if I had one year to live would be:*

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to take steps towards doing some of those things now are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps – both for myself and other people – would be:

*

*

*

The Top Priorities Approach

There are many ways to help people to achieve their goals. One of the most basic is to focus on their top priorities.

Different people will have different priorities. A person may need short-term, medium-term or long-term help:

To deal with a pressing issue or a challenging situation;

To take care of their health, finances or other practical issues;

To focus on their relationships, work or other parts of their life;

To take decisions that can affect themselves and other people;

To shape their short-term, medium-term or long-term future.

You will have your own approach to helping a people to manage these issues. One approach is to ask them:

"What are your top priorities right now?"

When appropriate, you can help them to tackle these priorities. The next steps may be to help them to lay the foundations for shaping a positive future.

Looking back, when have you followed elements of the top priorities approach? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

You may have done this when supporting a friend, counselling a person or helping somebody to make a transition. You may have done so when acting as a trusted advisor, being a mentor or playing another role.

What did you do then to clarify the person's top priorities? How did you clarify their short-term, medium-term or long-term goals? How did you then help them to tackle these priorities? What happened as a result?

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? You may do this when helping a friend, colleague or client to focus on their top priorities. What can you do then to help them to achieve their goals?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Top Priorities Approach

The specific situation when I may follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

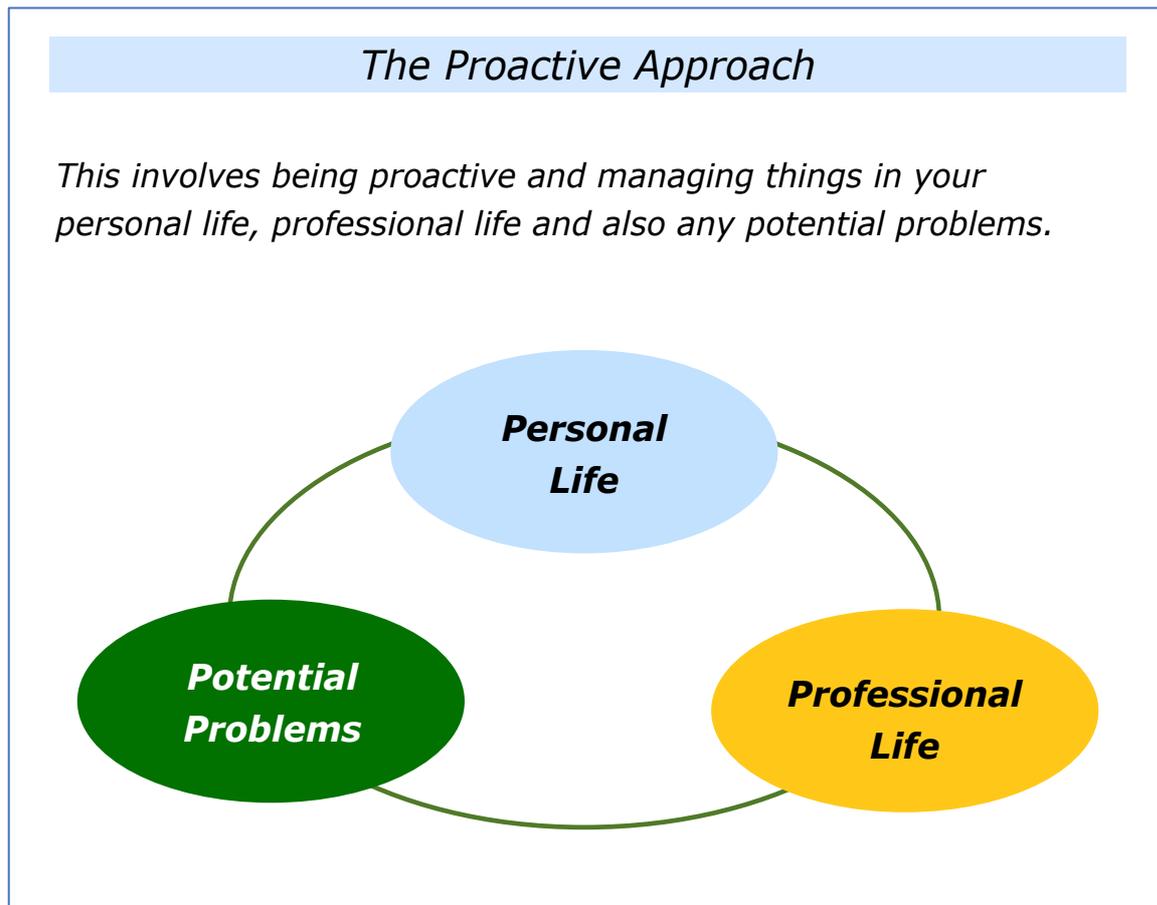

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Proactive Approach

Some people aim to be proactive. They aim to, as far as possible, shape the future. Some people choose to be reactive. They respond to events when they happen. Some people combine both approaches.

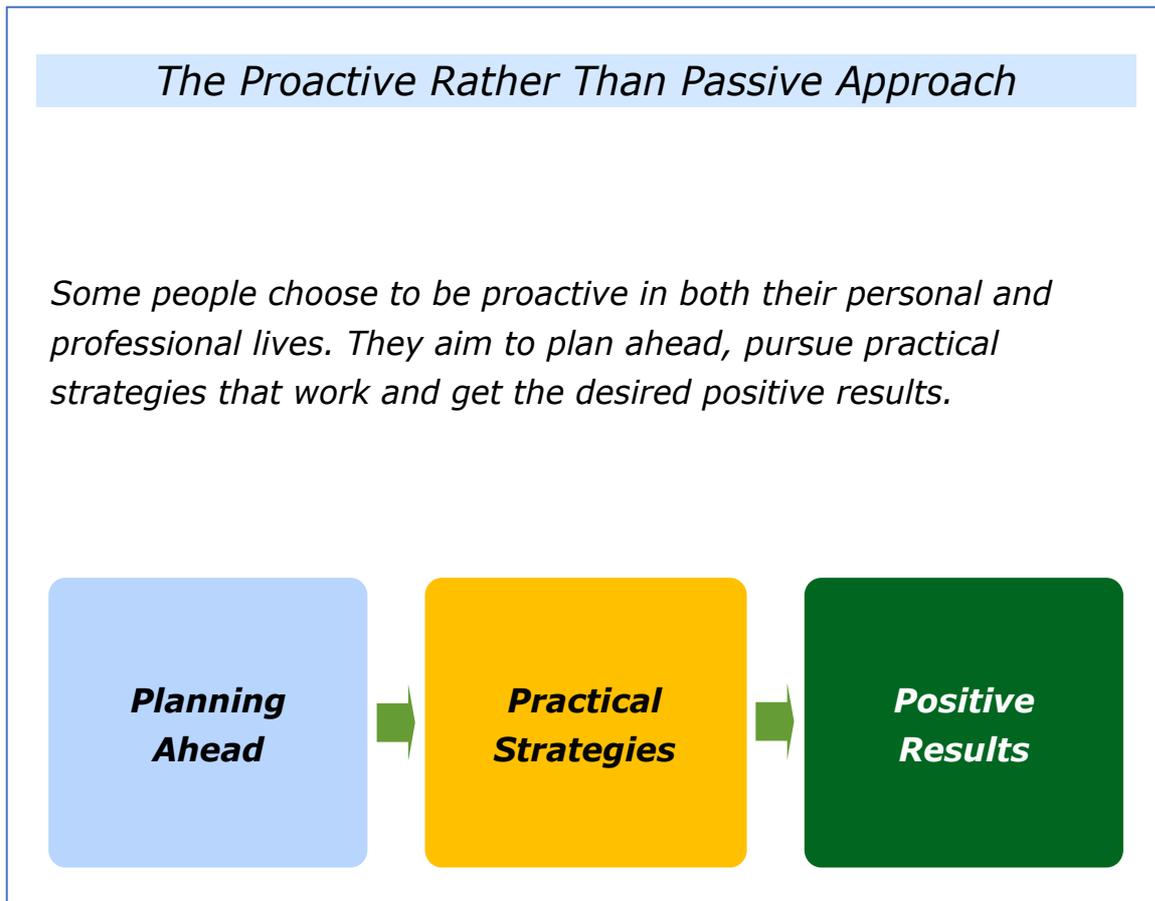

People who are proactive look ahead to anticipate events. They take this approach in their personal life, professional life and in managing potential problems.

Such people sometimes take time out to clarify their life goals and work towards their picture of success. They then aim to be proactive rather than passive. They then take the following steps when looking ahead to the next day, week, month, year or longer period.

They develop the daily habit of planning ahead in their personal and professional lives;

They develop practical strategies for managing things in their personal and professional lives;

They do their best to get the desired positive results in their personal and professional lives.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. What are the areas of your personal and professional life where you are good at being proactive? What do you do to stay ahead of the game?

Different people take this step in different ways. Here is a summary of how one person expressed their approach.

"Many years ago I began to focus on my life goals. This happened after attending a workshop on career development.

"During the session we were invited to clarify our long-term personal and professional goals. Since then I have made key decisions based on how these fitted with achieving my life goals.

"I also learned how to plan things by starting from the destination and working backwards. This is an approach I have applied in many aspects of my life.

"Bearing in mind the results to achieve, I consider the strategies I can follow to give myself the best chance of success. This leads to making action plans for the next day, week, month or even for the year.

"The planning part also involves anticipating and managing unexpected events. I then move into action and do what I can to deliver the goods."

Let's return to your own life and work. If appropriate, you may want to explore the following themes.

The Proactive Approach In Your Personal Life

Looking at your personal life, what are the areas where you are good at being proactive? What are the areas where you could be better?

You may be good at planning and doing the daily tasks, managing your money and caring for your loved ones. You may not be so good at taking care of your health or doing other things to shape your future.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Proactive Approach In My Personal Life

The specific ways that I am good at being proactive in my personal life are:

*

*

*

The specific ways that I could better at being proactive in my personal life are:

*

*

*

The Proactive Approach In Your Professional Life

Great workers aim to be proactive rather than passive. They aim to stay in charge rather than play catch up. They aim to be strategic and shape events. This helps them to stay ahead of the game.

Looking at your professional life, what are the areas where you are good at being proactive? You may be good at planning the practical aspects, organising your schedule, taking care of customers and managing your key stakeholders.

You may be good at managing the psychological aspects. These may include encouraging your colleagues and taking care of their wellbeing. You may also plan ahead and ensure the team will have positive and professional team members in the future.

People are now finding that their professional world is becoming more complex. Some organisations are asking them to deliver higher targets whilst, at the same time, being good at managing the key internal and external stakeholders.

This calls for individuals to be more self-managing. They may need: a) to be proactive and focus on their priorities; b) to achieve their professional goals; c) to take care of their personal wellbeing.

Try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe: a) the specific ways you are good at being proactive in your professional life; b) the specific ways you could be better.

The Proactive Approach In My Professional Life

The specific ways that I am good at being proactive in my professional life are:

*

*

*

The specific ways that I could be better at being proactive in my professional life are:

*

*

*

The Proactive Approach In Managing Potential Problems

How good are you at looking ahead and managing potential problems? Some people are good at doing it in their personal lives. They take action to prevent problems regarding their health, relationships and other issues.

Such people may also be good at managing problems when, despite their best efforts, such issues do arise. They then buy time to think, explore their options and do their best to achieve positive results.

Some people are better at anticipating and managing problems in their professional lives. This can be because it involves strategic rather than emotional decisions – though that is not always the case.

If you wish try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Proactive Approach In Managing Potential Problems

The specific ways I am good at anticipating and managing potential problems are:

*

*

*

The specific ways I could be better anticipating and managing potential problems are:

*

*

*

Many people are now aiming to take more control of their lives. This approach also helps them to buy time to think when unexpected events happen. They are then more likely to make good decisions.

Some aim: a) to plan ahead; b) to clarify the possible strategies that may work; c) to pursue their chosen strategy and do their best to get positive results. They also keep working towards achieving their life goals.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Proactive Approach In The Future

The specific things I can do to continue to be proactive in my life are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps will be:

*

*

*

The Appropriate Urgency Approach

Some people act with appropriate urgency in their lives and work. They are proactive and make things happen. They anticipate challenges and, when necessary, react appropriately to unexpected issues.

Some people have a lower sense of urgency. They tend to drift rather than be decisive. They may also choose to ignore issues that could ultimately affect their lives or work.

Great workers often take the following steps in certain situations. First, they start by clarifying the goals to achieve. Second, they decide on their plan of action. Third, they then act with appropriate urgency and do their best to achieve the desired goals.

They aim to do things at the right pace in the right way. Sometimes they do things quickly. Sometimes they take time to reflect before acting. Sometimes they put things on the back burner and act when necessary.

Such people develop the habit of thinking ahead. They anticipate what will happen and clarify their strategy. Getting on the front foot, they aim to shape the future. They aim to make things happen rather than just react to what happens.

Different people pursue this approach in different ways. Pete Collins, the American Football Coach, has a mantra that he expects his players to follow. This is:

"Be Early."

This phrase means more than be early for training and meetings. It means:

"Be early in your thinking, your preparation and your actions. Be proactive in everything you do in order to stay ahead of the game."

Different people also use different techniques for applying appropriate urgency. The following sections introduces some of these approaches.

The Dwight Eisenhower Matrix

People who apply appropriate urgency often focus on priority management. They aim to be effective rather than just being efficient.

President Eisenhower had an approach that has since been adapted and developed by other people. One model was popularised by Stephen Covey in his book The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People.

The approach divides tasks into certain quadrants based on the importance and urgency. You can then look at each task and choose which action you want to take. Here is one adaptation of the model.

Dwight Eisenhower Matrix

There have been many adaptations of the model that Eisenhower used for deciding on the urgency of issues. Here is one approach.

Do It

This is important and also urgent. Do it now.

Decide When To Do It

This is important but not urgent. Decide when to do it.

Delegate It

This needs to be done but not necessarily by you.

Delete It

These are tasks that do not necessarily add value.

John Kotter - Maintaining A Sense Of Urgency

John Kotter has enabled many organisations to be proactive and stay ahead of the game. He explains this approach in the following way.

Winners first make sure that a sufficient number of people feel a true sense of urgency to look for an organisation's critical opportunities and hazards now.

Great organisations create strategies for shaping the future. This calls for communicating clear goals, building committed teams and empowering them to deliver the goods.

People are encouraged to get some early wins and build momentum. They continue to do fine work, refuse to declare victory too early and then make change stick.

Such organisations build a culture of constant improvement. This calls for then continuing to have an appropriate sense of urgency.

Let's return to your own life and work. How can you maintain an appropriate sense of urgency? If appropriate, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to focus on the following areas.

Do It. Describe the specific things you want to act on now.

Decide When To Do It. Describe the specific things you want to schedule and do in the future.

Delegate It. Describe the specific things you can delegate.

Delete It. Describe the specific things you can delete from your list of possible things to do.

Here is the exercise on this theme. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

Appropriate Urgency – My Action Plan

*Do It. The specific things
I want to do now are:*

*

Decide When To Do It. The specific things I want to do in the future are:

*

Delegate It. The specific things I want to delegate are:

*

Delete It. The specific things I want to delete are:

*

The Rule Of Three Approach

The Rule Of Three

Some people follow this rule in their lives and work.

- They may focus on three goals;
- They may communicate three messages;
- They may create a model which has three steps.

Some people follow the rule of three in their lives and work. They may do this when focusing on three goals, giving three messages to people or creating a model that has three steps.

Why take this approach? People look for patterns to make sense of information. According to brain scientists, three is the easiest number for people to remember in terms of looking for patterns.

The Masterclass website gives some reasons when it can be useful to remember the rule of three. It describes this in terms of giving tips to writers but the rule often applies in other situations. Here is an excerpt from the website.

What Is The Rule Of Three?

The rule of three is a writing principle based on the idea that humans process information through pattern recognition. As the smallest number that allows us to recognize a pattern in a set, three can help us craft memorable phrases.

The rule of three is also incredibly useful as a structural tool: comedians use the rule of three to craft three-part jokes (set up, build anticipation, punch line) and screenplays generally follow a three-act structure.

Here is a further explanation from The Rule of Three website.

When it comes to communicating ideas, human beings are programmed to process information through instinctive pattern recognition.

Of course, to communicate effectively, the pattern needs to be as small as possible. So what is the smallest number required to make a pattern? Three.

And there lies its power. In its many forms, the Rule of Three, at heart, utilises simple three-element patterns to communicate complex ideas effectively.

The pattern works because it is short. Memorable. Powerful. That's why the Rule of Three is so pervasive throughout history:

In physics – Newton's three rules of motion.

In music – musical triads: the three-note building blocks of musical harmony.

In religion – the concept of the triple deity, common throughout world mythology, such as the holy trinity.

In art and photography – principles of composition, such as the rule of thirds.

Of course, as copywriters, we're primarily interested in writing and rhetoric. That's where the Rule of Three really comes into play:

Aristotle's three unities – dramatic unity of time, place and action.

The three dramatic conflicts – internal, relational and external.

The three-act structure – beginning, middle and end, used throughout drama and in the modern cinematic trilogy.

The list goes on. The Rule of Three has also been used to encapsulate some of history's most powerful ideas. For example: 'Liberty, Equality, Fraternity'.

Some of the most powerful speakers in in history fill their speeches with Rule of Three techniques.

The IQDoodle website expands on this theme. Here is an excerpt from the website.

The human mind actually enjoys thinking in patterns. In fact, we naturally look for and create patterns every day, in everything we do.

An example of this idea is within our language where adjectives are often grouped together in threes in order to emphasize an idea.

The Rule of Three is relevant because the number three is the lowest figure that can be used to form patterns in our mind.

This is important, because: The first instance of something occurring is considered as chance; The second instance is considered a coincidence; The third instance is perceived as a pattern.

Good leaders sometimes communicate their team's goals by following the rule of three. They may also add three points under each heading. This makes it easier to remember than a list of nine points. Different leaders do this in different ways. Here is one framework they use.

The Team's Goals

*The three key goals
we want to achieve are:*

1) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

2) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

3) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow the rule of three approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Rule Of Three Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the rule of three approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Focusing On The Goal Rather Than The Goalkeeper Approach

Great workers often focus on the goal rather than the goalkeeper. They then aim to hit the ball into their chosen part of the goal.

Such people focus on the possibilities and find solutions to problems. They also always aim to do their best. Sometimes that is actually the goal.

Looking back, can you think of a situation where you kept focusing on the goal? You may have been leading a project, producing a website, directing a play or doing another activity.

What did you do right then to reach your aim? You may have been doing something you felt passionately about. You may have planned ahead, set a positive goal and followed your chosen principles.

You may have got some early successes and done superb work. When faced by a challenge, you may have taken time to reflect, clarify the potential strategies and then did your best to achieve positive results.

Great workers put themselves into situations where they see opportunities rather than get bogged down by obstacles. They then aim to maximise the opportunities and, if necessary, find ways around the obstacles. One person expressed their approach in the following way.

"I love making wildlife films for television. Whilst I qualified as a vet, I prefer to create unusual films that raise awareness about wildlife.

"I love developing quirky projects, selling the ideas to television and filming the animals. I even enjoy digging toilets in the bush.

"Returning to the studio, I enjoy putting together the stories and doing the voice overs. Finally, I like presenting the programmes and, when appropriate, engaging with people using social media.

"My focus is always on the finished product, even if this may develop as we go along. I was once put in hospital after being attacked by an animal in the bush. We kept the cameras rolling, however, and the attack added colour to the film.

"Ten years ago I spent a year working in a big organisation. Most of my days were spent trying to get ideas past the gatekeepers rather than filming animals.

"I eventually left to resume freelance activities. Now I get on with making films that help others to appreciate wildlife."

What are the situations where you focus on the goal rather than the goalkeeper? How can you put yourself into more of these situations in the future? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Focusing On The Goal Rather Than The Goalkeeper Approach

The specific situation where I follow elements of this approach is:

*

The specific things I can to put myself into more of these situations in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Let's return to the theme of taking control of your life. Can you think of a situation where you may want to feel more in control? You may want to focus on your key life-priorities, feel more in control at work or manage difficult conversations.

Looking at the situation, how can you build on what you can control? How can you clarify and focus on your priorities? How can you shape the future and achieve your picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Feeling More In Control In The Future

The specific situation where I want to feel more in control is:

*

The specific things I can do to feel more in control in the situation are:

*

*

*

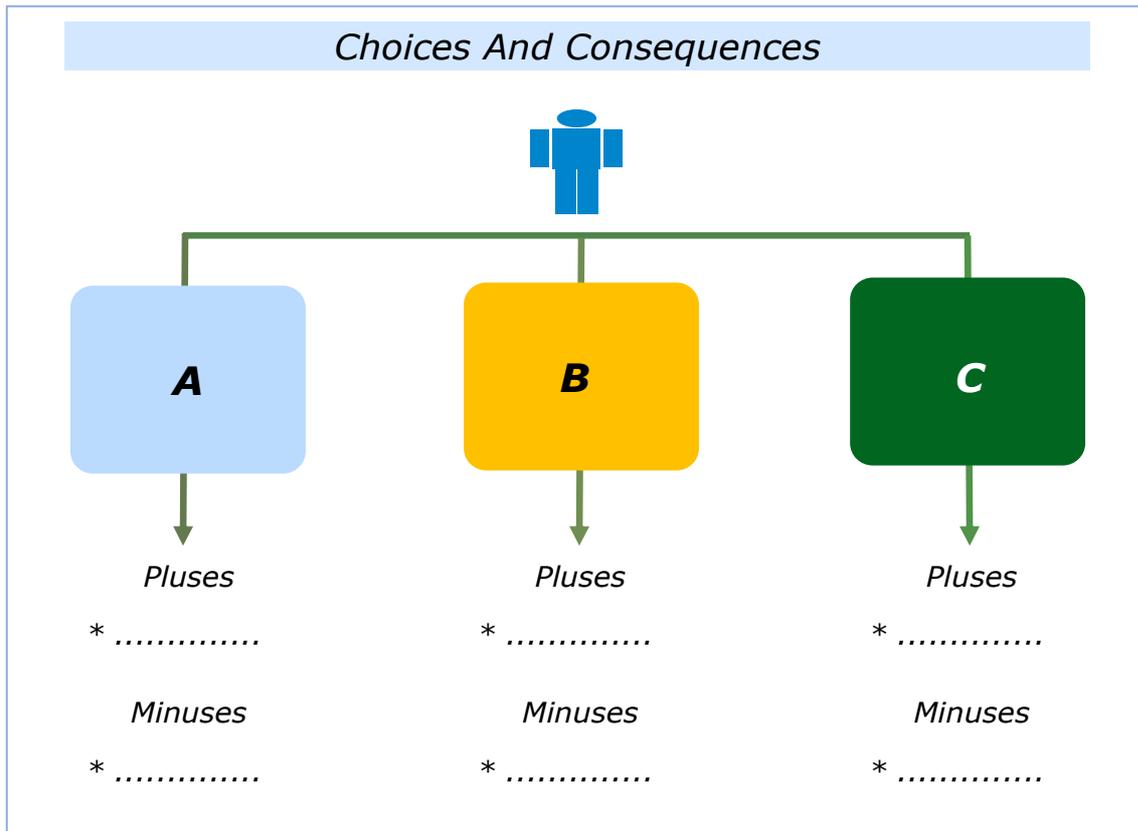

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Choices And Consequences Approach

People make choices all the time. The choices they make have consequences both for themselves and other people. Choosing not to do something is an option – but is also a choice.

Everybody experiences both successes and setbacks. The ways they choose to respond to these experiences can have a profound effect on their futures.

A person who achieves a success can celebrate for a while. They can then be complacent or use the success as a springboard towards continuous improvement.

A person who experiences a setback may need time to reflect. They can then choose to develop or dwell on the disappointment. They can be decisive and shape their futures or just drift.

Viktor Frankl described this approach in his book Man's Search For Meaning. This described his harrowing journey through the Nazi concentration camps.

Surrounded by terror, he wondered how to make sense of this madness. Viktor concluded each person had the freedom to choose their attitude. He described this in the following way.

Man is not free from his conditions, but he is free to take a stand towards his conditions.

Everything can be taken from a man or a woman but one thing: the last of human freedoms to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way.

Chance played an enormous part in the death camps, of course, but each person faced choices each day. Viktor describes how it was vital to look alert and ready to work. New arrivals found the ordeal began when the railway trucks drew into the camp sidings.

Recalling his own experience, he describes joining a long line which shuffled towards an SS Officer. The Officer looked at each person and casually pointed to the left or the right. Viktor explains:

It was my turn. Somebody whispered to me that to be sent to the right side would mean work, the way to the left being for the sick and those incapable of work.

My haversack weighed me down a bit to the left, but I made an effort to walk upright.

The SS man looked me over, appeared to hesitate, then put both his hands on my shoulders, I tried very hard to look smart, and he turned my shoulders very slowly until I faced right, and I moved over to that side.

Viktor survived the Nazi camps, emigrated to America and worked as a psychiatrist. Working with suicidal people, he recognised the similarity between them and prisoners in the death camps. He recalled two prisoners who talked of taking their lives.

Both men used the typical argument: that they had nothing more to expect from life. The challenge was to show the men that life was still expecting something from them. Viktor continues:

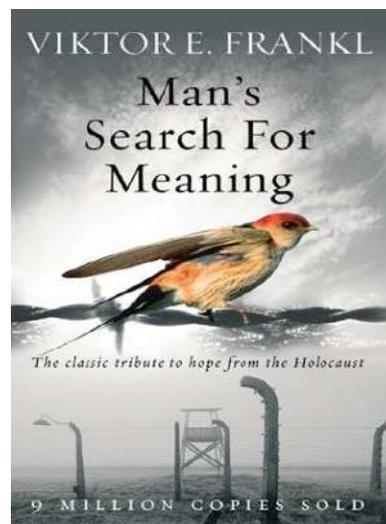

We found, in fact, that for the one it was his child whom he adored and who was waiting for him in a foreign country. For the other it was a thing, not a person.

This was a scientist and had written a series of books which still needed to be finished. His work could not be done by anyone else, any more than another person could ever take the place of the father in his child's affections.

A man who becomes conscious of the responsibility he bears toward a human being who affectionately waits for him, or to an unfinished work, will never be able to throw away his life. He knows the 'why' for his existence and will be able to bear almost any 'how'.

Viktor Frankl - Choosing Our Attitude

"Man is not free from his conditions, but he is free to take a stand towards his conditions. The last of human freedoms is the ability to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances."

The choices and consequences approach is strongly influenced by decision making theory and existential psychology. It can be used to help people to explore and expand their potential options for achieving their goals.

This approach is sometimes used in what can be called Choice Therapy. It is strongly influenced by existential psychology, reality therapy, logotherapy and the work of some self-help groups. The following section explores how it can be translated into action.

The Choice Therapy Approach

Choice Therapy, like all schools of therapy, it is based on certain assumptions about people. These involves encouraging people yet also expecting them to take responsibility for shaping their futures.

Imagine that you are qualified to provide therapy sessions and that somebody has asked for your help. Here is an overview of some of the guidelines you may follow in your own way.

Choice Therapy

Imagine that somebody has asked for your help. It can be useful to focus on the following themes.

- To help the person to feel welcome and encourage them to describe the topics they want to explore;
- To explain what you can and can't offer and to make clear working contracts – the ways you can help and also their responsibility in working towards the goals;
- To focus on the first theme they want to explore and clarify the real results they want to achieve - their picture of success;
- To explore their choices – the options they can pursue – towards achieving their goals;
- To explore the consequences of each option – the pluses and minuses – and for them to rate the attractiveness of each option on a scale 0-10;

- To, if appropriate, ask if it is okay for you to share some other possible options;
- To share knowledge – successful strategies, positive models and practical tool – that they can use in their own way to achieve their goals;
- To invite the person to reflect and, if they wish, choose the option – or combination of options – they want to pursue;
- To focus on the practical steps they can take to pursue their chosen option – this includes building on the pluses, managing the minuses and doing their best to achieve their picture of success;
- To move on to the next topic they want to explore.

There are many ways to apply this approach. The follow pages describe one example of somebody I worked with several years ago.

Dave – Choosing To Improve His Communication Style

Dave was several months into taking a leadership role in a high-tech company. The early signs were promising but then people began complaining about his communication style.

Whilst they admired Dave for his drive, they became upset about his mood swings and sniping. His home life was also deteriorating, especially the relationship with his teenage daughter. She was doing well in several school subject but he criticised her efforts in other areas.

Dave's view was that his daughter had to get used to what he called 'the real world'. But comparing her unfavourably to other classmates did not have the desired effect.

He approached me soon after receiving a warning from the company's board. Whilst they believed in his business expertise, they were questioning whether his leadership style would get the best from the company's knowledge workers.

Dave explained that, for one of the first times in his life, he felt like he was failing. He felt the need to take stock as a professional and as a parent. He had good intentions but these did not reflect in his communication style.

We explored his choices – the various routes - he could take in the future. Each route had consequences with both pluses and minuses For example:

He could continue to communicate in the same way but that may continue to produce the same challenging results;

He could try to improve his communication style in way that helped to achieve his personal and professional goals.

Dave had a strong personality and the way he expressed this had consequences. He could inspire or intimidate people. As with all decision making, the key question to answer was:

What set of consequences did he want?

Dave said he wanted to help people rather than hurt people. We therefore explored how he could improve his communication style. The involved focusing on the following steps.

Clarity

Looking ahead, we clarified the real results he wanted to achieve when communicating with people. This involved focusing on his team members and daughter. Bearing this in mind, did the following exercises.

My Team Members

The actual words I would like the people in my team to be saying about the way I communicate with them are these.

"Dave acts as a positive model. When communicating, he gives us the big picture and context. He outlines the strategies for going forwards in a way that encourages us to achieve them.

"He is not shy in presenting ideas for improvement. But he does this in a way that is supportive and provides us with practical ways we can get results."

My Daughter

The actual words I would like my daughter to be saying about the way I communicate with her are these.

"My Dad always supports me. When I ask him for help, he helps me to build on what I do well. He always listens to me. If I ask for advice, he shares his ideas in a way I can use.

"My Dad wants the best for me. Whilst I know he may have differing views from mine, I know he will always be there for me. He is a good friend who I know I can trust."

Dave clarified the results he would like to achieve when communicating with his team members and daughter. We then moved on to the next stage.

Communication Style

Looking ahead, we explored the specific situations in which Dave would like to communicate with people. Looking at what he wanted to achieve in each of these, we focused on the following theme.

How could he communicate in a way that was most likely to achieve the desired results?

We began with his professional life and concentrated on an upcoming meeting with his team. How could he prepare properly and set things up to succeed?

This highlighted a key point regarding growth. People often find it easier to develop by building on their strengths rather than by attempting radical change – even though the outcome may appear to be change. Bearing this in mind, we focused on the following theme.

Building On His Strengths As A Communicator

Everybody has successful patterns. Everybody has followed these at some point – even if only for a few moments – to achieve success. Taking this approach, we explored the following themes.

When did Dave communicate successfully? What did he do right then? What were the principles he followed? How could he follow those principles in other situations?

Dave's successful pattern was clear. He was good at communicating with clients. What did he do right then?

He prepared properly. He clarified the results he want to achieve – such as helping the client to achieve success. He followed a certain structure when planning the meeting. He aimed to make the session as predictable as possible – this helped him to deal with any surprises.

He contacted the client ahead of time about what they wanted to achieve from the meeting. He rehearsed properly before the session. He behaved in a positive and professional way in the meeting. He made clear contracts about the goals to achieve.

He followed a certain script but was also fully present. He focused on helping the client to achieve success. He was patient and managed any triggers that could send him into a negative spiral. He aimed to make it a positive experience for everybody involved.

Dave could follow similar principles with his team members. This called for him to prepare properly, be positive and be professional. It also required him to be patient when faced by any unforeseen challenges.

Previously Dave often went into such meetings with all guns blazing. He began by pointing out people's mistakes and then expected them to be open to ideas. This did not work.

The consequences were that people got scared. They stopped listening, stayed silent and waited for the meeting to be over. This approach did not encourage them to be proactive or focus on self-improvement.

Dave and I explored how he could translate the principles he followed with clients when working with colleagues. He wanted to create a positive environment but also get people to take responsibility. During the meeting he wanted:

To encourage people to focus on the team's goals;

To communicate the key strategies the team could follow to achieve the goals – but to do this in way that also allowed people to add to them.

To encourage people to take more ownership for improving the team's performance.

Dave was bright and intellectually he knew the best way forwards. But sometimes he got impatient and spoke without thinking. He could also be sarcastic and belittle people. This was followed by him feeling guilty.

Looking ahead, Dave needed a framework he could follow that would increase the chances of success. He therefore sent people an email that described the purpose of the session. This included giving them the following messages.

The Team Meeting Agenda

I am looking forward to our next team meeting on ... Here are some of the topics I would like us to explore. Please feel free to add any other topics that it would be good cover.

The Team's Goals

As you know, our goals for the year are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

I will start by giving an update on our progress. Then I want us to do exercises on the following themes.

First, the specific things we are doing well that will help us to achieve the goals and how we can continue doing these things.

Second, the specific things we can do better – and how – to help us to achieve the goals.

Third, the specific action plan we can follow to do our best to achieve the goals.

As the team leader, I obviously have views on these topics. At the same time, however, I would like us to pool our ideas. Certainly I will share my ideas. But I try to do this in a way that encourages good conversations.

The aim will be to finish the session with clear action plan: a) that gives us a good chance of reaching the goals; b) that people have contributed to building.

We will also need mission holders who are prepared to take responsibility for delivering parts of the plan. It will be important to give these people the support they need to do the job.

Let me know ahead of time if you would like to add any other items to the agenda. Look forward to seeing you at the meeting.

He sent the email and got a positive response. Several team members sent along topics to add to the agenda. This led to the next stage.

Concrete Results

Dave did his best to follow his successful communication style during the meeting. This involved following the framework he had sent to people ahead of time. It also involved him aiming:

To continue to be positive, professional and encourage people to contribute their ideas;

To keep focusing on the results to achieve, build on what the team was doing well and tackle areas for improvement;

To conclude by producing the action plan – together with scheduled progress reports - for achieving the team's goals.

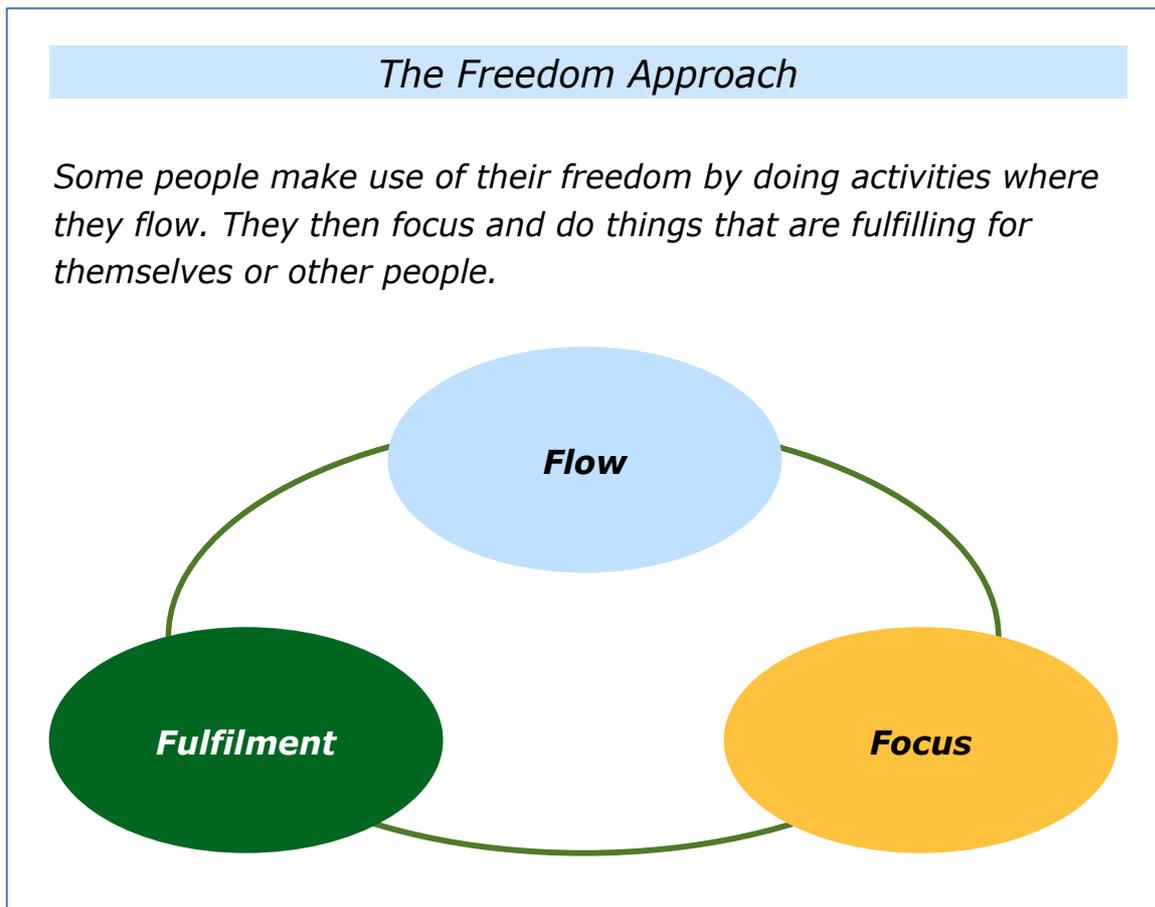

Dave managed to follow these principles and the meeting proved successful. There were times, however, when he had to be patient and remind himself to be professional.

This involved recognising and managing any triggers that would result in him going into a negative spiral. He later reported:

"This was the most difficult part. I had to remind myself how I would behave with clients in such situations. I managed to keep my temper, however, and we found solutions. This was hard work but it was worth it in the end."

During the following months Dave chose to build on his successful communication style. It wasn't all plain sailing but eventually it paid off in both his personal and professional life.

The Making Use Of Freedom Approach

Let's explore another aspect of taking control. Many people work towards having a sense of freedom. A person who is working to reach a specific goal may say something like the following.

Everything will be okay:

When I have enough money to retire ... When I sell my business ... When I get out of this place ... When I have got the right qualifications ... When I meet the right person ... When I win the Gold Medal.

Sometimes this proves to be the case. A person feels free and moves into shaping their future. They find it easy to do things that are rewarding for themselves or other people.

Sometimes this can be more difficult after a person has achieved a specific goal. Let's explore this theme.

Moving Beyond Post-Purpose Syndrome

A person who has been working towards a specific goal may experience post-purpose syndrome. They previously had a sense of purpose.

They followed a certain schedule when aiming to sell their business, win the Olympic title or reach another target. Suddenly they may need to find a new sense of purpose.

Another person may grab the opportunity. Certainly there may be dips along the road, but they are grateful for the chance to shape their future. Different people do this in different ways.

They may do activities where they experience a sense of flow. They may focus on these and do work that is fulfilling for themselves or other people.

They may do things that give them positive energy. They may translate these into doing a specific project and work towards this new sense of purpose.

They may clarify the positive things they want to give to people during their time on the planet. They may focus on doing these activities and passing on a positive legacy.

Let's return to you own life and work. Looking into the future, can you imagine a time when you may feel a sense of freedom? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What can you do then to make use of this opportunity? How can you use this freedom in a way that is beneficial? How can you use it to do things that may be fulfilling for yourself or other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Freedom Approach

The specific situation in the future when I may have a sense of freedom may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to make good use of this sense of freedom are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Spring Cleaning Your Life Approach

There are many exercises that invite people to focus on their priorities and life goals. The follow pages describe several approaches.

Some people amass lots of things in their lives. Imagine that you want to spring clean your life. This exercise invites you to look ahead and focus on the following things

Three People

Who are the three people – in addition to your loved ones – that you would like to spend time with and encourage? How would you like to build with these people?

Three Strengths And Three Goals

What are three strengths you have that you would like to build on? What are the three main goals you would like to focus on in your life? How can you work towards these goals?

Three Possessions And Three Other Things

What are the three possessions that you would like to keep? What are three other things you would like to keep in your life? How can you appreciate or use these in a beneficial way?

Focusing In The Future

Bearing in mind what you have written, describe the specific steps you can take to build on these things in the future. This can help you to keep focusing on what you believe is important.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Spring Cleaning My Life

The three people I would like to encourage and focus on – in addition to my loved ones - are:

*

*

*

The three strengths I have that I would like to build on are:

*

*

*

The three goals I would like to focus on working towards in my life are:

*

*

*

The three possessions I would like to keep and use are:

*

*

*

The three other things I would like to have in my life are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on what I have described are:

*

*

*

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to focus on your choices and the consequences. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to choose the route that produces the most positive consequences.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the choices and consequences approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Choices And Consequences Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

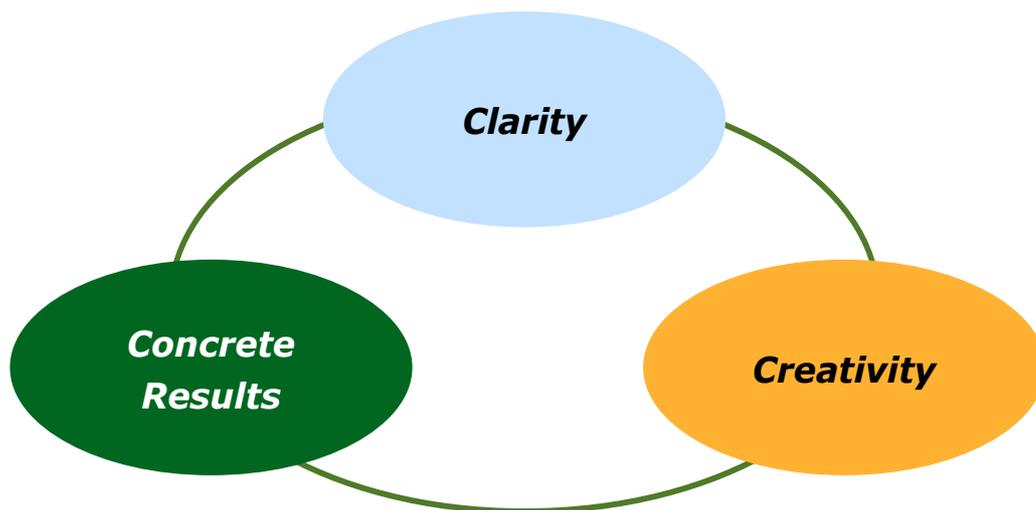

*

*

The Creative Decision Making Approach

Creative Decision Making

There are many models for making decisions. This approach focuses on how to make considered and, when appropriate, creative decisions. It involves focusing on the following themes.

Making decisions is a key skill in life. People make decisions all the time and the choices they make have consequences - both for themselves and for other people.

There are many models for making decisions. The following pages describe how people can make considered and, when appropriate, creative decisions.

This involves following the Three C approach and focusing on the following themes.

Clarity – This involves clarifying the real results you want to achieve;

Creativity – This involves clarifying the choices, consequences and creative solutions;

Concrete Results – This involves clarifying the action plan for achieving the desired results.

The following pages provide a pack you can use when going through these stages. It focuses on how to use the approach when tackling a specific challenge. But you can also adapt the approach to making other decisions or working towards a specific goal.

Good decision makers often buy time to make considered decisions. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to focus on the following themes.

The first step involves establishing clarity. It is vital to clarify the real results you want to achieve. This is the real 'What'. This step also includes clarifying the benefits of achieving the goals.

The next step is to use your creativity to explore the possible ways to achieve the goals. This is the 'How'. You can then follow your chosen route and do your best to achieve the desired concrete results. This is the 'When'.

Here is the pack that you can use to making decisions. You will, of course, use it in your own way to work towards achieving your goals.

The Creative Decision Making Pack

Introduction

There are many models for making decisions. This pack describes how people can make considered and, when appropriate, creative decisions.

This involves following the Three C approach. It involves focusing on clarity – establishing the real results to achieve - creativity and concrete results.

The pack describes how to use the approach when tackling a specific challenge. But you can adapt the approach to making other decisions or working towards achieving a specific goal.

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. This can involve working through the following stages.

Clarity

This involves: a) clarifying the challenge; b) clarifying the things you can control in the situation; c) clarifying the real results you want to achieve and the benefits of achieving these goals.

Creativity

This involves: a) clarifying the possible choices; b) clarifying the consequences of each option; c) clarifying the potential creative solutions.

Concrete Results

This involves: a) clarifying the route you want to follow; b) clarifying the working contracts you may need to make; c) clarifying your action plan and getting concrete results.

Clarity

Challenges. The specific challenge I want to tackle is: 'How to ...?'

Controllables. The specific things I can control in the situation are:

Clarity. The real results I want to achieve are:

Creativity

Choices. The possible options for achieving the results are:

Consequences. The pluses and minuses of each option are:

Creative Solutions. The other possible creative solutions are:

Concrete Results

Conclusions. The specific route I want to follow is:

Contracts. The contracts I need to make to achieve the results are:

Concrete Results. The specific action plan for achieving the results is:

Imagine that you aim to make a decision. As mentioned earlier, this can involve reframing the decision as a challenge. Here are some possible examples.

"How can I take care of my health? How can I take the next step in my career? How can I do satisfying work? How can I turn around a difficult team? How can I set up and run my own business?"

The following pages provide a framework you can use for making decisions. You can also use this approach when helping individuals, teams and organisations.

When helping teams, the word 'I' is simply changed to 'We'. You can then encourage people to channel their ideas towards achieving the picture of success. Here is the framework.

Clarity

Introduction

Clarity is crucial. Good decision makers clarify the real results they want to achieve – the real 'What' – before moving on to the 'How'. You can go through the following steps to establish your goals.

Challenges - the specific challenges you want to explore and then settling on the first challenge you want to tackle.

Controllables - the specific things you can control in the situation.

Clarity - the real results you want to achieve and the benefits of achieving these results.

Let's explore each of these stages.

Challenges

You can start by listing the various challenges you want to explore and then focus on the first topic you want to tackle. You can try to frame the challenge in positive terms. For example:

"How to stay healthy?" rather than "How to stop smoking?"

It can also be useful to frame the challenge in terms of "How to ...?" or "How can I ...?" For example:

"How can I do fulfilling work?" rather than "I want to change my career."

The "How to ...?" phrase also encourages you to begin using your imagination to generate solutions.

Challenges

*The specific challenges
I want to explore are:*

* How to ...

* How to ...

* How to ...

The first of these specific challenges that I want to explore is:

* How to ...

Here is some more information about the situation and the specific goals I want to achieve:

*

*

*

Controllables

Let's assume you have focused on a specific challenge. Before clarifying the results you want to achieve, it can be good to do a reality check. This involves clarifying what you can control in the situation

Peak performers control the controllables. They can, for example, control their attitude, professionalism and other things. They can't necessarily control the outcome of their efforts. They can, however, do their best to influence it. Peak performers build on what they can control and manage what they can't.

You can apply the same rule in your own life. Returning to the challenge, describe the things you can control in the situation.

It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Controllables

The specific things I can control in the situation are:

Clarity

Imagine you have clarified the challenge and the things you can control in the situation. You can then move on to the next stage.

Clarify the real 'What' before moving on to the 'How'. Sometimes it is tempting to begin moving into solutions mode.

Before doing that, however, it can be useful to clarify the real results you want to achieve and translate these into a clear picture of success.

Sometimes you may want to achieve lots of things related to this topic. If so, clarify all your goals and list these in order of priority.

Imagine that you are looking at the first challenge you want to tackle. The key is to ask:

"What are the real results I want to achieve?"

Sometimes this process takes a little time but it is a vital step in clarifying your real aims.

Here are some examples of how a person's original topic can change during the process of exploring the real results they wanted to achieve.

Person A originally said: "How can I get promotion in my company?"

They settled on: "How can I build a satisfying career where I do stimulating work and get a good salary?"

Person B originally said: "How can I as a leader turnaround difficult people in my organisation?"

They settled on: "How can I build a successful organisation?"

Person C originally said: "How can I deal with my manager who insists on micro-managing me every day?"

They settled on two things: "How can I deal with the present situation by behaving professionally towards my manager and delivering positive results? How can I find a rewarding role where I work with a manager whom I respect?"

Imagine you have clarified the specific challenge and what you can control in the situation. It can be useful to do the following things.

First - to clarify the real results you want to achieve. If appropriate, brainstorm all these goals.

Second - to list these results in order of priority.

Third - to describe the benefits of achieving these results.

Clarity

The real results I want to achieve - in order of priority - are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The specific benefits of achieving these results may include the following:

*

*

*

Creativity

Introduction

So far you have clarified the challenge, the controllables and the results to achieve.

It is then time to move on to exploring possible solutions. This will involve going through the following stages.

Choices - the potential options for tackling the challenge.

Consequences - the pluses and minuses involved in pursuing each option together with the attractiveness of each option.

Creative Solutions - the other possible creative solutions.

Let's consider these stages.

Choices

Bearing in mind the goals you want to achieve, you can explore all the possible options you can pursue. These can range from the obvious options – such as maintaining the status quo and doing nothing – to the more outlandish ones.

It's important to list all the options, even the ones you are not going to pursue, to consider the whole picture. This provides the whole context for choosing your way forward. So you can outline the following choices.

Option A is: To ...

Option B is: To ...

Option C is: To ...

Etc.

Consequences

Looking at each option in turn, you can consider what you see as the pluses and minuses of each route.

Great decision-makers often base their decisions on the consequences of each option rather than the options themselves. They then build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

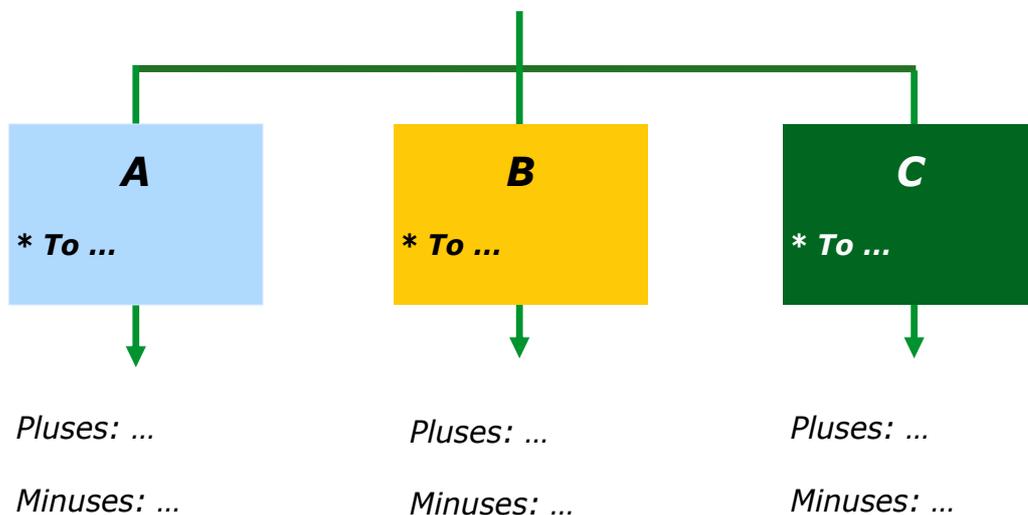

Bearing these things in mind, outline the various options. You can then rate the attractiveness of each option on a scale 0 – 10.

The overview of the potential options may look something like the illustration on the next page.

The pages that follow the illustration provide a framework that you can use to describe these options in more detail.

Choices and Consequences

The possible options are:

The attractiveness of each option is:

___ / 10

___ / 10

___ / 10

Option A Is:

* To ...

The pluses are:

- *
- *
- *

The minuses are:

- *
- *
- *

The attractiveness of this option is: ____ / 10

Option B Is:

* To ...

The pluses are:

- *
- *
- *

The minuses are:

- *
- *
- *

The attractiveness of this option is: ____ / 10

Option C Is:

* To ...

The pluses are:

*
*
*

The minuses are:

*
*
*

The attractiveness of this option is: ____ / 10

Creative Solutions

Looking at the goals you want to achieve, are there any other possible creative solutions? If appropriate, you can explore the following themes.

"Let's start by re-establishing my goals. What are the real results I want to achieve?"

"Looking at the options I have outlined, which is the most attractive option? How could I build on the pluses and minimise the minuses? Looking at the various options, is it possible to take the best parts of each route and create a new road?"

"Sometimes it can be useful to learn from my own successes. Looking back, have I ever been in a similar situation before and managed it successfully? What did I do right then? Is it possible to follow any of these principles to achieve the goals?"

"Are there any other people, teams or organisations that have tackled this kind of issue successfully? What did they do right? How can I follow these principles in my own way?"

"Bearing in mind the the goals I want to achieve, here are some other potential creative solutions I may wish to consider:

"Option D could be to: ...

"Option E could be to: ...

"Looking at all the options, which are the ones that make sense? Which of these would I like to explore further? How might these be translated into action?"

Keep going until you feel you have explored all the options. Then go on to the next stage.

Creative Solutions

The other possible creative solutions are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Concrete Results

Introduction

It is then time to translate the ideas in action. You can do this by going through the following stages.

Conclusions - the specific route you want to follow to do your best to achieve the results.

Contracts - the specific contracts you may need to make with people to do the work involved on the way to achieving the results.

Concrete Results - the specific action plans for achieving the results.

Let's consider these stages.

Conclusions

Sometimes it can be useful to take time out to reflect before settling on the way forward. Sometimes you may also need to cross over an emotional threshold before committing to your chosen route.

Imagine that you are ready to take this step. Looking at the various ways forward, you can settle on the route you want to follow. Sometimes you will choose to pursue one main option; sometimes you may want to pursue multiple options.

Imagine you have settled on your chosen route. What will be the pluses and minuses involved? How can you build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

Looking at the results you want to achieve, you may want to complete the following framework.

Conclusions

The route – or combination of routes – I want to follow for tackling the challenge and achieving the results is:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The pluses of following this route will be:

- *
*
*

The minuses of following this route will be:

- *
*
*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses are:

- *
*
*

Contracts

Looking at the road ahead, if appropriate you can consider if you need to make any contracts with people.

Your main contract, of course, is with yourself. Looking at the whole package – the pluses and minuses involved – do you want to make the commitment to achieving the goals?

You may also need to make clear working contracts with other people who can help you to reach the goals. If so, it is important to consider the following themes.

How can you ensure everybody is clear on the picture of success? How can you ensure people have the required support? How can you ensure people will proactively keep you informed about their progress toward the goals?

Contracting

The specific things I can do to make clear contracts with people are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Concrete Results

You can then make a clear action plan and build in some early successes. Different people make action plans in different ways. Some people focus on the following themes.

Who will be responsible for delivering certain specific results

What - what they will actually deliver in terms of specific results.

How - how they will aim to deliver the specific results.

When - when they will actually deliver the specific results.

You will have your own approach to action planning. Bearing this in mind, complete the following step.

Concrete Results

My specific action plan for delivering the results is:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Conclusion

This pack has explored one approach to making decisions. As mentioned earlier, the approach can also be adapted to help other people, teams and organisations to make decisions.

You will, of course, follow the approach in your own way. You can reframe the decision as a challenge and then aim:

To establish clarity – the real results to achieve;

To explore the choices, consequences and creative solutions;

To achieve the desired concrete results.

You can then aim to shape a positive future and achieve your picture of success.

The Choosing To Be A Creator Rather Than A Complainer Approach

People Can Choose To Be Creators Or Complainers

The Creative Approach

What do I want to create today?

How can I find creative solutions to the challenges?

How can I do things that help people or the planet?

The Complaining Approach

What do I want to complain about today?

How can I find more problems to complain about?

How can I find reasons for not doing things that help people or the planet?

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to be creators rather than complainers. The choice they make has consequences for both themselves and other people.

People who take the creative approach often have a positive attitude but are also realistic. Different people learn this in different ways.

Some learn from parents in the family. Sitting round the table, they hear their parents say things like:

"We have a good life ... We can count our blessings ... We don't have a lot of money but we have each other ... We can find solutions to problems ... We want you to be happy."

Some people learn it from significant individuals in their life. They may have a teacher, coach or another person who acts as a positive model. Such a person may provide encouragement and demonstrate creative ways of solving problems.

Some people learn from reading about inspiring individuals. They learn from the paths taken by people who are different. These may be inventors, athletes, entrepreneurs, singers, actors and others who do great work in their chosen field.

People who take the creative approach want to keep adding knowledge, models and tools to their repertoires. They also have a positive approach to challenges. They say things like:

"What is the challenge? What are the real results to achieve? What are the conventional ways to tackle the challenge? What do we know works? How can we follow these principles – plus add other skills – to tackle the challenge?"

"Are there any other potential creative solutions? When faced by a conflict, for example, how can we do our best to find win-win solutions? What are the strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?"

People who take the creative approach often find it generates positive energy. It is then more likely to help themselves and other people. Those who take the complaining approach are more likely to generate negative energy. This seldom helps themselves or other people.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to take the creative approach? How can you follow this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Choosing To Be A Creator Rather Than A Complainer Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Stress Testing The Strategies Approach

Great workers are often positive but realistic. Such people start by clarifying the real results they want to achieve. They then aim:

To clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

To stress test the strategies by simulating the possible things that could happen when translating these into action;

To implement the strategies and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Such people take this approach when building flood defences, designing space rockets, leading a company, rehearsing difficult conversations with employees or other activities.

Some people call this the pre-mortem stage as opposed to the post-mortem stage. They aim to see how something will react when subjected to certain conditions.

The stress testing part is crucial. Such people see how their chosen strategies will work in every conceivable scenario. Sometimes this leads to confirming the strategies. Sometime it leads to making adjustments. Sometime it leads to starting again.

People then do the work. Keeping a constant eye on what is happening, they build on what is working and find solutions to challenges. People keep going until they achieve success.

Looking at your own life, can you recall a time when you stress tested the strategies you planned to follow? You may have done this when preparing for an interview, leading a project, tackling a tough challenge or doing another activity.

What did you do to stress test the strategies? How did you clarify the potential difficulties? How did you make plans to deal with the challenges? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Stress Testing Can Lay The Foundations For Achieving Success

Some organisations refuse to explore challenging scenarios. When problems occur, they try to pass the buck or say that such events were unpredictable. It also often emerges that the leaders had failed to take heed of previous warnings.

Great organisations stress test their chosen strategies before implementing these fully. Some may also invite outsiders to give a view and think the unthinkable.

McKinsey & Company have produced an excellent article on this theme called Have you tested your strategy lately? Below are just a few of the questions they ask.

Does your strategy beat the market? Does it tap a true source of advantage? Does it embrace uncertainty? Does it balance commitment and flexibility? Is your strategy contaminated by any bias? Is there conviction to act on your strategy? Have you translated it into an action plan?

Many years ago I worked with a yachting team that took part in a round-the-world race. After answering questions similar to those listed above, they then practiced implementing the strategies.

The crew began by getting the basics right in icy but relatively good conditions. They then kept increasing the difficulties by, for example, rescuing a man who had fallen overboard.

Wasn't that risky? Certainly it was dangerous. But it would have been more dangerous to set out without knowing how to rescue somebody in a heavy sea.

Great teams settle on their chosen strategies and get the basics right. They then increase the stress levels to ensure they can perform brilliantly when under pressure.

Looking at my own work with organisations, we have often clarified the strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success. Looking ahead, we have then explored the following themes.

Are we serious?

Bearing in mind the pluses and minuses involved, do we really want to implement the strategies? If so, how can we build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

What are the challenges we may face? How can we prevent some of the difficulties happening? How can we manage them if they do happen?

Let's take a reality check. On a scale 0 – 10, how high would we rate our chances of achieving success?

What can we do to maintain or improve the rating? What else can we do to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

Great individual workers ask similar questions. They then rehearse how to translate the strategies into action. Sometimes they do this in real conditions; sometimes they may use mental rehearsal. Whatever method they use, however, they aim to rise to occasion when it matters.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking to the future, can you think of a situation when it would be useful to stress test your strategies?

This could be a personal or professional situation. You may be aiming to take an exam, rebuild your team, deal with a potential crisis, have a difficult conversation with people or do another activity.

Imagine you have settled on the key strategies you can follow to achieve success. How can you stress test these strategies? How can you, if appropriate, make the necessary adjustments? How can you then translate these strategies into action?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stress Testing The Strategies Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

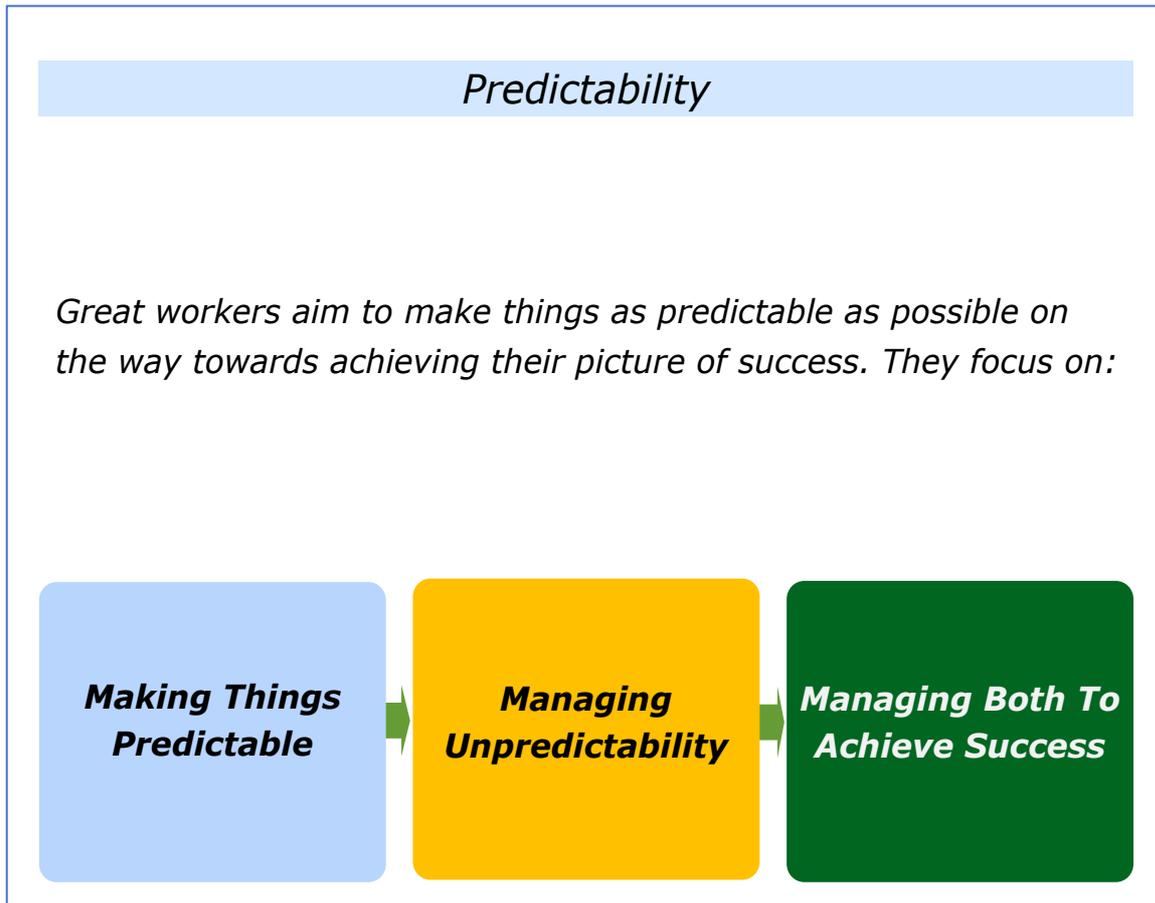

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Predictability Approach

Great workers build on what they can control when doing a piece of work. But they also realise that some things may be beyond their control. They therefore prepare properly. They aim:

To make things as predictable as possible ... To manage the unpredictable things ... To manage both the predictable and unpredictable things on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

At the same time, they may like to leave space for pleasant surprises. Let's explore how such people sometimes take these steps.

They Make Things As Predictable As Possible

People who take this approach start by focusing on the predictable things. They take the following steps when aiming to do a piece of work.

They clarify what they can do to make things as predictable as possible

Some start by focusing on what they can predict about their own behaviour. They may predict, for example, that they will do their best and deliver high professional standards. Bearing in mind what they can control, they then aim:

To plan ahead properly ... To clarify the real results to achieve ... To translate these into a clear picture of success ... To clarify the benefits of achieving the picture of success.

To clarify how they can build on their strengths when working towards the goals ... To clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success ... To translate these into a clear action plan.

To rehearse following their chosen strategies ... To rehearse delivering high professional standards ... To rehearse encouraging themselves and other people.

Such individuals clarify what they can predict about their own behaviour. They then move on to the next theme.

They clarify some of the predictable things that may happen

Great workers use their imagination to take this step. They clarify the predictable events and challenges that may happen when doing a piece of work. They aim:

To anticipate the predictable challenges they may face ... To clarify how to prevent some of these happening ... To rehearse how to manage some of these challenges if, despite their best efforts, they do happen.

To anticipate how other people may behave when they are doing the piece of work ... To anticipate the possible positive and challenging situations ... To rehearse how to manage these successfully.

They may then move into action and do fine work. Sometimes this can be enough to enable them to achieve their goals. There may be times, however, when they need to focus on the following theme.

They Manage The Unpredictable Things That May Happen

Great workers recognise that their work may involve encountering unpredictable situations. These can be caused by chance, random events or other things they can't control. They therefore focus on the following theme.

They clarify some of the potentially unpredictable things that could happen

Such workers again use their imagination to explore the potential positive and challenging scenarios. Bearing these in mind, they aim:

To clarify the potentially unpredictable things that could happen in their own personal and professional lives – such as illnesses, setbacks or other events;

To clarify the potentially unpredictable things that could happen in their professional field or market - such as innovations, new competitors or other challenges;

To clarify the potentially unpredictable things that could happen in society or the wider world – such as economic issues, political factors or Black Swan events.

Imagine that a person has explored these potential events. They may then move on to the next theme.

*They manage the unpredictable
things that could happen*

Different people take different approaches to managing such situations. Some explore each potential scenario in turn. They then aim:

To clarify what may actually be happening in the specific situation ... To clarify the potential consequences of what may happen ... To clarify what they can do to stop any immediate negative consequences.

To clarify what they can control in the situation ... To clarify the real results to achieve ... To clarify the strategies they can follow to manage the situation successfully.

To move into action, get some early successes and manage any short-team problems ... To re-establish stability ... To do their best to get positive results and achieve their picture of success.

Different people anticipate and manage potential challenges in different ways. The following section looks at how one person took this approach.

Alanna Shaikh: How I'm Preparing To Get Alzheimer's Disease

Alanna became well-known as a result of her TED talk about how she was preparing to get Alzheimer's Disease.

She is also a principal consultant at an organisation called Tomorrow Global. The website says:

We help clients think proactively about the future of global health. That includes strategic planning, preparedness, risk analysis, and troubleshooting.

Here is how the TED website described aspects of her work. This is followed by Alanna outlining how she is proactively working to tackle a personal challenge.

Global development expert Alanna Shaikh takes on the toughest of health issues - from the ones affecting the globe at large to the ones hurting her own family. On her blog, Blood and Milk, she aims to make global development issues both accessible and understandable.

In her TED Book, What's Killing Us, she explains the biggest challenges in global wellness -- from HIV/AIDS to the diminishing effectiveness of antibiotics - in a way that anyone can understand.

Alanna is especially interested in Alzheimer's, as she has watched her father deteriorate from the disease over the past 12 years. But she says the experience has not sent her into denial - she plans to be prepared for the genetically transmitted disease, should it ever arrive.

Alanna intends to develop a 'hobby' to keep her hands and mind active. She also intends to keep her body healthy. She says:

"The more things my hands know how to do, the more things that I can be happy and busy doing when my brain's not running the show anymore."

She moves on the third point which, she says, is for her more difficult. She aims to continue to become 'a better person'. Alanna refers to her Dad, who emits love. She says that, to fight the disease:

"I need a heart so pure that if it's stripped bare by dementia, it will survive."

Imagine that a person has done what they can to manage potential events. They may then move on to the final stage.

They Manage Both The Predictable And Unpredictable Things On The Way Towards Achieving Success

Great workers continue doing fine work. This also involves continuing to manage the predictable and unpredictable things on the way towards achieving their picture of success.

Taking this approach calls for continually reading reality. Some people do this by focusing on what is in the Green, Amber and Red Zones.

The Green Zone

They clarify the specific things that are going well and how they can build on these to continue to achieve success.

The Amber Zone

They clarify the specific things where there may be warning signs and focus on the steps they can take to improve in these areas.

The Red Zone

They clarify the specific things that are not going well – plus any unpredictable things that may happen – and how to tackle these issues.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to make things as predictable as possible and manage any unpredictable events that may happen. It is then do your best to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of the predictability approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Predictability Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to make things as predictable as possible whilst also managing the unpredictable things are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Setting Things Up To Succeed Approach

Setting Things Up To Succeed

This is an approach that can be used in many personal and professional situations. You can aim:

- To focus on clarifying the picture of success;
- To focus on the strategies most likely to achieve the picture of success;
- To focus on rating and improving the chances of achieving the picture of success.

You can then move into action and do your best to achieve the picture of success.

This is an approach that can be used in many situations. The aim is to set things up to increase the chances of success. You may use it to build relationships, do projects, lead a team or do other activities.

You may start by looking ahead to a specific situation. You may then aim: a) to clarify the results to achieve; b) to clarify the strategies for achieving success; c) to rate and improve the chances of success. You can then do your best to achieve success.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a situation when you aimed to set things up to succeed? This could have been in your personal or professional life. What did you do then to make this happen?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Setting Things Up To Succeed In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I did my best to set things up to succeed was:

*

The specific things I did then to do my best to set things up to succeed were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Imagine that you want to follow some of these steps in the future. Let's explore how you can do this in your own way.

*You can focus on clarifying
the picture of success*

You can focus on something you want to do in your personal or professional life. You may want to build a relationship, run a mentoring session, do a specific project, lead a team or do another activity. Looking ahead, you can ask yourself the classic questions.

What is the situation I want to focus on? What is the relationship I want to build, the task to complete, the project to do, the team or organisation to lead, the challenge to tackle or the other activity I want to do?

What are the things I can control in the situation? What are things I can't control? How can I build on what I can control and manage what I can't control?

What are the real results I want to achieve in the situation? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the picture of success?

Imagine that you have clarified the results you want to achieve. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can focus on the strategies most likely to achieve the picture of success

You can do your best to set things up to succeed. The steps you take will depend on what you want to do in your life or work.

You may want to do something in your personal life. This could be to build a long-lasting relationship, help your child to thrive, develop a healthy lifestyle, spend time with positive people or do another activity.

You may want to do something in your professional life. This could be to run a counselling session, do satisfying work, tackle a crisis, take over an ailing team, shift the culture in an organisation or do another activity.

Bearing these things in mind, you may explore some of the following themes. These involve clarity, contracting and concrete results.

Clarity

What are the specific results I want to achieve in the situation? What may be the specific results that other people want to achieve? If appropriate, how can we – as far as possible – get win-wins? Bearing these things in mind, what may be the picture of success?

How can I do my best to set things up to succeed? What are the strengths, assets and resources I can use to reach the goals? How can I use these things to do my best to reach the goals?

What are the key strategies I can follow to increase the chances of success? How can I build on my strengths and follow my successful style of working? How can I make use of the other resources?

What are the positive things in the situation? How can I build on these positive things? How can I build on the positive people and positive energies? How can I get some quick successes?

What are the potential difficulties that I may encounter? How can I prevent some of these happening? How can I manage these challenges if, despite everything, they do happen?

Who may be the other people – the person or group of people - involved in the situation? How may these people behave? What may be the positive things they may do? How can I build on these? What may be the not-so-positive things they may do? How can I manage these things?

Contracting

Clear contracting will also be crucial. This includes making contracts with myself and with other people. These will be about 'What' we want to achieve and 'How' we want to work towards achieving these goals.

Clear Contracting With Myself

What are the clear contracts I need to make with myself about: a) the specific results I want to achieve; b) the specific things I am prepared to do when working towards the goals; c) the specific things I am not prepared to do.

Clear Contracting With Other People

What are the clear contracts I may need to make with other people about: a) the agreed goals to achieve; b) my responsibilities in working to achieve the goals; c) their responsibilities in working to achieve the goals?

What support would I like to help to achieve the goals? How can I do my best to get this support? How can I find solutions if some of the support is not available?

Concrete Results

Let's return to the key strategies I want to follow. How can I translate my chosen strategies into a clear action plan? How can I get some quick successes?

How can I rehearse following my chosen strategies? How can I rehearse managing any potential challenges? How can I buy time to think if unexpected things happen?

How can I build on what is working? How can I tackle areas for improvement? How can I continue to encourage myself and support other people? How can I do my best to achieve the goals?

Imagine that you have considered how to set things up to succeed. Before embarking on the journey, you may wish to explore the following step.

You can focus on rating and improving the chances of success

You may have a positive attitude but it is also important to be realistic. Whilst aiming to do your best, you do not want to ignore warning signs or become a victim. It can therefore be useful to rate the chances of success.

Bearing in mind what you can control, how would you rate the chances of achieving the goals? Rate this on a scale 0-10. Be honest when you do the rating because this will be important when exploring the next step.

Imagine that you have rated the chances on a scale 0-10. You can then describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the chances of success.

These may be things that you can do to set realistic goals, get some early successes, get support or take other steps. This involves completing the following sentences.

Success Rating

Bearing in mind the things I can control, the rating I would give regarding the chances of achieving the goals is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *
- *
- *

Imagine that you have done all these things. Make sure the chances of success are at least 7+/10. You may then be in a position to do your best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific situation where you may want to set things up to succeed? This could be in your personal or professional life.

Looking ahead, what is the situation you would like to focus on? What are the results you want to achieve in the situation? What are the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success?

How can you set things up to succeed? How can you follow your chosen strategies? If appropriate, how can you make clear contracts with people? How can you get support?

How can you translate your strategies into action? How can you keep building on what is working? How can you tackle areas for improvement? How can you then do your best to achieve the picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Setting Things Up To Succeed In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may want to set things up to succeed may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to do my best to set things up to succeed are:

*

*

*

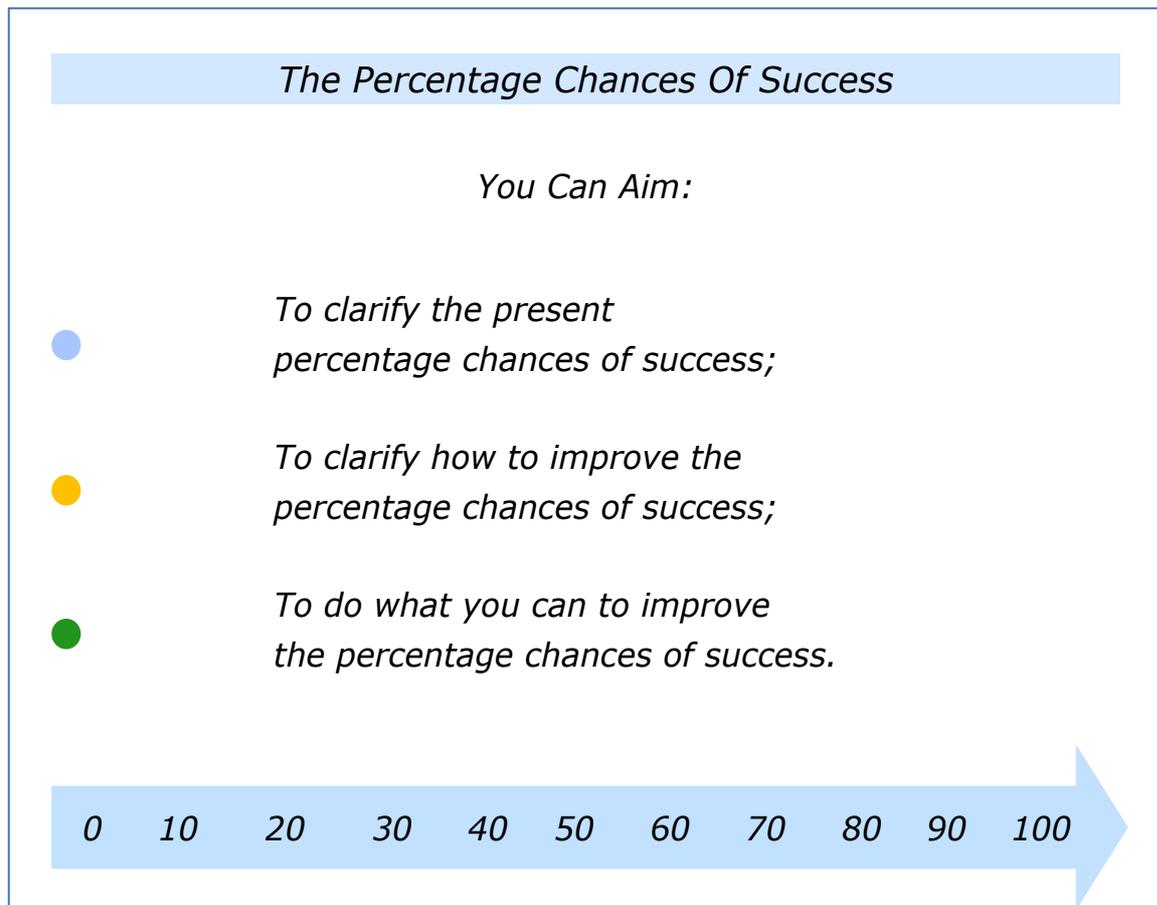

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Improving The Percentage Chances Of Success Approach

This is an approach that is used in sports but it can be applied in other fields. It involves doing your best to improve the percentage chances of success.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own work. You may be aiming to facilitate a mentoring session, run a project, lead a team, transform a culture or do another activity.

Let's assume that in this instance you are going to be leading a team which needs to deliver a particular project. Before applying for the role you did your due diligence.

You began by doing lots of research. Bearing in mind what you would be able to control, you rated the percentage chances of achieving success as 70% Plus. This led to you taking the next steps.

You Set Things Up To Succeed

You met with the key stakeholders and made clear contracts about: a) the results to achieve; - the picture of success; b) the support required; c) the things you would do to proactively keep them informed.

You then clarified the key strategies you could follow to achieve the picture of success. You also rehearsed following these strategies and managing any challenges along the way.

You also put the right people in the right places in the team. You also made clear contracts with each of them about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's assume that you have taken these steps. You have begun the work and got some idea of the reality facing the team. Bearing these factors in mind, you may explore the following themes.

You Can Clarify The Present Percentage Chances Of Success

Imagine that you have been leading the team for several months. The team has got some early successes and the work seems to be going reasonably well.

There may have been some events, however, that could begin to affect the team's performance. These could include some of the following:

Changes in the market – such as new competitors arriving and being able to move quicker than your company;

Changes in personnel – such as your manager, who was a key backer, moving on and being replaced by somebody who is an unknown quantity;

Changes in financial conditions – such as your organisation cutting costs and creating uncertainty;

Changes in your team – such as some people not performing as expected or some leaving for personal or other reasons;

Changes in other things you can't control – such as key customers leaving or changes in technology that are embraced by your competitors but not by your company.

Bearing these factors in mind, you can do a new reality check. Some of the findings may be challenging but you can then move towards finding solutions. You may want to explore the following questions.

How high would I rate the present percentage chances of achieving success?

Try to be as objective as possible when answering the question. Once you have given a percentage rating, then answer the following question.

What are some of the reasons why I have given this present percentage rating?

Imagine you have listed these reasons. Although you will get into more detail in the next section, it can be good to begin to lift your spirits by starting to explore the follow question.

What are the things we can do to maintain or improve the percentage chances of success?

Let's assume that you have explored these questions. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

You Can Clarify How To Improve The Percentage Chances Of Success

Imagine that you have rated the chances as 70%. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, you can then brainstorm ideas under the following heading.

The specific things we can do to improve the percentage chances of success are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Dare to describe lots of ideas – even those that may seem improbable. You can then move on to being selective and focusing on the actions you believe in.

As a leader, you may be able to implement some of these ideas without consulting with your key stakeholders but there may be others where you need their backing. Here are some of the ideas you may brainstorm.

We can aim:

To get some more quick success stories to show what is working and then go to our stakeholders to get more backing;

To be more selective by focusing on the specific areas where we stand the greatest chance of success rather than by spreading our resources too thinly;

To make changes in the team that will increase the chances of us achieving success;

To focus on the practical things we can do to build on what we can control and manage some of the things we can't control;

To produce several potential strategic options for going forwards - together with the pluses and minuses of each option - such as:

a) to pursue our present strategy with either our present resources, with added resources or fewer resources;

b) to pursue a more selective strategy – such as focusing on certain specific targets – and in this way improving the chances of success;

c) to pursue a potentially different strategy that builds on our strengths and will stand a good chance of achieving certain successes.

d) to meet the key stakeholders to outline the potential options – together with the pluses and minuses of each – plus any other options they can suggest and agree with them on the route going forwards.

Let's assume that you have explored the various options. This takes you to the next stage.

You Can Do What You Can To Improve The Chances Of Success

You may then take time to see the big picture and consider the potential options going forwards. Looking ahead, you may believe that, providing you and the team do your best, there is still a good chance of achieving success.

You can then aim: a) to focus on the potential actions that lie within your area of autonomy; b) to have translate some of these into action and get some early successes. This will create positive momentum.

You may then work with the team to keep focusing on the things that are in the Green, Amber and Red Zones. This will involve people doing the exploring exercises.

The Picture Of Success

The specific goals we want to achieve by ... are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The specific benefits of achieving these goals will be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The Green Zone

The specific things that are going well in terms of working towards the picture of success are:

The specific things we can do to build on these are:

The Amber Zone

The specific things where there are warning signs in terms of working towards the picture of success are:

*

*

*

The specific things we can do to move these into the green zone or take other actions are:

*

*

*

The Red Zone

The specific things where there are real issues in terms of working towards the picture of success are:

*

*

*

The specific things we can do to make decisions about these and then manage the consequences are:

*

*

*

Imagine that the team is doing superb work but there are still challenges. Some of these may be surmountable but others may pose more existential threats.

You can again rate the team's percentage chances of success and how to improve the chances. But you may reach a point when there needs to be a more radical appraisal.

You may look at the big picture and consider the possible ways forwards. This may lead to preparing to have a one-to-one session with your key stakeholder – the person who can make executive decisions. The stakeholder may want you to brief them ahead of time, however, because they may not like surprises.

Bearing this in mind you can prepare properly. This will involve giving the context and aiming:

To revisit the original picture of success and the benefits to the company;

To give an update on the successes so far and the potential challenges;

To outline the possible ways forward – together with the pluses and minuses of each option;

To invite the stakeholder to add any other possible options and, if they ask you, to offer your recommendations;

To invite the stakeholder to consider which route they would like you and the team to take in the future.

It will be vital to present this in a professional way – as if you were an outside consultant – and focus on what may be best for the company. It is important to take this approach rather than get into fights.

The stakeholder may agree to following one of the options that you believe in. Or they may produce one that you feel it is possible for you to pursue. You can then focus on how to implement the strategy.

Let's anticipate a potential difficulty. What happens if the stakeholder insists on pursuing a route that you may not believe in? It can then be useful:

To stay calm, listen and show you understand what they are saying;

To buy time to think and, in a professional way, say you want to explore the possibility;

To finish the meeting in a positive way and say when you will get back to them with a plan.

Taking time to reflect, you can consider your possible options going forward. Looking at each of the options, you can clarify the pluses and minuses for you personally and for the team. The options may include the following:

To go with what the stakeholder suggests;

To build on some of the positives in the suggestion and find ways to manage the minuses;

To offer another possible route – or combination of routes – to the stakeholder and outline the benefits to the company;

To decide to move on from the role because you no longer believe it is possible to do satisfying work or achieve success;

To suggest other possible ways forwards.

Imagine that you have explored all these options and have made a decision. Whatever route you choose to go, it will be important to behave in a professional way.

You may choose to stay in the role and do your best to increase the chances of success. You will have taken this decision as a responsible adult, however, and not by choosing to be a victim.

Alternatively, you may choose to move on. If so, you may aim to do this in a way that creates, as far as possible, wins for you, for your family and for the company.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to do your due diligence. It is then to set thing up to succeed, do superb work and keep focusing on how to increase the percentage chances of success.

Here we have explored how to take these steps when leading a team. The approach can be applied in other situations, however, such as when working as an individual. It can also be adapted to aspects of your personal and professional life.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Improving The Percentage Chances Of Success

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to increase the chances of success are:

*

*

*

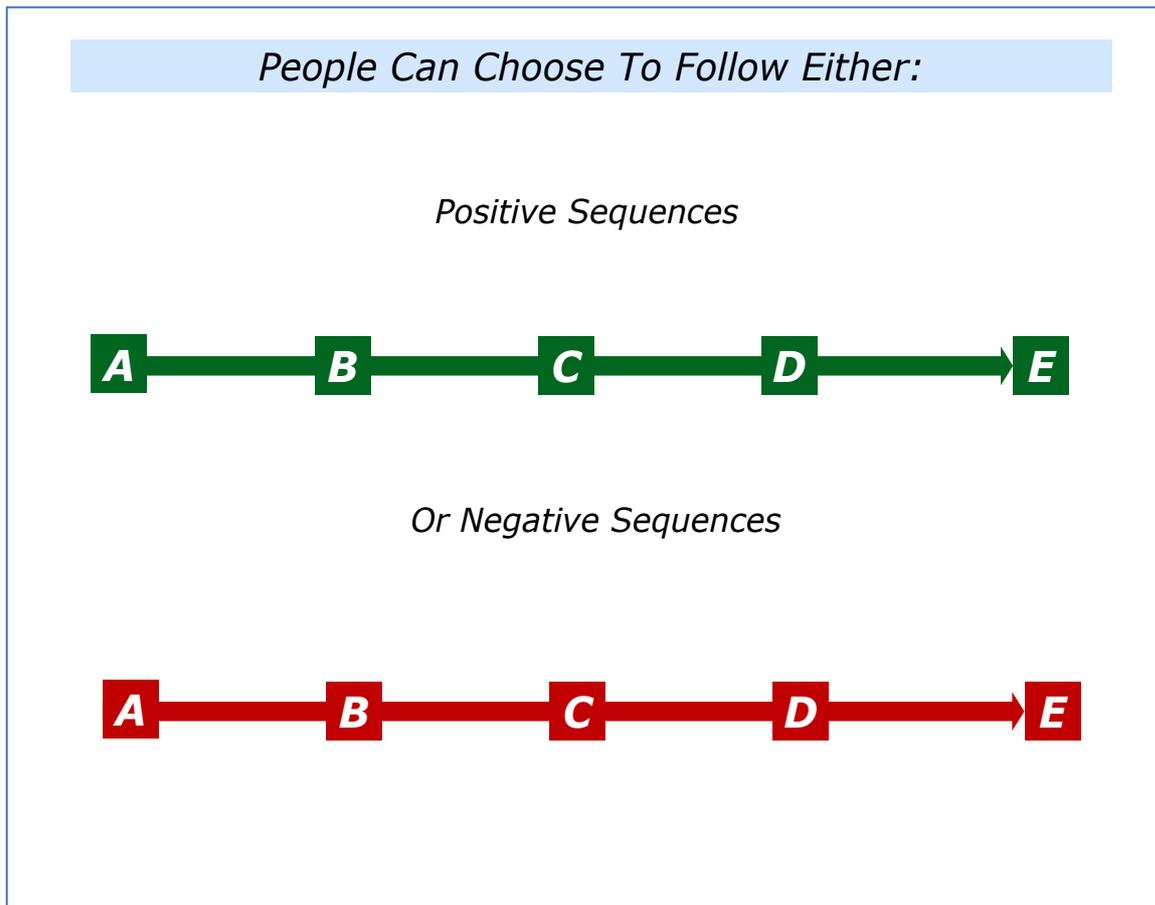

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Sequences Rather Than Negative Sequences Approach

People often follow sequences of behaviour. They may follow certain patterns that result in positive or negative outcomes. Let's consider some of these situations.

A Negative Sequence

A person may feel depressed about something they see, hear or do. They may dwell on the situation, get angry or become resentful. Whilst they know what is happening, they continue with the sequence.

They may then become more depressed or lash out at someone. This doesn't help them or other people. They have chosen to continue the negative sequence.

People can choose to channel their energy in a positive rather than negative way. One approach is for them to take the following steps.

A Positive Sequence

A person may begin by recognising that they are on a negative path. They may then ask themselves:

"What is happening? Am following a negative sequence? What will happen if I continue on this route? What do I want to do instead?"

"How can I start on a positive sequence? What are the things I can do to give myself positive feelings rather than negative feelings? How can I translate these into action?"

A person may then choose to start a positive sequence. They may do deep breathing, do something they enjoy, encourage another person, go for a walk or do another activity that give them positive energy.

Different people choose to take these steps in different ways. The keys, however, are for them:

To recognise the negative sequence and the consequences of continuing to follow this path;

To stop what they are doing, buy time to think and decide what they want to do instead;

To do something to start their positive sequence, get a quick success and continue on this path.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow a positive rather than a negative sequence? What can you do then to follow a positive sequence? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Sequences

The specific situation where I want to follow the positive sequences approach rather than negative sequences is:

*

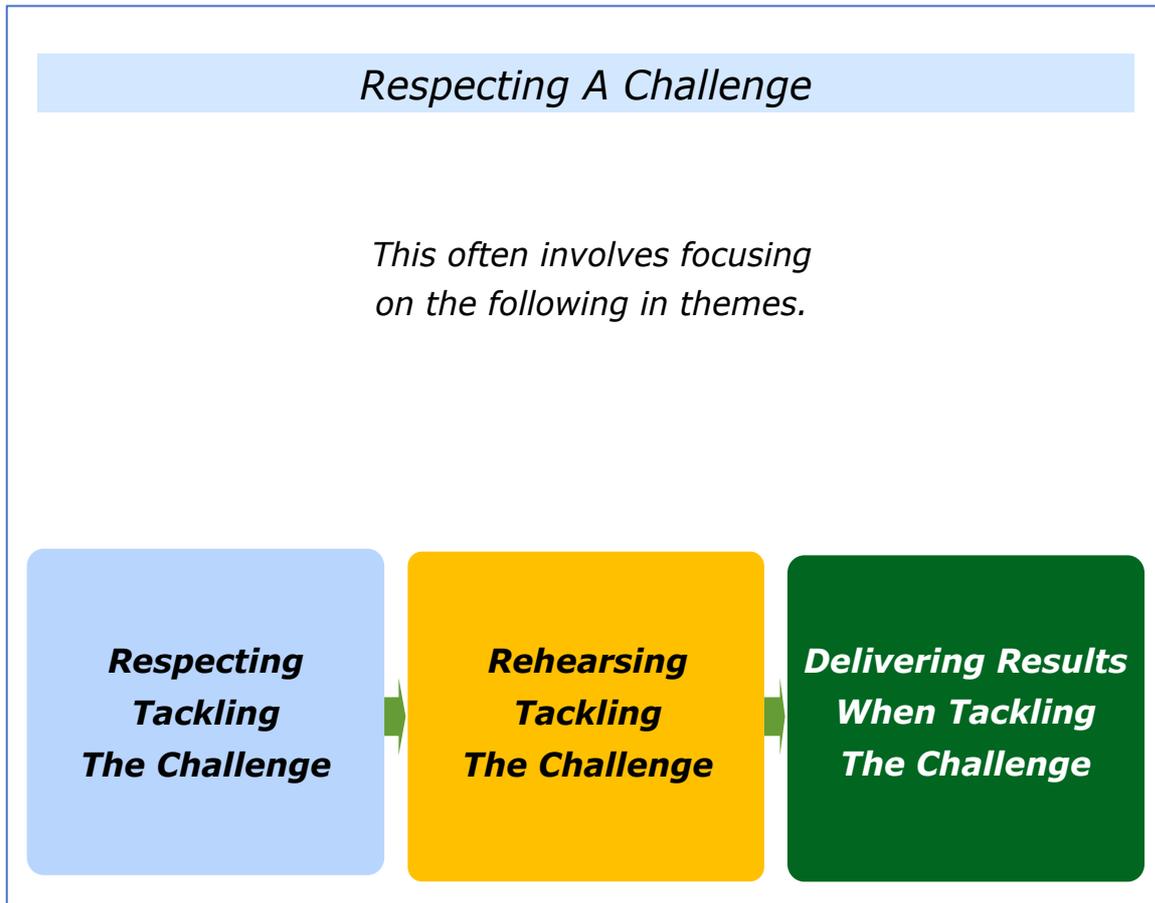

The specific things I can do then to do my best to follow the positive sequences approach are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Respecting A Challenge Approach

Great workers respect the challenge they face. They do this whether they are tackling a routine task, climbing a mountain or turning around a company

Some people do not respect a challenge and fall off the mountain. One leader explained how they fell into this trap.

"Several years ago I learned a severe lesson. It came off the back of achieving a success, but then I went into another role and messed it up badly

"During the previous five years I had built and sold a business. The work was challenging, but my colleagues and I enjoyed working towards a common purpose.

"Three months after selling the company I was much richer, but there was something missing. I needed to restart working. So I took on a senior role with another business.

"I felt the new role would be relatively simple, but that was my undoing. The role was 'not as advertised'.

"The work did not provide a sense of purpose and I began making sloppy mistakes. Eventually the business and I decided to go separate ways.

"This taught me a valuable lesson. Nowadays I do my due diligence and make sure I am motivated to achieve the goal."

Looking at your own life and work, can you recall a time when you respected a challenge? What did you do right then to rehearse and then deliver the required results? Let's explore these themes.

Respecting A Challenge

People perform many routine tasks each day as a matter of course. They get used to driving a car, solving problems at work and dealing with other issues. They may get into trouble, however, if they fail to concentrate or prepare properly.

Great workers do the following things when considering whether to tackle a challenge. They aim:

To research the challenge;

To rate their motivation for tackling the challenge;

To make sure they respect the challenge.

Imagine that you have been offered the opportunity to tackle a particular project. You may have the chance to launch a new business, take over a failing team, lead an initiative across a company or do another activity.

Your interest is piqued, but you also have reservations. On the one hand you think it could be interesting. On the other hand, you may have done similar things before, so it could feel mundane.

You want to do satisfying work and have a reasonable chance of success. This calls for doing a reality check before committing yourself to the challenge.

Your first task will be to gather information. One approach is to explore questions on the themes of What, Why, How, Who and When? These can be used to researching any potential project.

What

What are the stated goals of the project? What are the real results to achieve? What will be happening that will show you have reached the goals? What is the picture of success?

What is actually happening now? What is the state of play? If the project is already going: a) What is going well; b) What can be done better and how? What are the successful and unsuccessful patterns?

What are the key challenges you will face? What are the resources you will need to tackle these challenges, do superb work and reach the goals? Will these resources be available?

What are the things you can control on the project? What are the things you can't control? How can build on what you can control and manage what you can't?

Why

Why do people want to do the project? What will be the specific benefits for the various stakeholders – such as the company, customers, colleagues, community and other groups?

What will be the pluses and minuses that you and other people may encounter on the road towards achieving the goals? How can you build on the pluses and minimise the minuses? Looking at the pluses and minuses involved, are you prepared to accept the whole package?

How

How can you do your best to reach the goals? What are the three key strategies you can follow that will provide the greatest chance of success? How can you use your own and other people's strengths to reach the goals?

What are the potential difficulties you may meet along the road? How can you anticipate and prevent these difficulties happening? How can you manage the difficulties if they do happen?

How can you make sure that you go in with your eyes open? What are the things you can and can't expect from the culture – the organisation or company – in which you will be working?

What could you do to thrive, rather than just survive, when working in or alongside the culture? What will be the support required? How can you get some early successes?

Who

Who are the key stakeholders – the people you must satisfy? What is their picture of success? What is their mental model about how they believe people should work in order to achieve success? What do you believe are the overall Dos and Don'ts they ask people to follow?

Will you feel okay working with these people? How can you proactively keep them informed about the progress towards achieving the goals? How can you create enough space to make sure you can get on with the job?

Who are the people you may need on a team? What are the qualities – the spirit, strengths and skills – they will need to demonstrate? Looking at the people already in the team, try answering the following questions.

Which of the people already have these qualities? Which people may have the qualities? Which people probably don't have the qualities?

Bearing these things in mind, what are the decisions you may need to take about people? How can you do this in a moral way? How can you employ the right people in the right places in the team?

What are the specific results that people in each of the roles will need to deliver? How can you make clear contracts with them about their contributions towards achieving the goals? How can you make sure that people are given the support required to do the job?

When

What are the specific results that must be delivered by when? What are the key milestones? What are the short, medium and long-term goals? How can you get some early successes?

How can you continue to ensure that the project is on track and people deliver the goods? How can you continue to do reality checks about: a) What is working; b) What can be better and how? How can you encourage people on the journey?

How can you do everything possible to reach the goals? How can you ensure that people do the basics and, when appropriate, add that brilliance? What else can you do to deliver the picture of success?

Imagine that you have researched what may be involved when doing a particular project. Bearing in mind what you have explored, the next steps is to rate your motivation for doing the work.

You may be considering whether to write a book, run a marathon, climb a mountain or do another activity. You may be considering whether to lead a team, shift a culture or tackle another challenge.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to look ahead at a potential project and rate your motivation for doing it. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Potential Challenge

The specific challenge – such as a project – that I may consider tackling is:

*

The extent to which I feel motivated to tackle the challenge is:

_____ / 10

The specific things that I could do – or that could happen – to increase the rating are:

*

*

*

Rehearsing Tackling The Challenge

Imagine that you have chosen to do the particular project. The next step is to show respect for what needs to be done by rehearsing every aspect of the journey.

The theme of rehearsing properly is explored elsewhere in the book, but here are the headlines. It can be useful to focus on the picture of success and:

To rehearse following the key strategies that will give you the greatest chance of success;

To rehearse dealing with the potential challenges along the ways;

To again rehearse doing your best to achieve the picture of success.

Imagine that you feel ready to embark on the journey. It can then be useful to rest before clicking into action. You will then move on to the next step.

Delivering The Desired Results When Tackling The Challenge

Great workers show respect by giving their full attention to tackling the challenge. They do this whether counselling a person, climbing a mountain, leading a creative project or doing another activity.

They follow the key strategies most likely to deliver the desired results. They also do this by managing their energy and efforts in the most effective way.

Such people work at the appropriate pace. Sometimes they may buy time to think; sometimes work intensely. Sometimes they may work in short bursts; some work for long stretches.

Great workers continue to use their antennae when tackling the challenges. They keep asking themselves the following questions.

What are the real results to achieve? Am I on course to deliver these results? How can I keep on course to deliver success?

What is actually happening? What is going well? How can I build on these things? What can I do better and how? What are the potential things that could happen in the future? How can I manage these things?

What else can I do to achieve the desired results? How can I do these things? How can I finish in a good way and achieve the picture of success?

Whatever challenge you tackle, the aim will be to respect the work. Such an approach can enable you and other people to reach the summit - rather than fall off the mountain - and get down safely.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to clarify how you can respect a challenge, rehearse tackling it and deliver the desired results.

Respecting A Challenge

The specific challenge that it may be important for me to respect may be:

*

The specific things I can do to respect the challenge, rehearse properly and do my best to deliver the desired results are:

*

*

*

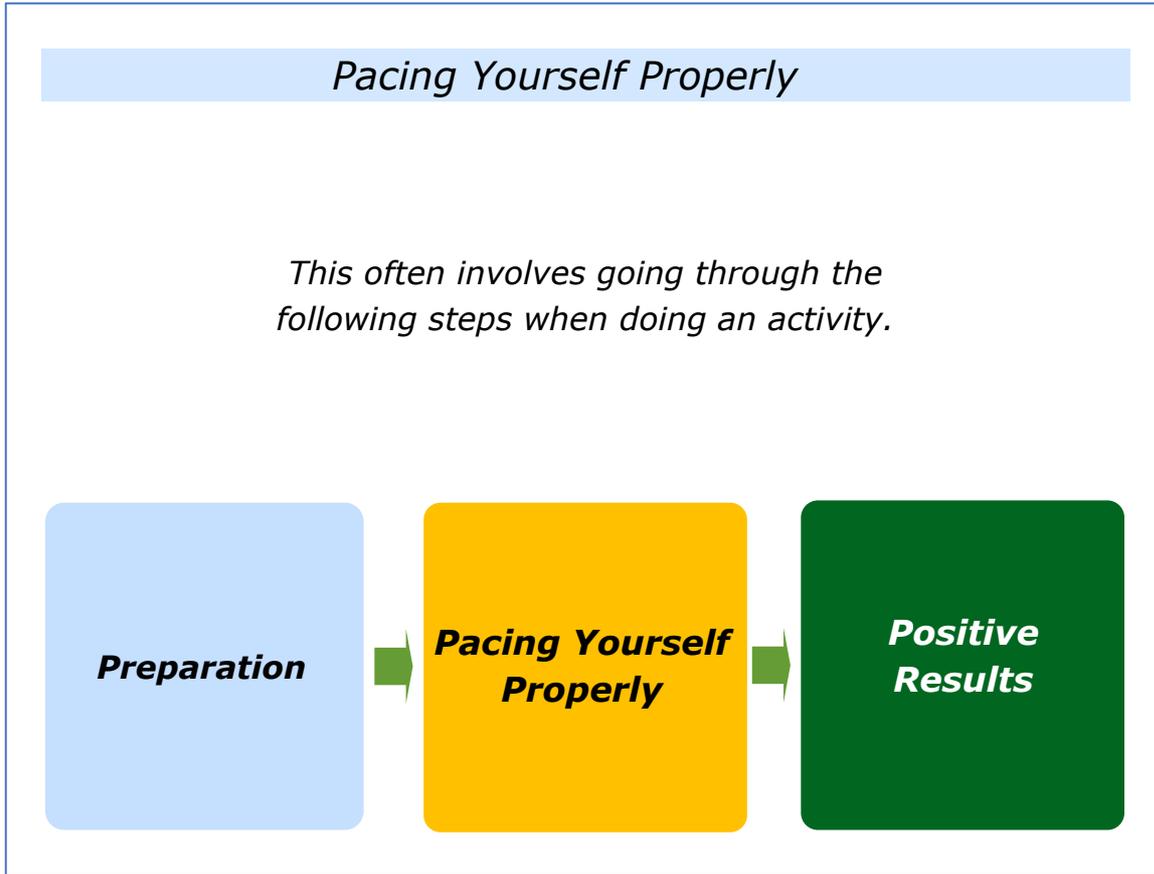

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Pacing Yourself Properly Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach involves preparation and pacing yourself properly on the way to achieving positive results.

This approach can also be used to help other people. Each person has their own pace of doing things. It can be important to recognise and respect this when helping them to achieve a goal.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you paced yourself properly? You may have been searching for a job, doing a creative project, tackling a challenge or doing another activity.

What did you do then to manage your energy both physically and psychologically? How did you pace yourself properly? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Pacing Myself Properly In The Past

The specific situation when I paced myself properly and achieved positive results was:

*

The specific things I did then to pace myself properly were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Following Your Own Pace Successfully

People sometimes work best when they can set their own timetable. There may be situations, however, when they are working towards a deadline that is set by others.

Imagine that you are aiming to do piece of work in the future. This may involve going through the stages of preparation, pacing yourself properly and getting positive results. Let's explore these themes.

Preparation

Great workers often start from their destination and work backwards. They go through the following steps:

They clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

They clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

They clarify the benefits of achieving the picture of success.

Such workers check their motivation to achieve the goals and make sure it is at least 7+/10. They also focus on how to can maintain or improve the rating.

Sometimes they do a piece of work even though the motivation rating is lower. They then actively choose to do it because it will help them to survive, thrive or work towards their lifetime goals.

Different people then plan their work in different ways. Some take the following approach:

They clarify their prime times – the times when they have most energy – and plan how to make the best use of these times;

They clarify how to organise their time in blocks - because this will give them the chance to do deep work;

They clarify their action plan – including the schedule they will follow – and aim to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Such people try to make sure they have the resources required to do the job. They also clarify how they can get some quick successes and encourage themselves on the journey.

Great workers may then take time to relax and rehearse what they are going to do. They rehearse how they can aim: a) to follow their chosen strategies; b) to manage any potential challenges on the way.

Pacing Yourself Properly

Imagine that you are doing a piece of work. You will follow your own ritual for moving into action. You may then go through the stages of absorption – immersing yourself in the work – adventure and achievement.

You may also aim to go at your chosen pace. Sometimes you may do things slowly, sometimes you may do things quickly. Sometimes you will take time to rest and reflect before rehearsing what you are going to do next.

Great workers aim to follow their chosen rhythm. They take this approach when doing a piece of work, playing a sport, pursuing a creative project or doing another activity.

Such workers also recognise they may sometimes need to alter their pace in order to deliver the goods to other people. They aim to follow their own rhythm but also, when appropriate, do what is required to meet the required deadlines.

Different people have different approaches to how they manage their energy when doing a piece of work. The following pages explore some of these approaches.

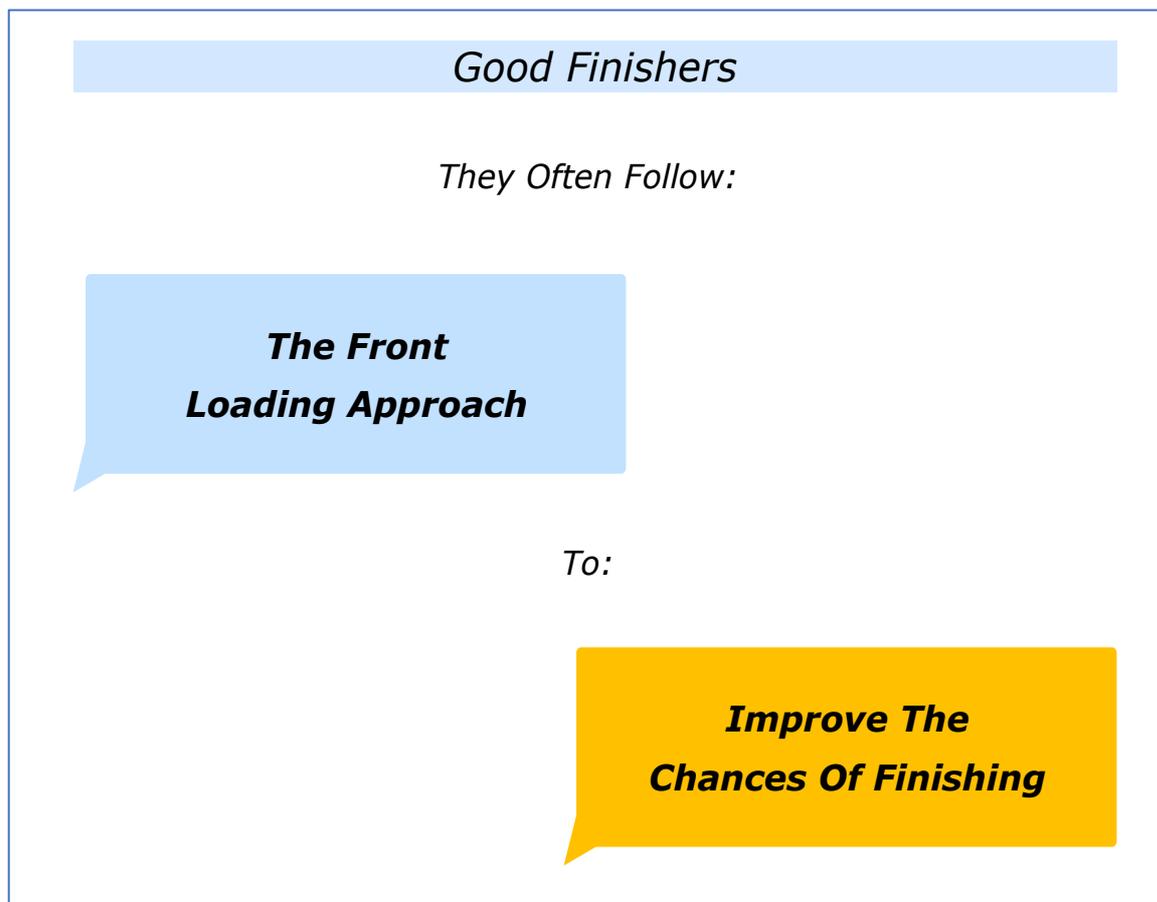

The Front Loading Approach

Great workers sometimes start by doing an enormous amount of front loading. This can take different forms and depends on the field in which they perform.

One freelancer aimed to bring in more than 60% of their desired income during the first six months of the year. This provided a platform for them to keep following their principles and get positive results.

One mediator began by meeting individuals before gathering people together. They showed respect to each person and clarified their aims. Bringing people together, they built on areas of agreement and got some early successes.

One person had a financial approach to front loading. They always earned enough money to pay for things before buying them. They felt more comfortable taking this approach and refused to go into debt.

The Motivating Yourself In The Middle Approach

Great workers go beyond motivating themselves when beginning and finishing an activity. They also maintain high standards during the middle part of doing the work.

Different people motivate themselves in different ways at this point. Some do it by refocusing on the benefits of achieving the picture of success.

Great teams refocus on their purpose. Many teams returned to this approach during the Covid pandemic. One person described this in the following way.

"Our medical team found it tough during Covid. We were working long hours under arduous conditions but we all pulled together.

"We kept revisiting our purpose. This is to care for people and help them to be healthy. We reenergised ourselves by focusing on this calling and aimed to live it every day."

One leader followed elements of this approach when preparing for a workshop with their leadership team. People had been working hard and had sometimes lost sight of their real goals.

The workshop gave them the opportunity to recentre and refresh themselves. Bearing this in mind, the leader sent the following message to people before the session.

Looking Forward To The Workshop

As you know, we are having a workshop next week. Looking ahead, I have set myself some goals for the day.

My goals are that at the end of the day, people are saying:

"We have revisited our mission and had a chance to add our ideas to the picture of success.

"We have refocused on the strategies want to follow to translate the mission into action in our daily work.

"We are again feeling a sense of mission and want to spread the word to our people and the world."

During the day I will be asking you to each contribute the ideas that you have: a) to build on the mission; b) to translate it into action; c) to maintain our health in the process.

At the end of the session I will be asking for mission holders who want to implement the various parts of the strategies. I will then give them the support they need to deliver the goods.

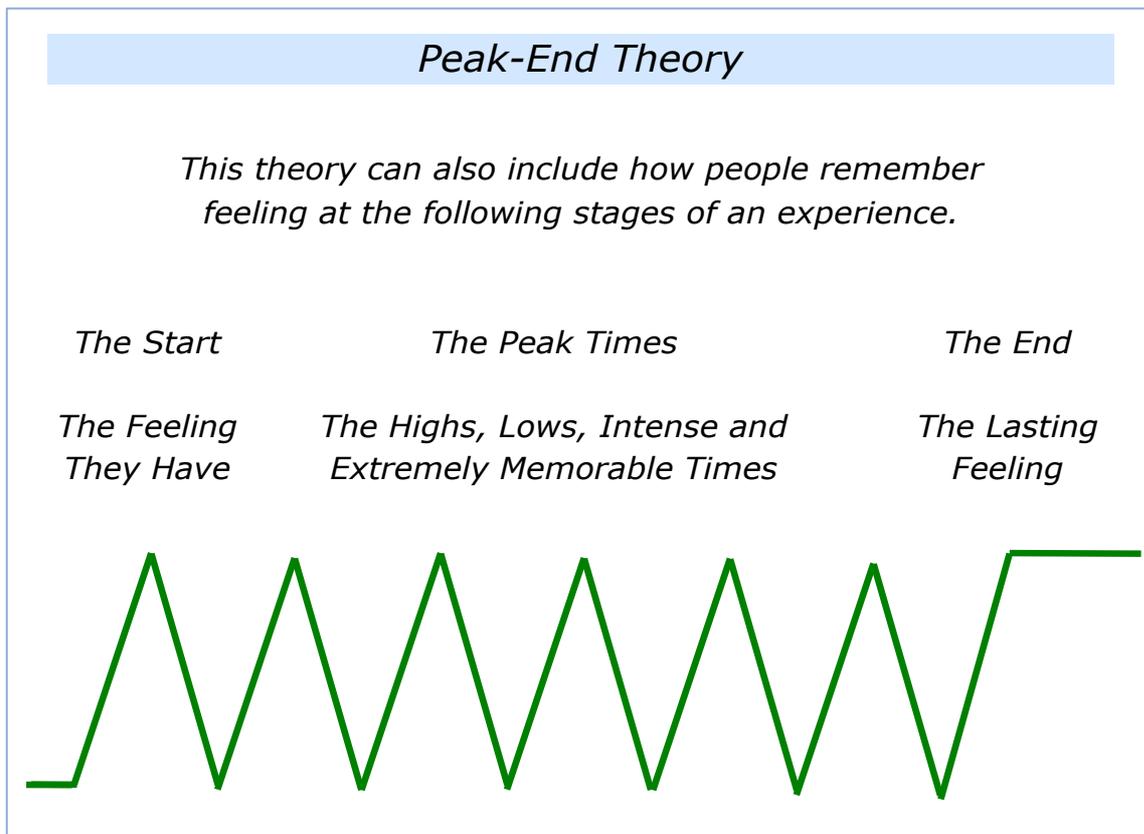

Let me know if there any other items – such as themes or challenges – you would like to add to the agenda. I look forward to seeing you on the workshop.

How to motivate yourself during the middle? One approach is: a) to recall what you have achieved so far; b) to remind yourself of the benefits of achieving the goals.

You can also keep reading reality. It can be helpful: a) to build on what is working; c) to improve in the other areas. You can then keep working towards toward achieving the picture of success.

Positive Results

Great workers are often good finishers in the areas where they excel. Such people embody some elements of what Daniel Kahneman called Peak-End Theory.

The theory says that, when looking back, people do not necessarily recall their feelings throughout an experience. Instead, they remember the way they felt at:

The peak times – the intense times – and the end of the experience.

The peak times may be pleasant or unpleasant. These are the memories that stay with us, as does the way we felt at the end of the experience.

An additional view is that people also remember how they felt at that start of an experience. For example, whether the start was welcoming, enjoyable or difficult. This approach can be applied to how we remember, for example:

A relationship ... A job we did at some point in our career ... A sporting event, musical performance or other experience.

Many singers and other entertainers follow this approach. The old rules apply: Start Big - Give Lots Of Highs - End Big.

Great workers sometimes follow similar principles. They start well, maintain high standards and finish strongly. They aim to do this each day on the journey towards achieving their longer-term picture of success.

The Third Wind Approach

Some people follow an approach that is borrowed from athletics. This involves going beyond having a first and second wind. It involves going into another dimension and experiencing a third wind.

Jason Saltmarsh described one approach in an article he wrote for the Huffington Post called The Zen Of Running: Catching Your Third Wind. Here is an excerpt from the piece.

Most runners are familiar with the feeling of catching your second wind. It usually happens 10 to 15 minutes into a run.

After clearing out the initial aches, pains and tightness from previous runs, the body begins pumping more blood into the working muscles and warming up until perspiration begins.

The running suddenly feels a bit easier, and the runner usually responds by increasing their pace. This is, of course, why warming up properly before a race is so important. For runners that stick it out a bit longer, a third wind awaits.

For me, this usually happens around mile 5 or 6. I find myself slide into a hypnotic rhythm of footfalls and exhales, and my mind starts to entertain itself in other ways.

I'll suddenly have an epiphany concerning a project at work, or I'll find a solution to a problem that I've been struggling with, or I might begin writing a new article in my head.

Finally, it can be worth remembering a phrase about finishing that is used in Formula 1 Racing. In order to finish first, first you have to finish. You will do this in your own way to achieve positive results.

*Finishing – In Order To Finish
First, First You Have To Finish*

Helping Other People To Follow Their Pace Successfully

Every person has a different pace of working. Sometimes it can be useful to help them to find and follow their chosen pace. Let's look at one example.

Jeff was the Chief Operating Officer for a company. He saw himself as a creative engineer, however, who did more than solve problems. He enjoyed designing systems that would enable people to achieve success.

Moving into his present role had produced several challenges. The first involved splitting the role into three segments. These called for organising his time into the following areas:

To stay close to his key stakeholders – such as the CEO – and take responsibility for translating their strategies into action;

To build a self-managing operations team that ensured the company's engine ran superbly every day;

To create free space to be able to deal with any unexpected events and design new systems that would help the company to achieve success.

Jeff saw how this approach would help to him to make his best contribution. He needed to find a good deputy, however, and also provide the support required for his team to become more self-managing.

He already had a good relationship with the CEO, who tended to use him as his Chief of Staff. But he also needed to create time to deal with crises and create new systems that would benefit the business.

Jeff then raised another point. During a previous session we had discussed the concept of prime times – the times when he had most energy. He explained his challenge in the following way.

"I have always been a late afternoon and evening person. This is when I feel most creative, but therein lies a problem. My role calls for me doing a lot of work from 8.00 am onwards.

"I have tried to change my routines by going to bed early and even going to the gym in the morning, but I am still at my best after 3.00 pm in the afternoon. Have you any suggestions?"

Jeff was based in Europe and had several options. These included: a) Staying in his present role; b) Running the European arm of a US company; c) Moving to a role where he had more control over his time.

He wanted to stay in his present role, however, and give it his best shot. There were several things he could do to make his best contribution. These included taking the following steps.

Accepting His Preferred Working Pattern

One approach was for Jeff to accept his preferred working pattern – which may become more pronounced as he got older. The aim would be to apply it in the best way.

This approach involved clarifying two things. First, how to build on the pluses of his preferred working style. Second, how to manage the consequences of any potential minuses.

Jeff found this approach to be quite liberating. He could aim to be super professional during the hours between 8.00 and 15.00. Then, if appropriate, he could aim to do creative work later in the day.

Making Good Use Of His Preferred Working Pattern

Looking ahead, Jeff clarified how to make good use of his preferred working pattern. This involved focusing on following themes.

Preparation

Jeff could be proactive and prepare properly. This would involve taking the following steps. He could continue:

To meet with the key stakeholders to clarify the specific help they may need from the operations team in the next day, week and month;

To help his operations team to plan: a) how to help the stakeholders to achieve their aims; b) how to manage any potential challenges;

To set aside time to do creative work on designing systems that would help the company to achieve future success.

Professionalism

Jeff would continue to be disciplined and professional in his daily work. This was an approach he had learned when competing in athletics at a national level. He explained this in the following way.

"There is an old saying in sports that: 'Hard work beats talent when talent does not work hard.' I was reasonably good but there were others who had much more talent.

"Bearing this in mind, I kept following certain disciplines to apply my talent. This called for preparing properly and aiming to do my best on the day.

"This is a pattern I have also followed in my career. I aim to be polite, professional and deliver positive results. This is something I will continue to do during my working days."

Peak Performance

Jeff felt able to run the operations aspect of the business. Recruiting a good deputy would be paramount, however, as would educating the team to become more self-managing.

He could also allocate time to designing and delivering systems that would help the business to achieve future success. This was the activity where he could deliver his equivalent of peak performance.

Jeff was not worried about doing this on top of the other aspects of the COO role. He explained this in the following way.

"Whatever has happened before, I tend to get a new burst of energy from the late afternoon onwards. Whenever possible, I will set aside time from then to 18.00 to work on the creative projects.

"Looking back at my history, I know this approach works. Sometimes I also get creative ideas into the night. I will need to note these down and try them later the following day."

He translated this approach into action. Sometimes he lagged a little in the middle of the day but then went for a short walk. He was still available on the phone, of course, but found this helped to reboot his energy.

Jeff was a realist, however, and recognised that at some point it may be advisable to seek another role. This would be one where he could be more in charge of his schedule. But for the moment he continued to make a fine contribution to the company.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to do the preparation and pace yourself properly on the way towards achieving the desired positive results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life. How could you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Pacing Myself Properly Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

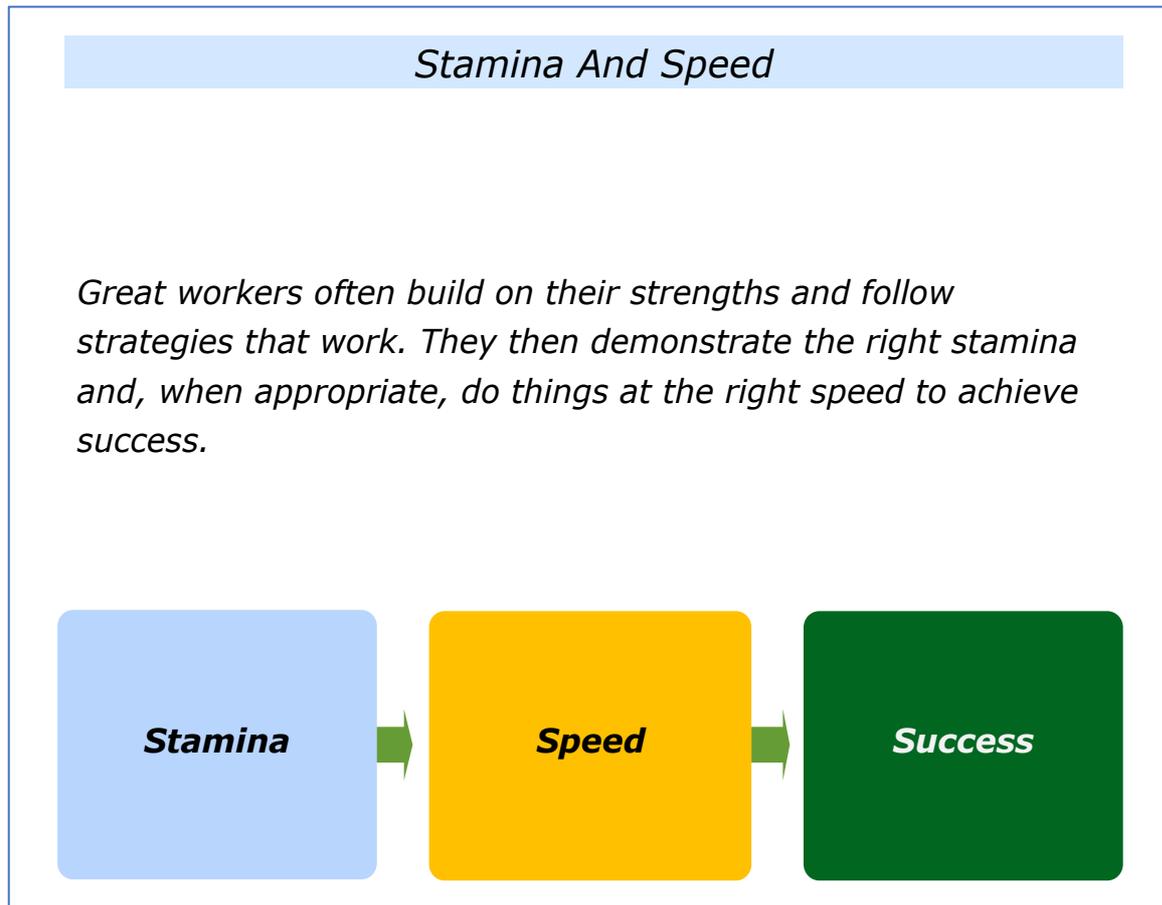

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Stamina, Speed And Success Approach

Great workers often build on their strengths and follow strategies that work. They then demonstrate the right stamina and, when appropriate, do things at the right speed to achieve success.

This piece focuses mainly on the stamina and speed aspects. But it is important to start by getting the basics right before moving into action. Let's explore these themes.

Strengths

Great workers often build on their strengths. They focus on the specific activities where they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. They aim to do what they do best and do their best.

Strategies That Work

Great workers focus on strategies that work. They sometimes do this by exploring the following themes.

What is the strength I want to build on? What is the piece of work I want to do by building on this strength? What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals?

What are the strategies that work when aiming to achieve such goals? Bearing these in mind, What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I translate these into action? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the goals?

Such workers then move into action. This sometimes involves focusing on the following theme.

Stamina

Great workers develop the required stamina. They may do this when aiming to pursue their career, perform certain kinds of work or achieve the desired positive results.

Some workers demonstrate this stamina during careers and get better over the years. They may be pursuing a passion, following certain principles and aiming to achieve peak performance.

They may be working as artists, musicians, conductors or delivering other kinds of performances. They may be working as educators, therapists, mentors, trusted advisors or in other fields.

Such people who demonstrate such stamina are often following their vocation. Seeing each day as an opportunity to do their best, they believe in the philosophy that:

You never retire from your vocation.

Some people demonstrate the stamina to superb work over a short, medium or longer period. They may aim to write a book, run a marathon, lead a project, compete during a sporting season or do another activity over a period of time.

Different people maintain their stamina in different ways. Some start by getting the physical things right. They get the right food, the right amount of sleep and make sure they are fit to do the work. They then take the following steps.

They prepare properly. They plan ahead, organise their time and make sure all the practical things are in place. They also prepare themselves physically and psychologically.

They rehearse properly. They rehearse following their chosen strategies and managing any potential challenges along the way. They do this until they feel satisfied they have covered all eventualities.

They organise their time in blocks and make full use of their prime times – the times when they have most energy. They then follow their chosen rhythm for working.

They set achievable goals for a session, move into action and follow their chosen strategies. They do deep work, get some early successes and aim to do superb work.

They manage their energy properly. They continue working until they feel ready to break. They then take time to relax, revitalise themselves and rehearse what they are going to do next.

Great workers sometimes employ their second wind. This can be a physical or psychological second wind. It lead to getting a new burst of energy and going into new dimensions. They then do whatever is required to get over the line and achieve success.

Such workers often follow a certain routine. They map out their day, week, month or year and try to organise their time in blocks. This helps them to do good work and also regain their energy.

Great Workers Follow A Certain Rhythm To Build And Maintain Their Stamina

They prepare properly and organise their time in blocks. They follow this pattern whether they are planning a day, a week, a year or another length of time.

They often start by following their chosen ritual. They may aim to relax, refocus and rehearse what they are going to do next. They then move into action and aim to deliver the desired results.

Imagine that a person has developed their stamina. Sometimes they may also focus on the next theme.

Speed

Great workers pace themselves properly. They pursue strategies that work and aim to do these at the right speed. Such an approach invites the question:

What is the right speed?

Great workers focus on the results in achieve in a situation. They then follow the rule that:

The right speed is the one that gets the right results.

Bearing this in mind, they may do things at what appears to be a slow, medium or fast pace. Let's explore these different approaches.

Great Workers Do Things At The Right Speed

Great workers aim to do things at the appropriate speed. They follow the rule that: The right speed is the one that gets the right results. They may therefore choose to follow the slow, medium or fast speed approaches.

The Slow Speed Approach

Great workers know when to do things in a relatively slow and measured way. They may do this when making key decisions. Going into a situation, they gather information and take the following steps:

They clarify what is actually happening, fix any immediate issues and clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

They clarify the potential options going forward – together with the pluses and minuses of each option – and settle on their chosen option;

They clarify the key strategies they can follow to pursue their chosen option, create an action plan and do their best to achieve success.

Such workers often have knowledge bank that is based on making previous decisions. This may have been built slowly over time. But, when appropriate, they can access it and act quickly to make good decisions.

Some great workers may also have had a relatively slow start to their careers. They may have spent time following their passions before settling on a path they wanted to pursue.

They may then have absorbed themselves deeply in building up their knowledge. This created a firm base which they built on in future years. Such an approach is in contrast to people who may have been shooting stars early in their careers.

Different people go at different speeds when doing different tasks or at different stages of their careers. Sometimes they operate in the following way.

The Medium Speed Approach

Great workers sometimes follow the medium speed approach. They follow a rhythm where they do things in a measured but effective way. They aim to follow this routine and do fine work.

Some writers, craft workers and artists take this approach. They follow a consistent rhythm that enables them to follow good habits when doing their work. Sometimes this can also lead to flashes of inspiration where they then do things quickly.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you followed elements of this approach? You may have been studying for an exam, following an exercise programme, leading a project or doing another piece of work.

What was the routine you followed? How did you work at a consistent and effective way? When appropriate, how did you work more quickly? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

The Fast Speed Approach

Great workers sometimes do things at a fast pace. Some do this physically, some do it psychologically. Some do it in other ways – such as by using their strategic intuition to make creative breakthroughs.

Great footballers, for example, often do these simple things quickly – such as playing the simple pass. They are continually scanning the field to see patterns, picture and possibilities. They then use their strategic thinking and skills to execute the desired pass, shot or movement.

Such players know when to do the simple things well. They then, when appropriate, use their unique skills to do something special that helps their team to succeed.

Great workers follow a similar pattern in their chosen field. Sometimes they use what is called their strategic intuition. They are able:

To quickly see patterns, focus on the possible ways forward and clarify the desired picture of success;

To reach into their repertoire of experience, knowledge and tools to select and rehearse their chosen strategy for achieving success;

To apply their chosen strategy, keep reading reality and do what is required to achieve the picture of success.

Great workers may go into another dimension and move into their equivalent of the zone. They appear to do things slowly yet more swiftly than other people. Such workers then do something special to deliver the goods. This takes us to the next theme.

Success

Great workers aim to do things at the appropriate speed. They may do things at a slow, medium or fast pace. Sometimes they combine these elements to achieve success.

Such workers sometimes focus on the following steps. They aim: a) to build a solid base; b) to do superb work; c) to use their strategic intuition to do something special to deliver success.

William Duggan, author of the book Strategic Intuition, has described how such intuition works. He explained this in the following way.

Flashes of insight are so important that scholars have written about them for centuries. The best description comes from an early classic of military strategy, On War by Carl von Clausewitz.

Clausewitz gives us four steps.

First, you take in 'examples from history' throughout your life and put them on the shelves of your brain. Study can help, by putting more there.

Second comes 'presence of mind,' where you free your brain of all preconceptions about what problem you're solving and what solution might work.

Third comes the flash of insight itself. Clausewitz called it coup d'oeil, which is French for 'glance.'

In a flash, a new combination of examples from history fly off the shelves of your brain and connect.

Fourth comes 'resolution,' or determination, where you not only say to yourself, "I see!", but also, "I'll do it!"

There are many ways to do fine work. Great workers sometimes aim to build on their strengths and follow strategies that work. They then demonstrate the right stamina and speed to deliver success.

Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you follow it in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish. Try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stamina, Speed And Success Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

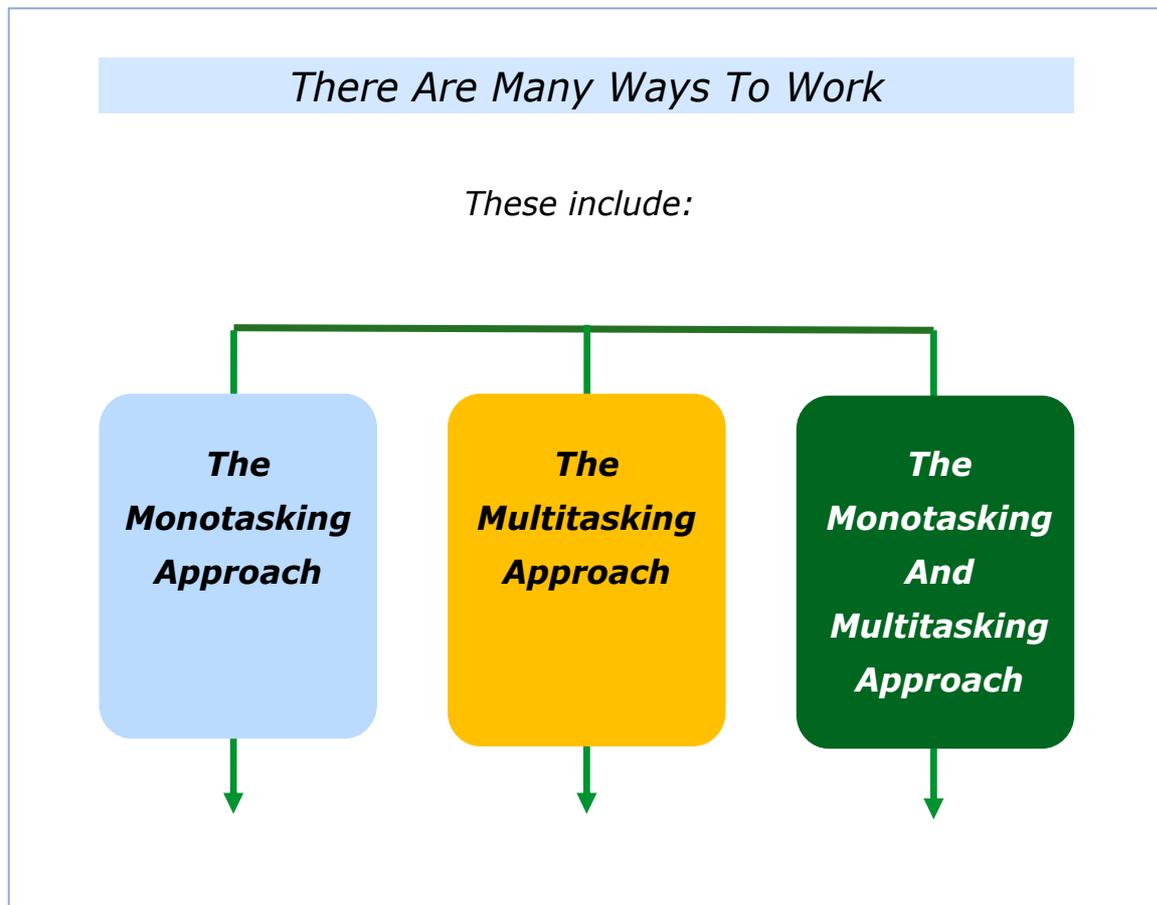

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Monotasking Approach And The Multitasking Approach

Many people recognise the importance of monotasking. This involves focusing fully on a task, doing deep work and using their abilities to achieve a specific goal.

Multitasking calls for being able to move from one task to another and doing each efficiently. Sometimes this is necessary and possible, but there can be downsides. These can include feeling tired and failing to focus on what is really important.

There is also another option. You can do a big monotask and, within this, do various multitasks. This can work if you focus on the big goal. You can then do tasks that contribute towards achieving this aim.

Samira Far wrote an article for Inc. on the theme of Monotasking Keeps The Brain Healthy And You More Productive. Here are some excerpts.

Monotasking – Tips For Getting Into This Mindset

● Do Deep Work

Deep work is the ability to focus on a demanding task - one that requires higher levels of cognitive ability and awareness - without distractions for an extended period of time.

Each day set aside 2 to 4 hours where you can focus on a single project without interruption. This kind of singular focus will engage both sides of your brain.

You will then be more likely to achieve the kind of breakthroughs that make the biggest impact on the project you are working on.

● Locate Your Peak Performance Time

Everyone has a specific period of the day when you are at your best. This is when you are sharpest, least distracted and most likely to have breakthrough moments.

This period of time is also when monotasking will be the easiest for you. For some it occurs in the morning and other's late at night. It is important to study yourself and locate what your peak performance time is.

Once you are able to identify your peak performance time of the day, set that time aside as your protected time to do deep work. Guard this time period. It's your holy moment.

- Eliminate Distractions And Focus On Two Questions

Monotasking is often about about eliminating distractions that prevent you from accomplishing the one goal. Start your day by asking yourself two questions:

What could I do today that will bring me a sense of meaning and purpose?

What are the two most important things I can do today that would have the greatest impact?

The first question reminds you to incorporate activities in your day that bring you fulfilment and promote wellbeing. The second question forces you to drill down on two items that actually matter.

Many individuals recognise the downsides of multitasking. Flitting from one minor task to another, they do not feel in charge of their day. They have to switch from context to context and tactic to tactic. They may say something like the following.

"I have been busy all day but am not sure that I have accomplished anything. I feel tired and need time to recover."

Monotasking has become more popular, whilst multitasking has got a bad reputation. But there is another option to consider.

Great Workers Sometimes Combine Monotasking And Multitasking

Great workers sometimes take the following route. They do both monotasking and multitasking.

They do monotasking by working towards a compelling goal.

They may do lots of multitasking within this framework on the way towards achieving the compelling goal.

Such workers focus on the compelling goal but are adept at doing multiple tasks that enable them to reach the goal.

Great workers take this route when performing as athletes, dancers, crisis managers or doing another activity. But it comes with a key proviso.

They keep focusing on their mission and must see how the multiple tasks contribute towards achieving their aims. They then develop their skills for managing these tasks and working towards the compelling goal.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow the monotasking approach, multitasking approach or combine elements of both approaches?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Monotasking And Multitasking In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to follow the monotasking approach, multitasking approach or combine elements of both may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own may are:

*

*

*

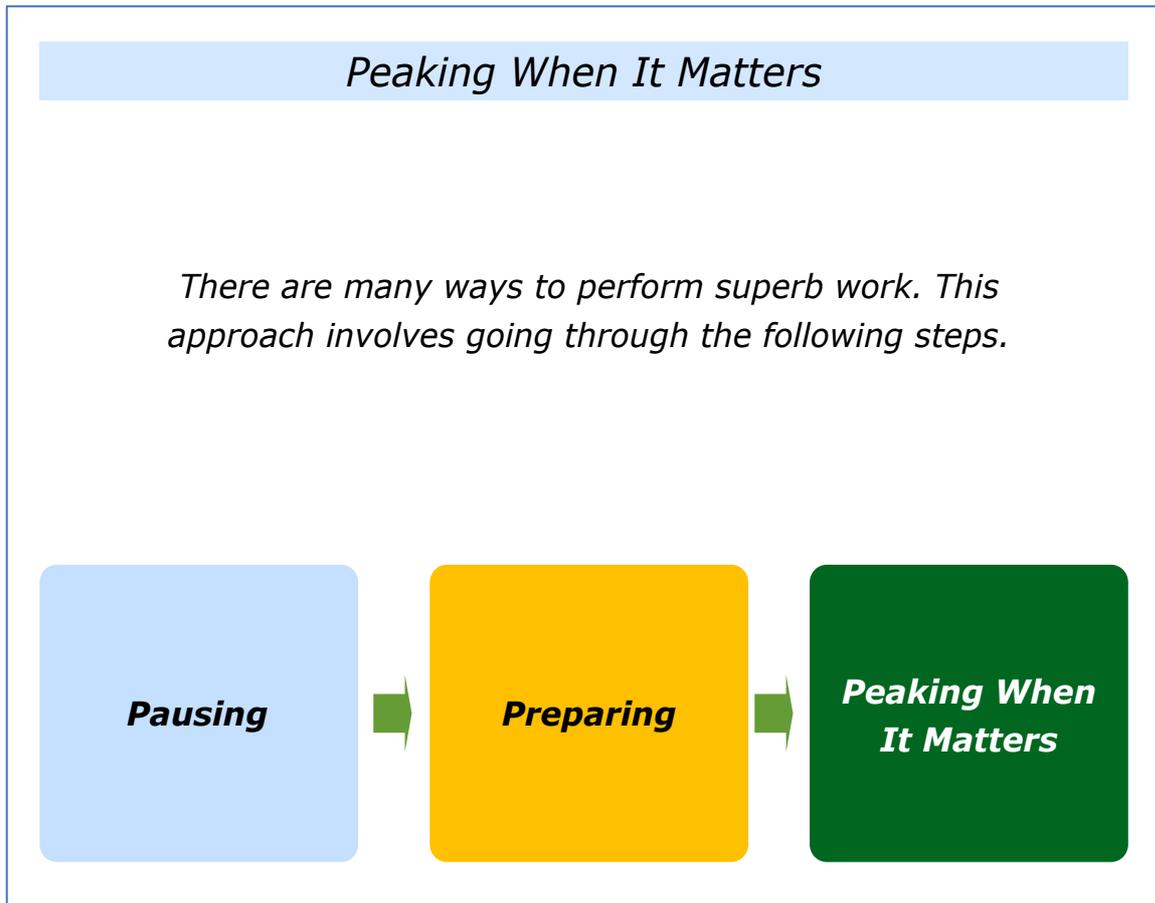

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Peaking When It Matters Approach

There are many ways to perform superb work. One approach is borrowed from sports but can be applied in many situations. This involves pausing, preparing and then peaking when it matters.

Peaking can mean different things in different situations. Much depends on the person and what they want to achieve in the situation.

For an athlete it may mean delivering peak performances in competitions. For a crisis manager it may mean making good decisions at crucial moments. For a mentor it may mean being fully present and helping the mentee to achieve success.

There are different ways to peak when it matters. One approach is to go through the following steps.

Pausing

This involves pausing for a certain period of time. Sometimes this could be for a short time, sometimes for a long time. The process often involves being still, recentring and exploring possible routes you can take in the future.

Some people pause many times during a day. They aim to relax, refocus and rehearse what they are going to do next. Some people may pause for longer times in their lives. They may take time out to recover from a crisis, reassess their life goals or prepare before making a transition.

Looking at your own life, when do you take time to pause? You may do this when you are aiming:

To refresh yourself ... To relax and recentre ... To explore ideas ... To refocus on your life goals ... To make a key decision ... To rehearse what you are going to do next.

What is your preferred way of pausing? Some people reflect, sleep, walk or do other activities. Some do exercises – such as deep breathing. Some buy time to think before making a decision.

Imagine that you are following your preferred way of pausing. You may then move on to the next stage.

Preparing

This involves preparing properly for what you have decided to do. The steps you take will obviously depend on the activity you aim to pursue and the picture of success.

An athlete who is preparing to compete, for example, will prepare both physically and psychologically. They may aim:

To commit themselves fully ... To seek advice regarding how to be at their best physical condition ... To follow disciplines regarding food and training ... To pursue a specific competition schedule.

To prepare themselves psychologically ... To accept the pluses and minuses involved in committing themselves fully ... To, if appropriate, make sure they manage their family life as well as their athletic life.

To encourage themselves ... To build on what they do well and tackle areas for improvement ... To manage their body and recover from injuries ... To mentally rehearse before competing ... To do their personal best on the day.

You will prepare in your own way before doing a specific activity as a counsellor, chef, artist, singer, leader or in another role. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Peaking When It Matters

This involves doing your best and peaking when it matters. Different people may do this at different times and in different ways. Much depends on the kinds of activity where they are aiming to perform at their best.

Great athletes, for example, continue to follow their disciplines and produce high quality performances. They may also focus on peaking at certain events. Doing their best on the day, they may then do something special to deliver the goods at the denouement.

Some workers follow a different rhythm. Looking at my work as a mentor, for example, I aim to do a certain number of sessions each day. This increases the chances of peaking.

Between the ages of 50 and 70 I could do around six face-to-face sessions during a day. These days I work from home doing virtual mentoring.

This involves preparing for sessions with individuals around the world. It is vital to consider the topics they may want to explore and then to rehearse the sessions.

The actual sessions involve becoming totally absorbed, focusing on the person and helping them to achieve their goals. Below is how the day may look in practice. This calls for doing my best and aiming to peak when it matters.

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow element of the peaking approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

If appropriate, how can you go through the stages of pausing and preparing? How can you then do your best and peak when it matters? What may happen as a result?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Peaking When It Matters

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

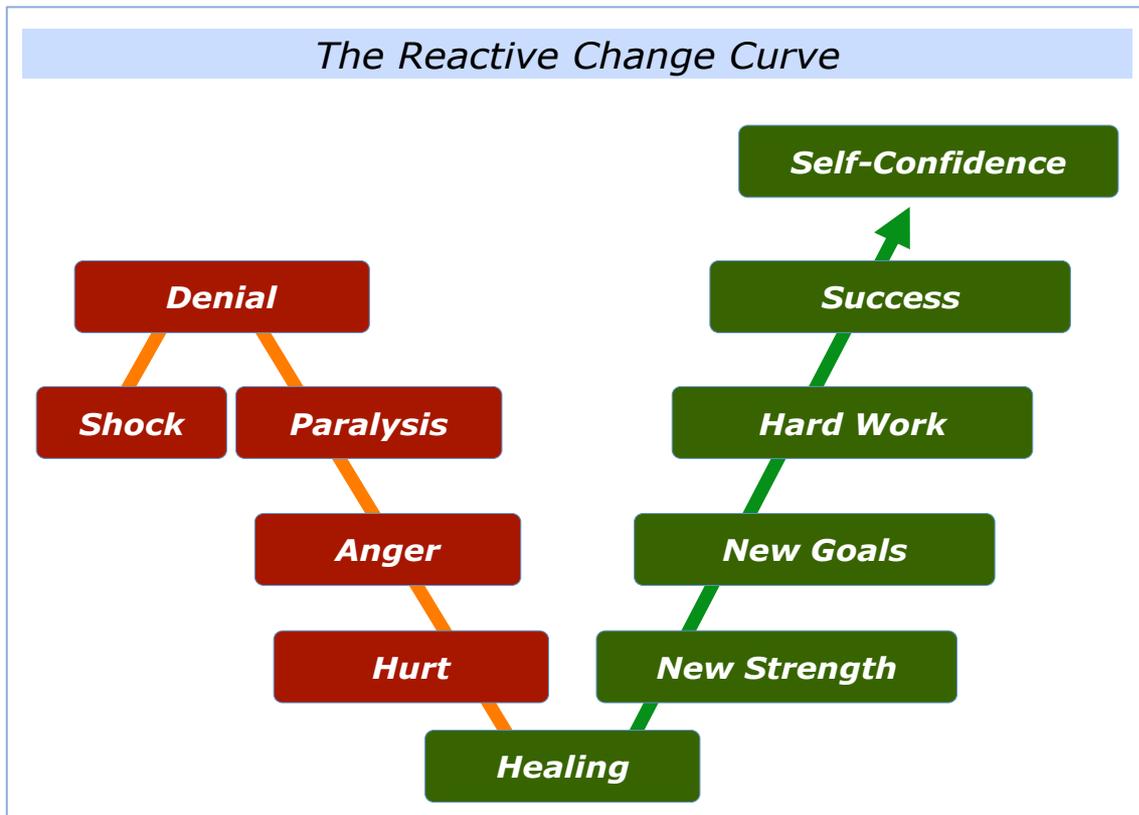

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Change Curve Approach

Peak performers have a pattern of overcoming setbacks. Sometimes they emerge stronger from such experiences. They grow wiser and more able to do great work in the future.

There are many models regarding how people manage change. One approach is when a person initiates proactive change. They feel in charge of the process and this gives them a sense of being in control.

They choose to look ahead, take initiatives and set specific goals. They perform superb work and do their best to achieve success. Such people continue to be proactive and focus on constant improvement.

Some people go through the process of reactive change. They may encounter an unexpected event or crisis that throws them off course.

This can be harder to overcome because people like to feel in charge. They feel better when they have initiated the change rather than feel it has been forced on them.

Many of the models for understanding reactive change are based on the work of Elisabeth Kübler-Ross. She is probably best known for the stages of grief and her book On Death and Dying, which was published in 1969.

There are many views about this approach. Some new models actually say it is important to keep a loved one alive in our memories rather than aim to move on.

Lorraine Hedtke's work, for example, encourages people to focus on the positive memories that are invoked by remembering people. It can involve continuing to speak with a loved one – such as talking them in the chair they used to have.

Lorraine says that these and many other actions can help to keep our love alive. They are also a great tribute to the people who have meant so much to us in our lives. This approach does not involve going through stages – it provides positive memories for life.

Elisabeth's model can still be important to understand, however, and has helped many people. She said that people often go through certain stages when facing the prospect of death, experiencing a loss or encountering a negative transition. They may go through the following stages.

Denial: "This can't be true."

Anger: "Who is to blame?"

Bargaining: "If things work out, I promise to live a better life."

Depression: "This is awful. I can't see a way forward."

Acceptance: "I am ready to move on."

Elisabeth explained that the phases were not necessarily sequential and people may go through some, but not all, of them. There would be ups and downs, regressions and leaps forward.

Some researchers have pointed out that Elisabeth's model was based on people who knew they were coming to the end of their lives. It did not apply to every situation where people experience setbacks or changes.

Many people found the model helpful, however, because it help them to make sense of difficult experiences. liberating. Some have built on Elisabeth's work and added to the model. The following section looks at one approach that is based on the original model. Let's explore some of these stages.

Shock

People experience a crisis. They lose their job, suffer an accident or get some bad news. Shock is the first reaction to trauma. This can be the case when somebody gets the sack, is involved in a car accident, loses a loved one or gets caught in a disaster. Shock gives way to the next stage.

Denial

A feeling of unreality follows and a person may deny what is happening. They may say:

"It's not true. It can't be happening. I can't believe it."

The driver climbs out of a smashed car, insists they feel all right and wants to continue their journey. The patient hears they have an incurable disease, but insists the hospital has mixed up the x-rays.

During the 1989 Hillsborough football disaster in England, for example, the authorities denied there was a problem, even though injured spectators were trying to find safety on the pitch. The authorities just wanted to get on with the game.

Paralysis

The police froze at Hillsborough. Constables reported that they had been ordered to stop spectators getting onto the pitch whatever the circumstances.

Distressed fans were therefore herded back into pens that had become death traps. Crucial minutes were lost before they evacuated spectators trapped behind the terrace barriers.

Paralysis is common in many stress situations. Bureaucrats in threatened organisations continue to follow old procedures, hoping the dangers will disappear. Passengers relax on planes that have crash landed successfully, thinking their ordeal is over, only to be overcome by toxic fumes.

Anger

"Let's find somebody to blame," is the cry. People search for scapegoats.

Victims pin blame on, for example, the police, the authorities, political parties, the other car driver or God. Some blame Life that has treated them cruelly. People often need to vent their feelings and experience a catharsis before entering the next stage.

Hurt

Pain seeps through the body, the organisation or the nation. Tears are shed and nightmares are re-lived.

Individuals react differently. Some may want to talk, sleep or retreat into silence. Some try to numb the pain with drink or other substance. Some relapse into depression.

Some people feel they are sinking downwards and fear they won't pull out of the dive. Many come to terms with the pain, however, and enter the next stage.

Healing

The optimistic scenario is that the body recovers and the mind begins to understand. Full acceptance takes longer, but it is time to start on the road to recovery.

The pessimistic scenario is that people sink deeper and experience a breakdown. Some stay at this level for a long time.

People obviously need encouragement at this stage. But at some point they must also take responsibility for their own future. Many people pull the pieces together and decide that life must go on. This takes us to the next step.

New Strength

People emerge from mourning as the mind searches for deeper meaning. The 45-year-old who experienced a heart attack, for example, considers developing a healthier lifestyle. They mobilise the physical and psychological strength needed to tackle future challenges.

The body feels stronger, the mind more determined. It is time to move forward and translate the feelings into action.

New Goals

After a painful divorce, the person aims to start a new relationship. After surviving a car accident, the driver again gets behind the wheel.

After the Hillsborough disaster, some football clubs removed the cages that had fenced in fans, whilst some clubs still procrastinated. Eventually all the clubs were forced to revamp their stadiums. They were set new health and safety goals.

People need hope. They sometimes do this by setting their sights on a long-term vision. At the same time, however, they also set short-term realistic goals that will produce visible successes.

Hard Work

People start fresh relationships, find new jobs, rebuild their cities or repair their nations after a disaster. This often calls for hard work and the sweat can have a cleansing effect. People feel they are doing something and begin to see results.

As mentioned earlier, however, the process is not linear. People may start getting the lives back together, but then maybe have flashback. Some also relapse, returning to Anger and Hurt. The next step is to translate the action into some early wins

Success

A recovering alcoholic aims to stay sober each day. A sacked worker feels better after completing their first week in a new job. A divorced person feels better after developing a more enriching relationship.

People cannot be given success. They have to earn it. They can be offered the right encouragement and tools to do the job. But they must get out of the chair and do the work.

Self-Confidence

People put the bad experience into perspective. Some individuals may still feel bitter, but others have different reactions. A person may say:

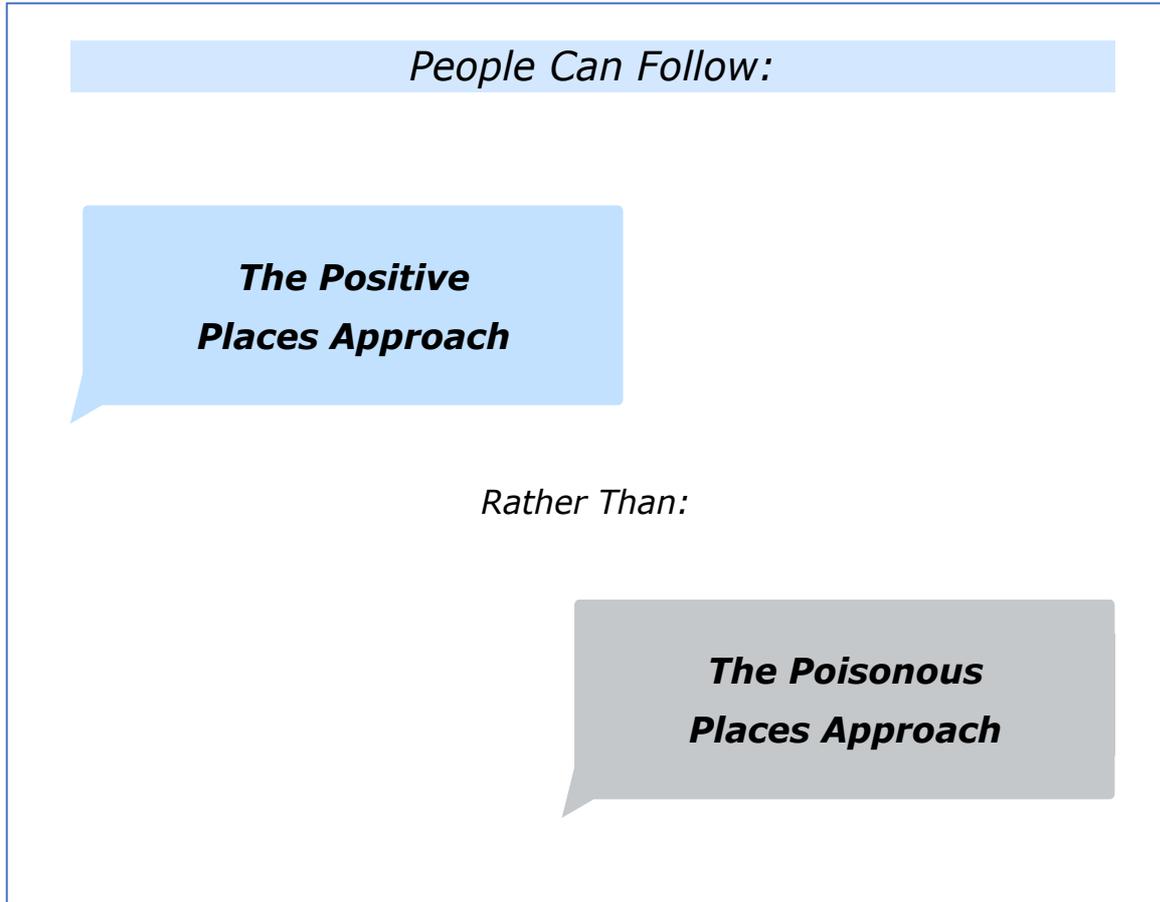

"It was the best thing that ever happened to me. It taught me that I could survive many things. It made me appreciate life and concentrate on what is important."

How do people come through the curve? They may manage it by themselves, talk with a friend, join a self-help group or use another approach.

Classic counsellors, for example, provide a supportive and non-directive environment in which a person can talk through their experiences. This enables a person to work through the change curve.

Let's look at one approach that people sometimes follow – either by themselves or with help from others – to manage setbacks successfully.

The Positive Places Approach Rather Than The Poisonous Places Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the positive places approach rather than the poisonous places approach.

Such people put themselves in positive places. They also aim to create positive places for other people. They like to encourage people in their lives and work.

They also recognise poisonous places. Such people then quickly put themselves into positive places that can encourage themselves and other people.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. Let's explore how it is possible to follow these themes.

Positive Places

What are the positive places for you in your life? What are the activities that give you positive energy? Who are the people with whom you feel at ease? What are the things you do that can feel purifying?

Different people give different answers to these questions. Here are some of the things that they may mention.

The Positive Places In My Life Are:

Encouraging people ... Being with my loved ones ... Working in my garden ... Walking with my dogs ... Listening to music ... Doing creative projects ... Studying success ... Passing on knowledge ... Creating beautiful things.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Positive Places

The Positive Places In My Life Are:

*

*

*

*

*

Poisonous Places

Some people expose themselves to poisonous places. They may listen to negative news, spend time with negative people, work in a toxic culture or do other things they find depressing.

Such people may start by aiming to understand and turnaround some of these situations. They may come to realise, however, that this may be fruitless. They may then need to find another solution.

Positive Places In The Future

Some people find ways to put themselves in positive places rather than poisonous places. They may take the following approach in their life, relationships and work

They keep putting themselves in positive places

Different people do this in different ways. Some ask themselves the following questions.

What are the positive places in my life? How can I keep putting myself in these places in the future? What will be the benefits of taking these steps – both for myself and other people?

Such people keep focusing on how they can take these steps to encourage themselves and other people.

They recognise when they may be affected by poisonous things and quickly put themselves in positive places

Different people recognise such situations in different ways. Some recognise the triggers that can send them into a negative spiral. One person described this in the following way.

"My style is to gather lots of information. I like to build on the positive things in life and also find solutions to challenges. Much of the time I feel up but then sometimes I may suddenly feel down.

"Looking around, I realise that I may have exposed myself to something poisonous. I may have listened to a piece of news or listened to somebody who has tried to spread pain.

"My reaction these days is to quickly focus on something positive in my life. This lifts my body and soul. I still try to find solutions to some challenges, of course, but I focus on the things I can control."

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow some elements of the positive places approach.

How can you keep putting yourself in the positive places in your life? How can you quickly put yourself in a positive place if you are exposed to poison? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

Here is the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Places In The Future

The specific things I can do to keep putting myself in the positive places in my life are:

*

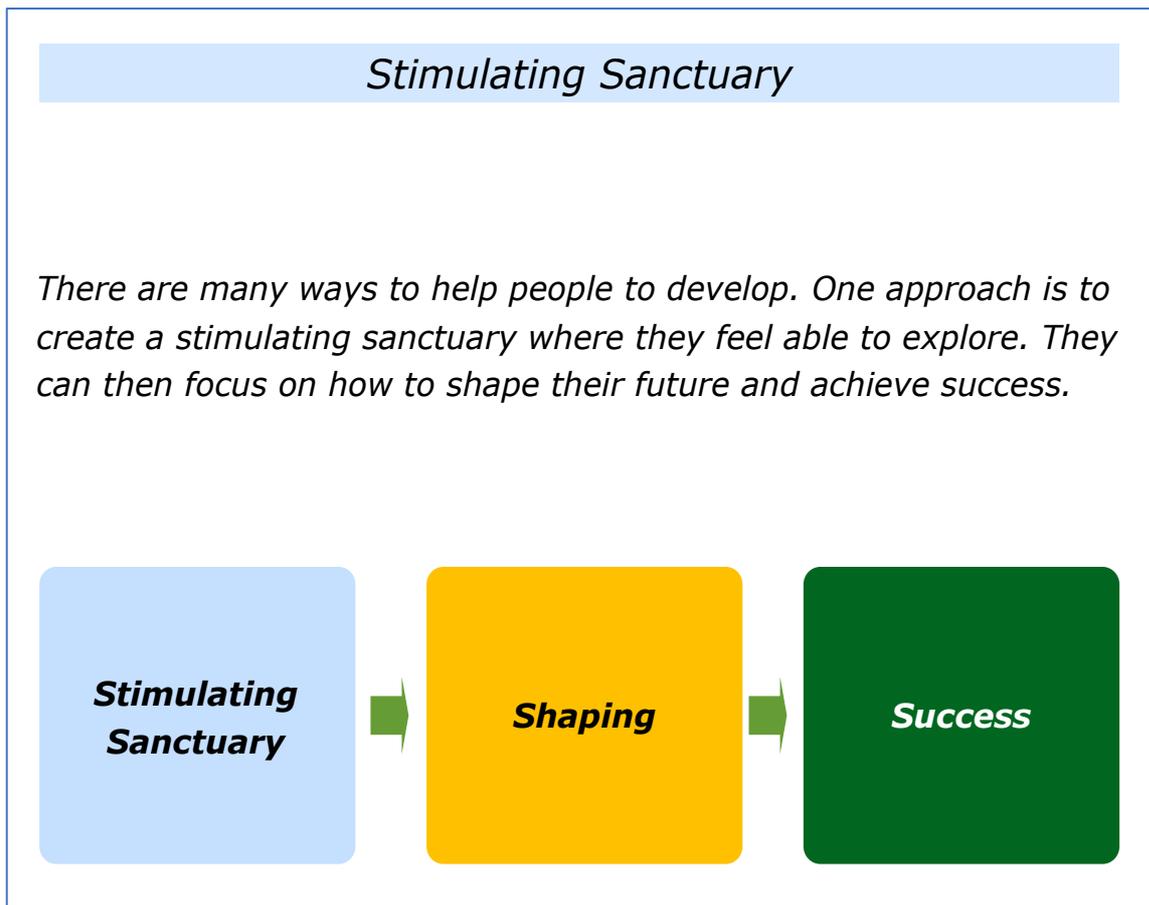

The specific things I can do to quickly put myself in a positive place if I am exposed to poison are:

*

The specific benefits of doing these things will be:

*

The Stimulating Sanctuary Approach

There are many ways to help people to develop. This is an approach followed by many educators, mentors, trusted advisors and people in the caring professions. They sometimes focus on the following themes.

Stimulating Sanctuary

Good mentors, for example, aim to create a stimulating sanctuary in which people feel able to explore their possibilities. They then help them to shape their future and achieve success.

Good educators aim to create a stimulating environment. Some do this by focusing on inspiration, implementation and integration. They create an inspiring environment, provide implementation tools that work and help people to integrate the learning in their own ways.

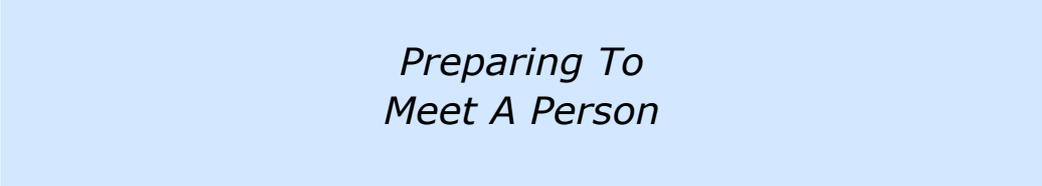

Different people spend time in different kinds of sanctuaries for different reasons. They may rest, sleep, listen to music, talk with friends or do another activity. Sometimes they aim to make sense of an experience.

Some people spend time in a sanctuary when recovering from a severe illness. They need a safe place where they can heal their body and soul. They are then more able to emerge stronger.

Some people spend time in their version of a retreat. They may rest, recentre and reflect on what is really important in life. Some emerge with a positive mantra they aim to follow in their daily life and work.

Mentors, educators and people workers sometimes go further than offering a safe place. When appropriate, they also aim to provide stimulation. They therefore prepare properly before running a session.

Good mentors, for example, consider the following questions before meeting a person. Other professionals may prepare by exploring variations on these themes.

Preparing To Meet A Person

Here are some questions it can be useful to explore before meeting a person.

- Who is the person I am going to meet? What may be happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their personal or professional goals? What may be topics they want to explore in the session?
- How can I make the person feel welcome and ease? How can I clarify what they may want to explore? Looking at the first topic, how can I clarify the real results they want to achieve? How can I clarify their picture of success?
- How can we explore the possible ways forwards? When appropriate, how can I pass on knowledge they can use? How can I share this in way that resonates with them? How can I then do my best to help them to achieve their goals?

Great educators focus on similar themes and aim to make the session enjoyable and effective. They clarify what people want to learn and make the learning personal, practical and profitable.

Personal – the learning should relate to the person’s agenda and help them to achieve their goals.

Practical – the learning should provide people with practical tools that can use to achieve their goals

Profitable – the learning should, in the widest sense, be profitable and help the person to achieve their goals.

Some people workers aim to create a stimulating sanctuary where individuals can reflect and, when necessary, refocus. This leads to the next step people can take in their lives and work.

Shaping

People Like To Shape Their Futures

One approach they can use is to build on what they can control in a situation. They can then aim to focus on:

- Clarity

To clarify the real results they want to achieve – their picture of success.

- Creativity

To clarify their possible options for moving forwards and the pluses and minuses of each option.

- Concrete Results

To pursue their chosen option and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Sanctuaries are great for a while. But at a certain point it can be important for people to move on because otherwise the muscles atrophy. This involves people aiming to shape their futures.

Different people do this in different ways. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, a person may start by clarifying the results they want to achieve.

Looking ahead, they may explore their potential options for going forwards together with the pluses and minuses of each option. They may also look at the attractiveness of each option and any potential creative solutions.

Buying time to think, a person may settle on the route they want to follow. They will then translate this into a clear action plan and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

A person recovering from an accident, for example, will begin exercising to build up the muscles. A jogger recovering from a mugging will start running in a safe place or with a friend.

A person who is laid off may do a piece of project work for a friend. They will do something simple to follow their version of getting back on the horse.

Going out into the world again can take a lot of effort, so a person may then wish to return to their sanctuary for a while. This is perfectly natural and will give them time to recover.

Many individuals who re-take charge of their lives start by doing something physical. They start exercising, move house or do other things that will bring them a quick win. They follow one of the oldest rules regarding change:

Change the physical things to change the psychological things.

People like to shape their futures. Sometimes a person can explore their options by themselves. Sometimes they may meet with somebody who helps them to get an overview of their situation.

Good mentors, for example, often use the Three C Model mentioned earlier. They help a person to focus on clarity, creativity and concrete results. When appropriate, they pass on knowledge in a way the person can accept and use.

Looking ahead, a person may then clarify their future plans. If so, they may do something like the following exercise. Whichever route they take, however, it is important for them to set things up to succeed. This can lead to the next stage.

Clarity

Bearing in mind the things I can control, the real results I want to achieve are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Creativity

The possible options going forward are:

The attractiveness of each option is:

___ / 10

___ / 10

___ / 10

Concrete Results

The specific things I can do to pursue my chosen route and do my best to get the desired results are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Success

Different people spend time in sanctuaries for different reasons. Some use them to find comfort after a loss or a setback. Some use them to return to their spiritual faith or inner compass.

Some people use sanctuaries to get stimulation. They go for a walk, listen to music, spend time with positive people or do other activities. They may also do this when aiming to develop a new sense of purpose.

Some take this approach when faced by a challenge. Buying time to think, they spend time in their chosen sanctuary to do some slow thinking. This helps them to see things in perspective and make better decisions.

Some people create times during their day when they can recentre and refocus. This enables them to regain their energy, refocus and rehearse what they are going to do next. One person expressed this in the following way.

"When I was younger I was addicted to experiences. I threw myself into activities and packed my diary with back-to-back events. I felt most alive when doing things, dealing with crises or striving to achieve a goal.

"Nowadays I like to create time to think. Maybe it is because I have got older or because we are now bombarded with information. I need time to reflect and make sense of experiences.

"This had led to me spending time in my sanctuaries. Sometimes I go for a walk, play music or have a nap. I find this helps me make better decisions and then rehearse what I am going to do next."

Some people workers may help individuals to play and pursue their chosen route. When doing so, they may encourage the person:

To clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

To clarify the specific things they can do to get some early wins, perform superb work and manage potential challenges;

To encourage themselves on the journey and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Such people continue to provide support and, when necessary, create a stimulating sanctuary. They will then help a person to shape their future and work towards achieving their goals.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow some elements of the stimulating sanctuary approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stimulating Sanctuary Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Recentering Approach

Different people use the recentering approach in different situations. They may do so when reflecting on what is important in life, recovering from setbacks or shaping their future. It involves going through the following steps.

They take time to rest, reflect and recenter. They reconnect with the core principles they want to follow. Sometimes they take the opportunity to revitalise themselves. They then refocus on the future.

They explore the possible ways forward. Clarifying the real results they want to achieve, they rehearse pursuing their chosen strategy. Moving into action, they then do their best to deliver the desired results.

(Please note. This piece uses the US spelling recentering rather than the English recentring.)

Some people also follow elements of this approach when recovering after a setback. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I go through the stages of rebounding, refocusing and aiming to deliver the desired results."

Whatever they call it, this approach often involves recentering and clarifying what they want to do in the future. They then aim to do their best to achieve their goals.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking back, when have you followed some elements of the recentering approach? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

You may have done this when been feeling vulnerable - such as being ill or after experiencing a setback. You may have done so when taking time to reflect on your values and explore your future possibilities.

What did you do to reflect, recentre and revitalise yourself? What did you do to revisit your inner compass and core principles? What did you then do to shape your future?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe what you did to follow some elements of the recentering approach.

Recentering In The Past

The specific situation when I followed some elements of the recentering approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow some elements of the recentering approach were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Imagine that you want to follow some of these principles in the future. Let's explore how you can take these steps.

Recentering

The first step is to take time to recenter. Sometimes it is possible to set aside time to rest, reflect and revitalise yourself. Sometimes it calls for buying time to think in the midst of a hectic activity or environment.

You will follow your own ritual for recentering. You may aim to find a quiet place, do deep breathing or find another way to relax. Choosing to reflect, you may go through some of the following stages.

Reconnecting With Your Core Principles

Some people use the time as an opportunity to reconnect with their core principles. Depending on the situation, different people do this in different ways. Some ask themselves the following questions when faced by a challenge or when looking into the future.

"What are the things that I believe are important in life? What are the core principles I want to follow in my life or work? What are the reasons why I believe it is important to follow these principles?"

"How can I follow these principles in the future? What will be the pluses and minuses of following these principles? Bearing these in mind, what is the route I want to follow?"

Imagine that you want to take this approach at some point in the future. Sometimes it can be useful to think ahead and revisit your inner compass. This can help you to act decisively when it matters.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Core Principles

The core principles I want to follow in my life or work are these.

I want:

* To

* To

* To

Good organisations also take time to recenter. They do this to ensure they are building on their core principles. They believe this approach is more likely to help them to achieve sustainable success.

Some organisations take a different approach. During the Covid-19 crisis, some rushed into the suggested process of recovery, reimagining and aiming to get results. They wanted build a better future, but there was a potential problem.

Rushing to fill a gap in the market, they may or may not have been building on their principles. This might produce short-term wins. But over the long term they may find themselves far away from their core strengths.

Revitalisation

Some people use the recentering time as an opportunity to revitalise themselves. Different people do this in different ways.

Some do this on a physical level. They rest, sleep or find other ways to revitalise the body. Some do it on a psychological level. They focus on things that give them positive energy. Some do it on a philosophical level. They revitalise their soul by focusing on their spirit and strengths.

Revitalisation has several meanings. These include the following: to give new life, to reinvigorate, to regenerate, to renew. The revitalisation process can also involve building on the best of the past and generating energy to shape the future.

Imagine that you have done some of these things. It will then be time to move on to the next step.

Refocusing

This step involves refocusing on what you are going to do next and rehearsing how to make it happen. This could be to tackle a challenge, achieve a goal or do another activity. Let's explore these themes.

Refocusing On What You Are Going To Do Next

Some people have a ritual they follow to refocus their attention on shaping the future. Bearing in mind the principles they want to follow in their life, they may then explore their following themes.

What am I going to do next? What is the task I want to do, the challenge I want to tackle or the goal I want to achieve? What are the real results I want to achieve – the picture of success?

What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I anticipate and manage any challenges? What else can I do to increase the chances of achieving success?

Imagine that you have taken this approach and have settled on your chosen route forwards. It can then be useful to take the next step.

Rehearsal

Great workers often rehearse following their chosen strategy. Different people do this in different ways. Here is one approach that you may wish to consider.

Rehearsal

You can focus on the results you want to achieve and then go through the following steps.

- You can rehearse following your chosen strategies and working towards your goals;*
- You can rehearse managing any challenges and then continuing to work towards your goals;*
- You can again rehearse following your chosen strategies and doing your best to achieve your goals.*

Great teams also rehearse pursuing their strategy. One Premier League football team in England, for example, makes sure that everybody knows their part in implementing the game plan. Here is how the team's captain explained the approach.

"Every player knows the team's playing strategy and what we want to achieve. They know exactly what they are supposed to do in the process.

"They also know the movements of the other players. This makes it second nature to know where to pass the ball.

"Every player knows what to expect during the week. After finishing the training on one day, we are told what we will be doing in training the next day.

"Everybody can then prepare properly for the training. This provides a framework where we can apply our talents to win matches."

Results

Imagine that you have gone through the recentering process and feel revitalised. You have also refocused and rehearsed pursuing your strategy.

You can then follow your ritual for clicking into action. Being fully present, you can follow your principles, delivering consistently high standards and aim to do superb work.

One approach is to follow your chosen rhythm. It is then to keep reading reality, keep improving and doing your best to deliver the desired results. Sometimes you may also reach the goal by adding that touch of class.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to go through the stages of recentering, refocusing and delivering results?

You may aim to do this when managing a crisis, overcoming a setback, tackling a specific challenge or doing another activity. You may do this when acting in your role as a parent, friend, educator, coach, trusted advisor, leader or in another professional role.

What can you do then to buy time to recentre and reconnect with your inner compass? How can you raise your sights and refocus? How can you follow your rhythm and deliver the desired results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Recentering In The Future

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the recentering approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

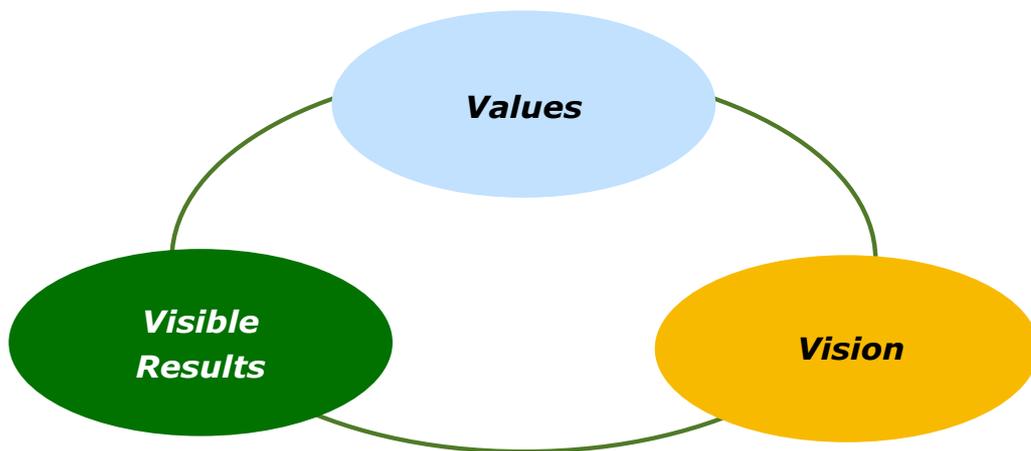

*

*

Vulnerability Is A Great Teacher Approach

Vulnerability Can Be A Great Teacher

It can encourage us to clarify what is really important in life and focus on the following themes.

Vulnerability can sometimes help us to learn about what is important in life. Sometimes wisdom seeps into our bones and we apply the lessons in our lives. Other times we forget the messages.

Can you think of a time when you felt vulnerable? You may have had an illness, lost someone close, suffered an unexpected setback or experienced another difficulty.

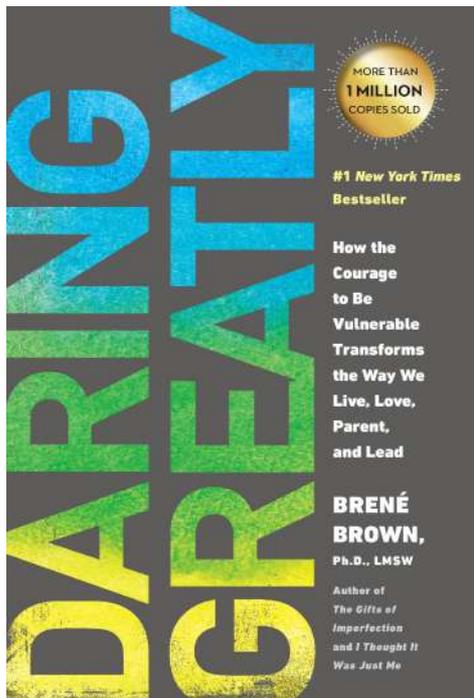

Suddenly you felt out of control. You felt unable to shape everything in your world. Certainly you aimed to control the controllables, but many levers lay beyond your reach.

What did you do next? After a while you may have begun to reflect, go deeper and listen to your soul. We are sometimes told:

"Everything is temporary, nothing is permanent."

It is when we feel vulnerable that this lesson hits home. We have the chance to consider what is important in our lives and work.

Brené Brown believes that people often grow from worthwhile struggles. She has written about how such people live wholeheartedly in her book Daring Greatly.

Courage can be daring to embrace vulnerability.

"Vulnerability is the birthplace of love, belonging, joy, courage, empathy, and creativity.

"It is the source of hope, empathy, accountability, and authenticity.

"If we want greater clarity in our purpose or deeper and more meaningful spiritual lives, vulnerability is the path."

Here are some quotes from Brené about people who dare to be human and show courage.

"We desperately need more leaders who are committed to courageous, wholehearted leadership and who are self-aware enough to lead from their hearts, rather than unevolved leaders who lead from hurt and fear."

"The courage to be vulnerable is not about winning or losing, it's about the courage to show up when you can't predict or control the outcome."

"The only thing I know for sure is that if you're going to dare greatly, you're going to get your ass kicked at some point. If you choose courage, you will absolutely know failure, disappointment, setback, even heartbreak. That's why we call it courage. That's why it's so rare."

Different people learn different lessons from their vulnerable times. Some clarify their deepest values, translate these into a clear vision and aim to achieve visible results. Let's explore these themes.

Values

Sometimes we learn a lot during challenging times. Sometimes we also apply these lessons in the future. Here is how one person explained this approach.

"My wife suffered a serious illness. Then, to make matters worse, my job came under threat. So our income was threatened.

"My first reaction was to simply want everything to be like it was before. But then I realised that things had changed forever. We could give up or learn to manage the new reality.

"Starting to research my wife's illness, we scoured the web for information and met with patient groups. This paid dividends. She eventually chose a specific form of treatment with a fine doctor.

"We also took stock of our assets - our finances, relationships, professional contacts and other resources. We soon realised how wealthy we were in real terms.

"We explored the possibility of downshifting. This would mean moving to another part of the country, perhaps near my wife's parents, and starting a different kind of life.

"My wife recovered and the job survived. But we also heeded the lessons.

"One year later we moved closer to her parents. She returned to part time teaching, which she loves, and I set up my own business.

"Our daughter likes living in the country and has started doing part time work at a stable. Our son changed his chosen subjects at university. Rediscovering his youthful idealism, he plans to become an environmental journalist."

Some organisations also take the opportunity to do some soul searching during difficult times. During Covid, for example, some decided to return to their core values. They then used these as a basis for shaping a successful and sustainable future.

Values can be a useful guiding compass for individuals, organisations and societies. But then comes the real part – translating these values into action. This often calls for exploring the next stage.

Vision

Looking back, when have you chosen to follow a certain value and translate this into working towards a clear vision?

Some people make key decisions after experiencing difficulties. A person who is treated unjustly may choose to study law and help other people. A footballer who suffers a career ending injury may choose to become a coach.

J.K. Rowling described how she took this approach when addressing students at Harvard about The Fringe Benefits of Failure and the Importance of Imagination.

Deep into the address she talks about how, after leaving university, she could be seen as a failure. Instead of studying a degree that might lead to a well-paid job, she had studied classics. She had little money and her marriage had broken.

J.K. had some great assets. In addition to having some wonderful friends, she mentioned three things. She had:

"A daughter I adored ... An old typewriter ... And a big idea."

She then worked towards her vision of producing the books about Harry Potter.

Visible Results

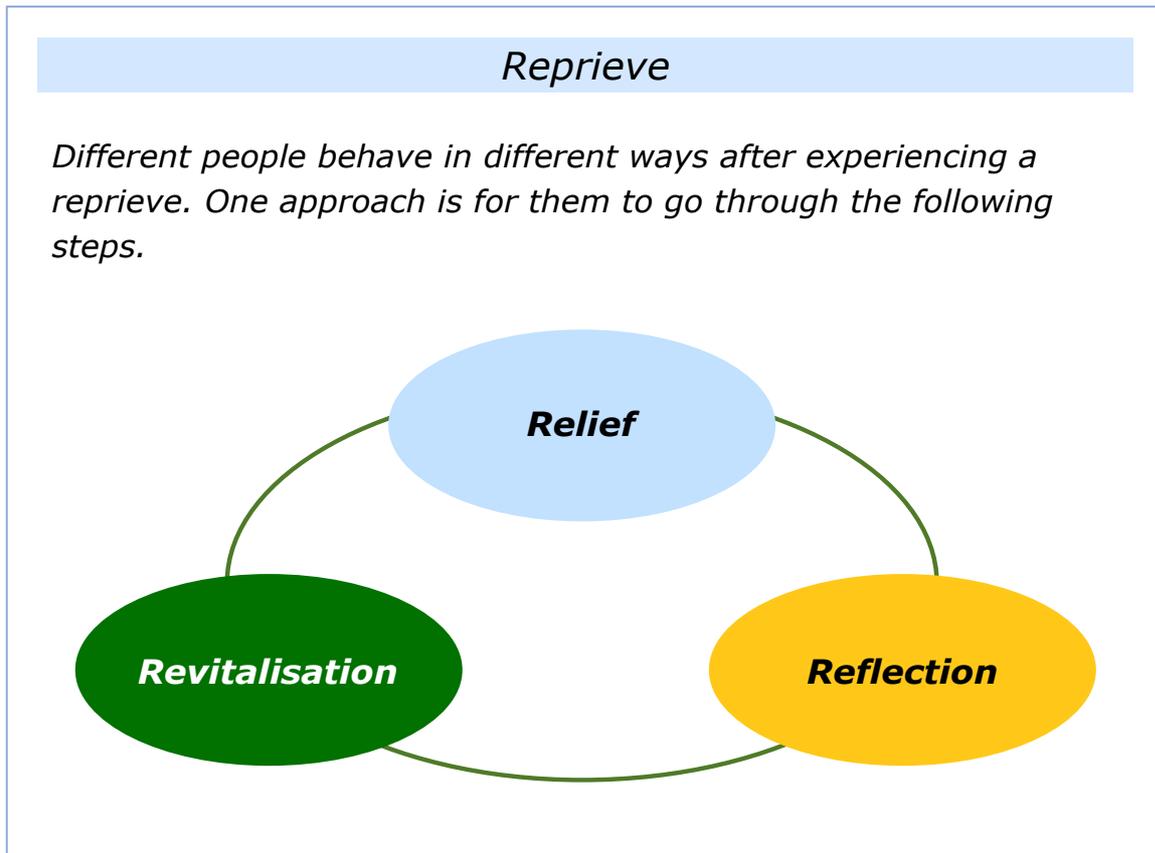

Our deepest learning is in our bones not just our hearts or minds. Some people then choose to follow their values, work towards a vision and produce visible results.

Sometimes they produce obvious results. They may do their best to create a happy family, help students to learn or work to pass a law that enables people to shape their futures. They may produce a play, design a building or do something else that gives people pleasure.

Sometimes the results they produce are less obvious but may become visible in other ways. They may help people to develop their self-confidence, create enriching experiences or give people positive memories for life.

Let's look at another approach that can help people to make the most of life.

The Reprieve Approach

Some people make the most of life after experiencing their equivalent of a reprieve. They may recover from an illness, be forgiven for a mistake, get a second chance or come through an existential challenge.

Near death experiences focus the mind, we are told. A reprieve experience may not be as dramatic but people may go through the following stages.

Relief

Imagine that you have had a health scare and are awaiting the results of a blood test. This can be an anxious time and many potential scenarios may go through your head. The blood test comes back and the doctor says:

"Everything is normal. You can get on with living your life."

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you experienced some kind of reprieve? What did you learn from the experience? If appropriate, how did you try to apply these lessons in your life?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Reprieve Approach In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I experienced some kind of reprieve was:

*

The specific things I learned from the experience were:

*

The specific things I did to try to apply what I learned from the experience were:

*

Sometimes the relief can lead to a feeling of elation. This can then lead to the next stage.

Reflection

Vulnerability is a great teacher. Some people who enjoy a sense of relief may then reflect on what is important in life. They may do this by exploring the following questions.

"What have I learned from the experience? What have I learned about what is important in life? How can I focus on these things in the future?"

Kathleen Taylor highlighted some of these themes in her TEDxTampaBay talk Rethinking The Bucket List. She has spent more than 20 years working as a counsellor in hospices.

When asked about her work, she says she loves her job. Why? She enables people to tackle this final chapter. At the same time, she learns from them about what does and does not matter in life.

Kathleen says that when facing death a person is able to be who they really are.

They become courageous and honest. They find joy in the smallest moments.

They are authentic and able to be their true self. They talk about things they have never expressed before.

They look back on and make sense of the body of work in their life.

Kathleen says that, whilst there are many stages in our lives, three stand out.

When we are young we are fearless and set our course. When we are in mid-life we question and maybe readjust our course. When we are at the end of our life we find answers about our course.

Kathleen believes that we can learn from people who are living their last days. She says:

"I would like to hope it is never too soon to learn these lessons."

Maybe we can take some of these steps earlier in our lives, says Kathleen. We can be who we truly are and aim to do our best in life. This can lead to the next stage.

Revitalisation

Some people who recognise their mortality see every day as a bonus. They may develop a sense of gratitude, appreciate life and help other people. They may also aim to pass on a positive legacy.

Some individuals do the Reverse Bucket List exercise. This invites them to describe the following things:

The specific things they are grateful for having been given in their life;

The specific things they have experienced and learned in their life;

The specific things they have given to people or have achieved in their life.

Such people sometimes feel revitalised. They feel motivated to build on the experiences, assets and the positive things they have in their life. They then aim to do their best during their time on the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Whilst it is hard to predict the future, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the reprieve approach?

This could be a reprieve concerning yourself in your personal or professional life. It could also be a reprieve that concerns somebody else who you may want to support.

What can you do in such a situation? How can you reflect on what is important in life? How can you translate these thoughts into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Reprieve Approach In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may want to follow elements of the reprieve approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Fallow Times Can Be Fruitful Times Approach

Fallow Times Can Be Fruitful Times

People can sometimes feel in flow when doing a stimulating project. After completing it they may feel frustrated and fallow.

They can make good use of the fallow times, however, and move on to being in flow on the next project.

People can sometimes experience a sense of flow when doing a stimulating piece of work or project. They enjoy setting specific goals, doing superb work and achieving success.

This is a process I have seen when working with driven people, start-ups and peak performing teams. They have sense of purpose and work hard to achieve their picture of success.

Finishing can bring a great deal of satisfaction but can be followed by a sense of emptiness. People had a reason to get up each day and they want to fill this void. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I love working on a rewarding project. But after completing the job I sometimes go into the doldrums.

"I am then tempted to jump into the next project, even though it may not be too stimulating. Sometimes it takes ages to find a new project that is satisfying."

Great workers sometimes experience fallow times. Let's explore how it can be possible to make good use of such times.

Recognising The Fallow Times

Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi's work on flow showed how a person can become completely absorbed in an activity. He explained that people then have a sense of purpose and do stimulating work on the way to achieving their picture of success.

Reaching the goal is satisfying, but this can be followed by a sense of frustration. It may be difficult to find the next adventure where they will experience a sense of flow.

At these times it can be useful to remember the agricultural tradition of allowing a field to lie fallow. The pasture can rest, recover and become revitalised.

Some creative artists recognise the value of giving themselves permission to be fallow. Providing these times are used properly, fallow times can be fruitful times.

Making Good Use Of The Fallow Times

People can be vulnerable during the fallow times. They may have completed a satisfying project, sold a company they built or fulfilled another dream.

Looking for a new sense of purpose, they can sometimes feel empty. Because of this searching, they are open to the influences around them. They may feel a vacuum inside, but this can open the door to ensuring that such times becoming fruitful times.

People do like to feel in control, however, so it can be useful for them to set their agenda. Even if this is simply to say:

"I am going to give myself permission to explore rather than strive to find the next project."

People who are open can benefit by surrounding themselves with positive – rather than negative – influences. Exposing themselves to enriching experiences can sow the seeds of future growth.

Imagine that you experienced such a fallow time. What would you like to surround yourself with at such times? You may wish to sleep, visit beautiful places, walk by the sea, spend time with kindred spirits, play your favourite music, study success or whatever.

Moving On From The Fallow Times To Flow

People who surround themselves with enriching experiences often find that a stimulating project emerges. Some may be cautious, however, and wonder if the new project is the right thing to do.

They wonder if they will recapture their previous sense of purpose. There is no perfect answer to these questions. When looking at the stimulating project that emerges, it can be useful for them to consider the following themes.

Will doing the project give me positive energy? Will doing it give me a chance to follow my personal or professional principles? Will doing it help people or the planet?

If the answers are "Yes," it can be useful to seize the opportunity. The touchstone is whether or not it gives them positive energy.

Making good use of the fallow times increases the chances of choosing a stimulating project. Embarking on the adventure, they can then flow, focus and finish.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the specific things you can do make good use of the fallow times.

The Fallow Times

The specific things I can do to make good use of the fallow times are:

*

*

*

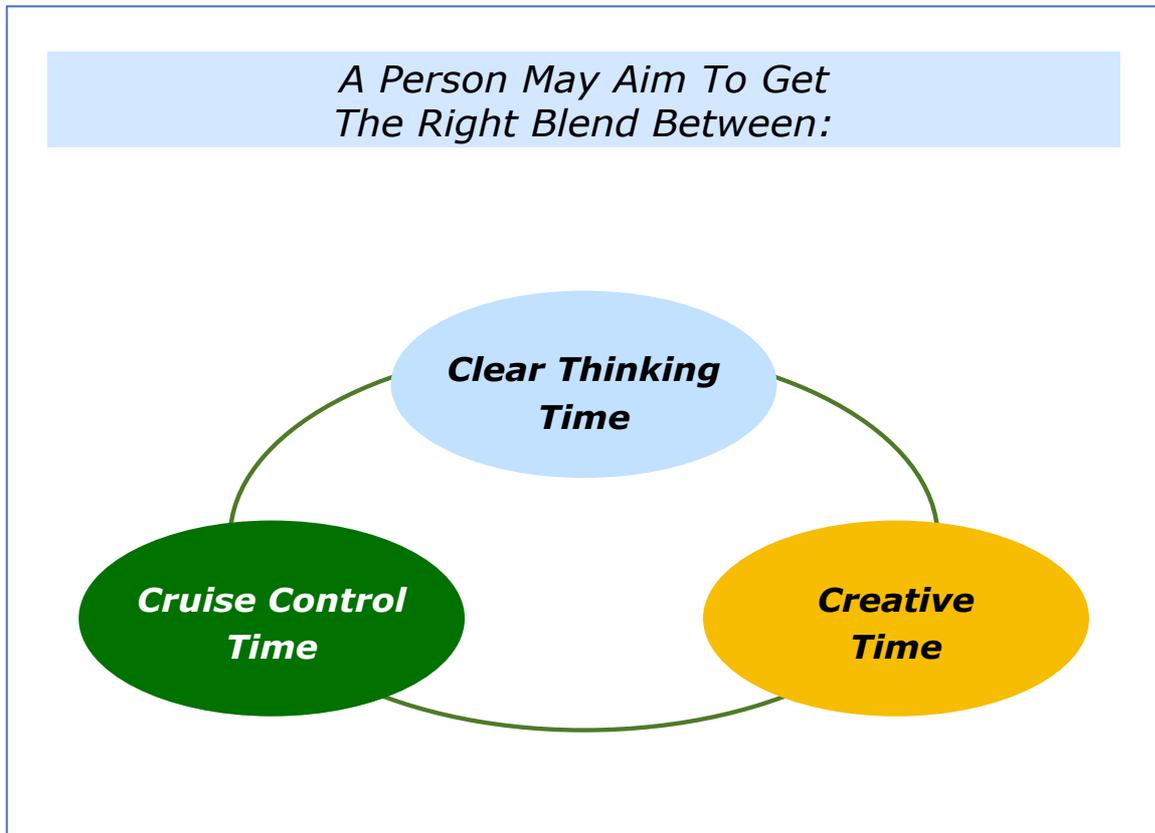

The specific benefits of doing these things will be:

*

*

*

The Different Kinds Of Time Approaches

This section looks at the different kinds of time. It starts by exploring clear thinking, creative and cruise control time. It then move on to considering other kinds of time. Let's start by focusing on the following theme.

Clear Thinking Time

When do you create clear thinking time? How do you get oxygen into your brain? How do you then use your imagination? Different people follow this path in different ways.

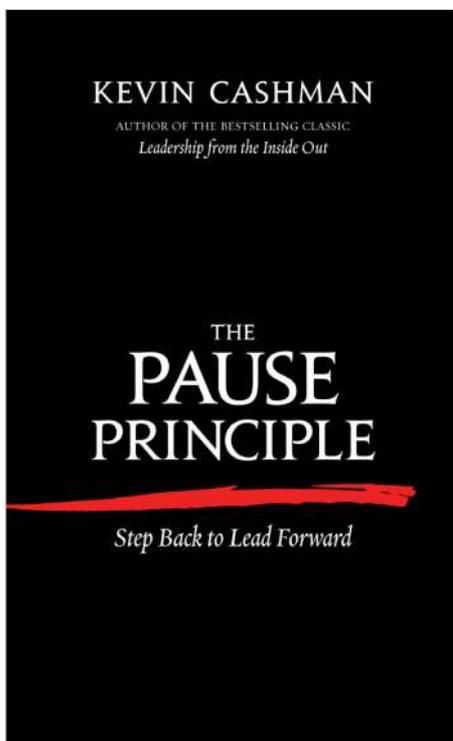

They may aim:

*To get enough sleep ... To compose themselves at the start of the day ...
To look ahead to the decisions and actions they need to take during the day ... To organise their time in blocks so they can give full attention to what they are doing*

To have breaks so they can regain their energy ... To build in time to reflect ... To go for a walk, run or have another kind of break ... To sometimes just let their mind wander and explore ideas ... To then refocus and rehearse their next thing they are going to do.

To buy time when making key decisions ... To do their due diligence ... To clarify the real results they want to achieve ... To explore the possible choices and consequences ... To make their decision and translate this into a clear action plan.

Good leaders try to stay calm and buy time when making decisions. Kevin Cashman highlighted this approach in his book The Pause Principle. Here is an excerpt from his website.

Cashman believes every leader is on a journey from being a transaction-focused manager to an authentic leader that inspires real change.

At the core of this transformation is the ability to pause.

Pausing is a conscious and intentional process of stepping back to reflect and deliberate, and then lead forward with greater clarity and impact.

Cashman's work centres around one simple truth: that fast thinking is the domain of management transaction, while slow thinking is the leadership domain of strategic, innovative transformation.

Looking at your own life, how can you create times for clear thinking? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Clear Thinking Time

The specific things I can do to create clear thinking times are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

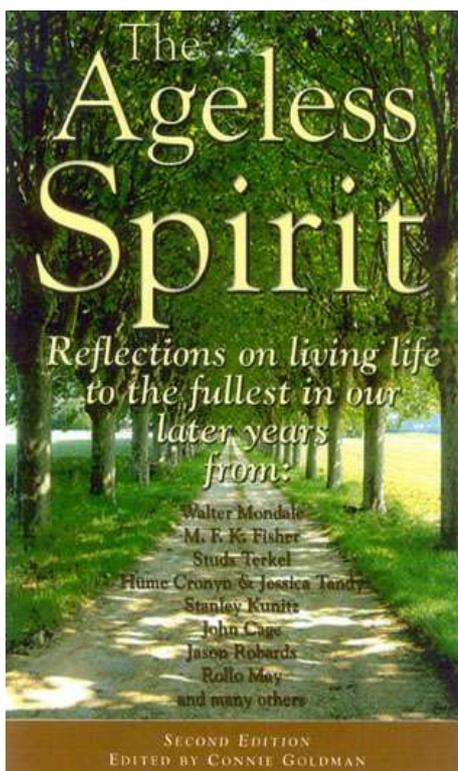

Creative Time

When do you feel most creative? Are there any times of the day that are your prime times? These are when you have most energy. How can you protect and make good use of these times?

Sometimes we have lots of energy. Sometimes we need to rest in order to become revitalised. Are you at your best in the morning, the afternoon, the evening or a combination of these times?

Rollo May, the psychologist, believed people could become more effective by making good use of such times. It is important to catch the wave, otherwise it is gone forever. Writing in the first edition of The Ageless Spirit, he explained his own schedule for a day.

I stay in my studio each day for four hours, but the last hour and a half isn't worth very much. It was hard for me to accept, but what can I do? All I can do is make the most of the creative time I've got.

So for two and a half hours I'm moving marvellously; the rest of the time I'm simply fiddling around.

But I find joy in fiddling too. I have to accept the fact that I'm not a God. I have to accept my destiny.

I have to accept the fact that I can only do creative work for a few hours a day, but that does not diminish one iota the joy I get from those two hours.

Different people use different methods to use their creative times. Some organise their diary so they can work without interruption. Some set up customer visits for when they have most energy.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Creative Time

The specific things I can do to safeguard and make good use of my creative times are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Cruise Control Time

When do you feel in cruise control? When do you do things almost automatically but are able to do the required work?

Cruise control can be useful, because sometimes you have to conserve your energy. At the same time, it is vital to respect the task in hand and deliver the required professional standards.

Peak performers often follow a daily rhythm that has elements of cruise control. They follow certain rituals that enable them to click into action and follow good habits.

Some professions involve following a rhythm but also paying full attention at critical moments. Nurses and doctors need to show compassion towards patients, for example, even when following a daily routine.

Looking at your own life, what are the times of the day that you go into cruise control? What are the kinds of jobs that you do during this time? You may do routine work, administration or other necessary chores.

Are there certain rituals you follow to get yourself into the mood to do such work? You may lock yourself away, go through lists and get a kick from crossing off each item. You may drink coffee, play music or do other things to encourage yourself when doing the tasks.

Imagine that you get interrupted. How do you switch into being fully concentrated? If appropriate, how do you buy time to do some clear thinking? How do you then do everything possible to reach your chosen goals?

Great workers try to balance their clear thinking times, creative times and cruise control times. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on these themes. This invites you to describe the specific things you can do to make good use of your cruise control times.

Cruise Control Time

The specific things I can do to make good use of my cruise control times are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

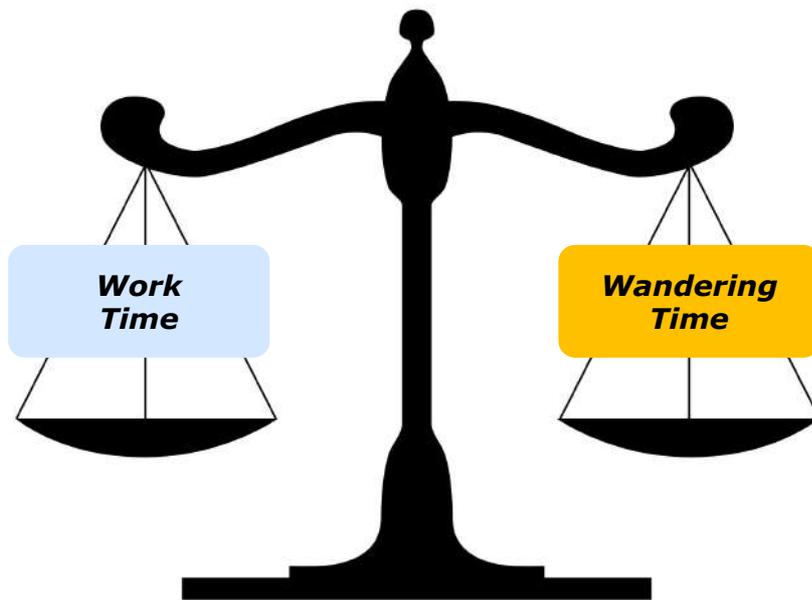

*

*

There are many kinds of time. The following section explores several approaches that people can use to stay creative.

The Work Time And Wandering Time Approach

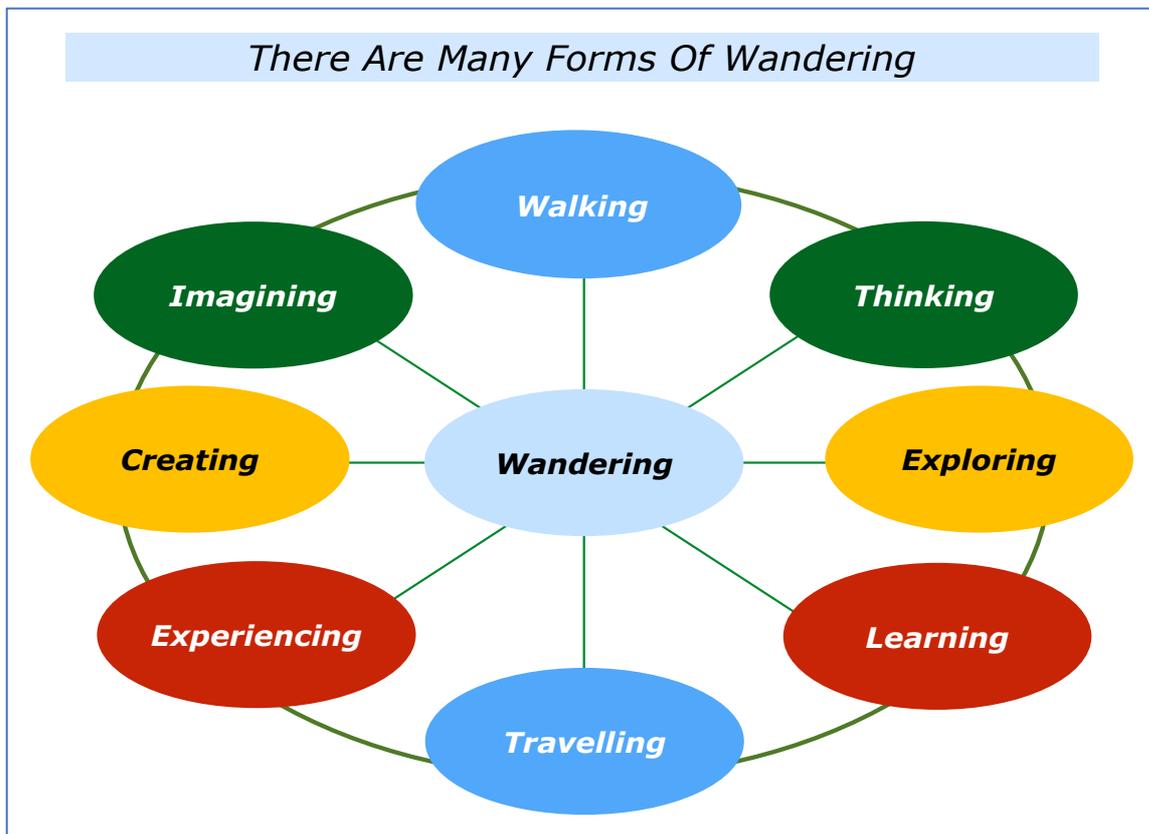

Getting The Right Blend Between Your:

There are many ways to recharge your batteries and take time to find solutions to challenges. One approach is to get the right balance between your work time and wandering time.

Creative people love their work time, but they also love their wandering time. This comes in different forms, but it serves the function of opening their minds.

They may enjoy the physical process of wandering - such as walking, exploring or having new experiences. They may also enjoy other forms of wandering - such as thinking, learning, creating and imagining.

During the past decade it has become more acceptable to switch off and let your mind wander. Carl Honoré popularised many of these ideas with his book In Praise of Slow.

Good decision makers often set aside time to do some slow thinking. Fast thinking often generates the pieces of the jigsaw, but slow thinking may be needed to make sense of the whole picture. Our epiphanies sometimes emerge when doing some slow thinking.

Looking at your own life, what are the kinds of wandering that you enjoy? You may enjoy letting your mind drift when walking, gardening, exploring the web or doing other activities.

Some people swear by the benefits of walking. They may love to walk in green spaces, cities or elsewhere. Sometimes this enables them to let their minds wander or even work things out.

Different people may explore different kinds of wandering time during different stages of life. Let's look at some examples.

George Dennison, the educator, believed it was important to get to know children. This sometimes involved the idea of losing time rather than saving time. He wrote a book about his experiences of doing this when running the First Street School in The Lower East Side of New York.

Writing in The Lives Of Children, which was published in 1969, he describes how the school he ran followed Rousseau's old policy of losing time.

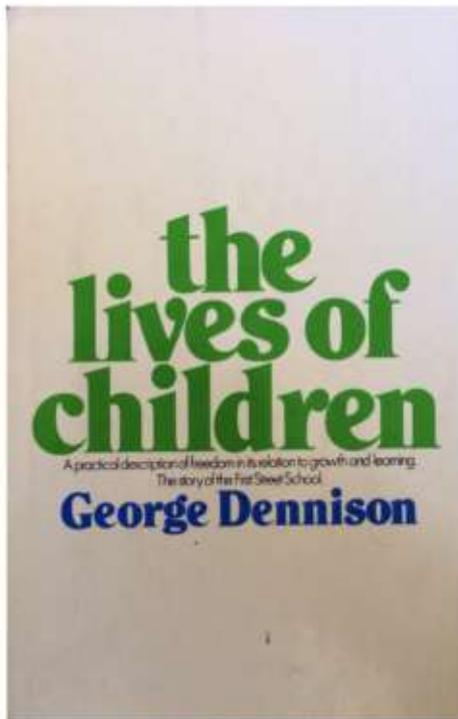

The most useful rule of education is this: do not save time, but lose it.

George and his colleagues made a lot of time to get to know the children, many of whom came from difficult backgrounds. Here is an excerpt from the book.

The first few weeks of school were extremely pleasant. With nine children and four adults, it seemed like a family gathering or a picnic, or perhaps a clubhouse of some sort.

In the range of educational endeavours, it must certainly have represented, for teachers and children alike, an extraordinary luxury.

Within this period many of the children's faces took on that glow of 23 eagerness that we associate with childhood.

We launched out immediately on the business of losing time. That is to say, we got to know the children really well.

We held long conversations with them, not on school topics, but on whatever occupied their minds.

We discovered the details of family life, neighbourhood events, personal worries and personal interests.

George goes on to describe how he balanced this wandering time with then moving into work time. This called for showing the children that they were cared for, which also involved equipping them to shape their future lives.

Jose Portillo was present at this time, as was his sister Elena, and the relationship I established with him was absolutely essential to our later lessons in reading.

He was thirteen years old, and after five years in the public schools still could not read, though he was of normal intelligence.

Now given this background, what must Jose have thought about my wanting to teach him to read? For I did want to, and I made no bones about it.

The fact is, he took it for granted. It was the right and proper relationship, not of teacher and student, but of adult and child ... and so I did not wait for Jose to decide for himself.

When I thought the time was ripe, I insisted that we begin our lessons. My insistence carried a great deal of weight with him.

My own demands were an important part of Jose's experience. They were not simply the demands of a teacher, nor of an adult, but belonged to my own way of caring about Jose. And he sensed this.

There was something he prized in the fact that I made demands on him. This became all the more evident once he realized that I wasn't simply processing him, that is, grading, measuring, etc.

And when he learned that he could refuse - could refuse altogether, could terminate the lesson, could change its direction, could insist on something else.

We became collaborators in the business of life.

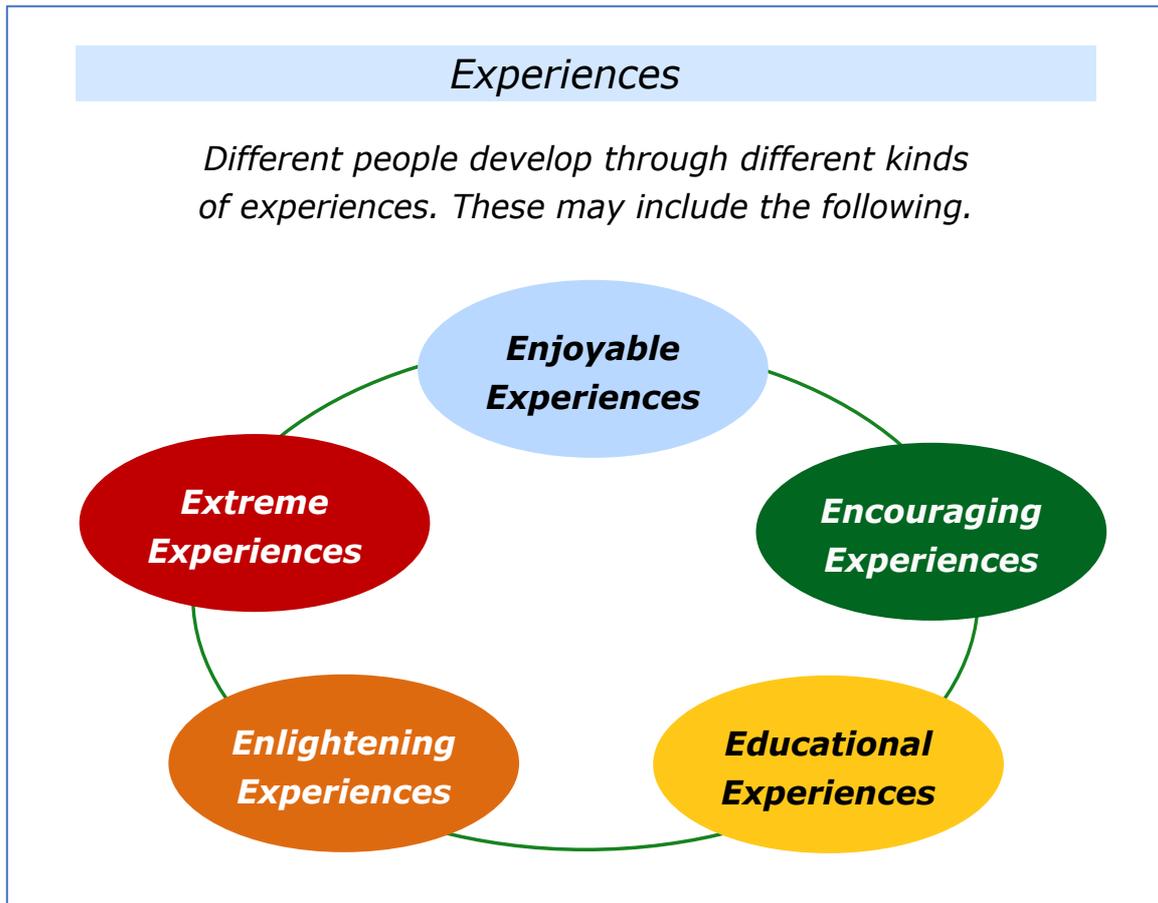

Different people get different benefits from wandering times at different stages of their lives.

People who are achievers, for example, can become addicted to activity. Sometimes it can be helpful for them to be proactive and give themselves time to think.

People who take this approach are more likely to see things in perspective. They may also find that it helps them to focus on what is really important. This can include taking care of their wellbeing.

People who are prepared to wander sometimes developing by pursuing certain kinds of experiences. Let's explore this approach.

The Developing Through Experiences Approach

Different people develop through different kinds of experiences. This section explores some experiences that may enable people to grow.

Enjoyable Experiences

People love to do what they enjoy in their lives and work. They may enjoy playing, exercising, creating, exploring or doing other things they feed their soul.

What do you enjoy doing? How can you do more of these things in the future? How can you encourage others to do what they enjoy? What may be the benefits of doing these things?

Encouraging Experiences

People often grow by getting encouragement. Some individuals who are dyslexic or have different ways of operating often mention encouragers who helped them to develop.

People can also grow by giving others encouragement. They may get a helper's high and find that the giver gets as much as the receiver. Some people simply want to give and help others to succeed.

Where do you get encouragement? Who are the encouragers in your life? How can you do more things that give you encouragement? How can you encourage other people? What will be the benefits of doing these things?

Educational Experiences

Many people love to learn. They love to explore, gather knowledge and discover how things work. They enjoy adding ideas, models and tools to their resources for shaping the future.

What are the things you love to learn about? How can you continue to learn and grow? When appropriate, how can you help others to learn? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

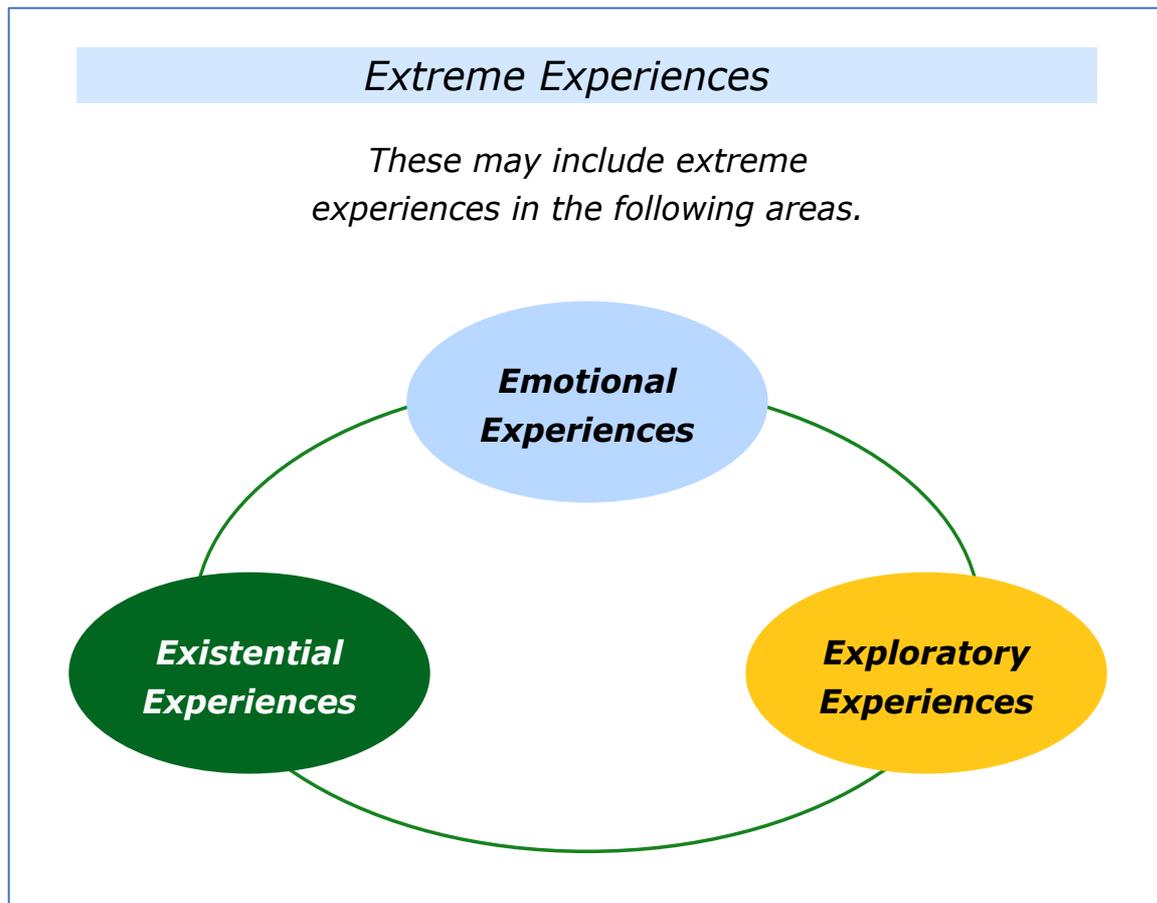

Enlightening Experiences

People can continue to educate themselves. Sometimes they may go further and have experiences that are enlightening. They may see life in a different way or have a creative breakthrough that enables them to shape their future.

When have you had such experiences? What happened that helped to create such breakthroughs? What did you do as a result? If appropriate, how can you increase the possibility of having enlightening experiences in the future?

Extreme Experiences

People sometimes grow through having extreme experiences. Sometimes these can be exhilarating, sometimes they can be challenging. People sometimes deliberately seek or create such experiences. These may fall into the following categories.

Emotional Experiences

Some people grow through extreme emotional experiences. These may be positive – such as joy, happiness or exhilaration. Some may also be more challenging – such as pain, unhappiness or grief.

Some people actually like to put themselves in situations where they experience extreme emotions. They may enjoy getting adrenaline highs or other feelings.

Some extreme emotions come out of the blue when we find ourselves affected by events beyond our control. Life can bring accidents, disappointments and grief.

Different people deal with such extreme emotions in different ways. The way they choose to respond can often depend on their repertoire of skills for dealing with such situations.

Exploratory Experiences

Some people aim to develop by exploring extreme experiences. They may choose to stretch themselves by focusing on certain kinds of adventures, sensations or challenges.

Some do this by pursuing activities where they feel fully alive. They may love living on the edge, climbing mountains, sailing the oceans or doing other things they find exhilarating.

Some aim to explore sensations by taking drugs or experimenting in other ways. These activities may give them certain highs but may also have potentially harmful effects.

Existential Experiences

Some people encounter existentially challenging situations. They may experience grief, trauma or life-threatening events that shock them to their core.

Some people may feel paralysed. Some may go through a range of emotions. Some may eventually be proactive and do their best to manage the situation.

Some individuals recall how they developed as a result of the existentially challenging experience. The problems may have seemed overwhelming at the time. Looking back in later years, however, they realise how they grew from managing the potentially life-changing situation.

Let's return to your own life. How can you develop in your own way through having experiences? These could be enjoyable, encouraging, educational, enlightening or extreme experiences.

What is the kinds of experience you would like to focus on? How can you pursue this kind of experience? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Developing Through Experiences Approach

The specific kind of experience I would like to focus on in order to develop may be:

*

The specific things I can do to pursue this kind of experience are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*The People Who Are Achievers
Sometimes Go Through The Striving,
Surviving And Thriving Approaches*

Some people get stuck at the surviving stage, however, and this can affect their personal and professional lives. They may then enter a questioning period for their lives. Sitting in a traffic jam one day, the person may say:

"I am successful, but I am not happy. What can I do about it?"

Failing to see an immediate answer, they may numb themselves and work to gain another promotion. One day another wake-up call arrives. They hear about a school friend who has died.

Reflecting on the shock, they embark on the existential journey travelled by many people. They explore what they want to do in the rest of their life.

A savvy person may stay in their job, but also begin pursuing a parallel strategy. They explore how they can do satisfying work and get a reasonable salary. They may also want to enjoy a better quality of life.

At this point they begin to strike a new balance between their work time and wandering time. They become more selective to be effective. Realising they have only so much energy, they are more careful about the work they commit themselves to doing.

They do their due diligence before taking on new jobs. They also make clear contracts with their stakeholders to make sure they get the support they need to deliver success.

Such people organise their weeks to balance work time and wandering time. They may organise their time in blocks, for example, and make sure there are few distractions. They can then immerse themselves fully in a piece of work.

At a certain point they take time to wander. This can take different forms. When at work, they may simply go for a walk or relax. This can enable them to reflect, make better decisions and explore ideas.

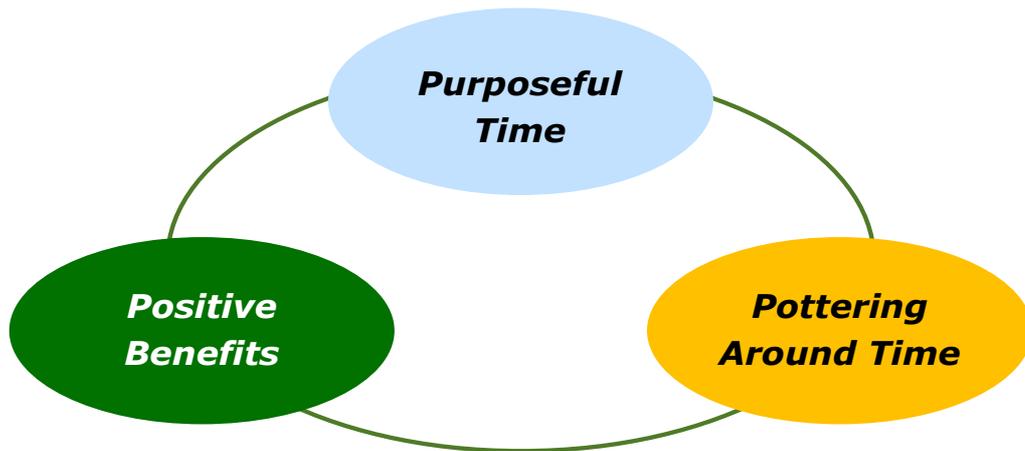

Looking at the rest of their life, however, the person may build in more time to develop. They may return to a former passion – such as playing music – or embark on physical tests, such as running marathons.

Such adventures do more than satisfy the soul. They also provide the person with an opportunity to think. They see things in perspective and chart their future path in life.

As mentioned earlier, there are many ways to enjoy your wandering time. Let's look at another way that people use this approach.

The Pottering Around Time Approach

Some people enjoy both their purposeful time and pottering around time. Both can have positive benefits.

Some people divide their day into purposeful time and pottering around time. Purposeful activity can be inspiring but you can only ride the wave for a certain length of time.

Sometimes you need to rest, reflect and regain your energy. Some people relax by simply pottering around. One definition of pottering around is:

To move about without hurrying and in a relaxed and pleasant way.

Some people do physical activities such as gardening, fixing cars or doing chores. Some do intellectual pottering around. They let their minds wander, peruse books or explore ideas.

There can be benefits to just pottering around. People may find that it enables them to pause and let things fall into place. Their unconscious works on finding solutions to problems.

Sometimes it is important to simply pause. This can help to refresh the mind, body and soul. It can also help us to see things in perspective.

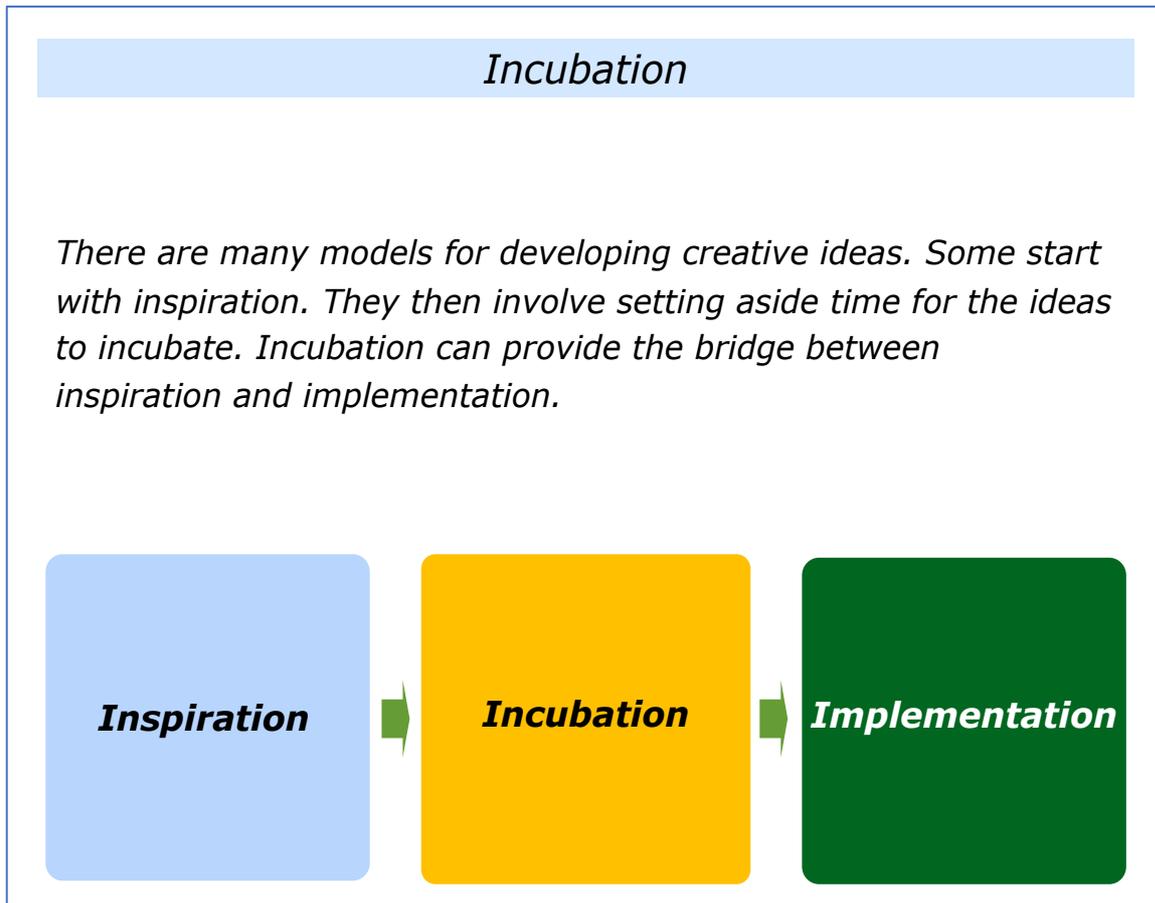

Jean-Jacques Rousseau believed that sometimes we learn by developing the art of losing time rather than saving time. We can become absorbed in pursuits we find interesting. Sometimes the adventure is simply pleasurable, sometimes it provides revelations.

Some people aim to balance mindfulness and mindlessness. Mindfulness can help us to be fully aware of what we are doing, but sometimes it is important to let our minds wander. This can help us to explore new dimensions.

Pottering around involves moving in an overall direction but it does not always have a specific aim. On some occasions, however, it can result in a person solving other problems that are on their mind.

Let's explore one of the ways that people may be able to make sure of their wandering time.

The Incubation Approach

There are many models for developing creative ideas. Some of these start with inspiration. They then involve incubating the ideas. Incubation can provide the bridge between inspiration and implementation.

There are many different approaches to setting aside time for incubation. Before looking at some of these, however, it can be good to start by reflecting on your own approach.

Looking at your own life and work, there may be times when you get inspiration or explore creative ideas. What do you then do to let the ideas incubate?

You may give yourself permission to set aside time to relax and let your mind wander. You may sleep, walk, play music, potter around or do something totally different.

Sometimes this may lead to creative breakthroughs and things coming together. Sometime it may not work this way. But then the potential solutions may appear later.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Incubation At The Moment

The specific things that I sometimes do to let ideas incubate are:

*

*

*

Many writers have described ways of nurturing the incubation process which can lead to illumination. People can then implement these insights and work towards achieving their picture of success.

Daniel Tscherner wrote a superb piece on this theme for the Linked In website. The creative process begins by what he calls preparation. This includes gathering information and settling on the way forwards.

He then goes on to describe the process of incubation. Here are excerpts from his excellent piece on this theme.

Creativity Process – The Magic Of The Incubation Phase

Incubation, the second phase of the creative process, is a period of rest and relaxation following the initial phase of preparation. After immersing yourself in a problem or project during the preparation phase, you set it aside for a while to let your mind wander.

You may engage in unrelated activities, such as taking a walk, doing chores, or even sleeping. The key is to break away from consciously focusing on the task at hand.

The incubation phase is integral to the creative process, primarily because it allows for subconscious processing.

The mind continues to work on the problem in the background, making connections and forming new insights that often lead to the sought-after 'Eureka' moment during the next phase of illumination.

Creating The Ideal Conditions For Incubation

The conditions that promote effective incubation can vary from person to person, as they are largely influenced by individual preferences and circumstances. However, certain general principles can guide you in creating the right environment for this phase of the creative process.

- Embrace Downtime

One key aspect of incubation is allowing yourself some downtime. This doesn't mean being idle; rather, it means engaging in activities different from the problem or project you're working on.

This could be anything from taking a walk, reading a book, cooking a meal, or even taking a nap. The idea is to let your mind wander away from the task at hand, sparking the default mode network activity we discussed earlier.

- Cultivate a Restful Environment

A calm, peaceful environment can help facilitate incubation. Consider creating a restful space in your home or office, free from unnecessary distractions. Some people find that being in nature or listening to soothing music can help stimulate the mind's subconscious processing.

- Maintaining Project Focus During Incubation

The incubation phase involves stepping back from active problem-solving, but it's crucial not to lose sight of the project entirely. Regularly revisiting the problem or project can help keep it fresh in your mind without overly focusing on it.

This could involve brief periods of focused thinking, where you consciously consider the issue, followed by periods of relaxation to let your subconscious mind continue the work.

Consider These Points For Your Next Creative Journey

- Trust the Process

Allow your mind to wander without pressure to generate solutions immediately. Remember, incubation is an integral part of the creative process, and your subconscious mind is working even when you're not consciously focusing on the problem.

- Intentionally Schedule Incubation Time

Dedicate specific periods during your work schedule for incubation. Whether that's a mid-afternoon walk, a weekend break, or some free-writing time in the morning, make it a priority.

- Reflect on Your Process

Take time to reflect on how the incubation phase contributed to your work. What worked well? What could be improved? Use these insights to refine your approach to the incubation phase in future projects.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to continue to build on the activities that already help you during the incubation stage. How can you also add other ways that can help?

Some people, for example, aim to do things that give them positive energy. They may immerse themselves in playing music, gardening, exercising or, as mentioned earlier, simply pottering around. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

This invites you to describe how you can build on your ways of letting ideas incubate plus maybe adding other ways in the future. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Incubation In The Future

The specific things I can do to keep building on how I let incubate ideas plus maybe add other ways in the future are:

*

*

*

Let's return to the theme of getting the right balance between your work time and wandering time. How can you try to do this in the future? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Work Time And Wandering Time

The specific things I can do to get the right balance between work time and wandering time are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing these things will be:

*

*

*

The Positive Addictions Approach Rather Than The Negative Addictions Approach

Some people have addictive personalities but actually everybody has addictions. These addictions may fall into two extreme categories.

Positive addictions – these can have positive consequences for themselves and others.

Negative addictions – these can have negative consequences for themselves and others.

Some people learn to recognise such addictions. They may then aim to channel these in ways that help rather than hurt themselves and other people. Let's explore these themes.

Positive Addictions

Some people may be addicted to focusing on positive things in life or finding positive solutions. They may be addicted to exercise, staying healthy or other activities.

Some may be addicted to doing creative work. Some may be addicted to appreciating life. Some may be addicted to helping other people.

Negative Addictions

Some people may be addicted to alcohol, drugs or other substances. Some may be addicted to angst or continually finding problems. Some may be addicted to anger or getting their highs by hurting other people.

Some therapy programmes encourage people to follow positive rather than negative addictions.

William Glasser described this approach in his 1976 book Positive Addiction. He showed how people could channel their energies into running, meditation or other beneficial activities.

This is an approach I sometimes used with people who wanted to channel their addictive personalities in positive ways. This called for helping them:

To clarify their personal or professional goals – their picture of success;

To clarify the positive patterns they could follow to increase their chances of achieving success;

To clarify and follow their specific action plan for achieving success.

Some people may object to this approach. They may say:

"Isn't that just replacing one addiction with another? Shouldn't the person be trying to find their true self?"

Perhaps, but some people found it proved more helpful for themselves and others. Some developed a positive addiction for exercise or helping other people who were in difficulties. This called for them choosing:

To rehearse when they were going to do – particularly when faced by situations that might trigger negative habits;

To follow a set routine and get some quick successes;

To keep repeating this pattern and get positive results;

This approach calls for a person really wanting to turnaround their life. It can involve finding other ways to get their highs.

Positive Addictions Rather Than Negative Addictions

People can choose to feel good by:

- Helping People rather than Hurting People
- Being Caring rather than Being Cruel
- Giving To People rather than Grabbing From People

Some people with psychopathic tendencies, for example, may get a physical chemical reaction when they hurt others. Being cruel can give them the rush of feeling powerful.

They become addicted to this approach and look for the next situation where they can get this kick. This can create lots of collateral damage.

Such people are addicted to anger. They try to make themselves feel big by making others feel small. They not only want to win, they want others to feel they have lost.

Some people take another route. They get their highs by helping other people. The positive majority of people take this route.

They love to encourage other people when acting as parents, educators, coaches, leaders, trusted advisors or playing other roles. They love to nurture people.

They care for others and, when faced by difficult situations, try to get win-win solutions. Such people want to plant seeds of hope that encourage both present and future generations.

Such people feel good after helping others. They can experience a rush followed by a sense of calm.

It is as if they have served something greater than themselves. They may experience the helper's high.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some of your positive addictions rather than negative addictions.

You may want to take care of your health, perform creative work or do another activity. You may want to help other people in your personal or professional life.

What are the positive addictions you may want to follow? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Addictions Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow some of my positive addictions may be:

*

*The specific things I can do to follow
some of my positive addictions then are:*

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Scripting Approach

Sometimes it can be worth exploring the old question regarding our daily conversation with people. This is:

"Who is the person you have the most conversations with?"

The answer is, of course, yourself. A person may have multiple conversations going on inside their head but there may be certain themes to which they keep returning. These themes can become positive or negative scripts.

A person with a positive script may keep saying:

"I want to do my best in life."

A person with a negative script may keep saying:

"Life is difficult and other people are luckier than me."

Different people develop different scripts. Here are some of the phrases that individuals may say to themselves.

The idea of scripting became popular in the 1960s. Eric Berne, the founder of Transactional Analysis, explained that individuals learn life scripts that act like an internal programme.

Parents and teachers play a strong part in the scripts that people internalise. Imagine if you grew in an environment where the key messages were either:

"You can build on your strengths and become the best you can be."

Or:

"You keep working hard but you will never be as good as other people."

A person can get to a point in life where they choose to create their own script. They sometimes do this after encountering a difficult situation. When writing their own script, however, it is vital for them to keep one thing in mind.

They need to focus on the things they can control rather than the things they can't control.

Imagine, for example, that you are a sports psychologist who is helping an athlete. They often get to the final of events and then falls apart. They may have two contradictory messages going through his head. These may be:

"I must try to win but I am bound to fail."

Some people may advise such a person to believe in themselves. They may advise them to keep saying:

"I am going to win."

This may or may not work. One challenge, however, is that such an approach is focusing on something the athlete cannot control.

Another approach is to invite the athlete: a) to focus on what they can control; b) to write a script they believe in; c) to then do their best to follow this mantra. Bearing this in mind, the athlete may say:

"I am going to flow rather than freeze."

People who write their own script also shape their mental model – the way they perceive life. This shapes the running commentary they may have inside their head.

Such people sometimes take the following steps when working through this approach.

They create a positive script they want to follow;

They take practical steps to translate this into action;

They take time to pause – especially when things get tough – and revisit their positive script.

Different people develop positive scripts in different ways. During the 1970s I also attended several workshops where people learned how to rewrite their own scripting.

Each person considered the main positive and negative messages they were given by their mother and father. These messages could have been spoken or unspoken – such as in the way the parents behaved towards them.

One person wrote two messages they were given by their parents. These were:

"Keep working hard, but you will never be as good as your sister."

As a result, the person had developed the habit of thinking:

"Whatever I do, it will never be good enough."

On the workshop people learned that their parents probably wanted to do the best for their children. Unfortunately parents sometimes have good intentions but poor communication. This can confuse children.

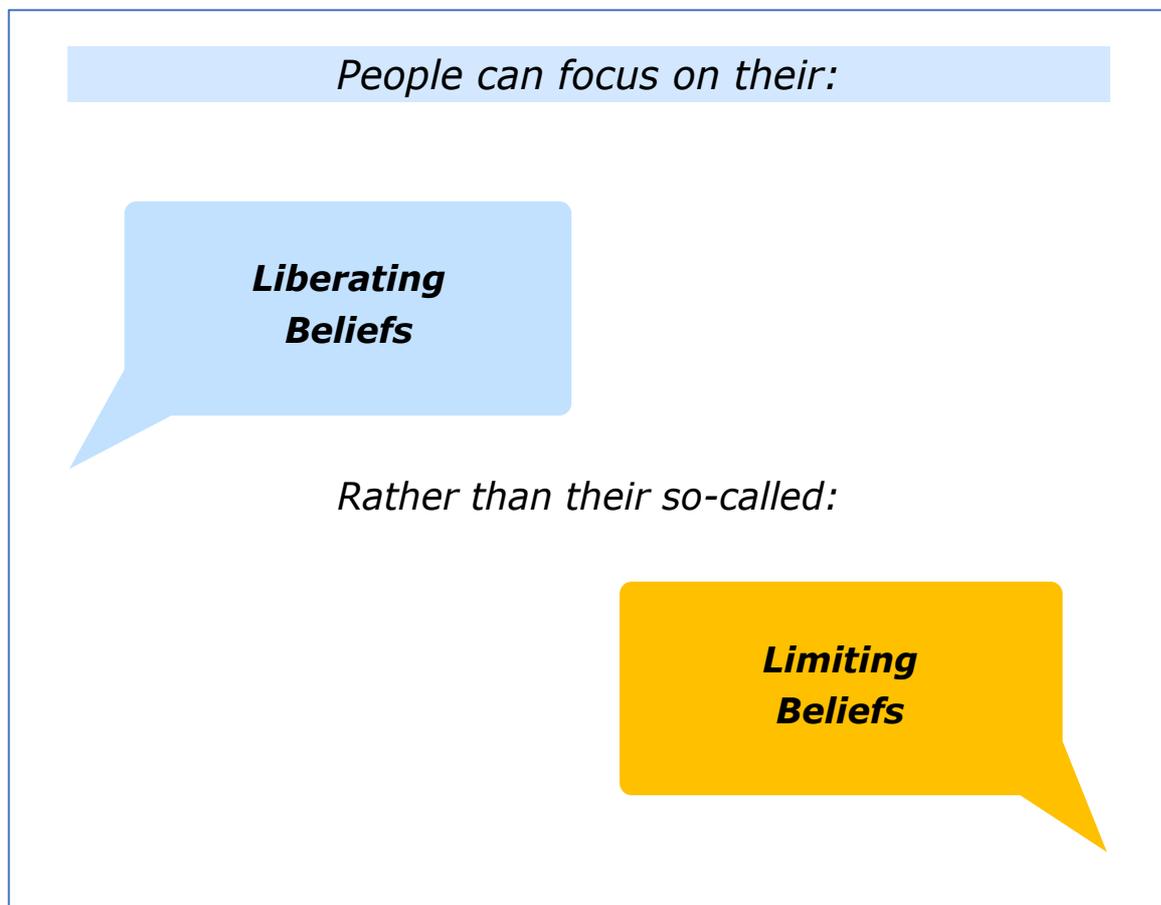

Bearing this in mind, the person decided to rewrite the messages they had internalised. They chose to write:

"Keep working hard and become the best you can be."

Some people turn their scripts into mantras that they use to remind them of certain beliefs. The mantras they use may consist of single words or phrases. Here are some examples.

Count your blessings ... Choose your attitude ... Be kind ... Encourage others ... Stay calm ... See things in perspective ... Every day is a bonus ... Always give your best.

Let's look at another approach to positive scripting. This involves taking the following steps.

People can focus on their liberating beliefs. They can then translate these into action and aim to do their best.

Some psychologists urge people to focus on their so-called limiting beliefs, but taking this route can increase people's self-doubt.

Another approach is for people to focus on their liberating beliefs. Such beliefs need to be based on reality, of course, rather than wishful thinking.

Bearing this in mind, people often go through the following steps to clarify their liberating beliefs.

Liberating Beliefs

People sometimes clarify their liberating beliefs by going through the following steps.

- They recall a specific time in the past when they performed superbly. They may have managed a challenge, reached a goal or achieved another form of success.
- They recall what they did right then – the principles they followed – to perform superbly. They clarify how they can follow these principles in the future.
- They translate these principles into positive affirmations and specific actions they can follow. These then become their liberating beliefs which they can follow to perform superbly.

Looking back at your life, when have you pursued a liberating belief that helped you to reach a goal? You may have done this when working to pass an exam, deliver a project or reach some other goal.

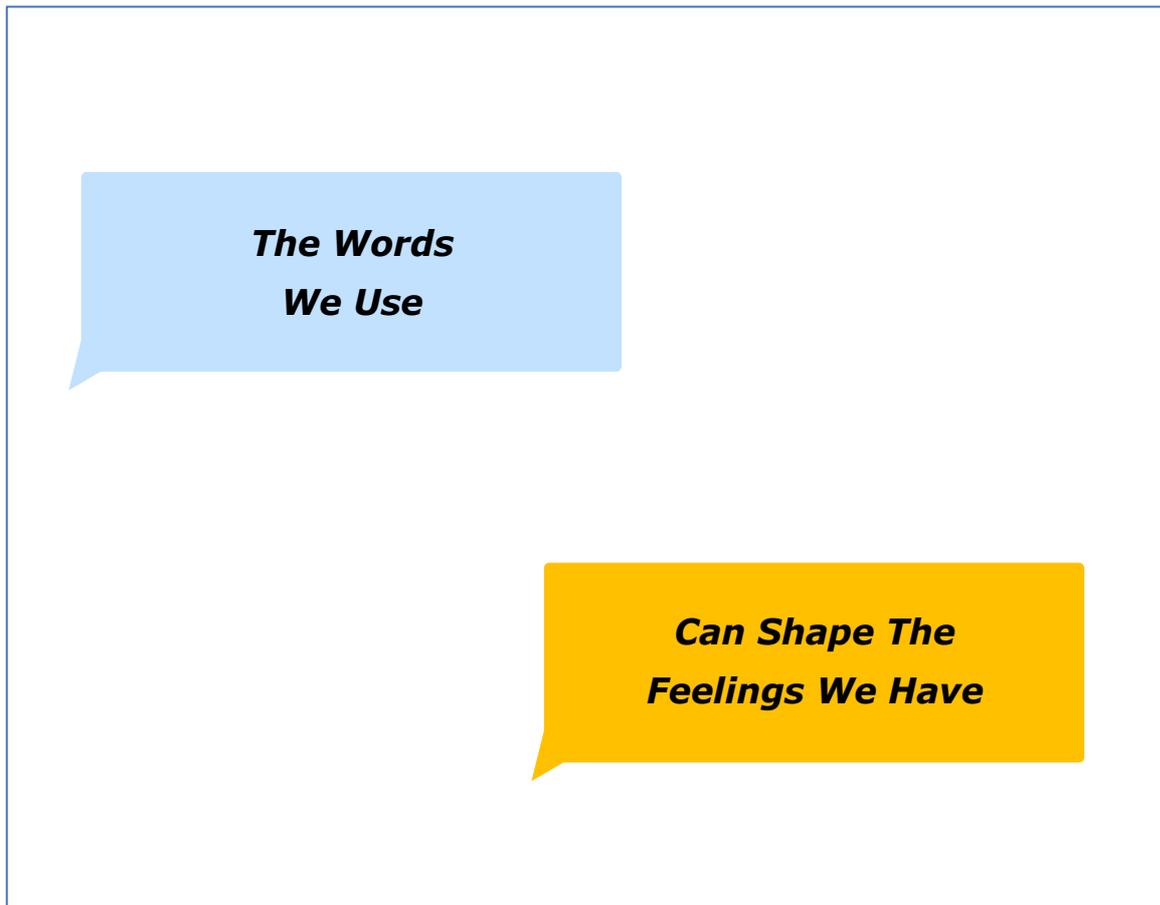

If appropriate, how did you translate this belief into positive affirmations? Different people do this in different ways. A person may say, for example:

"I can do it. I have done it before, so I can do it again. I just need to keep doing certain things in the right way. I will then reach the goal."

Some psychologists take the liberating belief approach when working with clients. They invite a person to recall when they have managed a similar situation successfully.

The client then develops belief from the gut. They have done it before, so they can do it again. Building on this feeling, they can follow similar principles to tackle the present challenge successfully.

*The Words We Use Can Shape
The Feelings We Have Approach*

There are many views on how we shape our feelings. Some say that our attitude plays a big part. Some call this our mindset or mental model. We then interpret our experiences through this filter.

Another view focuses on the words or metaphors we use to describe situations. For example: Do we label something as a challenge or as a problem? Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to remember that:

The words we use can shape the feelings we have.

Many articles have been written about how the words we use can produce different emotional responses. These also highlight how people can learn positive scripts or negative scripts. Here are some examples.

Person A may get news they have cancer and say: "I have reframed this as a project." Person B may say: "I have defined this as a battle."

Person A may say: "This is a challenge." Person B may say: "This is a problem."

Person A may say: "I want to build on my strengths and tackle areas for improvement." Person B may say: "I need to focus on my weaknesses."

The language we use can also affect how we perceive people and situations. It can also influence how we behave. One mediator explained this in the following way.

"My work involves helping people: a) to build on what they have in common; b) to find ways to manage any differences. I use the word differences rather than conflicts."

"Building on what they have in common, we aim to get some early successes. This helps to build confidence. We then help them to find healthy ways to manage any differences."

Let's return to your own life and work. How do you phrase things in certain ways to shape your feelings? If you wish, try answering some of the following questions.

What are some of the positive phrases you use to describe situations and shape your feelings? What can you do to try to phrase things in a positive way when faced by challenging situations? How can you continue to phrase things in a positive way in your life and work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Words I Use To Shape My Feelings

The positive phrases I use to describe situations and shape my feelings are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to phrase things in a positive way in challenging situations are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to continue to phrase things in a positive way are:

*

*

*

The Act As If You Are The Person You Want To Be Approach

The Act As If Approach

This approach involves aiming to act as if you are the kind of person that you want to be.

- If you want to be responsible, act as if you are responsible.
- If you want to be kind, act as if you are kind.
- If you want to achieve a goal, act as if you are doing your best to achieve that goal.

This approach involves aiming to act as if you are the kind of person you want to be. My first contact with the act as if approach was during the late 1960s. This was just before I opened a therapeutic community for drug addicts.

As part of my education, I visited an addiction treatment centre in Portsmouth. During the days there I became one of the community members, often being on the receiving end of the therapeutic programme.

Part of the programme was the act as if approach. This involved giving the recovering addicts the following messages.

You got into trouble because you developed irresponsible ways of satisfying your needs. This often involved hurting other people.

You say that you want to take responsibility and be more caring towards other people. This will initially be difficult because you have not learned how to do this in your life – nor has it been rewarded.

You can develop these new habits by acting as if you are responsible and caring. This may seem unnatural at first. But continuing to behave in this way will develop a new script and patterns.

You can put these into practice every day and may find that these bring positive benefits. If you wish, can then continue to develop healthier ways of satisfying your needs and living a fulfilling life.

This approach focused on developing new behaviours that would bring greater rewards than the old behaviours. William James, the American philosopher and psychologist, described this in the following way.

If you want a quality, act as if you already had it.

Human beings can alter their lives by altering their attitudes of mind.

By regulating the action, which is under the more direct control of the will, we can indirectly regulate the feeling, which is not.

This approach became a guiding principle for many people who wanted to make changes in their lives. It also became the basis for many therapy programmes.

William believed that doing things differently – rather than just talking – leads to changes in feelings. He described this in the following way.

If you believe that feeling bad or worrying long enough will change a past or future event, then you are residing on another planet with a different reality system.

In the dim background of mind we know what we ought to be doing but somehow we cannot start. Action may not bring happiness, but there is no happiness without action. Act as if what you do makes a difference. It does.

The Act As If Approach Is Similar To Going Into Role

Some people may have reservations about this approach. They may express some of the following feelings.

"What about authenticity? Shouldn't you be honest and true to your feelings? Acting as if sounds like you are doing something that isn't honest."

Certainly there can be drawbacks to the act as if approach. Initially there may be a yawning chasm between who you feel you are and who you are aiming to become. But we act as if every day of our professional lives.

A person may go into role when working as a nurse, doctor, trusted advisors or in another person. Pursuing that role properly – and following certain principles – can produce success for everybody.

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a situation where you may want to apply elements of the act as if approach? This could be in your own life or when helping another person to develop positive habits.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Act As If Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the act as if approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

Let's return to the theme of following positive scripts. Imagine that you want to follow some of your liberating beliefs and follow a positive script. As mentioned earlier, begin by focusing on the things you can control.

Looking ahead, what is the script you would like to follow? If appropriate, start by brainstorming the phrases you can say to yourself. You can then settle on a positive script you believe in.

What are the practical steps you can take to translate this into action? What may be the pluses of following this script? Are there any potential minuses? How can you build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

Sometimes you may hit difficulties or get blown off-course. How can you buy time, pause and revisit your positive script. How can you then follow it in the future?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Scripting

The positive script I want to say to myself and keep following is:

*

The practical steps I can take to translate this positive script into action are:

*

*

*

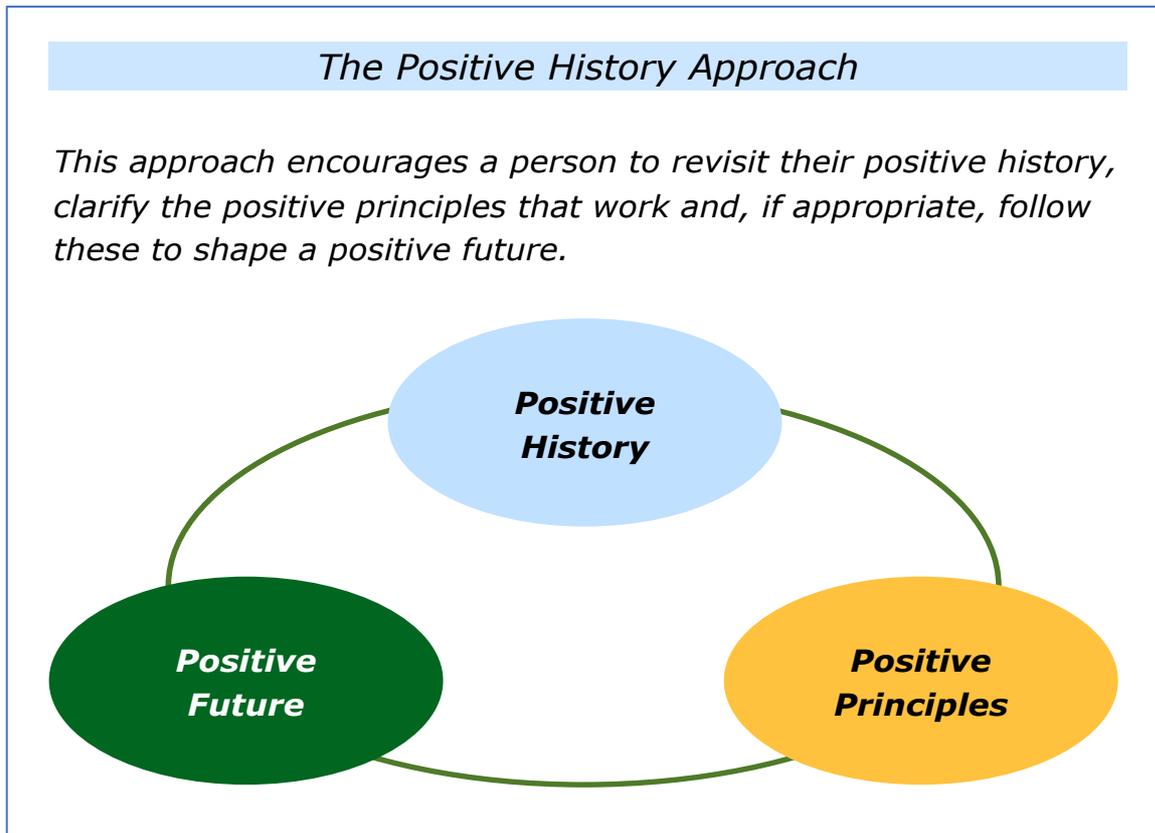

The specific things I can do to pause and revisit my positive script are:

*

*

*

The Positive History Approach

Imagine that you are counselling somebody who has experienced a difficult setback. One approach is to create a welcoming environment where they can talk and work through the classic change curve.

Another approach is to help a person to follow their positive pattern for overcoming challenges. Let's explore what this means and how it can be applied to tackling difficulties.

Everybody has a positive history. Everybody has achieved specific goals or overcome challenges. They may already have within them some of the resources needed to shape their future.

A person may have recovered from illness, made a difficult transition or managed a trauma. They may be able to follow some of these principles to tackle a present challenge.

Babette Rothschild is somebody who encourages this approach. She has helped many people to deal with traumas. Her work combines kindness, wisdom and practical tools. She says:

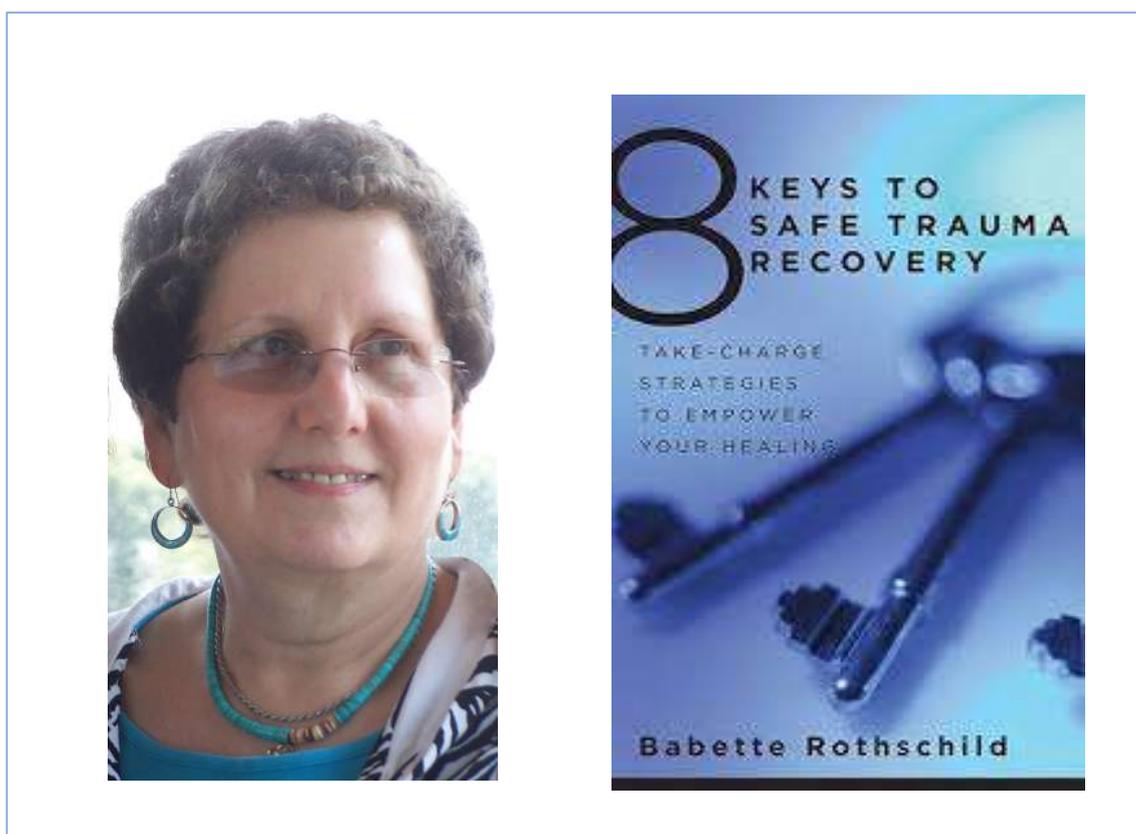

"The first goal of trauma recovery should and must be to improve your quality of life on a daily basis."

Babette creates a safe environment in which a person feels at ease. She then, if appropriate, provides practical tools that they can use:

To manage flashbacks and traumatic feelings;

To build on their inner strengths and successful patterns for dealing with challenges;

To add further skills they can use to improve the quality of their lives.

Babette is considered an expert in her field, but she also believes that people often resolve many issues without requiring professional help. She explains this in the following way.

"The vast majority of humans who experience traumatic events resolve them on their own, relying on internal resources, the family, the community, the environment, spiritual beliefs and so forth."

When people do seek Babette's professional help, she often begins by helping them to learn how to manage flashbacks. She explains this in the following way.

Applying the brakes

The client should learn how to apply the brakes to stop the process or take control of flashbacks or other symptoms. They will then feel more confident in being able to proceed with the therapy.

Babette underlines the importance of building on the client's strengths. She describes this in the following way.

Building on inner resources

"When the focus is on trauma, it is easy to forget the accompanying mechanisms that have helped people to survive and carry on, even when they have PTSD."

"Resources of both the past and the present are important allies; they mediate the negative effects of trauma. Resources are partners that make survival and life after trauma possible."

"Wise therapists will listen as carefully for coping mechanisms as they do for possible trauma."

Babette believes it is vital to help a client to build on their resources. This will make it easier to proceed with the trauma therapy.

Some counsellors may take this approach when working with individuals who are experiencing difficulties. Whilst acknowledging the person's feelings, they invite them to recall when they have dealt with challenges successfully. They may say something like the following.

"Looking back, when have you encountered a similar challenge and come through it successfully? What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed to tackle the challenge successfully?"

"Let's explore how you might follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to tackle the present challenge."

This is an approach that I have found works. It encourages the person to build from within and also increases belief. They have succeeded in the past and they can succeed in the future.

The Positive History Exercise

There are many ways to help a person to learn from their positive history. One option is to invite them to focus on specific situation when they did positive work. It is then to explore how they can follow similar principles in the future.

Another option is to invite them to look at the positive things they have done during the stages of their life. This is a much longer exercise. But it can be help a person to clarify their successes and focus on how they can shape their future.

My Positive History

Introduction

Every person has had many experiences and done positive things in their life. Looking back, they may have:

Overcome an illness as a child;

Performed in play;

Played sport at a high level;

Written an article;

Built a good relationship;

Designed a house;

Learned a language;

Led a team to success;

Built a successful prototype;

And done many other things.

This exercise invites a person to do the following things.

- Describe their history.

The person is to list some of the things they have experienced and the positive things they have done during their life. They are to start from the age of 0 and continue till their present age. (They don't necessarily have to populate every stage of their life.)

They may start by looking for big things. But if they start populating the pages they will find that lots of things appear.

- Describe some of the positive things they have done in their life.

The person can be encouraged: a) to focus on one or two the positive things they have done in their life; b) to describe what they did right – the principles they followed – to do the positive things.

- Describe how they may want to follow some of these principles in the future

If appropriate, the person can be encouraged to explore how they can follow some of these principles in the future. They may want either:

To do this in general terms – such as how they want to follow certain principles in their life or work;

To focus on how they can follow these principles to tackle a specific challenge or work to achieve a specific goal.

You can, of course, adapt this exercise in your own way. Here is the framework you can encourage the person to follow.

My Positive History

The experiences I have had and the positive things I have done during the following stages of my life have been these:

0

10

15

20

25

30

35

40

45

50

55

60

65

70

75

80

85 And Onwards

Positive Things

Two of the positive things I have done in my life and the things I did right – the principles I followed – to do these positive things.

The First Positive Example

When I ...

The things I did right then – the principles I followed – to do the positive thing were:

*

*

*

The Second Positive Example

When I ...

*The things I did right then - the principles
I followed - to do the positive thing were:*

*

*

*

*The Principles -
Following These In The Future*

The specific things I can do to follow some of these principles in the future are:

*

*

*

The Advantages Approach

This approach involves a person building on their advantages. These can include: a) the support they have been given; b) the strengths they have; c) the specific things they have learned from setbacks.

A person can then apply these advantages to work towards achieving their aims. Let's explore these themes.

Advantages

Imagine that you want to clarify some of the advantages you have in your life or work. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

Support

Some people have the advantages of being given stability and support early in their lives. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I had wonderful parents. They provided love, stability and also encouraged me to follow my passions. We did not have a lot of money, but we always had food on the table. They taught me to enjoy what we had in life."

Looking at my own life, I was adopted by lovely foster parents who provided ongoing support. We moved around a lot and, between the ages of 9 and 11, I went to 7 different schools. That did not matter much because I had already developed a pattern of learning by myself. And my parents always provided encouragement.

Later on I met several teachers and mentors who provided great support. These included people such as Alec Dickson, the founder of Community Service Volunteers. Some also provided practical support by opening doors to job opportunities.

Let's return to your life. What has been the support you have experienced that may be been an advantage? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Advantages – Support

The support I have had in my life and work included the following things:

*

*

*

Strengths

Let's move on to your strengths. These may fall into two main categories – your personal and professional strengths.

Personal Strengths

You may have the ability to encourage people, be creative or see patterns in certain kinds of situations. You may be able to focus, be resilient and keep working until you achieve certain goals.

Professional Strengths

You may be able to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs when doing certain specific activities. These may be in the areas of encouraging people, education, medicine, science, technology, the arts, sport, leadership, coordination or another activity.

What are the strengths you have been given or developed? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Advantages – Strengths

The strengths I have been given or developed in my life or work include the following things:

*

*

*

Setbacks

Some people actually see it as an advantage to learn from setbacks. They then aim to apply the lessons in their lives or work.

One former professional footballer recalled being released by an elite academy when he was eighteen. The lessons he learned led to him setting up services for helping young players who have been released. His company is now used by many professional clubs.

Looking at my own life, I spent six years working in a factory. Whilst I was useless at the job, it gave me time to think and study at night school. It also fired me with the determination to find a job working with people and to never to go back to the factory.

What are the specific things you have learned from setbacks that may have added to your advantages? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Advantages – Setbacks

The specific things I have learned from setbacks in my life or work include the following things:

*

*

*

Application

Imagine that you have clarified some of the advantages that you have been given or developed. You may then want to apply some of these to work towards certain goals. There are many ways to take this step. If appropriate, you may want to explore the following themes.

Aims

What is the specific activity where I can build on some of my advantages? What is the specific piece of work I would like to do? What would be the results I would want to achieve? What would be the benefits of achieving this picture of success?

Action Plans

What are the key strategies I can follow to increase the likelihood of achieving the aims? How can I translate these into a clear action plan? How can I get some quick successes? How can I manage the potential challenges on the journey?

Application

How can I apply myself properly to doing the work? How can I keep following the strategies? How can I follow good habits? How can I keep doing the right things in the right way every day? How can I encourage myself on the journey?

Imagine that you are applying yourself fully to work towards your aims. It may then be time to move on to the next theme.

Achievement

Different people have different views about achievement. Here is one definition:

Something you did after working to make it happen that gave you a sense of satisfaction.

Some people may focus on an inner goal. They aim to be a better person, follow their principles and do their best each day. Achieving these aims may bring satisfaction and even a sense of peace.

Some people may focus on an outer goal. They may aim to gain a qualification, perform an operation, invent a product, win a prize or reach another picture of success.

Some people may focus on both an inner and outer goal. They may then build on their advantage and follow their principles to do work that helps people or the planet.

Some people are born with advantages. Some are given them. Some develop these qualities. Some choose to be aware of these attributes. They may then apply themselves and do their best achieve certain aims.

Some people do not recognise their advantages. Some are loosely aware of them. Some may choose to ignore or not make use of their advantages.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of the advantages approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Advantages Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

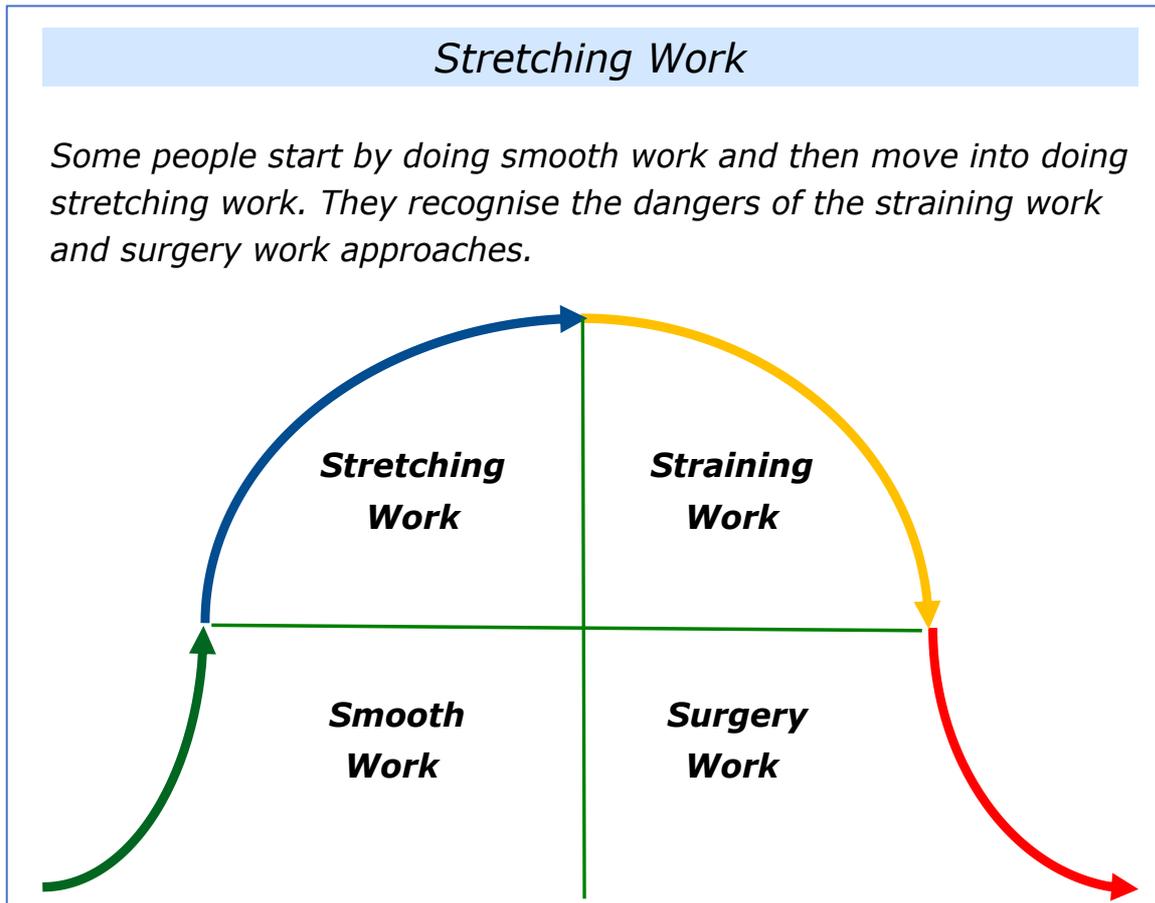

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Stretching Work Approach

There are many ways to do superb work. A person may start by doing smooth work and move into doing stretching work. Sometimes they may take this step to deliver brilliance.

A person may stay at this stage for a time but recognise the warning signs if they are straining. Sometimes they may do work that is harmful and can lead to needing physical or psychological surgery. Let's explore these themes.

The Smooth Work Approach

Great workers sometimes aim to work in a smooth way. They take the following steps to increase the chances of making this happen.

They plan to pursue the strategies most likely to succeed

Such workers prepare properly. Bearing in mind their strengths, they clarify the strategies most likely to deliver success. They then aim:

To rehearse pursuing their chosen strategies;

To rehearse managing any potential challenges;

To rehearse regaining their rhythm after managing challenges and then continuing to pursue their chosen strategies.

They plan to make things go as smoothly as possible whilst also managing how to deal with disruptions.

They pursue the strategies most likely to succeed

Great workers move into action and aim to get an early success. Different people follow different approaches when doing their work. They may aim, for example:

To flow, focus and finish successfully;

To focus on a clear purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success;

To build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to deliver success.

They will aim to follow their chosen rhythm when doing the work. Sometimes they encounter challenges, however, which involves taking the next step.

They find positive solutions and do their best to succeed

Great workers buy time to think when faced by unexpected challenges. Different people do this in different ways. They may aim:

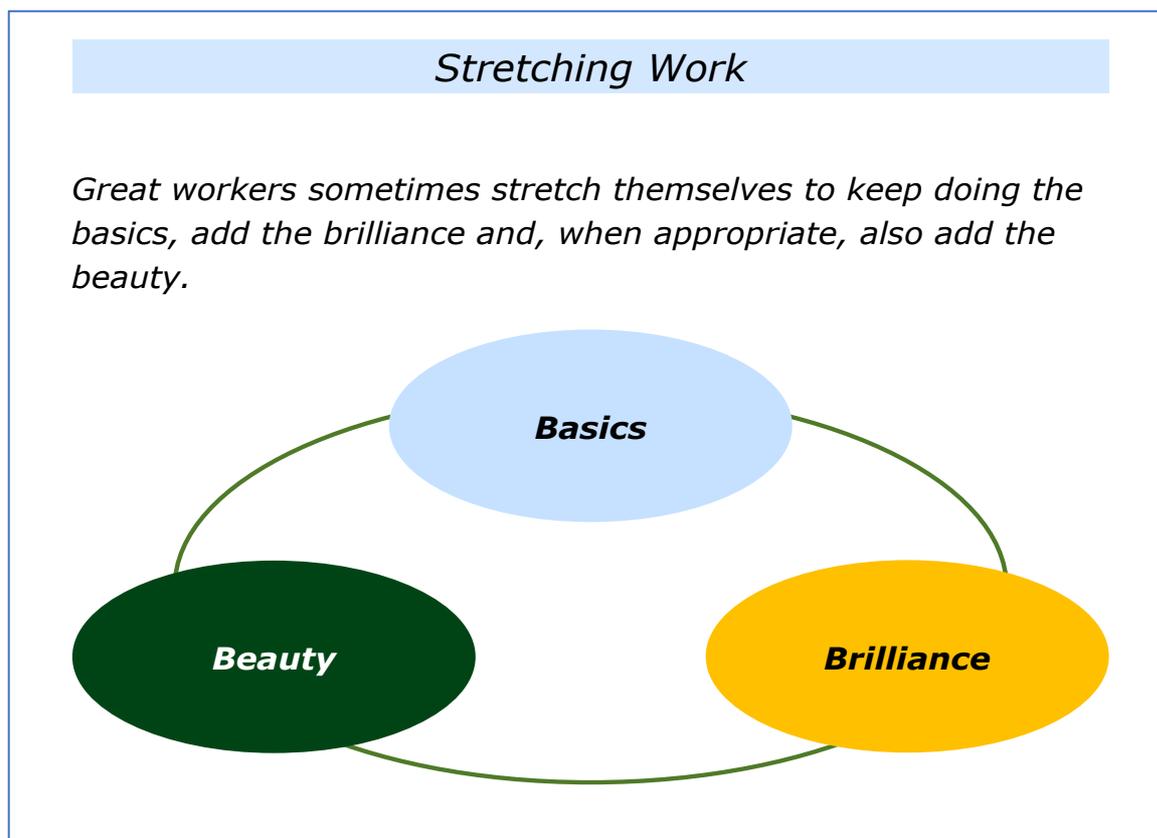

To keep focusing on what is happening – what is in the green, amber and red zones – and take the appropriate action;

To anticipate and prevent any potential haemorrhaging, start the healing process and solve the problems;

To buy time to think, find solutions to challenges and then continue to follow their chosen strategies.

Such workers try to make work as smooth as possible. At the same time, they prepare to deal with any bumps in the road. This helps them to increase the chances of achieving success.

Stretching Work

Great workers sometimes stretch themselves to go into another dimension. They may stretch their body, brain or other senses to go into their equivalent of the zone.

Sometimes they may stretch themselves to keep doing the basics. Sometimes to add the brilliance. Sometimes, when appropriate, they may also add the beauty.

The stretching approach can help them to expand their repertoires. They add more strategies and skills that can be used in different situations. This increases their ability to achieve success.

Straining Work

Great workers like to stretch themselves but also recognise potential danger signs. Sometimes this can happen when, for example:

They feel negative exhaustion rather than positive exhaustion ... They become conscious of strains in their body and soul ... They feel tense and grit their teeth ... They become irritable at small things ... They feel detached and elsewhere.

Some people find that stretching can be stimulating but straining can create problems. It is then important for a person to take time to heal themselves. This can also help to avoid the following stage.

Surgery Work

Some work can cause damage and lead to needing physical or psychological surgery. Some companies, for example, go beyond asking people to deliver stretch goals. They may ask people to achieve surgery goals. Their philosophy seems to be:

"People are straining every muscle to jump 2 metres but let's move the bar up to 4 metres. We will then get lots of people to jump 2.5 metres."

The employees may balk at first but some get on with trying to reach the new targets. They put in more hours, sleep less and strive to achieve the aims.

This approach may work for a while but there are downsides. A company may find that people resent being micromanaged, fall ill or move on to find more satisfying work.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to follow elements of the stretching work approach?

How can you set things up to do smooth work and move on to stretching work? How may you need to stretch yourself to keep doing the basics, add the brilliance and, if appropriate, add the beauty? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stretching Work Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach in my own way may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to stretch myself to do the basics, add the brilliance and, if appropriate, add the beauty are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Sweat Approach

Positive Sweat

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the specific activity where you are prepared to give everything and sweat in a positive way. It is then stretch yourself and do your best to achieve success.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the specific activity where you are prepared:

To give everything and sweat in a positive way;

To stretch yourself;

To do your best to achieve success.

The positive sweat part is interesting. It is when you really enjoy giving everything when doing a particular activity. You feel fully engaged and use your heart, head and other senses when tackling a task.

Sometimes there may be physical sweat. Other times it feels like there is a different kind of sweat. It feels as if your whole being is involved in doing the piece of work. You may find the experience exhilarating and, in some ways, it is the equivalent of positive sweat.

When does this happen for you? You may feel fully engaged when writing, painting, gardening or practicing a craft. You may do so when pursuing your vocation, tackling a certain kind of challenge or aiming to achieve a particular goal.

You may also stretch yourself when doing the activity. This can involve stretching yourself in a creative, intellectual or psychological way. It may mean exploring other ways of doing things that lead to imaginative breakthroughs.

You will have an inner compulsion to keep improving when doing the activity. Being deeply absorbed, you will keep going until you have satisfied both an inner and outer goal. Your gut feels the work is finished and you feel satisfied with the final product.

Different people have different feelings after going through these steps. They may feel joy, exhilaration or the equivalent of positive sweat. This can lead to a sense of peace. Then, after a while, they set off on a new journey towards achieving their next goal

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of the positive sweat approach? What may be the activity where you feel fully engaged, stretch yourself and do your best to achieve success?

How can you pursue this activity in the future? How can you keep improving when doing the activity? What may be the benefits of taking these steps – both for yourself and for other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Sweat Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the positive sweat approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

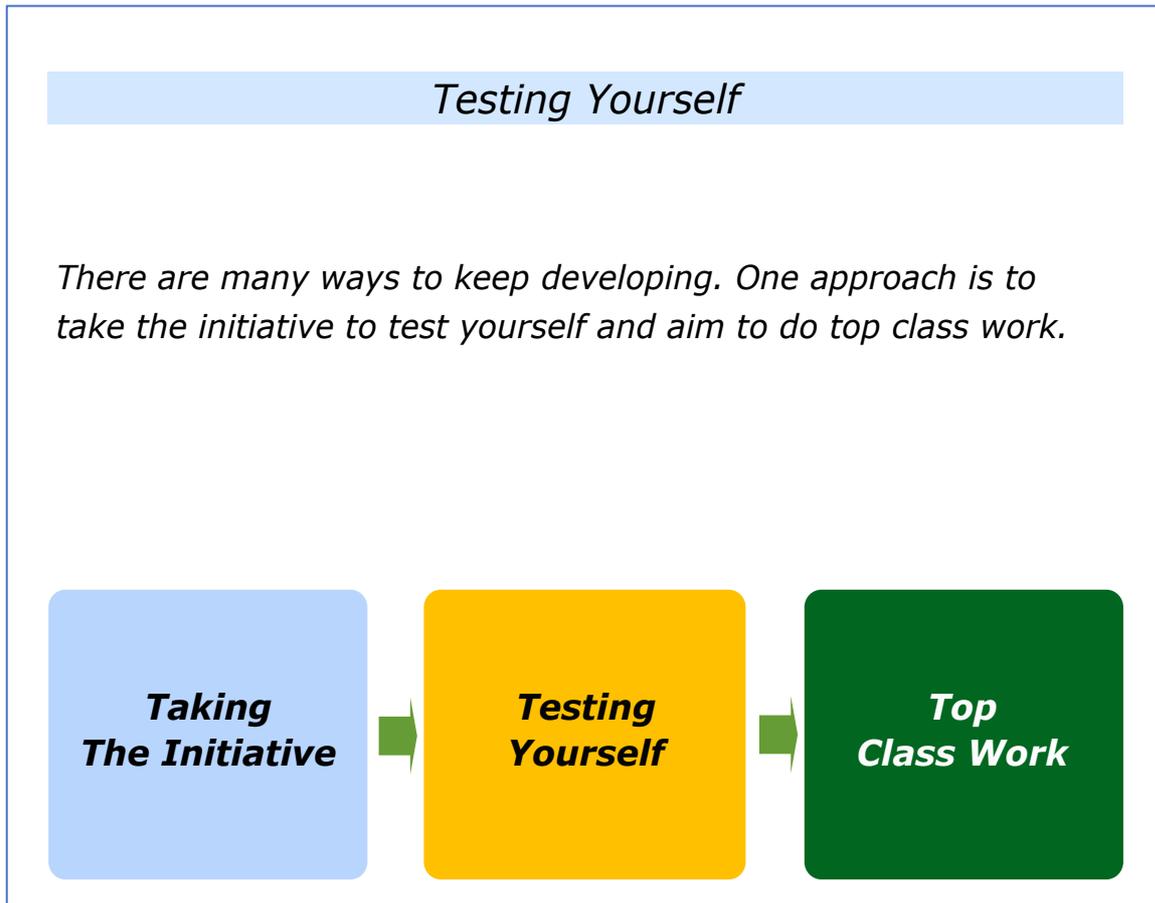

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Testing Yourself Approach

There are many ways to keep developing. One approach is to take initiatives to test yourself and aim to do top class work.

Some people test themselves in personal way. They may choose to develop a healthier lifestyle, run a marathon, climb a mountain or do another activity. This may involve using both their physical and psychological qualities.

Some people test themselves in a professional way. They put themselves into situations where they need: a) to build on their strengths; b) to develop their skills; c) to stretch themselves to achieve success.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you chose to test yourself? How did you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Testing Myself In The Past

The specific situation when I took the initiative to test myself and aim to do top class work was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow elements of this approach were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Different people choose different ways to take the initiative to test themselves. Some do it in a proactive way. Some do it when choosing their response to challenges. Some go through the following steps.

People Who Take The Initiative To Test Themselves

They sometimes take the following steps:

- They clarify the goal they want to achieve and the benefits of achieving this picture of success;
- They clarify the strategies they can follow to do their best to achieve the picture of success;
- They clarify their action plan – including how to build on the pluses and manage the minuses – to achieve the picture of success.

Some people take this approach because they see the benefits of aiming to achieve a specific goal. They may aim to improve their health, develop their skills, build a business or achieve another aim.

As mentioned, some individuals do this in a proactive way. They may have the desire to keep improving and adding to their repertoire of skills. They may aim to do this as a person or as a professional.

Some individuals do it in a more reactive way. They may encounter a setback, have an illness or face a particular problem. They may take time to reflect, consider their options and then decide to take the initiative to tackle the challenge.

People like to feel in control of shaping their future. Bearing in mind what they can control, they make a plan. They aim to make things as predictable as possible whilst also managing any unpredictable events.

Such people clarify their key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They then translate this into a clear action plan. This often includes focusing on the specific things they can do:

To follow the key strategies ... To encourage themselves on the journey ... To build on the pluses and manage any potential minuses.

Different people choose different ways to test themselves and do top class work. Let's look at how one person took these steps.

Richmond Stace is a Pain Coach whose work is described elsewhere in this book.

He also likes to do ultraruns which consist of running over 100 miles.

The follow pages provide excerpts from one of his blogs.

They describe how ultraruns help him to explore new dimensions in terms of pain and hope.

Ultrarunning To Understand Pain And Share Hope

There is a purpose for my ultrarunning, and it is mainly to share hope.

Running for long distances means being on your feet for hours, moving along. On the journey, you discover much about yourself - you find out what is under the hood.

Under normal circumstances, we use our resources to deal with challenges as they arise.

Life is full of uncertainty (more than certainty), twists and turns. That is the way. What we can do is to focus on controlling the controllables. What can we control? Our approach and attitude.

Suffering comes from the way that we think about any given situation. Prior to this, it is merely a situation. This has long been realised by philosophers and others.

Life is a journey - cliché yet true. How do you approach the journey? How do you deal with things when they don't go your way? The style that you use will determine whether you see it as an opportunity (to learn) or an obstacle?

Ultrarunning is the same. You set out on a journey that will be full of unknowns.

When you are trotting along and feel great, it is wonderful. What about when you are in pain, feel sick, are hit with fatigue and hunger and thirst and more? How do you respond? How do you keep going?

The concept of the pain cave describes the place you can go. It is dark. But, there is ultimate learning about oneself in the pain cave to the point that many embrace the experience.

Pain Is Inevitable On An Ultrarun

You become your own experiment as you examine your perceptions and thoughts shaped by the very actions you are making.

When you change the way you move, your thinking changes - embodied cognition at work.

Thoughts are very much grounded in the state of our body, and the state of our body is determined by the focus of our attention. Expectations also play a significant role - we see the world that we expect to see.

As inevitable pain emerges, the opportunity arises to closely examine the sensations and how they change.

Different perspectives and different language all shape the experience.

Noticing a shift in running pattern, perhaps leaning forward or the head dropping, one can lift and be taller to notice the change in perspective.

What is the story I am telling myself in these moments? If I alter the words, what happens?

Bringing my purpose to mind, or a loved one and there can be a sudden transformation of state.

Heavy moments are normal. Body, legs, head suddenly feel like sacks of wet sand — have you ever tried to move one?

But you know that this will pass, like all perceptions. Nothing is permanent. This insight alone pulls me back from the mire of thoughts.

Our perceptions and bodily sensations are dynamic - always changing. Life is not static, instead fluid and moving onwards. It is the story that stays the same. The one we have been conditioned to believe is true.

Then you realise that there are infinite stories and possibilities. Freedom. Ultrarunning teaches you about freedom. I can examine my own experiences under duress and elucidate my resources my journey continues. The finish line is of course the beginning of the next.

Sharing Hope

My message is one of hope. Both the knowledge of pain and what we can do to guide, support and encourage people to live fulfilling lives has grown enormously.

We have much better answers to the questions. What is pain? Why do we feel pain? What is the purpose of pain? What can we do to improve our lives?

Many of the strategies, practices and techniques to transform and overcome pain are taken from the skills of being well, peak performance and strengths based coaching. Over the past 10 years or so, I have called this Pain Coaching.

There Is A Simple Principle

The more you focus on the pain and try to treat it, the worse the outcome. The more you focus on the person and how they want to shape their life, the better the outcome.

Focus on what you want, not what you don't want.

As soon as you are saying, 'I don't want this pain', we focus right back on the pain. Instead, re-focus on your pictures of success and the steps you can take right now in that direction.

This is an approach and an attitude. You will need some help, it will be up and down, but there is great hope for many. This is my message.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you would like to take the initiative to test yourself and do top class work? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Testing Myself In The Future

The specific situation where I may want to take the initiative to test myself and aim to do top class work may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

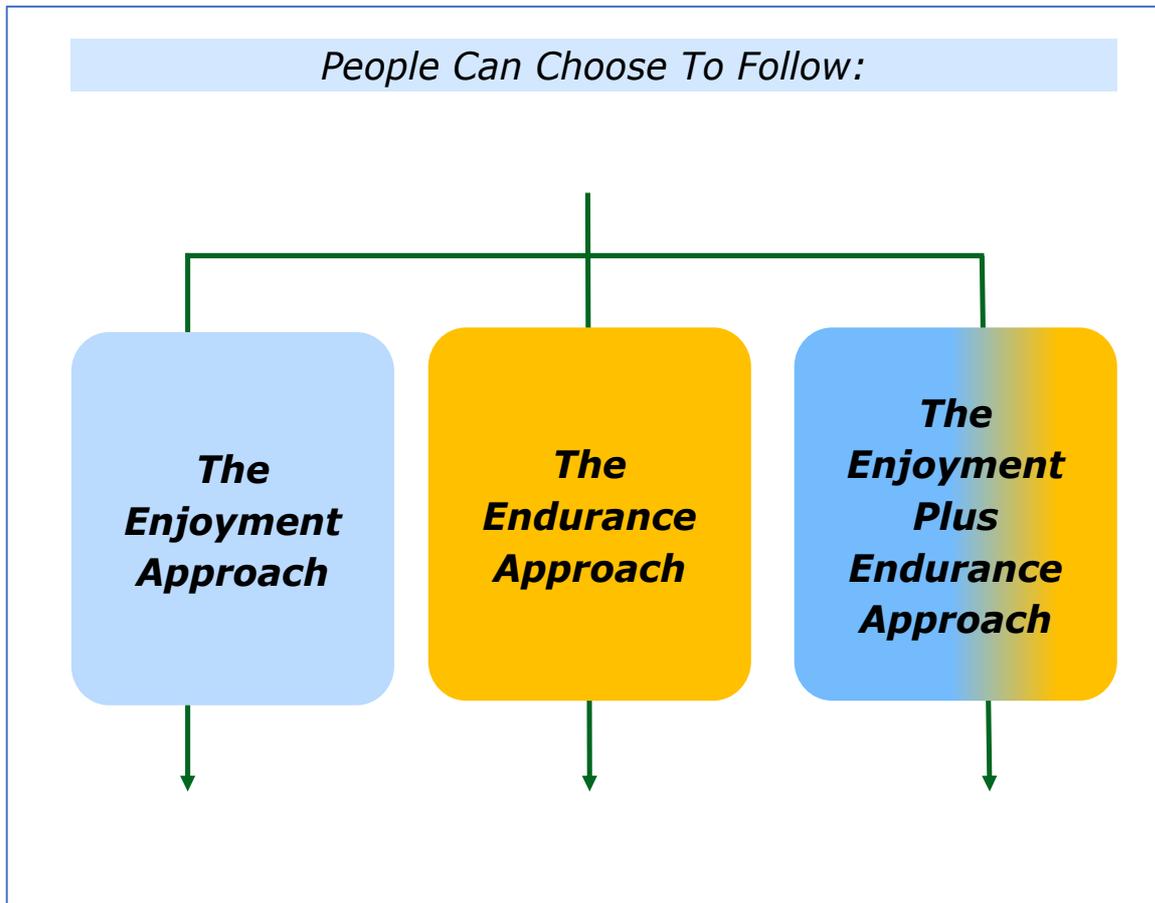

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Enjoyment Plus Endurance Approach

People sometimes choose to take these approaches in their professional lives. Let's explore these themes.

The Enjoyment Approach

Some individuals take the enjoyment route when shaping their career. This approach sometimes involves them taking the following steps. They may aim:

To focus on the specific activity they enjoy doing where they have the ability to deliver excellence;

To translate this into a specific service or product that helps certain kinds of people, customers or employers;

To perform excellent work that helps these people, customers or employers to succeed.

Such people love their work. They look forward to their day and often enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal. This can lead to a feeling of satisfaction.

The Endurance Approach

Some individuals take more of an endurance approach to shaping their career. This can involve them taking the following steps. They may aim:

To follow a specific route that they believe will pay a high salary or will eventually lead to them achieving certain professional status;

To accept the upsides and downsides that come with being part of a big organisation or climbing the career ladder;

To be prepared to endure certain kinds of boring work or difficult managers but also to have the endurance required to reach their long-term goals.

Such people may enjoy some aspects of their work. But they may experience certain side-effects when climbing the career ladder or working towards their long-term goal.

The Enjoyment Plus Endurance Approach

Some individuals aim to do enjoyable work and also combine aspects of the endurance approach. This can involve them taking the following steps. They may aim:

To do work they enjoy and also demonstrate endurance on the way towards achieving their chosen goal;

To follow their chosen rhythm for working, get some quick successes and encourage themselves on the journey;

To perform superb work, find solutions to challenges and do their best to achieve their chosen goal.

Great workers sometimes take this route. They believe in doing work they enjoy but also recognise the need to show certain qualities on the way towards achieving their aims.

These include the ability to plan ahead, pace themselves properly and have problem-solving skills. They may also need to demonstrate resilience to achieve their goals.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to follow elements of the enjoyment plus endurance approach? You may want to change your lifestyle, do a creative project, tackle a challenge or achieve a specific goal.

What is the enjoyable activity you may want to pursue? How can you translate this into a specific goal? How can you plan ahead and prepare properly?

How can you get an early success? How can you maintain the momentum? How can you track your progress? How can you reflect on: a) the specific things you have achieved so far; b) the specific things you want to do next?

How can you manage your energy on the journey? How can you build in times for rest and recovery? How can you find solutions to challenges? How can you do your best to achieve your picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can follow the enjoyment plus endurance approach in your own way. Here is the exercise.

The Enjoyment Plus Endurance Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Moving From Mourning To Mobilising To Marvellous Work Approach

There are many ways to manage sorrow, setbacks and other challenging emotions. Each person will pursue their own journey in their own time to manage these feelings.

The classic change curve approach described by Elisabeth Kübler-Ross may apply for some people. What must be remembered, however, is that it described the stages experienced by people who knew they were coming to the end of their lives.

Everybody is different and will experience different emotions. It is important to respect the journey they are on. Some people experience grief, for example, and this can involve complex emotions.

This piece focuses on people who take a certain approach to managing challenging emotions. They move through the stages of mourning to mobilising their energy to doing marvellous work. Let's explore these themes.

Mourning

Some people respond to painful events by going into a period of mourning. Feeling sorry for what has been lost or what could have been, they may numb themselves or find other ways to manage the feelings.

Some people quickly try to resume parts of their normal life. They return to work or do other things where life is more predictable. This helps them to cope with the unpredictable nature of what may have happened.

Some people experience flashbacks. They may be reminded of a loved one by seeing somebody who looks like them. They may also recall events when they could have behaved differently and regret their behaviour.

Mourning can involve many aspects. These may include aiming: a) to mourn a person's passing; b) to celebrate what they did during their life. The latter sometimes helps to cope with the feelings.

The following section explores some of the emotions that people may experience when dealing with such situations. It also looks at some ways that people may aim to manage these feelings.

Managing Sorrow

Sorrow is a feeling of deep sadness that can last for a long time. It can be one of the toughest feelings to manage. Each person may experience it in different ways.

A person may feel sorrow:

When losing somebody or something that cannot be replaced ... When feeling life is painful and they cannot see the point of carrying on ... When feeling that human beings are doing damage to the Earth.

A couple may have lost a child. A troubled person may feel overwhelmed and unable to take control of their life. A previously positive person may feel sadness but not know why.

A person may feel lonely or without hope. They may feel pain in their soul. They may, in extreme cases, feel they want to ease the pain by taking their life.

Different people express sorrow in different ways. They may cry or be unable to cry. Some may fall into depression. Some may express their sorrow through anger. They may do things that hurt themselves or other people.

People can be helped to navigate their way through the feelings and shape their futures. Every person is different, however, so it is vital to respect their experience.

Making Sense Of Sorrow

Sometimes a person can find their own answers as to why they experience sorrow. They may ask themselves:

"What are the reasons for these feelings? What do I feel sad about? What am I worried about? What do I feel has been lost or cannot be replaced?"

Sometimes there are obvious reasons for the sorrow. A person may be experiencing a sense of loss, have suffered a bereavement or been through a traumatic experience. Let's look at one example.

Several years ago I worked with John, whose wife Sarah had died several hours after giving birth to their daughter. John felt lost. The joy he and Sarah experienced had been taken away. He was helped by going to grief counselling but the deep pain remained.

During the next few months we worked on: a) how he could do the best for his daughter; b) how he could manage the pain. He also needed to take care of himself because he had stopped eating and lost 10 kilos.

He recognised that the pain of losing Sarah would not go away but he wanted to learn how to manage it. Previously his life had been fairly predictable. Suddenly everything had caved in.

John wanted to feel more in control so began to create a structure he could follow in his life. We therefore compiled a list of Dos and Don'ts he wanted to follow. He aimed:

To keep giving love to his daughter;

To follow daily disciplines, set goals and get successes;

To find a good way of managing his interactions with other people.

This final part was crucial. People were shocked by his appearance and they immediately went into counselling mode. He found such conversations exhausting.

John did not want to keep reliving the trauma in every conversation with friends and colleagues. We therefore worked on a script he could follow: a) to thank people for their concern; b) to stay in charge of the conversation and, if appropriate, close down the discussion.

He then moved on to a bigger topic to explore. John explained this in the following way.

"What do I tell my daughter when she is old enough to understand what happened to her mother?"

"While she is young I can say that her mother has gone to heaven. But later on she will want to know about the circumstances of her mother's death and her own birth.

"At some point she will need to manage her own feelings about the circumstances, but am not sure what to say. I do not want her to live her life feeling guilty."

John and I explored the principles he could follow when explaining what happened. It was a topic he would revisit when his daughter was approaching her teenage years. For the moment, however, he settled on finding ways:

To reassure his daughter that she was planned for and wanted by her mother and him;

To explain that after the birth there had been unexpected difficulties and her mother had died;

To again say that she was really wanted and that her mother would want her to live life fully.

He got into the habit of following his daily structure and regained joy by caring for his daughter. Returning to work a few months later, he found it releasing to do professional projects.

John found this satisfying for a while but then decided to change his lifestyle and negotiated a four day working week. This helped him to provide care for his daughter but also pursue other activities.

John revitalised himself by doing things that gave him positive energy, such as cycling and rewilding a local nature reserve. The latter helped him to meet new people. He continued to feel sorrow but also began to regain his zest for life.

Managing Grief

George Bonnano's book The Other Side Of Sadness focused on the strategies that people use to deal with bereavement, trauma and similar life-changing events. After a period of mourning, some people show the following characteristics.

Resilience

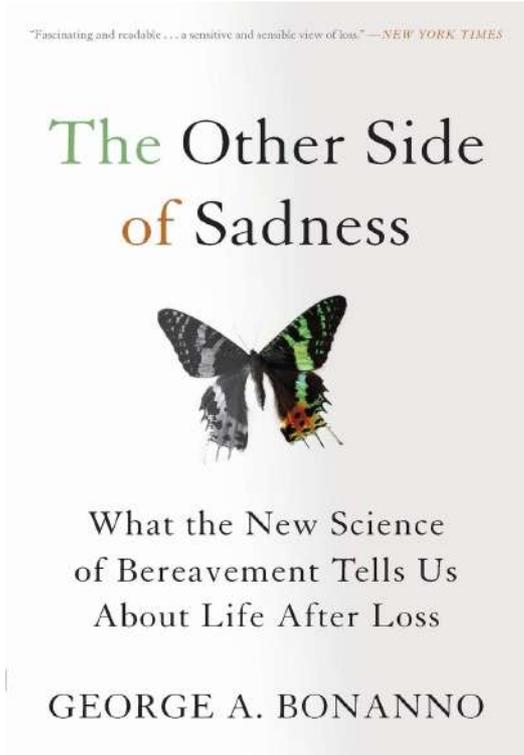

The majority of people, up to 65%, show resilience. They are affected, of course, but it does not change their life trajectory. They seem able to move on from the experience within several months.

Recovery

Up to 25% of the people recover after a reasonable time. During this time they might experience lows, but eventually they recover and are able to get on with life.

Chronic Grief

Up to 15% of the people find the experience debilitating over a much longer period. They fall into a state of chronic grief or other forms of dysfunction.

	Resilience Up to 65% of people are eventually able to get on with their lives. Recovery Up to 25% recover after a reasonable time. Chronic Grief Or Dysfunction Up to 15% find the event debilitating over a much longer period.
---	--

George found little evidence that people go through the stages outlined by Elisabeth Kübler-Ross. These are Denial, Anger, Bargaining, Depression and Acceptance.

This model has helped many people but, as mentioned earlier, Elisabeth studied people who knew they were dying. George focused on those who had been affected by life-changing events.

He reported that some people felt relieved when told it was okay to not necessarily go through the classic stages. George found that:

There is no standard way of grieving.

Some people veer between sadness and more hopeful feelings. They have deep lows, but sometimes they might laugh and enjoy aspects of life. George also says something that sounds counter intuitive.

Sadness can help us to deal with the situation. When we are sad we turn inwards. We slow down. Our heartbeat gets slower.

We pay more attention to things in a more accurate way. This enables us to focus on what is important when making decisions.

Our states of sadness come and go. Sometimes we have other emotions, such as laughter and positivity. Staying sad for months on end overloads our system, however, and can lead to chronic depression.

People who experience grief sometimes feel great pain in their gut. This can affect their whole being. Sometimes this results in them feeling unreal, losing their appetite or having other symptoms.

They want to feel in control and for things to be as they were before. Panu Pihkala highlighted this reaction in a piece he wrote for the BBC website when describing people's responses to climate change. Here is an excerpt from his article.

Grief researchers William Worden and Thomas Attig defined that one of the key tasks in a grief process is "the adjustment to a new environment".

They depicted the whole grief process as "relearning the world". Something has profoundly changed, something or someone is either lost or in the process of going away, and grief can help to us adjust.

Worden and Attig often had in mind the loss of a loved one, usually a human being. But these definitions match the needed scale of climate grief.

The world around us has changed, and is changing still.

We need to adjust to a new kind of social and ecological environment, with ongoing social disputes around climate politics and the ongoing physical effects of climate change.

We need to relearn the world: it is not like it was, or like we thought it was.

Many people recognise the importance of mourning. They may also recognise, however, that some feelings never go away. This sometimes calls for learning how to manage the emotions.

Some people honour the joy they got from a loved one. They may continue to speak to them and share what they are doing in their present life. This can be a way to celebrate the experiences they had together.

Some people learn how to manage the triggers that can lead them back into sadness. Sometimes they take time to recover but, after a while, they do something to give themselves positive energy in their lives.

Some people focus on how to make good use of the emotions. They may choose to appreciate life and help others to do the same. Some go further and move on to the following theme.

Mobilising

During the past 50 years I have worked with some individuals who have experienced grief and fallen into depression. One of the hardest parts is for them to mobilise their energy and start moving again.

The first step is a psychological one that only they can take. It is to choose to focus on what they can control rather than what they can't control.

The second step is to explore how they may use the experience to help themselves or other people. They may then begin experiencing more positive feelings as they look at the possibilities.

The third step is to translate their ideas into positive actions and get some successes. At times they may slip back into depression, but they can then aim to do things that give them positive energy.

Some people translate their grief into doing good work. Some use it to support others who go through similar experiences. Some use it to do practical work to help other people or care for the planet.

One approach is for them to build on their assets rather than their angst. They can then use these assets to help themselves and other people. Let's look at two practical examples of taking this approach.

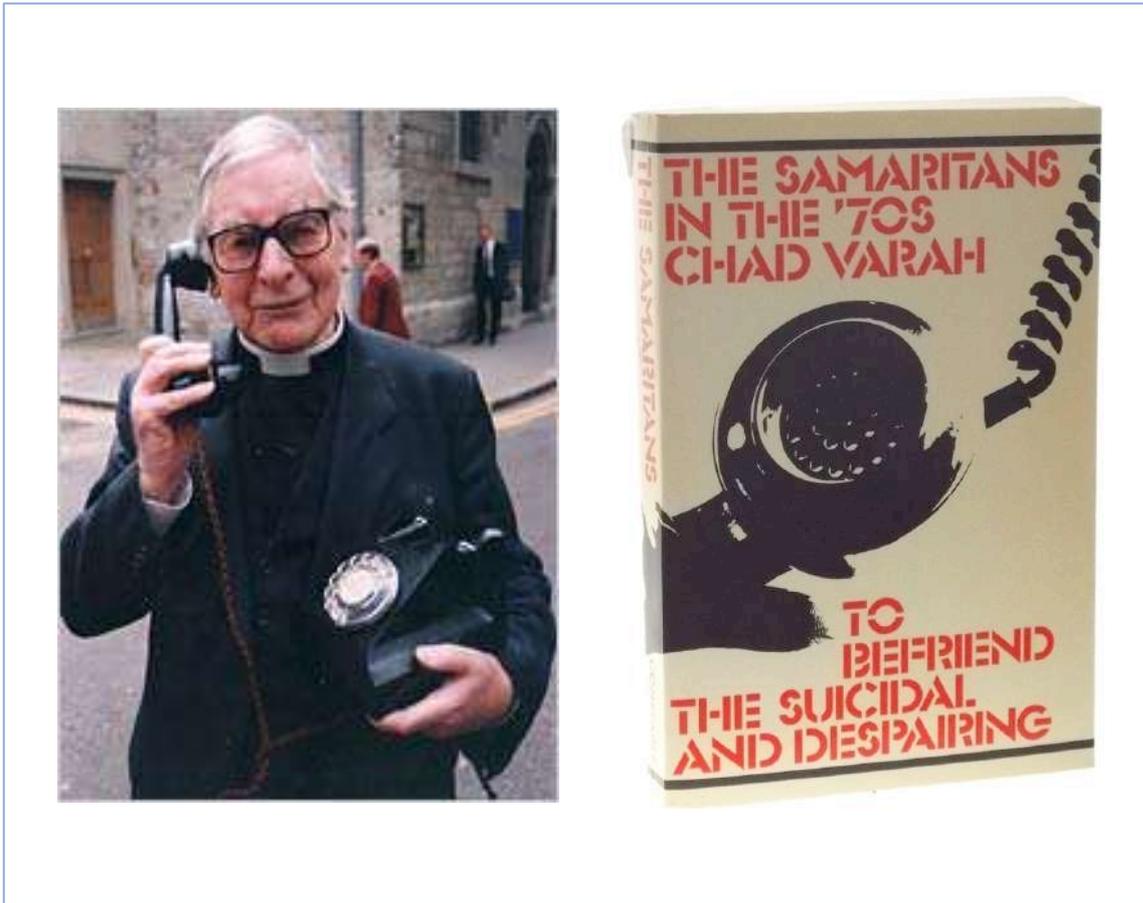

Chad Varah - The Samaritans

Chad was an Anglican clergyman who founded the Samaritans in 1953. Suicide was illegal at the time and he felt something could be done to help people in distress. Here is an excerpt from the organisation's website. It explains Chad's motivation.

The first funeral Chad Varah took as a curate prompted his lifelong commitment to suicide prevention and education.

The funeral was for a 13-year-old girl who had taken her own life because she feared she was seriously ill; in fact she had started to menstruate.

Chad vowed at her graveside to devote himself to helping other people overcome the sort of ignorance and isolation that had ultimately caused the young girl's death.

Chad was born in Lincolnshire and studied at Oxford before attending Lincoln Theological College. He was ordained in 1936, then worked as curate in various parts of the UK before serving much of his working life in London.

Always daring to be different, he supplemented his early income by working as a children's comic scriptwriter. He helped to create Dan Dare, the spaceman, for The Eagle comic. The official Samaritans site explains more about his approach.

An early proponent of sex education, Chad Varah alerted society to the approach of the permissive society, usually associated with the 1960s, with an article in the Picture Post in 1952.

Far more important to him than the outraged responses of conservative society were the 235 people who wrote in afterwards to bare their souls, 14 of whom showed signs of considering suicide.

The opportunity to act on his earlier promise to help people in emotional need came in 1953 when Chad was appointed Rector at the Church of St Stephen Walbrook in the City of London.

In the early 1950s, three suicides a day were officially recorded in Greater London; suicide was still an illegal act and sex education hardly existed.

Chad advertised in the press for people to help – not as trained counsellors, but as ordinary human beings offering a listening ear and emotional support.

Inundated with offers of help, he opened the first drop-in centre where emotionally isolated and distressed people could go to find a sympathetic ear – and Samaritans was born.

Chad continued to run Samaritans until 1987, thereafter remaining an active member of the organisation and retaining a watchful eye over it even after his retirement.

The Samaritans found that providing a listening ear could enable people to take more charge of their lives. Certainly some might use it as a constant emotional crutch, but it was still worth it, even if it helped only one person to live longer.

Chad pioneering work created a caring framework. This enabled many people to help themselves and live more fulfilling lives.

Joanna Macy – Active Hope

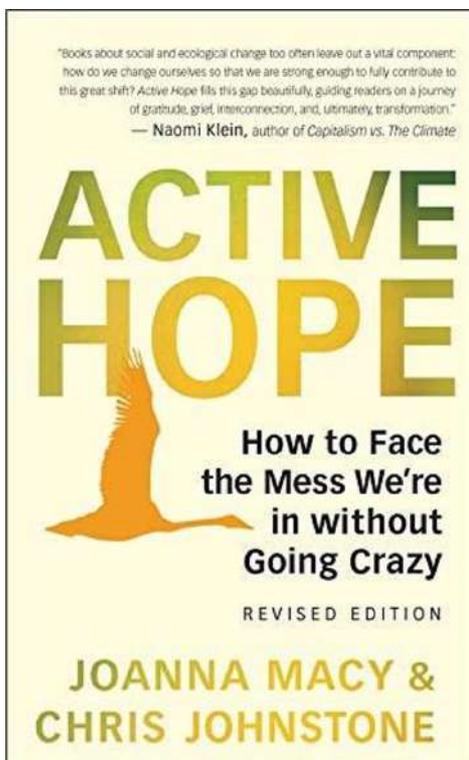

Joanna has devoted much of her life to helping people to manage their grief about climate change. She and Chris Johnstone produced the book Active Hope: How to face the mess we are in without going crazy. Here is an excerpt from the Introduction.

Whatever situation we face, we can choose our response. When facing overwhelming challenges, we might feel that our actions don't count for much.

Yet the kind of responses we make, and the degree to which we believe they count, are shaped by the way we think and feel about hope.

Most books addressing global issues focus on describing either the problems we face or the solutions needed.

While we touch on both of these, our focus is on how we strengthen and support our intention to act, so that we can best play our part, whatever that may be, in the healing of our world.

Active hope is a practice. Like tai chi or gardening, it is something we do rather than have. It is a process we can apply to any situation, and it involves three steps

First, we take a clear view of reality;

Second, we identify what we hope for in terms of the direction we'd like things to move in or the values we'd like to see expressed;

Third, we take steps to move ourselves or our situation in that direction.

The structure of the book follows the four stages of: Gratitude, Honoring our Pain for the World, Seeing with New Eyes and Going Forth. The journey through these stages has a strengthening effect that deepens with every repetition.

Since Active Hope doesn't require our optimism, we can apply it even in areas where we feel hopeless. The guiding impetus is intention: we choose what we aim to bring about, to act for, or express.

Rather than weighing our chances and proceeding only when we feel hopeful, we focus on our intention and let it be our guide.

Everybody will experience sorrow in their lives. Some people use this to mobilise their energy and move onto the next step.

Marvellous Work

The mainstream media is addicted to negative news. Look around the world, however, and there are thousands of stories about people who are doing good work.

Many have translated their challenging experiences into ways to help other people. They may run self-help groups, raise money for charities or do other kinds of marvellous work.

Deborah James was someone who did this in her own life. Here is an excerpt from a piece that Rachel Aroesti wrote in the Guardian about a TV programme that showed Debbie's approach.

Dame Deborah James was a remarkable cancer patient.

After she was told she had stage 3 bowel cancer in 2016, aged 35, the then-deputy head teacher threw herself into raising awareness of its symptoms and sharing the reality of such a diagnosis.

Initially via her blog Bowelbabe; then a column in the Sun; a lively and hugely popular social media presence; and the hit BBC podcast You, Me and the Big C, which she hosted alongside fellow cancer patients Rachael Bland and Lauren Mahon.

James did all this with equal parts glamour and candour – no easy task when you have “the poo cancer,” as she christened it on the podcast.

“There’s nothing pink about my cancer,” she continued wryly. “It’s just brown.”

Though clearly distraught, she signs off with her final broadcast with here humour undimmed. “Come on, I can’t leave on any other word apart from: check your poo.”

There are many ways to deal with challenging emotions. The feelings never go away but it may be possible to manage these. Some people do this by moving from mourning to mobilising to doing marvellous work.

Let’s return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Moving From Mourning To Mobilising To Marvellous Work

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a results of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Resourceful Approach Rather Than The Resentful Approach

The Resourceful Approach

Some people deal with challenging situations by being resourceful rather than resentful. They then focus on doing things that are re-energising and do their best to get the desired results.

There are many ways to deal with setbacks, disappointments and challenging situations. Some people choose to be resourceful rather than resentful.

Such people use their creativity to explore the possible ways forward. They then do things that are re-energising and do their best to get the desired results.

People who take these steps can feel revitalised and get a sense of renewal. This can increase their resilience and ability to shape a positive future. Let's explore these themes.

Resourceful

Imagine that you have had a setback. You may want to buy time to rest, regain your energy and refocus. You may then aim to find positive ways to shape your future. How to take this step?

One approach is to learn from your own positive history. Another approach is to learn from other people's experiences. Let's explore these themes.

The Learning From Your Positive History Approach

Looking back, can you recall a situation when you chose to be resourceful rather than resentful? You may have done this after experiencing a loss, a disappointment or a feeling a sense of injustice.

What was your first reaction to the event? You may have felt angry, hurt or rejected. How did you take time to heal, reflect and begin to resurface?

How did you then focus on the future? How did you clarify what you could control in the situation? How did you clarify the real results to achieve – the pictures of success?

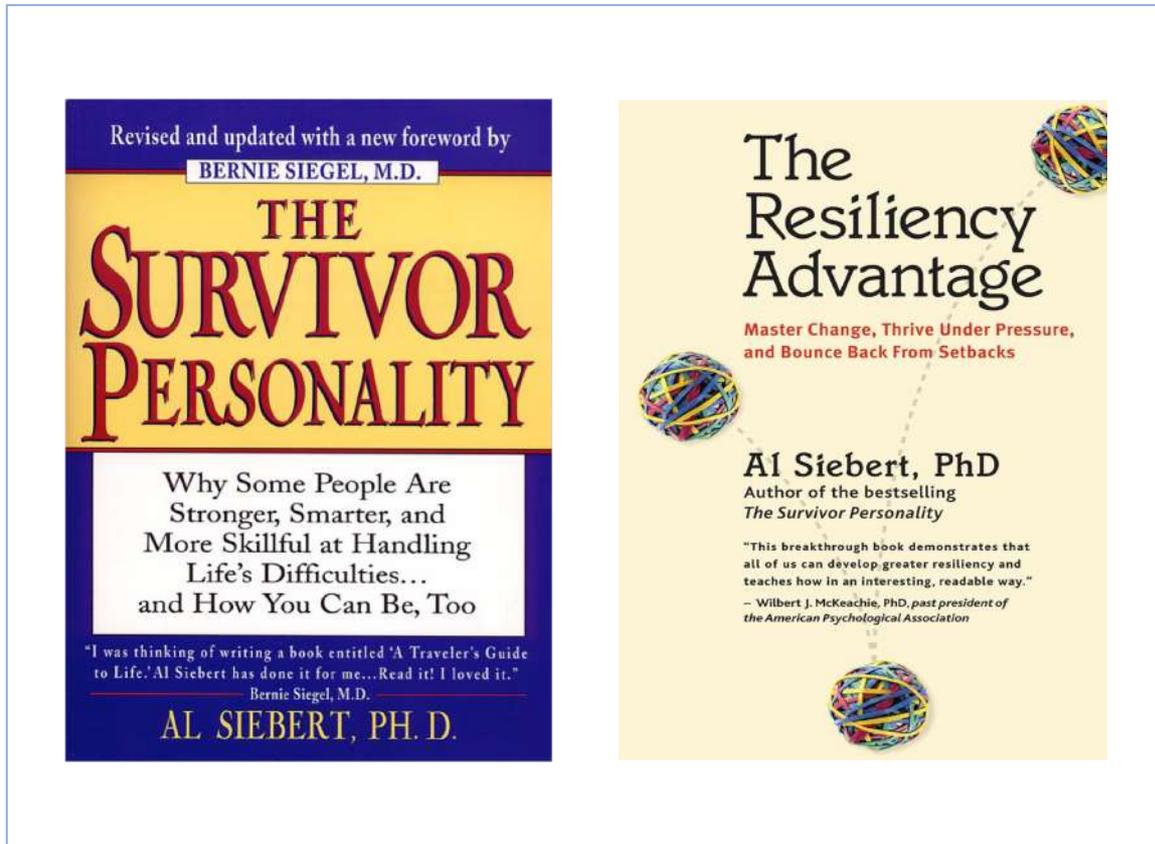

How did you explore the possible ways forward? How did you decide on your chosen route? How did you translate this into a specific plan? How did you move into action?

How did you get an early success? How did you encourage yourself on the journey? How did you do your best to achieve the desired results? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Looking ahead, how can you follow some of these principles to manage setbacks in the future? What other skills may you need to add? How can you be resourceful and aim to achieve your picture of success?

The Learning From Other People's Experiences Approach

Another approach is to learn from other people's experiences. Al Siebert's books The Survivor Personality and The Resiliency Advantage laid the foundations for much of today's work on being resourceful and resilient.

Al spent over 40 years studying life's survivors - those who grew when overcoming tough challenges. He initially focused on people that met four criteria:

They had survived a major crisis;

They had surmounted the crisis through personal effort;

They had emerged from the experience with previously unknown strengths and abilities;

They had, in retrospect, found value in the experience.

AI describes people who had faced various challenging situations. These included sexual assaults, life-threatening illnesses, being prisoners of war, addictions, physical attacks and crippling accidents.

How do people cope with such adversity? Some don't, says AI. They feel victimised, become helpless or lash out at others. Some people do deal with adversity. AI described some of the steps that such people take.

They stay calm, clarify the situation and chart their strategy. Committing to their course of action, they concentrate fully until they reach their chosen goal. AI wrote:

They thrive by gaining strength from adversity and often convert misfortune into a gift.

Are life's best survivors different from other people? No. They survive, cope, and thrive better because they are better at using the inborn abilities possessed by all humans.

The Survivor's Approach To Tackling Challenges

- They quickly read the new reality.
- They take responsibility for making things work out well.
- They stay calm, clarify what is happening and chart their path.
- They maintain a sense of perspective.
- They are resourceful and open to doing anything.
- They have life-competence that helps them in emergencies.
- They totally commit to doing their best.

They quickly read the new reality

Survivors have experience of overcoming difficulties in life. They read situations quickly and start considering the consequences. Other people ignore what is happening or bury their heads in the sand. Survivors click into awareness mode and take snapshots of what is actually happening.

They stay calm

Why? They realise it is vital to establish clarity. They must clarify what is happening and then make decisions about the way forward. The best way to do this is to get in the helicopter and take an overall view.

They maintain a sense of perspective

People who are diagnosed with a serious illness, for example, may reframe it as a project. Looking at it from this perspective, they are able to remove themselves and plan the path ahead.

They clarify their assets. They focus on their relationships, knowledge, talents and the healthy parts of their body. Mobilising these assets, they then tackle the challenge.

They are resourceful and open to doing anything

AI found that survivors chose their strategies from a wide repertoire of options. One contributing factor is that they have a quality common to many peak performers. Such people embrace what appear to be seeming paradoxes.

They are able to see the big picture and the small details, to be focused and flexible, to be serious and playful. This means they are able to see a wider number of options than people who have been trained to behave in one way.

They have life-competence that helps them in emergencies

Survivors are life-long learners. Such people tend to be savvy rather than having lived a sheltered life. This enables them to read situations, call on their experience and make decisions.

Moving into action, they observe what is happening – what is working and what isn't – and are prepared to change direction. This is a great advantage when tackling problems or emergencies.

They totally commit to doing their best

Survivors make their decision and throw themselves into pursuing their chosen strategy. They employ every ounce of energy to reach the goal. Al described this in the following way.

The survivor way of orientating to a crisis is to feel fully and totally responsible for making things work out well.

Such people often grow from the experience. They continue to expand their resilience and repertoire, but they also develop a sense of perspective about life. Al described them in the following way.

Resilient adults are happy rather than hostile. They forgive instead of holding grudges and are more playful than serious.

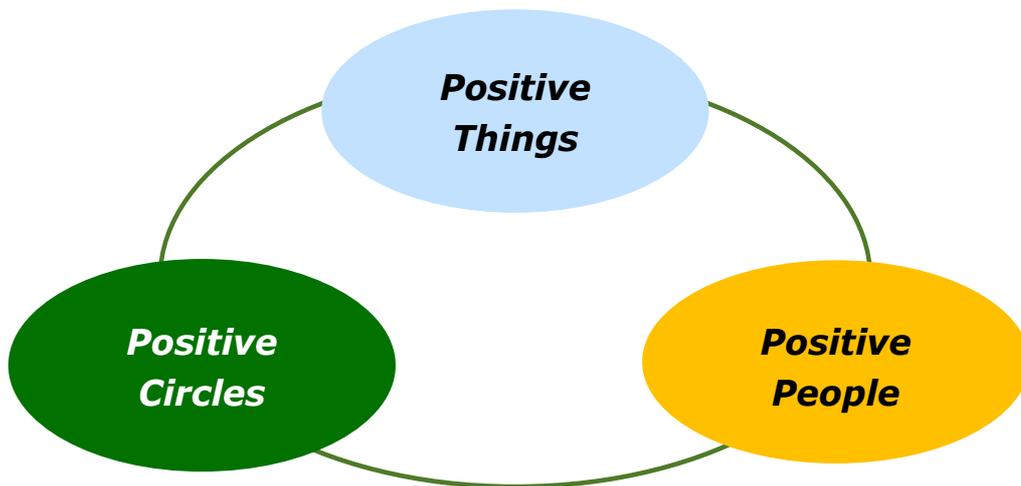

They get better and better every decade because they have a child-like curiosity. They ask questions, explore, want to know how things work, and learn valuable lessons in the school of life.

Imagine that you have been resourceful when facing a challenging situation. Sometimes it can then be useful to focus on the following theme.

Re-energising

The Positive Approach To Re-energising Yourself

There are many ways to re-energise yourself. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

Different people re-energise themselves in different ways. Some aim to rest, reflect and recentre. They then refocus and rehearse what they are going to do next.

Some take another approach. They aim: a) to build on the positive things in their life; b) to spend time with positive people; c) to put themselves into positive circles rather than negative circles. Let's explore these themes.

Positive Things

What are the positive things in your life? Different people describe different things when exploring this theme. Here are some they mention when describing these things.

The positive things in my life are:

Our children - who give us joy ... My partner - who gives me encouragement ... Our pets - who give us pleasure ... Our house - which is warm, cosy and reassuring ... Our food - which is nourishing ... Our garden - which is wonderful to be in and feeds our souls.

My health - which is good for my age ... My upbringing - in which my parents gave me love, support and encouragement ... My education - which was mainly self-study and involved exploring, reading and meeting good models.

My strengths - which have provided the opportunity to do satisfying work and earn a good salary ... My drive - which means I want to continue developing ... My professional network - which consists of many encouraging people.

My opportunities in the future - such as the many chances to encourage people ... The opportunities to pass on knowledge - such as through writing and mentoring ... The chance to encourage grandchildren - though it will be up to our kids regarding how they want to shape their future lives.

Imagine that you have described the positive things in your life. If appropriate, you may want to continue to appreciate and build on these things. Different people choose different ways to take this approach. One person expressed this in the following way.

"The exercise reminded about the important things in my life. My first reaction was to safeguard and support these things. This led to spending more quality time with my family.

"This coincided with my boss at work taking time out to care for his partner who had a serious illness. He repeated the well-known story about us each of us juggling rubber and glass balls in our lives.

"He said that the rubber balls bounce back if we drop them. But it is important not to drop the glass balls – such as our family relationships. I took this message to heart.

"Moving on to my professional life, I returned to doing what I did best. It meant leaving the C-Suite and working directly with clients, which was immensely satisfying. I continue to enjoy work to this day."

Different people have different triggers for taking such steps. Some do it after a Eureka moment when they realise what is important. Some did it after the Covid pandemic. Some do it to simply feel positive and make the most of life.

Imagine that you want take some of these steps. How can you build on the positive things in your life? What may be the benefits of taking these steps – both for yourself and for other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Things

The positive things in my life include the following:

*

*

*

The steps I can take to appreciate and build on these things are:

*

*

*

The benefits of taking these step – both for myself and other people – may be:

*

*

*

Positive People

Who are the positive people in your life? How can you spend more time with these people? How can you also encourage them? There are many ways to identify such people.

One approach is to do the exercise called Encouragers and Stoppers. This is an exercise that I often used on strengths workshops. The aim was to help people to identify how they could encourage themselves and other people in the future. Here are the instructions for the exercise.

Encouragers

Who have been the people who have encouraged you in the past? They may have been parents, teachers, friends or other people. Write the names of these people and the specific things they did to encourage you.

Who are the people who encourage you now? These may be people in your family, work place or elsewhere. Write the names of these people and what they do to encourage you.

Encouragers

Encouragers In The Past

*

*

*

Encouragers In The Present

*

*

*

Stoppers

Who have been the people with whom you have felt stopped? Some of these people may have had the best of intentions but their style may have been difficult to manage. Write the names of these people.

Who are the people - or what are the situations - in the present where you feel stopped? You have a responsibility to do your best, of course, but you may feel disqualified or not valued in certain situations. This can be challenging.

Two other points are worth mentioning. First, some people will both encourage you and stop you. If so, describe how they encourage you and also how they may feel stopped.

Second, some people stop themselves. They may do this by following negative scripts or by not doing their best. If appropriate, describe how you may stop yourself in certain situations. Here is the exercise on stoppers.

Stoppers

Stoppers In The Past

*

*

*

Stoppers In The Present

*

*

*

Encouragers And Stoppers In The Future

Imagine that you have made a list of encouragers and stoppers. Looking ahead, you may want to consider the following themes.

Encouragers

Let's start with the people who are supportive or stimulating. How can you build with such people? One approach is to be an encourager yourself and aim:

To spend more time the encouragers ... To encourage the encouragers and other people ... To encourage yourself.

Stoppers

Let's move onto the situations where you may feel stopped. When appropriate, it can be good to stop putting yourself into such situations. If this is not possible, you may aim:

To rehearse what you are going to do when encountering such people or situations;

To recognise the specific things they do that trigger your emotions and also learn how to manage such triggers;

To, but only when you feel it is appropriate, suggest positive ways the person may want to consider behaving in the future – plus describe the benefits for both themselves and other people.

Here is the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to focus on how you can build with encouragers and manage situations where you may feel stopped.

Encouragers And Stoppers

Encouragers

The specific things I can do to build with the encouragers – and encourage other people - are:

*

*

*

Stoppers

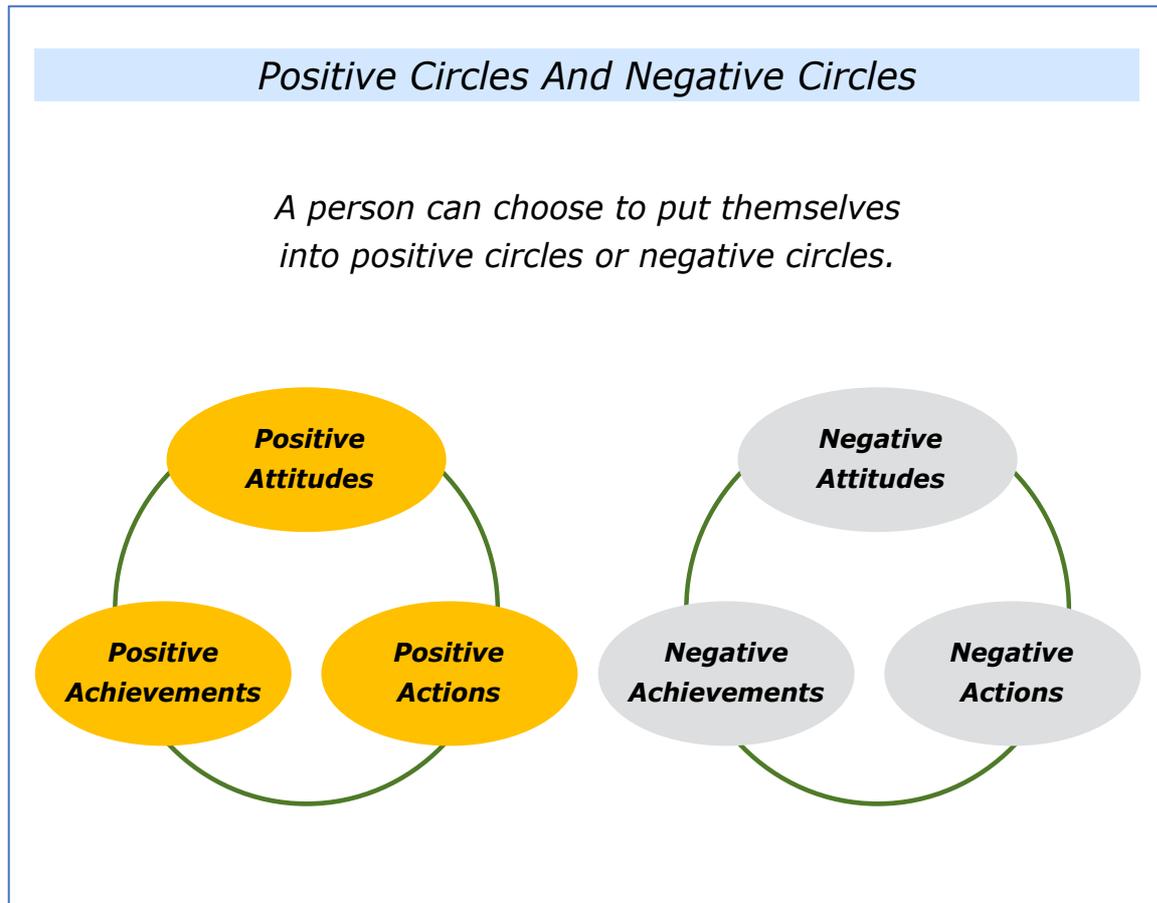

The specific things I can do to manage any situations in which I feel stopped are:

*

*

*

The Positive Circles Approach Rather Than The Negative Circles Approach

There are many ways to live life. One view is that a person can choose to put themselves into positive circles or negative circles. Let's explore this view.

Positive Circles

Looking back, can you think of a time when you put yourself into a positive circle? You may have chosen to have a positive attitude, translate this into positive actions and, as a result, achieve positive things.

You may have been changing your lifestyle, recovering from a setback, tackling a challenge or doing another activity. This may have led to you encouraging both yourself and other people.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Here are some of the ways that people may describe how they follow positive circles rather than negative circles in their life and work.

Positive Circles - I Can Choose:

To take responsibility for shaping my future ... To follow a structure in my daily life ... To do something each day towards achieving my life goals ... To eat nutritious food ... To walk several times a day ... To do things that gave me positive energy ... To spend time with positive people.

To get an early success each day ... To do more of the work that gives me satisfaction ... To set goals and get a sense of success ... To be kind ... To build on who I am rather than worry about who I am not ... To reflect on the positive things that have happened that day.

Somebody who puts themselves into positive circles may find these can lead to a tipping point. They may reach a stage where the habits they follow can lead to a transformational effect. They may get into the habit of living a positive life.

Negative Circles

Some people put themselves into negative circles. They may have a negative attitude, translate this into negative actions and, as a result, achieve negative things. They may hurt themselves or other people.

Different people take this approach in different ways. Here are some of the ways that people may describe how they follow positive circles in their life and work.

Negative Circles - I Can Choose:

To not take responsibility ... To see myself as a victim ... To say the world is to blame ... To let myself drift rather than follow a structure in my life ... To fail to exercise ... To eat poor food ... To stop doing the things that I enjoy.

To compare myself to other people ... To feel stuck in a job and not plan how to do something better ... To focus on what is wrong in the world ... To not manager triggers that can lead to me going into a downwards spiral ... To feel there is no hope.

Somebody who puts themselves into negative circles may reach another kind of tipping point. They can get to a point where they fall into a constant state of negativity, cynicism or depression.

Positive Circles In The Future

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to put yourself into positive circles in the future. How can you make this happen?

You may want to maintain a sense of gratitude and encourage other people. You may want to create and follow a structure in your life. You may want to do things that give you positive energy.

You want to build on your strengths and do satisfying work. You may want to be the best you can be rather than compare yourself to others. You may something each day towards achieving your life goals.

How can you react if you find yourself getting into a negative circle? One approach is: a) to recognise what is happening; b) to do something to put yourself in a positive circle; c) to get a quick success. It is then to build on this momentum and get positive results.

You will have your own approach to putting yourself into positive circles rather than negative circles. Taking these steps can sometimes benefit both yourself and other people.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Circles In The Future

The specific things I can do to put myself into positive circles in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing these things may be:

*

*

*

Imagine that you are aiming to manage a challenging situation. So far we have looked at how you can be resourceful and re-energise yourself. Let's now move on to the next theme.

The Exhilarating Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to do things that are exhilarating. There are several definitions for this feeling. These include the following.

A feeling of deep joy, happiness or elation.

Different people do different things to enjoy this feeling. They may experience it when being creative, running, playing music, going into a state of flow or doing other activities.

They may also take different routes to experiencing this feeling. Some people aim to do things that are enjoyable, energising and may sometimes even be exhilarating.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. This involves focusing on the following things.

You Can Do Things That Are Enjoyable

What are the things you enjoy doing? How can you do more of these in your personal and professional life? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Different people obviously enjoy doing different things. Here are some they mention when exploring this theme.

The Things That I Find Enjoyable Are:

The feeling of being in control ... Walking with my dogs ... Being with positive people ... Doing activities with our children ... Being close to water ... Working with certain kinds of customers ... Sometimes simply pottering around.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Enjoyable

The specific things I find enjoyable are:

*

*

*

*The steps I can take to do
more of these things are:*

*

*

*

You Can Do Things That Are Energising

What are the things that give you positive energy? How can you do more of these in your personal and professional life? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Different people get positive energy from doing different things. Here are some they mention when exploring this theme.

The Things That I Find Energising Are:

Being grateful ... Listening to certain kinds of music ... Enjoying being an introvert ... Doing things at my pace ... Studying success ... Doing stimulating projects in my work ... Passing on knowledge to other people.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Energising

The specific things I find energising are:

*

*

*

*The steps I can take to do
more of these things are:*

*

*

*

You Can Do Things That Are Exhilarating

What are the things that you find exhilarating? How can you do more of these in your personal and professional life? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Some people aim to do activities that they find exhilarating. Other people experience this feeling in different ways. Here are some they mention when exploring this theme.

The Things That I Find Exhilarating Are:

Studying kindness ... Having a sense of perspective and recognising I am small in the great sweep of history ... Seeing people do great work ... Focusing on how I can encourage both present and future generations.

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to do things that are enjoyable, energising and exhilarating. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Exhilarating

The specific things I find exhilarating are:

*

*

*

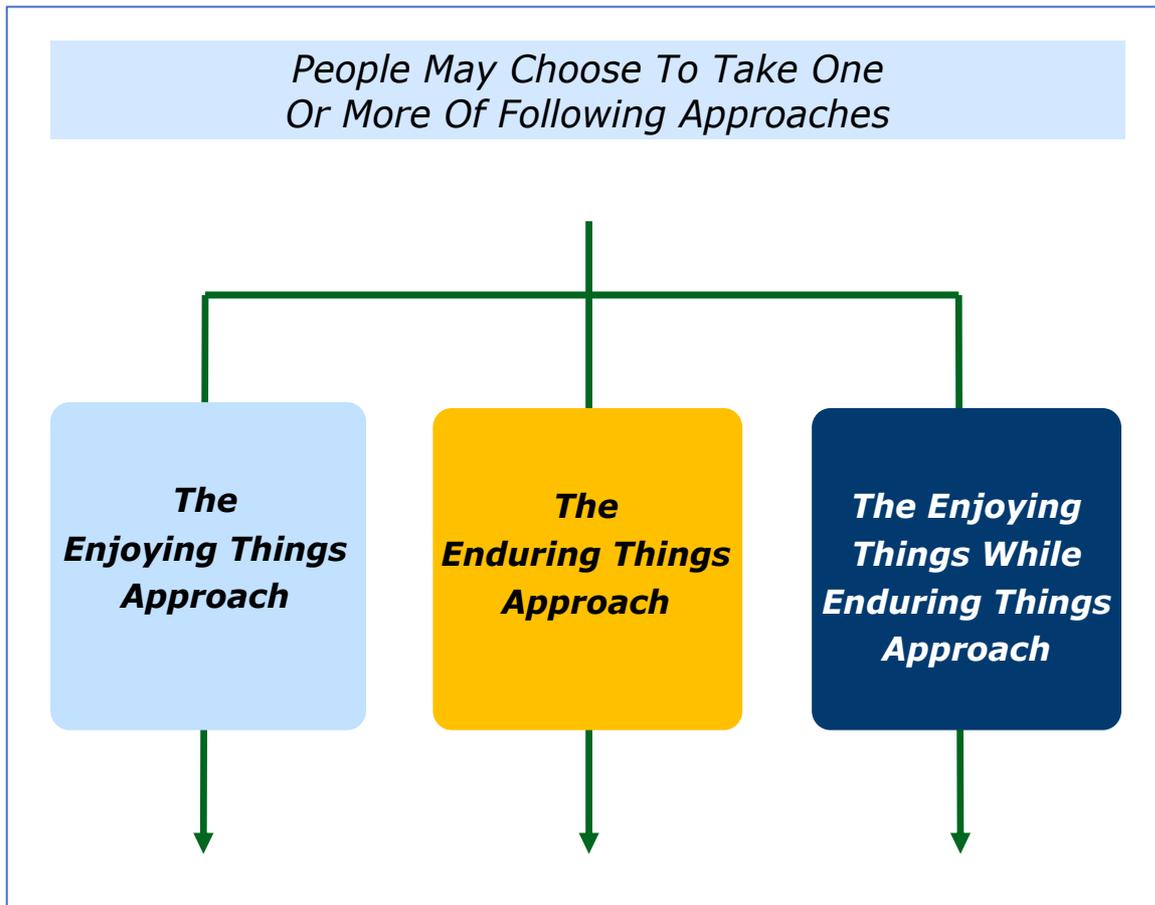

*The steps I can take to do
more of these things are:*

*

*

*

The Enjoying Things Approach Rather Than The Enduring Things Approach

People need to have access to the basic materials for life. They can then make choices about they shape their future lives. They may take one of the following approaches.

People may aim to enjoy things, endure things or enjoy things while also enduring things. Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

The Enjoying Things Approach

Some people follow the rule that 'what you focus on you become'. They therefore choose to have a positive attitude, do things they enjoy and count their blessings. They may also enjoy encouraging people.

Such people are often lifetime learners and gain strength from doing things they enjoy. They like to set specific goals, do satisfying work and achieve success.

They may also be resourceful and resilient. They may enjoy finding creative solutions to certain challenges. This enables them to expand their repertoire of skills for shaping a positive future.

Some people follow this approach in their personal lives and do things that give them positive energy. They may enjoy being with their children, walking, playing music, pursuing creative projects or doing other activities.

Some people follow this approach in their professional lives. They aim to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and achieve success. Sometimes this can involve making decisions.

One senior leader, for example, decided give up their seat in the C-suite. They chose: a) to work with the customers with whom they worked best: b) to do stimulating projects in their personal life.

Some people do what they enjoy when encountering things that could sap their energy. One person took this approach during election times in their country. They expressed this in the following way.

"I chose to spend my days focusing on positive things rather than listening to politicians arguing. This helped me to appreciate life, stay healthy and keep developing."

Many people gain strength from doing what they enjoy. Let's look at another approach it is possible to take.

The Enduring Things Approach

Some people seem to endure life. They may feel down about their relationships, work or because of other factors. They may find it difficult to develop a positive attitude or find ways to appreciate life.

Sometimes this may be down to circumstances. As mentioned earlier, people need to have access to the basic materials for life. They need food, shelter, encouragement and the chance to do satisfying work.

People who don't have these physical things may feel that life is an endurance battle. They need to make it to the next pay day to feed the family.

Some people may have the basic materials but put themselves into situations that are sapping. They may spend time with negative people, be in exhausting relationships or spend their days working in a toxic culture.

Such people may choose to endure things because they focus on the possible long-term benefits. They may stay in an unsatisfying job, for example, because leaving it would mean taking a pay cut.

People who take this approach may experience side-effects. They may lose energy, get illnesses or believe everything will be better when they can be free. Sometimes this works, sometimes it doesn't. Let's look at another approach for managing these situations.

The Enjoying Things While Enduring Things Approach

Some people aim to do enjoyable things on a journey that calls for endurance. Taking this approach gives them energy and strength to work towards a potential goal.

Such people do not kid themselves. They recognise it is vital to build on the positive things whilst also dealing with any negative aspects in their daily lives and work.

Looking at my own life, for example, I took this approach when working on machines in a factory for six years. I was no good at the job but kept going by focusing on several things.

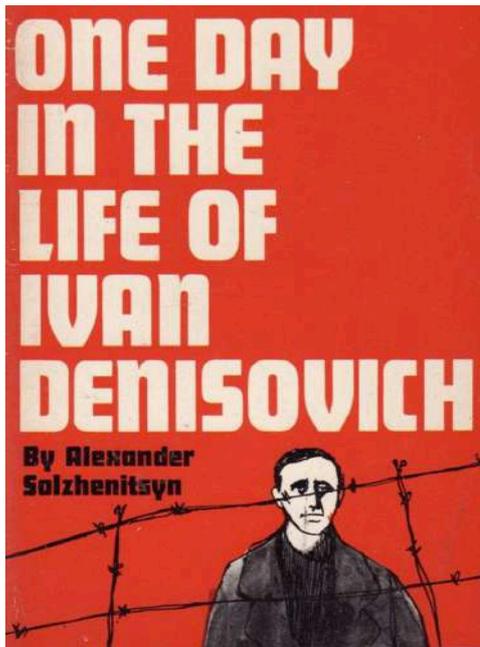

First, my dream of finding a work where I could help people. Second, continuing to read and learn. Third, travelling around the country watching football. Eventually I managed to find a full-time role doing social work.

Some people other ways to enjoy things on a difficult journey. This has been the subject of many films, such as The Shawshank Redemption.

Alexander Solzhenitsyn highlighted these themes in his book One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich. He describes how Ivan Denisovich Shukhov, who is serving a ten-year sentence in the Gulag, takes pride in his daily work. This is how several commentators described Shukov's approach.

He acts under a moral code that allows him to continue to respect himself. He no longer thinks much of home or freedom but instead thinks about that day, taking pride in his work as a mason.

In working hard at his masonry and taking pride in building a good, strong, straight wall, he is in effect subverting the prison authorities who seek to punish him by making him work.

Shukhov, instead, is gaining self-esteem by learning a new skill in prison and making his actions meaningful to himself.

He finds a sort of freedom through work because he is no longer working for the authorities but for himself.

He even wants to carry on building when the signal for the end of the day sounds.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the enjoying things approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you do things you enjoy? If appropriate, how can you do these to help you manage a journey that you may need to endure? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Enjoying Things Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can then to follow this in my own way may be:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Fair Fighter And Dirty Fighter Approaches

Everybody encounters differences and possible conflicts in their lives. It can then be useful to recognise when people are fighting fair or fighting dirty. Let's explore these themes.

You Can Recognise Fair Fighters

Fair fighters take responsibility. Whilst they may sometimes feel upset, they take ownership for their feelings and focus on how to shape a better future.

Such people build on common ground. During a conflict they look for the similarities. They focus on the shared goals that people want to achieve rather than the differences.

Fair fighters explore how it is possible to get some early wins that will build trust. They say things like:

"Let's look to the future and see how we can find a solution."

They refuse to play the blame game. Even when angry, they are careful with their communication. They ask themselves:

"What are the real results I want to achieve? Do I simply want to express my feelings or do I want to find a solution? How can I do my best to find a win-win?"

Such people stand up for their rights, however, and are certainly are not victims. They also give clear messages rather than conflicting or confused messages.

Fair fighters often focus on the future. They may aim, when appropriate, to offer positive suggestions that will benefit people. They try to, as far as possible, get win-win solutions to challenges.

You Can Recognise Dirty Fighters

Dirty fighters refuse to take responsibility. They blame others and often refer to the past. They like to pick fights and point out what they see as other people's failures.

Believing their own feelings are paramount, they express these without consideration for other people. They don't respect people who are different and may sometimes mock them.

Dirty fighters give conflicting or confusing messages. They may also put others in double binds. These are situations where, whatever the other person does, they feel they are bound to lose.

Such people focus on differences rather than common ground and insist that other people should change. Focusing on their own agenda, they aim to make sure that they win and that other people lose.

You Can Recognise Fair Fighters And Dirty Fighters In The Future

Positive people aim to keep encouraging people but sometimes it is important to recognise when others may be fighting fair or dirty. How can you anticipate and manage such situations? If appropriate, you can explore the following questions.

How can I continue to spend time with positive people? How can I keep putting myself into these positive places and situations? How can I encourage people and do my best in these situations?

How can I build on what people have in common? How can I, when appropriate, behave in a fair way when managing differences? How can I try to find, as far as possible, win-win solutions?

How can I recognise when some people may be fighting dirty? How can I then buy time to think and behave in a fair way? How can I recognise when it is time to move on from such situations?

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where it may be important to recognise whether people are being fair or fighting dirty? What may you want to do in that situation? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Fair Fighting And Dirty Fighting

The specific situation where it may be important to recognise whether people are being fair or fighting dirty may be:

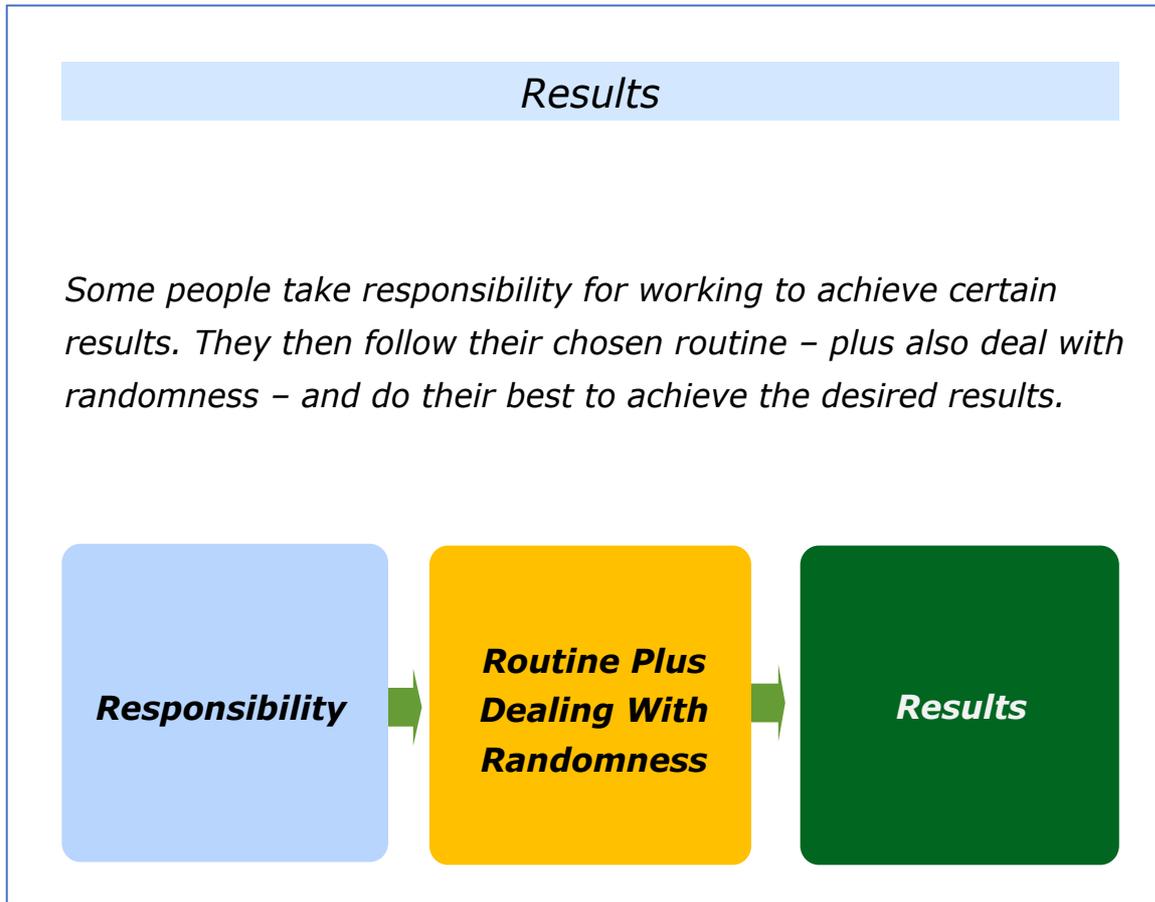

*

The specific things I may want to do in that situation are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

Different people choose different ways to recover from setbacks or manage challenging situations. Some people focus on the following themes.

Responsibility

Such people take responsibility for shaping their future and aim to achieve certain goals. They may aim to find a new job, stay sober, encourage other people or achieve another goal.

Routine

Such people then aim to follow a certain routine that will increase their chances of achieving the goals. They also plan how to anticipate and deal with random events that could throw them off-track.

Results

Such people get some early successes, maintain good habits and encourage both themselves and other people. They make the journey as rewarding as possible and do their best to achieve the desired results.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. The following pages look at three ways that people may follow it when tackling certain challenges. Let's explore these themes.

The one day at time approach is associated with recovering from addictions but it can be used in many other situations. It may be followed by individuals who pursue a certain path or work towards a specific goal.

The approach starts by a person deciding on their destination. This can involve them focusing on:

A state of being – such as being healthy, being kind or being at peace;

A specific goal – such as a personal aim, a positive legacy or a picture of success.

The person may then make a specific action plan. They may focus on how they can do their best each day, each week and each time period on the way towards their chosen destination.

Doing Your Best One Day At A Time

This approach is followed by people in many fields. They may aim to pursue a spiritual faith, follow certain habits or achieve a goal.

Virat Kohli, the captain of the India cricket team, takes this approach when aiming to improve himself and the team. Here is a summary of his philosophy.

"We aim to do our best and keep improving one day at a time."

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some create mantras they aim to follow on the way towards achieving their aims. This can involve taking the following steps.

The One Day At A Time Approach

This sometimes involves a person creating a mantra they want to follow. It is vital, however, that the person believes in it.

Here are some mantras that a person may focus on. You will, of course, create your own mantra.

Today I am going to do my best:

To be encouraging ... To help other people.

To stay healthy ... To follow my principles.

To deliver high standards ... To work towards the goal.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you followed elements of this approach? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

You may have done this when recovering from an illness, helping a person to get through a crisis or when tackling a challenge. You may have applied it when working towards a long-term goal.

How did you make action plans for each day? How did you encourage yourself on the journey? How did you get short-term successes? How did you continue to work towards the long-term picture of success?

During my early career I worked with recovering addicts who focused on staying healthy one day at a time. Since then I have worked with many caring people, creative artists and peak performers who have taken a similar approach.

Such people often focus on one principle where they want to do their best. They may aim:

To be encouraging one day at a time ... To help one patient at a time ... To write one page at a time.

They may find that following their mantra in one area has a knock on effect. They may begin to improve in other areas of their life. They may also recognise the philosophy that:

The journey is the destination and the destination is the journey.

One person had their mantra written on the palm of their hand and aimed to follow this each day. They kept looking at the mantra and translating it into action. They found this to be more helpful than paying lots of money to a therapist.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of area of your life where you would like to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Winning The Next Moment Approach

This is an approach that is used in sports but it can be applied in many fields. The aim is to win the next moment.

There are many different definitions of winning. In this context it means focusing on what you can control and doing your best.

The approach also be expanded to winning the next hour and the next day.

This is an approach that is used in sport. The aim is to win the next moment. It is an approach that can also be expanded to other areas of life.

There are different views on winning. In this context, winning means focusing on what you can control and doing your best. Some people expand this to winning the next moment, the next hour and the next day.

Paul O'Connell, the former Irish Rugby Union player, described this approach a talk he gave to a Pendulum Summit in 2018. Here is a summary of what he said about giving your best throughout a game.

Paul O'Connell – Mindfulness For Rugby Players

"Win the moment in front of your face."

Joe Schmidt

Paul called the approach 'mindfulness for dumb rugby players'. The team's coach Joe Schmidt kept giving his players the following message. Forget the mistake you have made, forget the try you have scored. Be fully present and win the next moment in front of your face.

As mentioned earlier, some people apply this to doing their best in their lives. They may do this when aiming:

*To stay healthy one day at a time when recovering from an addiction ...
To focus on one shot or one game at a time when playing a sport ... To do their best to achieve their desired results.*

Let's look at another application of this approach. This involves returning to some of the work done by Al Siebert.

The Guidelines For Thriving When Looking For A Job Approach

Al Siebert helped many people to thrive in challenging situations. These included helping people who had lost their jobs. The following ideas from his 1993 book The Survivor Personality are still relevant today.

Losing your job through no fault of your own can wipe you out emotionally. How do you find the energy to search for work? How do you deal with your anger?

How can you be pleasant, relaxed, and self-confident in an interview when you don't feel that way? Here are some guidelines for handling the emotional challenge of dealing with job loss and searching for new employment.

Guidelines For Thriving During Job Loss And Job Search - Al Siebert

- Write down how you feel. Get your feelings out in a safe way. Take creative action and begin your job search.
- Talk with people with whom you can share ideas. Brainstorm how to find employment opportunities.
- Rebuild your self-esteem. Describe the things you've done in the past year that you like yourself for doing
- Write a detailed description of what you do well. Practice talking about your reliable strengths.
- Discover something of value in your experience. What have you learned? How has it made you a stronger, better person?

- Make finding a job a job. Most job openings are never advertised. Find out what is happening in places where you would like to work.
- Focus on the employer's needs more than your own. Find a position you would like and research what the managers need.
- Customise your application to fit exactly with what this employer needs. They must see you as uniquely qualified for the position.
- Before your job interview take a few minutes to meditate on your past successes and reliable skills. Make the interview about how you want to help them.
- Be persistent. Be open to unexpected opportunities. Keep taking care of yourself and your health.

Let's return to the original theme. People can choose to be resourceful rather than resentful when managing challenging situations. They can then re-energise themselves and do their best to achieve the desired results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Resourceful Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

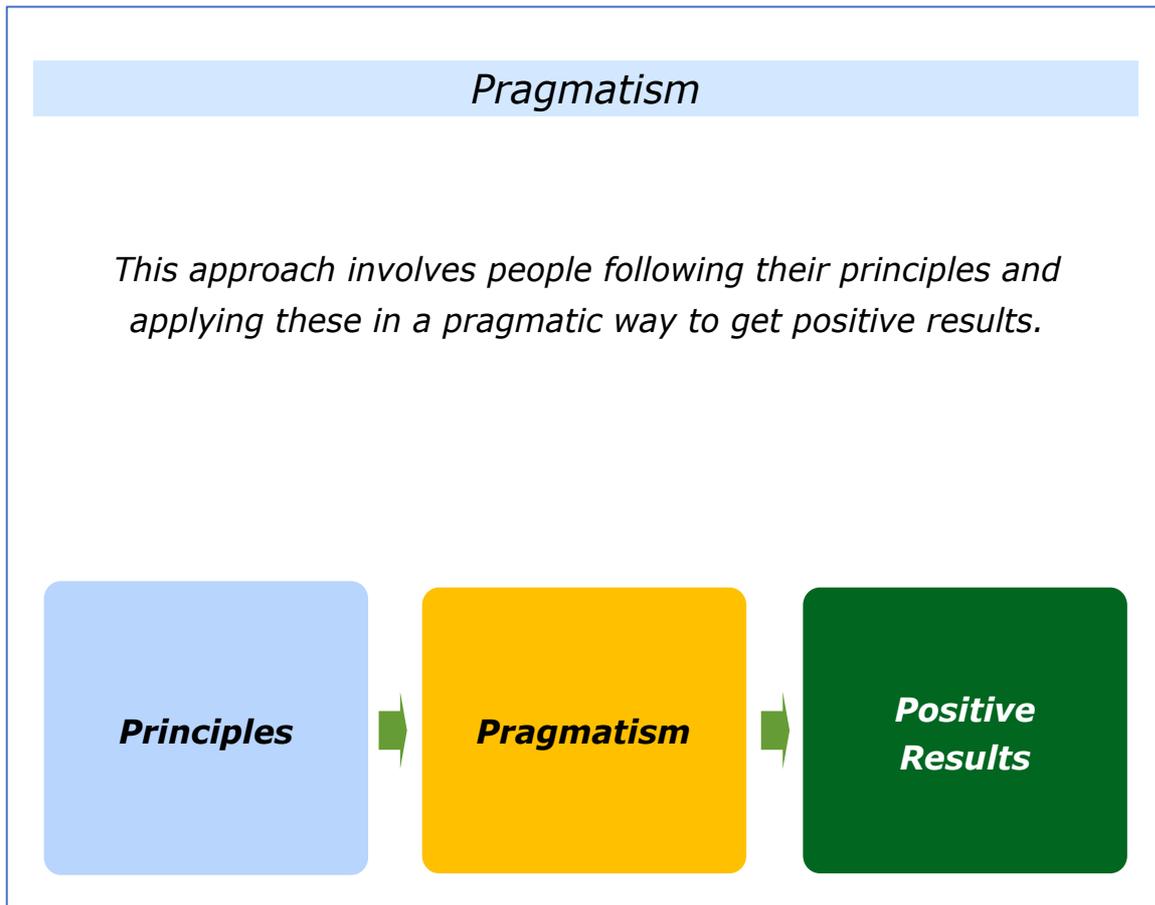

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Principles, Pragmatism And Positive Results Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. This approach involves people following their principles and applying these in a pragmatic way to get positive results. Let's explore these themes.

Principles

Great workers often believe in following certain principles in their work. These provide a compass they can follow: a) to clarify their strategy; b) to perform superb work; c) to do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Such workers also aim to follow these principles - rather than abandon them - when faced by certain scenarios. They focus how to do this when building on successes and also when managing setbacks.

During the past fifty years I have worked with many individuals, teams and organisations that have taken this step. Let's consider how they make this happen.

Some start by focusing on their purpose and then clarifying the principles they want to follow. As we know, many people who work in the services businesses have a similar purpose. They aim:

To build on their strengths and help their stakeholders to achieve success.

Different people describe this in different ways but it is a common theme. Bearing in mind their purpose, such workers then clarify the principles they want to follow to achieve their goals.

There are many ways to take this step. Some focus on their positive history and take the following steps:

They clarify when they have performed successfully in the past;

They clarify the principles they followed then – and how they translated these into action – to perform successfully;

They clarify how they can follow these principles – and express these in a modern way – to perform successfully in the future.

This is just one approach that individuals, teams and organisations take to clarifying their principles. Whatever approach they take, however, they often follow common themes.

People in non-profit organisations, for example, sometimes focus on the following themes. They clarify how they can care for their people, their products and their planet.

People in other organisations may settle on other principles. They may pursue some of the following sets of themes. They may aim:

To do work that is enjoyable, effective and excellent;

To be positive, professional and deliver peak performances;

To get wins for their company, wins for their customers and wins for their colleagues.

Different people choose different ways to settle on their principles. The following pages describe some of the exercises that I have seen work with teams and organisations. They take the following steps:

They clarify the key principles they want to follow in their work and how they can translate each of these principles into action;

They clarify the potential pluses and minuses involves in aiming to follow these principles;

They clarify how they can build on the pluses and minimise the consequences of any potential minuses.

People who are serious about following the principles t approach take time to do such exercises. They then keep referring back to these principles when making key decisions. This is a topic we will explore in the section on pragmatism. Here are the exercises.

The Principles

The principles we want to follow in our work and how we can translate these into action.

The Principles We Want To Follow In Our Work

We Want:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The First Principle We Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things we can do to translate this principle into action are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Second Principle We Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things we can do to translate this principle into action are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Third Principle We Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things we can do to translate this principle into action are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Potential Pluses Of Following These Principles Are:

*

*

*

The Potential Minuses Of Following These Principles May Be:

*

*

*

The Specific Things We Can Do To Build On The Pluses And Minimise The Consequences Of Any Minuses Are:

*

*

*

Pragmatism

Great workers continue to follow their principles and deliver high professional standards. They keep following good habits on the way towards achieving their picture of success.

Some leaders, for example, encourage their people to do this by showing what good looks like. They catch people doing things right and also keep producing success stories. Such leaders take the following steps:

They highlight when people have followed the principles and delivered success;

They highlight the specific things people did to translate the principles into action;

They highlight how people can continue to follow the principles to increase the chances of delivering future success.

Good organisations, for example, aim to follow their principles and do their best to deliver the goods. There may be times, however, when they experience situations that challenge the principles.

They may encounter problems in the market, be beaten by new competitors, lose good people or find some staff are behaving in toxic ways cause collateral damage.

Good organisations continue to follow their principles. They aim to apply these in a pragmatic way, however, in order to get positive results. There are many definitions for being pragmatic. One definition is:

To do things in a practical and realistic way that works.

Good organisations aim to keep following their principles because these may be the only constants in a changing world. The ways they apply these may call for being pragmatic, however, to get the desired positive results.

Such organisations therefore explore certain themes when faced by a challenge. They may ask themselves the following questions.

What are the principles we want to follow in our work? What are the things that work in this kind of situation? How can we follow our principles in a way that is most likely to work in this situation?

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Sometimes the potential solutions do not appear straight away. Whenever possible, however, it is important to focus on the next step.

Positive Results

Great workers often follow the principles approach in a pragmatic way and do their best to get positive results. The following section looks at how two organisations translated this approach into action.

The Principles Approach During The Pandemic

One company began by taking care of its people during the pandemic. They provided practical support and also guaranteed their wages. They continued to do this for six months after the pandemic had subsided.

The company also refocused on their principles and used these to shape a positive future. The company believed in playing to their strengths, doing superb work and helping their stakeholders to achieve success.

Bearing this in mind, the leadership team needed to make some key decisions. During the previous three years the company had acquired several other businesses. This approach had not always been successful.

The enterprise had become unwieldy and this resulted in a drop in quality. There were also several challenges regarding how to work with the founders of the businesses they had acquired.

The leadership team therefore focused on how to enable the company to shape a positive future. This involved them returning to the principle of building on their strengths. They explored the following themes.

Shaping A Positive Future

Strengths

Bearing in mind our strengths, if we were starting the business again today what would we do? What would be the products and services we would offer? How could these help our customers to achieve success?

Specific Customers

Who are the kinds of customers with whom we work best? How could we continue to work with these and also find similar customers? What are the kinds of challenges these customers may face now and in the future?

Success

How could we use our strengths to help these customers to achieve success? How could we realign our business to make this happen? How could we put the right people in the right places to deliver success?

The leadership team spent several days exploring these themes before settling on their strategy. This involved following the principles of aiming; a) to care for their people during the pandemic and for a period beyond; b) to shape a positive future for the company.

The company returned to doing what it did best. This involved playing to its strengths, focusing on certain kinds of customers and helping them to achieve success.

The core strategy was relatively simple to implement. The harder parts involved selling some businesses they had acquired and helping some people to move on in, as far as possible, a positive way.

The company managed to navigate the challenging times, however, and emerged stronger. They did so by asking:

"How can we follow our principles in this situation? How can we do this in a way that is likely to work? How can we encourage the people who will be here in the future? How can we help the people who will move on? How can we do our best to shape a positive future for the company?"

Great workers gain strength from using their principles as a guiding compass. This helps them to make key decisions. Let's look at another example of where this was the case.

The Principles Approach To Protecting The Positive Environment

The CEO of a professional services faced a dilemma regarding a key member of staff who was causing collateral damage. Six months previously the leadership team had defined the principles they wanted the company to follow in the future. These included the following:

To create a positive working environment in which motivated people can perform superb work;

To be professional in the way we behave towards our clients and each other;

To provide services that help our clients to achieve their personal or professional goals.

The leadership team had shared these with their people. They described how the principles had emerged from focusing on when people in the company had done superb work. They then asked people:

"Do you recognise yourselves in the principles? Do you want to add any other ideas?"

The leadership team invited everybody to do exercises on how people could translate the principles into action. They then got some early wins by implementing some of these ideas – particularly those around creating a positive working environment.

The CEO explained this background and then described their dilemma. They summarised this in the following way.

"One relatively senior person is causing problems. They were actually quite active during the principles session and came up with some ideas. But since then some of their behaviour has upset people.

"The person has previously been key to our business. They have specialist knowledge but tend to keep it to themselves. During the past couple of months they have also upset several people in the team.

"People sometimes approach the person to get help with certain things but often get an off-putting response. This has led to people feeling uncertain and going to other senior leaders for help.

"The person in question also keeps asking for pay rises which they believe they are worth. They do this in a demanding way, however, which puts us in a corner.

"They sometimes state their case by bigging-up their own efforts and criticising other people in the team. This does not help them or other people.

"We know what we ought to do. The hard part is knowing how to do it in a way that does not hurt the company."

Bearing in mind the company's principles, we focused on the key priorities going forwards. These included the following:

To maintain the positive environment and protect the people who were behaving in a professional way;

To protect the company by one of the partners temporarily taking over the specific area presently dominated by the difficult person;

To put in place a robust back-up plan that would compensate for the person's specialist knowledge;

To meet with the person to invite them to decide if they wanted to follow the principles of being positive and professional in their dealings with people inside the company;

To put in place the correct HR procedures in case the person chose to continue to cause collateral damage.

The company behaved in a professional way to protect the company and their people. They did this by giving the person chance to say if they were prepared to follow the principles. The person reacted by choosing to behave as if they were the victim.

The company then took the steps mentioned. A partner took over that part of the business and effectively side-lined the person. This eventually resulted in coming to an agreement with the person that it was better for them to move on. This was done in, as far as possible, a moral way.

The CEO later reflected that there had been many warning signs with the person and they should have acted earlier. The end result was that many people were relieved, however, and continued to enjoy working in the positive environment.

Great workers often follow their principles in a pragmatic way in challenging situations. They then follow the strategy that is most likely to work and, as far as possible, get positive results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Principles, Pragmatism And Positive Results Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then focus on the chosen principles and apply these in a pragmatic way to get positive results are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

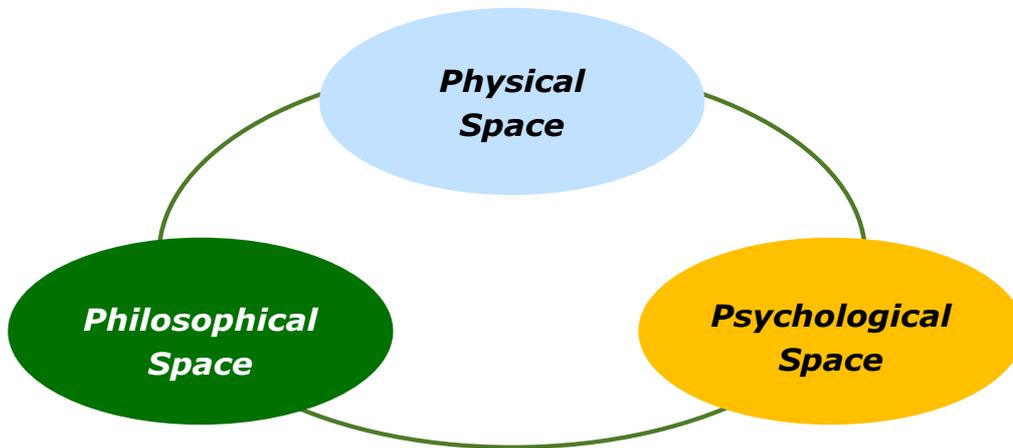

*

*

The Creating Space In Your Life Approach

The Space Approach

Every living thing needs space to live and grow. Human beings are more likely to develop when they feel they can be themselves and have the physical, psychological and philosophical space to grow.

Looking back on your life, when you do feel you have had space to grow? When have you felt it was okay to be yourself? How do you give other people the encourage and space to space develop?

Every living thing needs space to live and grow. Human beings are more likely to develop when they feel:

They can shape their lives, care for their loved ones and use their personal and professional talents;

They can be themselves and have the physical, psychological and philosophical space to grow;

They can help other people and make a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

People often feel driven to find or create a space where they can be themselves. This is not just a modern cliché where people talk about wanting space.

They have emigrated to new lands where they can have freedom to live, think and as they wish. They have chosen to live alone rather be in relationships that are imprisoning. They have moved to professional roles where they could use their talents rather than be in painful cultures.

The following pages describe an exercise I used to give on workshops that helped people to use their talents. This involved giving each person a long roll of paper which they spread on the floor. They were then invited to do the following things.

To map out the years they had lived in their life and also how long they would like to live in the future;

To draw how much space they felt they had during each stage of their lives and to note what was happening that those stages;

To recognise that this feeling of space is subjective – they could maybe have chosen to manage their experience in a different way – but it was important for them draw what it felt like;

To look ahead and describe how they wanted to create space for themselves – and make good use of it – in the future;

To clarify how they could encourage other people in their lives to be themselves and create space to grow.

The final part was important because some people could feel it was indulgent to focus only on their lives. It was good to explore how they could use what they had learned to encourage other people to grow.

The following pages provide an introduction to the exercise. It also includes examples of what one person wrote.

*Draw How Much Space You Feel
You Have Had In Your Life*

The following pages give you the chance draw how much space you feel you have had in your life. This will be subject, of course, but it can be useful to do this exercise.

You can then focus on how much space you want to create for yourself and for others to be themselves in life.

The space I have felt I have had to be myself in my life – together with the reasons why - has been the following.

0

Happy childhood. All seemed well. Dad worked for a big company and we moved around the world.

10

I was good at both the arts and sport, so made it easy to fit into new schools. I enjoyed exploring in all ways.

Still felt free when playing sports, dancing and doing theatre at school.

Mum and Dad separated. Got a new step parent. They tried to discipline me and I began to lose confidence.

15

Began to hang out with different types of people – artists, bikers and others.

Fighting with my step parent. Began to show symptoms of stress.

20

School suffered, but enjoyed feeling free with these people. Got into a few scrapes.

Left home.
Went to Uni.
Had a series of relationships.

25

Did not follow my instincts about what to study at Uni. Left after a year.

Had a three year relationship that eventually became restrictive.

Moved to London. Lived in a squat. Sold tickets on a theatre box office. Eventually managed to get a few roles.

Joined what proved to be a cult.

30

Got a job organising events. Enjoyed it – because it combined theatre and outdoor activities.

Left the cult.
Built a relationship with a partner who encouraged me.

35

Became a project manager and then director for an arts company. Love my job.

We adopted children. This meant we were busy, but I loved it.

40

Making plans to take care of my Mum as she gets older. She has always encouraged me.

Had a health scare. The treatment took time, but now okay.

Feel a new lease of life. Looking forward to the future.

45

50

55

60

65

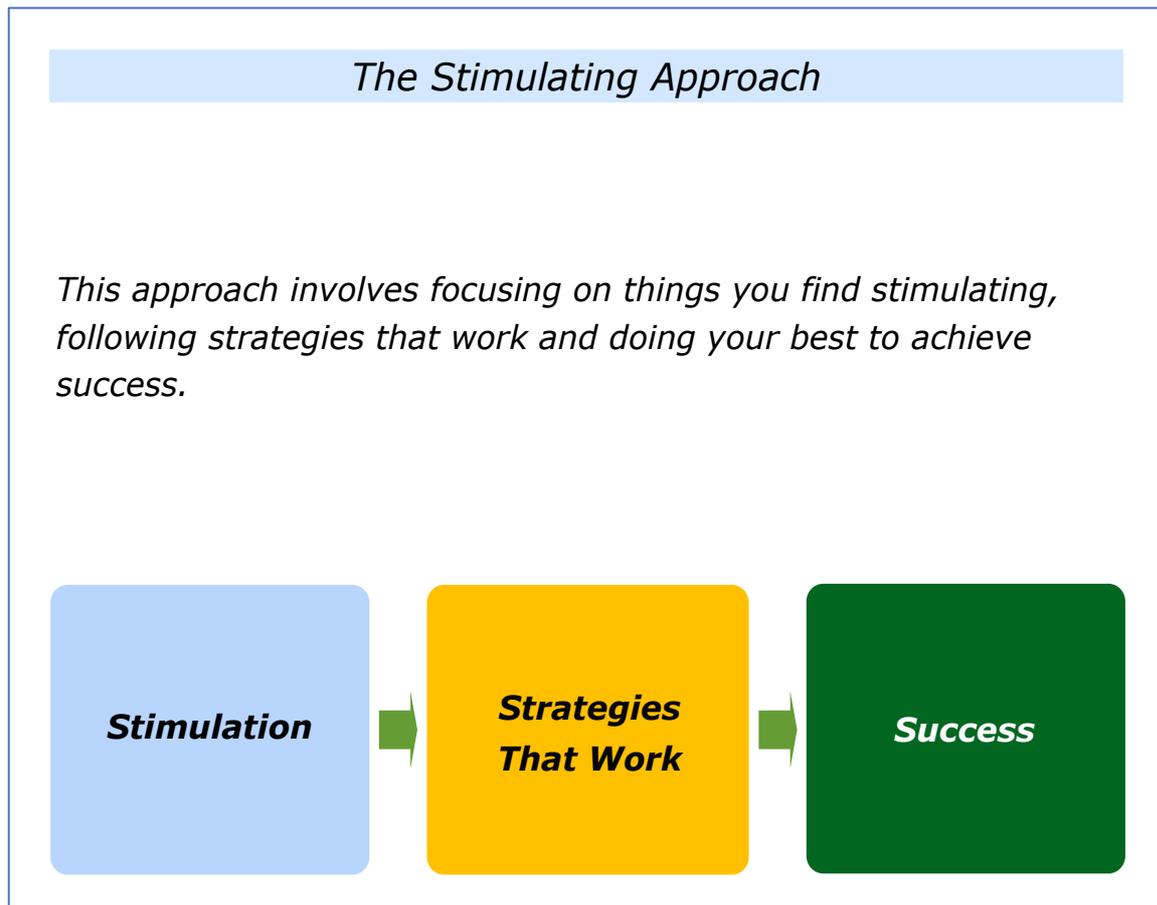

70

75

80

85 And Onwards

The Stimulating Approach

This approach is used by people who want to maintain their zest for life, be creative or find a new purpose. It is used by artists, song writers, designers and people from all walks of life.

The key is for a person to build on their strengths and do things they find stimulating. They will then be prepared to put in the equivalent of sweat and stretch themselves when doing superb work.

This approach is different from a person continually doing work that strains their body and soul. That is possible to do for a short time but doing so for longer can cause damage.

Different people pursue the stimulation approach in different ways. One model involves pursuing the following steps.

Stimulation

Stimulation

The specific things that I find stimulating in my life and work are:

*

*

*

A person may start by focusing on the things that they find stimulating in their life or work. They may also do things that increases the possibility of them getting stimulation. They may go for a walk, listen to music, sleep or do another activity.

Some people get inspiration from their equivalent of a wellspring. Like a spring or the source of a river, this is where things can sometimes start. This can lead to them getting ideas about what they do next.

Some people visit their equivalent of a muse. Here are some dictionary explanations of this concept.

The Muses were nine goddesses who were believed to give encouragement in different areas of literature, art and music. A person about to begin work would call on their particular Muse to inspire them.

A muse may also be one's special creative spirit. It can also be an imaginary force that gives ideas and helps you to write, paint or make music. It can also be a physical representation of this force.

A person may also find that serendipity plays a part in getting stimulation. They may hear a chance remark or experience something that sparks their imagination.

You will have your own approach to getting inspiration. If you wish, try exploring the following question.

What are the specific activities where you are more likely to get stimulation?

You may be listening to music, walking, appreciating beauty, studying success or experiencing other things. You may be doing certain things that give you positive energy. You may be writing, painting, cooking, encouraging people, designing things or doing other activities.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Stimulation

The specific activities I do where I sometimes get stimulation are:

*

*

*

The specific situations where I sometimes get stimulation are:

*

*

*

The specific steps I can take to do more of these activities or to put myself into more of these situations are:

*

*

*

Let's look at one person who focused on doing things she found stimulating. Katrina Sutcliffe was about to move to Bali to set up a yoga centre but this was stopped by Covid.

Running sessions via Zoom, she began combining these with her love for netball. This led to running yoga sessions for netball teams. These were much appreciated by the players. Katrina has gone on to offer these to other athletes. Here is an excerpt from her website.

About 7 years ago I accidentally fell in love with Yoga. I've always been extremely active, juggling everything from ultra-running to surfing, and netball, to rock climbing and whilst yoga began as just 'another sport', it quickly became so much more.

Our breath is our life force, and in Yoga and Meditation it is the magical rhythm that moves our body and mind. I believe that what we learn on the mat – focus, introspection, opening our heart, awareness, stillness, challenge – we take with us into the world.

My classes are focused on this connection between movement and breath, and encourage my students to be authentic and intuitive in their practice.

My Vinyasa/ Rocket sequences are creative, strong and playful but I also teach Slow Flow and Restorative Yoga as I believe there is balance in variety.

In a time like this, it is a gift to be able to share yoga online, to move and breathe with people all over the world.

Strategies That Work

Imagine that a person wants to channel their inspiration into doing a specific activity. They may want to pursue their love for writing, gardening, counselling, designing, fixing a problem or doing another activity.

The next step may be to translate this into doing a stimulating project and following strategies that work. Bearing this in mind, they may aim:

To clarify their picture of success;

To clarify the benefits of achieving the picture of success;

To clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving success.

How to clarify the strategies that will work? One approach is to study success. Bearing in mind the results they want to achieve, the person can explore the following themes.

They can learn from their own positive history

Looking back, they can recall when they have tackled a similar challenge successfully. What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – to tackle their chosen project successfully?

They can learn from other people's positive history

Looking around the world, are there any people who have done similar work successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can the person follow similar principles in their own way to tackle their chosen project successfully?

They can think strategically

Looking at their chosen project, they can ask themselves the usual strategic questions. These are the following.

What are the real results I want to achieve? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I translate this into a clear action plan and do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Different people choose to follow different strategies that work. Many build on their strengths and follow their successful patterns. Let's look at one person who took this route.

Mark Evans is known in the UK for his work as a vet and making films about wildlife. He also loves renovating cars and Land Rovers. Mark explains his passion for vehicles in the following way.

MARK THE VET

MARK THE SCIENCE EXPLORER

MARK THE PETROL HEAD

News
Mark's latest news
Read more

TV
Mark on TV
Read more

Corporate
Mark helping business

Gallery
Mark's photos and video clips

I have always loved diesel engines ever since making their acquaintance as a young lad obsessed by tractors.

I learned to drive on a Massey Ferguson 135 when I was about 13 and, to this day, the faintest whiff of red diesel mixed with hydraulic fluid and harvesting dust brings back a tsunami of very happy memories of my early days as a farmhand.

It's why I am so drawn to sniffing tractors whenever I get the chance. Is it just me? With a bit of filtering to get rid of the cod, batter and bits of saveloy, my Land Rover would happily rock along fuelled by the waste oil from my local chippy.

Mark chose to make a series of TV programmes about renovating vehicles. Being savvy, he followed the strategies that work. These involved him aiming:

To follow his passion and translate this into doing a stimulating project;

To turn this project into something that would be attractive to potential backers – such as a TV company – and a specific target audience that watches TV;

To make top class TV programmes that appeal to the target audience and also provide good returns for the backers.

Mark has continued to do things he find stimulating and follow strategies. People who take these steps are more likely to move on the next stage.

Success

Different people follow their strategies in different ways on the ways towards success. Some set aside blocks of times to do deep work on their chosen project. They then follow their successful style of working.

Some people follow a certain rhythm. They manage their energy to make use of their prime times – the times of the day when they have most energy – and make full use of these times.

Such people set reachable goals for the session and go through the stages of absorption, adventure and achievement. They get successes on the way towards achieving the long-term goals.

Such people also manage their energy properly. They recognise that it can be good to follow a certain rhythm but also build in time for rest, recovery and rejuvenation. Rehearsing what they are going to do next, they then throw themselves back into doing the work.

They also aim to enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goals. This is why it is important to get some ongoing wins on the way towards achieving the overall picture of success.

As mentioned earlier, different people choose different ways to go through the stages of stimulation, shaping and success. The following pages describe the route taken by one person. It is a long story, but well worth reading.

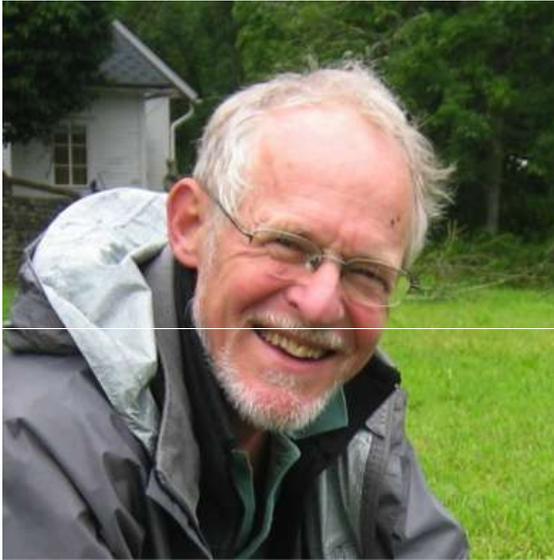

Archie Duncanson and I met more than 40 years ago when he attended a workshop in Sweden. He later translated his passion about the environment into publishing a book.

Here is some background to his book. This is followed by Archie writing his own story. I am reproducing it here in full, because it shows what can sometimes be a long but rewarding road towards achieving success.

Background

Ecologist Archie Duncanson set his heart on being a writer when he was a boy. Disappointed by his teenage attempts at fiction, he gave up. Then, driven by his passion for the environment, he finally committed pen to paper and wrote his first book at the age of 40.

First published in 1989 is recognised as a standard reference book for people who want to make simple changes in their lives at home.

Read it in one sitting and fell in love with it ... fun, immediately rewarding, and easy enough to do right this minute.

Community Regeneration, Rodale Institute, USA, 1990.

An essential guide to low-impact living ... easy steps we can all take at home to reduce our impact on the planet.

Friends of the Earth, Scotland, 2006.

The most important single book any citizen of the planet can read on environmental issues... amazingly clear and simple ... immensely empowering ... bursting with creativity and the fun of exploring.

Pierre Pradervand, author of The Gentle Art of Blessing, in Cygnus Books reviews, April 2009.

Archie's Story

As a boy I admired many writers and wanted to be like them. One was Thomas Paine who wrote essays on democracy at the time of the American Revolution. I admired him for speaking out for what he believed in.

At the age of 13 I had nothing revolutionary to write about, so I tried to write a short story. I didn't get very far—nothing came!

So I concluded that I wasn't meant to be a writer and gave up. I became an engineer instead and enjoyed being creative in design and analysis.

As for writing, when I was far from home I wrote long letters to family and friends, giving a travelogue and sharing my reflections with them.

I always enjoyed the writing - it gave me the feeling of having a conversation with a like-minded soul.

The years went by and still I felt I had little special to share, apart from my engineering work with colleagues.

Then one day a friend who was part of an amateur poetry circle said they were putting out a little booklet of poetry, and asked if I would I like to do some drawings to illustrate the poems.

Despite apprehension and worry about criticism, I decided to give it a go. I had fun using my imagination and coming up with interesting drawings and I got only positive feedback. Thus at age 40 I took my first step out into the public eye.

Discouraged With The World, I Decided To Act

About this time, I became very discouraged with the world's problems, especially the environment, and with what politicians and authorities were doing to solve them.

Nothing was happening; the environment was getting worse, not better! Out of this discouragement I one day decided to act and see if I couldn't do something on a very small scale at home in my own little private world.

I set about trying to reduce my garbage – and succeeded, step by step! Then I began cutting down my laundry detergent, other chemicals and electricity. I repaired things instead of throwing them away.

I bought higher quality: fresh organic vegetables, cloth table napkins instead of paper, and other things that last. My life began feeling it had more quality and yet I saved money and pollution.

I was so satisfied with my experiments and results that I wanted to share them with others! But I wasn't ready for a book yet. You might be, but I lacked the confidence.

So I took a smaller step, I wrote a three page letter describing what I was doing, how anybody could do similar things, and how satisfying it was – that we can each affect the big world problems with garbage, chemicals and energy by doing our part at home.

I made one hundred copies and sent them out to friends all over the world.

Soon I got back many positive replies. Friends liked the ideas and the fact that I had actually done something, rather than just thinking about it. My friend Carol wrote back:

"Someone should write a book telling us what to buy, what to eat, etc. for the good of the environment."

My eyes fastened upon the word 'someone' and I thought: I could do that. The more I thought about it, the more I felt I was just the right 'someone'.

I had the personal experience, I had the pedagogical skills to explain things simply and I had the desire.

I Decided To Share My Experiences

I put together an outline of the subjects I wanted to include in my little handbook for living 'environmentally friendly' – garbage, chemicals, food, clothes, the car, etc. I kept my list short because my intention was not to write an all-inclusive reference book.

It was to enthuse and inspire into action others who were discouraged as I had been.

I simply wanted to say, look, it's easy to solve the world's big problems, just start with your own share at home!

With that purpose I began writing, subject by subject. Instead of talking problems I gave example after example of my solutions.

Using my experiences as a teacher drawing on the blackboard, I used simple diagrams, pictures and tables to get the message across straight-away without a lot of words.

I kept it simple and made it fun, which was not hard since I myself had experimented with enthusiasm and watched my results grow with joy and satisfaction.

When I went to the library in the 1980's to learn more, I noticed that most of the books on the environment were disheartening.

They detailed fully the overwhelming nature of the problems and solutions were described as being dependent on everyone changing their habits ("If everyone would take public transport to work instead of the car...") which seemed unrealistic, if not impossible.

Most books were several hundred pages long, filled with small print that made green living seem like a difficult science in which you could make many mistakes if you were not careful.

I saw my task as that of a good teacher, to provide the essentials in a given short time, and to make it enjoyable and interesting as well as useful.

With this vision in mind, I had to rewrite some sections of my text again and over again many times until I felt satisfied.

The section on the car was the most difficult; I so easily fell into blaming the manufacturers and the oil industry. I had to step back and ask myself:

"What had I written that was new and interesting, that added to the positive alternatives and not just to the blame?"

I knew that I did not have all the answers, but wanted to share the best of the ones I did have.

So my approach to the car was to tell how happy and satisfied I felt every time I saved a litre of petrol by riding my bike or walking to the shops.

When I had a rough draft of the whole book, I showed it to friends. My reviewing friends were both encouraging and helpful in their comments.

Out of our discussions came new ideas for solving environmental problems in daily life and new thoughts about how to present the material to beginners.

I am grateful still today for all the support that people gave me.

Finally, I was done to my own satisfaction. My story was told to the best of my ability and illustrated with my own drawings. I was ready to go to print.

Publishing My Book And Bringing It Home!

It came as a revelation to me that any person anywhere can go to a print shop and, for a fee, pay to have their manuscript printed and bound as a book!

In fact, most books throughout history were published privately, until the last century or so, when publishing houses came to dominate!

I did not have the confidence to go to a publisher, so instead went to a special place in Stockholm.

This was the Writer's Book Machine (Forfattares Bokmaskin), a non-profit cooperative print shop where the author prints his or her book cheaply by doing much of the work themselves.

This called for doing the layout, mounting, collating, binding, trimming – everything except the actual printing.

They were very helpful and I learned how to make a book. When I did the binding, which required handling each copy many times, I felt like an artisan from an earlier century.

It strengthened the feeling that my book was a personal gift to each reader as well as to the world.

It is hard to describe the feeling I had when I brought the first printing of 500 copies home. After living with it for a year so intensively, like a pregnancy, here was my ecology book now in my hand!

As I looked at it, it almost seemed as if a stranger had produced it, and I could not fully comprehend that I had had the perseverance to handle all the thousand and one details that went into its making.

But, like finishing college or running a marathon, I had concentrated on one step at a time, and kept at it until I reached my goal. Like Pooh Bear, I felt very satisfied with myself.

Spreading The Book In The World

I had no publisher to do the selling and advertising, so I sent the book out to magazines and newspapers in Sweden where I lived.

I quickly got an excellent review in a popular green magazine, whose editor even offered to help me by selling the book via the magazine. Despite the fact that the book was in English (a foreign language in Sweden), it received many glowing reviews.

They liked its simplicity, positive attitude, practicality, and that it offered the reader a chance to make a difference. I was aglow! All my dreams had come true! I had succeeded!

From the magazine articles, people wrote or called me to order the book. I sold it for a low price to encourage its spread and usually sent them off the same day.

I began translating the text into Swedish so that it would be in the reader's native language. The Swedish edition came out 4 months later, published at the same place. This time I dared to produce a thousand copies. They sold like hotcakes.

After a very fine review in the Swedish Library Journal, virtually every library in the country ordered it, so I went back and this time printed four thousand copies.

The binding and trimming wasn't quite as thrilling as the first time, but still very satisfying knowing that every reader, even in a public library, was receiving a personal gift directly from me.

Soon invitations were coming in from schools, communities and environmental organizations to talk about the ideas in the book. I had a lot of fun giving talks and meeting some of my readers and others who thought in the same way as I did.

It also gave joy and satisfaction, confirming my belief that people truly want to care for the planet - they just need to know that what they do makes a difference - and a little basic info on how to make better choices.

I loved telling about my many composting failures (before I got it right) and demonstrating how to cook spaghetti and pasta without extra water, saving half or more of the cooking energy.

I showed slides from my home experiments and displayed gadgets that I had made.

I summarised my message with a one page handout titled "Archie's Eco-Checklist", which gave examples from my actions in the areas of garbage, chemicals, energy and food for the reader to check-off when they had tried them.

Within a year the book and its ideas were all over Sweden, spreading the joy and satisfaction of personal environmental responsibility to homes, day care centres and schools.

I also sent the book to international environmental organisations and to magazines in America, but with no response at all.

With a slight touch of bravado, I sent it off in 1989 to President Ronald Reagan, Soviet Premier Michael Gorbach, several European heads of state, Prince Charles of Britain and to the King of Sweden!

The book spread slowly in other countries through friends abroad and readers with international contacts. Due to the difficulty of selling internationally, I decided to send out free copies whenever requests came in.

Over the years I sent out more than a thousand free copies of the English edition to interested individuals around the world.

Some wrote back describing their use of the book in environmental education, which was satisfying for me. My address was in the back of the book, and I made many interesting acquaintances through this work.

In the U.S., I printed a separate edition and with the help of my sisters and friends sold about 500 copies but eventually gave away the rest. Without my presence and without distribution channels, the book never took off as it had in Sweden.

In my innocence I relied on individuals and NGOs to help me spread the book with its ideas, as had happened in Sweden. I had hoped environmental organisations would sponsor cheap translations and local non-commercial editions in different countries.

Stubbornly, I refused all offers for commercial editions and so lost many possible translations, with all of their potential readers.

After six years of working with the book in Sweden, demand abruptly died off in 1997 and I had to look for other work. That was OK, because it had done its job in Sweden and I was ready for a change.

But I was not quite satisfied because I still had many copies in English in my cellar and it had never gotten off the ground outside of Sweden.

As I took up other employment, I decided to give all remaining copies to libraries and schools. I began sending them out to universities and public libraries in the U.S. Some appreciated the gift, but from most I never heard anything.

Finishing A Dream

Five years and many library copies later, I got the idea to put the book on Internet – then the modern way to distribute information. There it would be available instantly to the entire world! It would also save me a lot of postage and trouble.

So I began revising the book for the Internet because by now 14 years had passed since the original edition, and there was room for many additions and improvements.

Still, much of the text stood the test of time, I believed, and the book could yet serve as an easily readable and practical introduction to living with fewer resources and less impact on the earth.

Just as I finished revising the book for Internet, and being a different person now, it occurred to me, wouldn't an international publisher be able to spread the book and its message even better?

I decided to give it a try, and sent the manuscript to five likely publishers. One responded positively, Green Books in the U.K., the people who put out publications by E. F. Schumacher, one of my inspirers.

I came to agreement with Green Books and rewrote the book with their editorial help to meet the British audience in the year 2004.

I was happy, but still not quite satisfied, because it was not readily available outside of Britain, and freight charges made it expensive. So I decided to finish my idea of putting it up on Internet, to which Green Books generously agreed. A few weeks later it was up for free download.

At Last: Peace, Joy And Satisfaction

Now, at last, I can relax, satisfied and peaceful. My work is done, my gift given. I have come to understand that what matters most in life is to give our gifts, whatever they are.

If I hold back, I feel stingy and unfulfilled – out of nothing comes nothing. When I give, I create something where before there was nothing.

I plant a seed that can grow into something and may someday give back - either to me or to someone else.

I have learned that I must believe in myself and dare to do what feels right in my life, day by day, action by little action. Each time I do that, I experience the satisfaction it gives at the time, and then with its memory even in all the years to come.

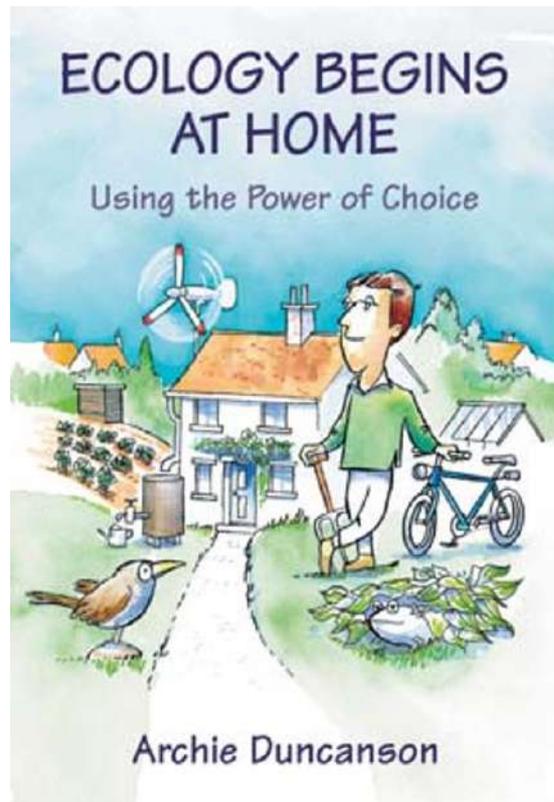

And like a seed, the gift may grow, providing ever more joy and satisfaction, as it did with my first letter titled Ecology Begins at Home and sent out to a hundred friends.

When a dream, big or small, arises in your mind, seize the opportunity.

Believe in yourself, in your own uniqueness, in your own special way of doing things, with your own something special to give to the world.

Publishing my book, and doing it myself, with my own hands at the Writer's Book Machine, has meant more to me than anything else I have done in life, except being a father and teaching.

Were I to die tomorrow, my life would be complete – my book is out, my message said, my gift given. Let me encourage you to do the same!

The most genially simple and concrete guide to practical ecology out today. Should be spread in massive editions, not the least to children, who easily understand it and who are usually less habit-bound than we adults.

Swedish Library Service 1990.

The best book yet on how to green your lifestyle ...makes the whole subject very clear and understandable.

Permaculture Magazine UK, 2005.

Different people generate their zest for life in different ways. One approach is for them to do things they find stimulating. It is then to translate these into shaping a satisfying project and working to achieve their definition of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some elements of the stimulating approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stimulating Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow the stimulating approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow the stimulating approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Development Approaches

The following section focuses on how teams and individuals can continue to develop. It also explores how it is possible to help people to develop.

Team Development

The following section focuses on how teams can continue to develop.

The Star Team Approach Rather Than The Team Of Stars Approach

The Star Team Approach Rather Than The Team Of Stars Approach

Star Teams have a clear picture of success. They are made up of people who have certain strengths, embody the team's spirit and want to contribute to achieving the team's goals. They take the following steps.

- They clarify the specific goal and the strategies they can follow to achieve the picture of success;*
- They clarify people's best contributions and coordinate their strengths to work towards achieving the picture of success;*
- They continue to do superb work, find solutions to challenges and do their best to achieve the picture of success.*

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to build a star team rather than a team of stars. This piece focuses on the well-known concept that:

A star team may consistently perform better than a team of stars.

This is because people in star teams coordinate their strengths to consistently perform superb work. A team of stars will occasionally produce moments of brilliance but they may not do this consistently.

People in star teams aim to make their best contributions towards achieving the team's goals. People in a team of stars may sometimes pursue their own agendas at the expense of achieving the team's goals.

A team of stars can do great work. But it involves them choosing to combine their strengths to help the team to achieve its goals.

Star teams have a clear picture of success. They then focus on the following themes.

They Focus On Their People

They recognise it is vital to have the right people in the right places to enable the team to achieve its goals. They are made up of people who demonstrate certain characteristics.

They employ people: a) who have certain strengths; b) who embody the team's spirit; c) who, most of all, want to contribute to achieving the team's goal. Let's explore these themes.

They employ people who have certain strengths

Star teams employ people who have certain strengths. There are many ways to apply this approach when employing or recruiting people. The following pages explore some of these approaches.

The Strengths We Need For Achieving The Picture Of Success Approach

Some teams do the following exercise to make sure they have the strengths required to achieve their goals.

They clarify the strengths that the team needs to achieve the picture of success;

They clarify the strengths they already have in the team to help them to achieve the picture of success;

They clarify the strengths they need to add to the team to help them to achieve the picture of success.

Strengths For Achieving

The Picture Of Success

The strengths we need in the team to help us to achieve the picture of success are people who:

- *
*
*

The strengths we already have in the team to help us achieve the picture of success are people who:

- *
*
*

The strengths we may need to add to the team to help us to achieve the picture of success are people who:

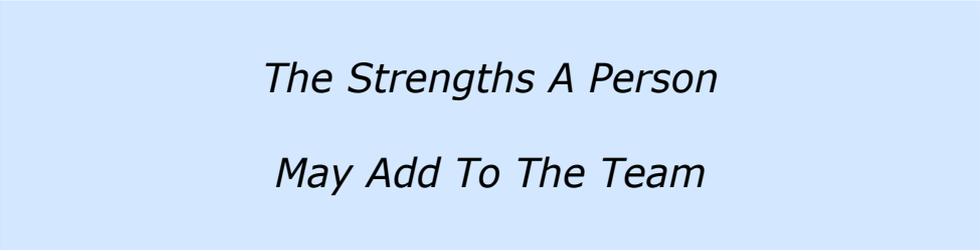

- *
*
*

The Strengths A Person May Add To The Team Approach

Star teams sometimes take another approach when considering people they can add to the team. This involves them exploring the following questions when focusing on a potential team member.

What are the person's strengths - the activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. How could they and we build on their strengths to help the team to achieve its goals?

What may be the potential pluses and minuses involved in employing the person? Bearing in mind these answers, do we want to move forward and explore the possibilities of the person contributing to the team?

The Strengths A Person May Add To The Team

The person's strengths – the specific activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs - are:

- *
- *
- *

The specific things they and we could do to build on their strengths to help the team achieve its goals are:

- *
- *
- *

The specific things we want to do regarding whether or not to explore the possibility of the person contributing to the team are:

- *
- *
- *

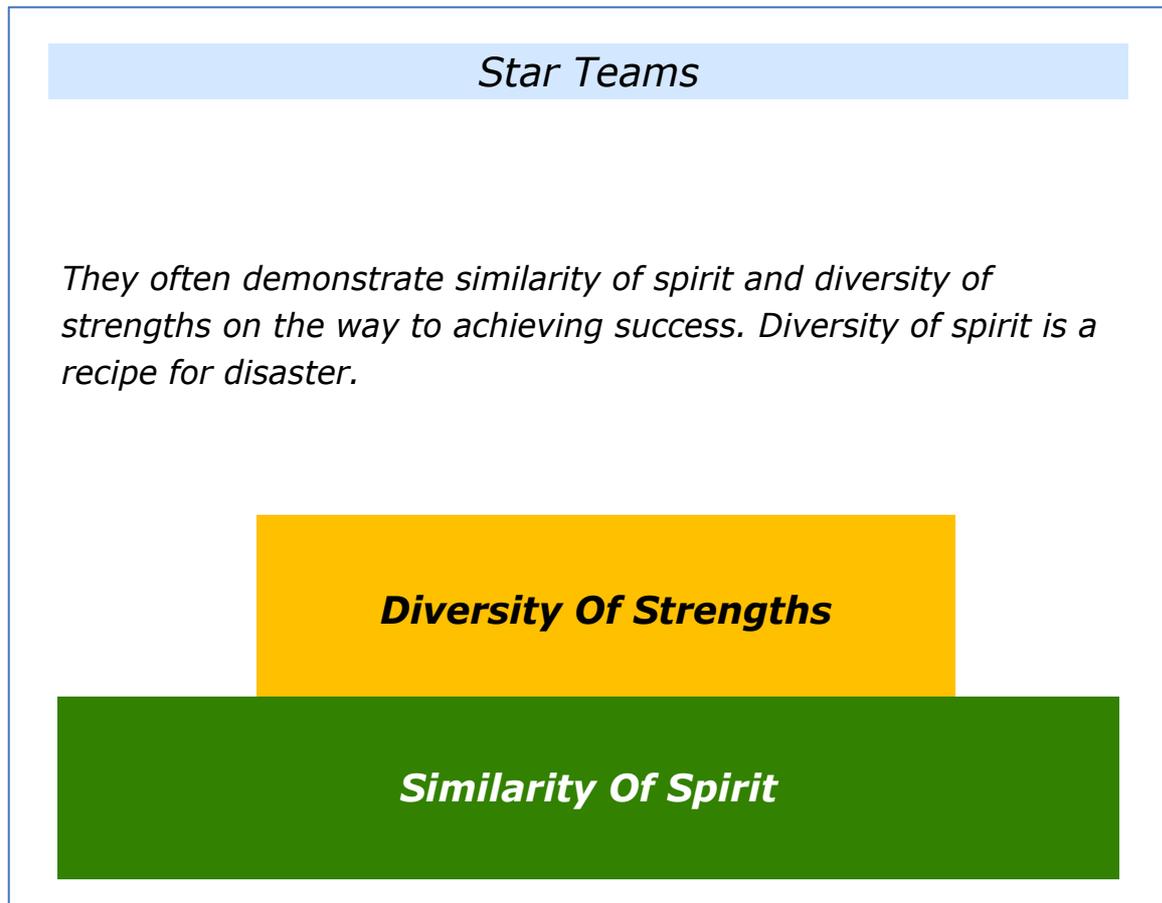

Star teams also consider another factor in deciding whether or not a person can contribute to the team.

They employ people who embody the team's spirit

Star teams are made up of people who have similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths. Spirit gets people so far. But it is the diversity of strengths that enables them to produce something special when it matters.

Diversity of spirit is a recipe for disaster. A person may have great strengths but if they behave in a negative way, for example, they can create collateral damage.

Star teams are clear on the spirit – the principles - they want people to demonstrate. They want characters rather than clones, however, and recognise that people will express the spirit in different ways.

Such teams sometimes take the following steps to employ people who are likely to embody the team's spirit. This involves them focusing on the following themes.

They start by defining the spirit – the principles – they want people to demonstrate. Some take the following approach.

They clarify the specific times in the past when people in the team have performed brilliantly;

They clarify the spirit – the principles – that people followed then and how they translated this into action;

They clarify the spirit – the principles – they would like people to follow in the future and how they can translate this into action.

Different teams will define different kinds of spirit or principles. Much depends, of course, on the kind of work they are doing.

A sports team may want its people to be positive, professional and aim to deliver peak performances. They will also look for people who want to apply their strengths to help the team to achieve success.

A hospice may want people who are compassionate and want to care for people nearing the end of their lives. They also look for people who can manage the emotions involved in doing such work.

Imagine that you lead a team and want to recruit people who demonstrate a certain kind of spirit. There are many ways to take this step.

One organisation I worked with took the following steps when interviewing people. They sent the candidate a booklet that described:

The spirit – the principles - they wanted people in people in the team to demonstrate;

The specific ways that people in the team had translated this spirit – these principles – into action in their work.

The candidate was invited to do some prework which they then presented at the interview. They were asked:

To describe a specific time when they had aimed to demonstrate this spirit – these principles – in their personal or professional life;

To describe the specific things they would aim to do to demonstrate this spirit – these principles – in their potential work for the team.

This sounds an enormous task but it was vital. Some candidates rose to the challenge whilst others did not. The organisation saw recruitment as one of its most important tasks, however, because they needed to employ people with the right attitude and abilities.

Many great teams take a similar approach. They also focus on the following theme when employing people.

They employ people who, most of all, want to contribute to helping the team to achieve its goals

Star teams believe it is vital for a person to really want to contribute to helping the team to achieve its goals. Bearing this in mind, they often take the following steps with talking with a person.

They explain the team's goals and the strategies it will follow to work towards achieving the picture of success;

They explain the professional standards people are expected to follow when working towards achieving the picture of success;

They may explain, if appropriate, the potential contribution the person could make towards achieving the picture of success;

Such teams then invite the person to take time to reflect and do the following things.

First, to decide if they would like to contribute to the team. If the person does want to, they invite them to move on to the next stage

Second, to describe the potential contribution they would like to make towards helping the team to achieve its goals.

The person may sometimes need more information about the results they will be asked to deliver. But it can be good if they have a go at describing their potential contribution.

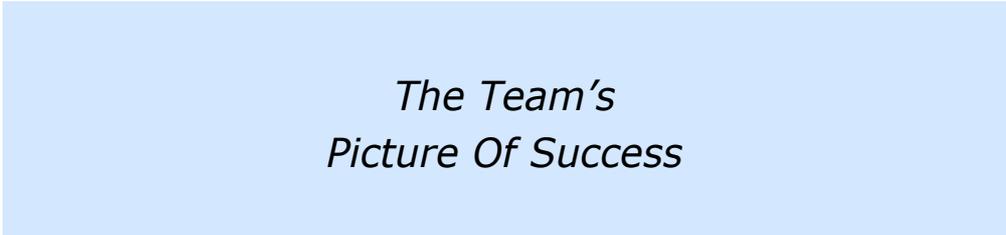

Star teams take this approach when interviewing people. They may also adapt it at certain times when having a conversation with a team member who may not be demonstrating the required professional standards.

Such teams employ people who have a volunteer mentality and who want to make the best contribution. They do not want to work with people who do not take this approach.

Imagine that a team has done what it can to get the right people in the right places. They then take the following step.

They Focus On The Picture Of Success

Star teams believe in communicating the big picture and giving context to their people. They believe it is important for people to see how their work contributes towards achieving the team's goals. Bearing this in mind, they present the following things to the team.

*The Team's
Picture Of Success*

The Picture of Success

The specific goals we want to achieve by ... are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Strategies

The strategies we aim to follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of achieving the picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Benefits

The benefits – for the various stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success will be:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

Some teams communicate the themes mentioned above. They then invite their people to go into groups, focus on the following themes and then present back their ideas.

Like About It - The specific things we like about it are ...

Additions And Suggestions - The specific additions and suggestions we have are ...

Concerns and Questions ... The concerns and questions we have are ...

Success Rating – The rating we would give regarding the team’s chances of achieving the goal and what we can do to improve the rating are ...

The Picture Of Success – Getting Your Suggestions

We would like you to go into groups and complete the following exercises where you give your responses to the aims and the strategies for achieving the picture of success. We would then like you to present your ideas.

The things we like about it are:

The additions and suggestions we have are:

The concerns and questions we have are:

The success rating – and how we can improve the chances of success - is:

Like About It - The specific things we like about it are:

*

*

*

Additions And Suggestions - The possible additions and suggestions we have are:

*

*

*

Concerns And Questions - The concerns and questions we have are:

*

*

*

Success Rating

Bearing in mind the things we can control, the present rating we would give regarding our team's chances of achieving the goals is:

_____ / 10

The specific things we can do to maintain or improve the ratings are:

*

*

*

Imagine that a team has communicated the picture of success. It has involved its people and may have added some of their ideas to the final vision. They then take the following step.

They Focus On Coordinating People's Strengths To Achieve The Picture Of Success

Star teams coordinate people's strengths to work towards achieving the goals. Different teams do this in different ways. Some teams take the following steps.

They make clear contracts with people about their best contributions towards achieving the team's goals

This involves each person doing the following exercise. Bearing in mind the team's picture of success and their strengths, it invites them to make clear contracts with their manager in the following areas.

The specific outcomes they will deliver – and by when – towards achieving the team's goals;

The specific support they would like and the support they will give others when working towards the team's goals;

The specific ways they will keep people informed about their progress towards delivering their contribution towards the team's goals.

There are many ways to take this step. One approach is for the person to do the following exercises and agree on their contribution with their manager.

*My Contribution Towards Achieving
The Picture Of Success*

The Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the picture of success and my strengths, the specific outcomes I will aim to deliver towards achieving the team's goals - and by when - are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering these outcomes will be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Support

The specific support I would like to help me to deliver these outcomes, plus the support I will give to other people, is:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

They coordinate people's strengths to work towards achieving the picture of success

Star teams often have great coordinators. Such people are often good at connecting with people and orchestrating their strengths to deliver the desired concrete results. They often focus on the following themes.

Clarity

Coordinators are good at managing upwards and clarifying the real results the leader wants to achieve. They then communicate this clarity to other people in the organisation.

Sometimes this involves continuing to communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. Sometimes it may involve focusing on a specific piece of work and clarifying the real results to achieve.

Coordination

Good coordinators make things work. They often do this by harnessing people's strengths to achieve the agreed picture of success. They aim to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

They start by explaining the big picture. This is especially vital with knowledge workers who want to know the context. They then take the following steps before making clear contracts with people:

They remind people about the team's aims and strategies for achieving the picture of success;

They explain where the specific piece of work fits into achieving the picture of success;

They explain the real results – the outcomes - to achieve by doing the piece of work;

They then take these steps to coordinate people's strengths.

Coordinating People's Strengths

Coordinators often focus on the following themes and ask the following questions when coordinating people's strengths to achieve the goals.

Clarifying The Picture Of Success

What are the real results – what are the outcomes - we want achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the goals?

What are the key strategies we can follow to achieve the picture of success? How can do our best to follow these strategies and achieve the picture of success?

Coordinating People's Strengths

What are people's strengths? What are the specific activities in which each person - or each team - delivers As rather than Bs or Cs? How can we coordinate people's strengths to achieve the picture of success?

What are the remaining practical tasks that must be done? How can we find creative ways to make sure these tasks are completed successfully?

Clear Contracting About People's Contributions

How can we make clear contracts with people about their contributions? How can we agree on the specific outcomes they will deliver towards achieving the picture of success? How can make sure there are mission holders who will take responsibility for delivering specific projects?

How can we build in regular coordination meetings? How can we ensure that we keep tracking our progress towards the goals? How can we ensure that people keep others informed about:

The specific things they have delivered in the past month towards achieving the picture of success;

The specific things they will deliver in the next month;

The specific challenges they face and their solutions for tackling these challenges;

The specific kinds of support they would like to help them to deliver success.

Concrete Results

Good coordinators get some early wins rather than embark on long process analyses. Success breeds success. It also buys time to tackle the more long-standing challenges.

They keep in touch with the leader and see their role as being proactive rather than that of being a glorified progress chaser.

They have regular meetings with the leader to look ahead to the next week, the month and the next quarter. They clarify the challenges facing the team and agree on the potential solutions.

Good coordinators ensure that people proactively keep them informed about their progress towards achieving the goals. They set up sessions where each person continually reports on the following themes.

My Contribution Towards Achieving The Team's Picture Of Success

Progress Report

The Specific Things I Have Delivered In The Past Month Have Been:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Things I Am To Deliver In The Next Month Are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Other Things I Would Like Discuss – Such As The Support, Challenges Or Other Topics - Are:

*

*

*

Imagine that a team is following elements of this approach. They then take the next step.

They Focus On Achieving The Picture Of Success

Star teams encourage their people to perform superb work. They also encourage them to find solutions to challenges and do their best to achieve the picture of success. Different teams do this in different ways.

One organisation I worked with had a dedicated room where people constantly updated the progress towards achieving the goal. It had charts that covered the following areas.

The Picture Of Success

The specific goal we want to achieve by ... is:

 To ...*

The specific things we want to have achieved by then that will show we have reached the goal will be:

Profits

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Products

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

People

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The other walls had the following charts that described the current state of play regarding various activities.

The Green Zone

People listed the things that were going well. They also provided concrete suggestions regarding how to maintain or build on these activities.

Great workers build on what is working. If things are going well with a particular customer, for example, they explore how to continue providing great service. This can lead to developing the relationship even further.

The Green Zone

The specific things that are going well

The specific things that people are doing well or that are going well at the moment are:

*

*

*

The specific things that we can do to build on these things are:

*

*

*

The Amber Zone

People described where there were warning signs. They also provided suggestions regarding how to improve these activities.

Great workers worry about things that are in the amber zone. They are concerned that, unless these issues are addressed, these may quickly slide into the red zone. So they focus on how to move these activities more towards the green zone.

The Amber Zone

The specific things where there are warning signs

The specific things where there are warning signs at the moment are:

*

*

*

The specific things we can do to take action and improve these things are:

*

*

*

The Red Zone

People listed the things that were going badly and gave suggestions regarding how to improve these activities. These could involve making radical improvements or for taking key decisions.

Great workers think ahead to ensure that things do not slide into the red zone. Crises do occur, of course, so then it is vital to find positive solutions.

There may be some issues, however, that are continually falling into the red zone. If systems are breaking down, for example, these may well need replacing.

A more challenging issue could be if a particular customer continually makes life difficult. Certainly it is vital to do whatever possible to provide great service. In some instances, however, a customer may prove impossible to please.

They may also prove to be a massive drain on resources. In such cases it may mean deciding to move on from the customer. This can be a difficult but necessary decision.

The Red Zone

The specific things that are not going well

The specific things that are not going well at the moment are:

*

*

*

The specific things we can do to make decisions and take action about these things are:

*

*

*

The Blue Zone

The organisation also went further and added another area called the blue zone. This was the space for both practical and imaginative ideas.

People listed the specific ideas, suggestions and other things that it might be worth considering to help the team shape a successful future. This led to some of the ideas being implemented and delivering positive results.

Great workers continually look for ways to improve. It can be useful to create different forums for exploring these ideas and then translating some of these into action.

The Blue Zone

The specific ideas, suggestions and other things that may help us to shape a successful future

The specific ideas and suggestions that it may be worth considering to help us to shape a successful future are:

*

*

*

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to build a star team rather than a team of stars. This piece has focused the theme that:

A star team may consistently perform better than a team of stars.

This is because people in star teams coordinate their strengths to consistently perform superb work. A team of stars will occasionally produce moments of brilliance, but they may not do this consistently.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the star team approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Star Team Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Destination, Dos And Delivery Approach

The Destination

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to describe the Destination, the Dos – such as the strategies to follow - and the Delivery.

It is then to invite people to decide if they want to contribute. If so, it is then to make clear contracts about what they want to deliver to help the team to reach its destination.

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to describe the following things to people.

The Destination – the team’s goals and the benefits of achieving the picture of success;

The Dos – the strategies people can follow to do their best to reach the destination;

The Delivery – the specific things that need to be delivered – and by when – on the way to reaching the destination.

The next step is to invite people to take time to reflect and decide if they want to contribute. If so, it is then to make clear contracts about their best contribution towards helping the team to reach the destination.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. This involves focusing on the following themes.

The Destination

Good leaders often start from their destination and work backwards. They start by picking a date in the future. Bearing in mind what the team can control, they then go through the following steps.

They clarify the real results the team can achieve by that date and translate this into a clear picture of success.

They clarify the benefits – to all the various stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success.

They clarify the team's chances of achieving these aims – on a scale 0-10 – and how to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success.

Such leaders do lots of due diligence on this latter theme. They clarify: a) the team's present ability to achieve the goals; b) the specific things it can do to improve the chances of success. This leads to the next stage.

The Dos

Good leaders play many scenarios regarding how to reach the destination. Bearing in mind what the team can control, they then go through the following steps.

They clarify the key strategies the team can follow to give itself the greatest chance of success.

They clarify the potential challenges and how to manage these successfully.

They again clarify the key strategies and ensure that following these will give the team the greatest chance of success.

Such leaders then translate these strategies into the specific actions – the dos – that people can follow to do their best to reach the destination. The next step is to communicate these to their people.

When doing so, it is important to bring each of these strategies to life by: a) giving the reasons for following these; b) giving specific examples that resonate with people. Different leaders do this in different way. Here is one example.

The Dos

The key strategies we can follow to do our best to reach the destination are these.

To Build On Our Strengths

To keep building on our strengths as a company whilst managing the consequences of any weaknesses;

To keep work with the kinds of customers with whom we work best;

To keep delivering high professional standards and, when doing so, be positive and approachable.

To Help Our Customers To Achieve Success

To do lots of research to make sure that you understand the customer and their potential challenges and goals;

To show that you understand the customer's world and then, when appropriate, make clear contracts about the specific things we can deliver to help them to achieve their goals;

To perform superb work, get some early wins and help the customer to achieve success.

To Help All Our Stakeholders To Achieve Ongoing Success

To keep developing as a company and do our best to achieve ongoing success;

To, where appropriate, help our customers to keep developing and to achieve ongoing success;

To help yourself and your colleagues to keep developing and to achieve ongoing success.

Different leaders will, of course, focus on different strategies that people can follow to work towards the team's goals. They may then move on to the next stage.

The Delivery

Good leaders work with their key colleagues to clarify the agreed road map to the destination. Bearing in mind the final results to be achieved, they take the following steps.

They clarify the specific things that must be delivered by when – including getting some early wins - on the road towards achieving the picture of success.

They make clear contracts about who will be responsible – who will be the mission holders - for delivering certain outcomes on the road towards achieving the picture of success.

They clarify the support that their people will need, the things they will do to report their progress and anything else that can be done to help them and the team to achieve the picture of success.

They ensure their key colleagues are clear on what needs to be done. Bearing this in mind, they move on to the next stage.

Communicating The Destination, Dos And Delivery

Good leaders aim to communicate this information to people in a positive and professional way. Bearing this in mind, they sometimes take the following steps.

They aim to give people the big picture by describing the destination, the dos and the delivery together with the benefits of reaching the destination.

They aim to bring these things to life by giving reasons for taking this approach and also giving examples: a) that resonate with people; b) that enable them to see how they can help the team to reach the destination.

They aim to then give people time to reflect to decide if they want to contribute and, if so, to make clear contracts about their parts in helping the team to reach its destination.

Different leaders do this in different ways. The following pages provide one framework for communicating these to their people. You would, of course, do this in your own way.

*The Team's Destination,
Dos And Delivery*

Welcome To Today's Session

We are going to start by giving you an overview of the team's destination – the picture of success – and the benefits of achieving these goals.

We will also describe the strategies to follow – the Dos – and the specific things to be delivered by when on the way towards achieving the goals.

We will then answer any questions you have about the reasons why we have chosen to go this route.

Finally, we will give you time to reflect and decide if you would like to help the team to achieve its goals.

If so, we can make clear contracts about your best contribution and the support you need to help us to reach the destination.

The Destination

The specific results we want to achieve by ... are:

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

*The specific benefits of achieving these results
- for all the various stakeholders - will be:*

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

The Dos

*The specific strategies we want to follow
– the Dos – to work towards reaching the destination and the reasons for these are:*

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

The Delivery

The specific things we want to deliver – and by when – to do our best to reach the destination are:

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

 To*

For example ...

(These are the headlines. We will share a more detailed road map with you in your smaller teams.)

The Next Steps

Bearing in mind what we have described, we will answer any questions you have about the reasons why we have chosen to go this route. The next steps will then include the following things.

- To give you time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute towards helping the team to achieve its goals. If you do, we can then move on to next stage.
- To, bearing in mind your strengths, make clear contracts about your best contribution towards helping the team to achieve its goals.
- To agree with you on the support you need, the quick wins you can get and how you will proactively keep people informed about your progress towards helping the team to achieve its goals.

You will also have the opportunity to give suggestions regarding how we as a team can increase our chances of achieving the goals.

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to describe the destination, the dos and the delivery. The next step is to invite people to decide if they want to help the team to achieve its goals.

If so, it is then to make clear contracts about their best contribution, the support they need and how they will keep people informed about their progress towards helping the team to achieve its goals.

Good leaders then encourage and enable people to perform superb work, find solutions to challenges and focus on continuous improvement. They do their best to help their people and the team to reach the destination.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Destination, Dos And Delivery Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Great Organisations Doing What They Do Best Approach

There are many models for building great organisations. This section explores one approach.

Great organisations do what they do best. They also encourage their people to do what they do best. They then aim to keep performing at their best. Let's explore these themes.

They Do What They Do Best

Great organisations build on their strengths. This focus on where they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. This often involves taking the following steps.

They focus on the things they do best;

They focus on the kinds of customers with whom they work best;

They focus on providing great service in the things they do best.

Such organisations continue to build on their strengths. This also involves taking the next step.

They Encourage Their People To Do What They Do Best

Great organisations build on their people's strengths. They put people in the places where they can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. This often involves taking the following steps.

They communicate their organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

They make clear contracts with people about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

They then encourage their people to perform superb and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Some organisations don't encourage people to play to their strengths. Sometimes this is done with the best of intentions, but it can result in average performances.

One organisation told their best sales people to spend most of their time managing their team rather than being with customers. This was the equivalent of a football team taking their best goal scorers off the pitch. It led to a decline in sales and morale.

This produced a wake-up call. The organisation finally got round to putting its best leaders, organisers and specialists in the right places. They then coordinated people's strengths to achieve success.

They Keep Performing At Their Best

Great organisations continue to perform at their best. This calls for consistently delivering high professional standards and, when appropriate, being pacesetters. Some organisations do this by taking the following steps.

They continue to create a positive environment in which motivated people can deliver peak performances;

They continue to embody the concept of continuous improvement for individuals and the organisation;

They continue to be pacesetters by staying ahead of the game and achieving ongoing success.

Bearing in mind their strengths, such organisations may develop new approaches to doing what they do best. They then apply these to help both themselves and their customers to achieve success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? You may want to do this as a leader, manager or in another role.

How can you focus on what you, your colleagues or your organisation does best? How can you translate this approach into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Great Organisations Doing What They Do Best

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

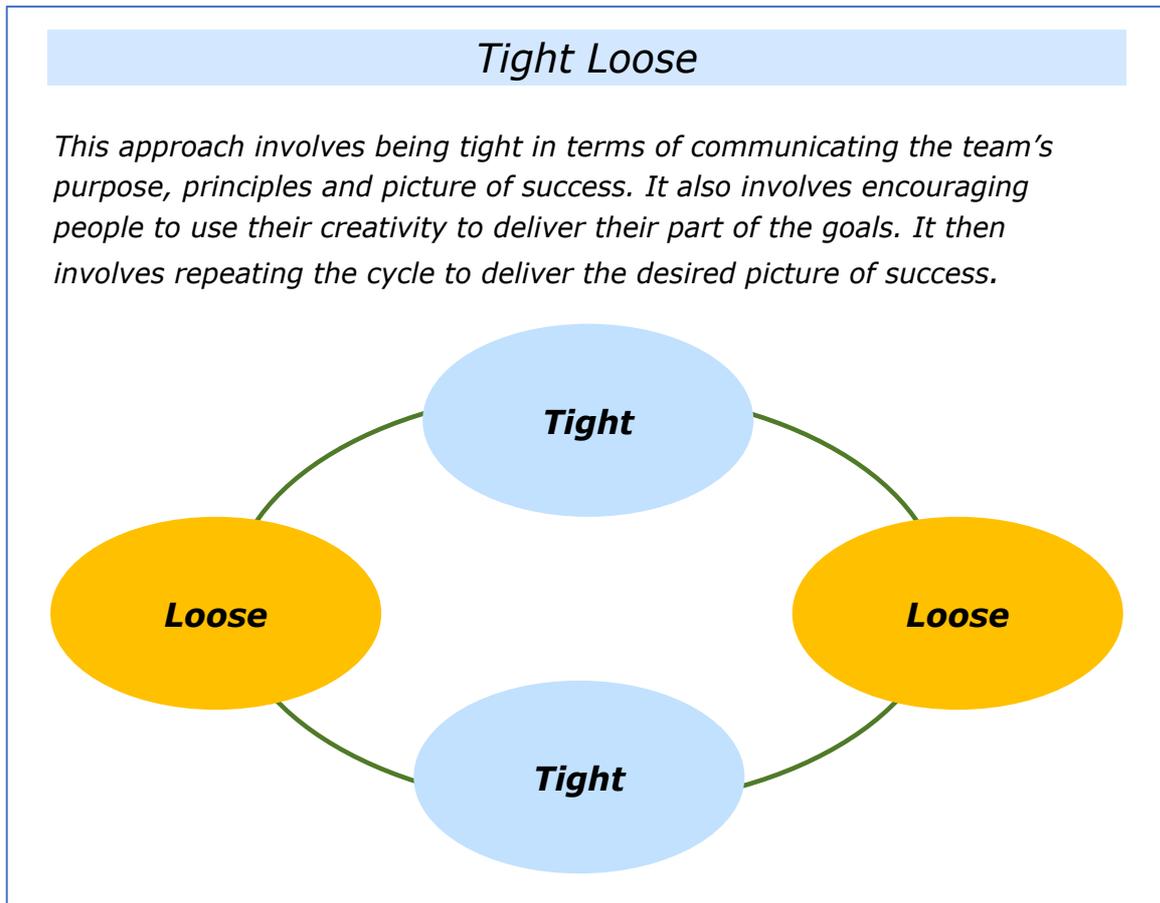

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Tight Loose Tight Loose Approach

There are many models for encouraging people to work towards achieving certain goals. Some of these models include elements of the tight and loose approach.

Rune Ulvnes, for example, developed what he called the Tight Loose Tight approach in 2009. Since then he has enabled people to apply the approach in many ways. We will look at his approach later in this piece. Before then, however, here is some context.

Some leadership styles follow the tight approach. This involves a command and control structure. It provides tight instructions on: a) what people should achieve; b) how they should achieve it; c) when they should achieve it.

Such an approach has advantages. It gives the impression of being in control and supervising people into doing good work. The downsides include people feeling they are micromanaged.

Some leadership styles incorporate the loose approach. This involves a more open and consensual approach to clarifying the goals. It also gives people freedom regarding how they achieve the aims.

This approach has advantages. It comes across as being more humanistic and involving. The downsides include lack of decisiveness and everybody expressing a view about everything.

Some leaders use a tight loose tight loose approach. This involves managing by outcomes. It calls for communicating a clear purpose, principles and picture of success. It then gives motivated people freedom, within parameters, to use their talents to achieve the goals.

Different leaders apply this approach in different ways. Some keep working through the tight loose tight loose cycle. This may involve them saying something along the following lines to their people.

Tight

This is the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. These are these outcomes to achieve and these are the benefits. Would you like to contribute towards achieving these goals?

Loose

If so, let's make clear contracts about on your contribution to achieving the goals. The way you achieve these outcomes is, within parameters, up to you.

Tight

Let's return to the outcomes we want to achieve. What is the progress? What is going well and what can we improve? What are the next steps?

Loose

Let's make clear contracts about: a) the ongoing contribution you want to make; b) the support you need; c) the ways you will proactively keep me informed about the progress toward achieving the goals.

Many leaders have adapted this approach to enable their teams to deliver the desired results. The following pages provide excerpts from articles written by Rune Ulvnes regarding his approach to using the model.

The Tight Loose Tight Approach

Purpose goals

My experience is that we must work towards what I have called purpose goals. These are fundamental if you work with Tight Loose Tight, a model that I developed about 10 years ago.

Purpose goals say something about what we as an organization want to achieve in the market – such as what effect our work should have.

Examples of purpose goals may be:

We want to excite the audience on a deeper level ... We want to help our patients have a more worry-free everyday life ... We want employees not to get annoyed when they use the computer for normal activities.

The purpose of purpose goal is to engage the team in becoming innovative. For agile teams, it is easy to follow whether this happens through a glance at the result.

You as a leader should therefore use the opportunity to strengthen and clarify the purpose at every iteration so that the team understands the goals better.

Most teams that work with purpose goals can quickly find that one goal is better than another as the work progresses.

For example, the goal "We want to excite the audience on a deeper level" might not be understood, and the team might fail to deliver any reasonable results.

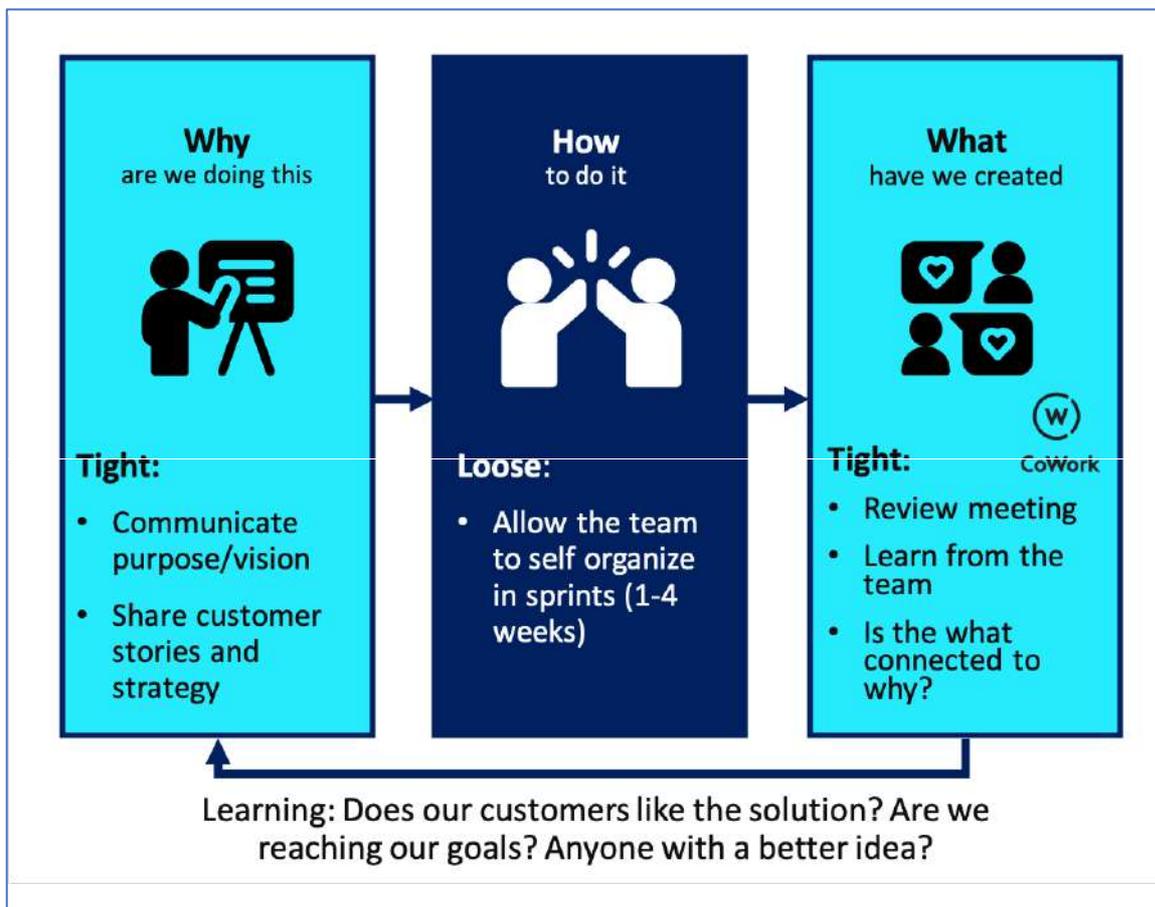

You should therefore seize the opportunity at any time to clarify the goal, for example "we want to give our audience two hours free of their worries while visiting our theater".

I do think that the simplicity of the model is its strength. This is the core of TLT:

Tight: As a leader, you give a purpose or direction to your employee or team.

Loose: You trust your employee or team and allow them to self-organize.

Tight: You follow up on your employee or team from time to time for mutual learning.

Different leaders apply the tight loose themes in different ways. One approach involves reminding people of the outcomes to achieve. As mentioned earlier, this also calls for taking the following steps:

To communicate the purpose – the outcomes to achieve – and the principles people can follow to achieve picture of success;

To make clear contracts with people about the outcomes they will deliver and give them freedom – within parameters – to use their strengths to make their best contribution towards achieving the picture of success;

To again encourage people to keep focusing on the purpose – the outcomes to achieve – and enable them to do superb work that continues to contribute towards achieving the picture of success.

Leaders sometimes find this involves moving between the tight loose tight loose model in their own way. They then do their best to enable the team to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Tight Loose Tight Loose Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Creating A Common Language Approach

Common Language

Great teams create a common language. This provides a common framework that people can use to focus on the following themes.

- Clarity

The specific strategy people can follow to work towards achieving the common goals.

- Consistently High Standards

The specific standards people can deliver to increase the chances of achieving the common goals.

- Concrete Results

The specific things to be delivered by people – and by when – on the way towards achieving the common goals.

Winston Churchill said that first we shape our buildings, then our buildings shape us. When I began working with people, I was told:

"First we shape our language, then our language shapes us."

Great teams often a common language. This is an approach I have seen work in education, sports, business and organisations. It provides a common framework that people can use to focus on the following themes.

Clarity

The specific strategy people can follow to work towards achieving the common goals.

Consistently High Standards

The specific standards people can deliver to increase the chances of achieving the common goals.

Concrete Results

The specific things to be delivered by people – and by when – on the way towards achieving the common goals.

Great teams create a language that provides a kind of shorthand people can use to make decisions and translate these into action. Some teams embody this language in certain principles - or values – that they encourage people to follow when working towards the team's goals.

Different teams will, of course, use different kinds of language. The following sections look at how some people apply this approach in their chosen fields.

The Development Programmes Approach

The first time I encountered the common language approach was when working in therapeutic communities. Since then I have seen how the approach works in many organisations that help people to develop.

Many of the successful programmes encourage people to take responsibility for shaping their futures. They also used language that encourages people:

To build on their strengths ... To follow strategies that work ... To work towards achieving their picture of success.

Some development programmes use positive language that encourages people to work towards their goals. They ensure that people feel able to opt in and go at their own pace. There are some cult-like programmes however, that use language to pressures people in other ways.

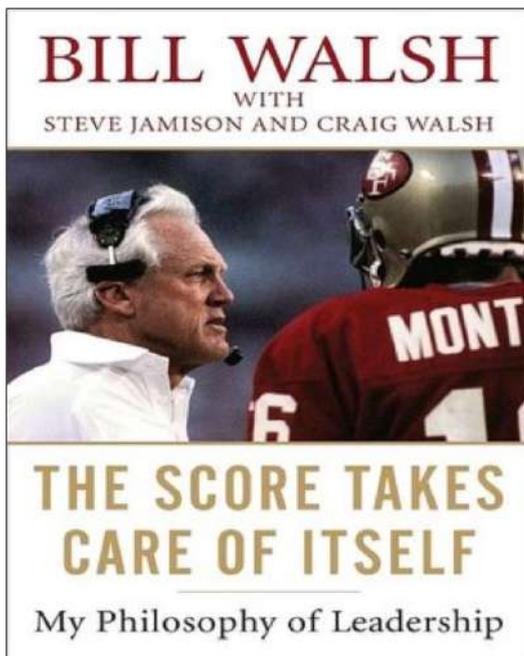

The Sports Teams Approach

Many sports teams have their own common language. The leader often sets the tone by describing the principles they want people to follow. They then invite people decide if they want to opt in and contribute to achieving the goals.

Bill Walsh, the American Football coach, followed this approach. He invited all the staff of the San Francisco 49ers to decide if they wanted to deliver certain standards of performance.

If they did then, as the title of his book says, The Score Takes Care Of Itself. The next section describes some of the principles he encouraged people to follow.

The Standard Of Performance

Bill Walsh:

*"Keep Delivering
The Standard of Performance and
The Score Takes Care of Itself."*

The Standard Of Performance

Here are some excerpts from The Standard Of Performance.

These principles applied to the coaches, players, ticket sellers, receptionists and all people who worked for the 49ers.

Each person was expected to focus on how they could – in their role – deliver the relevant Standard of Performance.

-  Use positive language and have a positive attitude. Demonstrate character. Be fair and demonstrate respect for each person in the organization and the work they do.
-  Exhibit a ferocious and intelligently applied work ethic directed at continual improvement. Maintain an ongoing level of concentration and focus that is abnormally high.
-  Seek poise in yourself and those you lead. Show self-control, especially where it counts most – under pressure. Deal appropriately with victory and defeat, adulation and humiliation (don't go crazy with victory nor dysfunctional with loss).
-  Demonstrate and prize loyalty. Promote internal communication that is both open and substantive (especially under stress). Make sacrifice and commitment the organization's trademark.

Some coaches outline the principles they want people to follow to achieve the goals. At an appropriate time, they may then invite the players to create their own mantra for pursuing these principles. One common mantra they may produce is:

Be Positive ... Be Professional ... Be Peak Performers.

Different kinds of sports teams may focus on different kinds of language. Let's look at another team that took this approach.

The Toshiba Yacht Crew Approach

Simon Walker, the skipper of Toshiba, followed elements of this approach when meeting his volunteer crew for the BT Global Challenge. He later described this in the following way.

Different skippers have different approaches. Some immediately go out onto the water; others spend time charting the course ahead.

Immediately after my crew was selected, I arranged for us to get together in a large unheated house in rural Wales.

This was 8 months before the starting gun fired and long before we ever got to sail the yacht. We began by spending two days talking about the race.

You can't build a team before you've agreed on the goal. As the leader, I explained my vision of how our race was to be run, but I also needed people's ownership.

So we discussed every element of the campaign in detail. Our often repeated values as a crew were simple:

Safe, Happy and Fast.

Professionalism was crucial - because we were literally dealing with matters of life and death. From the outset I insisted on high standards in everything we did and the crew responded superbly.

Time keeping was impeccable. This is important. If you can't trust your team mate to turn up on time, can you trust him or her with your life?

Simon's crew kept returning to Safe, Happy, Fast. He describes how these values were translated into action during the storms they encountered.

Everybody's commitment was crucial. Sailing in the depths of the Southern Ocean, for example, it was icy cold, windy, wet and exhausting.

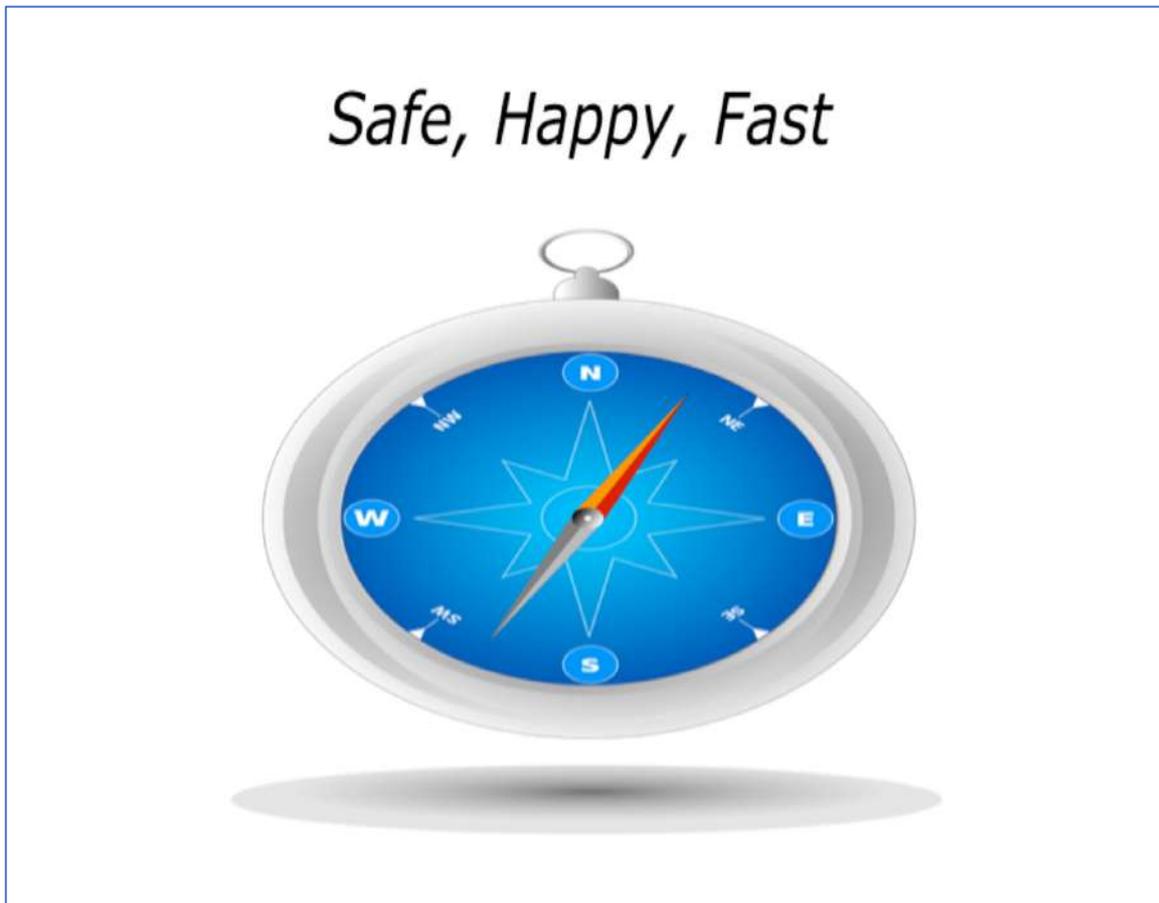

The people who had finished their watch would go below to snatch some sleep. After 30 minutes spent getting out of soaking kit, they would slide into their mouldy, damp sleeping bag, and it took another 30 minutes to reverse the process.

People therefore only had 3 hours of the 4-hour 'off-watch' available for sleep. The crew always slept on the high side of the yacht - which optimised the balance and made it sail faster.

When we needed to tack - change direction - the 'off-watch' crew would get up and take their sleeping bag to the other side.

Such a change-over might happen 2 or 3 times during their 3 hours rest. Not a single person complained and the entire crew did this day-after-day across the Southern Ocean.

No leader on Earth could make 13 other exhausted people do this unless they had all bought in into the idea. Everyone was committed.

The Organisational Approach

Great organisations choose a language that describes the key principles they want people to follow. Whilst these principles may be eternal, the way people express these may evolve as the world changes.

IBM, for example, was extremely successful for many years. Its people talked about the importance of following what they called the Basic Beliefs. These included:

Respect for the individual ... Service to the customer ... Excellence in everything we do.

IBM followed these successfully for many years but then hit a wall. The Basic Beliefs still held true but parts of the company did not always translate these into practice.

IBM then revitalised itself by returning to its beliefs and expressing these successfully in the modern world. Kevin Maney, the co-author of Making The World Better, described the reasons for this in the following way.

IBM founder Thomas Watson Sr. realized that if a company is really based on its own set of values, based on what it is rather than what it makes, it allows the company to change with the times.

Some organisations are serious about using a certain language and translating this into action. During the early 1990s I worked with the original leadership team at Air Miles. They created a set of values which were:

Deliver results ... Take responsibility ... Care for people ... Love change.

These words sound fine but are blank cheques. They can mean different things to different people. Bearing this in mind, we involved all their staff in Values In Action Workshops.

The workshops were interactive and enjoyable. They aimed: a) to show how the values were based on when people in the company had done great work; b) to invite people to focus on how the company and its people could translate the values into action.

The sessions also invited people to do an exercise called The Values Challenge. This involved people breaking into groups doing the following things. They aimed:

To focus on a present or future situation that might challenge the values;

To clarify the possible options for tackling the challenge together with the pluses and minuses of each option;

To clarify how people could follow the option that was closest to living the values in that situation.

The exercise showed that sometimes there are no easy answers. The key, however, is to follow the option that is closest to living the values.

Some organisations aim to create a common language. The language they use the help to shape the way people feel, think and act.

When I ran a therapeutic community, we encouraged people to take responsibility for shaping their future. This sometimes involved using the following language when working with the young people:

"How are you choosing to feel today? How do you want to shape your future? How can you work towards achieving your life goals?"

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the common language approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Common Language Approach

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

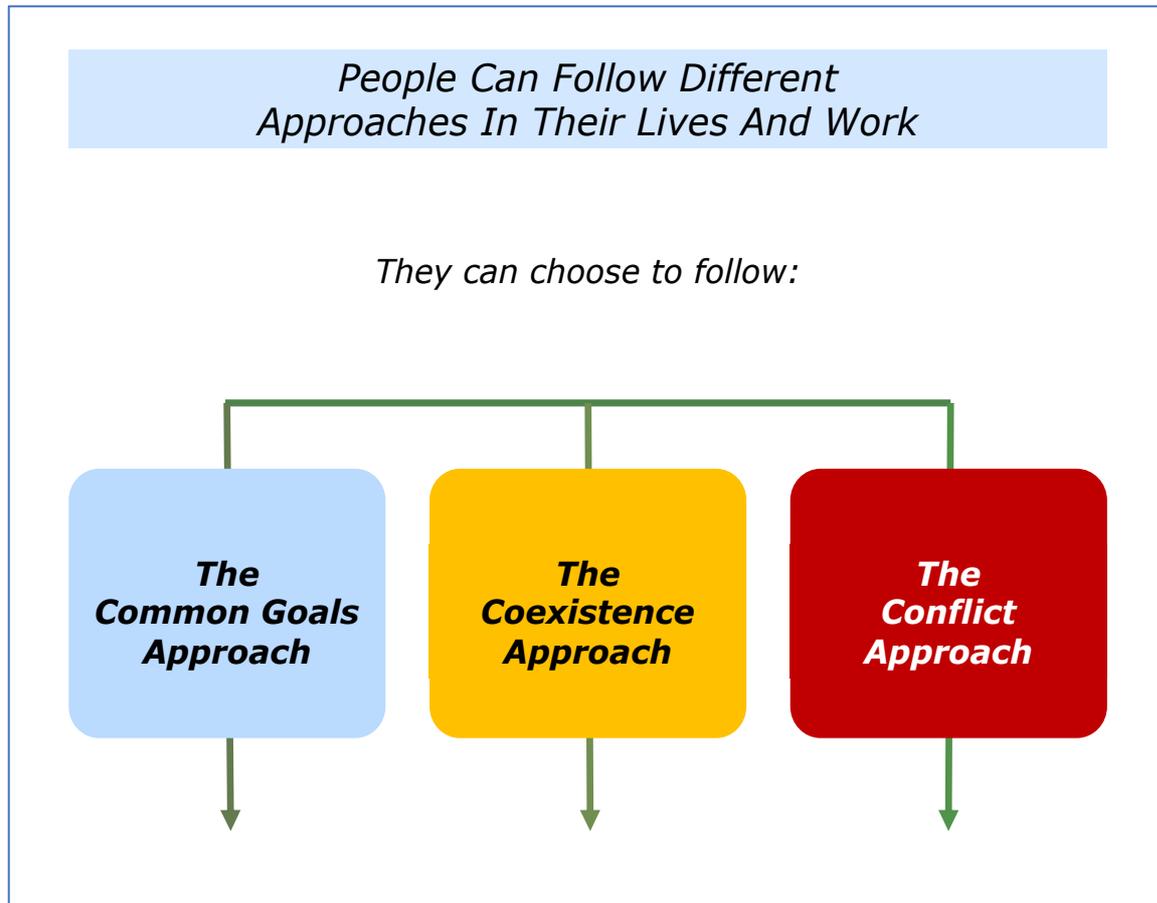

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

The Common Goals, Coexistence And Conflict Approaches

There are many ways for people to live and work together. They can choose to follow, for example, the common goals approach, the coexistence approach or the conflict approach.

Different people follow these routes in different ways. The route they take has consequences for both for themselves and other people. Let's explore these approaches.

The Common Goals Approach

This route involves people choosing to work together towards common goals. They can do this when working as a family, team, organisation society or as a group of nations.

Some leaders take this approach in organisations. The leaders clarify and communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. They also show the benefits of achieving the goals.

They then invite people to reflect and decide if they want to work towards achieving the common goals. If so, they make clear contracts about people's best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Some leaders take this approach in societies. They recognise that many people want similar things in life. They also want to maintain or improve their health, hope and happiness.

Such leaders then focus on setting goals that provide people with the basic materials for life – such as safety, food and shelter. They also give people the opportunity to shape their futures in a positive way.

There are many ways to set common goals. Let's explore one approach that is sometimes used in potential conflict situations.

The Third Side Approach To Setting Common Goals

The following section is based on work done by William Ury, who has helped many people to find solutions to conflicts. One approach he uses is to encourage people to focus on what he calls the Third Side.

William explains that people sometimes get into difficulties because they sit opposite each other and fight for their own agendas. Each party says the equivalent of: "I am right," or "Our side is right." "You are wrong." These are the First and Second Sides.

William says that we do not have to get into fighting by taking the First or Second sides. He says that we have a powerful alternative – the Third Side. He says:

The Third Side approach can transform our daily battles into creative cooperation. We can apply this at home, in our work and across the world.

The First and Second Sides

People can get into difficulties if they sit opposite each other and fight for their own agendas.

Each party may say the equivalent of: "I am right," or "Our side is right." "You are wrong."

These are the First and Second Sides.

People are more likely to achieve a positive outcome if they can sit side-by-side and look together towards a Third Side. This is the greater What and Why.

People often get into arguments about the How, but it is important to focus on the higher purpose. This purpose may be, for example, the children's welfare after a divorce, the team's goals or the kind of world we want to pass on to future generations.

When working with divorcing parents, for example, you will start by focusing on the shared aims they have in common. They may get into arguments and say that:

"We have nothing in common."

They blame each other and say that things would be better if the other person changed. At a certain point, however, you may say something like the following.

"You say you have little in common, but do you both want the best for your children?"

They will probably agree that they do, but may disagree on how to achieve those aims. You may then say something like:

"Looking ahead, let's explore the actual words you would like your children to be saying in 10 years about the way you managed the divorce.

"For example, you may want them to be saying things like:

'Mum and Dad behaved in a good way when they went apart. They never used us as pawns or blamed us.

'They continued to encourage us and helped us to develop. We now have two homes where we can go and feel at ease.

'Mum and Dad managed the difficult situation in a positive way.'

The Third Side approach can be applied in many situations. The key is to build on what people have in common and agree on a set of goals or a picture of success. This becomes the Third Side.

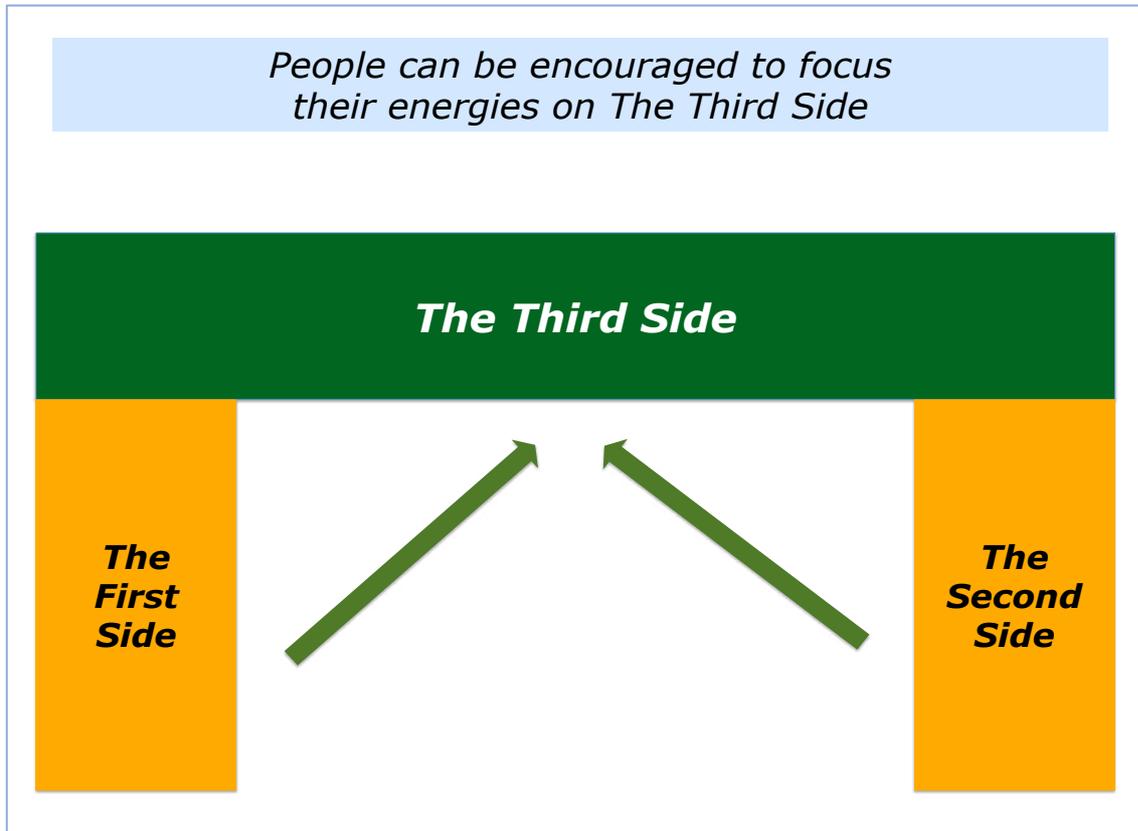

Providing people are clear on the agreed overall goals, you can then say things like:

"As far as I understand it, these are the goals to achieve. This is the picture of success.

"These are the benefits – for the various parties- of achieving the goals.

"Is this something you want to work towards achieving?"

You can then aim to set a specific goal and get a quick success. This helps to build confidence and move on to the next goal.

Mediators recognise that it can take time to get to this point. Bearing this in mind, let's explore this approach in more depth.

Clarifying The Common Goals – The Third Side

Imagine that you have been asked to facilitate a discussion about enabling people to work together towards a common goal. The first step is to clarify the potential Third Side.

This is what I was asked to do when invited to work with two departmental heads in a company. The Chief Executive was losing patience with the two teams that were supposed to work together to achieve the company's goals.

The challenge was that each team focused only on their own targets. When asked about cross-functional work, they blamed each other for failures. This downward spiral affected the service given to customers and the whole company performance.

Bearing this in mind, I met the Chief Executive to clarify the real results to achieve. He was crystal clear on what he wanted them to contribute towards achieving the company's picture of success.

This called for the respective departments to implement certain strategies to work together, deliver high levels of customer satisfaction and, in the process, contribute to achieving the company's goals.

The key would be to encourage the departmental heads to focus on these outcomes. They had forgotten to focus on the real What – the things they must deliver to achieve the company's picture of success. Instead they had fallen into arguments about the How.

This sounds relatively straight-forward. But what happens when you don't have an authority – such as a CEO - who can let people know about the desired Third Side?

Clarifying What Each Party Wants And Building On Common Ground

One approach is to meet with each party and clarify what each of them wants. The keys will be:

To clarify their respective aims;

To then build on common ground.

Each party may want to begin by expressing their feelings about the situation. When appropriate, however, you can invite them to focus on the future.

Good mediators show that they recognise people's feelings. They then encourage people to channel their energy towards finding solutions. One approach is to invite them to look to the future. It is to ask questions around the following themes.

"Looking ahead, what would you like to happen? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success?"

Mediators listen without judgement and play back what they are hearing. If appropriate, however, they sometimes invite people to express their ideas in a positive way.

If one party says that they want others to stop doing something, for example, the mediator invites them to say what they would like the others to do instead.

Towards the end of the conversation the mediator will summarise what they believe to be a party's goals. They may say something along the following lines.

"As far as I understand it, the goals you would like to achieve are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

"Is that right? Are there any other things that you would like to happen in the future?"

Imagine that you have taken this approach. You will have met with each party and clarified their aims.

The next step is to bring people together and focus on some of the common goals. Some people may try to draw you into arguing about the differences, but return to the similarities.

Keep bringing people back to the What – the real results they want to achieve. This can be challenging, because people often want to get into arguing about the How. When helping people, it can be useful to bear in mind some of the following guidelines.

Good Mediators

They aim to create a positive atmosphere and help people to find solutions to challenges. Some of the steps they may take are:

- To make sure that people want to solve the problem and are prepared to find win-win solutions;
- To find out what each party wants, build on the common ground and get some quick successes to build confidence;
- To then focus on one of the potential differences and clarify what each party wants;
- To clarify the real results to achieve – plus the benefits of achieving those results – and explore the possible solutions by keep asking: “How can we get a win-win?”;
- To – as far as possible – find potential win-wins, set specific goals and work together to achieve success.

Building On The Common Ground

The next step is to make sure the parties are prepared to build on the common ground. Sometimes this calls for again explaining it is important to get some quick successes rather than rushing into trying to solve deep differences.

Looking at the work with the two departmental heads, both had worked with me before so they knew the session would be positive. During the meeting it was important to take the following steps.

To create an encouraging environment and explain that I was sure we could pool our resources to find a win-win;

To explain that, if they were open to it, we would explore how they could be supported to combine their talents to achieve the company’s goals;

To put these goals in front of us so that we were literally all on the same side and looking together at the company’s picture of success.

Going deeper, I explained we had been tasked with working together to find solutions. Were they willing to work towards satisfying the customers and achieving the company's goals?

"Yes, of course we are willing," was the joint reply, followed by a few caveats.

Taking Steps To Achieve The Common Goals

Success builds confidence. So it is vital to focus on specific things that people can do to deliver some early wins. This is what happened with the two departmental heads in the company. They made specific action plans that involved them co-operating:

To deliver superb service to the customer;

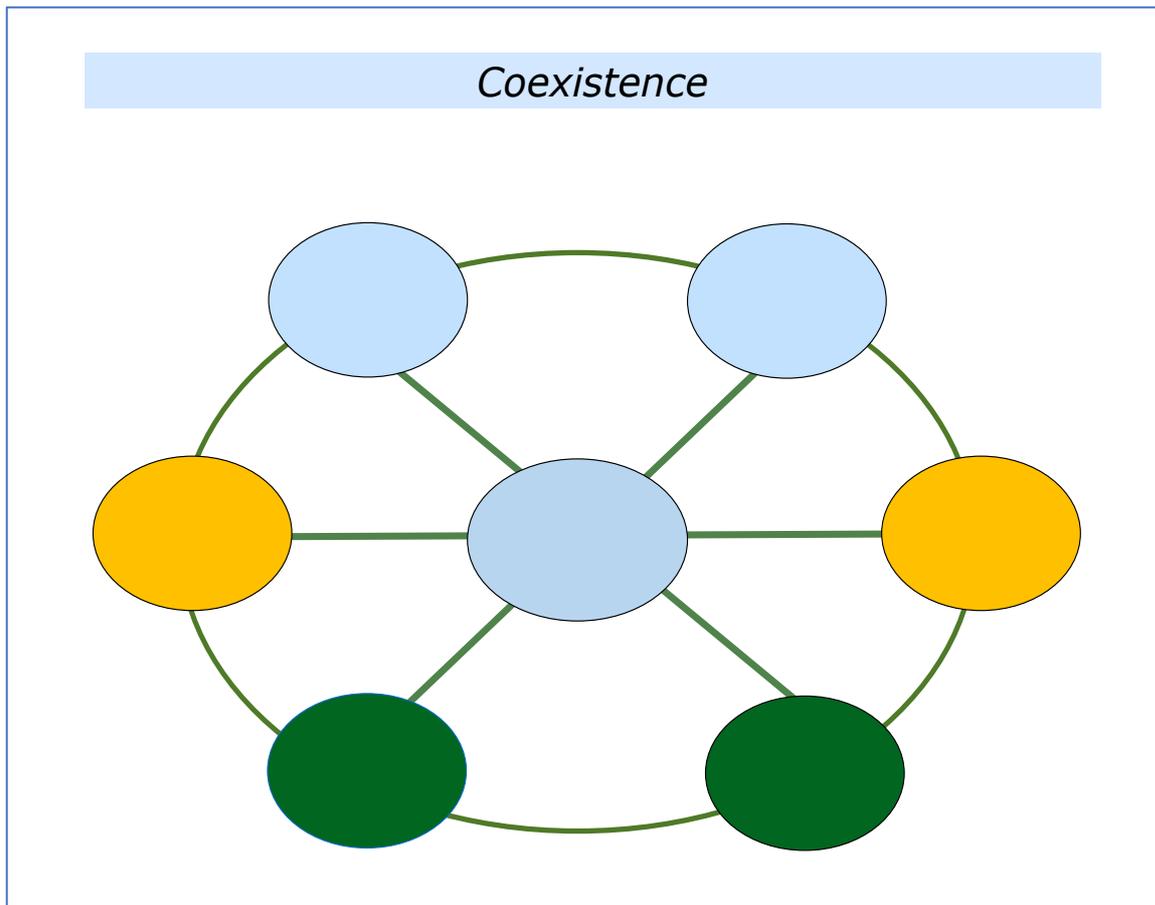

To produce success stories that enhanced the reputation of the customer and company;

To proactively keep the Chief Executive informed about their contribution towards achieving the company's picture of success.

The two people worked together to get some quick wins. They then developed a pattern of building on what they had in common rather than only focusing on differences. This laid the groundwork for helping them to achieve ongoing success.

There are many ways to encourage people to focus on common goals. Bearing this in mind, however, let's explore another approach that people take towards living and working together.

The Coexistence Approach

Some people follow the coexistence way of living or working together. They respect each other, accept differences and get on with living their lives. There are several definitions for coexistence. One of these is:

To live in peace with other as a matter of policy.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. It may be followed, for example:

By parents who divorce but cooperate in raising their children ... By people from different faiths or belief systems ... By people from different backgrounds ... By people in different countries.

Such people sometimes build on what they have in common. They may also do some things differently but this is accepted or even encouraged - providing they do not hurt others in the process.

Some companies follow the coexistence approach when they acquire businesses. Whilst other big companies take the complete take over approach and swallow up the other business, some companies aim to get the best of both worlds. They aim:

To integrate some generic systems and functions;

To give the acquired business autonomy – within certain parameters – to build on their strengths;

To make clear contracts with the acquired business about the outcomes they will deliver and their best contribution to the big company.

People who take the coexistence approach aim to live or work together in ways that help rather than hurt others. They are then able to live fruitful lives. Let's look at another route that is not as beneficial to others.

The Conflict Approach

People who take this route seem addicted to conflict. Some do it because they believe it is the only way to maintain their own existence. This may or may not be the case, but some do it for other reasons.

Some people are power driven and follow the conflict route to maintain their status. They start wars with other countries, criticise other people or scapegoat those who are different.

Such people aim to feel superior and are addicted to win-lose behaviour. They want to win and make sure that other people lose. This can create collateral damage and painful consequences.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow either the common goals or coexistence approaches? This could be in your personal or professional life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Common Goals And Coexistence Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow one of these approaches may be:

*

The specific things I can do then follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Strategy, Structure And Success Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to follow the right strategy and create the right structure that enables people to achieve success.

The term 'structure follows strategy' has passed into business folklore. It was coined by A.D.Chandler in the early 1960s.

He believed that it was vital for an organisation to clarify its strategy. It was then to create a structure that enabled its people and departments to follow the strategy and perform superb work.

Many organisations at the time started by creating a structure. They then told people to fit into it and do efficient work. If things did not work out, they changed the structure or the people.

Some organisations went further and believed that their structure was actually a strategy. This was seductive and gave leaders the illusion of control.

But the approach hit problems when technology or other events changed the world. Older style organisations still insisted on their people and customers following processes that were suited to another age. This sometimes led to their demise.

Great workers, teams and organisations start by clarifying their strategy. They then create a structure that enables people and departments to play to their strengths, follow the strategy and deliver success.

(You can explore more about how to follow this approach in the section of this book called The Coordination Approach.)

Structure

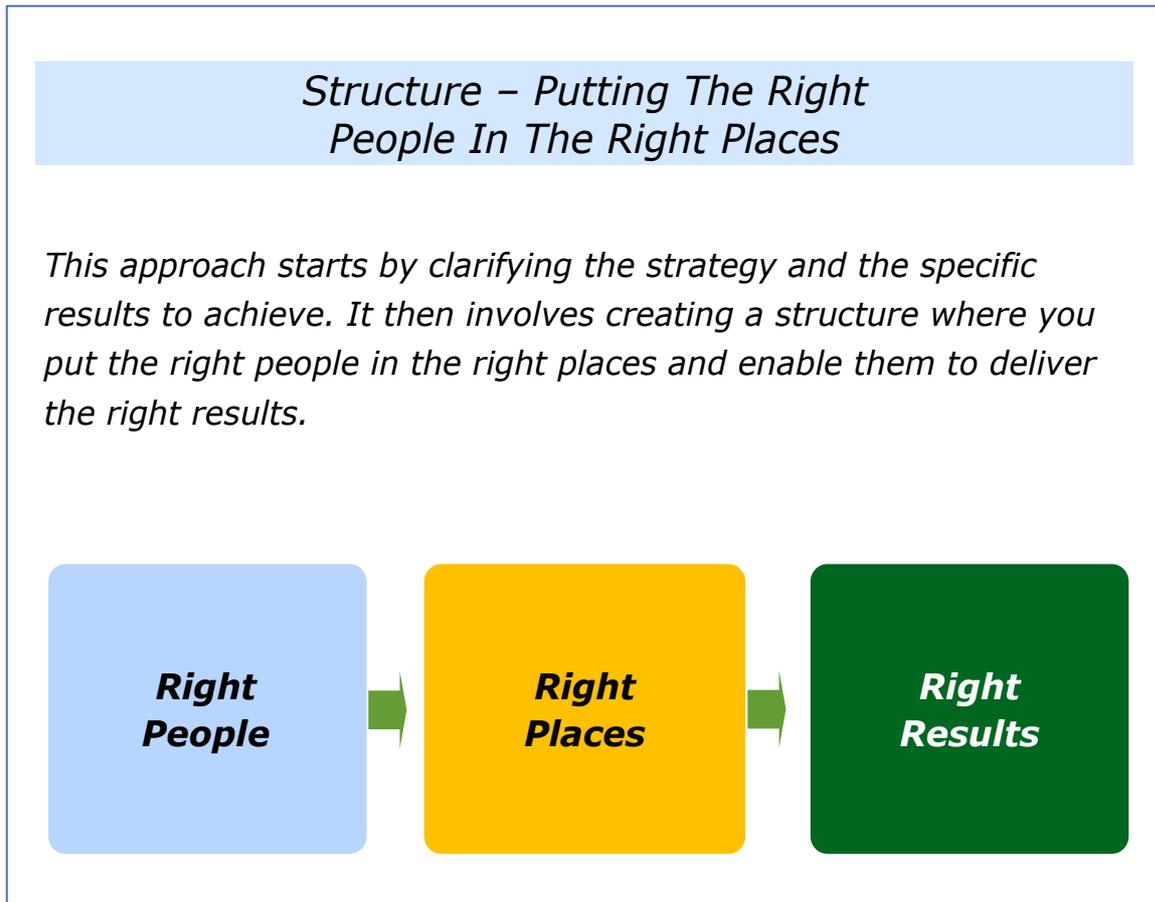

There are many ways to create a structure. One approach is to coordinate the strengths of people and departments so they follow the strategy and deliver success. You can aim:

- To clarify the strategy and the picture of success;
- To clarify how to coordinate the strengths of people and departments to follow the strategy and achieve success;
- To create a structure that encourages people to follow the strategy, perform superb work and deliver success.

Different organisations create such structures in different ways. One approach is to start by clarifying the strategy and the specific results to achieve. It is then to put the right people in the right places. People are then more likely to perform superb work and deliver the right results.

One key point. You may need to put together people with complementary strengths. You may have a senior manager, for example, who has strengths in one area but not others. You may need to ally them with somebody who has complementary strengths to help them fulfil the role.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the strategy, structure and success approach?

How can you clarify the strategy? How can you create a structure that enables yourself or other people to play to their strengths? How can you then focus on doing superb work and delivering success? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Strategy, Structure And Success Approach

The specific situation where I may want to use elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

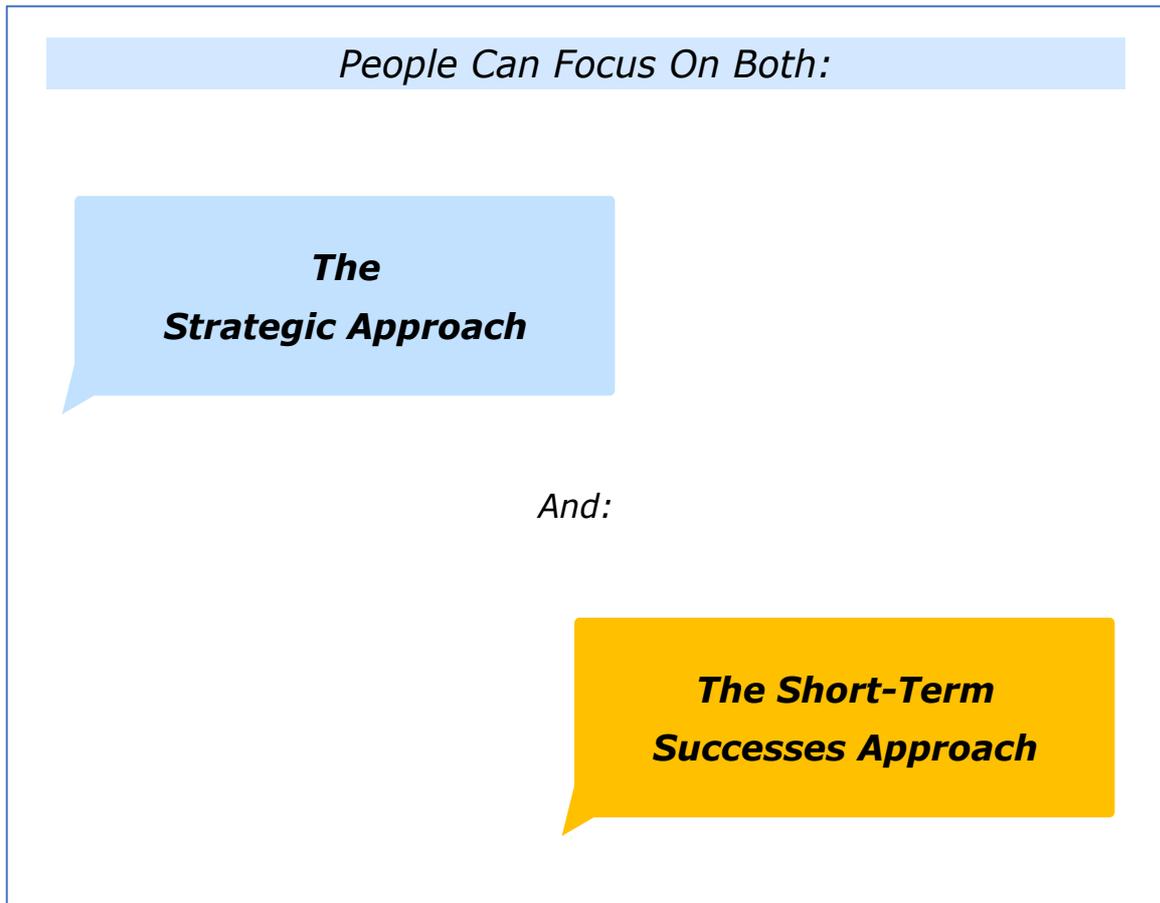

*The specific things that may happen
as a result of taking these steps may be:*

*

*

*

The Strategic And Short-Term Successes Approach

Imagine that you have been asked to take a leadership role and turnaround an organisation. You have done your due diligence and believe it is possible to make this happen. Bearing this in mind, it will be important:

To clarify and communicate the strategy for achieving the picture of success;

To make clear contracts with people about their specific contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To get some short-term successes and maintain momentum on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Taking this approach can buy time. It can also create the space to ensure the organisation is following the right strategy with the right people in the right way.

Some organisations do so-called strategic reviews but fail to ask the real strategic questions and simply focus on changing the structure. One Premier League football club, for example, avoided relegation with one match remaining. The board then gave the following messages.

"We are going to do a strategic review ... We need to do a root and branch restructure of the club ... We must not be in this position again."

The so-called strategic review was done by the board - the people who had created the mess at the club. As a result, they decided:

To retain their own positions on the board ... To restructure many elements of the organisation below them ... To retain the head coach and their staff ... To hope they could survive by not getting the goal-scorers needed to win matches.

The review did not translate into success on the field. Six months later they again found themselves in the relegation places. Stung into action, they replaced the coaching staff.

Let's return to the theme of clarifying an organisation's strategy and then getting some short-term successes. We can begin by focusing on the following theme.

The Strategic Approach

Imagine that you have been invited to turnaround an organisation. Different leaders take different approaches when aiming to make this happen.

As mentioned earlier, the first step is to do their due diligence to make sure it is possible to achieve the desired goals. Some people then take the following steps.

They make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the picture of success

They show they understand the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. They show how they will get some quick successes and do their best to achieve the goals. They make clear contracts about the support required to achieve the picture of success.

They clarify the strategy for achieving the picture of success

They will have already clarified some elements of the strategy for achieving the goals. They will also have agreed with the stakeholders on the key principles to follow. Bearing these in mind, they will clarify the strategy they aim to pursue.

Different leaders clarify the strategy in different ways. One approach is for them to explore the following themes.

What

What are our goals? What the real results we want to achieve? Bearing in mind what we can control, what may it be possible to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the results?

Why

Why do we want to reach the goals? What will be the benefits for the various stakeholders? What will be the pluses? What may be any potential minuses? How can we build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

How

How can we do our best to achieve the goals? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success? How can we perform superb work? What are the kinds of support that people need to achieve the results?

Who

Who are the kinds of people we need to work towards the goals? What are the attitudes and abilities they need to demonstrate? How can we employ people with such strengths? How can we make clear contracts about their best contributions? How can we then coordinate their strengths to work towards the goals?

When

How can we translate the strategies into a clear action plan? What is the road map with the milestones along the way? How can we get some quick successes? How can we keep doing reality checks about what is working and what can be improved? How can we reach the goals and then add that touch of class?

They communicate the strategy and make clear contracts with people about their contributions to picture of success

Good leaders communicate the strategy and explain how to get some quick successes. They show how people can contribute to the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They then give people time to decide if they want to contribute. If so, they make clear contracts with people about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

They encourage and enable people to work towards achieving the picture of success

They encourage people to follow the agreed principles and perform superb work. They manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They educate people to focus on continuous improvement and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

The Short-Term Successes Approach

Good leaders keep communicating the strategy but also aim to get some quick successes. This helps to build momentum on the way towards achieving the picture of success. Let's look at one example.

The Premier League football club eventually reached a critical point. At that juncture they decided to appoint a head coach who had a record of turning around clubs.

The head coach make clear contracts with the board about: a) the outcomes to be delivered; b) the strategies to follow; c) the support required to deliver the goods. They also had the autonomy required to make this happen.

The head coach communicated the overall strategy to all the key people in the club. They then aimed to get some short-term successes both on and off the field.

The players welcomed this approach. They felt more comfortable following a consistent strategy rather being subject to constant changes. Bearing this in mind, the coaching staff encouraged the players:

To follow a clear game plan – this involved playing to their strengths and getting the basics right;

To prepare properly for games – this involved giving 100% in training and practicing following the strategies when under pressure;

To have a positive mentality – this involved focusing on improving their performance rather than worrying about results.

The head coach believed that the squad had certain strengths. They also recognised that most of the goals would need to come from set pieces – corners or free kicks – plus some from midfield. They encouraged the players to follow a certain game plan. This involved aiming:

To build from a solid base – a strong defence;

To maximise the opportunities to score from set pieces and midfield;

To stay calm in situations whilst also doing their best.

The approach resulted in the team winning their first game – which was against the league leaders. There were then several ups-and-downs but the team aimed to continue to follow the agreed principles.

The Premier League team managed to avoid relegation by winning on the final day. The head coach then expressed the view that, whilst this was a relief, the next months should involve continuing to focus on and evolve the strategic plan.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the strategic and short-term successes approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Strategic And Short-Term Successes Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way may be:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Approach Rather Than The Personality Driven Approach

Many organisations start by being personality driven. They may have a charismatic or inspiring founder who creates a movement, idea, product, service or cause. They attract others with the power of their idea or the force of the personality.

Such organisations may only thrive in the long-term if they become principles driven. One approach is for them to clarify and communicate their principles. They then encourage their people to follow these principles to achieve ongoing success.

Some leaders have strong personalities. This can have both pluses and minuses. People may feel inspired and energised. They may sometimes feel intimidated, however, or rely on the leader for everything.

Great organisations often focus on clarifying and communicating their principles. These provide a guiding compass. People can then use their personalities to follow these principles in their work. This is an approach that I have seen work in many organisations.

Different organisations take this approach in different ways. One way is for them to go through the following steps.

Great Organisations Are Often Principles Driven

- They clarify and communicate the principles they would like their people to follow - together with the reasons for these – on the way towards achieving the picture of success.
- They encourage people to focus on how they can use their personalities to follow these principles and do superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.
- They continually reinforce the principles by sharing success stories that highlight how people have followed these to do superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the principles driven approach?

You may want to do this when working as an individual, leading a team or leading an organisation. What may be the benefits of following this approach?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Principles Driven Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of follow this approach may be:

*

*

*

The Managing The Principles Rather Than Just Managing The People Approach

There are many ways to lead teams and organisations. One approach is to focus on managing the principles rather than just managing the people. Let's explore how this can work in practice.

Managing The Principles

Imagine that you lead an organisation. You want to build a principles driven organisation rather than a personality driven organisation. You want people to align their efforts by aiming:

To keep focusing on the principles and using these as a guiding compass in their daily work;

To keep translating the principles into action when working with customers, colleagues and other people;

To keep following the principles by applying their strengths and doing superb work on the way towards delivering success.

Different leaders follow this approach in different ways. One leader explained their approach in the following way.

"We as a leadership team find it helpful to keep going back to the principles when faced by challenging situations. We ask ourselves the following questions.

"What are the principles we want to follow in our work? How can we follow the principles in this specific situation? What are the possible routes we can follow? What are the pluses and minuses of each route?"

"What is the route that is closest to our principles? How can we translate this into action? How can we build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?"

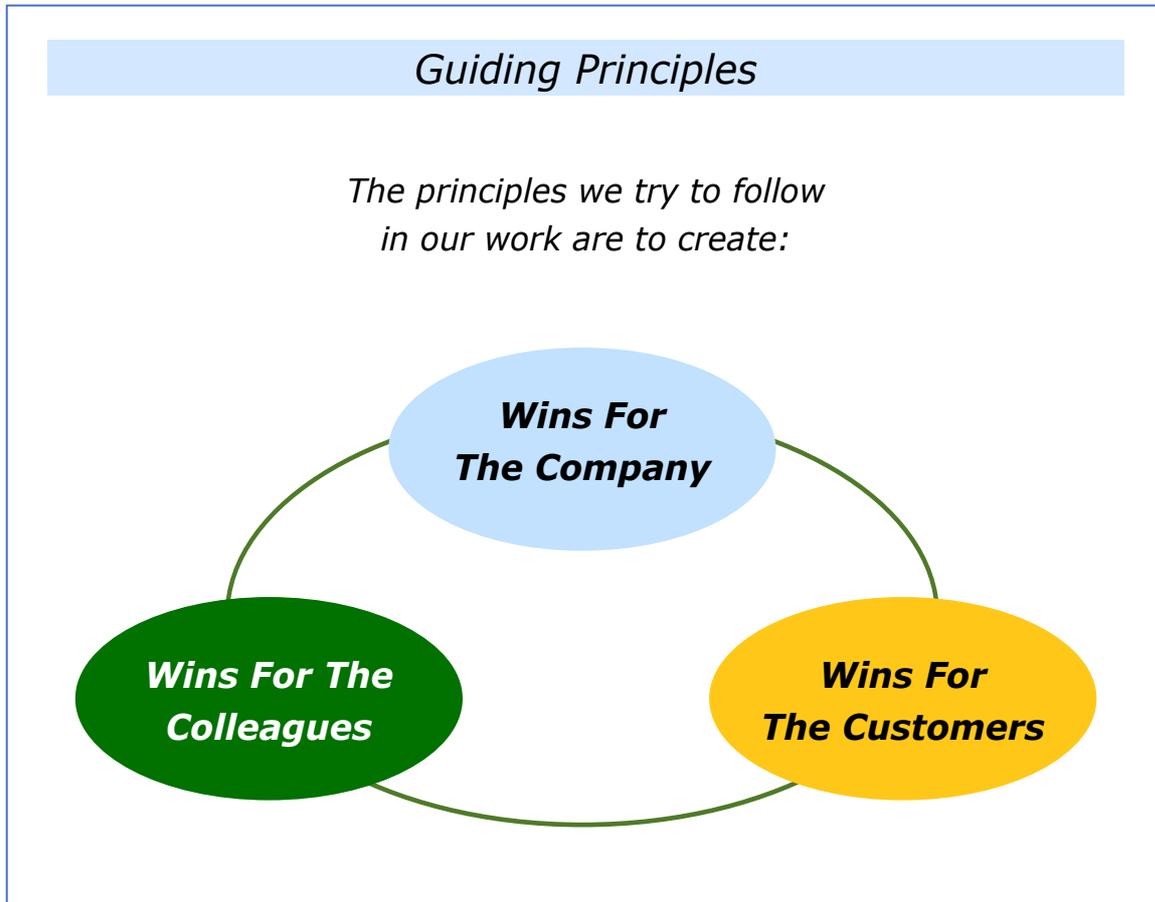

Some people may balk at this approach. They may argue that every person and every situation is different. Certainly that is true and certain extenuating circumstances can be taken into account.

Great leaders, teams and organisations, however, keep returning to their core principles. They use these as a framework when making decisions. They then translate these into action in the ways they work with customers, colleagues and other people.

Different people may follow different principles. One leader described their company's approach in the following way.

"We have guiding principles that we use as a compass. We aim to create wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues.

"We see these principles as interrelated. Whenever possible we try to create wins for all these stakeholders. Sometimes it can be challenging but it us helps to keep coming back to this compass."

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow the managing by principles approach?

What may be the principles you want to follow in the situation? How can you follow these in ways that create wins for as many stakeholders as possible? How can you translate these principles into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing By Principles

The specific situation where I want to manage by principles may be:

*

The specific principles I want to follow in the situation are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate these principles into action in the situation are:

*

*

*

The Communicating The Guidelines For Thriving In A Culture Approach

Good Organisations

They continue to communicate the guidelines – the Dos and Don'ts – that people can follow to thrive in a culture. They also explain the reasons for these guidelines.

The Dos

Do ...

Do ...

Do ...

The Don'ts

Don't ...

Don't ...

Don't ...

Good organisations communicate the guidelines – the Dos and Don'ts - that people can follow to thrive in a culture. They also explain the reasons for these guidelines.

Every system has rules. The system may be a family, work place or other culture. Sometimes these rules are spoken and made tangible. Sometimes they are not spoken and are less tangible.

People like clarity. They like to know the rules about how to behave in a certain system. They can then decide if they want to follow these in their own way.

Some systems have rules that are encouraging. They help people to develop and do their best. Some systems have rules that can be repressive or confusing.

Good cultures take the first approach. They continually explain the Dos and Don'ts for doing good work. For example:

Do have a positive attitude ... Do take responsibility ... Do be proactive.

Do make clear contracts about your contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals ... Do deliver the goods ... Do help the organisation, your customers and your colleagues to achieve success.

Do take care of your health ... Do encourage other people ... Do keep developing as a person and as a professional.

(The Don'ts may be the opposite of some of the Dos.)

Some cultures have rules that may not be so healthy. They implicitly give people the following messages:

Do compete against each other ... Do flatter your boss ... Do remember that you are only here to make money for the organisation.

Good leaders continue to explain the guidelines that people can follow to thrive in a culture. As mentioned earlier, they also describe the reasons for following the guidelines.

Different leaders do this in different situations. They may do it when running a workshop, leading a team or shaping the culture in a company. They realise it is also important to keep communicating these guidelines.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Communicating The Guidelines For Thriving In A Culture

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

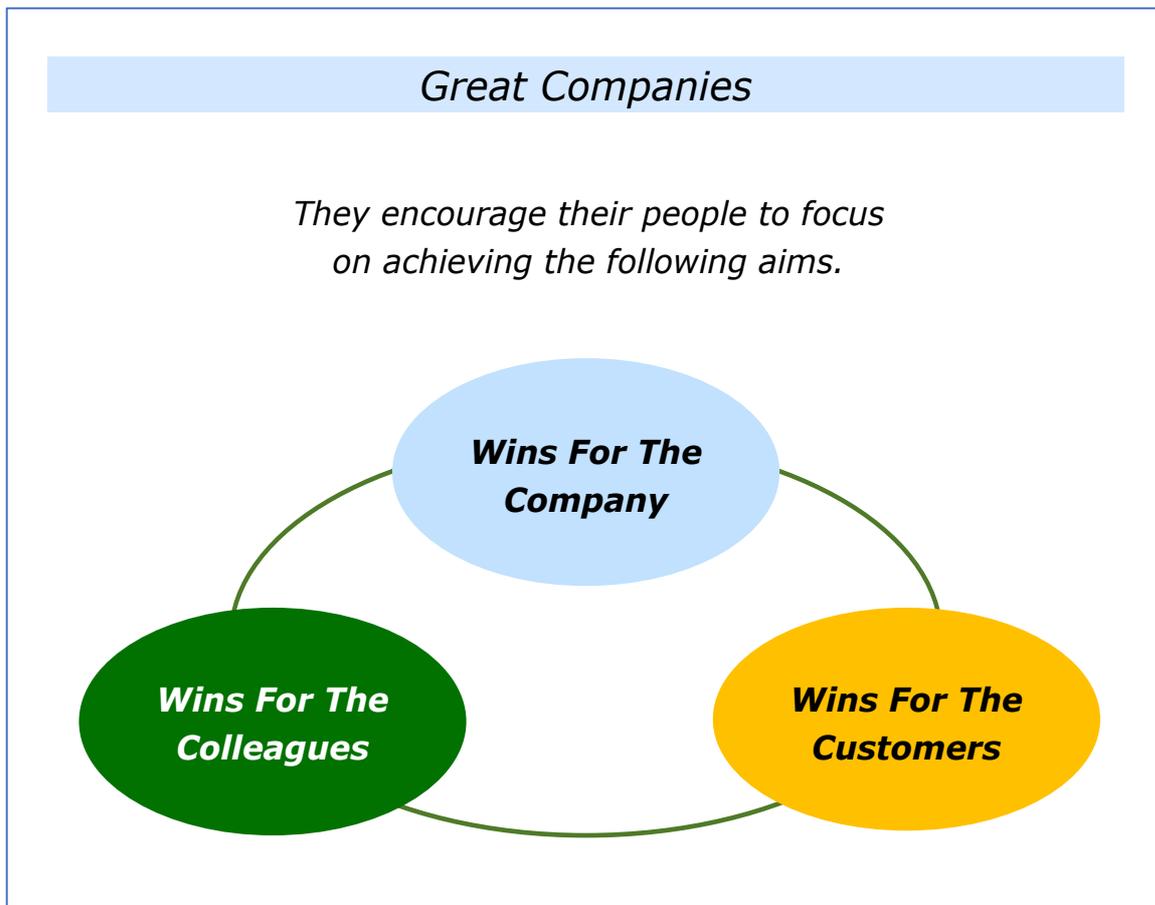

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Wins For The Company, Customers And Colleagues Approach

There are many way to build successful companies. Some aim to get wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues.

Sometimes it is necessary to concentrate on one of these areas, but it is vital to recognise the circular nature of this approach. Over the long haul it is important to get wins for all these groups of stakeholders.

Companies that focus only on wins for their shareholders may alienate their customers and colleagues.

Focusing only on wins for the customers may build a good reputation but not produce profits.

Focusing only on wins for the colleagues may build a happy work place but the company may go bankrupt.

The circular approach is more likely to build a sustainable and successful company. Let's explore these themes.

Wins For Company

Imagine that you are running a company. It will be important to make enough profit:

To keep the company going and deliver high professional standards;

To pay its stakeholders – its employees, backers and suppliers;

To build a good reputation and invest in shaping a positive future.

You can encourage your people to bear these things in mind when working with customers. This leads to the next step.

Wins For Customers

Great companies build on their strengths and do superb work that helps their stakeholders to achieve success. Bearing this in mind, it is important to encourage they people:

To understand the customer's goals;

To provide great service and do superb work;

To help the customer to achieve their goals.

It is important to do this in a way provides wins for the company and protects the wellbeing of its people. This leads to the next step.

Wins For Colleagues

Great companies create a positive environment in which motivated people can perform at their best. One approach they take is to encourage and enable them:

To build on their strengths and do satisfying work;

To deliver success for themselves, their colleagues, their customers and the company;

To continue to develop so that they can shape their future careers inside outside the company.

The latter point may sound counter-intuitive, but it is one that has been practiced by many of the companies with whom I have worked.

They recognise that people want to keep developing. Whenever possible, they aim to provide those opportunities within their company. There may come a time, however, when a person wants to move on.

Such companies find that helping people to develop leads to them becoming a preferred employer. This helps to attract people who want to perform at their best.

Great companies continue to get wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for the customers. As mentioned earlier, it is important to focus on all three areas.

Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the win-win-win approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Wins For The Company, Customers And Colleagues

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

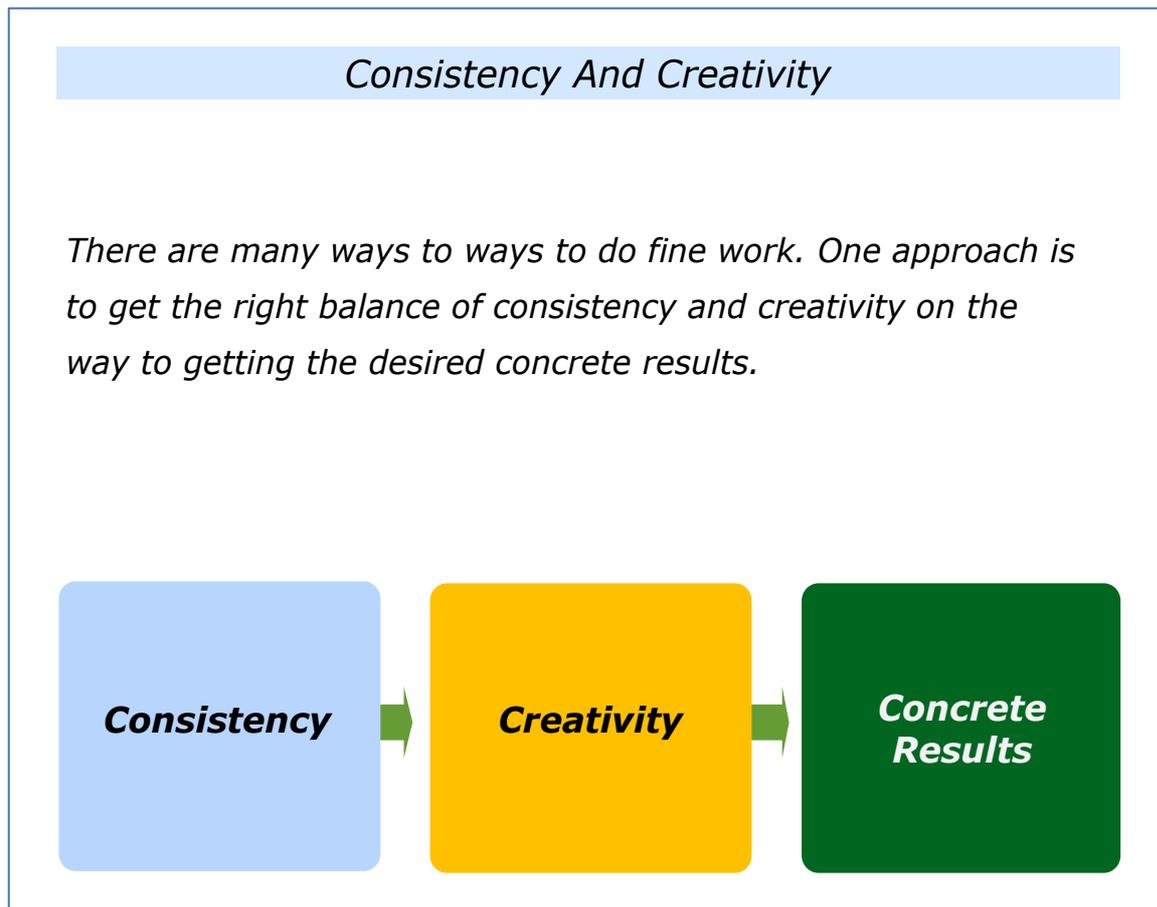

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Consistency, Creativity And Concrete Results Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to get the right balance between consistency and creativity on the way to achieving the desired concrete results. This piece describes how this approach can be used with teams but it can be applied in many situations.

Imagine you lead a team. One concern you have is that people may sometimes neglect the basics on their route to self-expression. Let's explore how you can encourage them to consistently perform superb work.

Concrete Results

The first step is to clarify the team's aims. You will have your own approach to taking this step. Whatever route you take, you may produce your own version of something along the following lines.

The Team's Goals

Bearing in mind the things we can control, here are the concrete results we want to do our best to achieve.

Concrete Results

The specific results we want to achieve are these. We want:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

Consistency

Imagine that you want your team to consistently deliver high professional standards. This can create the platform for encouraging people to add the brilliance. Let's explore how you can make this happen.

Start by gathering people together. You can explain the approach and, if appropriate, cover the following points in your own way. It can be useful:

To explain how superb teams get the right balance between consistency and creativity;

To bring this to life by giving specific examples of how teams have followed this approach;

To, if appropriate, invite people to come up with their own examples of how teams have followed this approach.

You can then invite people to tackle the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the specific results the team aims to achieve, you can invite them to take the following steps.

To brainstorm the specific things – such as the strategies and specific tasks – they believe people should do or deliver in a consistent way.

To discuss these ideas and then settle on what they believe to be the key things they believe people should do or deliver in a consistent way.

Here is the exercise on this theme. The illustration provides space for just three principles. But your team may add many more strategies, tactics and tasks that people should do in a consistent way.

Consistency

The specific things that people in the team can aim to do or deliver in a consistent way are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Creativity

Imagine that the team has clarified some of the things that people need to do or deliver in a consistent way. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can again give people the big picture and explain the context. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, you may wish to cover the following points in your own way. You can explain that it can be useful:

To keep delivering high professional standards in a consistent way;

To, when appropriate, apply their talents to be creative or find solutions to challenges;

To do this in a way that – as far as possible - gets wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues.

Depending on the field in which they operate, different teams will demonstrate creativity in different ways. They may aim either:

To do something special to provide great customer service;

To find solutions to challenging technical or human problems;

To deliver the goods by providing that touch of class.

Imagine that you have given people the context. You can then invite them to do the following things:

To brainstorm when they believe it may be important to encourage individuals to use their creativity to deliver the desired results;

To settle on what they believe to be the specific situations where people can use their creativity to deliver the desired results.

Here is the exercise on this theme. Your team may add many more than three ideas about how people can use their creativity to deliver the goods.

Creativity

The specific things that, when appropriate, people can be encouraged to do in a creative way to deliver the desired results are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Concrete Results

Imagine that you want to help the team to be good finishers. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, you may wish to cover the following points in your own way. You can explain that it may be important for people:

To keep developing by building on what they do well and tackling areas for improvement;

To anticipate and rehearse how they will manage challenges and potential unexpected events on the way to achieving the goals;

To follow their successful pattern for finishing and do their best to achieve the desired concrete results.

You can keep encouraging the team to get the right balance between consistency and creativity. If appropriate, you can also encourage them to clarify and follow the steps they can take to be good finishers. Here is the exercise you can invite them to do on this theme.

Concrete Results

The specific things that people can do to do their best to achieve the desired concrete results are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Debate, Decide And Deliver Approach

Many years ago I worked with Alison who led a fast moving team that produced excellent results. This was surprising, because the team worked within an organisation known for its stodginess.

Alison put the team's success down to knowing when to debate, decide and deliver. She explained this in the following way.

"We begin by clarifying what we can and can't debate. There are some things, for example, that are not up for debate.

"We focus on the topic we can debate, discuss it and then decide the way forwards. The next step is to deliver. So we get on and produce the goods.

"Some teams get mixed up because they keep going back to the debate stage."

Imagine that you are applying this approach to your own team. Let's explore how you can use it to deliver the goods.

The Debate Stage

Good leaders give people clear guidelines about the freedom they have to operate within. People then know whether they are focusing on debating, deciding or delivering. Poor teams get the three parts mixed up.

Bearing this in mind, you may want to say something along the following lines to your people.

"Looking at the year ahead, there are some areas that we can debate and some that we can't.

"We can't debate the organisational targets we must deliver. These include targets regarding profitability, product quality and the morale of our people. We need to deliver this scorecard.

"What we can debate is how, within parameters, we use our strengths to achieve these targets. We can also debate the other stimulating projects we can do that will help the organisation to achieve success.

"Bearing this in mind, let's settle on the things we can and can't debate. We can then go forward and explore the first topic we can debate."

Imagine that you have gone through this step and your team are clear about the topics they can debate. You may then move on to the next step.

The Decide Stage

Different leaders use different approaches to, when appropriate, involving their people in contributing to making decisions. Some leaders take the following approach.

They focus on the specific topic to be explored and then go through the following steps.

They clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

They clarify the potential choices, the consequences of each option and any possible creative solutions;

They clarify the route they want to follow, translate this into a clear action plan and get mission holders who will be responsible for delivering their parts of the plan.

You will have your own approach to making decisions in your team. The key is to conclude with a clear action plan plus mission holders who will be accountable for delivering their contributions.

The Deliver Stage

Good leaders ensure that their people deliver. Imagine that your team has embarked on doing the work. It is will be important for people to keep others informed about their progress towards delivering their part of the goals.

When appropriate, you can invite each mission holder – plus the people who are helping them – to present on the following themes.

The Picture of Success – The specific results we aim to deliver to contribute towards achieving the team’s goals are:

*

*

*

The Progress - The specific things we have delivered towards achieving these results in the past ... are:

*

*

*

The Plans - The specific things we plan to deliver towards achieving these results in the next ... are:

*

*

*

Different leaders have different ways of involving their people. People need to know the team's aims, however, and have a sense of ownership in making their part of it happen. They are then more likely to put their hearts into delivering the goods.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the debate, decide and deliver approach in your own team. How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Debate, Decide And Deliver Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

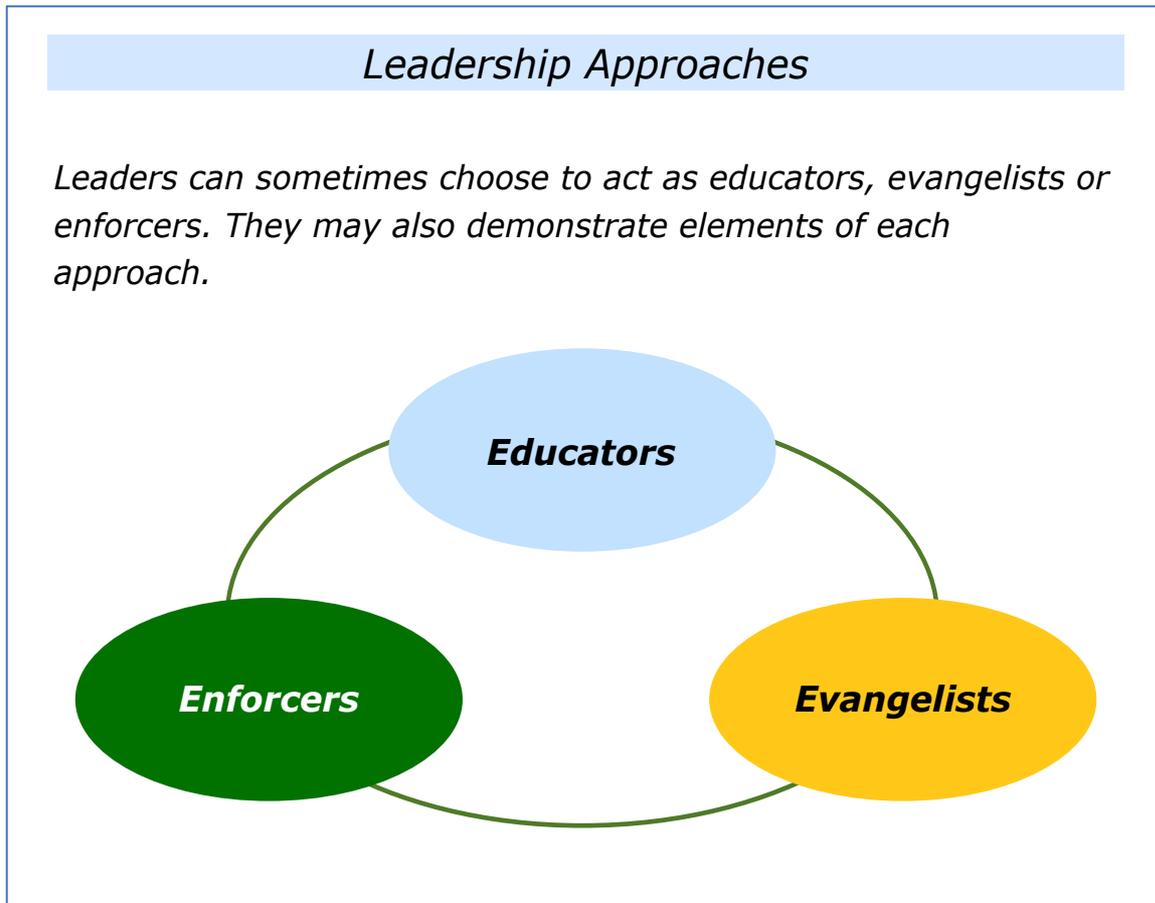

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Leader As Educator, Evangelist Or Enforcer Approaches

Leaders can choose to act as educators, evangelists or enforcers. They may also sometimes demonstrate elements of each approach. Let's explore these themes.

The Leader As Educator

Leaders who take this approach often display the characteristics of good educators. They are positive and predictable. They also aim to create in an environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance.

Such leaders believe in giving people the big picture and treating them like adults. They may take the following approach when, for example, explaining the aims of an organisation.

They explain the purpose, principles and picture of success. They also explain the benefits – for all the various stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success.

They explain the professional deal. This involves describing the company's responsibilities and the individual's responsibilities in working to achieve the goals. This includes describing the required professional standards.

Such leaders then invite people to take time to decide if they want to opt in. They then make clear contracts about people's best contributions towards achieving the goals.

They often aim to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They also do their best to encourage, educate and enable people to do superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Such leaders believe it is vital for people to make their own decisions regarding opting in. They don't want people to feel they have been sold something and later feeling resentful.

They believe in giving people the big picture and explaining the purpose of the work. They then aim to work with people who want to deliver high standards rather than those who see themselves as hostages.

They believe in the work they are doing. They may therefore sometimes show elements of being an evangelist but they do not believe in persuading people. It is up to people to choose to opt in.

Such leaders are prepared to act as enforcers, however, in certain situations. They may take this approach to protect the culture if some individuals choose not to meet the required professional standards.

They then give the person an option. The person can choose to deliver the required professional standards or they can move on. It is there choice and there are consequences.

Good leaders sometimes take the educator approach. Like any approach, however, there are both pluses and minuses.

The Potential Pluses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The educational approach can create a positive environment, give people the big picture and provide the reasons for following certain principles. It works well with people who want behave like adults, deliver high professional standards and make their best contributions.

It can also encourages people to keep focusing on the principles. These provide a framework that they can use to become more self-managing and make good decisions. The approach also helps to build the foundations for achieving ongoing success.

The Potential Minuses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The approach involves doing a lot of work to explain the big picture and the reasons for following certain principles. It calls for a serious approach to recruitment in terms of employing people who are prepared to take responsibility.

It does not necessarily work with people who are used to following lists or being managed by tasks. It also calls for acting decisively if some people choose not to follow the desired professional standards.

The Leader As Evangelist

Leaders who take this approach often aim to inspire people to work towards achieving a specific goal. They can be energetic, enthusiastic and, in some cases, enterprising.

They may also be charismatic. They may communicate a compelling story and get people to sign up to making it happen. Some talk about:

"Selling a vision and getting people to buy in."

They can excite people but there can also be downsides. They may build a company that is personality driven. People may feel inspired to sign up but then rely on the leader to keep inspiring them in the future.

Such leaders sometimes focus more on the selling of ideas rather than the actual substance. They may also try too hard to persuade people or get offended if certain people do not sign up to the cause.

The Potential Pluses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The evangelist approach can create a positive environment. People can feel inspired by the story and want to contribute towards making it happen. This can sometimes give them strength when times get tough.

The Potential Minuses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The organisation may become personality driven and people become dependent on regular injections of inspiration. This can lead to a kind of institutionalisation where people look to the leader rather than make their own considered decisions.

People may also aim to copy the leader in the way they talk, dress and treat others. Depending on the leader's personality style, this can have either positive or negative effects.

The leader may also be perceived as trying to do things to people. They may try to persuade people rather than letting make their own decisions. Whilst people may sign up on the spot, they may later have buyer's remorse

The Leader As Enforcer

Leaders who take this approach often have strong personalities. They believe in their own view of the world and want to enforce it on other people.

Such leaders can be intimidating. They may issue commands and expect others to follow them. This can lead to creating fear and micromanaging people.

Some leaders who take this approach have good intentions. They want people to deliver high quality standards. The way they express this can sometimes come across as bullying, however, and create collateral damage.

The Potential Pluses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The pluses of this approach are heavily weighted in favour of the enforcer. They feel powerful and enjoy their status. They may intimidate people into delivering short term results but these seldom last.

The Potential Minuses Of This Approach Can Include The Following

The minuses of this approach often affect people on the receiving end. They can feel intimidated and belittled. They may carry out the tasks but be continually criticised. This can lead to them experiencing different symptoms including physical or psychological pain.

Imagine that you are a leader. Can you think of a situation where, for example, you may want to follow elements of the educator approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Leader As Educator Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The My Perfect Next Year For My Team Approach

My Perfect Next Year For My Team

This would be that we continue to focus on our purpose and principles and we deliver the following things under these headings.

Profitability – This would be that:

We ...

We ...

We ...

Products – This would be that:

We ...

We ...

We ...

People- This would be that:

We ...

We ...

We ...

This is an exercise that can be used when helping the CEO and the senior leaders to clarify the goals for their teams. It can help to create alignment but also encourage them to use their imagination when looking ahead to the next year.

There are many ways to use this approach. Let's look at one method that can be used when working with the senior leadership team.

Step One - The CEO Shares Their View Of 'My Perfect Next Year For My Team'

The CEO takes time to do this exercise before the senior leadership team planning session. When doing so, it will be important for them:

To clarify the specific goals the organisation needs to deliver by the end of the next year;

To clarify these specific goals under the headings of, for example: a) profits – the profits to achieve; b) products – the product quality and customer service to achieve; c) people – the specific culture to achieve.

To clarify the specific ways they would like the senior team members to operate in terms of helping to deliver these goals.

Different CEO's will describe different things when doing this exercise. Here is one example of what such a leader may produce.

My Perfect Next Year For My Team

This would be that we continue to focus on our purpose and principles and that we deliver the following things under these headings.

Profitability – This would be that:

We deliver the agreed profitability for our backers;

We make x amount from our present products;

We make x amount from our developing future products.

Products (Including Services) – This would be that:

We enable our people to deliver great service to our customers and this produces at least 20 success stories;

We improve our systems to make it easy for both our customers and our own people to do superb work;

We develop x number of future products and services that will enable our customers and ourselves to achieve future success.

People – This would be that:

We continue to have a culture where our people focus on our purpose and follow our principles to deliver success;

We continue to create a positive work place that the vast majority of our people would recommend to a friend as a great place to work;

We continue to build a strengths-based organisation where people can do great work and also feel they are progressing in the professional lives.

If appropriate, the CEO can invite people to add to the points that they have outlined. They can do this by transferring what they have written to flip charts. They can then say something along the following lines.

"I have written what I would like to see us as a senior leadership team deliver in the next year. I would now like each of you to do the following things.

"First, to take time to reflect and consider what you would like to see added to these aims.

"Second, to write each of your ideas on separate Post-its.

"Third, for each of you come up and put your Post-its on the appropriate flip chart and explain what you have written.

"I will then take away this information and, where appropriate, aim to weave it into our aims as a senior team."

Imagine that the CEO has encouraged people to go through this process. They may then move on to the next stage.

Step Two – Each Of The Senior Leaders Do The Exercise 'My Perfect Next Year For My Team'

This step involves each of the senior leaders doing this exercise. When doing so, it can be useful for them to relate their aims to the organisational aims outlined by the CEO.

Each senior leader will, of course, focus on their specific areas of interest and the goals their department will deliver. They may focus mainly on either the profits, products or people parts.

This highlights some key things about the individual senior leaders. Whilst one of these areas may be their key remit, it can be important for their team to also focus on the other aspects. This is particularly so when it comes to the people part.

The CEO can get valuable information about each of the senior leaders' focus. Bearing these things in mind – and in a non-judgemental way - the exercise demonstrates the following things.

The specific senior leader's natural default and where they will focus their energy;

The specific areas where they and their team may need support – such as focusing on the people aspect;

The specific things that can be done to help each of the senior leaders' teams to cover any needs in the areas of profits, products or people.

Imagine that each of the senior leaders have completed and presented the exercise on 'My Perfect Next Year For My Team'. The CEO can then take this away and begin building the plan for the next year.

This can then lead to Step Three – which we will look at shortly. Before then, however, it can be useful to mention the following possibility.

The Individual Contributor Approach

It may be that a leader is leading to team of individual contributors. If that is the case, they can each do a similar exercise called

My Perfect Next Year Would Be:

To ...

To ...

To ...

They can describe the specific contribution they would like to make to achieving the team's goals. Plus any other things they would like to add.

Let's return to the scenario where the CEO has gathered the information from the other people. This can lead to the next stage.

Step Three – The CEO Puts Together The Strategic Plan For Delivering The Perfect Next Year

The CEO may then work with a small team to put together the strategic plan for the next year. Different people will do this in different ways. One approach is for them to take the following steps.

To build on the CEO's original presentation and add any ideas that emerged from the session that would strengthen The Perfect Next Year;

To clarify the key strategies the senior team can follow to increase the chances of delivering The Perfect Next Year;

To meet with the senior leadership team members and make clear contracts about each leader's contribution to ensuring their own teams and the organisation delivers The Perfect Next Year.

The CEO may also appoint a coordination team. This team can then support the senior leaders and help them to deliver their parts of the plan and do their best to achieve The Perfect Next Year.

Different CEO's will use different methods for creating alignment. This piece has described one approach that involves people focusing on the organisation's and their team's Perfect Next Year

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The My Perfect Next Year For My Team Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

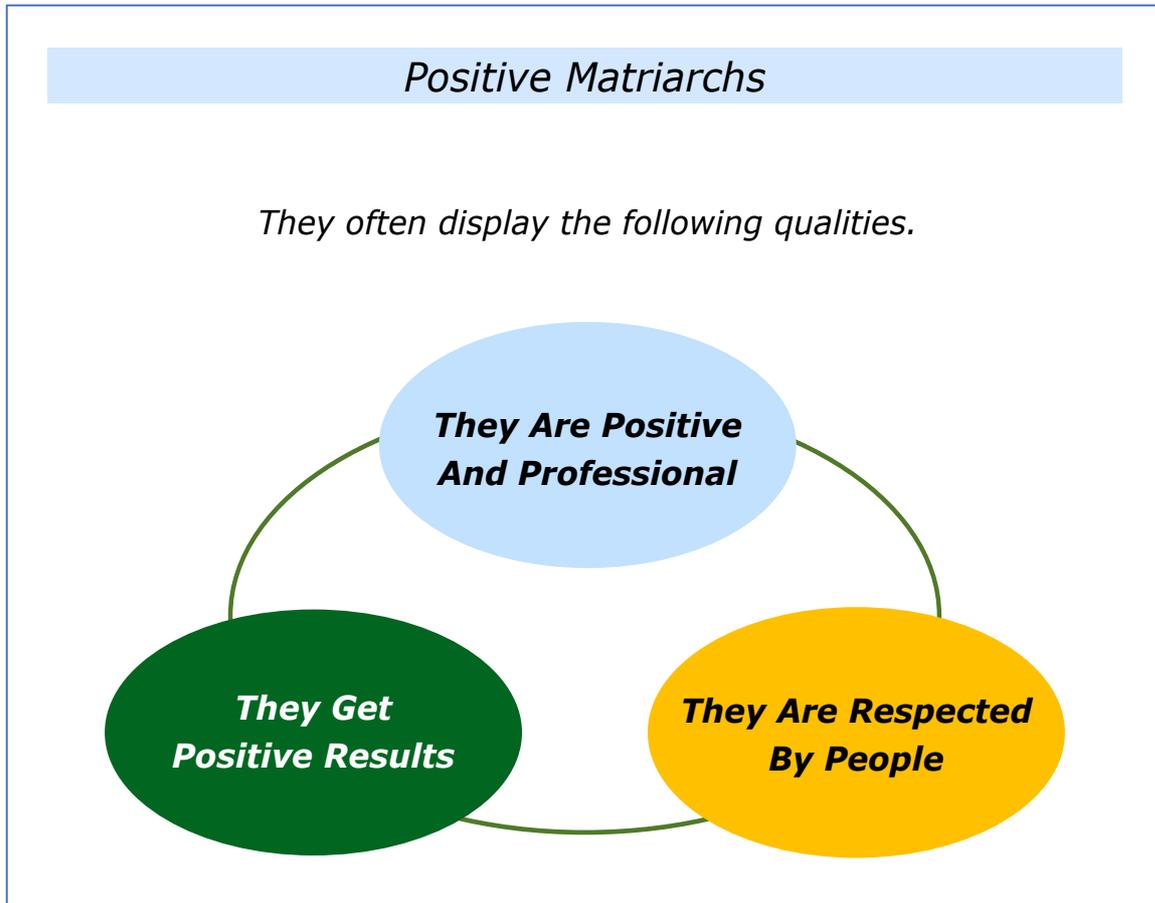

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Matriarch Approach

Positive matriarchs play a key part in helping teams and organisations to achieve success. They have formal professional roles but they also often act as custodians of the culture.

Such matriarchs act as positive models and demonstrate high professional standards. They are also savvy and know how to get positive results. People often like working for them, but also know what is and is not accepted.

Looking back, can you think of a woman who played such a role? What were the qualities she demonstrated? How did she translate these into action? How did other people respond to the matriarch?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

A Positive Matriarch In The Past

The name of the woman who acted as a positive matriarch was:

*

*The positive qualities
they demonstrated were:*

*

*

*

The positive influence they had on the people and the workplace was:

*

*

*

Many positive matriarchs demonstrate some of the following qualities. Let's explore these themes.

They Are Positive And Professional

Such people are often warm and welcoming. They show an interest in people but also have a strong work ethic. They expect themselves and others to deliver good work on a daily basis.

During the past fifty years I have worked in many places where women played this role. These have included therapeutic communities, schools, businesses and other organisations.

Such matriarchs often acted as custodians of the cultures. They safeguarded the principles and ensured these were translated into action. They created a positive atmosphere but also made sure that people got the work done.

They Are Respected By People

Positive matriarchs provide the positivity and predictability that maintains an organisation. They are respected by people because of their personality and professionalism.

People also know that the matriarch expects them to deliver certain standards, however, so they don't try to get away with poor work. Some may do to begin with, but they soon decide to deliver the goods or move on.

Such women often act as good models for young professionals who aspire to develop their careers. They may also mentor such people and pass on knowledge about how to retain their sanity whilst also delivering success.

They Are Good At Getting Positive Results

Many positive matriarchs have been around the block. They have had many different experiences in their personal and professional lives.

They have worked for superb leaders, dysfunctional leaders and many in-between. They have worked for great organisations and those that perform poorly.

They may have raised families, run refugee centres, coached sports teams, dealt with crises and led business teams. Most of all, they know how to get things done.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, imagine that you lead an organisation. What may be the kind of situation when you may want to hire a positive matriarch?

What could be the benefits of bringing in such a person? What could you do to find such a person and then give them the support they need to do superb work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

A Positive Matriarch In The Future

The specific situation where I may want to employ a positive matriarch may be:

*

The positive benefits they may bring to the workplace may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to find such a person and then give them the support they need to do superb work are:

*

*

*

The Similarity Of Spirit And Diversity Of Strengths Approach

Great teams embody a certain spirit. They are also often made up of people who have similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths. Diversity of spirit is a recipe for disaster.

Spirit gets people so far. But it is the diversity of strengths that enables them to produce something special when it matters.

Such teams start by defining the spirit – the principles - they want people to demonstrate. Attitude is non-negotiable but they want characters not clones.

They also recognise that people will express the spirit in different ways. But is vital that people always demonstrate high professional standards in their work.

Great teams often employ people who have a positive attitude. They then encourage them to use their strengths to follow certain principles and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's explore how some of these themes relate to individuals and organisations.

A Person's Spirit

Different people have different kinds of spirit. They may demonstrate this in the way they behave and the effect they have on other people. For example, they may be:

*Generous, kind and encouraging ... Caring, creative and a bit crazy ...
Cruel, selfish and mean.*

How to define a person's spirit? One approach is to do the following exercise. This involves doing three things.

First, write the name of the person. Second, write three words that you believe describe the person's spirit. Third, describe some of the ways that they translate this spirit into action.

This approach is subjective, of course, and other people may use different words to describe the person. But it can be a starting point. Here is the exercise.

The Person's Name Is ...

The three words I would use to describe their spirit are:

*

*

*

The specific ways they translate this spirit into action are:

*

*

*

A Team's Spirit

Different teams also demonstrate different kinds of spirit. People who work in a hospice, for example, may follow different principles from those in a sports team or financial institution.

The team's spirit will shape the culture and the effects this has on people. For example, the culture it creates may be either:

Caring, compassionate and people focused ... Positive, professional and peak performing ... Cold, competitive and callous.

Imagine that you lead a team. Try exploring the following themes.

What may be the kind of spirit that you want people to demonstrate in the way they behave and work?

How would they translate this spirit into action?

What may be the reasons why you would like people to demonstrate this kind of spirit?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Team's Spirit

The spirit we would like people in our team to demonstrate is:

*

*

*

The specific ways they would translate this spirit into action would be:

*

*

*

The reasons why we would like people to demonstrate this spirit are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you lead a team and want to follow elements of this approach. Let's explore two ways you can make this happen.

The Recruiting For Spirit Approach

There are many ways to recruit people. One approach is to clarify whether a person has the right spirit and strengths to help the team or organisation to achieve its picture of success. They may therefore take the following steps.

They start by clarifying the spirit they want people to demonstrate

Imagine that you have already clarified the spirit – the principles or professional standards – you want people to demonstrate. If so, you can move onto the next theme followed by some teams and organisations

They clarify whether a candidate may have the spirit they want people to demonstrate

One organisation I worked with took the following steps when interviewing people. They sent the candidate a booklet that described:

The specific principles they wanted people in the organisation to follow;

The specific reasons why they wanted people to follow these principles;

The specific ways that these principles could be translated into action.

The booklet was illustrated with examples and success stories that showed how employees had followed the principles in their daily work.

The candidate was invited to do some prework which they then presented at the interview. They were asked:

To describe a specific time in when they had aimed to follow one of the principles – this could be in their personal or professional life;

To describe the specific things they did to translate the principle into action;

To describe the specific things they would do to aim to follow this principle in their work in the organisation.

This sounds an enormous task but it was vital. Some candidates rose to the challenge, others did not. The organisation saw recruitment as one of its most important tasks. It looked for people who took responsibility and aimed:

To have a positive attitude;

To help other people – such as customers and colleagues - to succeed;

To keep developing as professionals

The organisation aimed to recruit such people and involve them in a positive induction process. They then made decisions about the person's future towards the end of the probationary period. The organisation found this often proved to be successful.

The Success Stories Approach

Some teams and organisations aim to reward the behaviour they want repeated. They continually publish success stories that highlight when people have demonstrated the required spirit. The aims are:

To keep showing people what good looks like when the spirit – such as the principles - are translated into action;

To show people the benefits – to all the various stakeholders - of following these principles;

To encourage people to apply their strengths to follow these principles in the future and help the organisations to achieve success.

Great teams continue to follow the similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths approach. They encourage people to follow the principles and coordinate their professional strengths to deliver sustainable success.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Similarity Of Spirit And Diversity Of Strengths Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

*

*

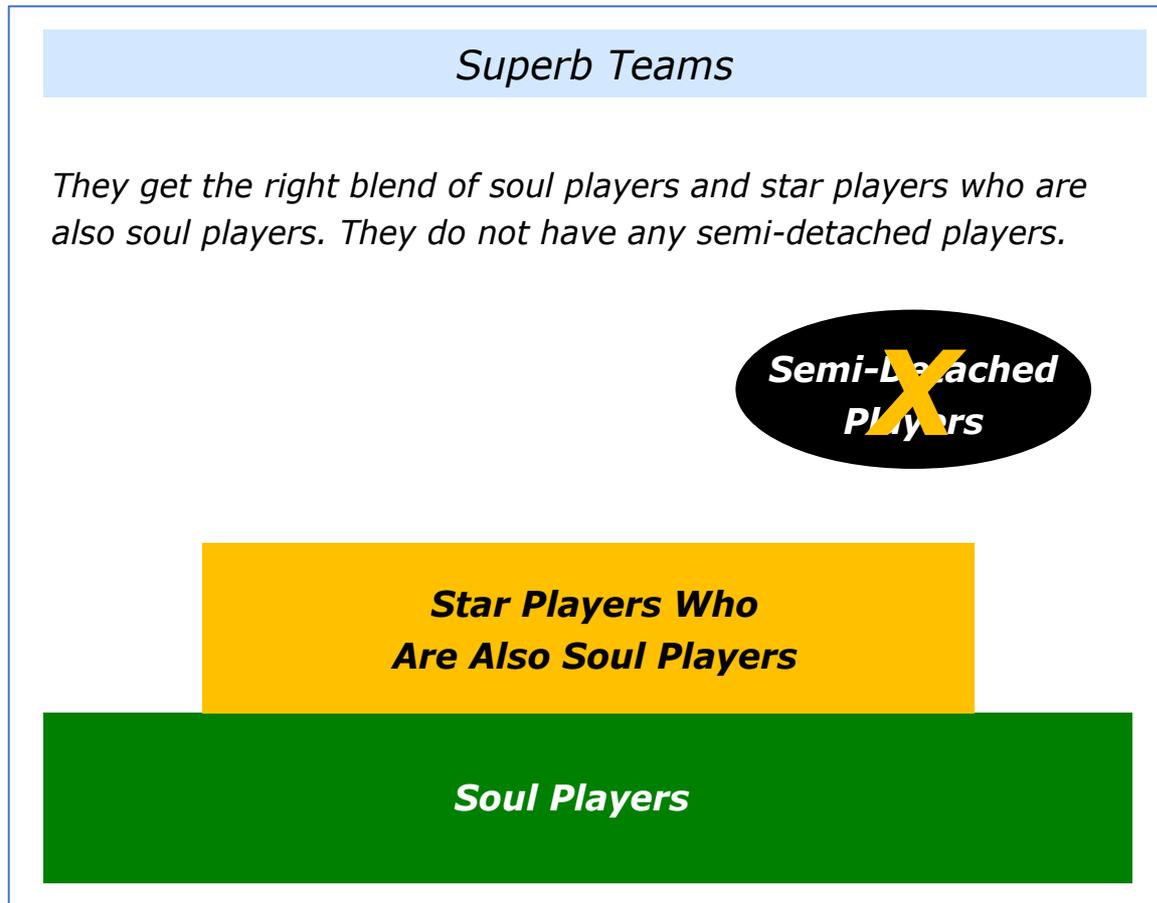

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Soul Players And Star Players Approach

Imagine that you lead a team. There are many models for putting together people who will combine their strengths to do superb work and deliver success.

One approach is to get the right blend of soul players and star players. The star players must also be soul players, however, and embody the spirit of the team. There is no room for semi-detached players who are pursuing their own agenda.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. One leader I worked with expressed it in the following way.

"Every good team I have built has had at least 70% soul players. They have a strong work ethic and can always be relied on to deliver high standards. Sometimes that can also develop their talents to become star players in certain areas.

"My successful teams have also had around 30% star players. They are prepared to sweat, however, and sometimes add that touch of magic."

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can make this happen.

Soul Players

Soul players embody the spirit of the team. They have a strong work ethic and aim to deliver high professional standards every day. They provide the backbone and make sure the team always gets to at least 8/10.

Such people are loyal and low profile but neglect them at your peril. Soul players need encouragement. They believe that, providing they do a good job, their loyalty will be rewarded. They may suffer in silence, however, while watching others grab attention.

Reward them for their contribution, because otherwise one day you may find they hand in their resignation. One person described this in the following way.

"For years my partner kept telling me to move on. I felt loyal to the company, however, and put in lots of hours that nobody noticed.

"My previous team leader used to meet with each of us off-site every six months. She took the time to find out how things were going and if we needed support.

"The new boss did not seem interested. They spent a lot of time with the vocal people in the team. I carried on, however, because that was my job.

"But then the company put in a performance management system where people had to be ranked along a bell-curve. That was the last straw. I was told that I must increase my profile in order to stay out of danger. But that is not my nature. Fortunately I had kept contact with my previous team leader. I now work for her in her new company."

Superb teams make sure that more than two-thirds of their team are soul players. Such salt-of-the-earth people can also sometimes become star players in a particular niche. But they are happy to put in a daily shift that provides the platform for success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the soul players in your team. Write the names of these people.

Describe the specific things you can do to encourage the soul players.

Describe the specific things you can do to – if appropriate – add more soul players to the team.

Soul Players

The soul players already in the team are:

*

The specific things I can do to encourage these soul players are:

*

The specific things I can do to, if appropriate, add more soul players to the team are:

*

Star Players Who Are Also Soul Players

Star players who are also soul players embody the spirit of the team. They can sometimes add that touch of class that takes the team from 8/10 to 10/10.

Superb teams often have around one-third of their team made up of such star players/. But talent brings obligations. It is vital for them to act as positive models and also encourage other people in the team.

Such individuals can find themselves in an interesting dilemma when progressing in their career. They may have been a star player at one level but then find they are considered a soul player at the next level. They can then ask themselves the following questions.

Do I want to start by being a soul player? Do I want to put in the work to consistently deliver the required professional standards? Do I want to be a soul player and then maybe even a star player at this level?

Imagine that you have several potential star players in your team. How can you ensure they make their best contributions to the team? One approach is to continually ask yourself the following questions:

If everybody in the team left tomorrow and offered their services back to the team: Who would I rehire? What would I rehire them to deliver?

Imagine that you would rehire some of the potential star players. You can then make clear contracts with them about their best contributions to the team.

One approach it is to start by making the professional deal clear. The potential star player needs to be prepared to do following things:

To want to contribute towards achieving the team's purpose;

To follow the team's principles and required professional standards;

To build on their strengths – whilst managing the consequences of their weaknesses - to make their best contribution towards achieving the team’s picture of success.

Imagine that you have explained these things to a potential star player and they want to opt in. If so, you can then encourage and enable them to achieve peak performance.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the star players in your team who are also soul players. Write the names of these people.

Describe the specific things you can do to encourage them to make their best contributions to the team.

Describe the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, add more star players who are also soul players to the team.

Star Players Who Are Also Soul Players

The star players who are also soul players already in the team are:

*

The specific things I can do to encourage these soul players are:

*

The specific things I can do to, if appropriate, add more star players who are also soul players to the team are:

*

Semi-Detached Players

There is little point in employing semi-detached players who pursue their own agenda or show disregard for people. They can cause lots of collateral damage.

Everybody gets down at times. But people who choose to work for a team need to accept a certain package. This includes being professional, encouraging others and making their best contribution.

One key point is worth underlining. Some people who provide services on a part-time basis may actually be fully committed when working with the team. They are not semi-detached players.

Let's look at another scenario. Imagine that you take over a team that contains several uncommitted people. There are several steps you can take to make clear working contracts.

Before taking the job, make sure you have the mandate to build a superb team. You are then in a strong position when meeting each of the potentially difficult people.

You are making the rules, not them. Meet with each person individually. You can create an encouraging environment but also give them clear messages. You can describe the following things.

The team's purpose and picture of success;

The team's principles and professional standards that people will be expected to follow in order to deliver the picture of success.

Invite each person to go away, reflect and decide whether or not they want to opt into the team. Remember, it is their job to persuade you that they want to be in the team, it is not your job to persuade them.

People must actively make the decision to commit - or re-commit - to the team. They can then make clear contracts about their contribution towards achieving the picture of success. If they do not commit – in actions rather than just words – they are choosing to not be in the team.

If you wish, try tackling the following exercise. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the potentially semi-detached people in your team. Write their names.

Describe the specific things you can do to communicate the team's purpose, principles and required professional standards to these people.

Describe the specific things you can do to replace any people who choose not to follow the required professional standards.

Semi-Detached Players

The potentially semi-detached players in the team are:

*

The specific things I can do to communicate the team's purpose, principles and professional standards to these people are:

*

The specific things I can do to replace any people who choose not to follow the required professional standards are:

*

Continuing To Get The Right Blend Of Soul Players And Star Players

Superb teams evolve. Some people will stay, some will move on. That is the nature of evolution. If you want to build a second and third generation superb team, however, it will be vital to continue to get the right blend of people. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to do the following things.

Keep In Touch With The Soul Players

Meet with them on a regular basis and ask how things are going in their world. Such people are prepared to work hard, but it may be useful to explore the following things in your discussions:

To ensure they have clear goals and know how their work is contributing towards achieving the team goals;

To ensure they have the support they need to do their job and are well rewarded – both emotionally and economically – for the work they do;

To encourage them to build on their strengths, keep developing and do satisfying work.

Keep In Touch With The Star Players

Meet with them on a regular basis. It may be useful to explore the following things in your discussions:

To focus on how they can continue to build on the strengths - plus manage the consequences of any weaknesses – and make their best contribution to the team;

To clarify the possible routes they may want to take in their future career – inside or outside the team - and the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, help them to pursue these routes;

To finish the session by making clear contracts about their continued contribution to the team or the specific things that can be done to help them to move on in a positive way.

This approach may seem counter intuitive. But it is important: a) to build on their strengths; b) to recognise they may have aspirations; c) to, in the meantime, make clear contracts about the best contribution.

Keep Making Sure You Have The Right Blend Of Soul Players And Star Players

If you are a leader, you are judged by the performances of your people. Bearing this in mind, it is important to keep encouraging the people in your team.

Looking ahead, however, there may come a point when you need to rebuild the team or even build a new team in a new place. It can therefore be useful to do the following things:

To keep a list of the soul players you want to employ in your present and future teams;

To keep a list of the star players who are also soul players that you want to employ in your present and future teams;

To keep making sure you get the right blend of people in your teams and to act appropriately if any appear to be becoming semi-detached players.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific things you can do to maintain the right blend of soul players and star players in your present team;

Describe the specific things you can do to keep a list of such people who you may want to employ in your present or future teams.

Describe the specific benefits of maintaining the right blend of such people your team.

Soul Players And Star Players

The specific things I can do to maintain the right blend of soul players and star players who are soul players in the team are:

*

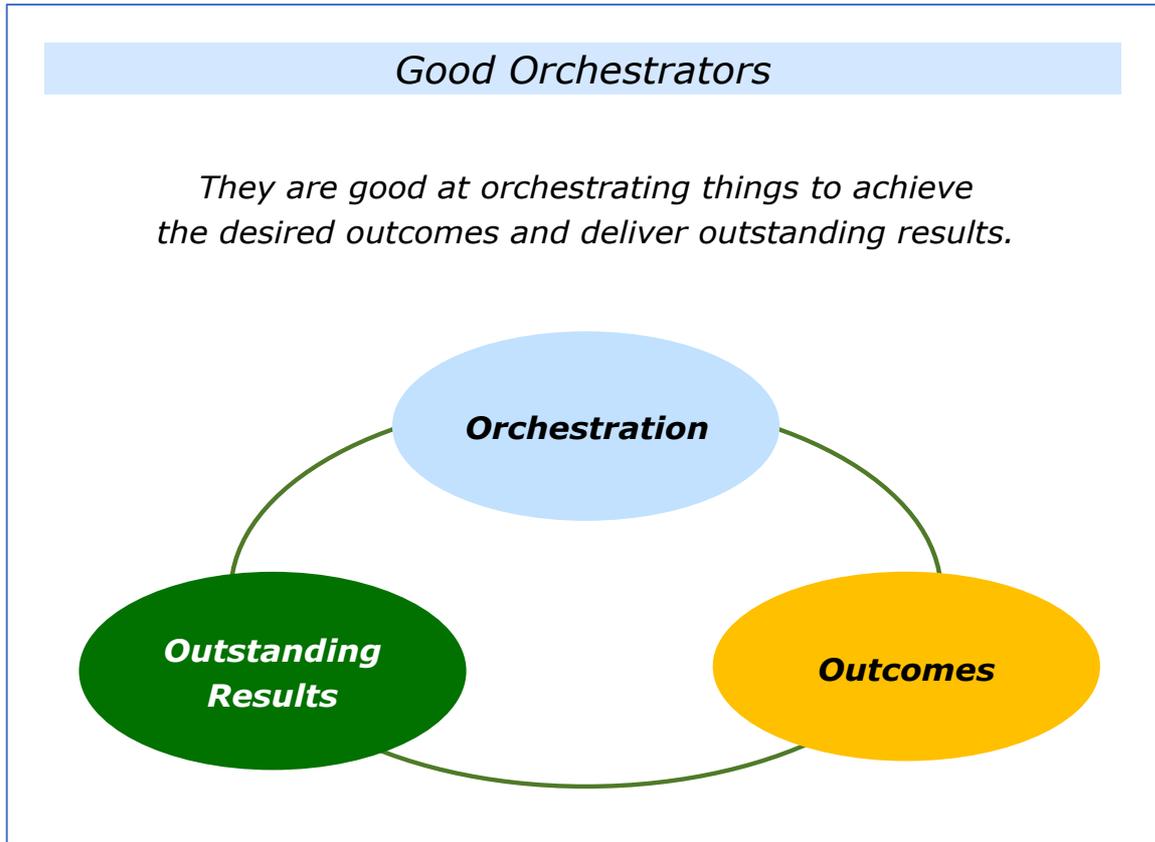

The specific things I can do to keep a list of such people that I can employ in my present or future teams are:

*

The specific benefits of getting the right blend of such people in teams are:

*

The Good Orchestrator Approach

Good orchestrators play a key role in organisations. They are great at taking responsibility, delivering consistently high standards and getting things done.

Such people start by make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the desired outcomes to achieve. They do this when leading a project, implementing a strategy or doing another activity.

They then act as mission holders for delivering the goods. They are good at orchestrating things – such as people and resources - to achieve the desired outcomes. They may then add that touch of class to deliver outstanding results.

Such people must want to be orchestrators, of course, and be given the support to do the job. This is a vital because the role can be both rewarding and taxing. Let's explore the steps such people often take to doing fine work.

They Make Clear Contracts About The Outcomes To Achieve

Good orchestrators start by establishing clarity. Before embarking on doing a project, for example, they meet with the key stakeholders and focus on the following themes.

They clarify the specific outcomes to deliver and the things that will be happening that will show they have achieved the picture of success;

They clarify the specific guidelines to follow – the Dos and Don'ts – when working towards achieving the picture of success;

They clarify the specific things that can that done – such as getting the required support - to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success.

Good orchestrators make clear contracts with the stakeholders about these things. They then play back their understand of the agreements to make sure that everybody has the same picture. Let's look at one example of how this works in action.

The CEO of a company asked Kate to lead a project that involved providing services in a new market. This was because the company aimed to build on its strengths and:

To continue to be successful in its present market ... To be successful in a new emerging market ... To build a prototype that demonstrated how it could be successful in this new market.

Kate was happy to build a successful prototype but there were challenges. The main one involved coordinating the strengths of several different departments that could help to deliver the goods.

Bearing these things in mind, Kate met with the CEO to set things up to succeed. This resulted in completing the following framework.

The Picture Of Success

Building The Successful Prototype

The Specific Outcomes

The specific results we want to achieve when building the successful prototype are:

*

*

*

The Specific Benefits

The specific benefits of delivering these results will be:

*

*

*

The Specific Guidelines

The specific guidelines – the Dos and Don'ts – to bear in mind when building the successful prototype are:

*

*

*

The Specific Support

The specific support that will be provided to increase the chances of success when building the prototype are:

*

*

*

The Specific Measures

The specific things that will be happening that will show the successful prototype as achieved the desired results will be:

*

*

*

Kate and the CEO agreed on the outcomes to achieve and the guidelines to follow. They also made clear contracts about the required support and the measures to show they had achieved the picture of success.

The CEO then helped to set things up to succeed. They sent an email to the heads of departments and the other senior managers. This gave people the following messages.

Building A Successful Prototype

I want to give you a heads up about a project that some of you may be asked to contribute to in the next few months. This project can help us to shape a successful future.

We are doing well as a company at the moment but we also need to keep developing. We therefore aim to move into an emerging market. Bearing in mind our strengths, the first step will be:

To build a successful prototype that will provide great service to customers and help us to build a superb reputation in this market.

This will involve several departments working together to combine their strengths. The aim will be to build the prototype and delivers three customer success stories within the next six months.

I have asked Kate to lead this project and I would like you to support her in making it happen. We will then apply the lessons from the success stories to help us to shape a positive future.

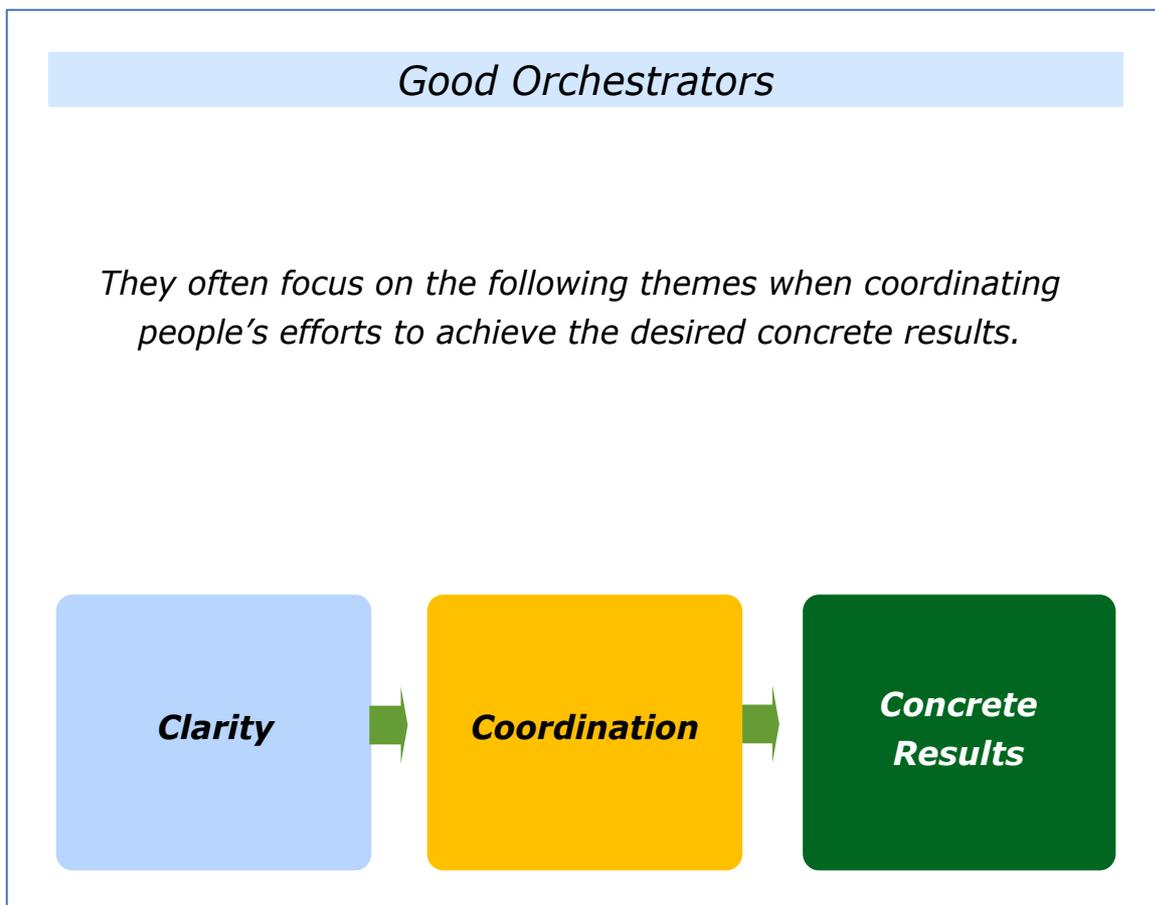

Let me know if you have any questions. I look forward to hearing about the progress we are making towards building the prototype and delivering the success stories.

The CEO's message set the scene and gave Kate the chance to deliver the goods. People could see the big picture and she did not have to spend time persuading them to cooperate.

Projects work best when there is clarity. People need to know about the goals to achieve, the guidelines to follow and the support to be given. This helps to set things up to succeed.

Good orchestrators start by aiming to establish such clarity. They are then ready to the next stage.

They Orchestrate Things To Achieve The Desired Outcomes

Good orchestrators make things work. They do this by coordinating the resources and people's efforts to deliver consistently high standards and achieve the picture of success.

Different orchestrators will do this in different ways. Some start by exploring the following questions. They then translate these into action when aiming to deliver the project, strategy or other activity.

Good Orchestrators

They focus on the following themes when coordinating people's efforts to achieve the desired concrete results.

Clarity

What are the real results to achieve – the picture of success? How can I communicate this to people and show the benefits of achieving these goals? How can I clarify if people are prepared to contribute towards achieving the picture of success?

Coordination

How can I coordinate the resources and people's efforts to achieve the goals? How can I make clear contracts with people about their contributions? How can I give them the support they need to deliver their parts of the picture of success?

Concrete Results

How can I manage by outcomes when coordinating people's contributions? How can I keep track of our progress and encourage people to deliver consistently high standards? How can I ensure we do our best to deliver the picture of success?

Kate took this approach when orchestrating people's efforts to build the successful prototype. Because of the CEO's messaging, she was able:

To keep communicating the big picture and coordinate people's strengths to work with three customers in the new market;

To agree on clear goals with the customers, deliver consistently high standards and provide great service;

To stay in touch with the customers, focus on continuous improvement and help the customers to achieve success.

Kate continually met with her colleagues. Starting meetings by refocusing on the picture of success, she clarified how she could help them to deliver their agreed contributions. She then helped them to deliver their goods.

She also continually met with the customers. She clarified what her company was doing well and what could be improved. She then made sure that her company helped the customers to achieve success.

Different people follow these principles in different ways to deliver the desired outcomes. Some also move on to the next stage.

They Sometimes Add That Touch Of Class To Deliver Outstanding Results

Good orchestrators sometimes go into other dimension to perform great work. They add that touch of class or do something special to delight people and deliver outstanding results.

Kate built a prototype that delivered success for three customers in the new market. She added something special by getting the marketing department to translate this work into success stories.

These stories highlighted: a) the positive work done by her colleagues and the customers; b) the principles that had been followed to deliver such work; c) the practical steps the company could take to follow these principles in the future. They followed this framework.

The Success Story

The title of the success story is:

*

Specific Situation

The specific situation we faced – including the specific challenges and the desired picture of success - was:

*

*

*

Specific Principles

The specific things we did - the principles we followed and how we translated these into action - to tackle the challenge and achieve the picture of success were:

*

*

*

Success

The specific results that were delivered were:

*

*

*

Summary

Here is a summary of: a) the specific things that worked and how we can follow these principles in the future b) the specific things we could do better next time and how; c) the specific other things of interest that emerged.

*

*

*

Good orchestrators get things done. They start by make clear contracts about the desired outcomes. They then orchestrate things to achieve the outcomes and deliver outstanding results.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? You may aim to do this yourself or to work with somebody who can deliver the goods.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Good Orchestrator Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

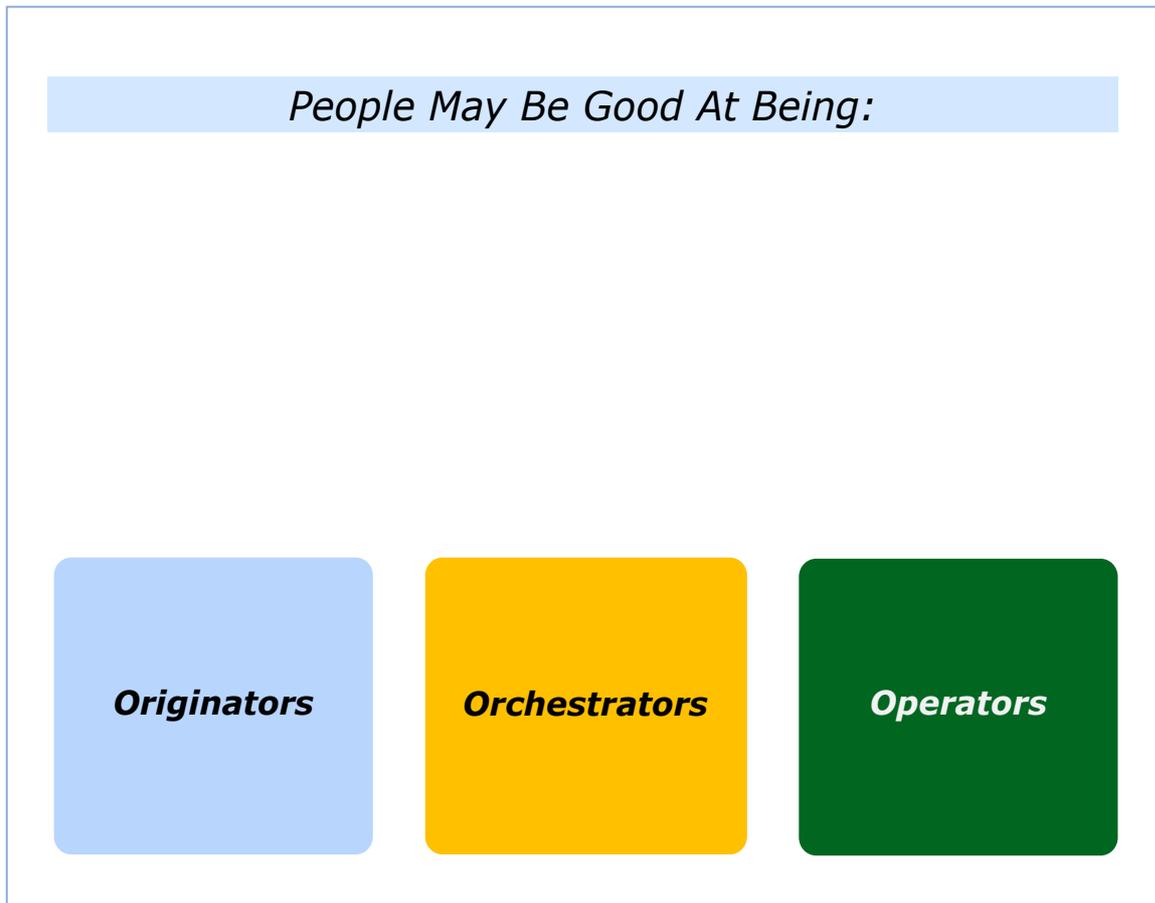

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Originators, Orchestrators And Operators Approaches

There are many ways for people to build on their strengths and do superb work. This piece looks at how some people may do their best work as originators, orchestrators or operators. Let's explore these themes.

Originators

People who take this approach like to shape new things. Whilst recognising that it is hard to be completely original, they like to explore, develop new models or communicate fresh ideas to people.

People who are good at this approach choose different ways to apply their strengths. For example, they may:

Be inspiring founders of businesses ... Be evangelists for a business ... Be thought leaders in a particular field ... Be strategic advisors ... Be good communicators who share new ideas in a way that people can use.

People who are good originators may need to be aware of both the pluses and minuses of the role. They can then build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

The pluses can include the following. They can provide fresh ideas and inspiring visions. They can also pass on knowledge that helps an organisation to stay ahead of the game.

The potential minuses can include the following. Some may come across as too conceptual and not able to ground their ideas in reality. Some may find it hard to be humble or show respect for other people.

People who are originators often need others to translate their ideas into action. This often involves having people who demonstrate the following qualities.

Orchestrators

People who take this approach are good at orchestrating people and resources to achieve certain outcomes. Such people often demonstrate the following characteristics.

They make clear contracts with the key decision makers about the outcomes to achieve – this includes the purpose, the principles to follow and the picture of success;

They communicate the purpose, principles and picture of success to the people who will be involved in making it happen and describe the benefits of achieving these outcomes;

They make clear contracts with people about making their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

They coordinate people's strengths, manage by outcomes and enable people to do superb work;

They encourage people to build on what is working, tackle areas improvement and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

People who are orchestrators may need to be aware of the pluses and minuses of this role. They can then build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

The pluses can include the following. They can bring great value to an organisation by making things work. They can ensure that people channel their efforts towards performing superb work and achieving the agreed goals.

The potential minuses can include the following. They need to be good at clear contracting with the stakeholders otherwise things won't work. They also need to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks otherwise they will not get the best from people.

Orchestrators often rely on certain kinds of people who do fine work and deliver the goods. Let's explore the characteristics shown by such people.

Operators

Good operators enjoy using their professional skills to perform superb work that contributes to achieving specific goals. They often work best when the following conditions are in place.

They are clear on the purpose, the principles to follow and the desired picture of success;

They have a positive attitude, choose to opt-in and make clear contracts about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

They are given the support they need and managed by outcomes – rather than by tasks – when working towards achieving the agreed goals;

They are professional, perform superb work and proactively keep their stakeholders informed about their progress towards achieving the agreed goals;

They deliver the agreed outcomes and also help their colleagues to do good work on the road to achieving the organisation's picture of success.

People who are good operators may need to be aware of the pluses and minuses of this role. They can then build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

The pluses can include the following. They can apply their professional skills to perform superb. They can find this gives them great satisfaction and they can continue to develop.

The potential minuses can include the following. They need to be clear on the purpose, principles and picture of success otherwise they may find it difficult to find meaning in their work. They also need leaders who can manage by outcomes otherwise they may feel frustrated.

Good teams make sure they get the right blend of originators, orchestrators and operators. There will always be some cross-over between the roles, of course, but it can be helpful to get the right blend. This can help the team to achieve ongoing success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow one or more of these roles? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Originator, Orchestrator And Operator Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of one or more of these approaches may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Campaigners, Coordinators And Completer-Finishers Approach

Some people do fine work by demonstrating some of the qualities described by Meredith Belbin in his work on great teams. They may have strengths as campaigners, coordinators or completer-finishers.

Great teams are often made up of people who combine these qualities to do fine work. Some individuals may, of course, be good at all three aspects. Let's explore these themes.

Campaigners

Campaigners are often good at communicating a compelling vision. They communicate this in a way that resonates with a certain target group of people. They also show the benefits of achieving a particular goal.

Such people can do this in a positive or negative way. Those who do it in a positive way often demonstrate the following characteristics. They may be good at being able:

To communicate the benefits of a certain philosophy or picture of success;

To communicate the benefits of a certain service or product;

To communicate the benefits of people pursuing a certain paradigm.

Campaigners may be good at bringing the ideas to life by moving from the concepts to giving concrete examples. They may also describe the practical strategies that people can follow to reach the goals.

Such people sometimes recognise the potential pluses and minuses of their approach. These include the following.

The Potential Pluses

They may be good at conveying enthusiasm, communicating an inspiring vision and showing the possible ways forward. They may also good at showing the strategies that people can follow to achieve success.

The Potential Minuses

They may need to focus on a specific target audience rather than reach all kinds of people. They may be good at outlining the strategies to pursue but get bored with the daily implementation of these strategies.

Campaigners can provide inspiration but they may need other people to help them with the implementation. This highlights the next group of people in great teams.

Coordinators

Great teams often have superb coordinators. Such people often act as mission holders who take responsibility for translating the strategies into action and delivering positive results.

Coordinators keep focusing on the results to achieve. They make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the goals to achieve. They are then good at being able:

To communicate the goals to people and make clear contracts with them about their contributions towards achieving the goals;

To coordinate people's strengths to do superb work, find solutions to challenges and achieve the goals;

To manage by outcomes, focus on continuous improvement and do what is required to achieve the goals.

Coordinators focus on the outcomes to achieve and have good people skills. They then encourage and enable people to apply their strengths to deliver the picture of success.

Such people sometimes recognise the potential pluses and minuses of their approach. These include the following.

The Potential Pluses

They are dedicated, have high professional standards and do superb work. They are good at making clear contracts about the outcomes to achieve, providing support and enabling people to deliver the goods.

The Potential Minuses

They may need to learn how to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks and be given the required practical support. They need to take care of their health because they may take on more than they can manage.

Coordinators often channel the efforts of individual contributors towards achieving the goals. This highlights the next group of people in great teams.

Completer-Finishers

Completer-Finishers are often good at finishing things in specific activities but not necessarily in others. It is therefore important to understand their strengths and where they can be relied on to deliver the goods.

Such people may be individual contributors who specialise in certain activities. They have deep knowledge in their chosen area and take a pride in their work.

They often perform best when they can understand the big picture and how their work contributes to achieving the goals. Providing they are given support to do the job, they are then more able:

To play to their strengths and do superb work on the way towards achieving the goals;

To proactively keep their key stakeholders informed about their progress towards achieving the goals;

To produce the desired positive results and make their best contributions towards achieving the team's picture of success.

Such people are often loyal to certain values in their work. They may sometimes recognise the potential pluses and minuses of their approach. These include the following.

The Potential Pluses

They are specialists who have great knowledge and can produce high quality work. They often have their individual way of thinking and operating that, if channelled in a positive way, can enrich the team.

The Potential Minuses

They may follow their own path in ways that create challenges for other people. They may then need to refocus their efforts towards delivering the agreed outcomes and helping the team to achieve success.

Coordinators create an encouraging environment in which completer-finishers can perform superb work. They also expect such people to have a positive attitude, be professional and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Great teams get the right blend of campaigners, coordinators and completer-finishers. They then focus on providing inspiration, doing the implementation and achieving the desired impact.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Campaigners, Coordinators And Completer-Finishers Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Adults In The Room Approach Rather Than The Adolescents In The Room Approach

Different people work in different ways. Some people act like responsible adults. They aim to be respectful and do their best to deliver the desired results. They follow the old rule of acting like adults in the room.

Some people take another route and act like irresponsible adolescents. They are disrespectful and focus on delivering noisy rhetoric that gets them noticed. This can create collateral damage and chaos.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

The Adults In The Room Approach

Some organisations ensure that the leadership team and other teams have people who behave like adults. The phrase adult in the room has several definitions. These include the following:

A person or a group of people that behaves in a mature and responsible ways. They also make measured and rational decisions based on all the available facts and data.

People who behave in this way often display the following characteristics when making decisions, doing the work and in their interactions with other people.

They Take Responsibility

Such people choose to take responsibility. They enjoy being proactive, looking ahead and anticipating challenges. They like to make things happen but are also good at responding to events.

They enjoy making considered decisions. They clarify the real results to achieve, the possible ways forward the consequences of each option. They then focus on how to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses of pursuing their chosen option.

They Show Respect

Good leaders behave in a professional way and show respect to other people. Nelson Mandela, Mary Robinson and many other fine leaders demonstrated this quality in abundance.

They are decisive but also believe in building caring and civilised cultures. They are respectful when meeting people and, when appropriate, listening to their points of view.

They Deliver Results

People who act like adults aim to deliver the desired results. Bearing in mind the aims to achieve, they follow the strategies most likely to achieve success and deliver consistently high professional standards.

They embody the concept of continuous improvement and find solutions to challenges. They do what they promise to do and do their best to achieve the agreed picture of success. Sometimes they also add that touch of class.

The Adolescents In The Room Approach

Some organisations lapse into employing or even promoting people who behave like irresponsible adolescents. They may have a leadership group of individuals who compete against each other, blame people or engage in turf wars.

People who behave in this way can have a corrosive effect on the culture and create collateral damage. Such individuals sometimes demonstrate the following characteristics.

They avoid taking responsibility. They blame other people, outside events or other factors. They praise their own efforts – sometimes even awarding themselves big bonuses – and present themselves as victims.

They do not show respect for other people. They may see themselves as superior or even scapegoat others. The way they behave can contribute to building a cruel and uncaring culture.

Such individuals are more interested in rhetoric – including proclaiming their views loudly – than delivering the desired results. Some pick fights or promote themselves rather than doing the job for which they were hired.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the adults in the room approach?

This could be a situation where either you want: a) to be an adult yourself; b) to gather a team of people who play that role; c) to promote somebody who acts like an adult.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Adults In The Room Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

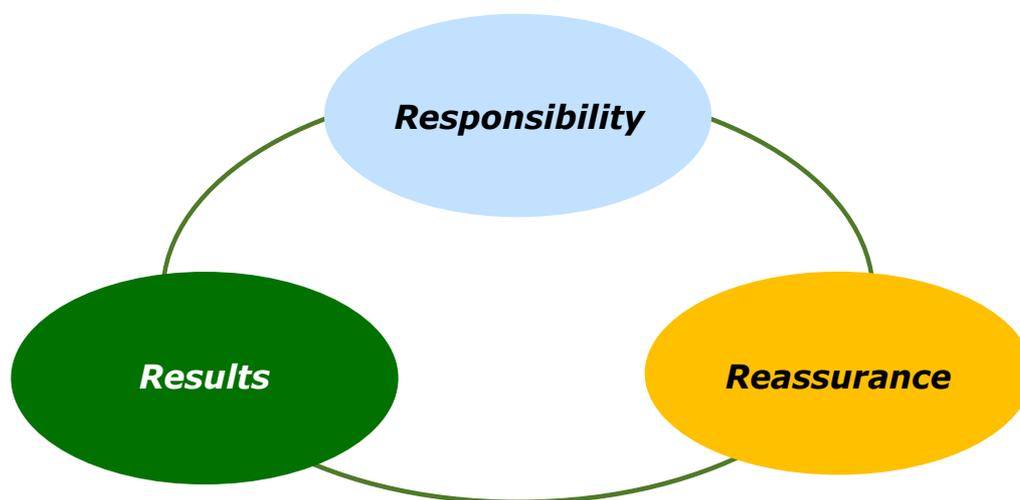

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Managing Your Manager Approach

Managing Your Manager

Great workers make clear contracts with their key stakeholders about the results to achieve. They then focus on the following themes to keep people informed and also deliver the goods.

Great workers deliver the goods. They are also good at managing their manager and other key stakeholders. Sometimes this calls for dealing with challenging situations.

Imagine the scene. You are the Regional Manager for a retail chain. It is 7.00 am on a Monday morning and you are driving North to meet some of your staff. Suddenly your mobile rings. It is the Chief Executive, who says:

"Yesterday I dropped into our biggest store in London. They had failed to order enough of our best selling items. The customers were unhappy, the staff were unhappy and I am unhappy. What are we going to do to fix it?"

There are many ways to respond to such as request. One approach is to say:

"I will get onto it straight away. I will make sure that we have enough stock for today and the rest of the week.

"At the same time, I will see what we can do to contact any customers who were disappointed. We can also run a promotion on these items for next weekend.

"Looking to the future, I will ensure that the store staff know how to anticipate demands and get enough stock to satisfy customers.

"I will now make some calls to put everything in place. If appropriate, I may then visit the store. The store team and I will produce ideas to make up for the short fall this week.

"I will ring you back in half an hour to explain the action plan for getting the results. Is that okay?"

Great workers often focus on three themes to manage their managers and other key stakeholders. They take responsibility, reassure people and deliver results. Let's explore how to make this happen.

Responsibility

Such workers take responsibility. They start by proactively making clear working contracts with their manager and, if appropriate, other key stakeholders.

They clarify the results to achieve – the agreed picture of success;

They keep people informed about the progress towards achieving the picture of success;

They perform superb work and deliver the agreed picture of success.

Such workers are super professional. They take initiatives, get some early successes and keep their stakeholders informed. Some employees forget this rule and become institutionalised. They stop taking initiatives and wait to be managed.

Many of today's organisations, however, want people who are positive, proactive and professional. One leader explained this in the following way.

"I want people to step forward. I want them to understand our goals, say how they want to contribute and then deliver on their promises.

"Too many people sit waiting for me to dish out the jobs. That may have worked in the past. But now I want people who show they want to take responsibility. This frees me up to take a more strategic role in shaping the business."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the follow things.

Describe the people you must satisfy in your work. These may include your manager, customers and other key stakeholders.

Describe the specific things you can do to proactively make clear contracts with these people about the results to achieve and show you will take responsibility for achieving these agreed goals.

Responsibility

The people I need to satisfy – such as my manager and other key stakeholders – are:

*

The specific things I can do to proactively make clear contracts with these people about the results to achieve and show that I will take responsibility for delivering these agreed goals are:

*

*

*

Reassurance

Bosses often worry. They go to bed at night worrying about hitting the numbers, satisfying their bosses, improving service quality, getting the right people and staying out of trouble.

Similarly, their bosses are under pressure from the banks, stock market or other outside forces. Your job is to reassure them. Never say: "Trust me." That is like a red flag to a bull.

Show your manager and other stakeholders that you can be relied upon. Make clear contracts about your contribution, keep them informed and deliver early successes.

Show your leaders that you understand the business. Show them that you are thinking ahead, anticipating issues and have plans in place.

Bosses do not like nasty surprises. When appropriate, describe the potential challenges that lie ahead and your strategies for tackling these issues.

Be honest, especially when faced by potential crises. Show you have considered the possible ways forward, the respective consequences and, where appropriate, give your recommendations.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the follow things.

Describe the people you must satisfy in your work.

Describe the specific things you can do to reassure these people – in a realistic way – that things are under control and progress is being made towards achieving the agreed goals.

Reassurance

The people I need to satisfy – such as my manager and other key stakeholders – are:

*

The specific things I can do to reassure these people – in a realistic way – that things are under control and progress is being made towards achieving the agreed goals are:

*

*

*

Results

Managers and other stakeholders will judge you by the results you deliver. Producing some early successes buys you time. But then you need to deliver the agreed goals.

One soccer coach explained how he had made a fundamental mistake early in his career.

"In sport we talk about building a team, building a club and then building a dynasty. But it is in that order. This is something I learned in my first managerial job.

"I was parachuted into a club in crisis where the Board said they wanted me to build for the long term. I therefore spent a lot of time getting the fundamentals right from the Academy level onwards.

"My strategy should have been to focus entirely on the first team and climb the league table. I could have got some experienced players who would also have developed the youngsters.

"My two years at the club helped to lay the foundations for future managers, who reaped the benefits of the youth policy. But what I failed to do was to show progress at the first team level.

"The Board were under attack from the fans. Despite saying they were committed to long term development, they decided to terminate my contract.

"Now I know it is vital to deliver quick results and build a winning team. This gives you the chance to build a club and then a dynasty."

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, how can you satisfy your manager and other key stakeholders?

One approach is to agree on the specific goals, perform superb work and achieve the picture of success. You can also do something special to add that touch of class.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the follow things.

Describe the people you must satisfy in your work.

Describe the specific things you can do to deliver the agreed results to these people and, if appropriate, add that touch of class.

Results

The people I need to satisfy – such as my manager and other key stakeholders – are:

*

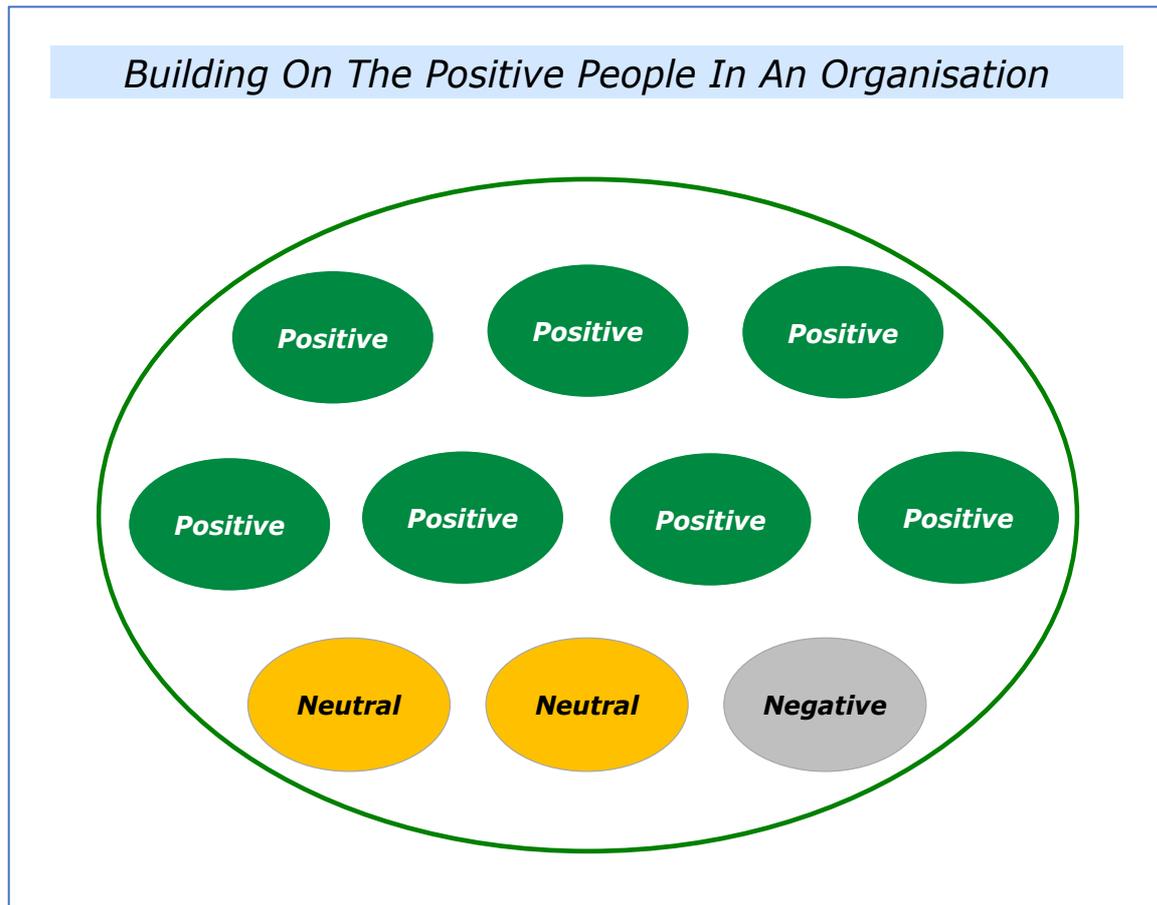

The specific things I can deliver the agreed results to these people and, if appropriate, add that touch of class, are:

*

*

*

The Building On The Positive People In An Organisation Approach

Imagine that you lead an organisation. Some of the people are positive, some are neutral, some are negative. How do you want to work with the different kinds of people?

In the old days organisations often told you to concentrate on turning around the negative people. But that did not work. Nowadays you put your energy into the engine, not the trailer.

Good leaders often believe in giving their people the big picture. They then enable people to make their best contributions to achieving the organisation's goals. Some do this by taking the following steps.

They communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

They build on the positive people whilst also giving everybody the chance to contribute to achieving the picture of success;

They encourage people to do superb work and do their best to help the organisation achieve its picture of success.

Such leaders believe it is important to be moral and give everybody the big picture. People can then decide if they want to opt in and help to deliver the goals.

Imagine that you have gone through this stage. Looking around, it has become apparent that people are choosing either:

To be positive and professional ... To be neutral or guarded ... To be negative or unprofessional.

Let's explore how you can work with the different kinds of people. You will, of course, adapt these approaches in your own way.

The Positive People

"Reward the behaviour you want repeated," is the motto in all organisations. Bearing this in mind, it is important to encourage the positive people who aim to deliver high professional standards.

Such people are the engine but they also need support. They frequently volunteer for tasks and do fine work but they also get exhausted. Bearing this in mind, you can aim:

To spend time these people, build on their strengths and make clear contracts about their best contributions to the organisation;

To encourage them to follow the organisations principles, agree on the outcomes they will deliver and provide them with the required support;

To enable them to perform superb work that contributes to achieving the organisation's picture of success.

One soccer manager I worked with took this approach. Taking over an under-achieving club at the end of a season, he was appalled by the attitudes of some players. He chose:

To bring in four senior professionals who acted as positive models;

To build on the players who were prepared to act in a professional way;

To replace the negative ones with young players from the academy.

The manager produced an immediate culture change that was reflected both on and off the field. The team climbed the league and the next season went on to win its first national trophy.

Imagine that you lead an organisation. How can you build on the positive people? How can you encourage them to make their best contributions? How can you give them support and help them to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

The Positive People

The specific things I can do to build on the positive people in the organisation are:

*

*

*

The Neutral People

Some people may be neutral or guarded. There can be many reasons for their behaviour. They may have seen new leaders come in, make big promises and fail to deliver. This can explain why they are guarded.

Such people can be professional and make fine contributions. They must each make their own decisions, of course, but there are many things you can do to provide an encouraging environment.

One approach is to spend time with these people by meeting them in groups or in one-to-one sessions. You can then aim:

To again share the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To give them a sense of ownership – within certain parameters - in following the principles when working towards the picture of success;

To give them the support they need to perform superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Different leaders follow this approach in different ways. One leader who took over the European arm of a multinational company explained how they took these steps.

"I toured every country in the European region and did two-hour sessions in which I literally met every person.

"Meeting groups of around twenty people, I talked about last year's achievements, before outlining the goals for the next year.

"I used a flip chart and a few slides, but the tone was mainly conversational. Looking at the challenges ahead, I invited people to ask their questions and answered these as honestly as possible.

"Finally I reiterated the organisation's strategy and outlined what we could all do to get some quick successes. People seemed to appreciate the sessions."

Sounds hard work? Perhaps, but it can be harder if leaders do not connect with people. Given the right kind of support, many will do superb work and go that extra mile.

Another approach is to have one-to-one sessions with people. This is often more suitable when taking over a relatively small team because of the numbers involved.

You can meet with the individuals and again explain the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. You can then invite them to take time to reflect about their contribution.

If appropriate, you can make clear contracts about: a) the specific contribution they will make; b) the specific support they need; c) the specific things they will do to keep you informed about their progress.

Imagine that you lead an organisation. How can you encourage the neutral people? This may or may not work, but it can increase the chances of them making their best contribution.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

The Neutral People

The specific things I can do to encourage them to make their best contributions to the organisation are:

*

*

*

The Negative People

People who are negative or unprofessional need to make a decision. Do they want to follow the organisation's principles and make a positive contribution?

Different leaders invite people to make these decisions in different ways. They do not get into arguments with people. They simply say something along the following lines.

"The principles we encourage the people in our organisation to follow are: To ... To ... To ..."

"The reasons for following these principles are because we aim: To ... To ... To ..."

"Looking to the future, let me know if you want to follow these principles."

"If so, then we can look together at how you can take these steps and help the organisation to achieve success. If not, then we can have a discussion about the possible ways forward."

Some individuals may want to argue, blame others or fight dirty. As mentioned earlier, however, good leaders do not get into arguments. They simply keep saying:

"These are the principles we want people to follow. Let me know if you want to follow these in a professional way."

Sometimes a person will say they want to follow the principles but they need to follow up with deeds not just words. If appropriate, you can then invite the person to create a specific action plan. The person can describe:

The specific principles they aim to follow that will help the organisation to achieve success;

The specific things they will do to translate these principles into action and deliver success;

The specific other things they will do in the future to help their colleagues and the organisation to achieve success.

At this point it is worth doing a reality check. Some individuals may say they want to commit but not translate their words into action. They have made their choice and there will be consequences.

Imagine that you lead an organisation. You want to build on the positive people and give the neutral people the chance to make their best contributions.

You are also prepared to replace any negative people with people who want to follow the principles. These new people can then add to the positive energy and help the organisation to achieve success.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the specific things you can do to give any negative people the chance to follow the principles and then to act on the result of their choices.

The Negative People

The specific things I can do to give them the chance to follow the organisation's principles and, when appropriate, act on the result of their choices are:

*

*

*

The Never Walk Past A Quality Problem Approach

Never walk past a quality problem – because otherwise you have said it is okay

A Managing Director taught me the meaning of the phrase Never Walk Past A Quality Problem. Sitting in the reception area of his company's offices, I saw him park his car and walk toward the main entrance.

Suddenly he dived into the hedge and emerged with an empty drink can. It was 7.30 in the morning and the can had obviously been thrown from the nearby main street during the night. The MD explained his actions in the following way.

"I refuse to walk past a quality problem, otherwise I have said it is okay. If we don't keep our hedges and car parks clean, visitors will think we don't pay attention to our products."

Good leaders aim to build an excellence culture rather than an excuse culture. They encourage the behaviour they want repeated and never walk past a quality problem. Let's explore how they follow this approach.

They Clarify The High Quality Standards

Imagine you lead a team and want to set high quality standards. The first step is to act as a good model. This is because people will watch what you do rather than what you say.

How can you then encourage people to deliver the required standards? One approach is to instruct them to behave in certain ways. This may work for a while but it can also create a culture where people don't think for themselves.

Another approach is to set the tone from the top but to also involve people in setting the required quality standards. It is then to give them the support they need to deliver the goods.

How to make this happen? One approach is to gather people together and invite them to take the following steps. You can ask them:

To focus on a specific activity where they want to deliver high quality standards – such as customer service, product quality, professional behaviour or another activity;

To describe the specific things they can do – plus the support they need - to deliver high quality standards in this activity;

To describe the specific benefits – to all the various stakeholders – of delivering high quality standards in this activity.

Delivering High Quality Standards

The specific activity where we want to deliver high quality standards is:

*

The specific things we can do – plus the support we need – to deliver high quality standards in this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of delivering high quality standards in this activity will be:

*

*

*

They Keep Communicating The High Quality Standards

People sometimes need reminding about what good looks like. How to make this happen? Every Wednesday the MD mentioned above sent out an email called Weekly Wins.

In addition to highlighting business successes across the company, they described the specific ways that people had demonstrated the quality standards. He explained this in the following way.

"It's easy to report acts of heroism. Like many companies, we have employees who drive through a blizzard from London to Glasgow to deliver an important package.

"Certainly we tell these stories, but it's crucial to highlight the daily acts of people doing things the right way. So we publicise the efforts of people who are running the engine as well as those who are entrepreneurial. This reinforces the standards we want people to demonstrate each day.”

Some leaders also keep producing success stories that describe how people have delivered the high quality standards. These stories show what good looks like and encourage people to keep developing in these activities.

There are many frameworks for producing such stories. Here is one approach.

The Success Story

The specific activity where people delivered high quality standards was:

*

The specific things that people did then to deliver high quality standards in this activity were:

*

*

*

The specific things we can do to keep delivering high standards – plus maybe keep developing in this activity - are:

*

*

*

They Never Walk Past A Quality Problem

Good leaders often take this approach in their work. They never walk past a quality problem whether it concerns the organisation's principles, products or people.

There are many different scenarios where this approach may be important in order to maintain the desired high standards. Let's look at one example.

Imagine the scene. It is 9.30 on a Monday morning and one team member arrives 30 minutes late for a 9.00 meeting at the office. The person then unleashes their frustration on the rest of the staff by making the following proclamation.

"What a terrible day. The trains are late, the traffic is terrible and today I am due to meet the client from hell. What a way to begin a Monday."

What to do about such an entrance? You can ignore the person, confront them or adopt some other approach. The following example is one I witnessed when working with a company.

The leader asked the late arriving team member to make another entrance. They explained this in the following way.

"I wonder if you can replay that situation. Everybody has found it hard to get into work today, but we want to get on with the job."

"I would like you to go out and then come in again. This time, think about the impression you are giving to people in the office."

"I don't want you to come in with a forced smile, but I do want you to think about the tone you are setting on a Monday morning."

"Do you want to try? It's up to you."

That approach may sound heavy but it worked. The team member smiled wryly, accepted the message and said they were sorry. They left the room and came in again 30 seconds later with a totally different attitude.

The leader was not looking for clones, but they did want people to behave in a professional way. Allowing the situation to have gone unchallenged would have given the message:

"It is okay to start the week by infecting other people."

Team members must be able to express their feelings, but they must also understand the consequences. The way they behave can have a positive or negative effect on other people.

You will have your own way of never walking past a quality problem. This can be relatively easy when it applies to physical products or customer service. But it can be harder regarding human behaviour.

People must get the message that certain actions are encouraged whilst others are unacceptable. Corporate misdemeanours can often be traced back to ignoring people who behaved badly. The messages are:

Reward the behaviour you want repeated and never walk past a quality problem.

Let's return to your own work. If you wish, try tackling the exercises on this theme. This invites you to think of a specific situation where you may want:

To not walk past a quality problem;

To instead give people a positive way forward by suggesting the quality standards to be delivered in the future.

Here is the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Delivering High Quality Standards - Never Walking Past A Quality Problem

The specific situation where it will be important to not walk past a quality problem may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to not walk past the quality problem and instead suggest the high standards to be delivered in the future are:

*

*

*

The Future Press Release Approach

The Press Release

The date is ... The specific things that we have achieved – and what has happened – since we began the work have been:

*

*

*

There are many ways for people to set and work towards goals. One approach is for them to write a future press release. This is a starting from the destination type of approach.

Different people use it in different ways. Some teams or organisations pick a date in the future. This could be a certain point in a project, the end of the financial year or another date in the future.

People then write a press release describing what they have achieved by that date. They may also describe some of the following things:

The specific things they have delivered – including some of the success stories – and the benefits of achieving these results;

The specific strategies they followed – such as the actual things they did – to achieve these results;

The specific other things that may have happened – such as outside events – along the way towards achieving these results.

They may conclude the press release by again describing the results that were delivered and also making any potential recommendations for the future.

People who use the press release approach can find that it helps to bring their aims to life. They may also develop the press release as circumstances change. People then keep working to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the press release approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Future Press Release Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

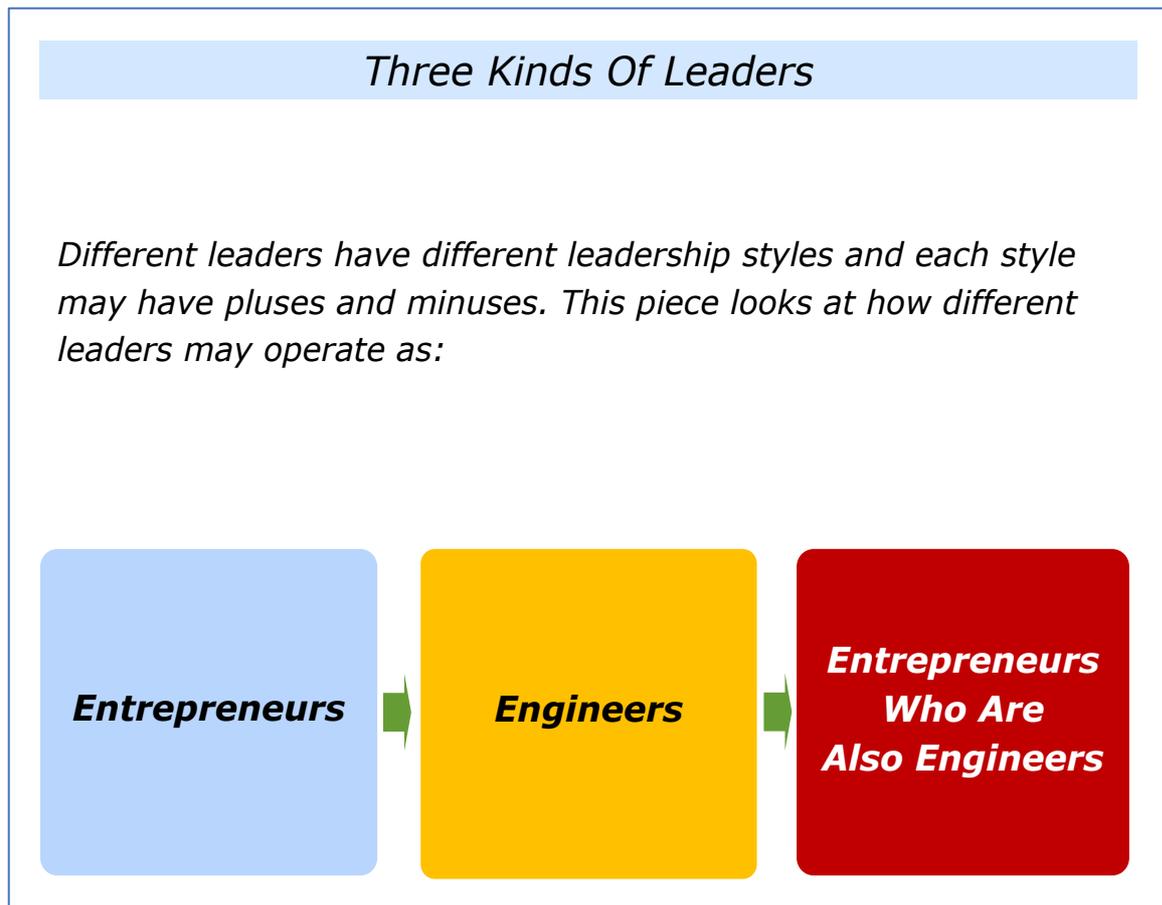

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Entrepreneurs, Engineers And Entrepreneurs Who Are Also Engineers Approaches

There are many kinds of leadership styles. This piece looks at leaders who may operate in certain ways. Let's explore these approaches.

Entrepreneurs

Entrepreneurs tend to have high energy. They are brilliant in their own field and think quickly. They go 'A, B ... and then leap to ... Z'.

Visionary by nature, they often see pictures of what good looks like. They do not always communicate these visions to people, however, even though they may think they have communicated the picture.

Contrary to most beliefs, such people actually do follow a process but it is their own process. They follow these principles intuitively, however, and sometimes it is hard to communicate these to other people.

Great entrepreneurs recognise both their strengths and weaknesses. They often have a coordinator who acts as a translator between them and the rest of the world. The coordinator makes sure the ideas are implemented properly and have the desired impact.

There is seldom a dull moment working with such entrepreneurs. They can be inspirational but also frustrating. Sometimes they change their minds without telling others. Nevertheless, they attract many people who enjoy the adventure.

Engineers

Engineers want to make things work. They tend to be methodical and follow a structured process.

They go 'A, B, C, D, E ...' and continue in a systematic way until they reach 'Z'. They expect others to adopt a similar approach and be able to explain their actions in detail.

Good engineers focus on the end goal. They then apply their expertise to implementing processes and tackling challenges on the road to achieving success. Sometimes they can become fixated on certain issues, however, and need to refocus in the real results to achieve.

This approach may be exactly what is required to develop consistency across an organisation. On the downside, however, this can sometimes lead to micromanagement.

Some engineers move on to developing a style of managing by outcomes rather than managing by tasks. They develop a culture in which people take responsibility for following the key principles and delivering success.

Entrepreneurs Who Are Also Engineers

Some leaders combine both approaches. The entrepreneurial side is inspiring and focuses on the real results to achieve. The engineering side is systematic and sees details on the road to achieving success.

Entrepreneurs who are also engineers can be demanding. Working with them can be exhilarating but also like a switchback ride. The leader can shift quickly from focusing on the vision to swooping down into the detail. This approach can be intimidating for some people.

Such leaders can be challenging to work with but often attract people who follow them from project to project. People are willing to put with both the pluses and minuses involved. They know they will be part of exciting teams that often deliver the goods.

There are several guidelines to follow when working with the different kinds of leaders. These can be useful to bear in mind whatever the kind of leader. It can be useful to take the following steps

To clarify the leader's picture of success and play back your understanding to ensure you both have the same picture;

To clarify and follow the overall Dos and Don'ts for working well with the leader – it is important to know their view of how they want people to work with them;

To get some early successes and proactively keep the leader informed about the progress being made towards achieving the goals – otherwise the leader might start interfering;

To recognise that the leader might change their mind without telling you – so it can be good to keep checking their evolving picture of success;

To maintain high professional standards and do your best to deliver the agreed picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a situation where you may be working with a leader who demonstrates elements of being an entrepreneur, engineer or an entrepreneur who is also an engineer?

How can you work with such a leader? How can you retain your sanity and also do your best to deliver the agreed picture of success? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Entrepreneur, Engineer And Entrepreneur Who Is Also An Engineer Approaches

The specific situation where I may be working with a leader who demonstrates one or more of these styles may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to retain my sanity and also do my best to deliver the agreed picture of success are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The People's Responsibilities In Working Towards The Picture Of Success Approach

This is an old but useful exercise that can be used to clarify each person's responsibilities in working towards achieving the team's goals. You can gather people together and go through the following steps.

Step One – Clarifying The Team's Picture Of Success

Start by clarifying the team's picture of success. You can put this on a flip chart and produce something like the following. You can, of course, follow your own framework for clarifying the team's goals.

The Team's Picture Of Success

The specific results we want to achieve by ... are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Step Two – Clarifying Each Person's Responsibilities In Working Towards Achieving The Team's Picture Of Success

Imagine that the team is clear on its picture of success. You can then put up individual flip charts with each person's name at the top and also give each person lots of Post-it Notes.

You can then invite people to spend some time writing on individual Post-it Notes. Bearing in mind their strengths, they are to describe what they see as their responsibilities in working towards achieving the picture of success.

Each person may already have a specific job title. But it is actually important for them to also focus on their strengths and what they see as their responsibilities. This can also form for the basis for a later discussion.

Imagine that you have given people time to write their Post-It Notes. They can then go up in turn to the flip chart that has their name on the top and put their Post-its under their name. It is good if they can explain each Post-it as they put it on the flip chart.

The following pages show how this exercise might look if there are five people in the team. You can also add each person's job title if you wish but, again, it is important for the person to bear in mind their strengths and their best contribution.

Later, after everybody has put up their Post-it Notes, there will be a chance for others to offer ideas about what may be a person's best contribution. Here is one way the exercise can look.

Person A's Responsibilities

Bearing in mind their strengths, Person A's responsibilities in working to achieve the team's picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Person B's Responsibilities

Bearing in mind their strengths, Person B's responsibilities in working to achieve the team's picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Person C's Responsibilities

Bearing in mind their strengths, Person C's responsibilities in working to achieve the team's picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Person D's Responsibilities

Bearing in mind their strengths, Person D's responsibilities in working to achieve the team's picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Person E's Responsibilities

Bearing in mind their strengths, Person E's responsibilities in working to achieve the team's picture of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Imagine that each person has described what they see as their responsibilities in working towards achieving the team's picture of success.

You can set aside time to give other the team members chance to share suggestions regarding each person's possible contribution. Bearing in mind a particular team member's strengths, they may share:

The specific things a person may wish to consider adding to their contribution;

The specific things a person may wish to consider delegating to other people in the team.

Let's assume the team has completed this part of the exercise. They can then move on to the final part.

Step Three – Clear Contracting About Each Person's Responsibilities In Working Towards Achieving The Team's Picture Of Success

Imagine that there is agreement on each person's responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals. It can then be useful to make clear working contracts to ensure everybody has the same picture.

If appropriate, you can take away the flip charts – or other format that has been used – and write up what has been agreed. This can then be circulated to everybody in the team.

Times change, of course, and things can evolve. So it can be important to keep revisiting and revising these agreed responsibilities. If appropriate, however, you can produce something like the following framework.

As mentioned earlier, this is an old exercise but it can be useful for clarifying people's responsibilities. They can then keep do their best to achieve the team's picture of success.

The Team's Picture Of Success

The specific results we want to achieve by ... are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Team Members' Responsibilities In Working Towards Achieving The Picture Of Success

Person A's Responsibilities Are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Person B's Responsibilities Are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Person C's Responsibilities Are:

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

Person D's Responsibilities Are:

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

Person E's Responsibilities Are:

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

The Team Coach, Individual Coach And Specialist Coach Approaches

The Coaching Approaches

There are many different kinds of coaches and each of these may follow their chosen philosophy. These include coaches who may focus on one or more of the following areas.

There are many kinds of coaches and each of these may follow their chosen philosophy. They may then aim to pass on strategies and skills that help people to achieve success.

Different coaches may also work best in different situations. They may work best as a team, individual or specialist coach. Let's explore these themes.

The Team Coach

Such coaches have the personality and skills required to help certain kinds of teams to achieve their goals. They may sometimes demonstrate the following qualities.

They know how certain kinds of teams build on their strengths and follow certain strategies to achieve success;

They know how to pass on this knowledge in a way that people can use to help their team to achieve success

They know how to enable people in a team to combines their strengths to do superb work and achieve success.

Some coaches may work best with certain kinds of teams who are at a particular stage of their development. They may also work best for a certain time frame. They may then move on to work with other teams.

The Individual Coach

Such coaches may have the knowledge and skills required to help certain kinds of individuals to achieve their goals. They may sometimes demonstrate the following qualities.

They know how to help certain kinds of people to build on their strengths and follow certain strategies to achieve success;

They know how to pass on this knowledge in a way that these people can use to achieve success;

They know how to enable such people to do superb work and find solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving success.

Some coaches may work best with certain kinds of individuals who are at a particular stage of their development. They may also work best for a certain time frame with these people.

The Specialist Coach

Such coaches may have expertise in specific area. This could be in wellbeing, psychology, crisis management, communication skills, sales, technical development, peak performance or another activity.

Such coaches often work best with people who want to develop or tackle particular challenges in this activity. They may sometimes demonstrate the following qualities.

They know how to help people who want to focus on a special activity and achieve success;

They know how to pass on this knowledge in a way that these people can use to achieve success;

They know how to enable such people to do superb work and find solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving success.

Such coaches work best when they can use their specialist knowledge to help people who want to develop in a particular activity that matches their area of expertise. They can then apply their knowledge to help people to achieve success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to build on your strengths and follow one or more these coaching approaches. What may be the kind of coaching you would like to do?

Would you like to focus on team coaching, individual coaching or specialist coaching? Or would you like to combine several of these approaches? How could you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Team, Individual And Specialist Coaching Approaches

The specific kind of coaching approach – or combination of these approaches – that I would like to do is:

*

The specific things I can do to follow this in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Clarifying The Brief Properly Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to make sure there is a clear brief about the outcomes to achieve. This enables people to get the basics right and do brilliant work.

This is a vital step when working with external clients. It can be just as important when working with people within an organisation. Providing a clear brief can set people up to achieve success.

Clear contracting is vital in many areas of life. This is especially so when either:

You are giving a brief to a person, team or people in an organisation;

You are checking that you have understood a brief properly after it has been given to you by your boss, a customer or another person.

Some people get into trouble because the brief is not clear or they have not even been given a brief. This can happen in organisations that do not have clear goals or leave it up to people to interpret a brief in their own ways.

Great workers ensure that a brief is clear. This provides a framework that people can follow to do fine work. Let's explore how to follow this approach when communicating and clarifying a brief.

Communicating The Brief

Imagine that you are a leader who aims to describe a strategy, a piece of work or a project. Clarity is vital. It is important to communicate a clear brief to give people context and describes the outcomes to achieve.

There are many models for giving such a brief. Some people draw on elements of military missions. Such missions often embody the following qualities. They aim to communicate:

A clear and achievable goal ... A strategy that can work and the resources required to achieve the goal ... A clear time frame and the equivalent of an exit strategy.

Some leaders also use the What, Why, How, Who and When approach. They give people the big picture and context. They then describe the outcomes to achieve, the guidelines to follow and people's roles in achieving the aims.

Imagine you want to follow this approach when describing a strategy, a piece of work or a project. The following section provides a framework you can use to communicate the brief.

You will adapt this framework in your own way, of course, and use examples to bring it to life. It can then be important to give people the opportunity to ask questions for information so that they are crystal clear on the brief. Here is the framework.

Communicating The Brief

One approach is to cover the following themes when describing a strategy, a piece of work or a project.

- The What. The specific outcomes we want to achieve are:
- The Why. The specific reasons for doing this and the benefits will be:
- The How. The specific guidelines – the overall Dos and Don'ts – to follow when working to achieve the outcomes are:
- The Who. The specific people who will be involved in delivering the outcomes - together with their responsibilities and the support they will be given - are:
- The When. The specific action plan and road map for achieving the outcomes is:

Good leaders recognise that people often work best when they understand the big picture and their part in achieving the goals. They therefore take the following steps to make sure that everybody is on the same page.

They communicate the context, describe the outcomes to achieve – plus the reasons and benefits - and make sure that everybody is clear on the brief;

They make clear contracts about people's contributions, give them the support to do the job and then manage by outcomes on the way towards delivering the brief;

They encourage people to perform superb work, inform them about the progress being made – plus any changes - and enable people to do their best to deliver the brief.

This is the ideal scenario. There may be times, however, when people are asked to do things but are unclear on the brief. Let's explore how to manage this kind of situation.

Clarifying The Brief

Imagine that somebody has asked you to follow a strategy, perform a piece of work or do a project. Some organisations simply order people to do things without giving context or clarity about the outcomes to achieve.

You can simply get on with the work and assume you know what is required. This can be challenging, however, and sometimes the confusion can lead to not being able to deliver the goods.

What to do in such a situation? One approach is to behave in a positive and professional way but also aim to clarify the brief. If appropriate, you can take the following steps. You can aim:

To clarify your understanding of the outcomes to achieve by doing your own background research about the strategy, piece of work or project;

To clarify your provisional understanding by then putting together what you believe to be the plan – the What, Why, How, Who and When;

To clarify the actual plan by, when appropriate, checking out your understanding with the person who has asked you to perform the work.

This final part may need to be done in a careful and professional way. One approach is to say something along the following lines when approaching the person who communicated the task.

"I wonder if it is possible for me to check something out with you to make sure I am working towards the right goals. As far as I understand it:

"The outcomes to achieve are ... The guidelines to follow are ... The time frame is ...

"Is that right? Are there any other aims to add or things that I should bear in mind?"

This is the short version for checking out if you have understood the brief. Such an approach may help to clarify the outcomes to achieve – plus the guidelines to follow – and enable you to get on with the work.

Another approach is to play back and check out a fuller version of the What, Why, How, Who and When. This may or may not be appropriate, but it can help to fill in the whole picture.

Here is a framework you can use for taking this approach. You will do this in an appropriate way, of course, to have a positive conversation. This can help you to clarify and then do your best to deliver the brief.

Clarifying The Brief

As far as I understand it, this is the brief. Let me know if there is anything that needs to be added or amended.

- The What. The specific outcomes we want to achieve are:
- The Why. The specific reasons for doing this and the benefits will be:
- The How. The specific guidelines – the overall Dos and Don'ts – to follow when working to achieve the outcomes are:
- The Who. The specific people who will be involved in delivering the outcomes - together with their responsibilities and the support they will be given - are:
- The When. The specific action plan and road map for achieving the outcomes is:

There are many ways to do fine work. As mentioned earlier, one approach is make sure there is a clear brief. Taking this approach can help to set people up to achieve success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Clarifying The Brief Properly Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Majority Gains Approach Before The Marginal Gains Approach

Majority Gains And Marginal Gains

Great performers focus on getting the majority gains before then adding the marginal gains.

Majority Gains

Marginal Gains

Many people now focus on the importance of making marginal gains to improve performance. Here is one definition of this approach.

The principle of marginal gains is that small incremental improvements in any process amount to a significant improvement when they are all added together.

This approach can help people, teams and companies to have a competitive edge, but it is important to see this in context. One of the key rules in any activity is that:

Great performers focus on getting the majority gains before then adding the marginal gains.

Such people start by doing what works in their chosen field. This takes them to 8+/10. They then add the marginal gains to get to 10/10. Let's look at some examples.

Great workers may aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to deliver success. This provides the basis for doing superb work.

Great teams may aim to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. They then manage by outcomes on the way to helping their people to deliver the right results.

Great organisations may aim to encourage their people to focus on the organisation's purpose and follow its principles. They then enable their people to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Great workers aim to do what they believe in. They keep doing the basics and, when appropriate, add the brilliance. They then sometimes reach their goal by adding that touch of class.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you want to follow some elements of majority and marginal gains approach?

What works in your chosen activity? What can you do to make the majority gains? How can you keep doing these things? How can you get to 8+/10? What can you do to add the marginal gains? How can you then do your best to get to 10/10?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Majority Gains And Marginal Gains Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to get the majority gains – to do what works – in this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can then do to add the potential marginal gains in this activity are:

*

*

*

The Consistently High Standards Approach Rather Than The Chaotic Approach

Great workers often follow the delivering consistently high standards approach. They do this whether working as individuals, teams or organisations. They aim to continually do superb work and deliver the goods.

Some workers follow the chaotic approach. They do this as individuals, teams or organisations. They produce work that is inconsistent, poor quality or fails deliver the goods.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

The Consistently High Standards Approach

Consistently High Standards

*The consistently high standards
we aim to deliver are:*

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

When have you encountered people who delivered consistently high standards? This could have been an individual worker, a team or an organisation.

They may have been working as an artist, artisan, counsellor, problem solver or in another role. They may have been people working in a hospice, hotel, sports team, service business or another organisation.

What were the principles the person or people followed? How did they aim to translate these principles into action? What happened as a result of them taking these steps?

Depending on the work they do, different people may follow different principles. But here are some of the most common principles that individuals, teams and organisations may follow to deliver the goods.

Consistently High Standards

The specific things we aim to do to deliver consistently high standards are these.

 To create a positive environment*

*To create an encouraging environment and make people feel welcome ...
To respect and care for people.*

 To be professional*

To always act in a professional way ... To always deliver high quality standards

 To provide superb service*

To focus on what people want to achieve ... To do our best to help people to achieve their goals.

The specific things people do to translate these standards into action will determine the quality of their work. They aim to deliver these in a way that achieves the desired positive results.

Good organisations continually encourage people to maintain high standards. They often produce success stories, for example, that highlight the specific things that people have done to perform superb work.

They recognise that the quality of their work – their brand – is not what they say it is: it is what their customers experience. They therefore aim keep in touch with their customers:

To clarify their present and future needs;

To clarify what they are doing well – and how they can do more of these things – to fulfil their present and future needs;

To clarify what they can do better – and how – to fulfil their present and future needs.

Good organisations follow the purpose of all service organisations. They aim to use their strengths to do superb work and help their stakeholders to achieve success.

They focus on stability, stimulation and success. They provide stability by following their principles. They then provide a stimulating environment that encourages their people to make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

The Chaotic Approach

Some workers, organisations and governments behave in a chaotic way. They may profess to follow certain principles but they are inconsistent, fail to fulfil their promises and do poor quality work.

Some people follow the chaotic approach in order to cause confusion. They then proclaim themselves to be the only ones who can clean up the mess.

Some organisations create chaos because they fail to describe their purpose or fail to be disciplined when faced by problems. They lurch from problem to problem without producing a clear strategy.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the consistently high standards approach?

You may aim to do this when working as an individual. Alternatively, you may aim to do this when leading a team or an organisation. How can you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Consistently High Standards Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow it in my own way are:

*

*The specific things that may happen
as a result of taking these steps may be:*

*

The Clarifying The Actual Words You Would Like Your Stakeholders To Be Saying Approach

The Stakeholder's Name Is ...
The actual words we would like to hear them saying about the work we are doing and the contribution we are making to the organisation are: "....." "....." "....."

This is a well-known exercise that is often used in service organisations. It invites people who are aiming to give great service to take the following steps:

To clarify the names of the key stakeholders they want to satisfy;

To clarify the actual words they would like to hear these stakeholders saying about the service they are giving to them;

To clarify the specific things they can do to increase the likelihood of the stakeholders saying these things.

Imagine that you have taken over a team that aims to provide great service to both its internal and external customers. If appropriate, you can gather people together and guide them through the following steps.

People can brainstorm their key stakeholders and write the actual names of these people

The people in your team can begin by writing the names of their internal stakeholders. These may include, for example: the CEO, the senior leadership team and people in other departments.

It is vital to give good service to these people. This will help these internal customers: a) to do their jobs properly; b) to help the organisation to achieve its picture of success.

The team members can then write the names of each of their external stakeholders. It can be useful: a) to write the name of, for example, the external customer or organisation; b) to write the names of particular people in that organisation.

This can be a vital step because there may be multiple people in the customer organisation that they need to satisfy. It is good to identify these specific people.

Imagine that the team has brainstormed all the possible stakeholders. You can then invite them to take the next step.

People can allocate one flip chart per stakeholder and write the name of the stakeholder at the top of the flip chart

This can be a useful step in refining the list of stakeholders. Let's look at one example. Some time ago I ran a session for 30 people in a pioneering company that was about to be bought. They identified several groups of stakeholders. These included:

The New Owners ... John, The CEO ... Sue, The Managing Director ... Their Customers - which included their long-term customers, new customers and prospective customers ... Their Colleagues - the people working in their own company.

Your team will have its own list of stakeholders. There may be times, however, when you may need to educate them about other stakeholders - such as people in their wider community. You can then invite people to take the next step.

People can describe the actual words they would like to hear each of the stakeholders saying

Invite people to go to the flip chart that relates to the specific stakeholder they would like to focus on. You can then encourage people:

To brainstorm and then agree on the actual words they would like to hear the specific stakeholder saying;

To make sure these are actual sentences – rather than management phrases – and to bring the sentences to life by giving examples.

One approach is to invite individuals to write these quotes on Post-it Notes and then put each of these on the flip chart. Another approach is to simply ask people to brainstorm the quotes and put them on the flip chart.

Different people will obviously write different things. They may, for example, want one of their external customers to say the following things.

"The team understands the goals of our business."

"The team provides great service that helps us to achieve our goals."

"Their people are positive and professional."

"The team acts as a one-stop shop when solving any problems."

"I would recommend this team to anybody who wants to learn about giving great service."

Let's assume that the team members have completed this stage. They can then move on to the next step.

People can describe the specific things they can do to increase the likelihood of the stakeholders saying these things

People can focus on the things they can control and do their best to increase the likelihood of the stakeholders being satisfied. Looking at each stakeholder in turn, here are some of the things they can do. They can aim:

To clarify the stakeholder's challenges and goals;

To make clear contracts with the stakeholder about the specific things they can do to help them to achieve their goals;

To clarify the Dos and Don'ts for working well with each of the stakeholders;

To stay in touch with the stakeholder, get some early wins and provide great service;

To, when appropriate, meet with the stakeholder to clarify:

a) the specific things they are doing well regarding the service they are providing and how they can do more of these things;

b) the specific things they can do better and how;

c) the specific challenges the stakeholder may face in the future and how they can help them to tackle these challenges;

To continually improve their professional offering and do what they can to help the stakeholder achieve success.

Different teams use this exercise in different ways. Some complete the flip charts and then put them around their work place. Others use them as wallpaper for their computers.

One final point. It can be useful to keep revisiting this exercise because things can change. So it can be good to do it at least once every quarter.

For information, here are some examples of the frameworks that one team used. You will, of course, adapt the exercises in your own way.

Managing Our Stakeholders

The actual words - the actual phrases - we would like our key stakeholders to be saying about our work and our contribution to the organisation.

Introduction

This is an old exercise that people may have done many times in service organisations but it can be well worth revisiting. It invites people:

To write the names of their key stakeholders both inside and outside the organisation;

To describe the actual words or phrases they would like each of these stakeholders to be saying about the work they are doing and what they are contributing the organisation;

To describe the specific things they can do to increase the likelihood of people saying these things.

Here is the exercise.

The CEO (only if we are reporting directly to them)

The actual words we would like them to be saying about the work we are delivering and the contribution we are making to the organisation are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things we can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

Other Departments In The Organisation

The actual words we would like them to be saying about the work we are delivering and the contribution we are making to the organisation are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things we can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

Our Manager

The actual words we would like them to be saying about the work we are delivering and the contribution we are making to the organisation are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things we can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

Our Clients – A Flip Chart For Each Client

The actual words we would like them to be saying about the work we are delivering and the way we are helping them to achieve success are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things we can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

- *
- *
- *

Our Own Team Members

The actual words we would like to be saying about the work we are delivering and the way we are working are:

"....."

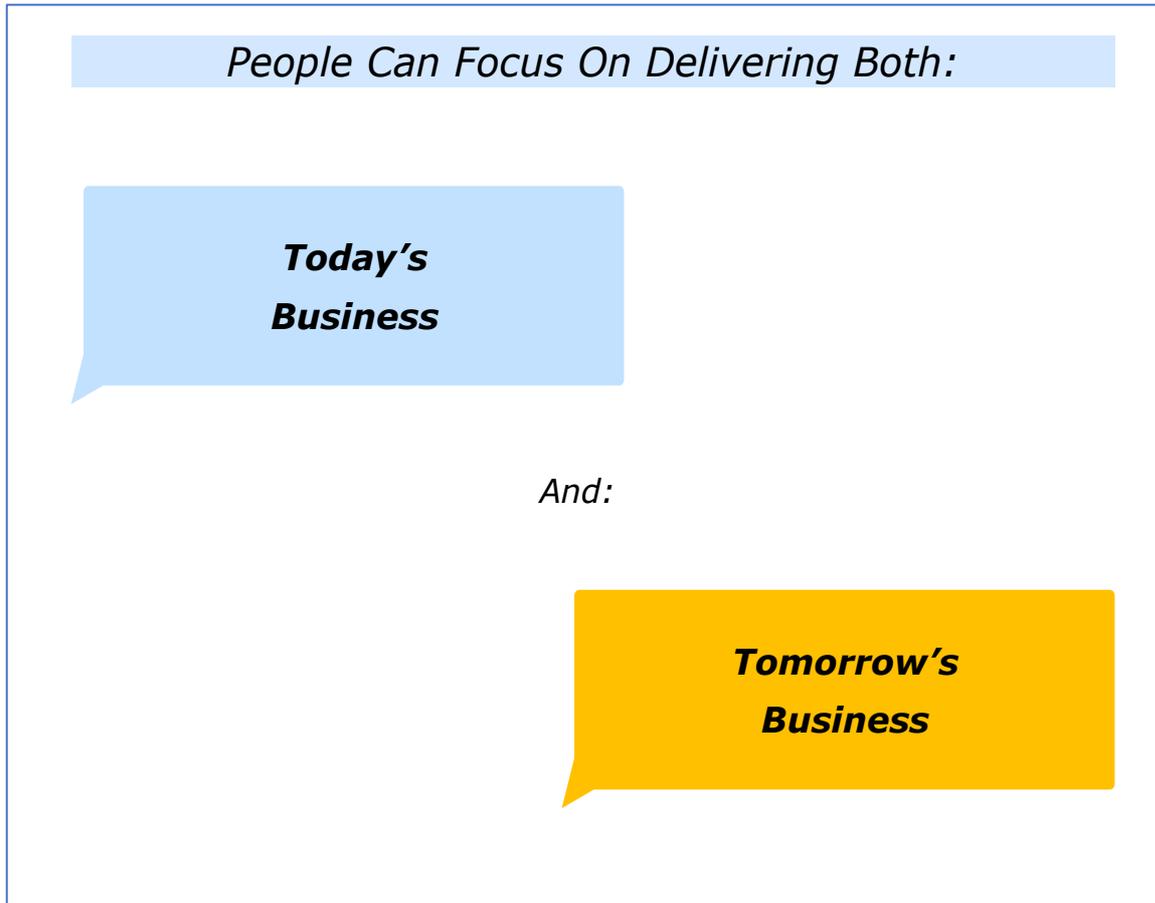

"....."

"....."

The specific things we can do to increase the likelihood of us saying these things are:

- *
- *
- *

The Today's Business And Tomorrow's Business Approach

Imagine that you lead a team. There are many ways to encourage your people to deliver success. One approach is to involve them in focusing on how to deliver today's business and tomorrow's business.

The leader of one team I worked with invited their people to do exercises on these themes. The following section describes how to implement this approach. You would, of course, adapt this in your own way.

The leader began by setting the scene before inviting people to focus on these themes. Here is a summary of what they said when introducing the session.

Today's Business And Tomorrow's Business

Today I would like to involve you in producing suggestions we can follow to deliver today's business and also develop tomorrow's business. This can help us to shape a positive future.

Before we do that, here is a reminder of the team's picture of success. This gives you a picture of: a) the team's goals; b) the benefits; c) the strategies we aim to follow; d) the things we have achieved so far this year.

The Picture Of Success

The team's goals, the benefits, the strategies and the successes we have achieved so far this year.

The Specific Goals. The specific goals we aim to achieve by the end of this year are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Benefits. The benefits of achieving these goals – for all the various stakeholders – will be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Strategies. The strategies we aim to follow to do our best to achieve the goals are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Successes. The successes we have delivered so far on the way towards achieving these goals have been:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Let's focus on the future. As you know, we need to keep delivering superb work to keep delivering today's business. This includes practical steps we can take:

To keep building on our strengths, tackling areas for improvement and following our strategies for achieving the goals;

To keep doing superb work, encouraging each other and providing great service to both our external and internal customers;

To keep delivering today's business, developing tomorrow's business and doing our best to achieve ongoing success.

Let's move on to the exercises. These focus on the following areas.

Today's Business

I want one group of people to brainstorm and then produce practical suggestions we can follow: a) to keep delivering today's business; b) to maybe get even more work from these customers. Here is the exercise.

Today's Business

The specific things we can do to perform superb work to deliver today's business – and maybe get even more work from these customers - are

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

Tomorrow's Business

As you know, it is vital for us to be proactive to develop and then deliver tomorrow's business. This includes practical steps we can take:

To continue working with our pacesetting customers – those who ahead of the game in their chosen field;

To create services and products that will help them and other customers to tackle their future challenges successfully;

To keep building a team where we play to our strengths, encourage each other and shape a successful future.

I want one group of people to brainstorm and then produce practical suggestions we can follow to develop and maybe aim to begin to deliver tomorrow's business. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Tomorrow's Business

The specific things we can do to develop and aim to begin to deliver tomorrow's business are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Each person went into the group that focused on the area they wanted to cover. The two groups did the exercises, brainstormed ideas and settled on several practical suggestions. They presented these back to the whole team where the ideas were discussed.

The leader then explained the next steps. This would involve clarifying the specific ideas to be implemented and translating these into clear action plans.

This step would also involve having mission holders who would ensure that the ideas got implemented. This would be a vital step in delivering the goods.

Good teams make sure they have mission holders. Here are some of the characteristics demonstrated by such people.

The Mission Holders

Good teams have many people who are prepared to be mission holders and help to deliver the picture of success.

Here are some of the themes to bear in mind regarding such people.

Mission Holders

- Such people love to take responsibility. They often start their career by being eager beavers who make lists and implement action plans. They get a kick from getting things done and seeing positive results.
- They may then move into a more strategic role where they act as orchestrators, coordinators or project directors. They build agreed action plans, make clear working contracts and coordinate people's strengths to achieve the goals.
- They are prepared to take accountability. They must be given the authority and autonomy required to deliver the goods. They are then more likely to make their best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

The leader then described the action planning process in more detail. They explained this in the following way.

Thank you for your ideas. Looking at these, I would now like to work with you on making action plans for delivering today's business and tomorrow's business.

When doing this we will take the following steps. I will also be working with you on making these happen.

First, I would like each of you go to the area you are interested in and are also are prepared to help to deliver. So you can choose again whether you volunteer to focus on today's business or tomorrow's business.

Second, I will work with each of these groups to agree on: a) the specific things we will focus on to deliver today's business and tomorrow's business; b) the specific actions plans for making these things happen.

Third, I will then ask for volunteers who are prepared to act as mission holders who take responsibility for making sure these things happen.

The mission holders will have my full backing. They will be given the required support and empowered to create task forces of volunteers who are prepared to implement the action plans.

The leader gave people a few minutes to decide which area they wanted to focus on – today's business or tomorrow's business. This involved a bit of toing and froing but eventually people settled into their groups.

The leader then spent a few minutes with each group to agree on the aims for the session. They described:

The key themes they definitely wanted people to focus on when producing action plans;

The freedom that people had to, if they wished, add other themes when producing the action plans;

The specific kind of action plans they wanted people to produce and also the mission holders for each theme.

The leader kicked off each session in the groups before settling in a place where people could find them if required. People got on with the tasks. They also occasionally with the leader that they were on the right track.

People did the work and then presented back their action plans. Here is the framework they used.

Today's Business And Tomorrow's Business

The Action Plan

Today's Business: The specific things we want to do to deliver today's business are:

 To ...*

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

Tomorrow's Business: The specific things we want to do to develop and deliver tomorrow's business are:

* To ...

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Mission Holder for ensuring we make these things happen is ...

The leader then held meetings with each of the mission holders. These sessions covered the following areas:

The specific support the mission holders needed to implement the plans successfully;

The specific ways the mission holders would proactively keep the leader informed about the progress being made towards achieving success;

The specific other topics the mission holders wanted to discuss that could help them and their task forces to achieve success.

The team implemented the ideas, got some quick successes and achieved many of the goals. They then followed a similar process each year to help it to achieve ongoing success.

Imagine you lead a team. If appropriate, how could you follow elements of this approach in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Today's Business And Tomorrow's Business Approach:

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

Individual Development

The following section focuses on how individuals can continue to develop.

The Positive Approach

There are many ways to have a positive approach to life. This piece looks at one of the basic models that has been followed by many people, teams and organisations.

People who take this approach choose to have a positive attitude. They then follow their principles and express these by working towards a chosen picture of success.

These themes have been described by philosophers, psychologists and others over the years. Some acknowledge the roots of this approach, whilst some claim it as their own. Some also use other words to describe the themes.

Different people follow these themes in different ways. The following sections explore how some people aim to translate these into action.

Positive

People who take this approach are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. Bearing this in mind, they often choose:

To be positive rather than negative ... To be creators rather than complainers ... To take responsibility rather than avoid responsibility .. To help people rather than hurt people.

They aim to build on their strengths rather than their shortcomings. They focus on what they can control rather than what they can't control. They aim to do their best during their time on the planet.

They are good at seeing patterns in the areas where they excel. They then aim: a) to build on the successful patterns; b) to stop the unsuccessful patterns; c) to follow the strategies most likely to achieve success.

Positive realists are good at seeing possibilities. They have a history of studying success and clarifying what works in certain situations. Bearing this in mind, they often enjoy finding creative solutions to problems.

Such people are good at positive reframing. They reframe situations to focus on: a) the positive possibilities; b) the possible ways forward; c) the practical things they can do to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to continue to have a positive attitude in the future. How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try completing the following sentence.

Positive Attitude

The specific things I can do to continue to have a positive attitude in my life and work are:

*

*

*

Principles

People who take this approach often follow their chosen principles and aim to translate these into action. Doing what they believe in gives them strength.

Such a person may follow certain moral principles, a spiritual faith or another belief system. They keep referring to this inner compass when making decisions in their daily lives.

What are the principles that you aim to follow in your life or work? Different people give different answers to this question. Here are some of the themes they mention.

*My Principles – The principles
I try to follow in my life are:*

*To be grateful ... To encourage people ... To see every day as a bonus ...
To care for nature ... To create beauty ... To use my talents to help people ... To do quality work ... To give people positive memories for life.*

Let's return to the question we asked earlier. What are the principles you try to follow in your own life? How do you try to translate these into action?

What are the reasons why you want to follow these principles? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Principles

The specific principles I try to follow in my life are:

*

*

*

Picture Of Success

People who take this approach often aim to follow their principles and express these by working to achieve a certain picture of success. Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

They may aim to encourage people by building a happy family, running seminars that inspire students, providing medical or doing another activity that enables people to achieve their goals.

They may aim to do creative work that finds solutions to problems, uses technology to improve people's lives, removes carbon from the atmosphere or do another activity that helps to build a better world.

They may aim to help people to do superb work by creating an inspiring school, running a sports academy, leading a pioneering team or creating an organisation that enables people to achieve peak performance.

People who take this approach often focus on a principle they want to follow and translate this into doing a specific piece of work. They then take the following steps:

They clarify the real results they want to achieve and translate this into a clear picture of success;

They clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving the picture of success;

They clarify their action plan, perform superb work, keep improving and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a principle you want to follow and translate this into doing a specific piece of work? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What is the piece of work you want to do? Bearing this in mind, what are the real results you want to achieve? How can you translate this into a clear picture of success?

What are the strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success? How can you translate this into a clear action plan? How can you then do your best to achieve the goals? What may be the benefits of achieving the picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Picture Of Success

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The Specific Goals

*The real results I want to achieve
by doing this piece of work are:*

*

*

*

The Specific Strategies

The specific strategies I can follow - and how I can translate these into action - to give myself the greatest chance of success are:

*

*

*

The Specific Benefits

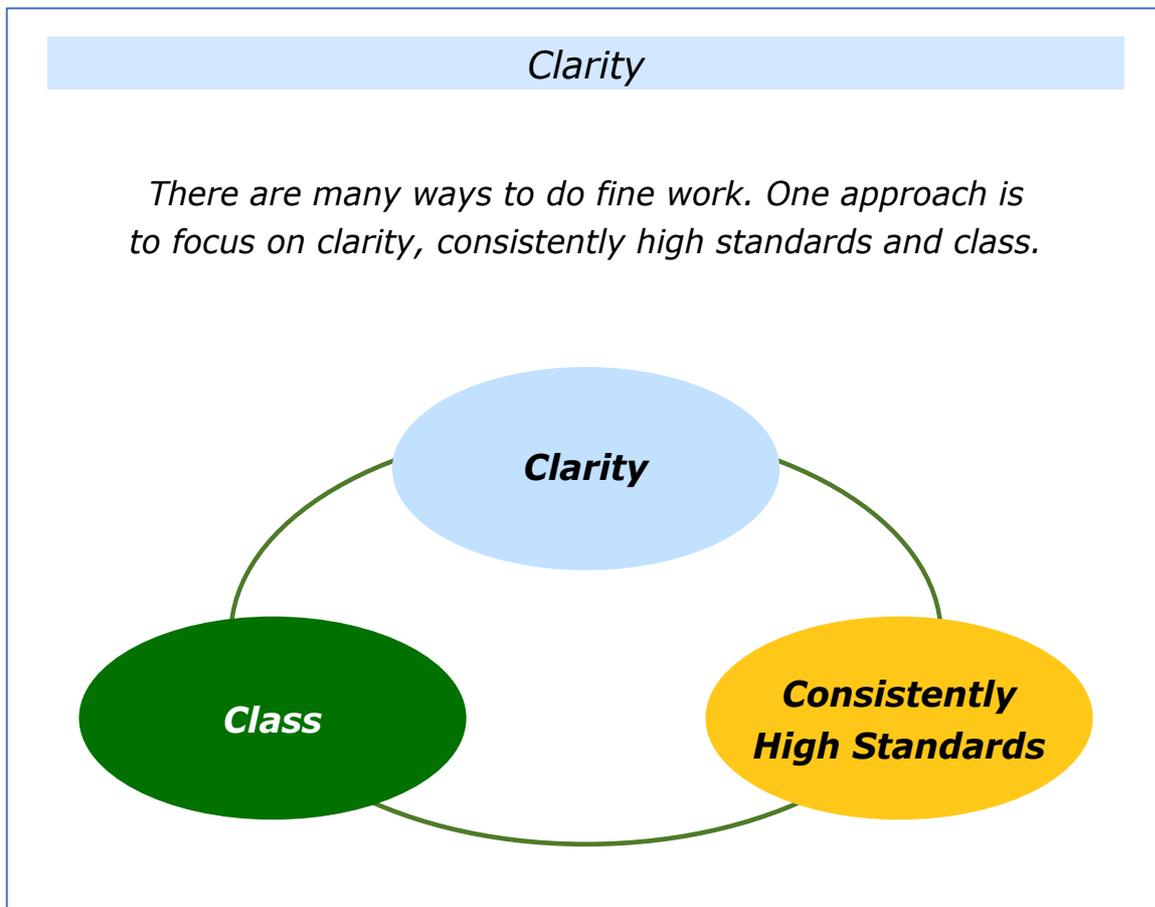

*The specific benefits of achieving these results
– for both myself and other people – will be:*

*

*

*

The Clarity, Consistently High Standards And Class Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on clarity, consistently high standards and class. Let's explore how to translate this approach into action.

Clarity

Great workers build on their strengths and set specific goals. Choosing to be selective to be effective, they aim to be crystal clear on:

The specific results they want to achieve and the benefits of achieving this picture of success;

The specific strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

The specific action plan they aim to follow to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Such workers do their research and due diligence before committing to achieving certain goals. Different people do this in different ways. Some take the following steps.

They clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goals;

They clarify how they can build on the pluses and minimise the minuses on the way towards achieving the goals;

They clarify their motivation rating – on a scale 0-10 - to do what is required to achieve the goals.

Great workers make sure their motivation rating is at least 7+/10. They may also clarify the specific things they can do to improve the rating. Some people take the following steps.

They clarify how they can get the required support and resources needed to do the job;

They clarify how they can get some quick successes and encourage themselves on the journey;

They clarify how they can manage any potential challenges on the road to achieve the goals.

Such workers go into projects with their eyes open. They take time to reflect and, bearing in mind all the factors involved, they then commit to doing the work. This leads to the next step.

Consistently High Standards

Great workers aim to do their best and deliver high standards. They take this approach whether they are performing at the Village Hall or the Carnegie Hall.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you took this approach? You may have been encouraging a person, teaching a class, doing a creative project, leading a team or doing another activity.

What did you do to prepare properly? How did you follow good habits? How did you aim to keep improving? How did you do your best to achieve the goal? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Great workers follow their chosen routines for doing fine work. They often start by aiming to set things up to succeed. They then sometimes take the following steps when doing a piece of work.

They rehearse what they are going to do next - such as following their strategy, doing a task or tackling a challenge;

They follow their chosen strategy, deliver high standards and find solutions to challenges;

They keep developing by building on what they are doing well and tackling areas for improvement.

Imagine that a person is following these principles and doing high quality work. Sometimes this will be enough to deliver the goods. Sometimes they will also focus on the following step.

Class

Great workers sometimes reach their goals by adding that touch of class. Sometimes this can be spectacular. Sometimes it can be a simple act of kindness. Sometimes it can be something that gives people a positive memories for life.

The athlete produces a remarkable performance. The singer produces a memorable encore. The victor behaves generously whilst the loser makes a gracious speech.

Nelson Mandela demonstrated aspects of this approach after leaving prison. Moving away from violence, he chose to focus on reconciliation and kindness.

Desmond Tutu wrote an article for the Guardian in which he highlights how Nelson translated this approach into action. The following section provides excerpts from this article.

Nelson Mandela – Showing Magnanimity And Class

For 27 years, I knew Nelson Mandela by reputation only. I had seen him once, in the early 1950s, when he came to my teacher-training college to judge a debating contest. The next time I saw him was in 1990.

When he came out of prison, many people feared he would turn out to have feet of clay. The idea that he might live up to his reputation seemed too good to be true. A whisper went around that some in the ANC said he was a lot more useful in jail than outside.

When he did come out, the most extraordinary thing happened. Even though many in the white community in South Africa were still dismissing him as a terrorist, he tried to understand their position.

His gestures communicated more eloquently than words. For example, he invited his white jailer as a VIP guest to his inauguration as president, and he invited the prosecutor in the Rivonia trial to lunch.

What incredible acts of magnanimity these were. His prosecutor had been quite zealous in pushing for the death penalty.

Mandela also invited the widows of the Afrikaner political leaders to come to the president's residence. Betsie Verwoerd, whose husband, HF Verwoerd, was assassinated in 1966, was unable to come because she was unwell.

She lived in Oranje, where Afrikaners congregated to live, exclusively. And Mandela dropped everything and went to have tea with her, there, in that place.

He said of the Afrikaners: you can very well understand how they must be feeling. He reached out to them using the symbol of the South African rugby team, the springbok, which was excoriated by many black people as a symbol of Afrikaner power.

Rugby was the white man's sport, especially for Afrikaners, and Mandela's master stroke at the World Cup final was when he strode on to the turf wearing his Springbok jersey.

Almost any other political leader would have seemed gauche, but he carried it off with aplomb. The whole arena, which was probably 99% white, mostly Afrikaner, erupted into cries of "Nelson! Nelson!"

The time in jail was quite crucial. Of course, suffering embitters some people, but it ennobles others. Prison became a crucible that burned away the dross.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to start by focusing on clarity. It is to establish the real results to achieve. It is then to deliver consistently high standards and add that touch of class.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Clarity, Consistently High Standards And Class Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

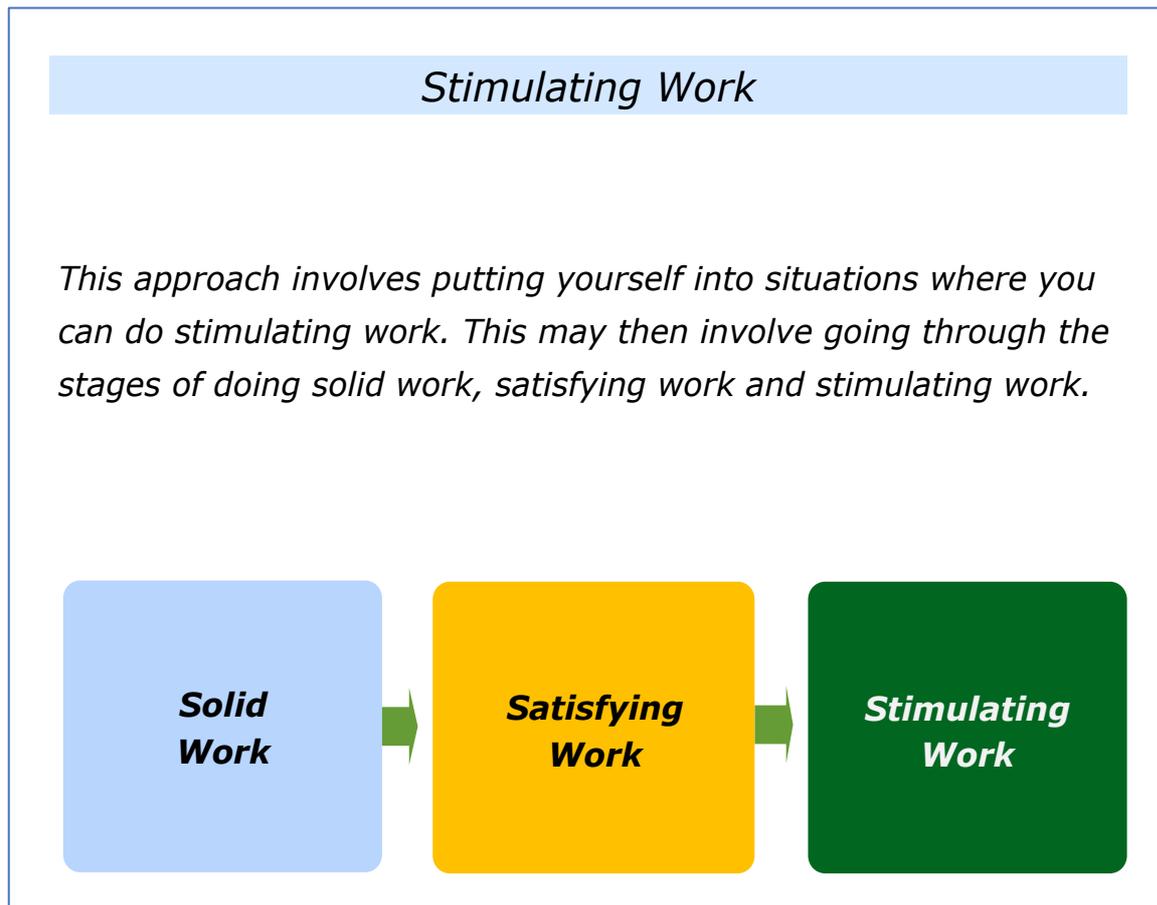

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Stimulating Work Approach

This approach involves putting yourself into situations where you can do stimulating work. It may then involve going through the stages of doing solid work, satisfying work and stimulating work.

This is an approach that can be used when helping people to shape their future careers. It is one that I used with a sales director who was wondering about exploring opportunities in other companies.

The person was adrenaline driven. They loved to do things they felt passionately about, set specific goals and work to achieve their picture of success.

They also enjoyed being a trusted advisor to pacesetting customers who were leaders in their fields. They could then provide services that helped these customers to tackle challenges and achieve future success.

Bearing this in mind, we explored whether it was possible to do more of these things in their present company. This led to them redefining the roles in their team.

They did this in a way that enabled people: a) to play to their strengths; b) to achieve the team's picture of success. This also released them to do what they did best.

The sales director is still with the company. They are doing stimulating work that creates wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for themselves and their colleagues.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. The first step is to clarify the kinds of work that you find stimulating. Different people give different answers when exploring this theme. Here are some of the things they mention.

The Situations Where I Do Stimulating Work Are When I Am:

Teaching motivated students ... Helping dyslexic children ... Solving specific technical problems ... Helping people to overcome pain ... Managing certain kinds of crises ... Giving keynote speeches ... Leading pioneering teams.

Imagine that you have identified and put yourself into a situation where you can do such stimulating work. Bearing this in mind, you may then focus on going through the following stages.

Solid Work

This involves doing the solid work that will provide the platform for doing the satisfying and stimulating work. The kinds of solid work will depend on your chosen activity. Whatever you work you do, however, it may involve aiming:

To plan ahead ... To clarify your strategy ... To translate this into a clear action plan ... To put in place the right structure ... To organise the resources to do the job ... To do the practical things required to set things up to succeed.

The athlete prepares themselves properly – both physically and psychologically. The actor learns their lines, rehearses and is ready to go on stage. The leader makes sure their team will be following the right strategy with the right people in the right way.

You will do the solid work in your own way. This may then lead to the next stage.

Satisfying Work

Many people focus on doing enjoyable and effective work that will help them to achieve their goals. This gives them a sense of satisfaction on the way towards doing stimulating work.

Different people will obviously do different kinds of satisfying work. Here are some of the things that people may mention when focusing on this topic.

The Kinds Of Work I Find Satisfying To Do Are:

Working with my hands ... Making furniture ... Helping certain kinds of clients ... Working in Accident & Emergency ... Simplifying information ... Facilitating workshops ... Reaching a personal goal.

Many people enjoy doing satisfying work. Sometimes they continue doing this for a long time. Sometimes it is a precursor to moving on to the next stage.

Stimulating Work

A person may get the point where they want to feel more alive. They may have a good job and a good salary, but they want to recapture the joy they used to feel in their work.

How to take this step? One approach is for them to build on their strengths and focus on the specific activities that give them positive energy. They can then pursue the following themes.

Stimulation

They can find or create a stimulating project that will benefit certain stakeholders. They can then make clear contracts with these people about the agreed picture of success.

Strategies That Work

They can follow the strategies that will give them the greatest chance of success. They get some early wins and keep people informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

Success

They can do superb work, find solutions to challenges and keep improving. They can do their best deliver the goods and achieve the agreed picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you can follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

What may be the specific situation? How can you do the solid work and satisfying work? How can you then do the stimulating work? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stimulating Work Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

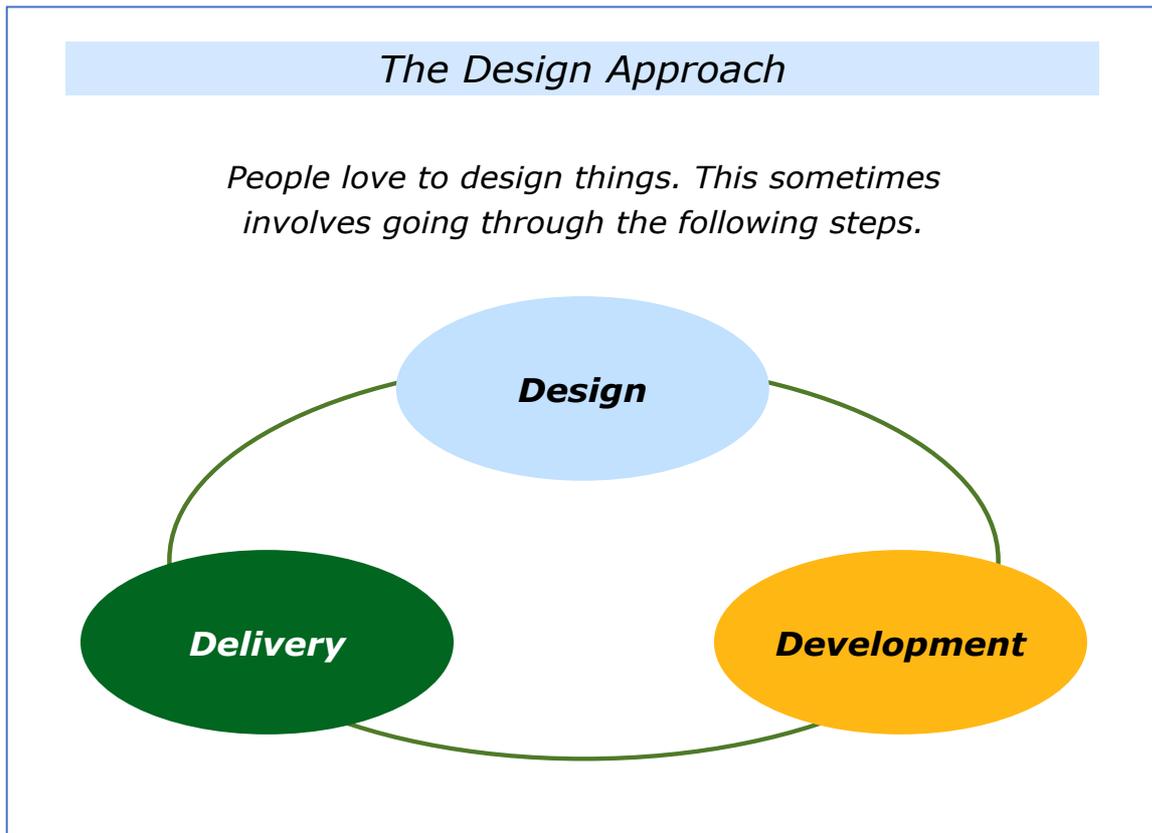

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Design, Development And Delivery Approach

Human beings are natural designers. They love to make things work, find solutions to challenges or create their version of paradise. Some love to design experiences that enrich people's lives or take them into another dimension.

Imagine that you want to design something. One approach involves going through the following steps.

Design

You can decide on something you want to design. You may want to write an article, do a mentoring session, run a workshop, revitalise a room, lead a team, build a culture or do another activity. You can clarify the real results you want to achieve with the piece of work.

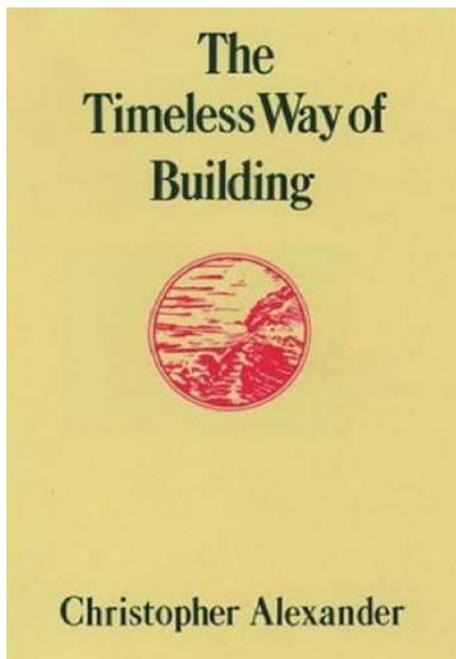

Development

You can develop the strategies you can follow to deliver success. You can do your research and clarify: a) the strategies that are most likely to work; b) the challenges and solutions. You can then rehearse and develop these strategies until you feel ready to do the piece of work.

Delivery

You can go into your version of the arena. You can be fully present, follow your chosen strategies and keep reading reality. You can build on what is working and find solutions to challenges. You can do your best to achieve the desired results and deliver the piece of work.

Christopher Alexander, the architect, said that all human beings have a strong drive to create. Writing in The Timeless Way of Building, he described this in the following way.

Each one of us has, somewhere in their heart, the dream to make a living world, a universe.

If you have a feeling-vision of the things – a painting, a building, a garden, a piece of a neighbourhood – as long as you're very firmly anchored in your knowledge of that thing, and you can see it with your eyes closed, you can keep correcting your actions.

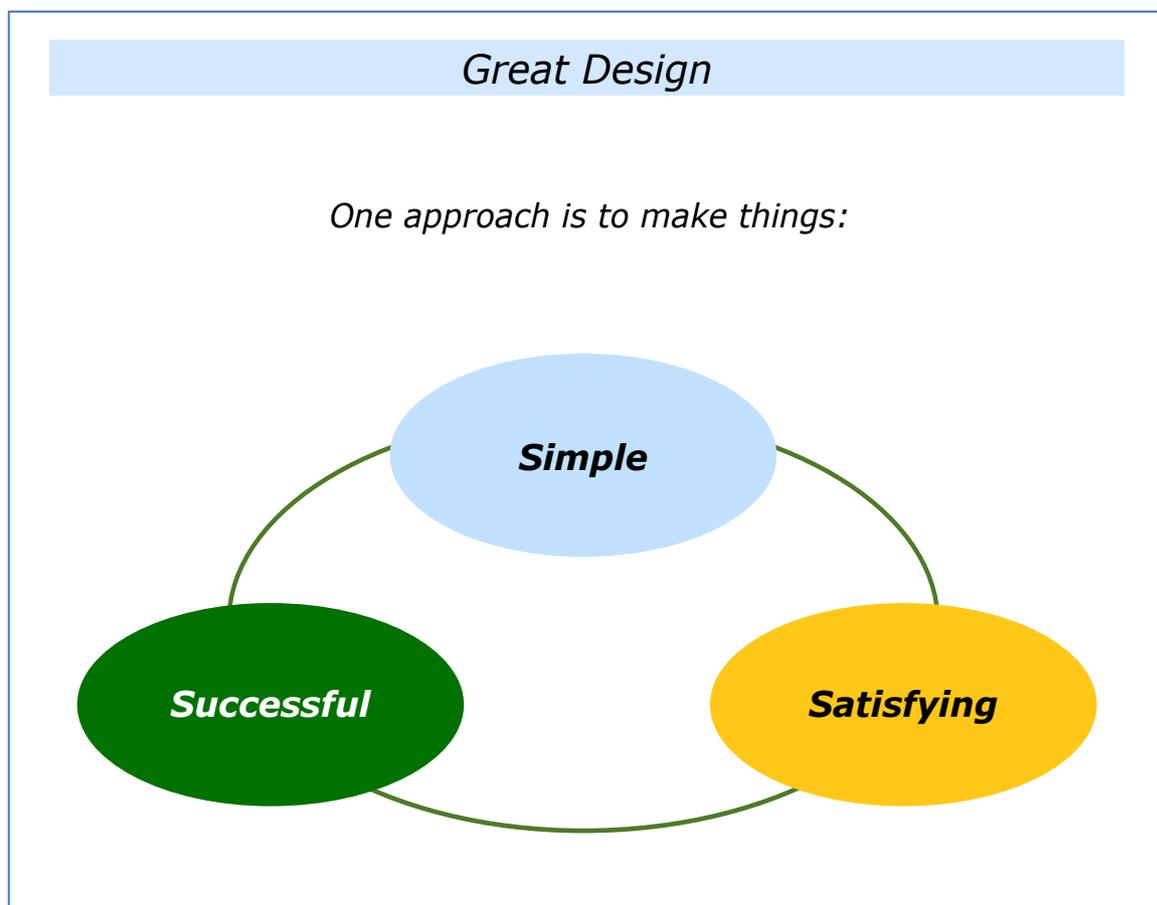

There is one timeless way of building. It is a thousand years old, and the same today as it has ever been.

The great traditional buildings of the past, the villages and tents and temples in which man feels at home, have always been made by people who were very close to the centre of this way.

Architects nurse this desire at the centre of their lives, says Christopher. One day, somewhere, somehow, they want to create a building that is wonderful, a place where people can walk and dream for centuries.

Every person has some version of this dream, says Christopher. Some wish to create a house, a garden or a fountain. Others wish to create a relationship, a painting or a book. The following sections explore some of the different ways to design, develop and deliver great work.

The Simple, Satisfying And Successful Approach

Some designers make things that are simple – in a profound way – satisfying and successful. They make beautiful things that work.

They follow these principles whether they are providing a service, designing a product, building an organisational culture or doing another activity. Let's explore these themes.

Making It Simple

Simplicity is genius, we are told. Art Fry's invention of Post-it Notes demonstrated simplicity in action. So did the Sony Walkman and the Apple Macintosh. Here are some views on simplicity.

Simplicity is the ultimate sophistication. Leonardo da Vinci

*Everything should be as simple as possible – but no simpler.
Albert Einstein*

Perfection is achieved not when there is nothing more to add, but when there is nothing more to take away. Antoine de Saint Exupéry

Making It Satisfying

Superb design is satisfying on a number of levels. Physically it looks and feels good. Practically it works and is user-friendly. There is an old Shaker dictum that says:

*Don't make something unless it is both necessary and useful;
but if it is both necessary and useful,
don't hesitate to make it beautiful.*

Frank Lloyd Wright's famous house Falling Water shows how something can be simple, satisfying and successful.

Making It Successful

Great design works. It is sometimes simple, beautiful and effective. It does the job. Here are some quotes on this theme.

Design is not just what it looks like and feels like. Design is how it works. Steve Jobs.

Good design is probably 98% common sense. Above all, an object must function well and efficiently - and getting that part right requires a good deal of time and attention. Terence Conran.

Pioneers often build prototypes that show a better way. They do not spend their time trying to change the old way of doing things. They may aim to build sustainable systems that deliver ongoing success.

Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at how some educators are helping their students to develop these skills.

The Feel, Imagine, Do And Share Approach

Kiran Bir Sethi has done superb work that helps people and the planet. She founded the Riverside School in Ahmedabad and the global movement called Design For Change.

This encourages thousands of children to implement their ideas for building a better world. Here is an excerpt from its website.

Children and adults can shape their futures by moving from saying "Can I?" to "I Can." They can find something that bothers them, do something about it and make change happen. They can do this by following the design process of Feel, Imagine, Do and Share.

Children are dreaming up and leading brilliant ideas all over the world. They are implementing ideas from challenging age-old superstitions in rural communities, to earning their own money to financing school computers to solving the problem of heavy school bags.

Kiran Bir Sethi and Design For Change

The 'I Can' mindset equips every child to be aware of the world around them. It enables them to take action and empowers them to design a more desirable and sustainable future – today.

This year, Design for Change reached 34 countries and over 300,000 schools. It inspired hundreds of thousands of children, their teachers and parents.

It enabled them to celebrate the fact change is possible and that they can lead that change.

Children focus on challenges on their own doorstep. They may aim to clean local rivers, convert garbage dumps into playgrounds, ensure school friends can get home safely, care for the elderly or do other activities.

Kiran has a background in design. She and her colleagues therefore invite children to tackle challenges by going through the design process of Feel, Imagine, Do and Share.

Feel

Focus on something you feel strongly about. This could be something that bothers you or something you want to improve. Start to explore your desired picture of success.

Imagine

Imagine a way to make it better. Explore what good looks like and search the world for examples of best practice. Focus on what you can control and clarify your picture of success.

Do

Do the necessary work. This can be an eye-opener for some young people, because it calls for sweat and overcoming setbacks on the road to achieving success. One student described this in the following way.

"This part taught us to develop persistence. Our generation is used to having a short attention span and, if we get bored, moving on to the next idea. But we realised that you have to be persistent to make change happen. That taught us a lot."

Share

Share your story with the world. The students make videos of their work and also take part in the annual Design For Change School Challenge. These stories provide inspiration for others who want to achieve their pictures of success.

Kiran explains how this approach is helping young people to develop the skills necessary for shaping the future. She describes this in the following way.

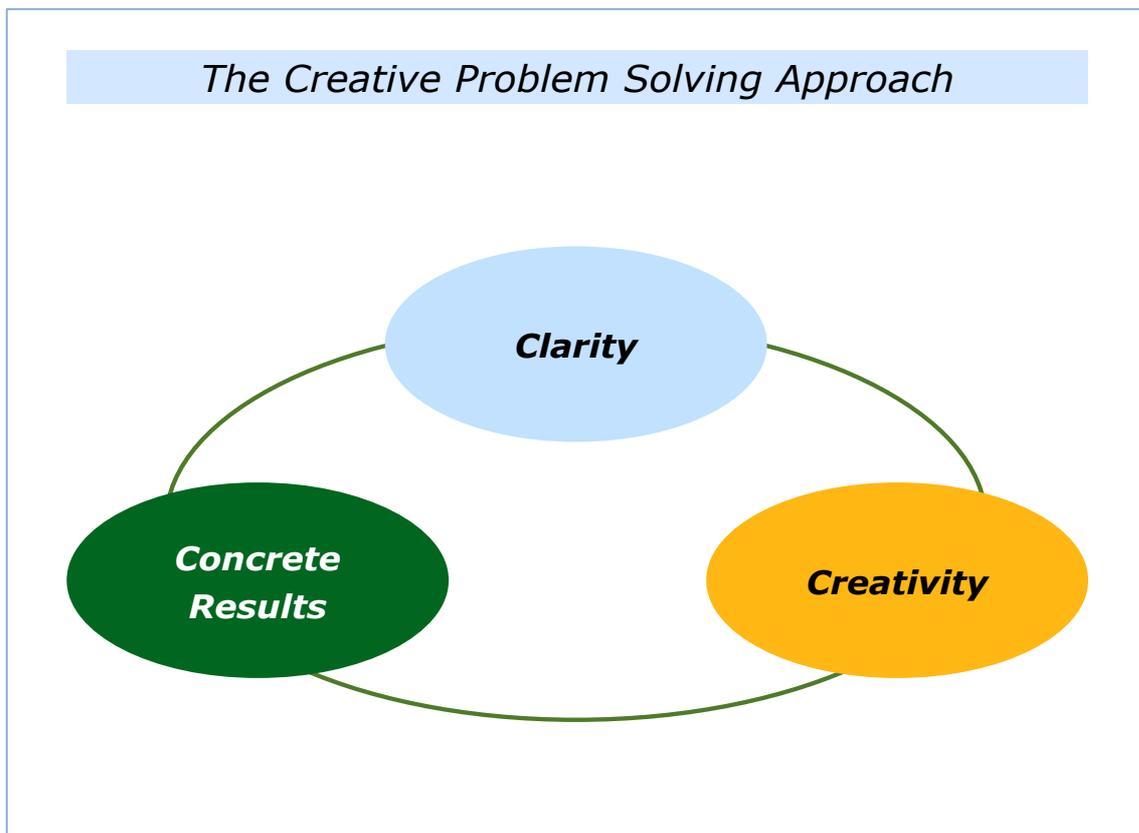

The Feel, Imagine, Do, Share framework helps to develop the much required 21st Century Skills in children. It builds their social and emotional competencies and promotes employability skills.

The power of Design Thinking allows both children and adults to transform the world into how they envision it - the power to create a more compassionate, empathetic world.

The Creative Problem Solving Approach

People love to design, develop and deliver solutions to challenges. There are many models for creative problem solving.

This section provides an introduction to Three C approach. It describes how people can find solutions by focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

This model can be used in many situations. It can be used in mentoring sessions. It can also be used for helping teams, organisations and communities to find solutions.

There are virtually always solutions to challenges. Some solutions may work superbly; some may cost money; some may cost very little. Some may please everybody; some may please fewer people. Some may simply be a case of doing the best you can in the circumstances.

Imagine that you are helping a group that wants to find solutions to a particular challenge. It can be useful to guide people through the following stages.

These are similar to when mentoring an individual. When working with a group, however, you will need more time to give people chance to share their views and then settle on their chosen way forwards.

Clarity

Clarity is crucial. It is vital to clarify the real What – the real results to achieve - before moving on to the How. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to invite people to work through the following questions.

What is the challenge we want to tackle? For example: 'How to ...?' What are the things we can control in the situation? How can we build on what we can control and manage what we can't?

What are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goals? What will be happening that will show us we have achieved the picture of success?

It important to frame the challenge in a positive way. For example, to say:

"How can we improve people's wellbeing?" rather than: "How can we help people to feel less stressed?"

"How can we, as far as possible, get win-wins?" rather than: "How can we stop behaving in ways that mean many people lose?"

"How can we use our strengths and work together towards achieving a common goal?" rather than: "How can we stop having conflicts?"

People may also be more motivated to achieve a goal if they see the benefits. It can therefore be good to describe the benefits for all the potential stakeholders.

People may want to achieve many goals. If so, it can be useful to list these in order of priority. People can then translate these into a clear picture of success. For example:

The Picture Of Success

The challenge we want to tackle is: How to ...

The real results we want to achieve – in order of priority - are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The benefits of achieving the picture of success will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Creativity

Imagine that you have helped a group to establish clarity. You can then invite them to work through the following questions.

What are the possible options for going forwards? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? What is the attractiveness of each option?

Are there any other potential creative solutions? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

It can be useful to invite people to start by brainstorming all the potential options, even those that they may initially dismiss. They can then see that they have many choices in the situation.

Looking at each option in turn, people can list: a) the pluses and minuses of each option; b) the attractiveness of each option on a scale 0/10. People can then produce something like the following chart.

Option A is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Option B is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Option C is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Imagine that people have described what they see as the options going forwards. If appropriate, invite people to take a short break and return refreshed.

You can then take more of a steer and, if okay with the group, also offer some other options for achieving the aims. One approach is to reset the session by saying something along the following line.

As far as I understand, the goals we want to achieve are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Bearing these in mind, let's consider all the possible ways forward. We will then settle on our strategy for achieving the picture of success.

Looking ahead, are there any other potential options? Is it possible, for example, to combine the best parts of the most attractive options? If so, what might be a potential way forwards?

Let's learn from your positive history. Looking back, when have you tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed? How could you follow these principles – plus add other skills – to tackle this challenge successfully?

Let's learn from other people's positive history. Looking back, have another other people or groups tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? How can we follow these principles in our own way to tackle the challenge successfully?

If appropriate, let's consider how to find solutions to any potential conflicts. What does each person or each party want? How can we build on what people have in common? How can we, as far as possible, find win-win solutions?

Let's try to look at the situation in a dispassionate way. Imagine that we were outside consultants who had been invited to provide impartial advice.

Looking at the situation from above, what would we advise this group to do? Which option – or combination of options - would we advise people to pursue?

Is it okay for me to share some more ideas? Looking at the results you want to achieve, here are some options it may be worth considering.

Option D could be to...

Option E could be to...

Looking at all the options, which are the ones that make sense? Which of these would we like to explore further?

Looking at this chosen option, how these might this look in practice. What would be the pluses and minuses of pursuing this option? How could we build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

Let's return to the real results we want to achieve? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

Concrete Results

Imagine you have helped the group to work through the previous stages. It is then time to settle on the way forwards. If appropriate, you can guide them through exploring the following themes.

Let's return to the picture of success. What is the option – or the combination of options - we want to pursue? How can we translate this into a clear action plan?

What are the clear working contracts that we need to make about who does what and when? Who would like to be the Mission Holder who takes responsibility for guiding the plan?

Who else would like to contribute towards achieving the goals? What would you each like to do and by when? What are the other practical tasks that need to be done? How can we make sure these get completed?

How will each of us proactively keep people informed about our progress towards achieving the goals? What support do people need? How can we encourage ourselves on the journey? What can we do to get some quick successes?

Let's do a success rating. Bearing in mind what we can control, how would we each rate the chances of us reaching the goals. Do this on a scale 0-10. What can we do to increase the chances of success?

People are ingenious and are capable of finding solutions to challenges. When working with groups of people, however, there are several key issues to focus on. These are:

To create a positive atmosphere in which people feel at ease and take time to clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

To use the Three C Model for helping people to clarify their options and their chosen strategy for achieving the picture of success;

To encourage people to commit themselves to their chosen strategy, make clear contracts and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Good decision makers recognise there are pluses and minuses to each option. Whatever their chosen way forwards, they build on the pluses, minimise the minuses and do their best to achieve success.

Let's return to your life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of something you would like to design? If so, it can be useful to work through the following themes.

Design

What would you like to design? What are the real results you want to achieve by doing this project? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goals – both for yourself and other people?

Development

How can you gather information about this potential project? How can you study what has worked in this past? How can you explore what could work in the future? How can you develop the prototype? How can you test it to see if it will deliver the required results?

Delivery

How can you set things up to succeed when delivering the design? How can you do superb work? How can you keep doing reality checks about: a) what is working) what can be improved? How can you do your best to deliver success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Design, Development And Delivery Approach

The specific thing I would like to design in the future is:

*

The specific things I can do then to go through the steps of design, development and delivery are:

*

The specific benefits – for myself and other people – of taking these steps may be:

*

The Building Something Beautiful Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to build on your strengths and do what you believe in. It is then to do the basics, add the brilliance and make something beautiful.

Imagine you want to follow this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following steps.

Building On Strengths

Great workers build on their strengths. They aim to do what they do best and do their best. Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. If appropriate, you can take the following steps.

You Can Clarify Your Strengths

One approach is to start by clarifying one or more of the strengths that you want to build on. If appropriate, clarify the specific activities where:

You have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs ... You are in your element – at ease and yet able to excel ... You are doing something you feel passionately about where you can deliver peak performances.

Try to be as specific as possible when clarifying your strengths. Much will depend, of course, on the activity in which you do good work. Let's look at one example.

Imagine you are good at mentoring. You can aim: a) to define the specific kinds of people with whom you work best; b) the specific things you can do to help these people; c) the specific examples of when you have helped people to achieve their goals.

The same criteria applies to any field where you do good work. Try to clarify the specific things you do to deliver success in that activity. It can then be time to focus on the following theme.

You Can Translate Your Strength Into Doing A Specific Piece Of Work

Imagine that you have clarified a strength you want to build on. If appropriate, you can translate this into doing a specific piece of work. You may aim, for example:

*To encourage a person ... To run a workshop ... To do a creative project ...
To provide great service to a client ... To build your own business ... To lead a team ... To shift a culture ... To do another activity.*

Let's assume that you have clarified a piece of work you want to do. What may be your reasons for doing this work? What will be the benefits for yourself or other people? You may wish to clarify these by doing the following exercise.

Building On Strengths

The specific activity where I may have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs is:

*

The specific piece of work I would like to do by building on this strength is:

*

The specific benefits of doing this piece of work may be:

*

Let's assume you have done this exercise. If appropriate, you may wish to explore the following theme before moving into action.

Belief

Great workers do what they believe in. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they aim: to a) to set goals they believe they can achieve; b) to follow principles they believe in. Let's explore these themes.

You can set goals that you believe are possible to achieve

This involves taking a certain approach to setting goals. Bearing in mind your own abilities – and what you can control – you can set goals that you believe are possible to achieve.

Here is an exercise on this theme. This invites you to clarify the specific things that you believe: a) you can achieve; b) you maybe can achieve; c) you probably can't achieve. This involves doing a reality check rather than being defeatist. Try working through the following themes.

Clarifying The Specific Goals

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

Can Achieve - The specific things I can achieve are:

*

*

*

Maybe Can Achieve - The specific things I maybe can achieve are:

*

*

Can't Achieve - The specific things I probably can't achieve are:

*

Bearing in mind what you believe you can achieve, it can be useful to focus on the following theme.

You can clarify the principles you believe in following when working towards achieving the specific goals

Great workers believe in following certain principles when working to achieve their goals. Some aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve the picture of success. Some people follow other principles. They may base these on either:

The philosophy they believe in about how to help people, do the work or achieve the specific goal;

The principles they have followed in the past to achieve success when working to achieve a similar goal;

The professional standards they believe in following when doing their best to achieve a specific goal.

The principles they follow will obviously depend on the kind of work they are doing. They may be working as an educator, nurse, carpenter, scientist, leader or in another role.

Let's return to the piece of work you want to do. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, try answering the following questions.

What are the real results you want to achieve? What will be happening that will show you have achieved these results? What will be the picture of success?

What are the principles you want to follow when doing the piece of work? How can you translate these into action? How can you do your best to deliver the desired results?

Bearing in mind what you can control, what is the probability of success? On a scale 0-10, how would you rate the chances of achieving the results? What can you do to maintain or improve the rating?

Let's try pulling all these things together. If you wish, try tackling the following exercise.

*Building On My Strengths
And Doing What I Believe In*

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The Picture Of Success

The specific results I want to achieve when doing the piece of work are:

*

*

*

The Principles

The specific principles I want to follow when doing this piece of work are:

*

*

*

The Success Rating

Bearing in mind the things I can control, the rating I would give regarding the chances of being able to deliver the desired results is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you are ready to move into action. This can involve focusing on the following theme.

Basics

Great workers keep doing the basics that are required to provide the platform for doing brilliant work. They often take the following steps.

They keep following their principles – such as following strategies work - on the way towards achieving the picture of success;

They keep delivering high professional standards when working towards the picture of success;

They keep embodying the concept of continuous improvement when working towards the picture of success.

Different people will perform different basics to reach their goals. The way they translate these into action depend on whether they work in sports, business, hospitality, medical care, therapy, technology or whatever.

A counsellor will help a person to feel at ease, explore what they want to achieve and then enable them to shape their future. An athlete will prepare properly - both physically and psychologically – and then do their best to achieve peak performance.

Let's return to your chosen work. What are the basics you need to do to create the platform for achieving success? How can you continue to maintain high professional standards? How can you translate these into action?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the piece of work you want to do, this invites you to complete the following sentence.

Basics

The basics that I need to keep doing in order to deliver high professional standards on the way towards achieving the picture of success are:

*

*

*

Brilliance

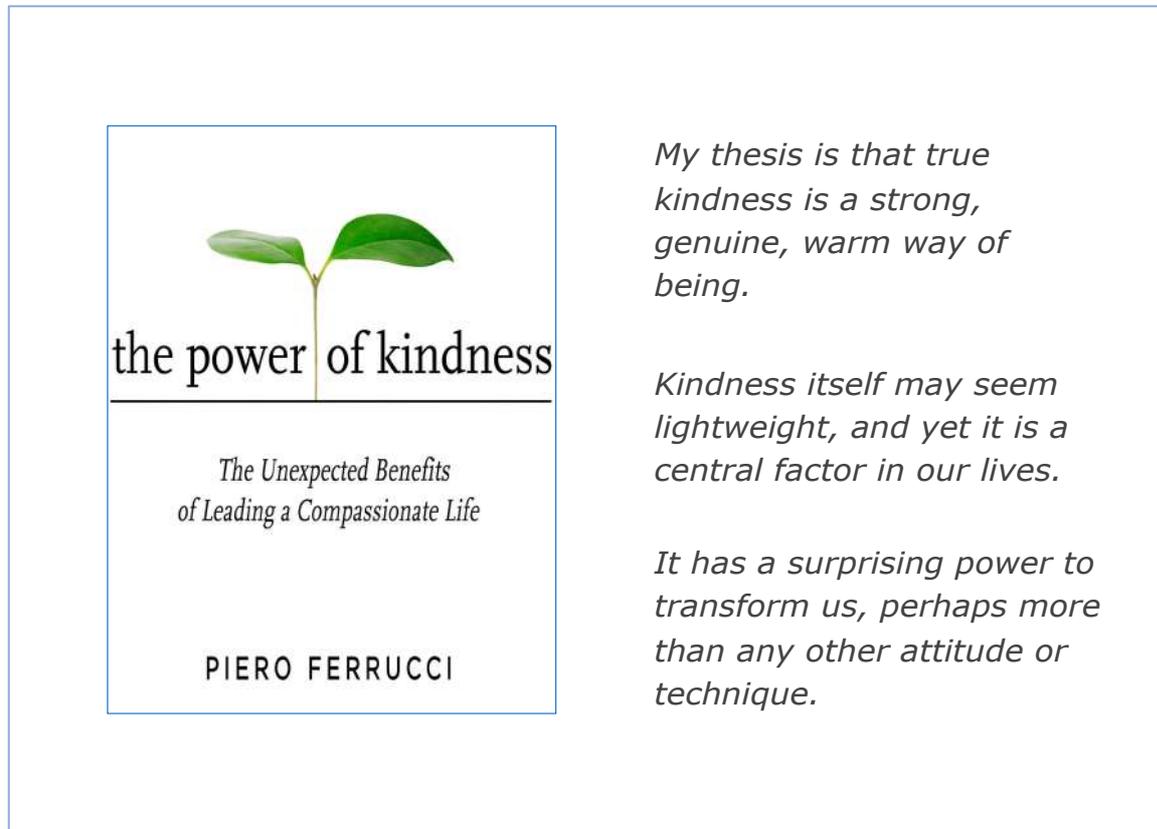

Great workers sometimes add the brilliance. A footballer may use their skills to make a defence-splitting pass or score a remarkable goal. A surgeon may use their gifts to perform a life-saving operation in difficult circumstances.

Different people add the brilliance in their own ways. One approach is for them to keep delivering high standards. It is then to use their strengths to do something special to achieve the picture of success.

As simple as it sounds, one way to add the brilliance can be by being kind. This can help to create positive memories for life. Let's explore this approach that builds on work of Piero Ferrucci.

He is a psychotherapist who has spent much of his career helping people to live fulfilling lives. He has also written many books, including The Power of Kindness and Beauty and the Soul.

Piero believes in the benefits of kindness, both for the giver and the receiver. Paul also says that, despite many headlines about cruelty, millions of acts of kindness happen every day. He explains this in the following way.

However special it may sound it (kindness) is by no means exceptional. On the contrary, it comprises a great deal of human interactions.

The fabric of our lives is made of care, solidarity, mutual service. These qualities are so embedded in our daily events that we may not even notice them.

Piero believes that kindness can help future generations. He encourages us to care for the planet in the following way.

Kindness is urgent in our relationship with our living environment. If we do not respect and love nature, do not treat her with loving kindness and the awe she deserves, we will end up intoxicated by our own poisons.

It is up to us. It is a choice in the life of each of us – to take the way of selfishness and abuse, or the way of solidarity and kindness. In this exciting but dangerous moment of human history, kindness is not a luxury, it is a necessity.

Being kind is taking a stand. By itself it may not help: Maybe our kindness will be ineffective. Never mind. We have affirmed a principle, a way of being.

Piero believes that many people feel better when they are kind. He explains this in the following way.

If we are healthier when we are caring, empathic, and open to others, it means we were born to be kind. If we push our way forward, cultivate hostile thoughts, or bear life-long grudges, we will not be at our best.

And if we ignore or repress our positive qualities, we may harm ourselves or others. As psychiatrist Alberto Alberti maintains, love that is not expressed becomes hate, joy that is not enjoyed become depression. Yes, we are designed to be kind.

My thesis is that true kindness is a strong, genuine, warm way of being. Kindness itself may seem lightweight, and yet it is a central factor in our lives. It has a surprising power to transform us, perhaps more than any other attitude or technique.

Let's return to your own work. You will, of course, use your strengths to add the brilliance in your own way. This can also help to create a positive memory for life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the piece of work you are doing, this invites you to complete the following sentence.

Brilliance

The specific things I can do to, when appropriate, add the brilliance are:

*

*

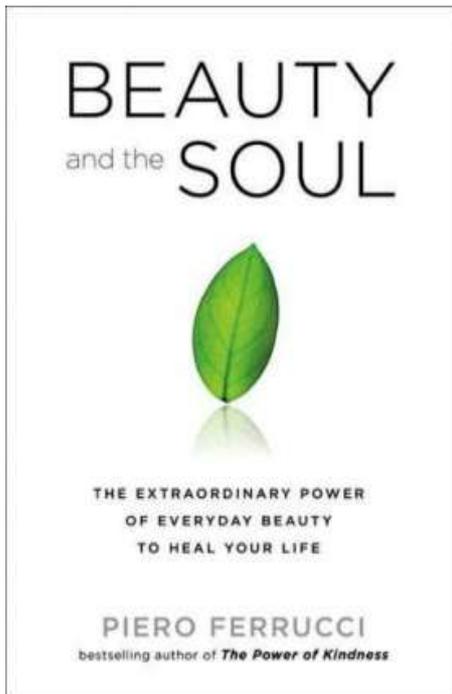

*

Beauty

Great workers may go beyond doing brilliant work. They may also aim to make it beautiful. There are many definitions of beauty. Some people follow the principles of great design.

They create something that is simple, satisfying and successful. It is simple but in a profound way. It is satisfying both an aesthetic and practical level. It is successful. It works and helps people to get positive results.

Let's return to the work of Piero Ferrucci, who believes in the power of beauty. He says that all of us, in one way or another, seek beauty. We know it brings happiness and wellbeing.

Beauty brings us back to the here and now. In the presence of beauty it is harder to be distracted.

To follow the way of beauty means to live in a state of mindfulness that does not admit distraction or escape.

We are here with our whole being. This is our kairos, as it was called in ancient Greece: The moment of opportunity, the timeless instant when revelation comes.

Beauty is in the eye of the beholder. A person may experience beauty in nature, art, music, theatre, sport, mathematics or another activity. Piero describes this in the following way.

Some manage to see the inner beauty of people: generosity, intelligence, honesty. It is a beauty less evident, but deeper and more lasting.

Beauty can help us to heal, feel alive and open our eyes, says Piero. It can help us to reconnect with our feelings, connect with other people and discover new dimensions.

Beauty is more than an extra, it is a basic. It is also the perfect medicine, says Piero. Its side effects are positive rather than negative. This is certainly true when it comes to people. He explains this in the following way.

Moral beauty is alive and well. In fact both kinds of beauty exist - outer and inner. The former is more obvious, more likely to attract attention, more immediate, gratifying and short-term.

The latter is subtler, deeper, usually needs more time to be perceived. And often it is not fully disclosed to the distracted eye. Physical beauty is a sprinter – it covers short distances faster. Beauty of the soul is a marathoner – it shows up over long distance.

Piero describes many studies that show the tangible benefits of beauty in schools, hospitals, workplaces and society. Beauty nourishes the soul, says Piero, but it goes further. Beauty may also be necessary for our survival as a species. It enables us to experience a sense of wonder and, when we wish, also create beautiful things.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to build on your strengths and do what you believe in. It is then to do the basics, add the brilliance and, when appropriate, make things beautiful.

Let's return to the piece of work you want to do. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you may aim to make the work beautiful.

Beauty

The specific things I can do to, when appropriate, make the piece of work beautiful are:

*

*

*

The Courageous Approach

There are many views about courage. This piece looks at three approaches that people may follow when tackling challenges.

Core Principles Courage

This approach involves a person having the courage to follow their core principles. They also prepared to accept the consequences of following these principles in certain situations.

They may be following their moral compass, serving a cause or pursuing a mission. They aim to live in good faith and be true to themselves in difficult situations.

Such people go to their core when facing a specific challenge. They may then ask themselves the following questions

"What are the principles I want to follow in this situation? How can I translate these into practice? What may be the pluses and minuses of taking these steps? Am I prepared to accept the consequences?"

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you followed elements of the core principles approach? This could have been in your personal or professional life. What was the actual situation?

What did you do then to follow your core principles and be prepared to accept the consequences? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Calculated Courage

This approach is also sometimes called cold courage. It involves making a calculated decision that acting in a way that appears to be courageous is the best way forwards in a certain situation.

People who take this approach sometimes take the following steps when faced by a particular challenge.

They drain themselves of emotion, become quite cerebral and look at the situation in a logical way;

They clarify: a) the real results to achieve; b) the possible ways forward together with the consequences of each option; c) the other potential creative solutions;

They choose to follow the option that has the greatest chance of success and make their action plan for achieving the desired results.

They then become almost computer like when pursuing their chosen option. Moving into action, they follow their plan and keep reading reality. They build on what is working and find solutions to challenges.

Such people almost go into a trance. They may seem to hover above the situation, see themselves from above and keep pursuing the route most likely to achieve success.

Emerging from the situation, they report that what they did was the most logical thing to do. They may then allow themselves to catch up on the emotions that they ignored when exhibiting such cold courage.

Crisis Driven Courage

This is sometimes called hot courage. It involves spur of the moment acts of bravery to deal with a crisis. The adrenaline kicks in and the person throws themselves into action.

This may happen in certain critical situations. A person may confront an armed attacker, pull somebody from a burning car or put their own life on the line to save somebody.

This does not involve the absence of fear. The person may accept the feeling of fear but choose to act because doing so is better than failing to act. They sometimes go through the following steps:

They recognise what is happening and what may need to be done to affect the outcome;

They ask the question: 'If not me, then who will do what is required in the situation?' and, as result, they choose to act;

They then pursue their chosen strategy and do their best to achieve the desired outcome in the situation.

Such people may operate from the gut. When later told that they acted with bravery, they may say something like the following: "It was the obvious thing to do."

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation when you may want to follow one of these approaches to courage? How can you then follow it in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Courageous Approach

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of the courageous approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

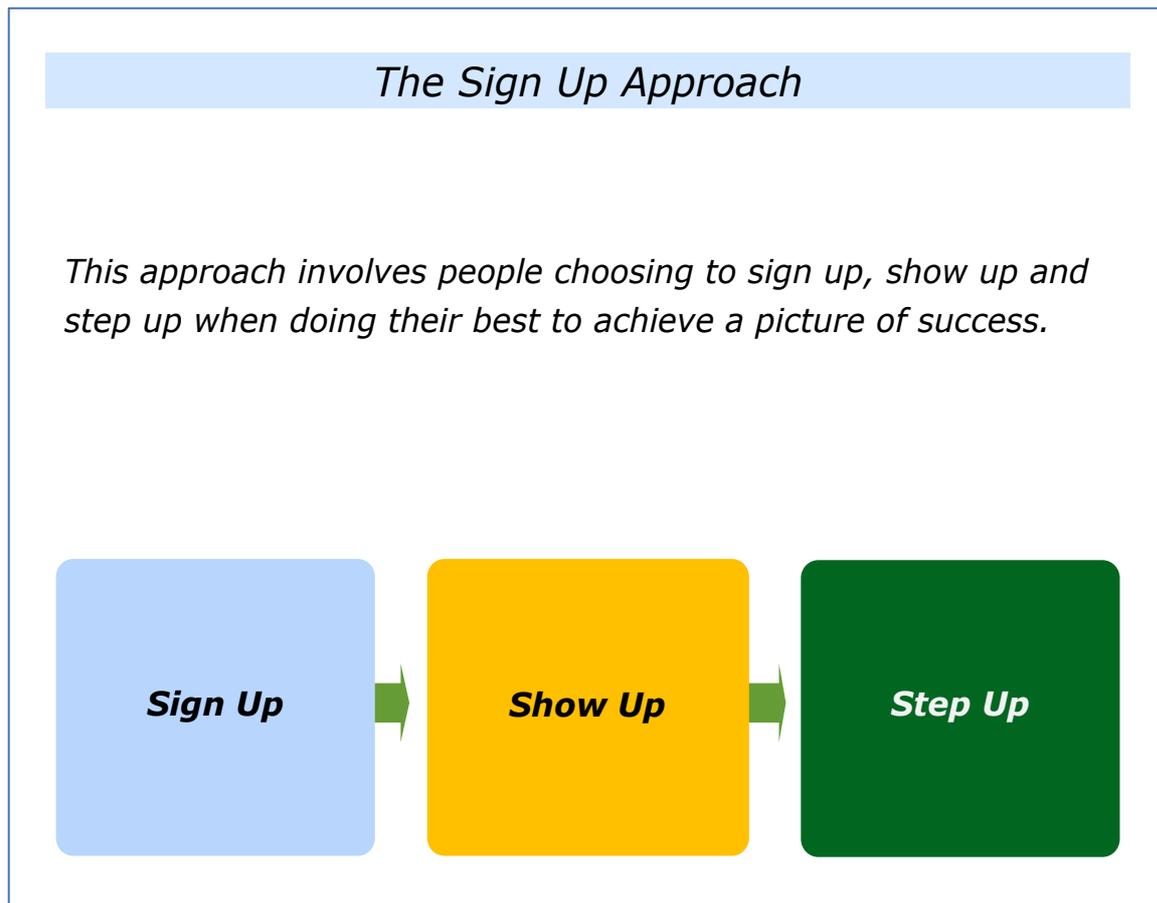

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Sign Up, Show Up And Step Up Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach involves people choosing to sign up, show up and step up when working to achieve a picture of success. Let's explore these themes.

Sign Up

This step involves a person making a conscious decision to opt into doing a piece of work. They may do this after clarifying the pluses and minuses involved in tackling a challenge or aiming to achieve a specific goal.

The sign up approach is also used in teams. It involves giving people the big picture and context. This includes communicating the following things to people:

The team's purpose, the principles to follow – together with the reasons for these - and the picture of success;

The potential pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the picture of success;

The team's responsibilities and the individual's responsibilities in working to achieve the picture of success.

People are then given the opportunity to reflect and decide if they want to sign up. If so, they are then make clear contracts about the best contributions towards achieving the goals.

Imagine that you may want to follow elements of this approach. This involves you choosing:

To clarify the specific goal you or the team you are joining wants to achieve – together with the benefits of achieving the goal;

To clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goals – together with how you can build on the pluses and minimise the minuses;

To clarify whether you want to sign up to doing what is required to do your best to achieve the goal.

Let's assume that you have chosen to opt into making this commitment. You may then focus on the next theme.

Show Up

This step involves a person preparing properly, being fully present and aiming to do their best when performing a piece of work. Let's explore these themes.

Preparing Properly

Great workers try to make things as predictable as possible. This gives them more space to deal with any unexpected events that may happen along the way.

They start by setting things up to succeed. Bearing in mind what they can control, they rate the chances of being able to achieve the desired goals. They do this on a scale 0-10.

They then focus on what they can do to maintain or improve the rating. They make sure there is at least a 7+/10 chance of achieving the desired goal.

Such workers then rehearse how they can do their best when performing the work. This involves them taking the following steps:

They rehearse pursuing the strategies they can follow that will give themselves the greatest chance of success;

They rehearse managing the potential challenges they may face on the way towards achieving success;

They again rehearse pursuing the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

Such workers also try to make sure they have the various kinds of support that will help them to achieve the goals. They then focus on the next stage.

Being Fully Present

Great workers often have a ritual for clicking into action. Some have a mantra they say before entering their version of the arena. They then aim to be positively engaged rather than partly engaged or pretend engaged.

They focus on the first task in hand. They keep using their antennae to be alive, alert and give their full attention to the work they are doing. This involves the next stage.

Doing Their Best When Performing The Piece Of Work

Great workers give 100 percent and do their professional best. They show respect for the task in hand whether they are performing at their equivalent of the Village Hall or the Carnegie Hall.

Such workers apply their strengths and aim to make their best contribution towards achieving the goal. When appropriate, they also encourage other people and the team to achieve success. Sometimes this involves focusing on the following theme.

Step Up

Great workers follow the ethic of continuous improvement. They keep reading reality when performing the work. They aim to keep building on what is working and tackle areas for improvement.

Such workers sometimes face unexpected challenges or need to do something special. They then aim to step up, rise to the occasion and add that touch of class that delivers the desired results.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to sign up, show up and step up. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Sign Up, Show Up And Step Up Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

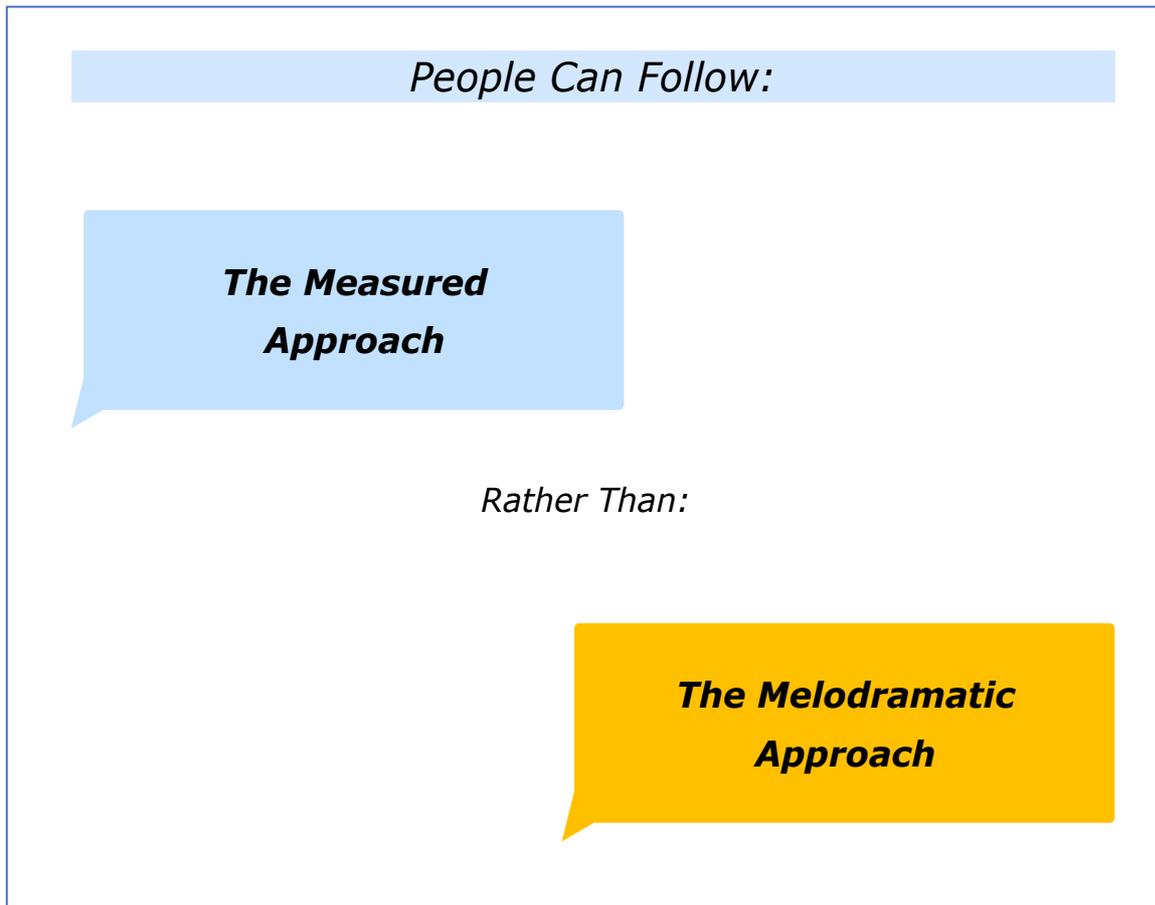

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Measured Approach Rather Than The Melodramatic Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the measured approach. They aim to behave in a mature way. Sometimes this can involve being considered, caring and creative. This can have positive consequences for other people and the planet.

Some people follow the melodramatic approach. They can be moody and make their feelings the centre of the world. Some may do things that are uncaring and unconsidered - except for their own immediate gain. This can have negative consequences for other people and the planet.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action and the effects they may have on other people.

The Measured Approach

There are many definitions and synonyms for being measured. These include the following.

The Measured Approach

Some people aim to follow the measured approach. Here are some definitions and synonyms for being measured.

- To be controlled, consistent and caring ... To act in a mature, responsible and adult way ... To be able to see things in perspective and focus on what is important.
- To make considered decisions ... To clarify the real results to achieve ... To see the possible options and the consequences of each option ... To follow the option most likely to achieve success.
- To recognise the consequences of their behaviour and adapt these to achieve the desired results ... To respond to challenges in a positive way ... To develop as a person and as a professional.

People who follow the measured approach often have a clear philosophy. They feel passionately about things and believe in following certain principles. They have a sense of perspective, however, and this influences their behaviour.

They see themselves as small in the great sweep of history. They don't see themselves as important, but they believe their actions have consequences. They therefore aim to do things that help people or the planet.

Such people make considered decisions. They start by focusing on clarity – the real results to achieve. They consider the choices, consequences and any creative solutions. They then pursue the route that is most likely to achieve the desired concrete results.

They often make evidence based rather than just emotional decisions. They do take emotions into account, however, when making certain kinds of decisions.

People who follow the measured approach actually find this can become more magical as they get older. They continue to develop and add to their knowledge as people and professionals.

They may also become more mellow as they get older. This does not diminish their passion, however, and they continue to try to do their best during their time on the planet.

The Melodramatic Approach

There are many definitions and synonyms for being melodramatic. These include the following.

The Melodramatic Approach

Some people may follow the melodramatic approach. Here are some definitions and synonyms for being melodramatic.

- To be driven by their own emotions ... To express these in over-dramatic ways ... To sometimes make themselves the centre of attention rather than seeing things in perspective.
- To sometimes behave in unconsidered ways ... To choose to be unaware of the effect their behaviour has on other people ... To be chaotic and create collateral damage.
- To, in some cases, demonstrate the Dunning-Kruger effect - when a person's lack of knowledge and skill in a certain area causes them to overestimate their own importance and competence.

People who follow this approach sometimes focus only on their own feelings and agenda. They may convince themselves that they are right – whilst others are wrong - and behave in ways that can create collateral damage.

Such people may live in their own world and lack empathy. They may refuse to take responsibility and look for ways to justify their own behaviour. They may then behave in even more extreme ways that can cause pain.

People continue to make decisions every day. They may do this as individuals, leaders or politicians. They can then choose to follow the measured approach or the melodramatic approach. The route they follow has consequences for other people and the planet.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the measured approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you follow this approach in your own way? How can you maintain a sense of perspective? How can you make decisions and act in a measured way that, as far as possible, have positive consequences?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Measured Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

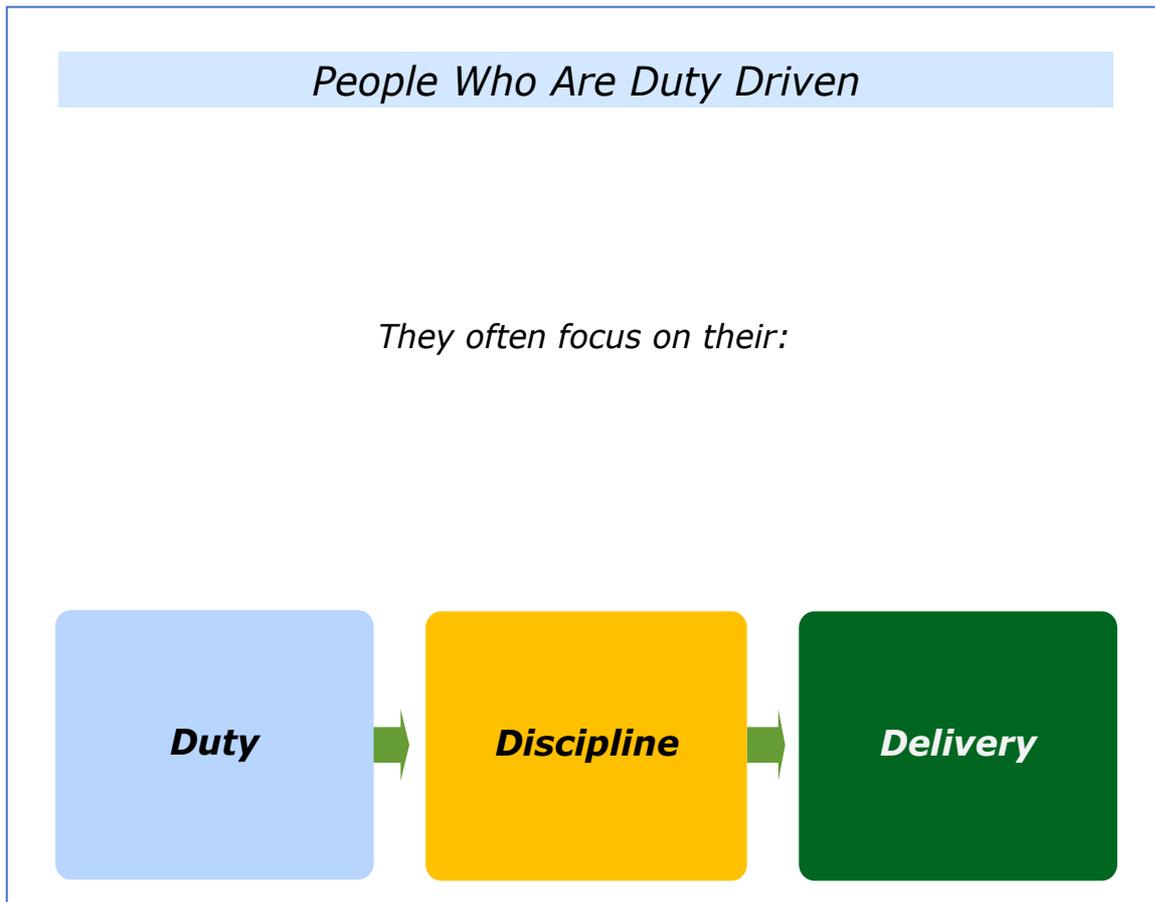

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Duty Driven Approach

Different people are driven by different senses of duty. They may feel a duty to care for their family, follow a moral code, pursue a philosophy, follow their vocation or another theme. This commitment often drives their daily actions.

People who take this approach often follow certain disciplines. They love to make lists and cross off completed items on the way towards achieving their aims. They get a kick from delivering the goods.

Such people may experience both pluses and minuses in their approach. The pluses can include pursuing a clear goal, having a sense of meaning and doing satisfying work. The minuses can include appearing robotic, failing to see the big picture or serving a false ideal.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific situation in the past when you felt a sense of duty towards something.

Describe the specific things you did to translate this sense of duty into action.

Describe the specific pluses and minuses – both for you and for other people – that were involved in pursuing this sense of duty.

Duty Driven In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I felt a sense of duty towards something was:

*

The specific things I did then to translate this sense of duty into action were:

*

The specific pluses and minuses – for me and others – that were involved in pursuing this sense of duty were:

*

Duty

Looking at your life at the moment, are there any things to which you feel a sense of duty? Different people express this in different ways.

Some people feel a duty to their talent. They show great discipline as a musician, chef, athlete, mathematician or in another role. They do the right things in the right way to make full use of their gifts.

Some people feel a duty to a mission. They dedicate themselves to raising money for a charity, climbing a mountain, inventing a pioneering product or another activity. They feel fully alive when pursuing this purpose.

Some people feel a duty to a moral code. They may follow their inner compass, pursue a spiritual path or live their values. They aim to translate their beliefs into action in their daily lives.

Miep Gies described how she took this approach in her book Anne Frank Remembered: The Story of the Woman Who Helped to Hide the Frank Family. She described this in the following way.

Helping people who are in danger is not a matter of courage but from making a decision that every human being has to make when he or she distinguishes between good and bad.

Miep was one of a group that helped the Frank family, who hid in an annexe next to the office where she worked as Otto Frank's secretary. After the family were betrayed she retrieved and safeguarded Anne's diary.

Looking at your own life, are there any things to which you feel a sense of duty? You may feel this towards your loved ones, your vocation, a compelling mission or something greater than yourself.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Describe the specific thing to which you feel a sense of duty.

Describe the specific reasons why you feel a sense of duty to this thing.

Duty

*The specific thing to which
I feel of sense of duty is:*

*

The specific reasons why I feel a sense of duty to this thing are:

*

*

*

Discipline

People who are duty driven love to follow daily disciplines. Such people need to believe, however, that pursuing this pattern will enable them to fulfil their duty.

Sometimes the discipline may come from the outside. A person may pursue their sense of duty by choosing to join a group such as a spiritual community, profession, police, military or other organisation.

Such an institution often lays out a code of behaviour that people need to follow. People then follow this creed because they see how it will help to fulfil the mission.

Sometimes the discipline comes from within. Creative artists, for example, often follow certain individual rituals that enable them to work each day.

Such people often demonstrate Obsessive Compulsive Discipline rather than Disorder. They follow their regular pattern without thinking. This enables them to continue to be creative.

Imagine that you have a strong sense of duty. You may wish to encourage other people, follow a spiritual faith, make good use of your talent, deliver a mission or pursue another activity. If you wish, try answering the following questions.

What are the disciplines I can follow to deliver the goods? What can I actually do – in behaviour terms – to translate these disciplines into action? What will be the pluses and minuses involved when following the disciplines? How can I build on the pluses and manage the minuses?

How can I get a good start to the day by following some of these disciplines? How can I keep doing the right things in the right way? How can I develop a daily rhythm to keep doing these things? How can I encourage myself on the journey?

As mentioned earlier, one approach is to develop a rhythm that you follow each day. Sometimes this calls for getting enough rest, rehearsing what you are going to do and then clicking into action.

After a while you may follow the rhythm without thinking. It is something you simply do each day as you work towards achieving the goals.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific thing to which you feel a sense of duty.

Describe the specific things you can do to translate this sense of duty into following certain disciplines.

Discipline

*The specific thing to which
I feel of sense of duty is:*

*

The specific things I can do to translate this sense of duty into following certain disciplines are:

*

*

*

Delivery

People who are duty driven do their best to deliver the goods. There are many models for taking this route. The following section describes one approach I used in my work but the principles can be applied in many other situations.

During the period between the mid-1970s and 2020 I ran hundreds of workshops. It was often vital to make clear contracts with people about what they wanted to achieve from the sessions.

This involved talking with the leader and other key stakeholders to agree on the following things.

The specific outcomes they wanted to achieve from the session;

The specific themes to be covered and, as a result, the actual things they wanted people to be doing after the session;

The actual words they would like to hear people saying at the end of the session.

We also made clear contracts about: a) my role in the session; b) their role in the session; c) any specific dos and don'ts to bear in mind when running the session.

Before the actual workshop we also sometimes took the following step. The leader sent an email to people explaining the aims of the session. They wrote something along the following lines.

The Workshop

I look forward to meeting you at our workshop next week. It will be facilitated by ... The aim is to make the session enjoyable and effective.

Here are some of the things that we would like you to saying at the end of the workshop.

"We are crystal clear on the next steps we can take to focus on our organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success."

"We have had the opportunity to add our ideas and have also got some practical tools that we can use to achieve the picture of success."

"We each know our parts in taking the next steps, have got the support we need and feel motivated to do our best to achieve the picture of success."

Let me know if there any other topics you would like us to cover or any other things you would like to be saying at the end of the workshop. I look forward to seeing you on the day.

Sometimes the participants got back with further topics they would like to see covered. When appropriate, these were added to the final agenda.

Clear contracting was also vital when starting the actual workshop. The leader would begin by giving a short introduction and then handover to me. I would say something along the following lines.

Welcome to the workshop.

I will try to make it both enjoyable and effective. Let's begin by making clear contracts about what we aim to achieve today.

As far as I understand it, the topics we want to cover are these:

To ...

To ...

To ...

"The aims are that at the end of the session you are saying some of the following things:

"...

"...

"...

My role is to create an encouraging environment. It is also to provide practical tools you can use to achieve your aims as an organisation.

Your role is to encourage each other. It is also to take the ideas you like and apply these in your own ways to achieve the organisation's aims.

Bearing these things in mind, are there any other topics you would like to add to the agenda? If so, we can try to cover these things.

We can then move onto focusing on the first topic we want to cover.

During the day I would do my best to deliver the desired results. This often involved focusing on a particular theme and aiming:

To be crystal clear on the specific results that people wanted to achieve by focusing on this theme;

To provide positive models and practical tools that people could use to achieve these results;

To also invite people to do exercises where they clarified the practical things they wanted to do to achieve the desired results.

During the day I kept in touch with the key stakeholders to make sure we were on course. This sometimes resulted in adapting things to make sure we achieved the goals.

The day was often about encouraging people to refocus on the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. It was also about helping them making their best contributions towards delivering the aims.

Bearing this in mind, towards the end of day we invited each person to do the following exercise. They then presented this to the rest of the group.

My Contribution Towards Achieving The Picture Of Success

The specific outcomes I am going to aim to deliver in the next ... towards achieving the organisation's picture of success are:

*

*

*

The leader would also explain they would have a follow-up session with each person. They would then agree on: a) the specific outcomes the person would aim to deliver; b) the specific support they needed to deliver these outcomes.

The leader would also describe how to get some quick wins. These were tangible things that would create momentum and help the team towards achieving the picture of success.

Finally, the leader would thank everybody for their contributions. This would include describing some of their own take-aways from the session. They would then formally end the workshop.

Looking back at running the workshops, I became more duty driven as I got older. Whilst wanting to pass on lots of ideas to people, it was vital to make sure these helped people to achieve their goals. That was my duty.

You will, of course, have your own approach to delivering the goods. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific thing to which you feel a sense of duty.

Describe the specific things you want to deliver when following this sense of duty.

Describe the specific ways you can do your best to deliver these things to which you have a sense of duty.

Delivery

*The specific thing to which
I feel of sense of duty is:*

*

The specific things I want to deliver when following this sense of duty are:

*

The specific ways I can do my best to deliver these things to which I have a sense of duty are:

*

The Misfits Who Sometimes Make Magic Approach

Misfits Who Sometimes Make Magic

Some individuals may feel like misfits in certain places and situations. Such people may sometimes follow their mission, maintain their own high standards and sometimes make magic.

Some individuals feel like misfits in certain places and situations. They may experience this in their daily life, school, work or community. Different people manage this feeling in different ways.

Some people aim to fit in. Some try to find a group where they gain a sense of identity. Some go their own way. They may do this in ways that can help or hurt themselves or other people.

Some individuals may have a sense of mission, maintain their own standards and sometimes make magic. Let's explore how they may follow this approach.

They May Have A Sense Of Mission

Some individuals focus on doing the things they believe in. They pursue their passion for writing, playing music, helping people or doing other things that give them positive energy. They find an activity where they feel they belong.

Some may then develop a sense of mission. Becoming obsessed by their chosen activity, they aim to become the best they can be. They may also want to pass on the fruits of labour to other people.

They May Maintain Their Own High Standards

Such individuals feel alive, alert and swept away when pursuing their chosen activity. They feel a sense of duty to serve their craft. They aim to do fine work, keep developing and maintain high standards.

They may also take this approach when working with other people. Whilst they may prefer to pursue their craft by themselves, they may recognise that sometimes it can be helpful to behave in a professional way.

They May Sometimes Make Magic

Such individuals feel a strong fit with their chosen mission but not necessarily with elements of the wider society. This means that they sometimes see things with an artist's eye. Such an approach has both strengths and weaknesses.

The pluses may include their strength of character, the ability to see possibilities and, on some occasions, being able to produce magical work. The minuses may include emotional ups-and-downs and the need to continually find people who may hire them for what they offer.

Some people who feel like misfits continue to thrive. This may be because they have found a positive way to follow their mission. They can then continue to maintain their own high standards and sometimes make magic.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may experience aspects of this approach. This could be when pursuing your own passion or encountering people who follow this path.

How can you make could use of this approach in, as far as possible, a positive way? Again, this could be when pursuing your own route or managing somebody who feels like a misfit but can sometimes make magic.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Misfits Who Sometimes Make Magic Approach

The specific situation where I may experience aspects of this approach may be:

*

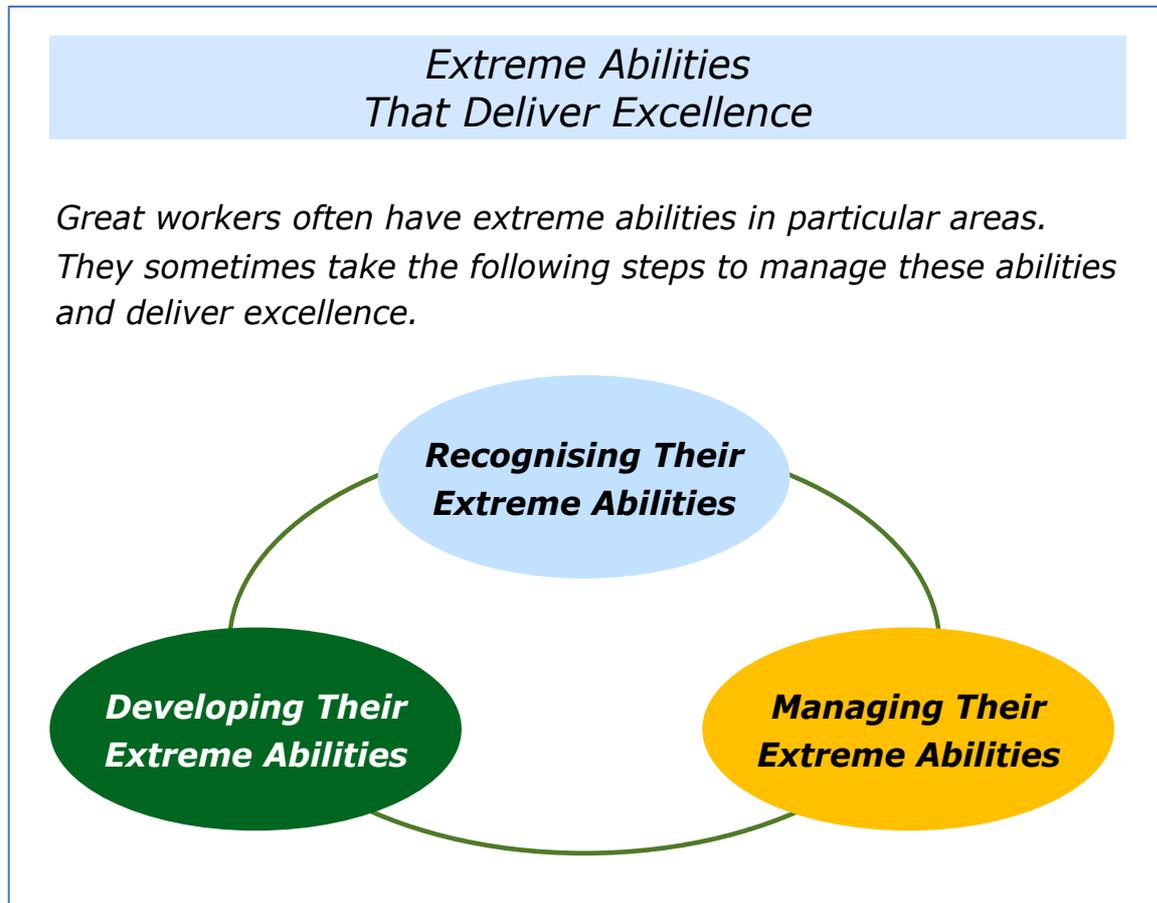

The specific things I can do then to make use of this approach in, as far as possible, a positive way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Extreme Abilities Approach

Great workers often have extreme abilities in particular activities. They then take certain steps to manage these abilities and deliver excellence in their areas of expertise.

Such people may also have extreme personality traits. They are not necessarily well-rounded and may have lop-sided personalities. This can take different forms.

They may be brilliant in some activities but have blind-spots in other areas. This can produce both pluses and minuses for themselves and other people.

Great workers sometimes learn how to recognise, manage and develop their abilities. Let's explore these themes.

They Recognise Their Extreme Abilities

Great workers have extreme abilities. Some may also have extreme personality traits. They may be deeply introverted or have elements of OCD, autism, dyslexia or other kinds of behaviour.

Many people have been helped to recognise and accept these elements relatively early in life. They may have had supportive parents who encouraged them to build on who they are as individuals rather worry about who they are not.

Different people learn about their personality traits – and the potential implications - in different ways. One person described this in the following way.

"My parents taught me to concentrate on the areas where I was confident and did good work. Being an introvert, I was happier reading and writing.

"When I was in big groups I went into my shell. This did not sit well with teachers who consistently reported that I needed to be more social.

"Later on I recognised that I felt more at ease doing work by myself or with a couple of people that I trusted. I did not like playing team sports or being in big groups.

"One reason was that I didn't like to be judged by certain kinds of people. I am happy to learn from people I respect but no longer pay attention to some kinds of critics."

Different people have different extreme traits. Warren Buffett describes how he is brilliant at reading spread sheets and forecasting potential trends. But he cannot tell you the colour of the wallpaper in the offices he has worked in for the past thirty years.

Warren chooses to focus on the area where he can see patterns and do fine work. This takes us to the next step taken by some people who have certain abilities.

They Manage Their Extreme Abilities

Some people learn to manage their extreme abilities and traits. This calls for building on their talents and, if appropriate, recognising the consequences of their behaviour. One approach involves finding ways:

To build on the pluses of their personal abilities and traits;

To manage the consequences of any minuses.

Stephen Fry, the actor, has shared his own experiences with bipolar disorder. Sometimes this can lead to great highs but also deep lows. During a television programme he described how twenty people with this condition were asked:

"Let me pose a hypothetical question. If you were given the chance to get rid of the lows but, at the same time, lose the highs, what would you do?"

Stephen reported that only one of the twenty people said they would take up this offer. Every person has things they need to manage in life, said Stephen. Bipolar was one such thing for him.

Many websites have been created by people who experience such mood swings. These provide practical tools that people can use to manage this trait. These include the following.

Set and follow a chosen routine ... Plan ahead ... Do things that give you positive energy ... Exercise in way that works for you ... Recognise and manage triggers ... Learn how to manage your moods ... Set and reach achievable goals ... Focus on improvement not perfection.

Different people use different ways to manage their extremes. This takes us to the next step taken by some people who have these characteristics.

They Develop Their Extreme Abilities

Great workers learn to develop their extreme abilities and deliver excellence. They may also learn how to develop and make good use of their extreme personality traits. Different people do this in different ways.

People who demonstrate some characteristics of autism, for example, may build on their strengths. They may have deep knowledge in their areas of interest, great attention to detail and the ability to deliver high quality work when doing repetitive tasks.

People who demonstrate characteristics of Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder also have strengths. The ADDA website describes these in the following way.

Each individual with ADHD has unique skills and advantages.

Within the ADHD community, these advantages are often referred to as ADHD Superpowers.

They Are: Quick Starters ... Creative ... Adventurous ... Courageous ... Focused ... Intuitive ... Detail Oriented ... Good In Crises ... Entrepreneurial ... Driven To Achieve.

Different people develop different ways to build on such traits. Some take the following approach.

They put themselves into places where they can do positive work ... They find ways to take a positive role and make a positive contribution ... They build on their strengths and do their best to get positive results.

Let's return to your own life. The extreme approach may or may not apply to you. If appropriate, however, try exploring the following theme.

Can you think of a specific activity where you may have the potential to develop an extreme ability and deliver excellence? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Extreme Abilities Approach

The specific activity where I may have the potential to develop such an ability and deliver excellence may be:

*

The specific things I can do to develop this ability and deliver excellence are:

*

*

*

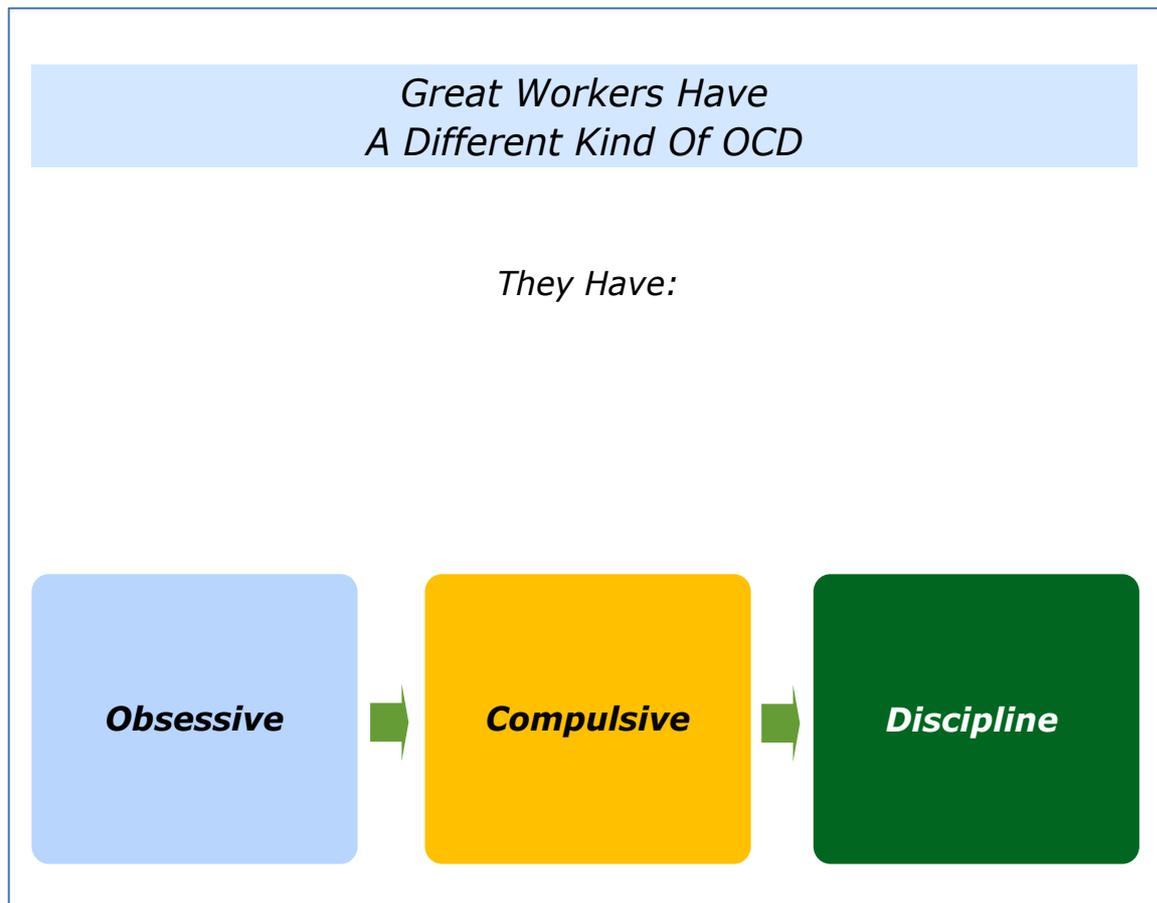

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Obsessive Compulsive Discipline Approach

Great workers often have a different kind of OCD. They have obsessive compulsive discipline rather than disorder. They feel compelled to follow this approach and aim to do superb work.

Different workers are obsessed by different things. They may feel compelled to write, paint, help people, solve certain problems or do other things. They then follow their chosen activity in a disciplined way.

Different people follow this approach in different areas. They may be artists, educators, medics, sports coaches, engineers, people workers and those in other fields. One person described this in the following way.

"Looking back, I do not know if I chose my obsession or if my obsession chose me. But it doesn't really matter.

"Every morning I get up feeling compelled to do what I believe in. It is then up to me to channel my creative drive and do work that helps other people."

Such people sometimes feel like they have been given a gift. Like the person mentioned above, they are not sure if they found their purpose or if their purpose found them. They then follow this purpose in their daily life or work.

Looking back, such people can sometimes see a pattern. They began by exploring interests that gave them positive energy. Then, at a certain point, one of these interests took over. This was sometimes because:

They found the activity to be fascinating;

They followed a certain discipline and experienced a sense of flow;

They did fine work and got a sense of fulfilment.

Such people may find that their chosen activity becomes a positive addiction. Becoming obsessed by the activity, they follow it in a compulsive and disciplined way. Taking this approach can sometimes lead to them experiencing a creative high.

When do you follow elements of this approach? You may do this when encouraging people, playing music, gardening, solving problems, tackling challenges or doing other activities.

Imagine that you want to pursue this activity in the future. How can you follow your obsessive compulsive discipline in your own way? What may be the potential pluses and minuses of taking this approach? How can you build on the pluses and minimise any minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Obsessive Compulsive Discipline Approach

The specific activity where I follow elements of this approach in my own way is:

*

The specific things I can do to keep pursuing this activity in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and minimise any minuses of taking this approach are:

*

*

*

The People Who Operate In Another Dimension Approach

*People Who Go Into A Different Dimension
Have Their Own Way Of Operating In The World*

- They develop their own view of the world
- They develop their own way of operating in the world
- They develop their own way of contributing to the world

Some people operate in another dimension. They have a different way of seeing, thinking and behaving. They then use their abilities to do positive work. Let's explore how you can recognise such people.

They develop their own view of the world

Some individuals have a particularly unique view. During the past fifty plus years I have had the opportunity to work with such people. Here are some of the things they said.

A Sales Director

"I can literally smell a deal. I also taste numbers. Some people have told me that I have synaesthesia, but I don't know about that."

"Ever since I was young I have been able to spot an opportunity to sell and know that what will work. But sometimes it is hard for me to explain the process I go through."

A Family Therapist

"Before a session I think of each family member. I put myself in their place and, within my body, feel what is like to be them. I then play a scenario of how each person will feel during each stage of the session I am going to run."

"In my body I often feel what other people will feel before they feel it. I then work out how to help them to move towards having the kind of feeling they want in the future."

A Chief Technological Officer

"I solve problems using my head. There is no point in my staff giving me a visual presentation, because I don't really understand pictures."

"I enjoy complex problems. Sometimes I compete at chess and take part in 50 games at once. I use quadratic equations to work everything out and win the games."

Many of these people used their ability to solve problems or help others. Their paths had not always been easy, however, and they had often encountered challenges.

Some individuals had been able to pass exams in a specific activity, such as maths, science or another subject. But they had been considered to be poor performers in other areas.

One common factor was that they often had a significant person – a parent, teacher or coach – who had believed in them. This helped them to develop their specialism and find a place where they could thrive.

They develop their own way of operating in the world

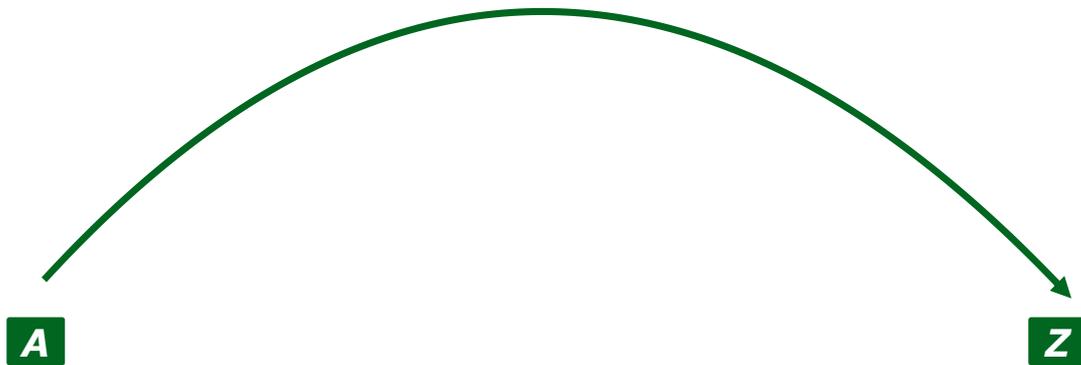

Such people often think and behave in ways that others find difficult to understand. This can create challenges for both themselves and other people.

A person may think in ways that may seem incomprehensible to others. When tackling a challenge, for example, they may start at A and then leap to their version of Z. This is the goal or desired solution.

They may then follow their own sequence and logic. Sometimes this means exploring many letters of the metaphorical alphabet – though not in a sequence that others would recognise.

People Who Go Into A Different Dimension Have Their Own Way Of Operating In The World

They may start at A but then leap to Z. They may keep moving between the various letters in the alphabet. This will be different from other people's styles – and in a different order – but they then make a plan for getting to Z.

They then implement their plan for getting to Z. It can be hard for them to explain to others how they got to a solution. This can be difficult for others to understand – especially to those who demand a linear process.

A person's thinking style may not affect others, but sometimes the way they behave can cause challenges. Being totally focused on what they do, they may have self-chosen autism.

They may demonstrate elements of OCD or be highly sensitive to certain kinds of noise, images or other stimuli. They may learn how to channel these elements in a positive way, however, and harness these to do fine work.

A person may have great awareness in one area but be totally lacking in other areas. They may learn to build on their strengths and minimise the consequences of their weaknesses – but this may not always be the case.

They develop their own way of contributing to the world

Such people develop their own approach to doing fine work. Sometimes this adds to and enriches the mainstream, but other times it can be different in a positive way.

A person may produce a creative breakthrough that shows a better way of working. They may create a new model, prototype or paradigm that enables people to achieve success.

As mentioned earlier, sometimes it can be hard to understand how such a person thinks. One Chief Executive I worked with said, for example, that he wanted his leadership team to understand how he thought. My response was:

"I am not sure even you know how you think. You are brilliant at finding solutions but do it in an unconventional way."

"It was until your teens that you realised that you were dyslexic, but actually that helped with your creative thinking. I am not sure that your team can ever understand how you think."

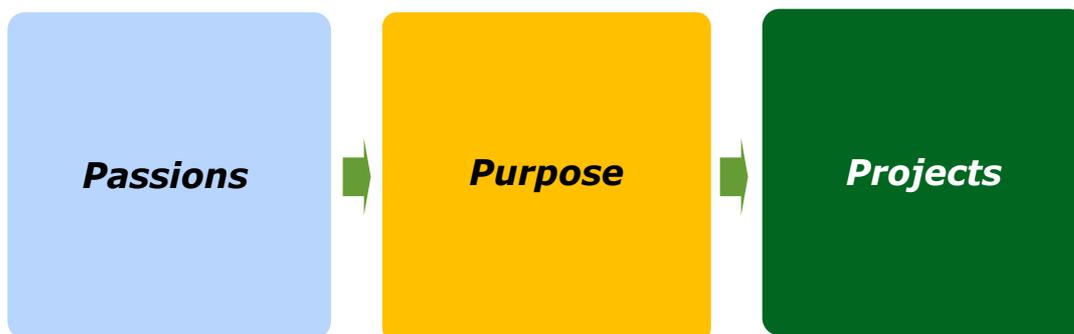

The CEO laughed and accepted that it may not be possible for others to understand his thinking style. They enjoyed working with him, however, and knew how to manage him.

People who operate in another dimension may not always be easy to understand. One approach that I found worked was to invite them to talk about their passions, purpose and the projects they wanted to do.

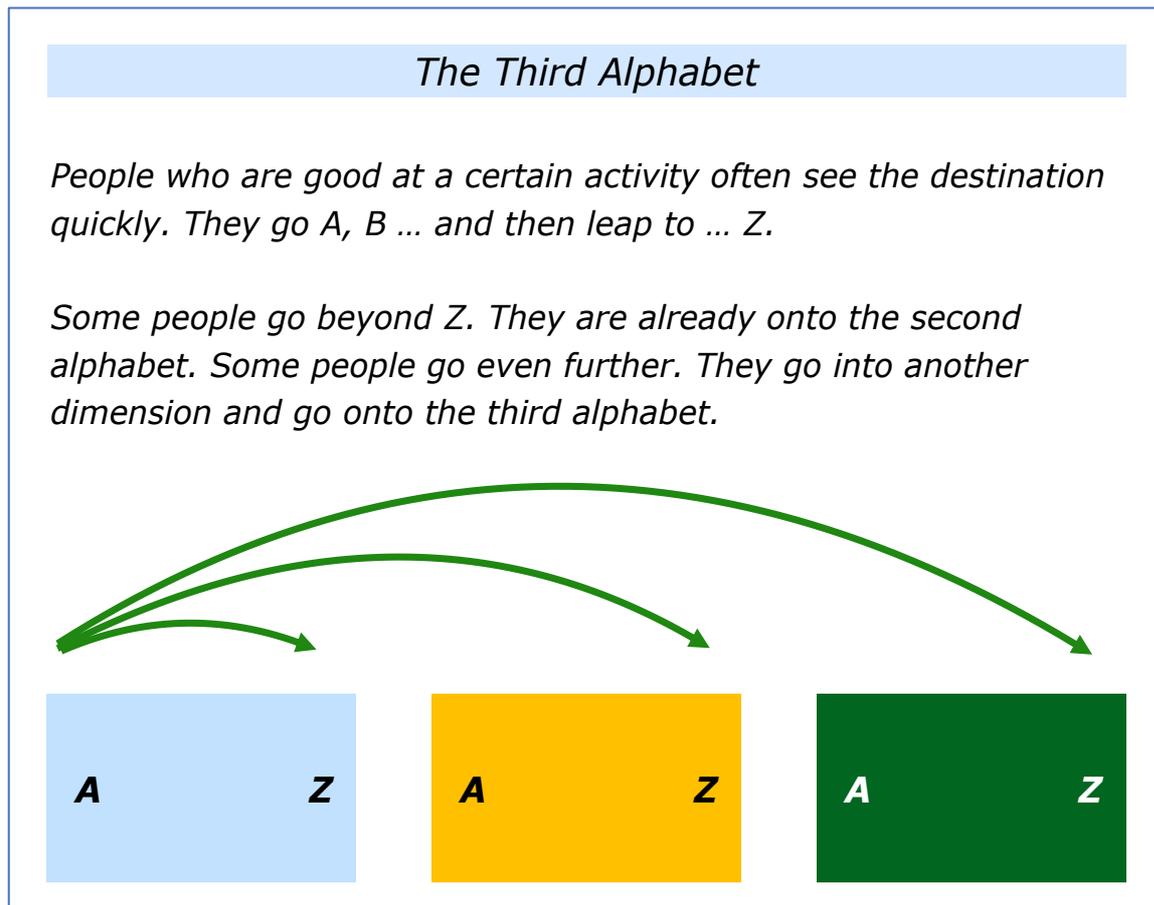

They enjoyed talking about these things and provided many insights. You will, of course, have your own way of relating to such people.

People Who Operate In Another Dimension

Sometimes it is possible to learn a lot from them by asking about their passions, purpose and the projects they want to do.

The Third Alphabet Approach

Imagine you are working with a visionary person. It can be useful to recognise that such people may be on their version of the third alphabet. One Chief Operating Officer explained this in the following way.

"Our leader is a real visionary. He sees the future and is years ahead of everybody.

"It is as if he is actually there. He can see, feel and experience what is happening. He can also describe the steps that have been taken to get to this place.

"Whilst a visionary, he can explain some aspects of the journey in great detail. He describes the steps to take and how to overcome challenges.

On other occasions, however, he gets exasperated with people who throw in objections.

"He simply says: 'We can solve that,' and goes on to explain the vision. Many people find him inspiring, whilst others want more detail and get frustrated.

"My job is to act as a translator. It is to clarify how we can keep running the business whilst also working towards his long term vision."

Practical visionaries see the destination quickly. When entering the situation in which they excel, they quickly see the potential picture of success. They go A, B ... and then leap to ... Z.

The architect walks onto a site and visualises the finished house. The innovator sees how a piece of technology can transform the world. The gifted mediator imagines a potential win-win solution for people who are stuck in a conflict.

Some people go beyond the Z. They go onto the second alphabet. Some people go even further. They go into another dimension and onto the third alphabet.

Have you ever met or heard about somebody who seems to go into this dimension? They may be a practical visionary in a specific field of science, therapy, education, technology, art or whatever.

What are the qualities that indicate they may go into this dimension? What is the kind of language they use? What do they do to bring this third alphabet to life? How do they describe the Z?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a person who you believe goes into the third alphabet in their particular field.

Describe the specific things the person does to indicate that they may go into this dimension.

The Person Who Goes Into The Third Alphabet

The name of the person who goes into the third alphabet in a particular field is:

*

The specific things they do that indicate they go into the third alphabet in the particular field are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you lead a team and report to a leader who is on the third alphabet. Sometimes this can be challenging.

You may think that you and the leader have agreed about what your team working with a visionary.

The leader may start thinking aloud about the future and give glimpses of the third Z. They may even indicate that your team needs to take these things into account during its present work. This can create confusion.

Should your team still deliver the agreed goals or have things changed? Should you explore whether the leader is really serious about changing the brief or should you wait a few days to let things settle? Should you try to extract what the leader really wants you to integrate?

One approach is to encourage the leader to talk about their vision for the future. After a while, however, you may want say some of the following things.

"I see what you want to do in the future. Bearing this in mind, does this have any impact on our team's present goals?"

"People are working towards the present agreed goals. This is version 1.0. Delivering these goals will provide a platform for the future versions 2.0 and 3.0."

"We are on track to deliver these aims by the agreed date. We can, of course, integrate some adjustments."

"Let me know if you would like us to continue with this version 1.0. Or, if necessary, add some adjustments. We can then provide the right platform for building a successful future."

Imagine that you have such a conversation with your visionary leader. Many leaders recognise that it is important to be positive and predictable, so they try to stick to the agreed contracts.

They accept that the people who work for them need to work towards a clear picture of success. This will hopefully be the case with your leader.

What to do if the leader keeps moving the goalposts? You can try to get as much clarity and consistency as possible regarding the agreed goals for your team.

You will also need to provide air cover and act as a translator for your team. This can be hard work but, if you feel the overall goal is worth it, you may want to continue managing upwards.

Managing A Leader Who Is Already On The Third Alphabet

You can invite the leader to describe their view of the destination and the third Z.

You can describe what your team is aiming to deliver at the end of the first alphabet and agree with the leader on that first Z.

You can act as a translator and ensure your team deliver the first Z whilst also preparing for delivering the future Zs.

Sometimes this can be challenging. One person expressed this in the following way.

"What if the leader you report to keeps doing 180 degree turns or delves down into micro-managing your people?"

"Sometimes we dread our boss returning from a long flight. Having time to think, he rushes back into the office and sprays lots of ideas around. Nobody knows what to do next."

There may come a point when constant changes from above are affecting your health. You may then want to focus on your priorities in life. It is important:

To retain your sanity and encourage yourself;

To do satisfying work;

To, if appropriate, help your team members to do satisfying work and get a sense of achievement.

Bearing these factors in mind, you can decide if you want: a) to continue in the present role, or: b) to explore how to find a more satisfying role.

There are, of course, many positives about working with visionaries who operate in the third alphabet. Such people are often inspiring.

They can give us glimpses of the future and provide the chance to do pioneering work. This is not only satisfying. It also helps us to develop as people and professionals.

So far we have talked about other people, but what about yourself? Are there any activities in which you explore such dimensions?

Arie de Geus, the author of The Living Company, found that great workers have what he called 'a memory of the future.'

Looking ahead, they explore scenarios in the activities they find fascinating. They use their imagination to take the following steps.

They explore both the positive and challenging scenarios;

They explore how to create and capitalise on the positive scenarios. They also explore how to prevent or, if necessary, manage the challenging scenarios;

They explore the best ways forwards for improving the chances of creating future success.

Such workers find this homework helps them as events unfold. They may have anticipated the actual scenario and are able to implement their chosen strategy.

Even if the unexpected happens, they will have rehearsed strategies for dealing with many scenarios. They can build on aspects of the strategies that may work in the situation, whilst also adding other elements. This gives them an advantage over others who may not have rehearsed properly.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity in which you explore the future and may even go onto the third alphabet?

How can you spend more time focusing on this activity? What may be the benefits of pursuing this activity - both for yourself and other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Third Alphabet

The specific activity where I may have the ability to go into the third alphabet may be:

*

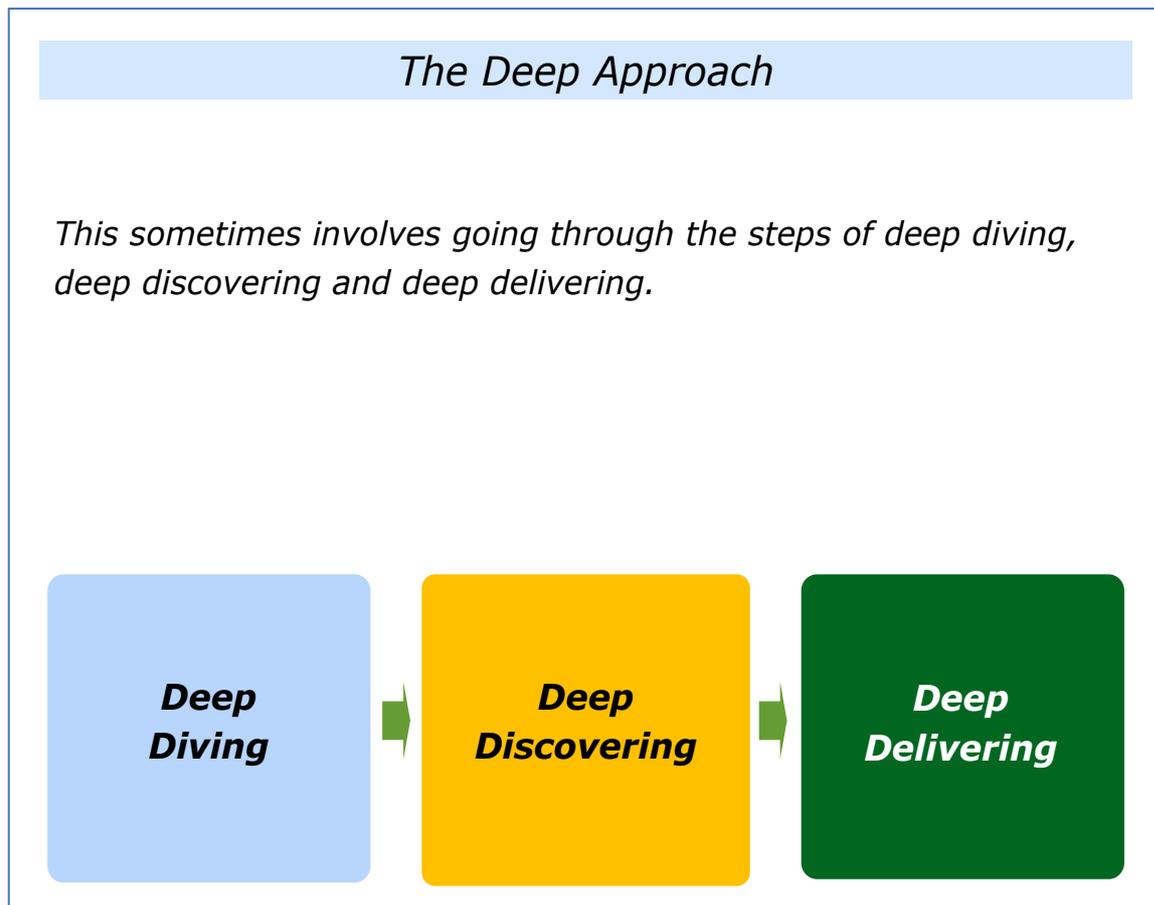

The specific things I can do to build on this ability to go into the third alphabet in this activity are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Deep Approach

Great workers choose to do some things deeply. They may sometimes dip into many things they find interesting. They then dive deeply into a specific activity they find fascinating.

Such people go through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement. They may have learned this approach during their childhood by pursuing hobbies or other topics they found interesting.

Many people now talk about the importance of doing deep work, which is a concept popularised by writers such as Cal Newport. The deep approach has a long tradition, however, and has been followed by great educators.

Maria Montessori, John Dewey and Sylvia Ashton-Warner were some of the educators who focused on the value of deep play and learning. They then encouraged people to translate what they discovered into doing deep work and delivering. Let's explore these themes.

Deep Diving

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you chose to dive deeply into something you found fascinating? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

Many people do this when they are young. They may dive into stamp collecting, train spotting, following a football team, learning about computers, studying insects or doing another activity.

They enjoy gathering information, making sense of things and clarifying what they have learned. They may also apply this knowledge to solve problems or achieve certain goals.

Such a person may also begin to learn transferable skills. They are learning how to learn, learning how to see patterns and, when appropriate, learning how to present this information to people.

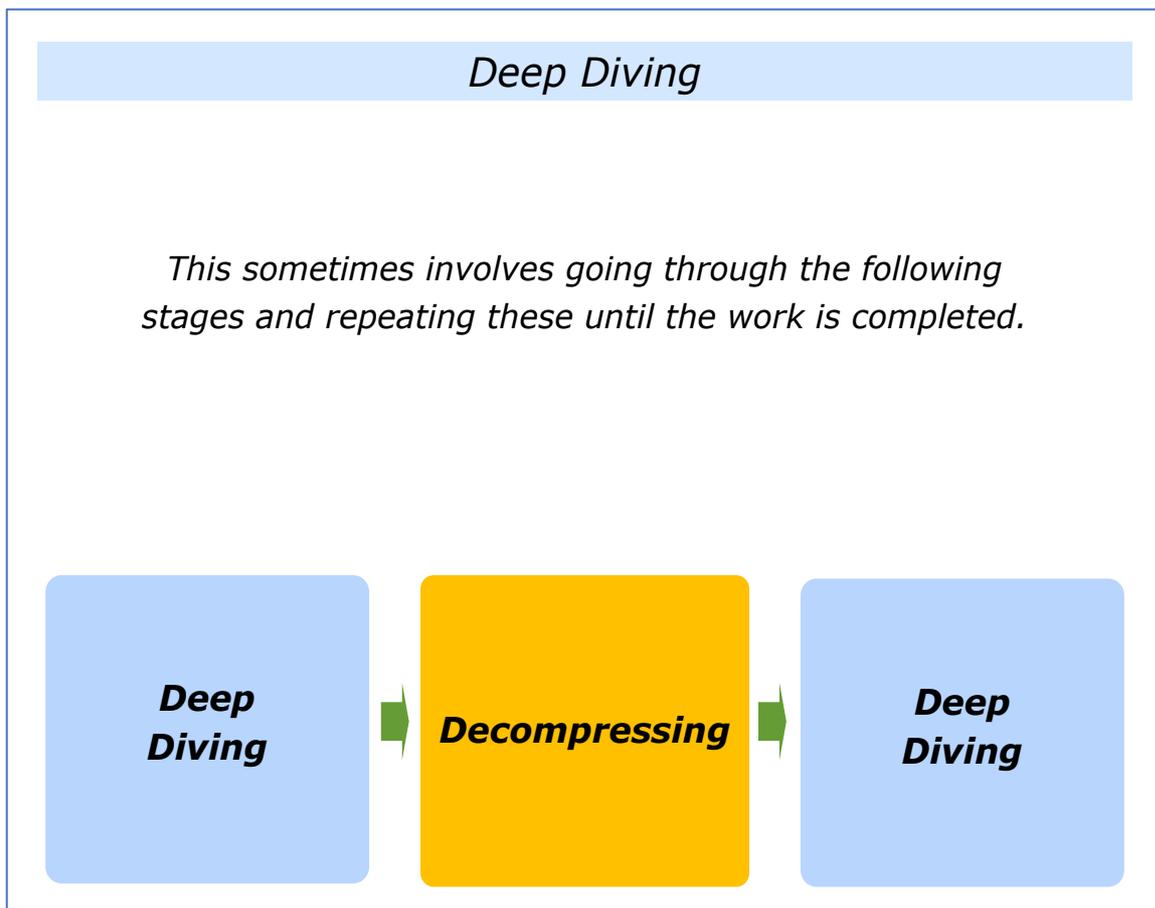

Great workers sometimes dive deep into their specialist area. They find this to be extremely enjoyable and also beneficial for their employer. But sometimes they encounter challenges that provide obstacles to doing their best work.

Such a person may find it difficult to concentrate in a traditional office where there are so many distractions. They may also need to manage their energy properly when working at home.

Imagine, for example, that you want to dive deeply into a particular activity. You may aim to study a subject, write an article, renovate a room, design a seminar or do something else you find fascinating.

How to manage your energy? One approach is to do the activity in your prime times – the times of the day when you have most energy. It is then to set aside a block of time when you can absorb yourself in the work.

Imagine you have set up such a schedule. You can then go through the process of diving deeply, decompressing and then diving deeply again. Let's explore these themes.

Each person has their own ritual for diving deeply. You will have your own approach to absorbing yourself in the topic and focusing on the task in hand.

Taking this step can bring great joy. Sometimes you will go into your equivalent of the zone. Time may go away as you pursue your chosen activity.

Diving deeply is rewarding, but you may also need to come to the surface. Sometimes this can be easy, but other times you may need to go through a process of decompression.

The word decompression has many meanings. Most people associate it with a deep sea diver having to spend time in a decompression chamber to avoid getting what is known as the bends.

Some individuals decompress at certain times when doing a piece of creative work. They need to rest, reflect and refresh themselves. They may slow down, sleep, walk or do other things. They then feel ready to go deep diving again.

Deep Discovering

Great workers love the joy of discovery. They want to dive deeply and gather information about their chosen topic. They aim to see the big picture, make connections and see patterns.

Some love to integrate the knowledge. They want to make models, make sure these work and apply these in real life. They may then want to pass on this knowledge to help people to succeed.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you followed this approach? You may have aimed to learn more about a topic, make sense of events or improve a skill.

What did you do then to discover more about the topic? How do you begin to make sense of the information? How did you use the knowledge? How did you clarify what worked and what could be improved? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Deep Delivering

Great workers often want to apply what they have discovered. They take pleasure in developing their work and what they offer to other people.

An artist may use it to improve their craft. A nurse may use it to help their patients. An athlete may use it to develop their performance. A scientist may use it to further their research. A leader may use it to improve their decision making.

Some workers deliver things in a deep way that operates on several levels. They may follow elements of great design and do work that is simple, satisfying and successful.

They produce work that has a profound simplicity. They make complicated things easy to use, show a transformational way of working or pass on deep knowledge that people can use to achieve success.

They do work that is satisfying on several. They create services, products or other things that are good to use or give pleasure. This can turn the users into strong advocates of the work.

They produce work that is successful. A product or service can be beautiful and easy to use, but it needs to do the job. This is the vital part. Great workers product things that help people to find solutions or succeed.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the deep approach? You may want to do this to study a topic, improve a skill, pass on knowledge or do another activity.

How can you dive deeply into the topic? How can you pursue your approach to discovery? How can you apply the knowledge and deliver in a deep way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Deep Approach In The Future

*The specific situation in the future
when I may want to follow elements of the deep approach may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of the deep approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Adrenaline Driven Approach

Imagine you lead a team that contains some adrenaline driven people. They love doing exciting projects that provide the buzz of adrenaline, adventure and achievement.

Sometimes they do stunning work and deliver peak performances. Sometimes they can be difficult or leave it to the last minute before delivering on deadlines.

That may be okay for them – because they love pulling the rabbit out of the hat - but it causes problems for other team members. Let's explore how to get the best from such people.

Recognising adrenaline driven people

Such people are turned on by the adrenaline, adventure and achievement. Let's consider these themes.

Adrenaline

They love getting their adrenaline juices flowing. They may be attracted to sporting activities, skydiving, stage performances, firefighting, troubleshooting, keynote speaking or whatever.

Adventure

They love doing projects that provide a sense of adventure. Stretching themselves, they enjoy learning and gathering new experiences.

Frequently turned-on by the highs, they may also experience deep lows. Such people want to feel alive and hate being bored.

They like to have drama in their lives. If you don't watch out, they may create a crisis just to feel excited or to get a kick out of solving the problem.

Achievement

Striving hard, they love to reach a goal. They get an enormous kick from reaching a summit, accomplishing the almost impossible or performing superbly in front of an audience. Some like applause and adulation.

Adrenaline driven people bring both pluses and minuses. The upsides are that some can be super positive, deliver peak performances and produce that touch of magic. Some can become icons for others in the team.

The downsides are that they may follow their own agenda, sometimes to the detriment of the team. They can also have mood swings, show impatience or upset other people.

Do you have any such people in your team? If so, try completing the following exercise. This invites you to write the names of the adrenaline driven people you have in your team.

Adrenaline Driven People

The adrenaline driven people I have in my team are:

*

*

*

Getting the best from adrenaline driven people

How to get the best from such people? The first thing is not to be intimidated by them, even if they are powerful personalities.

Remember, it is their job to convince you they want to be in the team, it is not your job to persuade them. You can then make clear contracts about their best contributions to the team.

Good leaders explain the team's purpose and the possible routes it could follow in the future. They explain the reasons why the team will be pursuing its chosen strategy rather than any of the other possible routes. They then explain the team's specific goals.

After doing this, they invite people to reflect and decide if they want to use their strengths to achieve the picture of success. You will have your own way of making this happen, but here are some of the themes you may want to communicate to people.

The Picture of Success

The team's picture of success – including the specific goals we want to achieve in the next year – is:

*

*

*

The Professional Standards

The professional standards we would like people to follow – plus the reasons for these - to achieve the picture of success are:

*

*

*

The Pluses and Minuses

The pluses involved in working towards and achieving these goals – including the benefits for all the various stakeholders – will be:

*

*

*

The potential minuses involved in working towards and achieving these goals will be:

*

*

*

The Practical Support

The specific kinds of practical support we will offer to help people to achieve the goals will be:

*

*

*

We are happy to answer any questions about why we are choosing to pursue this strategy rather than the other possible routes.

We will then give you time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute towards achieving the goals.

If so, get back to us. We can then make clear contracts about how you can make your best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

You can present a compelling vision and it up to people whether they choose to opt-in. You can then, if you wish, invite each person to do the following exercise.

This asks them to describe their best contribution to the team. Meet with them and settle on their agreed goals for the year.

*My Contribution Towards Achieving
The Picture Of Success*

My Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the team's goals and my strengths, the specific results I want to deliver by ... are:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

The Specific Benefits

The specific benefits of making this contribution - for the team, customers, colleagues and other stakeholders - will be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

The Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering the results will be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

The Specific Support

The specific support I would like to help me to achieve the goals, plus the support I will give to other people, is:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

The Agreed Goals

After discussing these things with my manager, the specific results I will deliver by ... are:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Helping adrenaline driven people to develop and sometimes to move on

There is another key step in helping your people to develop, whether or not they are adrenaline driven. It can be important to spend quality time with each of them each month.

You aim to build a successful team in which people take responsibility for delivering the goods. So you can invite the person to come to the meeting with their views about the following things.

The specific results I have delivered in the past month and the specific results I aim to deliver in the next month.

The specific things I am doing well and how I can follow these principles more in the future. The specific things I can do even better in the future and how.

The specific challenges I face, the potential solutions for tackling these challenges and the support I would like to reach the goals.

The specific other things I would like to explore about my work and career.

Every person in the team can use their strengths to contribute to delivering the team's Scorecard – the mandatory things the team must deliver. They can also do stimulating projects that help the team to achieve ongoing success.

At some point individuals may feel they need to move on, which can be a natural step in development. Adrenaline driven people sometimes want to take this step more frequently than others.

Why? They get impatient and want to go onto new projects that they perceive as more exciting.

Such people frequently strive hard to reach a specific goal – such as hitting a sales target, launching a product, climbing a mountain or whatever. Reaching the target is great and provides a creative high, but it also leaves a vacuum.

The person then searches for a new sense of purpose. Adrenaline driven people who find a positive purpose can then channel their energy in a healthy way.

Those that don't may channel it in an unhealthy way and become resentful. In more extreme cases, they may fall into addictions - such as gambling, drinking or getting into trouble.

What does this mean for you as a leader? Keep checking with the adrenaline driven person as they approach the end of a project. You can encourage them to do the following things.

To encourage themselves and do whatever is required to deliver their contribution to the team.

To find or create the next stimulating project - this may be within your team or organisation, but sometimes it may mean moving elsewhere.

To rest, recover and then manage the transition to next project.

Let's return to your own team. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific things you can do to ensure the adrenaline driven people continue to do good work that contributes to the team.

Describe the specific things you can do to help them to develop and, if necessary, move on.

Describe the specific things you can then do to continue to build a successful team.

Adrenaline Driven People

The specific things I can do to ensure they continue to contribute to the team are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to help them to develop and, if necessary move on, are:

*

*

*

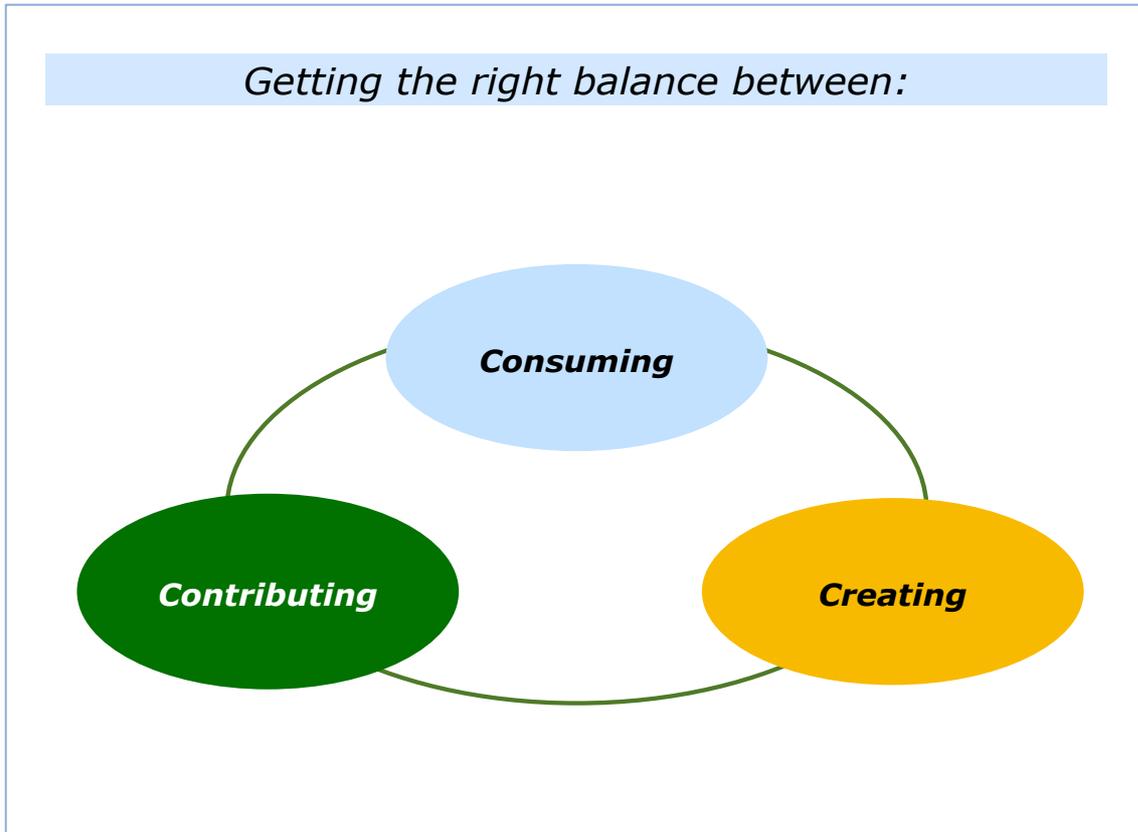

The specific things I can do to continue to build a successful team are:

*

*

*

The Consuming, Creating And Contributing Approach

People are living systems and need to get the right balance between consuming and creating. Sometimes they may also translate this into making a positive contribution to people or the planet.

Consuming can take many forms. It is not just about food. It also includes the environment and the things people experience in their daily lives and work. As the old saying goes: 'Everything is Food'.

A person may consume bad news about the environment and this can overload their system. A person may consume lots of ideas. They can lead to them feeling overloaded and stodgy. They may feel better if they translate these ideas into action and get some successes.

Creativity can take many forms. It can include writing, playing music, solving problems, designing things, producing something new or doing other creative activities.

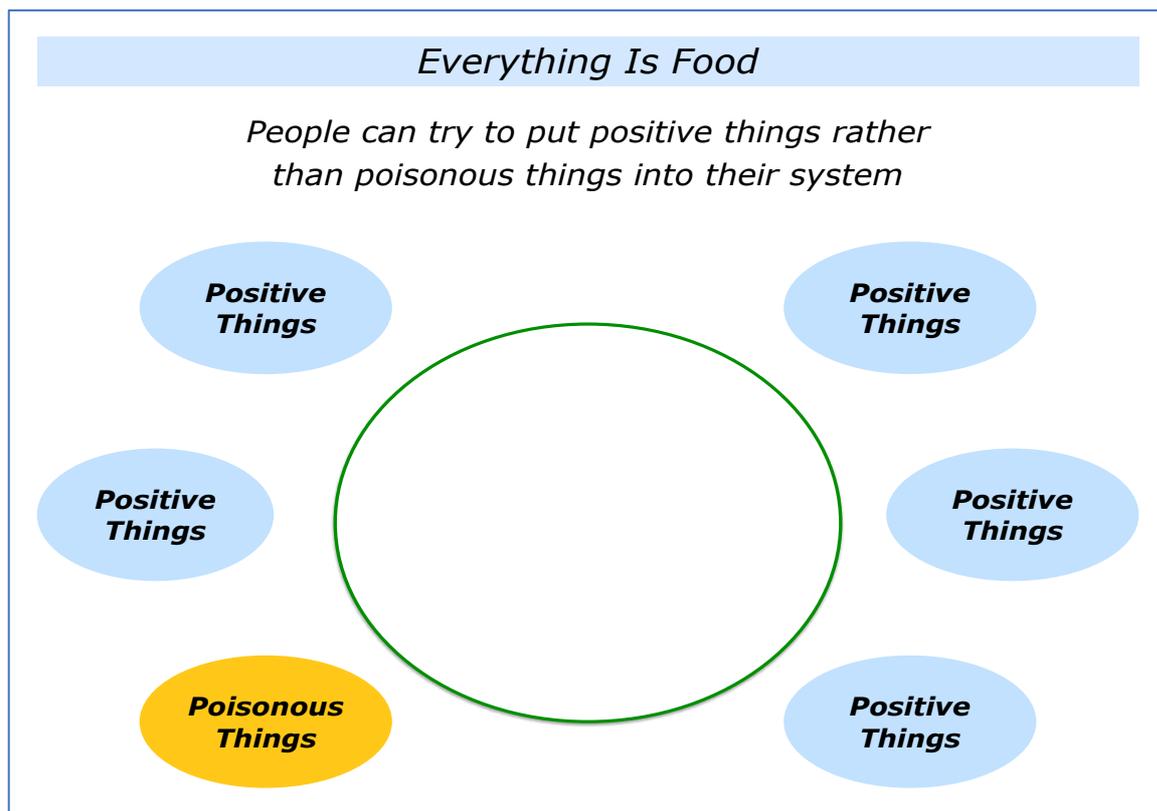

Contributing can also take many forms. It can include giving to others, encouraging people, doing good work, passing on knowledge or helping to build a better world. Imagine you want to get the right balance. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

Consuming

You can start by considering what you want to put into your body and soul. One person described how they took this approach.

"I began by listing the physical and psychological things I wanted to consume. On the physical side, I aimed to eat good food, spend time in the fresh air and take care of my health. On the psychological side, I wanted to get stimulating ideas, read uplifting articles, work on energising projects and spend time with encouraging people."

"The hard part was doing this in my daily life. Some things were easy to cut out, but others took more effort. I have managed to take many of these steps but it is still a work in progress."

Creating

How can you make good use of the things you consume? One approach is to ask yourself some of the questions.

"What am I taking into my body and soul? What am I feeling or thinking? How can I channel these experiences in a creative way?"

You may choose to translate your experiences into encouraging others, writing, painting or cooking. You may choose to focus on exercising, gardening, finding solutions, working or doing other activities.

People often feel better if they can get the right balance between taking things in and getting things out. The key is often to find healthy ways making this happen.

Contributing

Some people go a step further. They ask themselves the following questions.

"How can I use these experiences in a positive way? How can I contribute something that helps people or the planet?"

Many people who have setbacks use these to pass on knowledge that helps other people. They may choose:

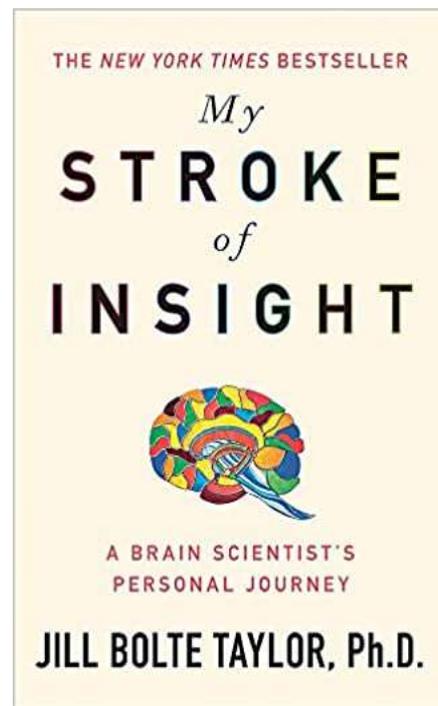

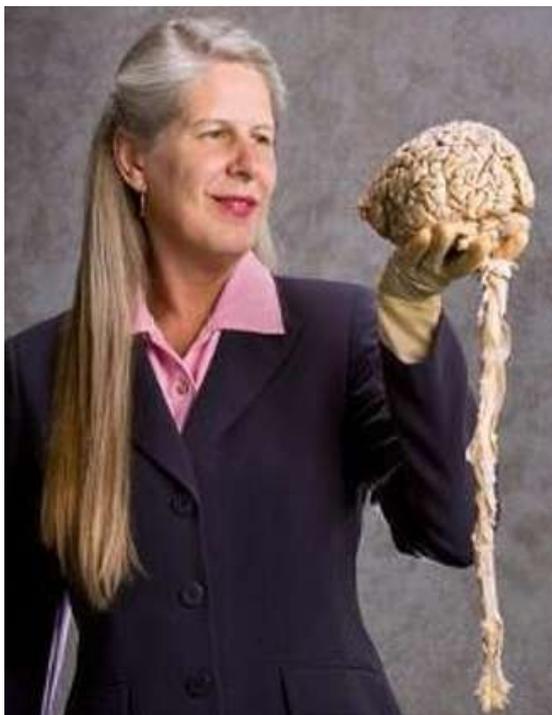

To create websites for patients ... To help the homeless ... To help prisoners of conscience ... To help athletes whose careers are cut short ... To help people change their careers ... To pass on knowledge that helps people to shape their future lives.

Jill Bolte Taylor translated adversity into doing brilliant work that helps others. Here is the introduction to her well-known TED Talk.

Neuroanatomist Jill Bolte Taylor had an opportunity few brain scientists would wish for. One morning she realised she was having a massive stroke.

As it happened – as she felt her brain functions slip away one by one, speech, movement, understanding – she studied and remembered every moment.

She went on to publish My Stroke of Insight. Here is an excerpt from her website that explains some themes she explores in the book.

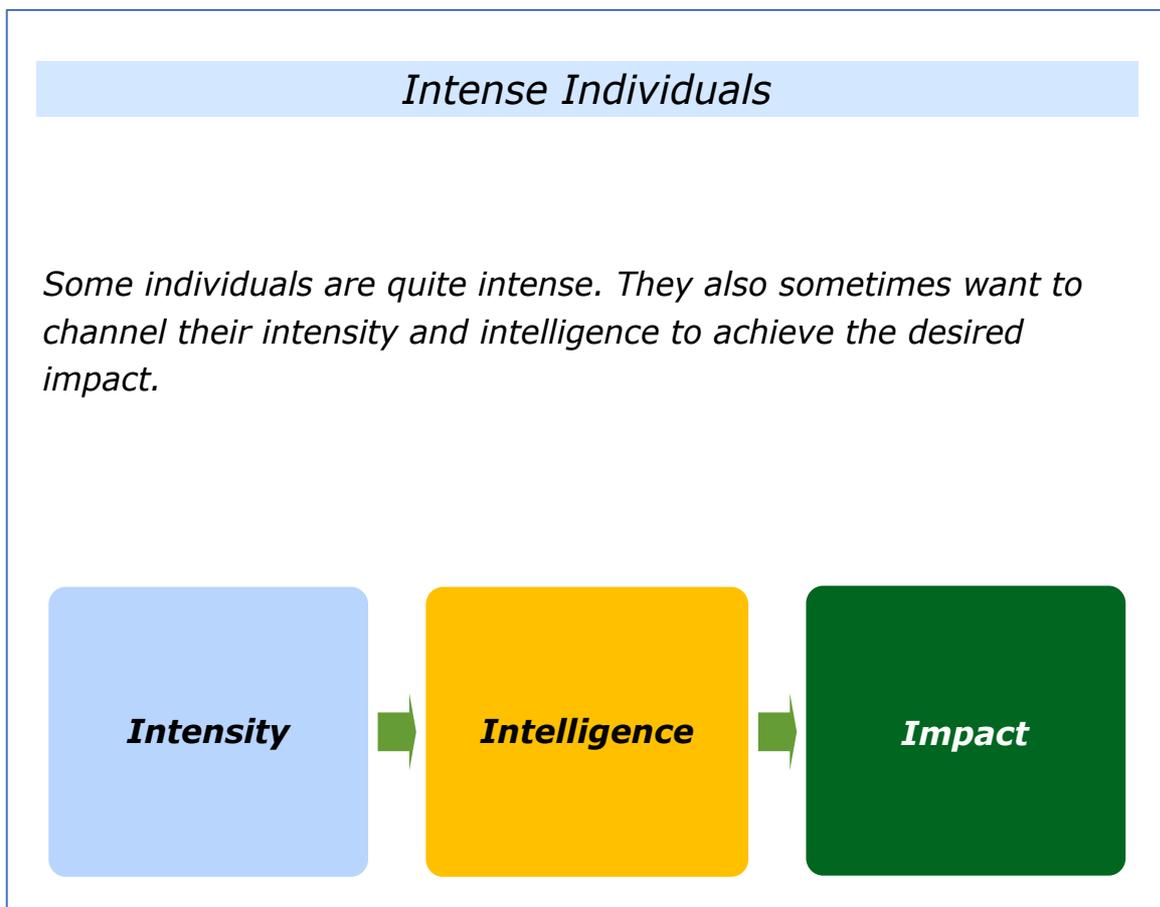

Jill shares with us her recommendations for recovery and the insight she gained into the unique functions of the right and left hemispheres of her brain.

Based upon her academic training and personal experience, Jill helps others not only rebuild their brains from trauma, but helps those of us with normal brains better understand how we can 'tend the garden of our minds' to maximize our quality of life.

Jill teaches us through her own example how we might more readily exercise our right hemispheric circuitry with the intention of helping all human beings become more humane.

People sometimes need to get the right balance between consuming, creating and contributing. This can especially be the case if the person is intense.

The Intense Approach

Imagine that your work involves helping intense individuals who want to make a positive impact. They may be active in sports, the arts, business or other fields.

Such people are often extremely driven. They may have a short attention span and only be interested in information that can help them to achieve their goals.

Bearing this in mind, here is one approach that can be useful when working with such people. This involves encouraging them to channel their intensity and intelligence to achieve the desired impact.

Sometimes it is important to start from the destination – the person's aims and the real results to achieve. Let's explore these steps.

Impact

Intense individuals often want to get to the point quickly. Being goals driven, they want ideas they can use to achieve their picture of success.

How to connect with such people? One method is to show that you have done your research. It is to connect with their aspirations and how they want to make a positive impact.

The usual way to do this is to make the person feel welcome and the centre of your world. It is then to say something along the following lines.

"As we know, you have lots of drive and ambition. Bearing this in mind – but only if it may be useful – we can explore how you can continue to work towards your goals.

"Are there any particular themes or challenges it would be good to explore? If appropriate, I can then share ideas you can add to your repertoire to help to achieve your goals."

Sometimes I have taken another approach that may appear risky but have only done this after doing lots of research. After making the person feel welcome, I have then said something along the following lines.

"Good to meet. I am looking forward to hearing more about your strengths and goals.

"If appropriate, we can explore how to keep building on your strengths and also tackle some of the other challenges. The important thing is to focus on your agenda, however, and make it a useful session for you.

"Looking at what you have said and done, it looks like some of the goals you want to achieve are these:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"As I said, however, we need to focus on your agenda. Then, if appropriate, we can explore some ideas you can use in your own way to work towards your aims. Is that okay?"

This approach is relatively simple when working with a business leader, athlete or other achiever. It is quite possible to do research about the specific goals they want to achieve. It can be more difficult if a person faces challenges in their personal or professional life.

The approach sounds risky but can also pay off. Looking back at my own work, I have found that many driven people appreciate the research that has been put in about them and their aims.

This has helped to start the session in an energetic and practical way. We have then been able to quickly focus on the positive impact they want to make in their lives or work.

Intensity

Imagine that you are helping an intense person. Sometimes it is important to acknowledge their intensity and, where appropriate, help them to channel it in a positive way. There are several ways to take this step.

You can encourage the person to describe the things they feel passionately about. They may feel driven to pursue specific activities, achieve certain goals, fulfil their potential or do other things.

You can encourage the person to channel their intensity in a way that helps them to reach their goals. One way is to help them to add to the repertoire of strategies they can use to achieve their picture of success.

You can encourage the person to recognise that their intensity is an asset. Sometimes they may need to use it full on. Sometimes they may want to slow down, however, and apply in a calmer way.

Driven people can be inspiring or intimidating. If the person is open to it, however, you can offer ideas for channelling their intensity in ways that help themselves and other people to reach their goals.

Intelligence

Intense individuals often have great intelligence in the areas where they excel. Many also want to expand their knowledge of strategies and skills that can help them to achieve success.

One football manager I worked with always carried a large book for noting ideas to apply in his life and work. During our first meeting he described his desire to keep learning.

"I go to seminars on many subjects, not just those about football. If I can get just one idea to improve myself or my team, then it is worthwhile."

There are several definitions of intelligence. These include the following.

The ability to learn, understand and make judgements that are based on reason ... The ability to learn from experience and apply knowledge to shape your environment and achieve your goals.

There are also many kinds of intelligence. Howard Gardner popularised the concept of multiple intelligences with his 1983 book Frames of Mind. This challenged the academic establishment by expanding the conventional number of intelligences measured by schools.

Such institutions tended to look for linguistic and logical-mathematical intelligences. They paid little attention to other talents unless, for example, a person was outstanding at athletics or art.

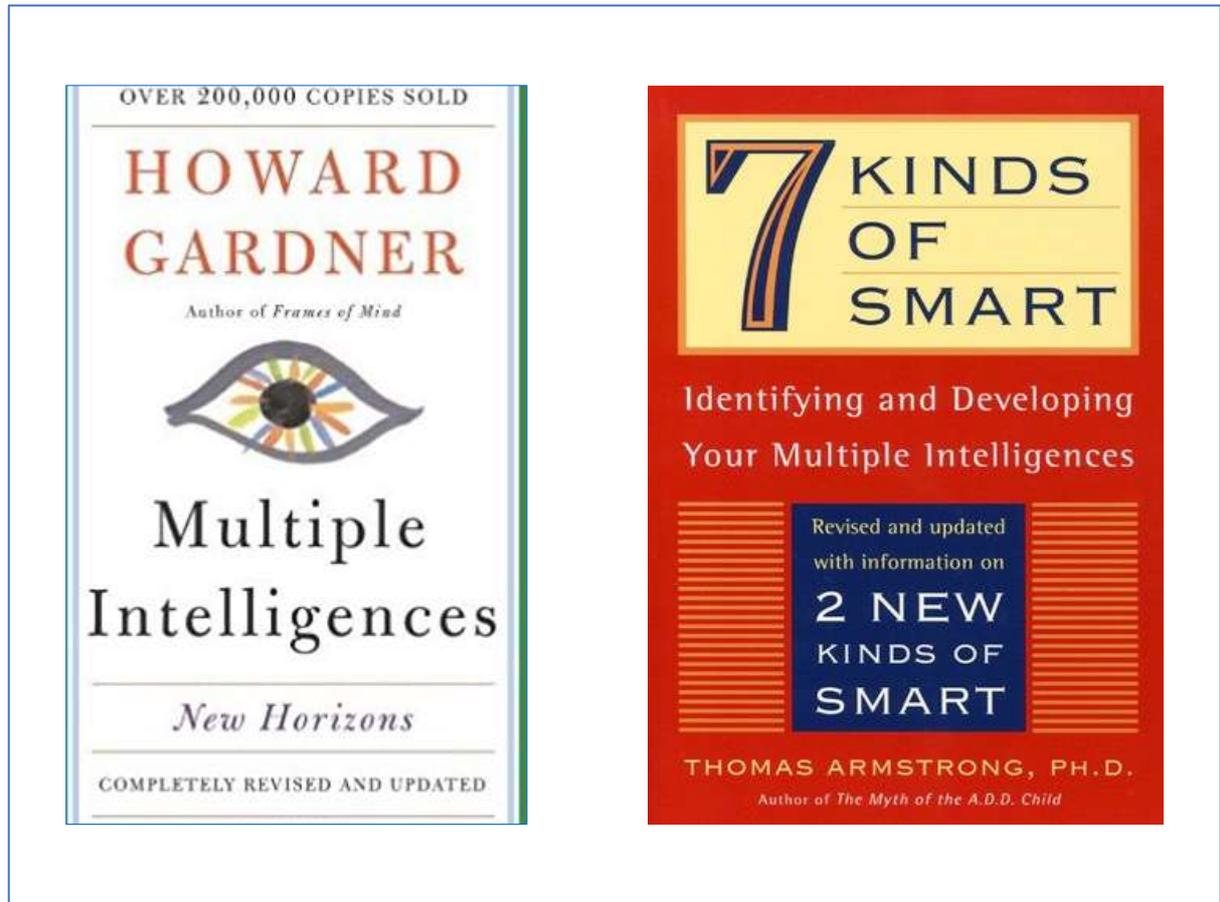

Howard showed how people may also have interpersonal, visual, musical or other intelligences. Since then he has expanded these to cover the following intelligences: interpersonal, spatial, linguistic, logical, musical, kinaesthetic, naturalist, existential and intrapersonal.

His treatise was somewhat academic, as were the names he coined. He also later confessed to being deliberately provocative by calling these intelligences rather than, for example, styles.

Gardner got his reaction. Academics debated the semantics, whilst practitioners translated the ideas into action in the schools. By the start of the 21st Century many of his ideas had entered mainstream education.

Some educators understood the spirit behind the approach; others simply applied it as a tick-box system they must implement. The phrase MI entered the educational system, but there was a need to reach a wider audience.

Thomas Armstrong built on Howard's work with his book 7 Kinds Of Smart and called the intelligences certain kinds of smarts. The book provided practical ways that parents and educators could enable people to find and build on their intelligences.

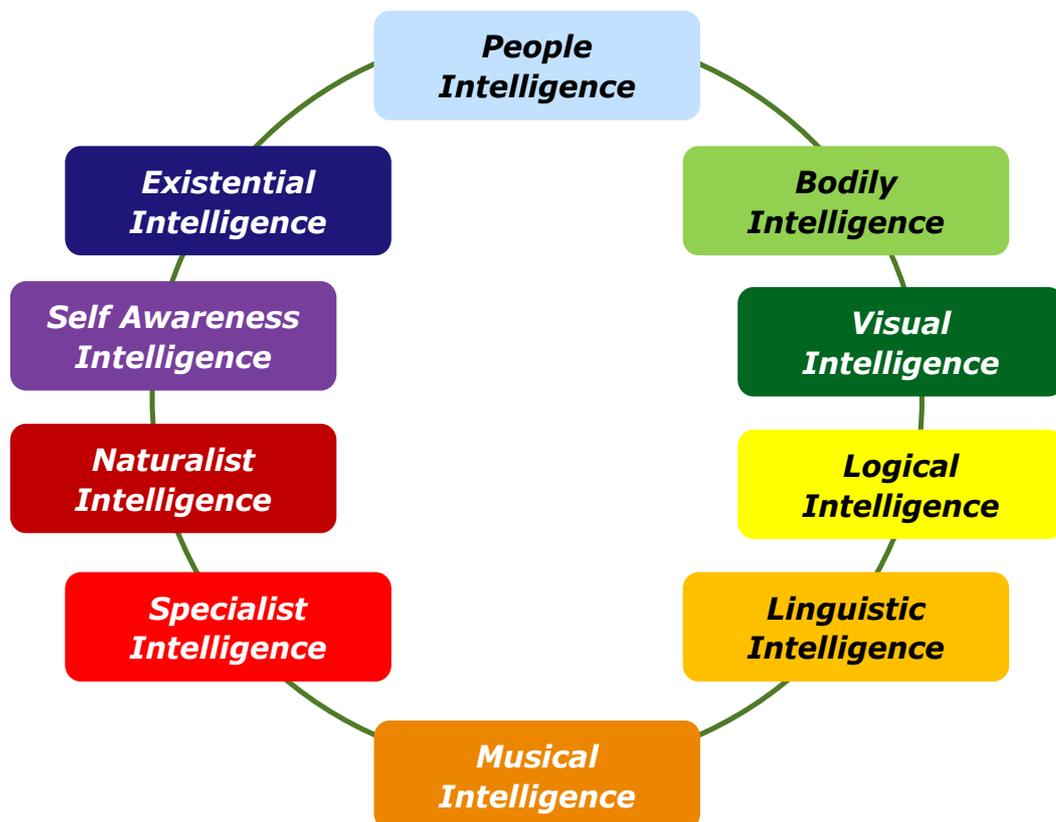

The concept of multiple intelligences has moved into mainstream education. Sometimes this has been used to help individuals to develop. Sometimes it has become a tick box approach to be applied in a mechanical rather than individual way.

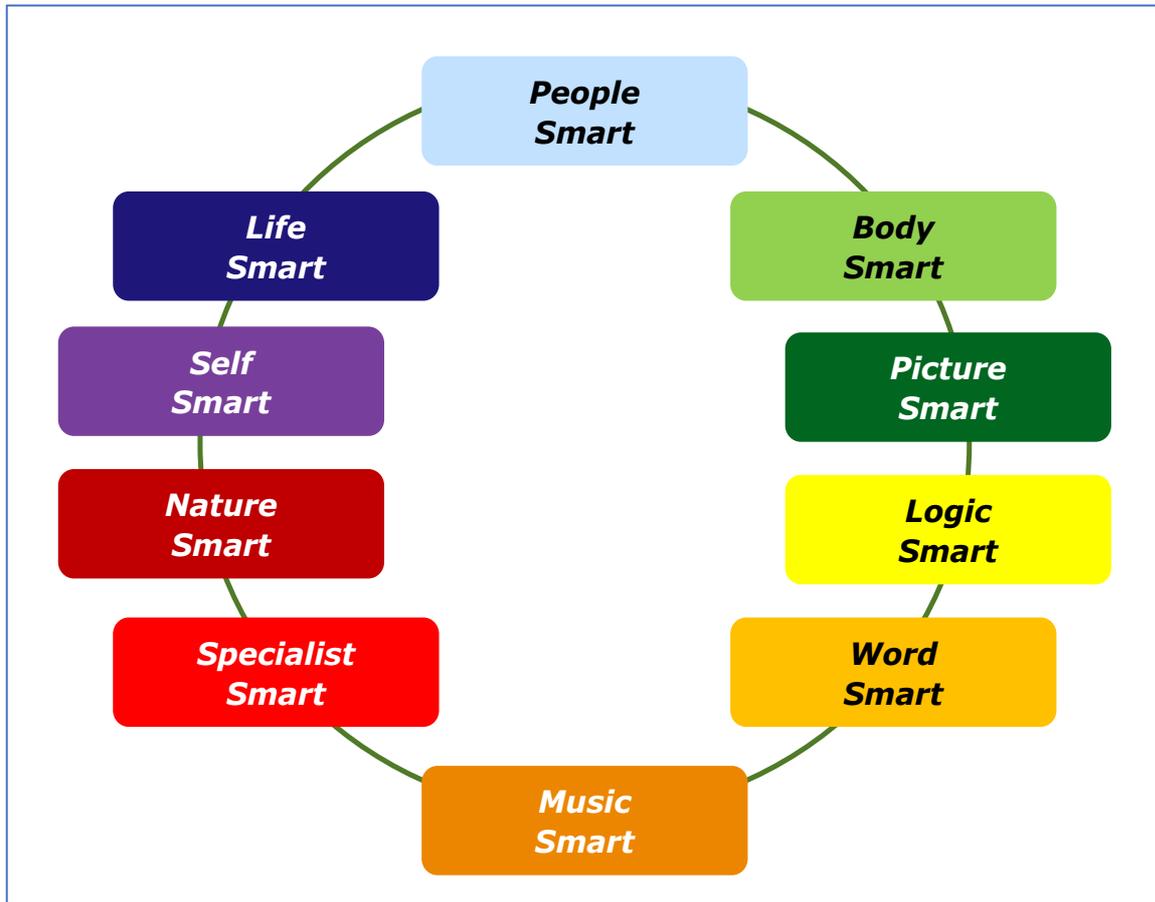

Some people have added to the various intelligences. These include specialist intelligence to describe a person being good at a specific craft, skill or other activity. Existential intelligence signifies a person being good at dealing with life experiences or exploring spiritual issues.

Here is a brief overview of the various intelligences. These start by giving some of the original themes followed by the terms that Thomas used. People sometimes combine several of these qualities to perform well in their life or work.

Multiple Intelligences

There are many kinds of intelligence. A person may combine some of the following qualities.

People Smart

Such a person may be good at working with people. For example, they enjoy building relationships, encouraging others and social interaction.

They have strong empathy skills. Sometimes they sense what is going to happen in a group, for example, before it actually happens. They can also be good at organising people and coordinating the strengths in a team.

The best way to help them learn may be through conversations, role-plays, simulation and other activities involving people. People smart corresponds to what Howard Gardner called Interpersonal intelligence.

Body Smart

They may be good at controlling their body movements, dancing, sports and managing materials successfully. They express themselves through movement – sometimes finding it difficult to sit still – and often have good hand-eye coordination.

The best way to help them learn is anything involved with movement or activities that evoke feelings. Such people have a strong muscle memory, being able to call on lessons they have integrated into their bodies. Body smart corresponds to Kinaesthetic Intelligence.

Picture Smart

They may be good at working with pictures, images, drawing, colours, art, imagining or other forms of visual organisation. They often need to create or find visual images that enable them to retain information.

The best way to help them learn is by using these media. Picture smart corresponds to Spatial intelligence.

Logic Smart

They may be good at elements of reasoning, gathering information and numbers. They enjoy thinking conceptually, seeing patterns and making connections.

The best way to help them to learn may be inviting them to solve problems – particularly in their areas of greatest interest – collect data, do experiments and present the information. Logic smart to what Howard Gardner called Logical-Mathematical intelligence.

Word Smart

They may be good at working with words, conversations, writing and languages. They enjoy speaking, storytelling, explaining, using humour and teaching.

The best way to help them learn may be inviting them to use these skills through writing, presenting, speaking new languages and other verbal media. Word smart corresponds to Linguistic intelligence.

Music Smart

They may be good at creating and appreciating music. They also often think in sounds, patterns and 'rhythms'. Some are sensitive to even the smallest sounds – which can be either helpful or distracting.

The best way to help them to learn is through music and, for example, helping them to see rhythms – patterns – in other areas of learning. Music smart corresponds to Musical-Rhythmic intelligence.

Specialist Smart

They may have strengths in specific activities and area of expertise. Such people are able to quickly see patterns and the strategies required to achieve success.

They may operate in special areas of expertise that are not yet recognised in the mainstream. Bearing this in mind, they may have the ability to do pioneering work in such fields.

Nature Smart

They are good at seeing rhythms in nature and have a feeling for living things. Here is a superb definition from Kathy Koch of what is called Naturalist intelligence.

Nature-smart children think in patterns and are usually able to compare and contrast easily ... (They) usually enjoy collecting things according to shape, design, and texture ... Children who are nature smart love to be outside.

They may get dirty during every recess because they dig in dirt and pick up every rock and acorn ... Attention is probably heightened when lessons have to do with animals, rocks, mountains, lakes, planets, and other things of nature.

Self Smart

Such people have a good understanding of themselves. They clarify their inner feelings, strengths and weaknesses. They tend to think deeply about topics and can sometimes be quiet. They may feel uncomfortable being 'graded' by others, because it involves outside judgements about their own views.

They learn best by focusing on topics related to their own lives and experiences. Such people often prefer to work alone. They like being given time and space to explore their own insights.

Self smart corresponds to what is called Intrapersonal intelligence. Thomas has written:

Intrapersonal children tend to be loners. Although they may seem very isolated and cut off from the world, they in fact take in a great deal of what they observe, and possess rich inner lives.

They like going their own way – doing things in their own time. Fiercely independent, they can be very hard to deal with, if forced to learn in a specific way imposed from without.

They need to be given choices about their learning. 'Do you want to do a project on birds, or on dinosaurs? Do you want to study the problems on page 14, or page 16?'

They do best with independent study, individualized projects and self-paced materials such as computer software programs.

Ask them about their interests – they may be slow to warm up to you, but once trust has been established, they will share with you some of their hopes and fears, some of their dreams and visions.

Provide them with opportunities to be alone with themselves; give them the tools they require to carry out their self-chosen learning activities, and make sure they have enough time to work at their own pace.

Life Smart

This relates to people who are existential smart. Throughout history individuals have asked questions such as:

"Who am I? What do I want to do in my life? Why do I want to do it? How can I make it happen? When do I want to begin?"

People with existential intelligence gather knowledge and, in some cases, wisdom to explore and find answers to these questions. They may also focus on the more spiritual aspects of existence and our purpose on the planet.

Driven people are often extremists. They are experts in some areas but have less skills in other areas. If appropriate, you can help a person to expand their intelligences by adding to the repertoire of skills they can use to achieve their goals.

Impact

Imagine you are helping an intense individual. As mentioned earlier, many of them want to make a positive impact. They may want to raise happy children, deliver successful projects, have a profound influence on society or achieve another goal.

Such people are often passionate about their chosen work. Sometimes this can be expressed in negative ways, especially when they care deeply and feel frustrated.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to try to encourage a person to focus on the real results they want to achieve. One leader I worked with shouted at his staff but this did not achieve the desired effect. Looking ahead, we began by exploring the following theme.

"What is the positive outcome you want to achieve?"

The leader said he wanted his people to be more proactive and take responsibility. Unfortunately his people felt scared, retreated into their silos and failed to take responsibility. This acted as a trigger to the leader, who would then launch into a tirade.

He wanted to build a self-managing team where people could manage the daily tasks, manage him and deliver success. This might take some time, but we then explored the following question.

"What are all the possible options for achieving the positive outcome?"

He could carry on shouting, but this would only be a short-term fix. Exploring the possible ways forward, he ultimately decided to take the following path:

To stay calm, buy time to think and behave in a professional way towards people;

To hold sessions where he educated the team by communicating the picture of success and the key priorities – then inviting each of them to clarify their personal contributions;

To hire a coordinator who could act as a translator between him and the team – then hand over the daily running of the team to this person;

To, if appropriate, recruit more self-managing people and support the coordinator in building and running a successful team;

To turn his energies to doing what he did best – going out to customers, getting business and securing the future for the team.

The leader pursued this approach and, despite a few setbacks, began improving the way they managed their intensity. He has since moved on to doing other projects but one lesson has remained.

He has always hired a great coordinator to manage the daily working of the team. The leader has then been able to focus on what he does best and use their ability to make a good impact.

Intense people can sometimes have the potential to be peak performers. Here are some characteristics that such people may demonstrate, but these come with a caveat. Not all people who demonstrate these characteristics will be peak performers.

Peak Performers

- They may have lopsided personalities – being brilliant in some areas and blank in others.
- They may demonstrate paradoxes that don't fit conventional psychometric tests.
- They may behave in ways that are considered different, quirky or odd.
- They may follow daily habits and only focus on what they believe is important.

Peak performers may sometimes behave in ways that are different and not necessarily easy to understand. Such people may have lopsided personalities.

They may be brilliant in some areas but blank in others. Warren Buffett described himself in this way. Here is a summary of what he said:

"I have a lopsided personality. I am brilliant with numbers but I cannot tell you the colour of the wallpaper in my room at home. Even though I have lived in the same house for over fifty years."

Such people may see things quickly in one area of life. They can tell you exactly what is happening and what is about to happen. In other areas they don't notice a thing.

Peak performers sometimes demonstrate what appear to be paradoxes. They do not fit old style psychometric tests and do not give conventional answers to questions. If a person asks them:

"Are you somebody who sees the big picture or do you pay attention to detail?"

They may respond:

"Sometimes I do both."

If a person says to them:

"According to your psychometric test, you are not a risk taker. Is that right?"

They may respond:

"Absolutely, I am an entrepreneur, so I don't take risks. It is the people who join big organisations that take risks. They put their hands into the destiny of other decision makers."

Peak Performers Sometimes Demonstrate Paradoxes

- They may simultaneously see the big picture and also see the small details.
- They may appear to be intellectual but are actually following their intuition.
- They may be introvert by sometimes go into role and may appear to be extrovert.

Peak performers may sometimes appear to be different, quirky or odd. Some of them behave in ways that could attract certain labels.

Such people may be highly focused – but this may come across as being semi-autistic or living in their own world. Some may be highly sensitive – but this may sometimes come across as being bipolar

Some may perceive things in different ways. They may experience dyslexia, synaesthesia or other faculties. Some may develop behaviours that for them seem natural to but others seem odd.

Peak performers often follow daily habits that remove the need to make unnecessary decisions. They may wear the same kinds of clothes and eat the same kinds of food each day. They then use their energy to focus on key decisions.

Such people focus on the things they believe are important. They may do great work in certain areas but neglect other aspects that can be important in life. The following pages explore some of the approaches such people may follow on the way to doing fine work.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where an intense person may ask for your help? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can show you understand the person's goals? How can you help them to channel their intensity to achieve their desired outcomes? What may happen as a result?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Intense Approach

The specific situation where an intense person may ask for my help may be:

*

The specific things I can do to help the person to channel their intensity and achieve their desired outcome are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Attacking The Day Approach

Some people follow the attacking the day approach rather than the anxious approach. They start by clarifying what want to achieve and set specific goals.

Such people aim to have a certain attitude, apply themselves and do their best to achieve their aims. They may then get a sense of satisfaction from what they have achieved during the day.

The attack the day approach can have pluses and minuses – both for themselves and other people. It is therefore important to build on the pluses and manage the minuses.

Some people follow this approach when building on their strengths, following their calling or doing another activity. They sometimes translate it into action by focusing on the following themes.

Attitude

Such people often have an achiever mindset. They clarify what they want to achieve in their life and work. They then focus on what they want to do that day to work towards their short, medium and long-term goals.

Different people aim to achieve different things. Some focus on how they want to help other people. Some focus on how they want to work towards their personal or professional goals.

Such people often have a positive attitude and aim to attack the day. They see each day as an opportunity to work towards their picture of success. They may therefore focus on the following themes.

My Life Goals

The specific things I want to do in my life are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The specific things I want to do today to work towards those life goals are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Such people often build on solid ground by making things as predictable as possible. Bearing in mind what they can control, they set things up to succeed.

They prepare properly before moving into action. They rehearse what they going to do: a) to set specific achievable goals; b) to follow strategies that work; c) to do their best to achieve success.

Such people rehearse how to deal with any challenges. They learn to manage unexpected events by buying time to think, considering their options and pursuing their chosen way forwards.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way and set goals you want to achieve. It can then be time to move on to the next step taken by people who attack the day.

Application

Such people like to follow their own plans when working towards their goals. They love to apply themselves, work through their lists and get successes along the way. They may follow a certain ritual for clicking into action and then aim:

To follow their chosen rhythm when doing the work;

To focus on their action plan, get an early success and move on to the next task;

To build in times for rest and then rehearse what they are going to do next on the way towards achieving their goals.

Such people love to absorb themselves in their chosen work. They also have the ability: a) to focus on the task on hand; b) to focus on how that will help them to achieve their long-term goals.

They sometimes go into a state of flow when doing their chosen work. They set achievable goals, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve success. This can lead to the next step.

Achievement

Such people get a dopamine kick when crossing items off their list. Some also recognise the pluses and minuses of this approach. They recognise that is it important:

To get these dopamine kicks by doing things that contribute to their daily and long-term goals, rather than;

To get a dopamine kick by doing things that do not necessarily contribute to achieving the goals.

(One caveat is worth underlining, however. It can sometimes be healthy for a person to get such a kick by doing something that gives them a personal boost. They can then return with renewed energy to work towards their goals.)

People who attack the day often have an achiever mindset. As mentioned earlier, however, this approach can have pluses and minuses for both themselves and other people.

The Potential Pluses

These include the following. The person may have a strong sense of purpose. They may love setting goals, following a specific routine and doing superb work. They may also get a sense of satisfaction from achieving their goals.

The Potential Minuses

These include the following. The person needs to ensure they are pursuing what they believe to be the most important goals in their life or work. They may also need to ensure they do this in a way that helps – rather than hurts – themselves or other people.

They often aim pursue their passion, follow their principles and achieve their daily picture of success. Sometimes this brings a sense of peace – if only for ten seconds – but it is a wonderful feeling.

Such people sometimes reflect on what they have achieved that day. They then turn their thoughts to what they want to do the next day. They focus on how they can continue to work towards their long-term goals.

This may sound like a never-ending cycle, but don't feel sorry for them. They love to feel alive and keep attacking each day. Such people then do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Attacking The Day Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

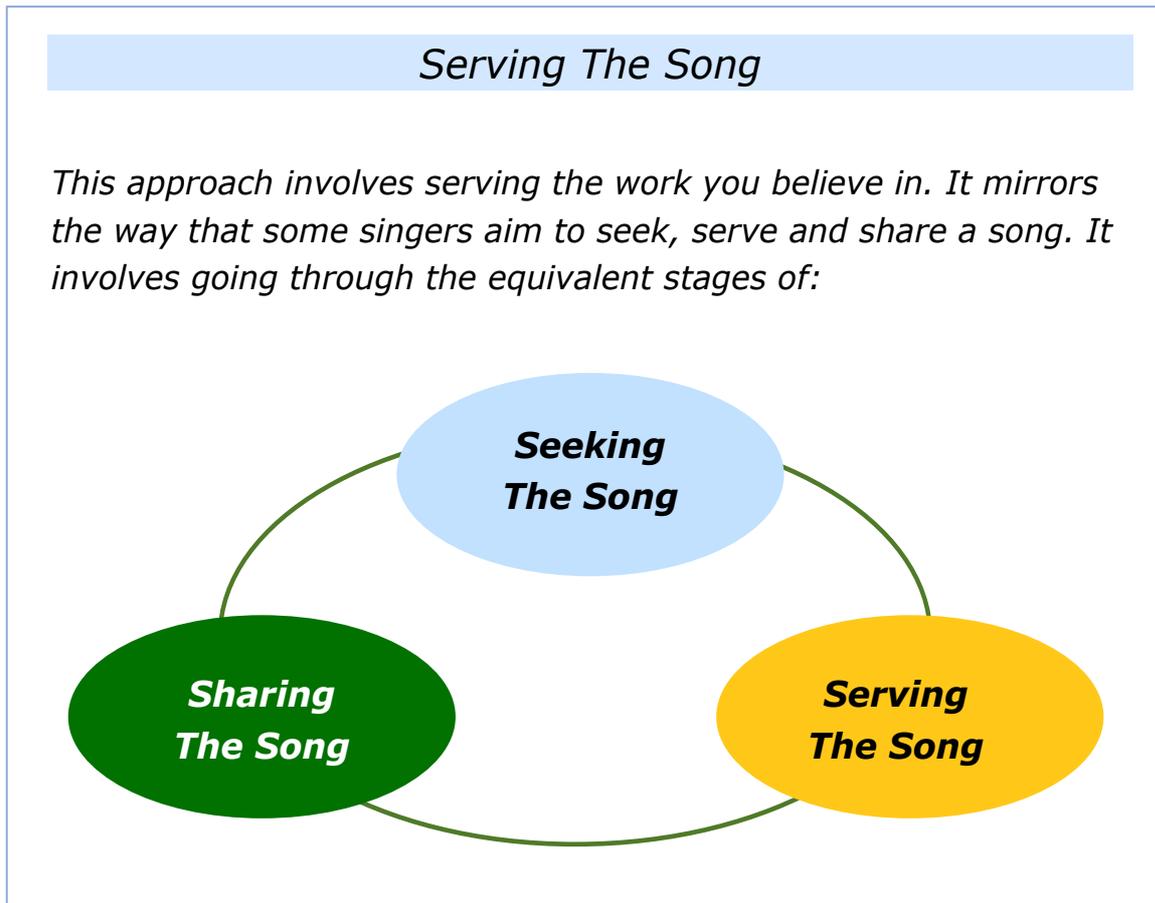

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Serving The Song Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. This approach mirrors the way that some singers aim to seek, serve and share the song. Let's explore these themes.

Seeking The Song

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. How can you find the work you want to do – the song you want to sing? Some people take the following steps.

They build on their strengths, do things that give them positive energy and explore ideas they find stimulating;

They find something they want to pursue – sometimes through serendipity - and translate this into setting a specific goal;

They perform superb work, find solutions to challenges and work to achieve their picture of success.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some songwriters, for example, get ideas from their tapping into their own feelings, watching people or working with other musicians. They then aim to translate these experiences into songs

Emilylou Harris wrote her own songs but also searched for other people's songs which had certain qualities. She aimed to find songs that resonated with her and may resonate with others. She said:

"Most of my career, I've been a finder of songs, a gatherer of songs."

Some people find their true work by absorbing themselves in things that give them positive energy. These adventures produce serendipity provides new pathways. Here is a summary of how one person explained the route they took.

The Paediatrician

I have always been good at passing exams because I have a photographic memory. But it wasn't until my early twenties that I discovered what I felt passionately about.

I took a year off to go travelling and eventually landed in the Greek islands. There I met many refugees and their children. This prompted me to go back to university and study to become a paediatrician.

There are, of course, many other ways to find your vocation – your calling – the song you want to sing. Imagine that you have done this in your own way. You may then move on to the next stage.

Serving The Song

Some singers talk about the importance of using their talents to serve the song. They aim to show respect for the song and bring it to life in a way that resonates with the audience.

Some people take a similar approach to doing the work they love. They aim to show respect to the craft, perform superb work and help other people to achieve success.

Let's return to the analogy of a singer serving the song. Several years ago I worked with a singer who wanted to feel at ease when performing live in front of audiences. She explained this in the following way.

"My career took off but then it stalled. I became preoccupied with being loved by everybody. It got to the point where I froze if I spotted a person in the audience who was not being appreciative.

"There is now an opportunity coming up, however, where I have the chance to sing live. I would love to take it, providing I can deal with my version of stage fright. I want to enjoy singing and also give people great experiences."

I invited the singer to recall her most satisfying performance. Looking back, she said her best performances came when she served the song. She described one particular experience when she sang one of her favourite songs.

"I rehearsed in my room and in my mind for many weeks. Then came the day of the performance. Getting to the theatre, I went through my usual rituals for centring, which included deep breathing.

"Moving from the dressing room, I snapped into action and strode onto the stage. Forgetting myself, I sank deeply into the music and aimed to serve the song.

"Before I knew it, the song was over and the audience gave rapturous applause. I am not exactly sure what happened, but people said it was the best performance I had ever given."

Looking deeper, we began to explore what she had done right on that occasion. We then looked at other times when she had given fine performances. Could we see any recurring patterns?

Eventually we began to clarify the key principles and how she could follow these in the future. Looking ahead, she felt it would be useful to pursue the following themes.

To play to my strengths when choosing a song ... To forget myself and serve the song ... To perform superbly and, when appropriate, to add something special.

We focused on the specific steps she could take to translate these principles into action. This resulted in her feeling more at ease when giving performances.

Some people focus on serving the work they believe in. They may then go through a process of absorption, adventure and, when appropriate, doing work that helps people to achieve success.

Sharing The Song

Singers love to share the song by performing for audiences and making records. One artist I worked with also loved teaching budding songwriters how to write hits.

Some workers also love to share the fruits of their labours. They may do this by passing on knowledge and practical tools that people can use to do similar work in their own ways.

Some share knowledge by taking apprentices or teaching classes. Some do it by acting as coaches, mentors or trusted advisors. They love to share frameworks that people can use to achieve their own pictures of success.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to do a piece of work where you may want to follow your equivalent of serving the song. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Serving The Song Approach

The specific piece of work I would like to do where I may want to follow my equivalent of serving the song is:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

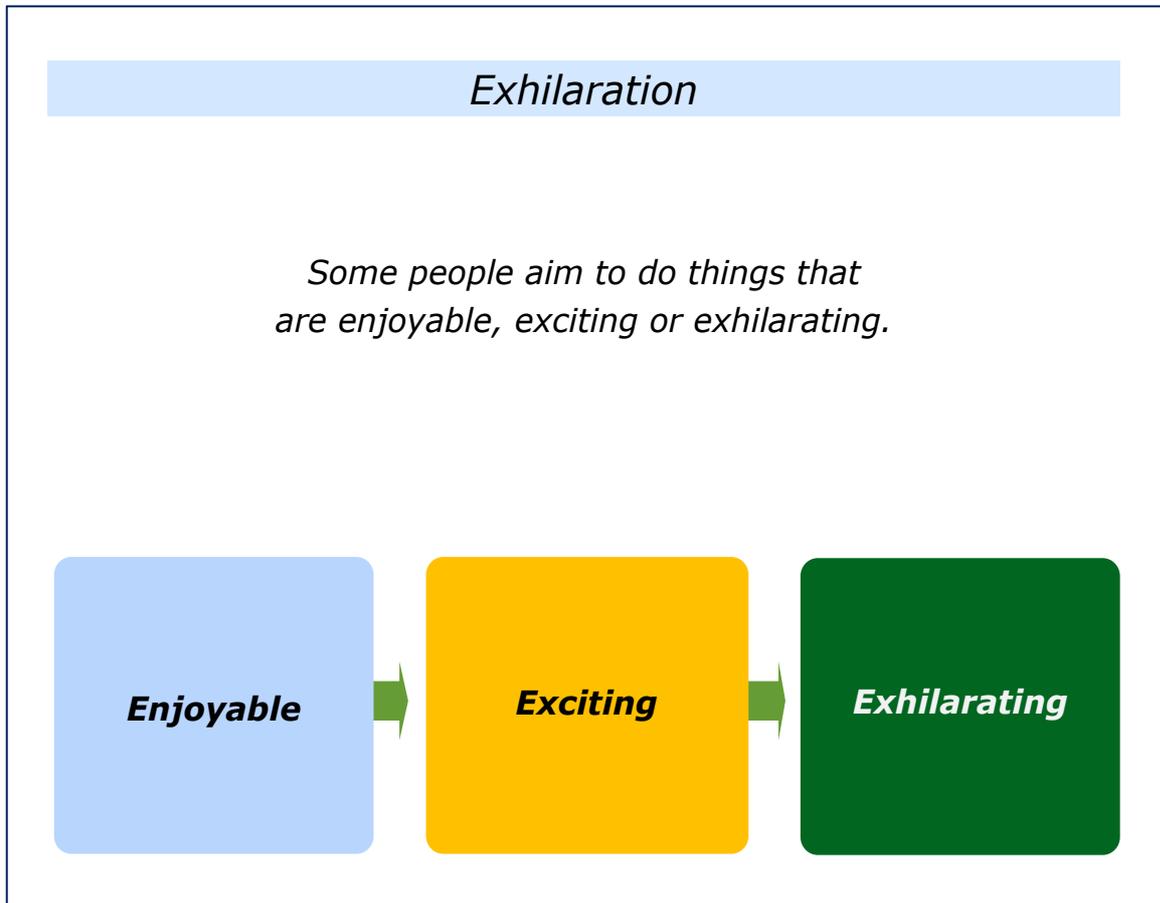

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Enjoyable, Exciting And Exhilarating Approach

There are many ways to feel alive. Some people aim to do things that are enjoyable, exciting or exhilarating. They aim to do these in a positive way, however, that helps themselves or other people.

Sometimes people find that doing these things can have a chain reaction. They start by doing things they enjoy. This can lead to a feeling of excitement and even exhilaration.

Sometimes people do things that lead to experiencing one or more of these states. This can be enough in itself. It can lead to joy, satisfaction and a feeling of contentment.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. Let's explore these themes.

Enjoyable

Different people enjoy different things. You may enjoy walking, listening to music or spending time with positive people. You may also enjoy learning, tackling certain challenges or doing other activities.

What are the things you enjoy doing? How can you do things that give joy to other people? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people – of doing these things?

Exciting

Some people like to do things where they experience excitement. They may excite their senses by exploring ideas, doing creative projects or getting an adrenaline kick.

You may feel excited when playing a sport, doing stimulating work or tackling certain kinds of challenges. You may also do so when finding solutions to problems or working to achieve compelling goals.

Exhilaration

Some people go into another dimension. Going beyond excitement, they experience exhilaration. They sometimes do this in ways that provide positive memories for life.

You may do this when following your principles and achieving peak performance. You may do it when seeing other people create something brilliant or beautiful. This may take your breath away and lead to a sense of exhilaration.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the enjoyable, exciting or exhilarating approach. How can you do this in your own way? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Enjoyable, Excitement And Exhilaration Approach

The specific things I can do to follow elements of this approach are:

*

The specific things I can do to translate these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

*The specific benefits of doing
these things will be:*

*

*

*

The Principles Approach To Shaping Your Professional Career

There are many ways to shape your future career. These include pursuing the following routes.

The Principles Approach

Some people follow their principles and aim to do positive work on the way towards shaping their professional career. The principles they follow may be eternal but the way they express these may evolve to deliver excellence in the changing world of work.

The Personal Strengths Approach

Some people build on their personal strengths – the specific activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. They aim to find sponsors – employers or customers – who want what they offer and then use their strengths to help these people to achieve success.

The Professional Skills Approach

Some people focus on the kinds of professional skills that employers may need now and in the future. They aim to add these skills to their repertoire – plus get the relevant qualifications - and apply these to keep shaping their career.

As mentioned earlier, there are many ways to shape your career. This piece focuses on the principles approach. Let's explore how this can be translated into action.

The Principles Approach In Action

Imagine the scene. A person is being interviewed for a specific role in an organisation. At some point the interviewer may aim to clarify the person's ambitions by asking some of the following questions.

"Where do you see yourself in five years? What is the role you would like to be in then? What are your career goals?"

Some individuals answer such questions by saying they would like to have gained promotion and be in a senior role. They may take this approach to show they are ambitious.

A person who follows the principles approach may answer such questions in a different way. They may say something along the following lines.

"As we know, the world of work is evolving, so it is hard to describe the actual job I will be doing.

"What I can say, however, is that it will be a role where I am following certain principles. For example, it will be a role where:

"I am working with a pacesetting company that is doing pioneering work in its field.

"I am leading a superb team that does great work that helps the company and its customers to achieve success.

"I am creating a positive environment that enables people to develop and, in some cases, move on to take more senior roles in the company.

"As I said, I am not sure what their actual role will be, but it will be embodying those principles that I have tried to follow in my professional life."

People who take this approach have clarified the principles they want to follow. They then aim to express these in doing positive work and, in the process, shape their professional career.

Such individuals aim to keep developing and are also good at reading reality. As mentioned earlier, they recognise that:

The principles they aim to follow may, for them, be eternal;

The ways they express these principles may evolve, however, as the world of work also evolves;

They may need to keep developing as professionals in order to deliver excellence.

People who take this approach believe in a certain kind of consistency. They involve them following consistent principles that come from within themselves.

They are committed to development, however, and are able to apply the principles in pragmatic ways. They take this approach to doing superb work and delivering positive results.

They recognise that the world of work is changing. There are fewer predictable career paths anymore, but there will always be projects. Bearing this in mind:

They focus on how they can follow their principles in their present work and help their stakeholders to achieve success;

They focus on how they could follow their principles in the future to help potential employers or customers to tackle challenges or achieve their goals;

They focus on how they can continue to express their principles in modern ways in order to deliver excellence and help people to achieve success.

Different people obviously follow different principles in their work. The principles I have tried to follow, for example, have been to help people:

To build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve their picture of success.

This is an approach I began following in the early 1970s when running five day courses on strengths coaching. Since then I have continued to follow these principles when working with individuals, teams and organisations.

You will have your own set of principles that you follow in your work. You may then express these in different ways when shaping your professional career. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things:

To describe the principles you aim to follow in your work;

To describe some of the ways you may aim to express these to do positive work;

To describe some the things you can do to keep following these principles and shape your professional career.

Here is the exercise on these themes. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Principles Approach To Shaping My Professional Career

The principles I aim to follow in my work are:

*

*

*

The ways I aim to express these principles to do positive work are:

*

*

*

The ways I can aim to follow these principles to shape my professional career are:

*

*

*

The A, B, C Approach To Shaping Your Future Career

Many people recognise that the world of work has changed. There are fewer predictable career paths but there will always be projects. Bearing this in mind, how can you continue to shape your future career?

Some people follow the A, B, C approach. This involves them aiming: a) to focus on their actual present role; b) to have several backup plans; c) to also explore other creative options.

Imagine you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can translate this into action.

Plan A – My Actual Present Role

The first step can be to focus on your present role. On a scale 0-10, how satisfied are you in it at the moment? Try to make sure it is at least 7+/10. How can you maintain or improve the rating?

Imagine that you are reasonably satisfied in your work. If appropriate, you then have a number of options. These can include the following:

You can continue to be super professional in your present role and, if appropriate, add more skills and qualifications to your repertoire;

You can expand the satisfying parts of the present role whilst also finding ways to make sure the other tasks get done;

You can explore how to combine these satisfying parts into creating a new role that contributes towards achieving the organisation's goals.

What if the satisfaction rating is less than 7/10? This can be a warning sign. There may be things you can do to improve your satisfaction but it may also be important to focus on the next theme.

Plan B – My Backup Plans

Security is to have an alternative, we are told, and this is especially true in today's world. This is the case even if your own and your employer's prospects seem good.

The advent of new technologies can make some jobs obsolete whilst global events can lead to recessions. Takeovers can also come out of the blue and lead to redundancies.

Bearing this in mind, it can be important to have several backup plans. There are various routes you can follow to explore this approach. Let's start with the obvious ones.

Imagine that you want to explore the possibilities of finding a satisfying role with another employer. There are several possible ways forwards.

You can look for suitable roles and apply for them directly

This approach can sometimes work but many experienced people find it can be time-consuming and challenging. It can also sap their confidence. Bearing this in mind, let's explore another option.

You can aim to find a role by focusing on your professional network

Many people get jobs through their network. This is because decision makers are more likely to hire people they know who can deliver certain results. There are several ways to find a role through your network. These can involve either:

You being hired by somebody you have worked with in the past;

You being recommended by such a person to somebody in their network.

There are several things to bear in mind when taking this route. Some of these sound counter intuitive but they can lay the ground for achieving success. The first one is this:

Real networking is about encouraging other people and helping them to succeed. It is not about self-promotion.

People who get work through their network have often spent a lot of time encouraging others. They do not suddenly send people an email asking for a job.

Bearing this in mind, the best time to give to your network is when you have a job. You can then aim to encourage people in your network by showing an interest in them and their aspirations.

One approach is to meet people or keep in touch via Zoom. It can then be useful to do some research before the session. This involves aiming:

To clarify what is happening in the other person's world;

To clarify any challenges they face or goals they want to achieve;

To clarify how you can pass on knowledge or practical tools to help them achieve success.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some meet face to face. Some send articles, materials or ideas that people may find interesting.

People who take this approach often find it rewarding to encourage others. Sometimes it can lead to conversations that produce future job possibilities. This can also overlap with the next step towards creating your backup planes.

You can communicate what you can deliver to help people, teams or organisations to achieve success

Imagine that you have got to a point where you aim to be more active in finding another role. Certainly you can follow the traditional job search approach.

Another approach is to explore possibilities through people in your network. Here are some ways to make this happen. You can aim:

To clarify your strengths;

To clarify the specific things you can deliver to help people, teams or organisations to achieve success;

To clarify how you can position what you offer in a way that could be attractive to potential employers.

The latter point is crucial. It is vital to focus on the potential employer's agenda. Some individuals make their application about them. They often list their skills and experience. Whilst this may be relevant, the key is to describe what you can deliver to help the employer to achieve success.

Let's explore how you can follow this approach when communicating with people in your network. Below is an example of the kind of email that some people may send when exploring new possibilities.

This is quite business-like in terms of describing what it is possible to deliver to a potential employer. But it is important for a person to tailor this approach in their own way.

A Professional Update

Dear ...

As you know, I have been working at ... some time. This has been enjoyable and also rewarding to work with excellent people.

Looking ahead, however, there will come a point when I begin exploring possibilities for moving on. The aim will be to work with an organisation that wants to continue to deliver excellence in its chosen field.

Much depends on the organisation's goals, of course, but here are some things that I could deliver for such an organisation. These include the following:

To build superb teams that coordinate their strengths and align their efforts to achieve the organisation's goals;

To enable people to perform excellent work, focus on continuous improvement and help the organisation to build a great reputation;

To maintain a positive culture in which people take responsibility, have high morale and help the organisation to achieve ongoing success.

There are lots of practical examples I can give about how to achieve these results. But the key would be to focus on helping the organisation to achieve its specific goals.

Looking ahead, let me know if you think there may be any people in your network who may be interested in having these things delivered for their organisation.

I would then be happy to have an informal conversation with them about how it would be possible to deliver these results.

As mentioned earlier, many jobs come via a person's network. When taking this approach, however, it is important to do so in a way that does not put pressure on people.

Let's return to your own approach to developing backup plans. Imagine that: a) you have actually got an interview for a specific role; b) you are now in a position where you may be able to take it. This can involve focusing on the next step.

You can prepare properly for an interview with a potential employer

There are many ways to prepare properly for an interview. Before doing so it is vital to do lots of research. This includes focusing on the specific role and exploring the following themes.

What are the organisation's goals? Looking at the role, what will be the results I will be required to deliver towards achieving these goals? Bearing in mind my strengths, to what extent will I find the role satisfying?

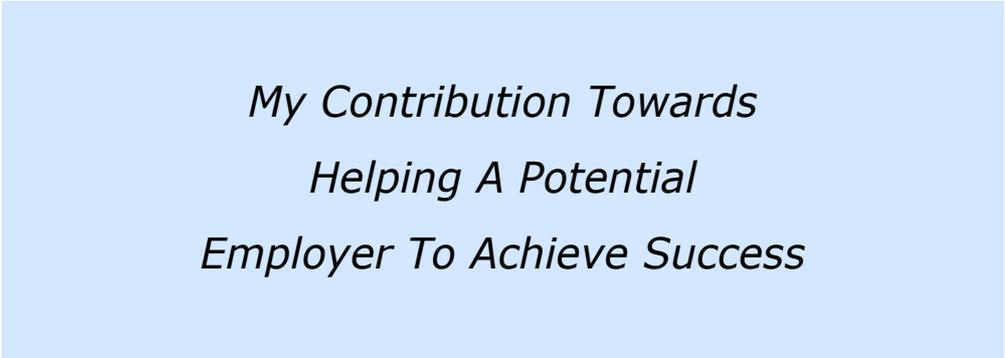

What is the organisation's culture? What may be the potential pluses and minuses of working in the culture? Who will be the stakeholders I need to satisfy? What is their style of leading, managing or working?

Looking at these things, do I want to go for the role? If so, what can I do to prepare properly for the interviews? How can I show that I want to make a positive contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals?

Imagine that you want to go for the role. As mentioned earlier, there are many ways to prepare for an interview. The following section describes one approach.

This involves working through a pack that invites you to clarify your contribution towards helping a potential employer to achieve success. The pack was created many years to help people who had been laid off when their company went into administration.

The key was to focus on how they wanted to help the potential employer to achieve success rather than to try to sell themselves. Many people found it useful and reported it gave them a head start when going for interviews. You will, however, adapt the pack in your own way.

*My Contribution Towards Helping A Potential
Employer To Achieve Success*

Introduction

Imagine that you are preparing for an interview for a specific role in an organisation. This pack describes one approach you can take to prepare for the session.

The pack invites you to focus on certain themes regarding the desired role. You can work through these but then adapt them in your own way during the interview. Here are the themes it can be useful to consider.

Success

Describe what you believe to be the goals – the picture of success – of the team or organisation you want to join.

This may be difficult, because you are not privy to lots of information. Bear in mind, however, that most employers want to improve their profits, products - including customer satisfaction - and people.

Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the organisation's goals and your strengths, describe the specific contribution you would like to make towards helping them to achieve success. Try to give some specific examples.

Specific Benefits

Describe the benefits of making this contribution. These can be benefits for the organisation, customers and colleagues.

Specific Updates

Describe the specific things you would do to proactively keep the key stakeholders informed about your progress towards achieving the goals.

Specific Early Successes

Describe the specific early successes you would aim to deliver. Getting some early wins will reassure the key stakeholders. It will also buy time for you to get on with doing superb work.

Summary

Summarise again what you would like to deliver to help the organisation to achieve success. Also describe any other themes you would like to explore with the potential employer.

The exercise will be challenging but it can help you to clarify your best contribution to a potential employer.

As mentioned earlier, however, it can be important to adapt these ideas in your own way during the interview. Here is the exercise.

Success

As far as I understand it, the goals of the organisation - together with some examples - are:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the organisation's goals, the specific contribution I would like to make towards achieving the picture of success would be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Specific Benefits

The benefits of making this contribution - for the organisation, customers, colleagues and other stakeholders - would be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

The Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering the results will be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Specific Early Successes

The specific early successes I would aim to deliver would be:

1) To ...

For example ...

2) To ...

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Summary

*In summary, this is what I would like to contribute towards achieving the picture of success.
Plus any other things I would like to mention.*

*

*

*

This section has explored how you can add to your backup plans for shaping your future career. It has mainly focused on the possibilities for finding another full-time role in an organisation. Let's look at other routes you may wish to consider.

Plan C – My Creative Options

Many people explored this approach during the Covid lockdowns. Much depended on their financial situation, but some pursued paths that led to them maintaining their wellbeing whilst doing satisfying work.

People do not need a crisis to find ways to shape their future careers but sometimes necessity is the mother invention. This can also create a sense of urgency.

The following section describe some ways that people pursue potentially creative options. These include doing projects, building their own business and changing their lifestyle. Let's explore how you may want to follow some of these in your own way.

The Projects Option

This is an option followed by many people who find it challenging to get a full time role. Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Bearing in mind your strengths, you can take the following steps.

You can clarify the specific things you can deliver to help people to achieve success

You may have specific skills in a particular field. You may be good at delivering certain results when implementing aspects of a people strategy, solving technical issues, improving customer service, building successful prototypes or doing other activities.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to do the following exercise. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Project Delivery

The Specific Things I Can Deliver When Doing A Specific Kind Of Project Are:

*

*

*

You can aim to find a project where you can help people, teams or organisation achieve success

The next step is to try to find a project. This may involve following similar steps to those outlined earlier regarding contacting people in your network. Many organisations have projects that are either behind schedule or not delivering the required results. If appropriate, you can find a way:

To ask people in your network if there are any projects that their people may need help to do or to complete;

To offer knowledge and practical tools that people can use to deliver the project successfully.

One approach is to offer these ideas in a generous way. You can then follow up with an email to outline the possible ways people can move forward to deliver the project. This approach sounds low key but it can sometimes result in a decision maker saying:

"How can we take this forward?"

You can make clear contracts and deliver the project successfully

Imagine that a decision maker has hired you to deliver a specific project. Clear contracting is crucial in many areas of life. This is especially so when it comes to providing professional services. Bearing this in mind, you can make clear contracts in the following areas:

The specific results to be delivered by the project – the picture of success;

The specific overall guidelines – such as any key Dos and Don'ts – to follow when working to deliver the results;

The specific responsibilities of various people – such as yourself and any other people – in working to deliver the project;

The specific support that will be provided to deliver the project;

The specific things you will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress being made towards delivering the picture of success.

Imagine you have made clear working contracts. You may then move into action, get some early successes and perform superb work. Keeping people informed about the progress being made, you can then do your best to deliver the desired results.

Let's assume that you have delivered the project successfully. This can sometimes lead to other possibilities – such as another project or piece of work – in the same organisation.

One approach is also to write up the project as a success story. It is then important to highlight the good work done by other people. You can also add it to your own portfolio to show what can be delivered for an organisation.

Some people enjoy the project approach. They may do one project full time for an organisation or do several different projects for different employers.

Whatever route they take, they know that every project ends. They therefore keep in touch with people in their network in to explore potential future projects. They believe in having several backup options for shaping their career.

The Building Your Own Business Option

Some people pursue the option of starting their own business. Different people do this in different ways. Here are some of the routes they may follow.

Some make building the business their main option. Bearing in mind their strengths, they see a gap in the market, focus on a specific niche and do their best to attract paying customers.

Some continue in their present work and pursue a side project that results in developing a business. They may then switch to this full time or hand over the management of it to other people.

Some build a business out of necessity. They may lose their job or experience other issues that mean they need to make money. They may then use their entrepreneurial skills to build a business.

Some build a business out of anger. They may get frustrated by working for an employer that continually refused to adopt one of their ideas or made their life difficult. They then decide to translate their idea into a business.

Some build a business as a result of serendipity. They may be talking with a customer or employer who has a particular need or challenge. This sparks an idea that the person turns into a business.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Writing in the Guardian, Rachel Healy described how Kate Jackson, a former midwife, built a business after the age of sixty. Here are excerpts from the article.

Kate Jackson

One sunny day in 2017, Kate Jackson, then 61, took a wooden wool-spinning wheel into her garden.

She propped her iPad against a brick, pressed record and started talking as she spun – about crafts, the countryside, her menagerie of animals (cats, chickens, bees and Eileen the goose).

Jackson enjoyed watching videos about gardening and quilting on YouTube, so one day she thought: how hard can it be? "I made a resolve to upload once a week."

She called her channel The Last Homely House "which is a place to feel comfortable, secure and welcomed. That's what I wanted my channel to be."

It now has 123,000 subscribers. Last May, Jackson – who lives in rural Northumberland – set up a sister channel, called The Last Homely Garden.

She has an online shop, nearly 40,000 Instagram followers, and even a fan-run Facebook group. She has become the linchpin of a thriving online community.

Thirteen years ago, after an unexpected divorce and with her three children adults, Jackson found herself living alone. "It was not a future I'd planned," she says. "I found it hard to reimagine myself."

She left her career as a midwife to focus on selling homemade crafts and teaching workshops, "but I was struggling financially".

By the time her village had decent broadband installed in 2017, she was ready to share her little world of artisan pastimes online. In Jackson's videos, she chats while cooking, sewing, sorting fabrics. Sometimes, she will film a tutorial – but it's always relaxed.

Most of her viewers are older American women, who adore this glimpse into English country life. But it's more than that.

"My daughter Martha said: 'You're a woman who lives on her own, rurally, and you're fine.'

The Last Homely House has become a family endeavour in other ways, though. Her children and their partners are all creative and get involved by doing bits of work on the channel.

They create illustrations, run the online shop, edit videos and photos, and sometimes appear on screen.

"Seeing how invested they are in what I'm doing has been an absolute joy," Jackson says. "It's a collaboration between the people I love most in my life."

Success also brings security: "I'm financially independent in a way that never seemed possible when I was down, wondering when I'd sell my next quilt."

The Changing Lifestyle Option

Some people pursue this option. They may do this either: a) by doing it in a proactive way and planning ahead; b) by doing it because they need to make changes in order to survive or thrive.

Some people have enough money to follow the changing lifestyle approach in a considered way. They may aim to move home, focus on their wellbeing and do satisfying work.

Some people may change their lifestyle because of more challenging circumstances. This may call for them building on their personal and professional assets – of which they may have more than they realise – and then finding ways to develop a sustainable lifestyle.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine you may want to follow elements of the A, B, C approach to shaping your future career. How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

The A, B, C Approach To Shaping My Future Career

The specific way in which I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to translate this way into action are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Move From Being A Shaper To Being A Supplier Approach

The Shaper And Supplier Approaches

A person may sometimes move between the following roles:

- Being A Shaper In An Organisation;
- Being A Supplier In An Organisation;
- Being A Shaper In Another Part Of Their Life Or Work.

A person may take different roles in their working life. Sometimes they may be a shaper in an organisation. They may take a strategic role and enjoy being able to influence the organisation's future.

Sometime they may find that their role changes in certain circumstances, however, and they are asked to become a supplier. They may still have some autonomy but their main role is to supply services to the centre.

This can happen if either of the following things happen: a) the organisation gets bigger; b) the organisation gets taken over; c) the organisation asks them to head a sub division

A person who was used to shaping things from the centre may find this challenging. Different people do different things in this kind of situation.

One approach is to redefine themselves as suppliers but also find ways to shape things in their life and work. Let's explore these themes.

Moving From Being A Shaper To Being A Supplier

One person I worked with described how they had moved between these roles. They expressed this in the following way.

"The organisation I work for is five years old. I was employee number six and we turned our hands to everything. We moved from setting the strategy to dealing with everyday problems.

"Those were exciting days. We invested heavily in the business and our efforts paid off. We made profits, grew to around eighty people and also expanded to other regions.

"The board then decided to bring in several senior people from bigger organisations. At first these moves were welcomed but then morale began to drop.

"The new C-Suite members put in processes that did not respect our strengths or deliver better results. Some of our best long-standing staff were also moved to less senior positions.

"I was asked to run a region far away from the centre and this looked good on paper. It would also give our children the chance to learn another language and appreciate other cultures.

"The first months went well but then it got frustrating. The centre said it valued my team's input but our suggestions were not acted upon. There became an increasing divide between the centre and the staff on the ground.

"We now have little control over the services and products we have to deliver. My family and I like living in this region, but I am considering my future. I want more satisfaction in my work."

The person and I explored the possible ways forward. They wanted more freedom to shape things. This would be difficult in their present business but there were other possibilities.

The first thing was to buy time. It was important: a) to maintain their present income stream; b) to continue to do good work in their present role; c) to explore the possible routes where they could shape things.

The person had an extensive network of people with whom they had worked in the past. Several of these had gone on to start new businesses that needed scaling.

Bearing this in mind, the person made their action plan. This involved taking the following steps.

They accepted that they and their team were now suppliers to their present organisation

Certainly they could make suggestions, but their main role was to do following things:

To make clear contracts about the specific outcomes the centre wanted the team to deliver in terms of profitability, product quality and people morale;

To provide great service to the centre and their customers – much of this depended, of course, on getting the support required to deliver the goods;

To maintain a positive atmosphere in their own team and enable people to continue to develop.

The person focused on how to make these things happen. Whilst acting as a supplier to the centre, they could do their best to shape the culture of their own part of the business.

They began acting as a trusted advisor to several people in their network

The person met with several CEO's in their network who were not competitors to their present employers. Before meeting these people, the person took the following steps. They aimed:

To understand the CEO's business, the challenges they faced and their aims for the future;

To clarify the knowledge they could pass on that could help the CEO's business to achieve their goals;

To meet with the CEO and pass on this knowledge in a way their business could use to achieve success.

The person's aim was simply to provide practical knowledge that the CEO's could use in their own ways. These conversations also led to more meetings and some of the CEO's saying:

"How can we take this further?"

They began acting as a mentor to new businesses at their regional incubator

The person knew several venture capitalists and also people who ran one of the region's incubators for new businesses. They began to act as a mentor for several businesses in the digital and AI spaces.

This proved to be stimulating and beneficial for all the parties. It also opened the door for the person to take future consultant work and non-executive roles.

Being A Shaper Again

The person's team continued to deliver good service to the centre and its customers. There were occasional blips caused by a lack of resources that stretched the team.

Some of these were rectified by presenting the business case to the centre. Instead of griping, it was vital to explain the benefits that would result from providing the right resources.

The person stayed with the organisation for a further three months but then moved on. One of the CEO's they met invited them to lead a new part of their business.

This proved liberating on several levels. The person enjoyed being able to shape things in their work. They took more care of their health and began exercising. They later explained how their family noticed the difference.

"My partner says I seem much happier. I had not realised that previously I sometimes looked preoccupied or even grumpy. It is good to feel more in control of my life and work."

As mentioned earlier, a person may take different roles in their life. They may sometimes be a shaper, sometimes a supplier. Whatever role they play, however, they like to feel they can shape their futures.

Let's return to your own situation. Can you think of how you can continue to shape parts of your life or work – even if some of this involves being a supplier? How can you translate these ideas into action?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following steps.

The Shaper Approach

The specific ways I can continue to shape parts of my life or work are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

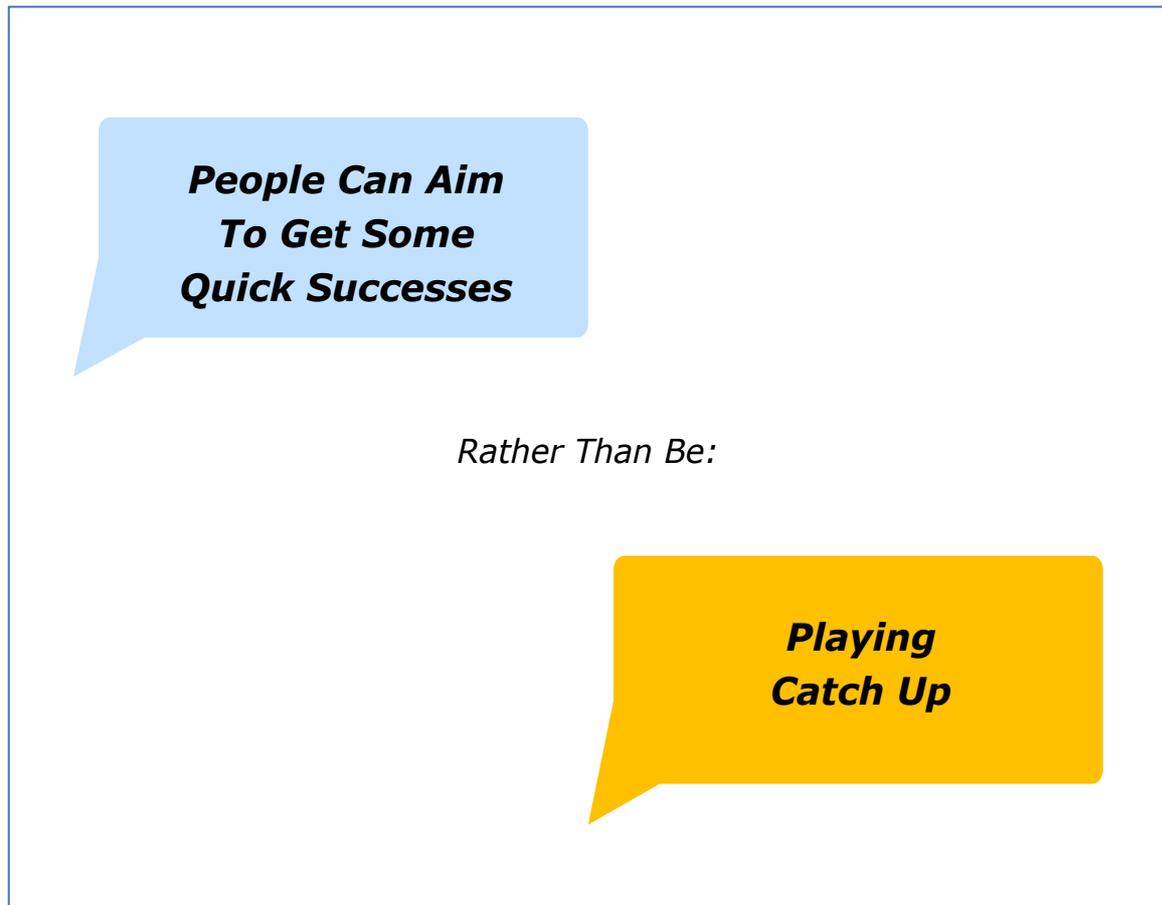

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Getting Quick Successes Rather Than Playing Catch Up Approach

Some people take this positive approach in their personal and professional lives. They aim to get some quick successes rather than be playing catch up. Different people do this in different ways.

A person may do something early in the day to get a quick success. They may count their blessings, encourage another person or do something to work towards their life goals. They then feel in charge of shaping their day.

A mentor will aim to make a mentee feel welcome. They will clarify what the person wants to explore and the results they want to achieve. They may then quickly offer a practical tool that the person can use to achieve their goals. This can provide the basis for a successful session.

A freelance worker may start their financial year by getting lots of work. Feeling more secure, they can then be selective about the other work they do during the year. They feel they are ahead of the game.

A leader who is taking over a team may set a positive tone by meeting with individuals. They may focus on the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. During the one-to-ones they may also encourage the individuals to share their ideas about:

The specific things they believe could be added to the picture of success;

The specific things they would like to do to build on their strengths and contribute towards achieving the picture of success;

The specific other topics they would like to explore during the session with the leader.

Such a leader may then build on the positive people and enable the team to get some quick successes. They will follow up maintaining the momentum towards achieving the picture of success.

A football team may aim to quickly take control of a game. They may attack, press the opposition, win back the ball and play the game in the other team's half. Such a team may also aim to get a quick success after scoring or conceding a goal. They will regain their rhythm and aim to dominate the match.

Looking ahead, how can you get some quick successes in your personal or professional life? How can you, when appropriate, encourage other people to get quick successes? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

You may aim to do these during a day, a week or another time frame. You may aim to do some in your role as a partner, parent, educator, coach, freelancer, employee, manager, leader or in another role.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

People Getting Quick Successes

The specific things I can do to get some quick successes in my personal or professional life are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to, when appropriate, encourage other people to get some quick successes are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Gut, Guidelines And Goals Approach

Many people are gut driven. They may make a decision in their gut about a person, a situation or a possible way forward. They then back-up this decision with selected logic.

Some people are good at making such decisions whilst others are not so good. Much depends on whether they have a track record of making good decisions based on their gut reactions.

Great workers sometimes follow this approach. They then follow certain guidelines to reach their goals. Let's explore this approach.

Gut

Imagine that your gut is telling you what to do in a situation. One approach may be to clarify the reasons why you are feeling this way. This may involve asking the following questions.

What is the information I am getting that means I feel this way? What may be a person saying or doing? What may be the patterns I am seeing in a situation? What may be the possibilities going forwards?

It can be useful to get examples that provide reasons for your feeling, intuition or thoughts. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I often get a strong feeling about something. But I need evidence to prove the feeling is right. This helps me to decide how I want to move forwards."

Imagine that you have found examples that back up your gut feeling. It can then be useful to focus on the next theme.

Guidelines

Great workers sometimes start by having a gut feeling. They then follow certain guidelines before moving into action. They may clarify the goals they want to achieve in the situation and go through the following steps.

They recall when they have tackled a similar challenge successfully and how they can follow these strategies in the present situation;

They explore many other options – and the consequences of each option – before setting on their chosen strategy for achieving the goals;

They mentally rehearse pursuing their chosen strategy and also managing any challenges on the way towards achieving the goals.

Gary Klein described a similar process in his books Sources of Power: How People Make Decisions and The Power of Intuition. He described how firefighters play different scenarios in their heads – almost like running films – in pressure situations.

The firefighters recall what worked when tackling similar fires in the past. They visualise follow similar principles to tackle the present fire – plus explore other ideas - and imagine what may or may not work. They then settle on their chosen strategy.

You will have your own approach to following your gut and checking the guidelines that may work in reality. This may lead to you focusing on the next theme.

Goals

Great workers move into action. They aim to follow their chosen guidelines and give their best when working towards achieving certain goals.

Such workers aim to perform superb work but also keep reading reality. They keep checking: a) the things that are going well; b) the things they can do better and how. They then implement these ideas to keep improving.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow your gut feeling? This could be in your personal or professional life. What may be the specific situation?

How can you clarify the reasons for your gut feeling? How can you gather evidence about what may be happening? How can you then follow your chosen guidelines for achieving your goals in the situation?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invite you to complete the following sentences.

The Gut, Guidelines And Goals Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Artistic, Beautiful And Creative Approach

People Can Sometimes Choose To Follow:

The Artistic, Beautiful And Creative Approach

Rather Than:

The Abstract, Boring And Complicated Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people try to make their work artistic, beautiful and creative. They take this approach rather than doing work that is abstract, boring and complicated.

They may aim to do this when running a workshop, writing an article, nurturing a garden, leading a team or doing another activity. They may aim to do it when working as a teacher, chef, architect or another role. Let's consider these themes.

Artistic

Some people use their artistic skills to show what it may be possible to achieve in life. They may aim to share a positive vision or show a picture of success.

Beautiful

Some people follow the principles of great design to make things beautiful. They aim to make things simple – in a profound way – satisfying and successful.

Creative

Some people use their imagination to find solutions to challenges. They may also do creative work that shows people a positive way forwards and enables them to achieve success.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to do things that are artistic, beautiful and creative. Taking this approach can help to lift people's spirit and shape a positive future.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements to this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life. How could you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Artistic, Beautiful And Creative Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Doing Your Best Whilst Also Dealing With Delights And Disappointments Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to do your best whilst also dealing with the delights and disappointments. It is then to do your best again. Let's explore these themes.

Doing Your Best

Different people aim to do their best in different ways. Some individuals have a framework they follow in certain situations. One person explained their approach in the following way.

"My first step is to buy time to think, see the big picture and clarify the possible options for going forwards. Bearing in mind what I can control in the situation, I then go through the following steps.

"First, to clarify the outcomes I want to achieve. Second, to clarify the strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success. Third, to then do my best to achieve the desired outcomes.

"Moving into action, I keep building on what is working and tackling areas for improvement. This often involves continuing to develop on the journey towards achieving the desired outcomes."

Imagine that you are doing your best in a certain situation. You may be doing a creative project, tackling a challenge or working to achieve a specific goal. Sometimes there may be delights, sometimes there may be disappointments. Let's explore these themes.

Delights

Different people see delights in different ways on the way to towards achieving their aims. Some individuals define the work they do as a delight. One person expressed this in the following way.

"For me it is a privilege to do work I love. I enjoy helping people and every day is a delight. Sometimes there are tough times. But even then I enjoy the challenge of helping people to achieve their goals."

Some people also enjoy learning from their successes. One person described how they kept something called My Development Book. They explained this in the following way.

"Looking back on the week, I start by focusing on the successes and try to clarify the learning. Looking at each success in turn, I describe the following things.

"First, the specific things that I or other people did well and how to build on these in the future. Second, the specific things that or other people could do better in the future."

Imagine that you are celebrating and learning from delights in your own way. Sometimes events may not always go to plan, however, which can lead to the next theme.

Disappointments

Great workers have a history of dealing with disappointments in a positive way. One mentor highlighted this when asked about the potential of a talented young person. They expressed this in the following way.

"The person you mention is talented and has been successful. But it is hard to assess their potential they have had a tough setback. The way they deal with such a setback will provide a good guide as to what they can achieve in their career."

There are many ways to manage disappointments. Some people dwell and do not move forwards. Some people find ways to manage their feelings and begin to develop. One approach is for them to become almost cerebral. Looking at the situation in a dispassionate way, they then explore the following questions.

"What actually happened in the situation? Who were the people involved and who did what? How did I or other people behave? What happened as a result of these actions?"

"What were the things I could have controlled in the situation? What were the things that were beyond my control? How could I have built on what I could control and do my best to manage the other things?"

"Looking ahead to potentially similar situations in the future, how can I apply the learning? Bearing in mind what I can control, how can I clarify the results to achieve? How can I then do my best to achieve these aims?"

Great workers then do their best again. They have a positive attitude and embark on their next venture. They then continue to manage the delights and disappointments.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Doing My Best Whilst Also Dealing With Delights And Disappointments

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Delighted, Driven And Dramatic Approaches

There are many ways to live life. The following section looks at three of the many different approaches that people may follow. Let's explore these themes.

The Delighted Approach

People who follow the delighted approach often appreciate life. They take responsibility, count their blessings and aim to enjoy each day. They may also encourage other people in their daily lives and work.

Such individuals may be positive realists rather than wide-eyed optimists. They see possibilities but are also good at reading reality. They recognise warning signs and choose not to become victims.

They may also develop resilience by coming through tough times. These experiences help them to focus on what is important in life. They therefore aim to make good use of their time on the planet.

People who follow this approach may experience both pluses and minuses. The pluses can include the following. They choose to have a positive attitude, have a sense of gratitude, enjoy being in the present and encourage other people.

The minuses can include the following. They need to keep reading reality to watch for warning signs and, on occasions, may find that some people try to take advantage of their generosity.

The Driven Approach

Different people follow the driven approach for different reasons. They may be driven to care for their loved ones, follow a spiritual faith, follow a vocation, pursue a mission or aim to achieve their picture of success.

Such people often feel obsessed. They wake up in the morning and focus on: a) what they believe in doing; b) how they can do something towards it that day; c) how they can set achievable goals and get a sense of satisfaction.

People who follow this approach are often disciplined and map out the route they can follow to achieve their goal. One approach is for them:

To clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

To clarify the structure they can follow when pursuing these strategies – such as how to organise their schedule and resources;

To clarify the daily disciplines they can follow to achieve the goal and then translate these into a clear action plan.

Such people then follow these disciplines. Sometimes they do this without thinking. They simply click into action, follow good habits and aim to get positive results.

Sometimes they need to take time to reflect, however, to make sure they are still on track. They may then need to do some course correction in order to reach their destination.

People who follow this approach may experience both pluses and minuses. The pluses can include the following. They enjoy having a sense of purpose, following a daily routine, achieving daily goals and working towards something that will give them satisfaction.

The minuses can include the following. They may sometimes behave in an unhealthy way or ignore the needs of other people. They also need to make sure they are working towards achieving the right goals – otherwise they might be climbing the wrong mountain.

The Dramatic Approach

People who follow the dramatic approach love to feel alive. They often follow their passions, do stimulating activities and enjoy the drama that comes with these experiences.

Such people do not like to feel numb. They avoid this by throwing themselves into activities which may have positive or negative consequences. They prefer having dramatic emotions rather than feeling bored.

Some people follow this approach in a positive way. They feel joy when doing creative projects, tackling certain challenges or achieving a sense of fulfilment. They may also behave in a way that inspires other people.

Some people follow the dramatic approach by doing things that create collateral damage. They may get their kicks from being the centre of attention, creating conflicts or hurting other people.

Some individuals may have a series of relationships that involve drama and extreme emotions. They may choose partners who have addictions, for example, and this can lead to having dysfunctional and dramatic relationships.

People who follow the dramatic approach may experience both pluses and minuses. The pluses can include the following. They may feel alive, gather many experiences, create positive memories for life, keep developing and achieve peak performances.

The minuses can include the following. They may experience bipolar emotions - veering from highs to lows. They find it difficult to be selective because they want to do everything. Some people may also behave in destructive ways and hurt other people.

Some individuals may combine elements of the delighted, disciplined and dramatic approaches. If so, it can be helpful for them to learn how to manage the pluses and minuses of each route.

One common combination is for a person to follow the delighted and driven approaches. They may aim to make life as pleasurable and predictable as possible. They may also aim to find ways to deal with any dramas on the way towards reaching their destination.

Let's return to your own life and work. What may be the approach - or the combination of approaches - that you tend to follow? What are the pluses and minuses of this approach? How can you build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Delighted, Driven And Dramatic Approaches

The specific approach – or the combination of approaches – that I tend to follow is:

*

The pluses and minuses of following this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and manage the consequences of the minuses are:

*

*

*

The Pausing, Preparing And Performing Superbly Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to go through the stages of pausing, preparing and then performing superbly. Let's explore these themes.

Pausing

This stage involves relaxing and gathering one's thoughts before beginning to refocus. Different people do this in different ways and much depends on the work they are doing.

Some people pause for a long time. They may do this after completing a piece of work. They may need time to rest and reflect before beginning to explore new ideas. They may then focus on their next project.

Some people pause before what may be considered a short time. A footballer about to take a penalty, for example, may follow their own ritual for calming down before taking the next step.

Preparing

This stage involves preparing properly and rehearsing before doing a piece of work. Different people do this in different ways to set things up to succeed.

Some people do lots of due diligence before taking a role, embarking on a project or doing a job. They gather information, clarify the goals to achieve and rate the chances of success.

They clarify strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They then rehearse following these strategies – including managing potential challenges - until they are satisfied with their plan.

Some people may take a long time to take these steps. Some may do it in a short time – even a matter of seconds. They may then briefly pause again before moving on to the next stage.

Performing Superbly

This involves moving into action and doing superb work. Different people do this in different ways. This may depend on their personality type and preferred way of working.

Some people who are introverts, for example, feel comfortable in their own company. They may also feel comfortable, however, about moving into a professional role. They may do this as an actor, athlete, specialist, trusted advisor or when doing another activity.

They then move into a situation where they know: a) the results to achieve; b) the rules to follow; c) the role they can play to rewarding work and deliver results. They do the work and may then revert back to spending time in their own company.

Some people have personalities where they simply enjoy being on stage or going into their version of the arena. They may then click into action, be fully present and do superb work.

Such individuals may also use all the senses to keep reading what is happening. They then aim: a) to build on what is working and do it more; b) to apply their repertoire of skills to find solutions to challenges. They then do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may go through the stages of pausing, preparing and then performing superbly? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Pausing, Preparing And Performing Superbly Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Solidity, Sparkle And Success Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to build on their strengths and set specific goals. It is to then do the solid work and add the sparkle on the way to achieving success.

People may take these steps in their daily work, the arts, sports, medicine, sports, business or other fields. They may do so when working as individuals, in a team or in an organisation.

Looking back, when have you followed this approach in your own way? You may have been helping a person, doing a project, leading a team, contributing to an organisation or doing another activity.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Solidity, Sparkle And Success In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I followed elements of this approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as result to taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Great workers often embody these elements. Their colleagues and customers may say some of the following things about the such a person delivers high professional standards.

"They are always positive and professional ... They can always be relied upon ... They provide great service ... They sometimes produce that touch of magic ... They use their strengths to help others to succeed."

Great teams often combine solidity and sparkle. They get the right balance between consistency and creativity. They follow their strategy, maintain high standards and sometimes do something special to deliver success. One soccer coach explained this in the following way.

"My teams are built on solid foundations. The goalkeeper, defenders and defensive midfielder are strong characters who deliver consistent performances. They provide the platform for the team."

"The attacking players must also play their parts in making sure the system works. Then, when necessary, they can add that touch of magic when it matters."

"My teams have the right combination of warriors and warriors who are also wizards. I have no time for wannabe-wizards who are not prepared to work hard and contribute to the game plan."

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the solidity, sparkle and success approach?

You may want to do this when encouraging a person, writing an article, running a workshop or doing a project. You may want to do so when organising an event, leading a team or doing another activity.

How can you do the solid work? How can you, if appropriate, add the sparkle? How can you do your best to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Solidity, Sparkle And Success In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Doing What Comes Naturally Approach

There are many ways to do superb work. One approach is to focus on a specific activity where things come naturally. It is then to develop and deliver superb work when doing this activity. Let's explore these steps.

You Can Do What Comes Naturally

When are the things that come naturally to you? What are those were you make complicated things look things simple? The Gallup Organization used to ask individuals a question when exploring their strengths. This was:

"What are the things you cannot help but do?"

What are the activities where this happens for you? Looking at these activities, where you do fine work and deliver the goods?

You may find this happens when gardening, cooking, counselling, playing a sport, writing technical articles, organising events or doing other activities. One leader explained their approach in the following way.

"I am fascinated by how to help people to succeed. During my teenage years I devoured books about sports people and inspiring leaders. Then I switched to studying great teams.

"Nowadays I try to create environments that encourage people to do their best. The theme is the same whether I am in my role as a business leader, providing people with training or, hopefully, nurturing my family.

"I want to be a positive models and help to create culture that enable people to succeed."

Imagine that you have identified the specific activity where things come naturally. If appropriate, you may want to take the next step.

You Can Develop What Comes Naturally

During my early career I spent time with great educators. Some said that many people had talents but did not make full use of these gifts. There were various reasons why this happened.

Some people found it hard to overcome setbacks. They were used to being the first pick in sports, singing auditions or other activities. They were not prepared to be second pick or sweat to achieve success.

Some fell for temptations and became addicted to diversions. There were occasions when they showed glimpses of brilliance but then they fell back into unhelpful patterns.

Some people do focus on developing their talents. Being gifted in a certain activity, they find it relatively simple to get to 7/10. They are then prepared to make the exponential climb towards 10/10.

How can you develop your talent? How can you add positive models and practical tools to your repertoire? How can you apply this knowledge in your chosen activity?

How can you continue to learn? How can you embody the ethic of continuous improvement? How can you build on what you do well? How can you tackle areas for improvement?

You Can Deliver What Comes Naturally

People who do what comes naturally often merge with the work. They see it as a vocation. And you never retire from your vocation.

Bearing this in mind, however, they set aside blocks of time to do what they do best. They then go through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement. They aim to do deep work and deliver the goods.

Different people follow these steps in different activities. They may be working as a counsellor, educator, architect, athlete, medic, scientist or in another field. They may be working as an individual contributor, team member, coordinator, leader or in another role

How can you follow some of these principles in your own way? What is the activity where things come naturally? How can you translate this into doing a specific project or achieving a stimulating goal?

How can you set aside time to do it properly? How can you move into action? How can you absorb yourself fully? How can you do superb work? How can you do your best to deliver the goods?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Doing What Come Naturally

The specific activity where things come naturally for me is:

*

The specific things I can do to develop this activity and deliver superb work are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Photographic Memory Approach

The Photographic Memory Approach

Great workers often have the equivalent of a photographic memory in the areas in which they excel. They experience situations through their senses and may do the following things.

- They may see things in great detail;
- They may feel things in great detail;
- They may use other senses to experience things in great detail.

Great workers often have the equivalent of the photographic memory. They are able to recall every detail of doing work in the activity where they excel.

Every individual is different, however, so some may not see pictures. Some may feel, listen, smell, taste or use other senses to understand situations. They then apply this knowledge to do superb work.

The golf champion remembers the exact lie of the ball in a tournament ... The dancer uses their muscle memory to follow steps they last performed 20 years ago ... The chef use their senses to imagine the taste of the new dish they are preparing.

Some people recall what they learned from a previous situation. They build on what worked and apply what they could have done better. They then use this knowledge to achieve success.

Some see the present situation from many angles. They hover above it, go around it and consider it from different angles to get the whole view. They then use this information to pursue their chosen strategy.

Some imagine situations in the future. Depending on their lead senses they may see, feel, hear, taste or do other things to clarify how to create the successful experience. They then aim to make this happen.

One person described how doing an exercise on this theme led to them changing how they worked with people. They explained this in the following way.

"This exercise changed my career. For years I had made a living facilitating workshops but then I began doing individual follow-up sessions with people.

"Suddenly I discovered that I had total recall about what happened in the one-to-one meetings. I remembered every detail about the individuals.

"Meeting them later, I recalled their personal background, experiences, talents, challenges, everything they said in the session. So I concentrated on doing more one-to-one coaching. This became my new career."

What are the specific activities where you have the equivalent of the photographic approach? You may do this when counselling people, teaching a class, managing crises, scaling a mountain, leading teams or doing another activity.

How can you put yourself into more of these situations? How can you then aim to do superb work? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Photographic Memory Approach

The specific activity where I may have the equivalent of a photographic memory may be:

*

The specific things I can do to put myself into these situations and aim to do superb work are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Drive, Detail And Delivery Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the specific activities where you score highly on drive, detail and delivery. Let's explore where you may take these steps.

Drive

Great workers have a strong drive to do a particular activity. They often focus on the specific activities which - as the Gallup Organization puts it - they cannot help but do.

Such workers may follow this drive to do counselling sessions, educate students, renovate houses or solve technical problems. They follow it to do creative projects, lead teams, pass on knowledge or do another kind of work.

What is the specific activity that you have a strong desire to do? What are the reasons why you want to do this activity? What may be the benefits of doing it – both for yourself and other people?

Drive is something that often starts in your gut. It provides the engine and energy for what you want to do. But it is important to consider a key aspect when talking about drive.

Great workers may be driven to apply their strengths in different ways at different stages of their careers. They may continue to follow their vocation – their calling – but express this through different vehicles on the way towards doing valuable work.

One person described this feeling after being offered the chance of being promoted in a company. They expressed this in the following way.

"My company recently offered me the chance to become Chief Operating Officer in the business. This would involve doing the following things.

"First, to stay close to the CEO, translate their chosen strategies into action and, when appropriate, help them to make their best contribution to the business.

"Second, to build an operations team that helped the heads of department to implement the strategies by providing practical support and ensuring they were able to deliver success

"Third, to make sure I created enough free space to be able to manage any unexpected events, crises or other issues that may arise in the future.

"The COO role is one that I would have felt excited about in the past. But it one that I have done several times during the last ten years. It would lead to an increase in salary but my drive to do it is only 5/10.

"My plan is to take up an offer from another company that want to build a prototype that will help them to achieve future success. My drive rating for that is 8+/10."

Imagine that you are focusing on a specific activity where you score highly on drive. Make sure it is at least 8+/10. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Detail

Great workers seem to balance paradoxes in the specific activity where they excel. They have the ability to both helicopter above the situation yet also be hands on. They are able:

To focus on the key strategies for achieving success;

To focus on the specific details of these strategies for achieving success.

Great workers often take this approach when doing individual work. They may do so when working as artists, writers, therapists, mentors, trusted advisors or in other professions.

Such workers then combine the roles of being architects, builders and craftsmen. They are able to focus on the big picture but also pay attention to the small details.

Great leaders, however, sometimes choose to stay at the high level. They may aim: a) to communicate the key strategies; b) to have coordinators who implement the strategies; c) to have individual contributors who focus on the detail.

Such leaders manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. At the same time, they keep scanning situations and picking up on the details. They then communicate this information in a way that helps the team to achieve success.

Let's return to the specific activity where you score highly on drive. Looking at this activity, how highly would you rate your attention to detail? Make sure it is at least 8+/10.

Imagine that you have scored highly on both drive and detail. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Delivery

Great workers deliver the goods. They aim to apply their strengths, follow their strategies and do superb work. They do their best to find solutions to challenges and achieve the desired picture of success.

Imagine that you have focused on a specific activity where you score highly on drive and detail. Looking back, when have you delivered the goods in this activity?

What do you believe is your successful pattern for completing work? What are the principles you follow? How do you aim to be positively engaged, perform superb work and finish properly? What do you do right to sometimes deliver peak performances?

Looking at the specific activity you want to pursue, how high would you rate your ability to deliver the goods? Make sure it is at least 8+/10. What can you do to maintain or improve the rating?

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the specific activity where you score highly on drive, detail and delivery. It is then to do your best to perform superb work.

Imagine that you want to focus on such an activity. How can you continue to superb work and develop in this area? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Drive, Detail And Delivery Approach

The specific activity where I score highly on drive, detail and delivery is:

*

The specific things I can do to continue to do superb work and develop in this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Fertile Ground, Fallow Ground And Frozen Ground Approaches

People Can Choose Where They May Aim To Share Ideas

They may focus on either of the following kinds of ground.

Fertile Ground

Fallow Ground

Frozen Ground

Many people want to help others succeed. Sometimes this may involve passing on knowledge that people can use in their own ways to achieve their goals.

Imagine that a person has ideas, models or practical tools that work. It may be important for them to know where to plant these seeds.

They can identify the potential fertile ground. These may be the kinds of people, places and cultures that are more likely to be open to such ideas. It can be useful for them the focus on these areas.

The person may also find it useful to identify the fallow ground. This may include people who are not necessarily looking for new directions but they may be open to things that spark their interest.

The person may need to avoid the frozen ground. These are places where people have rigid beliefs and are not necessarily open to other ideas.

Imagine that you want to pass on knowledge. Let's explore how you can identify the various kinds of ground.

The Fertile Ground

Looking around, where might be the most fertile ground for passing on your knowledge? Here are some questions it can be useful to explore when considering this theme.

Who are the kinds of people with whom you work best? What are the personality characteristics of these people? What are the reasons why they may be open to what you offer?

What are the kinds of work places – cultures and environments – that may be open to what you offer? What are the characteristics of these places? How can what you provide help these people to achieve success?

Imagine that you have something of value to offer. The reality is that some people – some target groups or audiences – will be more open to such ideas than other groups.

This rule holds true whether you are working as a counsellor, therapist, singer, artist, sports coach or in some other role. You may find it useful to focus on the most fertile ground.

Looking at my own work, I have tended to focus on working with positive achievers. Such people have a positive attitude but also want to achieve certain results.

This has often involved working with pioneers in education, business, sports and other fields. Such people have also sometimes been pacesetters or peak performers.

This is an approach that I have also taken when running therapy sessions or working with challenging organisations. The aim has been to appeal to the positive achiever parts of individuals, teams or organisations.

Later we will focus on your chosen fertile ground. Before then, however, let's look at another possibility.

The Fallow Ground

The fallow ground is an option that is sometimes worth exploring. These are situations where people may be resting or are relatively happy with their present lives or work.

Such people may not necessarily be looking for new ideas or directions. They may have their interest piqued, however, by stimulating things that show them how they can achieve success.

Imagine that you want to offer knowledge to such people. It can be important: a) to share ideas in a way that respects people and may help them to achieve their goals; b) to not try to sell anything to them.

Sometimes you may find it surprising when offering knowledge to such people. Some may find that it resonates with them and what they want to do in the future. Sometimes the seeds you plant begin to grow.

Let's move on to another area that you may consider but much will depend on your approach to this option.

The Frozen Ground

Everybody is different. People like different kinds of foods, music, art and other things. They may also have different mind sets. Some may not be open to the ideas you want to offer. So, for you, this may be the equivalent of frozen ground.

Some individuals decide they want to target these groups. They deliberately aim to reach others who are sceptical or have rigid opinions. They aim to open their minds to other ideas and possibilities.

There are many views about how to relate to sceptics. One view is that people will only change their thinking if they see how doing so will bring them more benefits.

Some individuals therefore try to show others the benefits of changing their lifestyle, company culture or behaviour. This may work, but the odds are not in favour of the recipients of the messages actually changing.

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the kinds of ideas, models and tools you would like to pass on to people? Where do you believe would be the most fertile ground?

What are the kinds of people or places that would be most open to these ideas? How can you reach these in a way that fits your values system? How can you pass on knowledge in a way that helps them to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Fertile Ground

The specific kinds of knowledge that I would like to share with people are:

*

*

*

The specific kinds of people and places that may be open to this knowledge are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to pass on knowledge to people in this fertile ground are:

*

*

*

The Enjoying The Journey Approach

Enjoying The Journey

There are many ways to live life. One approach is aim to enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goals.

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to aim to enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goals.

This can be relatively easy when doing positive activities. Sometimes it can be more difficult when doing things that are less positive. Let's explore these themes.

Some people aim to enjoy the journey when doing positive activities

Different people do this when doing different things. They may enjoy the journey when:

Encouraging other people ... Nurturing their garden ... Writing articles ... Developing certain skills ... Organising events ... Solving technical problems ... Making things work ... Passing on knowledge to people.

What are the positive activities where you enjoy the journey? What may be the reasons why you enjoy these activities? What are the things that give you satisfaction?

You may be following a passion. You may enjoy adding to your knowledge and applying it to a real issue. You may be getting a sense of satisfaction from achieving positive results.

Different people do different things to encourage themselves when enjoying the journey. They may aim to:

Set an achievable goal ... Organise their time in blocks so they can do deep work ... Rehearse what they are going to do ... Move into action ... Do intense work ... Give themselves breaks along the way ... Keep going until they have reached their achievable goal.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a positive activity you would like to do? How can you enjoy the journey when doing this activity? What may be the benefits of taking those steps?

As mentioned earlier, it can be relatively easy to take this approach when doing activities you love. It can be harder in other situations. Let's consider this theme.

Some people aim to try to enjoy the journey when doing less positive activities

A person may take this approach when managing potentially challenging situations. They may be:

Having a course of medical treatment ... Dealing with depression ... Recovering from an injury ... Helping a loved one who is experiencing difficulties ... Working in a boring job ... Having to give people bad news ... Taking tough decisions to turnaround a company.

Different people encourage themselves – and other people – in different ways when taking such journeys. Let's explore some of these approaches.

Some people take the enjoyment approach. They aim to do things they enjoy, give themselves treats or do activities that give them positive energy. This helps to maintain their strength on the journey.

Some people focus on the things that give them hope. Looking at my own life, this is something I did when working in a factory for six years. I kept focusing on the things I wanted to do in the future. This helped to maintain my spirits.

Some people take the encouragement approach. They aim to do things that encourage themselves and, when appropriate, encourage other people. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I kept focusing on the benefits of the medical treatment – which was to prolong my life. I also aimed to encourage the medical staff. This helped me to stay positive on the journey."

Some people take the excellence approach. They see the challenging experience as a chance to deliver excellence. This is an approach taken by bomb disposal technicians, mountain rescue teams and others who do hazardous work. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I am quite cerebral in my work. Bearing in mind the challenge, I drain myself of emotion and redefine it as a task to be done. I rehearse it time and again in my mind to minimise the risk. I then go ahead and do my best to deliver the goods."

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to enjoy the journey? This could be when doing a project, tackling a challenge or working towards a goal. How can you aim to enjoy the journey in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following steps.

The Enjoying The Journey Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

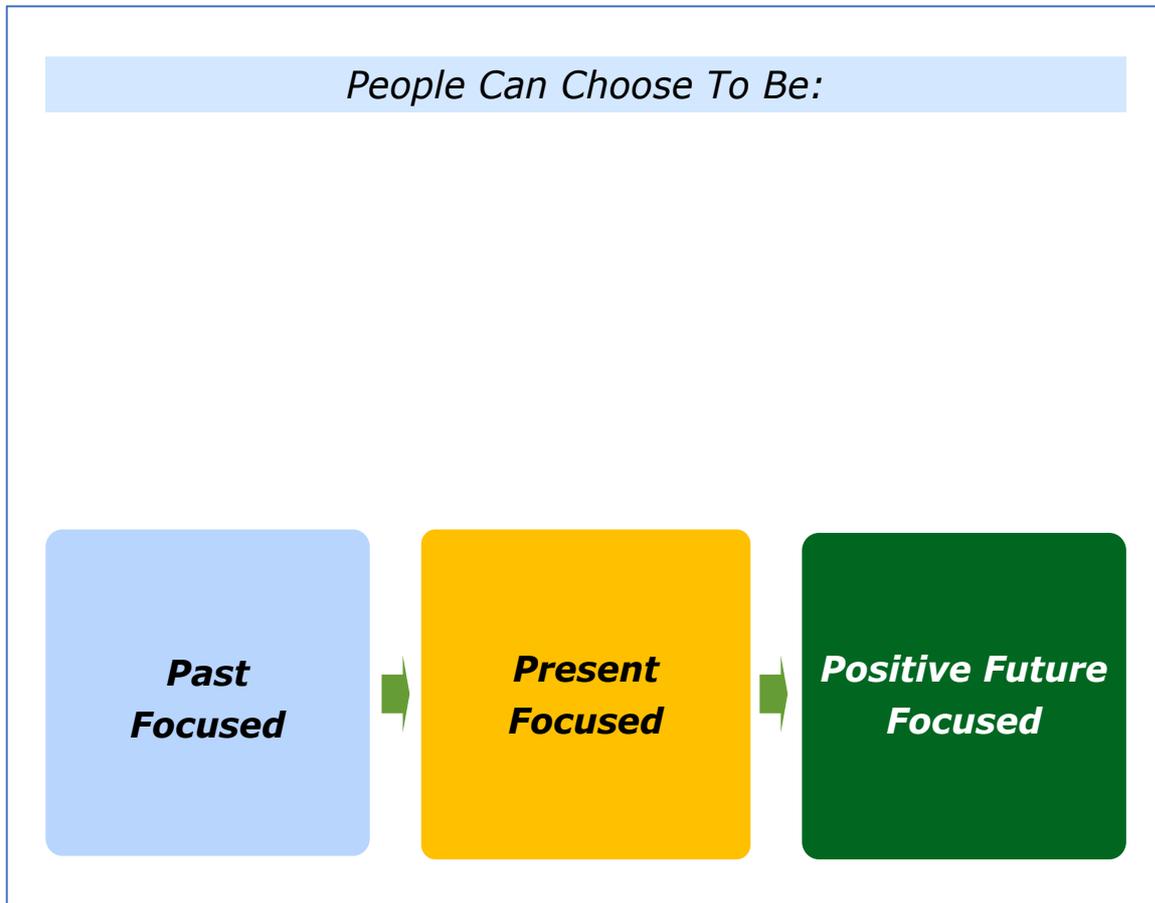

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Past Focused, Present Focused And Positive Future Focused Approaches

People can choose what they focus on when dealing with events in their lives. They may choose to be past focused, present focused or positive future focused.

The approach that people take can sometimes influence the way they communicate with others. Let's look at one example where people who have different focuses when responding to a challenge.

A person who is past focused may want to go over past events that have led to the challenge. This can be useful to make sure certain things do not happen again. But it can also lead to paralysis by analysis.

A person who is present focused may want to explore how they feel and think at the moment. This can provide a platform for shaping the future but it can also lead to a person going round in circles.

A person who is positive future focused will want to move onto the possible solutions to a challenge. They want to channel their energy into how things can be better in the future. They may say things like:

"How can we solve it? What are the goals we want to achieve? What is the picture of success?"

Each person may have positive intentions but are focusing on the challenge from different angles. This is neither good nor bad – but it can lead to difficulties in communication. Let's explore the different focuses that people may have in life.

The Past Focused Approach

People who take this approach are often quite thoughtful. They like to understand the context and why certain things have happened. They may then feel more able to move on to shaping the future.

There are pluses to this approach. Such a person may find it useful:

To understand the events that have led: a) to certain things happening, or; b) to them experiencing certain feelings;

To analyse why things may not be working well in a situation or in a relationship;

To, if they have a positive frame of mind, focus on the past to recognise their successful patterns and then follow these principles in the future.

There are also potential minuses to this approach. These include the following. Such a person may find that they tend:

To focus on diagnosis rather than cure and not move forward until they understand the past and can make guaranteed plans for the future;

To, if they have a negative approach, focus on regrets or what they see as failures in the past;

To, sometimes in relationships, fall into criticising others and blaming them for certain things in the past.

The Present Focused Approach

People who take this approach often live in the moment. They may immerse themselves in experiences and feel fully alive. They may also experience extreme highs and lows.

There are pluses to this approach. Such a person may find that they are able:

To be fully present and enjoy experiences – such as food, music, nature, companionship and other events;

To apply their heart and head when doing an activity – such as a piece of work - and sometimes go into a state of flow;

To enjoy extreme positive emotions that can create wonderful memories for life;

There are also potential minuses to this approach. These include the following. Such a person may find that they tend:

To be open to negative influences – such as being depressed by events, difficult people or their own emotional swings;

To be so wrapped in their own feelings that they may not be aware of the consequences of their behaviour on other people;

To take themselves and their feelings too seriously and not be able to see things in perspective.

The Positive Future Focused Approach

People who take this approach are often upbeat and action oriented. They are quick to recognise what is happening in a situation and want to move towards shaping a positive future.

There are potential pluses to this approach. Such a person may find they are able:

To maintain a positive attitude and, when appropriate, encourage both themselves and other people;

To keep focusing on the principles they want to follow in life towards their picture of success;

To be good at looking ahead, preventing problems happening and, when necessary, focusing on possible solutions to challenges.

There are potential minuses to this approach. These include the following. Such a person may find that they tend:

To get along best with people who have a similar approach but be impatient with others - which has implications for whom they work with and for their relationships;

To want to quickly move to making decisions – which can be difficult for people who have different styles of processing information;

To be so future focused that they keep striving forwards rather than appreciate their achievements.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow one or more of these approaches? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Past, Present And Positive Future Focused Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow one or more of these approaches may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow these in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

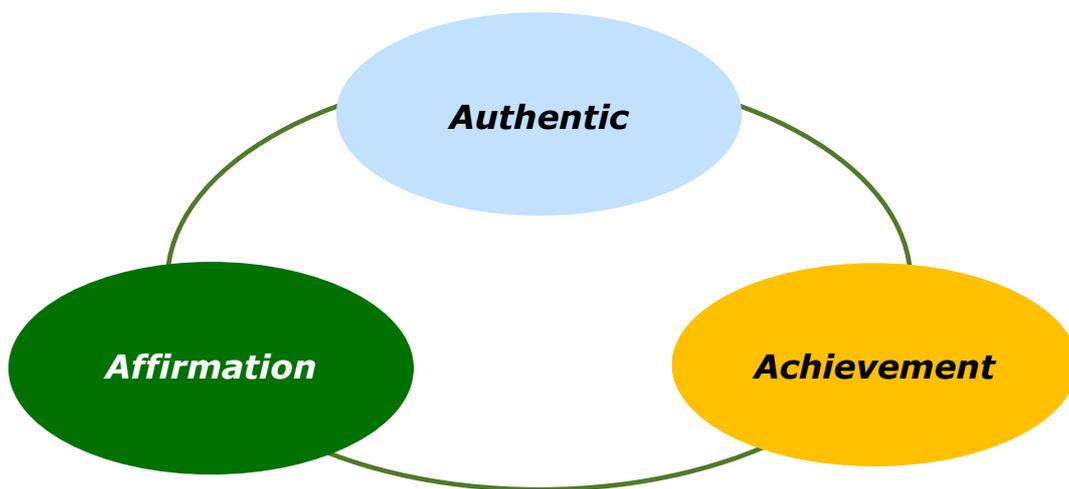

*

*

The Authenticity, Achievement And Affirmation Approach

Being Authentic

Different people grow in different ways. One approach is for them to be authentic and achieve things. Sometimes this may also result in them getting affirmation.

Different people grow in different ways. Many learn by doing activities where they go through the steps of being authentic, achieving things and getting affirmation.

Imagine that a person has asked for you to help them to develop. Let's explore how you may be able to do this by focusing on the following themes.

Authentic

A person is more likely to grow when they operate from their core. This approach can take many forms. A person may aim, for example:

To do what they believe in, do the basics and aim to do brilliant work;

To do things that give them positive energy, follow their principles and work towards their picture of success;

To do things where they build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success.

Achievement

A person is more likely to grow when they achieve their aims. Sometimes they may do this quickly, sometimes they may need to overcome challenges.

They may follow this path when doing an activity, performing a project or working towards achieving a specific goal. Reaching their goal helps to build confidence and provides a sense of success.

Affirmation

People are more likely to grow when they get affirmation. This comes with a reality check, however, because they are not always in charge of whether they get affirmation.

Sometimes the affirmation comes from themselves. A person may feel they have been true themselves, done what they believe in and also achieved their aims.

Sometimes affirmation comes from outside. A person may do good work and get positive feedback. This can help to lift a person's soul.

There may be many situations, however, where this feedback is not forthcoming. This does not necessarily mean the person has not done good work. It may simply mean that other people are not in the habit of giving positive feedback.

Different people grow in different ways. Whatever approach they use, it can also be useful for them:

To clarify what they have done well and how they can follow these principles in the future;

To clarify what they could do better and how they can apply this learning in the future.

Imagine that a person has asked you to help them to develop. How can you help them to be authentic and achieve things? How can you help to be realistic about the kinds of affirmation they can and cannot expect? What may happen as a result of them taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Authenticity, Achievement And Affirmation Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach in my own way may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Lopsided Personality Approach

Lopsided Personalities

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Some may then aim.

- To recognise they have a lopsided personality;
- To build on the strengths of their lopsided personality;
- To manage the consequences of the weaknesses of their lopsided personality.

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Warren Buffett described himself in this way. Here is a summary of what he said:

"I have a lopsided personality. I am brilliant with numbers but I cannot tell you the colour of the wallpaper in my room at home. Even though I have lived in the same house for over fifty years."

A person with a lopsided personality may see things quickly in one area of life. They can tell you exactly what is happening and what is about to happen. In other areas they don't see a thing.

Great workers sometimes demonstrate characteristics that may be labelled as aspects of autism, OCD, savant qualities or another name. Some individuals learn how channel those characteristics in a positive way. Let's explore how they may take this approach.

Some individuals recognise they may have a lopsided personality

Some individuals get to a point where they recognise they may have a lopsided personality. Different people do this in different ways and at different stages of their lives.

Some people take this step through raising their own awareness. They may learn about other people who demonstrate such characteristics. They may read books, watch films or gather knowledge about people who behave in certain ways and go on to do great work.

Some people take this step through others helping them to recognise their strengths. A parent, teacher, coach or another person may help them to see they have great abilities in some areas but not in others.

Today it is more common for individuals who have elements of dyslexia, synaesthesia, autism or other characteristics to be told to build on their abilities. Some talk about using their super strengths whilst also recognising they may have shortcomings in other areas.

Some individuals may also be considered to be twice-gifted or twice-exceptional. They may have great ability in some areas and also demonstrate great resilience to manage certain disabilities.

Can you think of ways in which you may have elements of a lopsided personality? What are the specific areas where you may have the ability to be brilliant? What are those where you may be totally blank?

One person described aspects of their personality in the following way.

"I am good at solving certain kinds of problems but am hopeless in other areas. My partner said it took years to understand this was the case.

"They could not understand why I was so good at managing certain kinds of crisis but that I am nature blind. I can anticipate what is going to happen in certain areas but cannot tell you about the trees and flowers in our garden."

Some individuals build on the strengths of their lopsided personality

Some individuals recognise that they excel in the intelligences that are rewarded by the school system. They may be good at writing, music, maths, art, science or other subjects.

Some may excel in other types of intelligence. They may be good at helping people, creative thinking, selling, inventing or in an activity that is not rewarded by academia.

Some individuals have parents, teachers or other people who help them to develop their talents. Many dyslexic young people, for example, have been helped by adults who supported their abilities in creative work, cooking, selling, dance, leadership or other activities.

Some individuals may get to a point where they experience a eureka moment. This leads them to saying something along the following lines.

"I am going concentrate on the areas where I am able to do stimulating work and deliver success."

Such people then sometimes aim: a) to do what they do best; b) to do their best; c) to make their best contribution towards helping other people to achieve success.

This approach can help them to make a living doing what they love. At the same time, it can be important for them to develop the following skill.

Some individuals manage the consequences of the weaknesses of their lopsided personality

Some individuals recognise that, whilst they can be brilliant in some activities, they can have blind spots in certain areas. They may get away with some of these if they are positive and treat other people with respect.

They may be like the classic mad professor who regarded fondly for their brilliance and their quirks. Such a person may get by because people see them as a great asset.

Some individuals may be totally blank in certain areas of life, however, and this can have consequences. It may result in them causing harm to themselves or other people.

They may be great at caring for strangers but sometimes neglect their loved ones. They be superb at teaching maths but have a gambling problem. They may be good at making decisions in their professional life but poor in their personal life.

Some individuals build on their strengths and learn how to manage their consequences of their weaknesses. The second part can be challenging, however, because they can become preoccupied and not notice they are behaving in a certain way.

One approach is for a person to recognise the triggers that show they may be drifting into difficult territory. They can then aim: a) to buy time to think; b) to consider the possible options going forward; c) to rehearse following their chosen option. They can then move into action.

Let's return to your own life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on the themes we have considered. This invites you to explore the following themes

First, to describe the specific ways you may demonstrate elements of having a lopsided personality.

Second, to describe the specific things you can do to build on the strengths of this personality.

Third, to describe the specific things you can do to manage the other consequences of this personality.

Here is the exercise. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Lopsided Personality Approach

The specific ways in which I may demonstrate elements of having a lopsided personality may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on the strengths of this lopsided personality are:

*

*

*

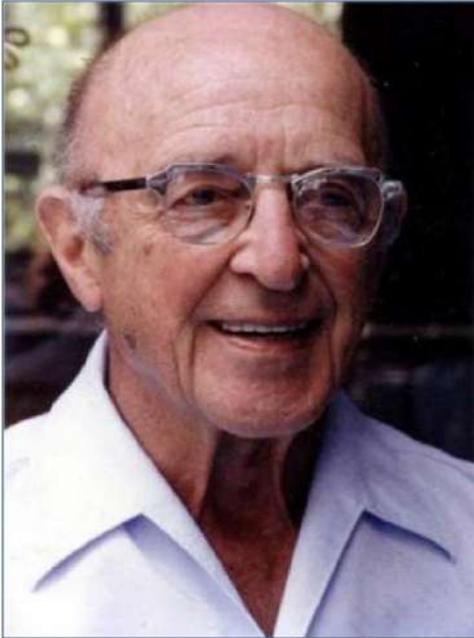

The specific things I can do to manage the other consequences of this lopsided personality are:

*

*

*

The Facts Are Friendly Approach

Carl Rogers, the psychotherapist, said:

"The facts are always friendly.

"Every bit of evidence one can acquire, in any area, leads one that much closer to what is true."

Carl Rogers believed that people grew by facing reality. We should welcome information, he said, even if the new evidence shows that our previous views were mistaken.

Whatever the revelation, the facts are friendly. Let's explore how you might employ this approach in your life and work.

You can gather information by recognising the facts are friendly

Gather information with an open mind, we are told, even though this might challenge your present views. This can be difficult, because it highlights a key issue.

Do we believe what we see or do we see what we believe?

People sometimes have a paradigm – a way of looking at the world – that means they only focus on things that support their present position.

As we know, this is called confirmation bias. This can be reassuring for them, but sometimes it means they refuse to read reality. Such an approach can be dangerous for them and also for other people.

Peak performers are positive realists in the fields where they excel. They have a positive attitude but also quickly read reality. This enables them to see patterns and anticipate what might happen.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a difficult situation where you adopted the approach that the facts were friendly? You may have lost a client, been concerned about an illness or faced another challenge.

Whatever the situation, you wanted to know the truth. How did you keep an open mind, even though you might have been going through difficulties? How did you gather the data? How did you then use the information to move forward?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Facts Are Friendly In The Past

The specific situation when I followed elements of the facts are friendly approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow elements of this approach were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

You can make decisions by recognising the facts are friendly

Let's assume you know the facts about a tough situation. The next step is to decide your way forward. As we know, one approach is to use the Three C model for making decisions. This involves focusing on clarity, creativity and concrete results.

Clarity

Looking at the challenge you face, what are the real results you want to achieve? You may want to achieve several aims. If so, list these in order of priority. What are the things you can control in the situation?

Creativity

The next step is to focus on creativity. What are the choices you have for trying to achieve the goals? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses of each option? Are there any other potential creative solutions?

Concrete Results

What is the route – or combination of routes – you want to follow? How can you translate your chosen route into action? How can you get some early successes? How can you encourage yourself on the journey?

Good decision makers often base their decisions on the consequences of the options, rather than the options themselves. Such people can therefore be said to choose the consequences. They then aim to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

Let's consider a tough example. Imagine that you contract a life threatening illness. You will start by gathering lots of information. This may involve scouring the web, reading and consulting with experts. You will then go into decision making mode.

Clarity will be the first step. What are the real results you want to achieve? You may want to live as long as possible, whatever the treatment. Or maybe you prefer to have less invasive treatment and a reasonable quality of life.

Gathering information, you will explore the various options. These may include mainstream or alternative treatments. You will also look at the consequences.

You may be able to prolong your life for 3 years but with difficult side effects. Alternatively, without extensive treatment, you may be able to live for 18 months, with most pain coming near death.

Facing the facts may not at first sight appear friendly. But it is vital to get as much information as possible. This will enable you to consider the various choices, consequences and other creative solutions. You will then be in a better position to choose your way forward.

You can keep doing reality checks by recognising that the facts are friendly

Imagine that you have embarked on pursuing your chosen route. You will do your best to work towards your chosen goals.

It will also be important to focus on facts. Bearing this in mind, how can you keep doing reality checks: a) to see what is working and do it more; b) to find solutions to things that are not working? How can you do everything possible to achieve your goals?

Let's return to your present life. Looking ahead, can you think of a potentially tough situation where you may need to gather all the facts to make a good decision?

How can you embrace the attitude that the facts are friendly, even if some are uncomfortable? How can you choose your way forwards? How can you keep doing reality checks? How can you build on what is working and find solutions to any other challenges?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Facts Are Friendly In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of the facts are friendly approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach:

*

*

*

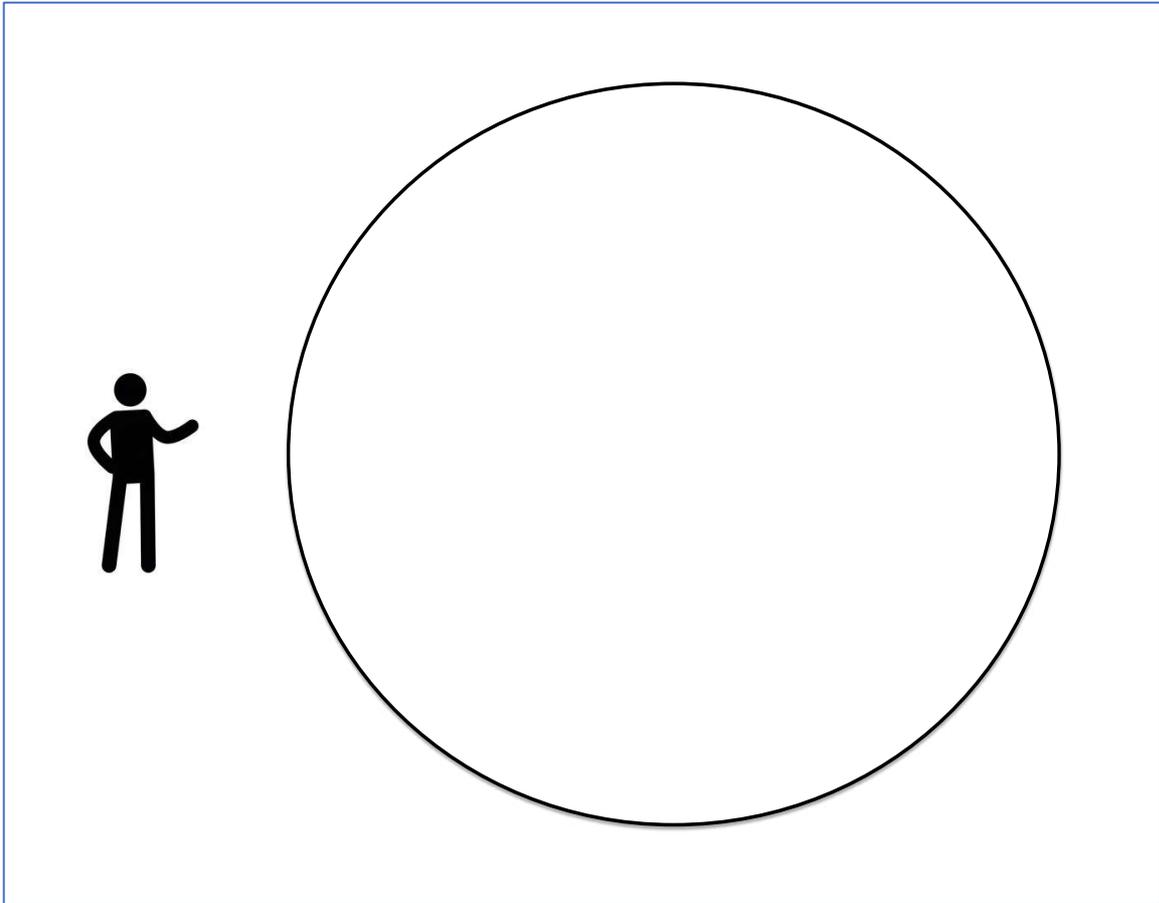

*The specific things that may happen
a result of taking these steps may be:*

*

*

*

The Advantage Of Being An Outsider Approach

Every person is different. They have their own personality, experiences and perceptions. Some are encouraged to be true to themselves and continue to develop. Others may find this to be more difficult.

Some individuals may feel like outsiders. They may want to be part of a group but find it difficult to join in. The way they manage these emotions can shape their futures.

Victoria Wood described feeling like an outsider at school. Many years later she explained how this may have been an advantage in her work as a writer, comedian, actress and singer. Here is a precis of what she said about this becoming an advantage.

"I was never in the netball team or part of a group. I was often on the outside. But this helped me to observe things.

"I watched how people behaved, talked and interacted. This helped me when it came to writing sketches, plays and songs."

Some individuals who feel like outsiders turn this to their advantage. They may learn:

To see things from the outside and get an overview;

To see patterns in the way that people or things interact;

To see how things do or don't work well in systems.

Such individuals may learn how to manage their feelings in certain situations. They may then go on to use their observation skills in their work.

They may do this as a writer, therapist, coach, scientist, consultant, trusted advisor or in another professional role. They may pass on knowledge that can help other people to do superb work.

Some people find it more difficult to be outsiders. They may want to feel accepted as part of a group or gain recognition for their efforts. Some may even experience existential angst.

Colin Wilson described these emotions in his first book The Outsider. He explained how some individuals 'see too deep and too much'. They may then find it challenging to deal with the certain emotions.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where can use the positive elements of being an outsider? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Outsider Approach

The specific situation where I may be able to use the positive elements of being an outsider may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to use the positive elements of being an outsider are:

*

*

*

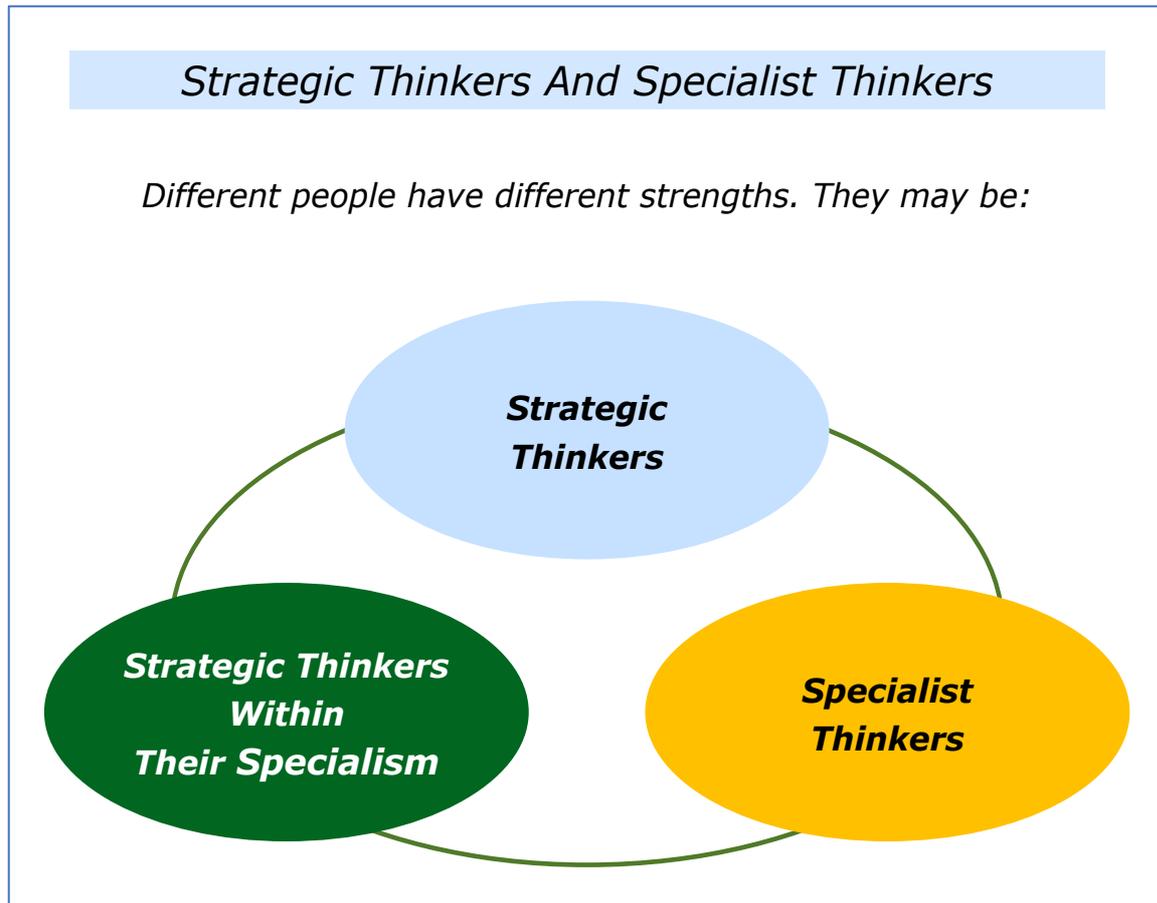

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Strategic Thinkers And Specialist Thinkers Approaches

Different people see things in different ways. They may be strategic thinkers, specialists or strategic thinkers within their specialism. They may also take different approaches when working to achieve success.

Strategic thinkers can sometimes find it challenging to manage the contributions of specialists. Some experts may focus on their own aims rather than the organisation's goals.

Some people may, of course, combine elements of both approaches. Some may be strategic thinkers who are also specialists and, as mentioned earlier, some may be strategic thinkers within their specialism.

Strategic thinkers and specialists operate differently, however, and there are both pluses and minuses attached to each role. Let's explore these themes.

Strategic Thinkers

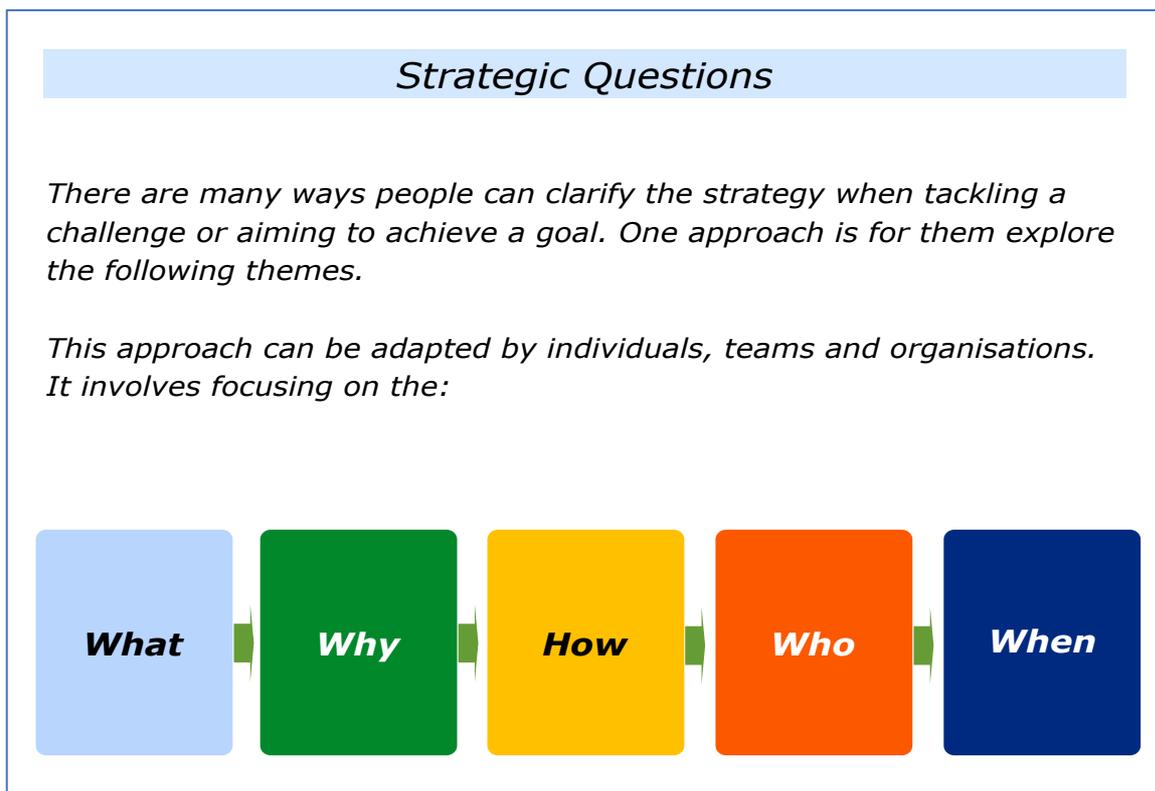

Strategic thinkers aim to gather information, see the big picture and focus on the results to achieve. They are good at recognising patterns and also seeing how things are connected.

They keep focusing on the big picture when making decisions. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they clarify the short, medium and long-term goals.

Strategic thinkers use their own favourite models for making decisions. One common factor, however, is that they clarify the real What – the real results to achieve – before moving to the How.

They may also be good at lateral thinking – rather than just linear thinking – when clarifying the possible ways to reach the goal. They then translate these ideas into a clear action plan.

Strategic thinkers focus on the outcomes to achieve. They may then use the What, Why, How, Who and When approach clarify the ways forward. Some explore the following themes.

What

What are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What are the actual words we want the various people to be saying after we have done the work? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the results?

Why

Why do we want to reach the goal? What will be the benefits for the various stakeholders? What will be the pluses? What may be any potential minuses? How can we build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

How

What are the possible options going forward together with the pluses and minuses of each option? What is the route we want to follow? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

Who

What are the results we want people to deliver when working to achieve the goals? How can we encourage each of them to build on their strengths and make clear contracts about their best contributions? How can we ensure they proactively keep people informed about their progress towards achieving the goals?

When

How can we translate the strategies into a clear action plan? What is the road map with the milestones along the way? What needs to be delivered by when? How can we keep doing reality checks about what is working and what can be improved? How can we reach the goals and then add that touch of class?

Strategic thinkers often communicate the big picture to their people. They describe the What, Why and How. They then focus on the Who and When and give people the opportunity to make their best contributions.

Some leaders have good coordinators who can orchestrate people's contributions towards achieving the goals. This also involves ensuring people proactively keep others informed their progress.

They recognise that there can be challenges. One that can arise is specialists and their teams focusing on their own aims rather than the organisation's strategic goal.

Strategic thinkers therefore keep reminding people of the organisation's goal. They then encourage people to contribute their part and also help others to work towards the picture of success.

The Specific Goal

The specific goal we are aiming to achieve is:

*

The specific strategy we are aiming to follow to achieve the goal is:

*

The specific contributions that each person can make towards achieving the goal are:

*

Strategic thinkers can find there are both pluses and minuses in the role. Let's explore some of these themes.

The pluses can include the following. They are able to see the big picture, focus on what they can control, shape things, set the strategy, make key decisions, build superb teams and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

The minuses can include the following. They can feel alone, find there are key factors beyond their control, demanding stakeholders such as investors, being impatient with people who focus on their own agendas rather than the big goals.

Strategic leaders may also need to find ways to coordinate the strengths of specialist thinkers. Let's explore the characteristics of people who may contribute in this way.

Specialist Thinkers

Specialist thinkers are often experts in their chosen field. They have deep knowledge and are loyal to the values of their craft. They often have strong beliefs about what is important in their area of expertise.

Such workers clarify the specific goals to achieve in their area. They may then cocoon themselves so they can do deep work and be free from any distractions.

Specialists then apply their expertise: a) to concentrate fully on the tasks to be completed; b) to perform these in their own way; c) to deliver high quality standards when working towards their goals.

Specialists love to dive deep into their work. They then follow their chosen processes and aim to uphold the values of their profession.

Such workers have many strengths and can make superb contributions to achieving an organisation's goals. They can become wrapped in their own world, however, and be seen as linear thinkers. This can create challenges for colleagues in other parts of the organisation.

Specialists may find there are both pluses and minuses in the role. Let's explore some of these themes.

The pluses can include the following. They are subject matter experts, love their area of expertise, concentrate fully, set specific goals, perform tasks, do superb work, keep learning and get satisfaction from achieving their chosen goals.

The minuses can include the following. They can become isolated, focus on their own aims, forget the organisation's goal, be protective of their own processes, fail to see colleagues in the organisation as their internal customers and sometimes feel unappreciated.

Strategic thinkers need specialists who provide expertise that can help the organisation to achieve its goals. They can do this by encouraging them but also ensuring they align their contributions to helping the organisation achieve success.

We will explore this topic later. Before then, however, let's look at another type of contributor.

Strategic Thinkers Within Their Specialism

Some people are strategic thinkers within their specialism but not in other areas. They are good at gathering information, seeing patterns and making decisions in their chosen field.

They may take this approach when focusing on biology, technical data or another areas of expertise. They then pursue the key strategies most likely to deliver the desired results.

Specialists may not apply such strategic thinking to other areas. This may be because: a) they are not interested or feel they cannot make a difference in that area; b) they simply want to focus on the things that they feel are important;

Strategic thinkers can aim to encourage specialists to make their best contributions towards achieving the organisation's goals. Different leaders do this in different ways. One approach is to go through the following steps.

Strategic Thinkers Can Make Clear Contracts With Specialist Thinkers

Clear contracting is crucial in any professional relationship. This is especially so with specialists. Let's consider one approach to making this happen.

Good leaders create a positive culture in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They often start by explaining the big picture of people. Different leaders do this in different ways. Whichever method they use, however, they often explain the following themes.

The What

The specific goal we want to achieve – the picture of success – is ...

The Why

The specific benefits – for the organisation, colleagues and customers – of achieving the goals will be ...

The How

The key strategies we aim to follow to achieve the goals are ...

The Who

The various roles that people will play – including the professional standards they will need to demonstrate – on the road towards achieving the goals are ...

The When

The specific things that must be delivered – and by when – on the road towards achieving the goals are ...

Strategic leaders invite people to reflect and decide if they want to help to achieve the goals. If so, they make clear contracts with people about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

One approach is to invite individuals to do the following exercise. Bearing in mind the organisation's goals and their own strengths, this invites them to describe and then agree with their manager on the following things.

*My Contribution Towards Achieving
The Picture Of Success*

The Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the picture of success and my strengths, the specific outcomes I will aim to deliver towards achieving the team's goals – and by when – are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Specific Support

The specific support I would like to help me to deliver these outcomes, plus the support I will give to other people, is:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering these outcomes will be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Strategic thinkers often aim to give their people context and explain the strategies for achieving the organisation's aims. They can then coordinate people's contributions towards achieving the goals.

Sometimes this calls for understanding the difference between strategic thinkers and specialist thinkers. This can help to align people's efforts for achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the strategic thinking and specialist thinking approaches? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Strategic Thinkers And Specialist Thinkers Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Clarifying What You Can And Can't Expect From A Culture Approach

The Culture
Can Expect The things I can expect from the culture are: * * * * 	Can't Expect The things I can't expect from the culture are:  * * * *

Many people do extensive research before joining an organisation. It is vital for them to enter with positive expectations but, at the same time, it can be good to do a reality check.

People can clarify what they can and can't expect in a particular culture. They then stand a better chance of building on the positives whilst also minimising the negatives. Imagine that you are about to join an organisation. It can be useful to consider the following steps.

You can clarify what you can and can't expect from the culture

Sometimes my work involves meeting with individuals who are applying for particular roles in organisations. Some of the discussion revolves around how they can use their strengths to help the potential employers to achieve success.

At the same time, however, we explore the things they may experience in the culture. This involves lots of research and checking with people who are familiar with the organisation.

We often begin by explore what they can and can't expect from a culture. Here is the list we compiled when one person applied for a role in a particular company.

*Can Expect - The specific things
I can expect in the culture are:*

To work with good clients ... To have colleagues who are nice people – because people in the company are very 'civilised' ... To be paid reasonably well ... To work in a relatively modern environment.

To get little direction from the top ... To cope with 'decisions by committee' ... To spend lots of time on internal meetings ... To hit difficulties in a couple of years because the leaders are delaying the strategic decisions required to thrive in the market.

*Can't Expect - The specific things
I can't expect in the culture are:*

To get quick decisions ... To get immediate backing for the tough decisions I make about people ... To get lots of positive feedback – but that is okay providing I am left in peace to do my job.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to think about the culture in an organisation you may be considering joining. Alternatively, you can apply the approach to focusing on your present organisation.

Here is the exercise about what you can and can't expect in a particular culture. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Culture

The organisation I want to focus on is:

*

Can Expect - The things I can expect in the culture are:

*

*

*

*

*

Can't Expect - The things I can't expect in the culture are:

*

*

*

You can clarify how to build on to the positive things in the culture

The person mentioned earlier clarified the possibilities moving forwards. They expressed this in the following way.

"It helps to be clear on what I can and can't expect from both the organisation and my potential manager.

"In my twenties I got upset because the organisations I worked in did not always do what it said on the tin.

"Far from making me cynical, this kind of exercise provides the basis for seeing how I can do good work in the organisation."

Moving on, they clarified how they could build on the positive things in the culture. These included the following things.

Building On The Positive Things – I Can Aim:

To build on the other positive people in the organisation ... To quickly begin working with customers ... To align my aims with the aims of the business.

To manage my manager by describing the KPI's I will deliver ... To show how I will keep them informed ... To get satisfaction from helping customers ... To get some quick successes.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you are focusing on a particular culture. This could be the organisation that you work in at the moment or one that you may be considering joining.

What do you think may be the positive things in the culture? How can you build on these positive things? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Things

The positive things in the culture may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on the positive things in the culture are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

You can clarify how to minimise the potential negative things in the culture

The advice given to anybody who might be considering joining a team or organisation is to do their due diligence. It is to:

"Go in with your eyes wide open.

How to take this step? If possible, one approach is to talk with people who know the set-up and to ask the following questions.

What are the Dos and Don'ts for being successful in this culture? Can you give specific examples? What are the things I can and can't expect in the culture? What are the positive aspects? What are the possible negative aspects?

What is a particular manager's style? How do they behave? What are the things I can and can't expect from them? What are the things that people can do to work successfully with the manager?

Are there any other things I would know about the culture?

The person mentioned above did this research. One area of concern was getting backing for any tough decisions to be made about rebuilding the team. We explored how to position this during the interview.

They would start by reassuring the employer. Certainly they would deliver the team's contribution to the organisation's goals. They would also show how they would get some quick successes.

It would be important, however, to have team members who did their best to make this happen. If people didn't perform, she would recruit people who would deliver success.

Positive realism is a key to delivering peak performance. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to approach a new culture – or to thrive in your present culture – by clarifying what you can and can't expect. You can then build on the pluses and, if necessary, find ways to deal with any minuses.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to explore how you can deal with any possible negatives in a culture.

It is then up to you to decide whether the overall package – the pluses and minuses involved - is worth it. You can decide whether or not you want to contribute to that culture.

The Negative Things

The potential negative things in the culture may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to minimise these potential negative things are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Dispassionate Approach

The Dispassionate Approach

This approach sounds paradoxical but it can work. It is to be dispassionate when following your passion and then doing your best to achieve the desired results.

There are many ways to do fine work. This approach sounds paradoxical but it can work. It is to be dispassionate when following your passion and then doing your best to achieve the desired results.

Great workers recognise that their passion can provide positive energy and be a great help. At the same time, however, it can cloud their ability to make good decisions and affect their discipline.

Bearing this in mind, they may become calm and clear when pursuing things they feel passionately about. They channel their passion in a disciplined way and to deliver the desired results.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you followed elements of this approach? What did you do then to maintain perspective? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Dispassionate Approach In The Past

The specific situation when I aimed to be dispassionate when following a passion and did my best to achieve the desired results was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow this approach in my own way were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Great workers sometimes go through certain stages in their careers. They get hired for their passion, promoted for their professionalism and build a reputation for being strategic and having perspective.

Passion

A person may pursue an activity they feel passionately about where they have the ability to do superb work. They convey this enthusiasm during interviews and get hired to do work where they can use their expertise.

Professionalism

The person produces fine work. Gaining a reputation for delivering high professional standards, they climb the career ladder. They may continue to specialise or move into a management or leadership role.

Perspective

The person begins to attend senior leadership meetings. Still feeling strongly about their chosen work, they may behave in either of the following ways.

They may convey their passion by communicating in ways that are not unhelpful. They may argue strongly for their chosen projects, defend their territory or may even criticise other departments.

Alternatively, they may choose to show they understand the big picture and have perspective. Whilst still passionate about their work, they see things from the whole company point of view.

They gain a reputation as somebody who thinks strategically and makes considered decisions. This leads to them being used as a trusted advisor by colleagues and maybe even by the CEO.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the dispassionate approach. This may be when pursuing individual work or as a leader. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

The Dispassionate Approach In The Future

The specific situation when I may aim to be dispassionate when following a passion and do my best to achieve the desired results may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

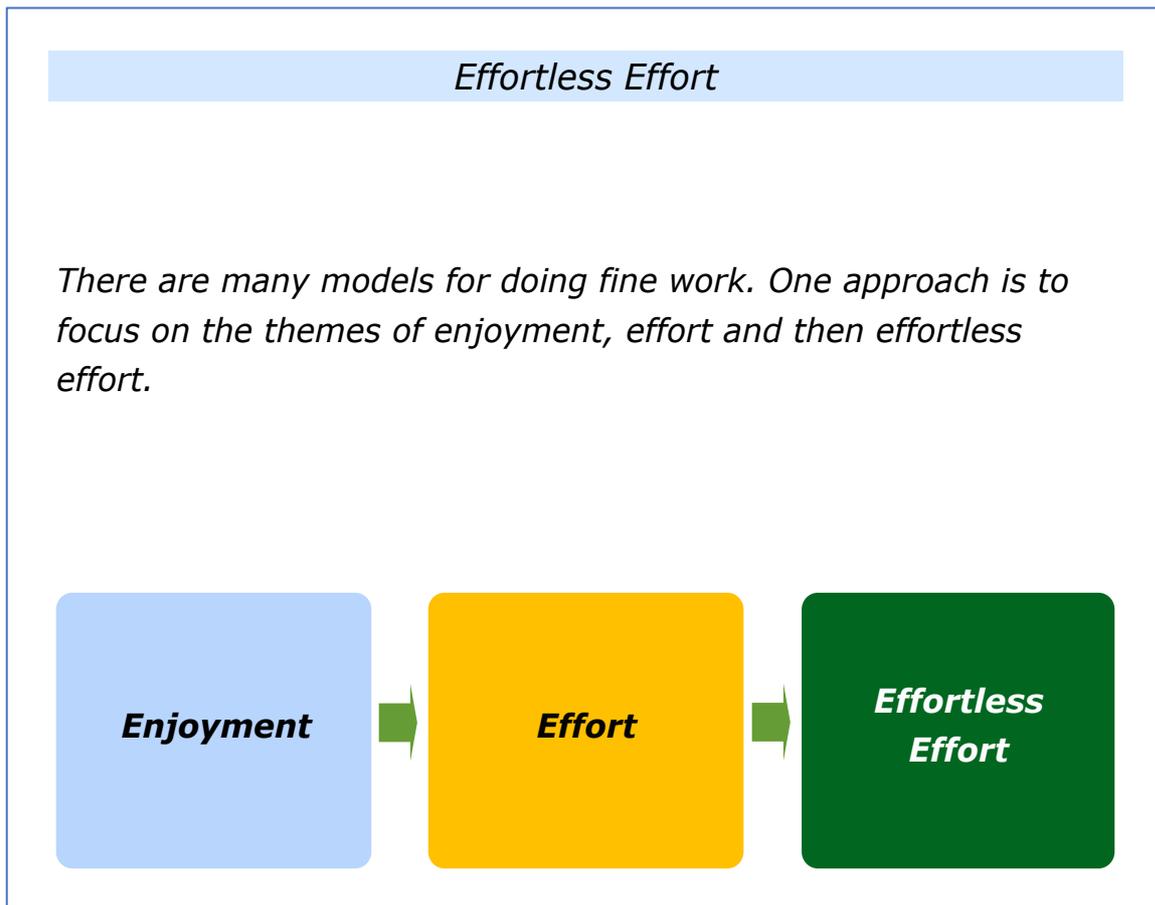

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Effortless Effort Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the themes of enjoyment, effort and effortless effort.

Some people aim to follow the Taoist principle of effortless effort that embodies the concept of wu wei. Here is one description from The School Of Life website.

Wu wei is a paradox. It means being at peace while engaged in the most frenetic of tasks so that one can carry these out with maximum skill and efficiency.

Something of the meaning of wu wei is captured when we are at one with what we are doing. This is likened to a state of profound concentration, flow or being in the zone.

Imagine that you want to do pursue the route of effortless effort. One approach is to focus on the following steps.

Enjoyment

The first step is focus on a specific activity you enjoy doing. It can be good to focus on one where:

You enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal;

You feel in your element – at ease and yet able to excel;

You can translate this into doing a piece of work or aiming to achieve a specific goal.

You may enjoy taking these steps when mentoring people, playing a sport or managing certain kinds of crises. You may do so when fixing technical problems, being on stage, climbing a mountain or doing other activities.

Imagine that you have settled on doing something where you will enjoy the journey and have the ability to deliver excellence. You may then want to focus on the next theme.

Effort

You may aim do special work by going a state of effortless effort. This does, however, highlight a paradox. You sometimes have to put in the effort before being able to go into that state.

There are many definitions for the word effort. These include the following.

The specific physical, psychological or intellectual activity required to overcome a challenge or achieve a specific goal.

Great workers focus on a specific activity and aim to maintain good habits. They practice, practice and practice. They practice until they can forget and the habit becomes part of their muscle memory.

This is why it is important to choose an activity where you will enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following framework.

Effort

The specific activity where I enjoy the journey and may also have the ability to deliver excellence is:

*

The specific things I can do to put in the effort required to deliver excellence when doing this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to encourage myself on the journey and also keep improving are:

*

*

*

Great workers often love putting in the effort required to do superb work. They love to visualise potential scenarios, explore solutions and then translate some of these into action.

They enjoy pursuing their craft by focusing on Kaizen – the concept of continuous improvement. They love to keep building on what they do well, tackling areas for improvement and continuing to develop.

Imagine that you are taking these steps. There may come a time when you are able to move on to the next stage.

Effortless Effort

Some people do special work by going into a state of effortless effort. This step may involve doing different things when taking it in a spiritual or secular way.

The spiritual way can involve relaxing, breathing deeply and merging with life in a deep way. It can involve being in the moment, appreciating life and having a sense of wonder.

As mentioned early, the secular way may involve embracing a paradox. It may call for aiming:

To do superb work by putting in the required effort;

To then do something special by going into a state of effortless effort.

Great workers sometimes take this step. They commit themselves to doing their best and do what is required to perform superb work. They then go into a state of flow – sometimes embodying effortless effort – and deliver peak performances.

Such workers often make complicated things look simple. They seem to do things swiftly but slowly. They seem to have more time than anybody else. They then use their skills to produce something special.

Let's return to the specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach. How can you enjoy the journey? How can you put in the required effort? How can you go into a state of effortless effort? How can you deliver excellence?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Effortless Effort Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

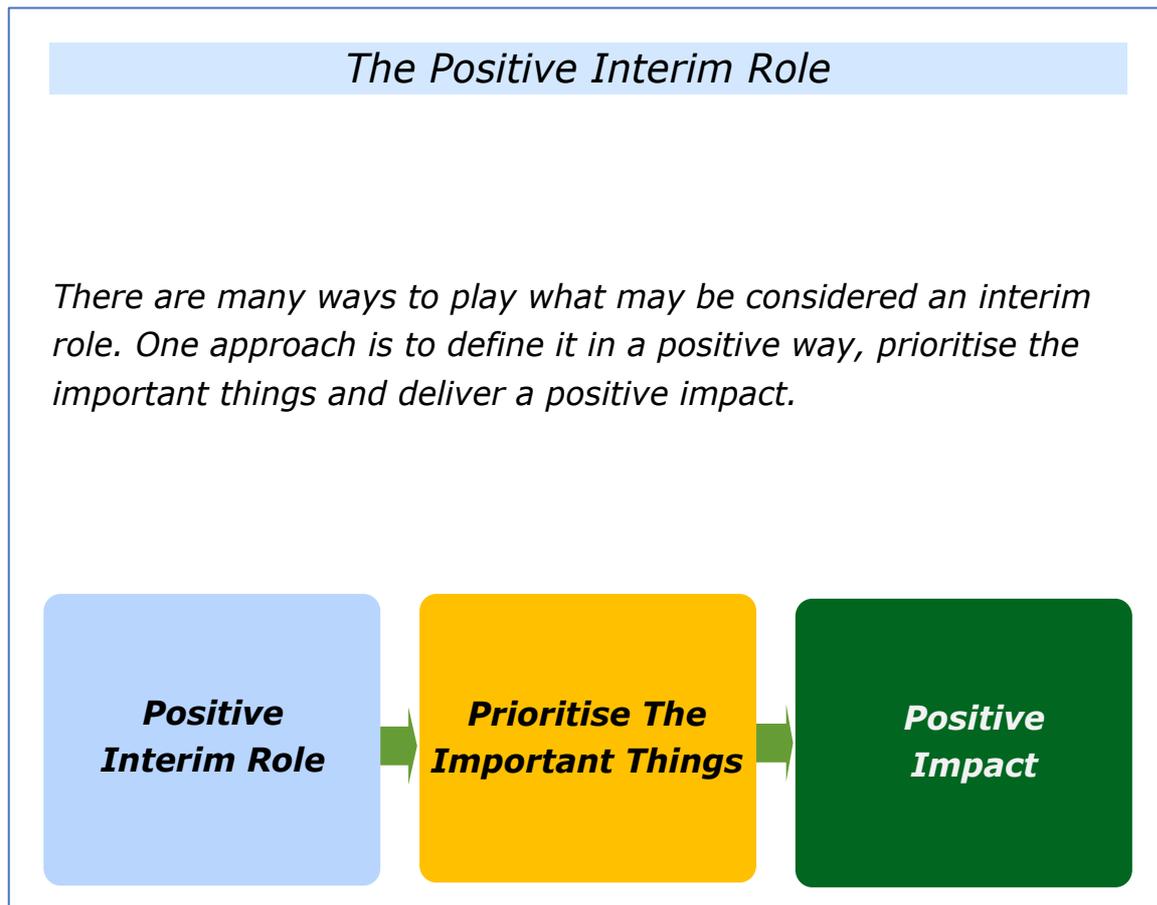

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Interim Role Approach

The positive interim role approach turns some ideas on their heads. One person expressed this in the following way.

"People may need to recognise that many things are interim rather than permanent. It is possible to do important work during that time, however, and aim to deliver positive results.

"Much depends, of course, on how long the interim period last. Some would argue that our time on Earth is interim. But we can each encourage people during our lives and aim to have a positive impact."

The positive interim role can be interpreted in many ways. People who work as therapists, mentors, coaches and trusted advisors, for example, may play an interim role in other people's lives.

Such professionals can have a positive influence, however, and do good work. This can sometimes have a relatively permanent effect on helping people to shape their future lives.

Imagine that you have been invited to do an interim role in an organisation. Whilst you would love the imaginary security of a permanent role, you are happy to take the position.

There are many ways to do the role. One approach is to focus on the following steps.

You Can See It As A Positive Interim Role

People can choose their attitude towards doing an interim role. They may choose to see it as either:

A chance to make a positive contribution;

A stopgap situation;

A way of getting a salary and nothing else.

Imagine that you frame the role in a positive way. Before rushing into it, however, it can be useful to work through the following steps.

You can clarify what you can control in the situation

You can control your attitude. You can be positive, professional and do your best to perform superb work. You can't control other people's attitudes, their management style or the overall strategy of the organisation.

Bearing these things in mind, you can clarify whether you want to do the role. If so, you can then aim to build on what you can control and manage what you can't control. This can lead to the next step.

You can make clear contracts about the outcomes to achieve

Imagine that you have decided to take the role. It will then be important to make clear contracts with the key stakeholders. These may include the person you will be reporting to plus any other key people.

There are many way to make clear contracts. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

The Picture Of Success

You can clarify the specific results to deliver in the role. Bearing in mind what you can control, you can clarify:

The outcomes the organisation may want you to achieve in the role;

The outcomes you may want to achieve in the role.

You can translate these into a provisional picture of success. (See later illustration.) When appropriate, you can share this with the key stakeholders by saying something along the following lines.

"As far as I understand, the outcomes to achieve in the role are:

"To ...

"To ...

"To ...

"Are there any other outcomes you would like me to add or bear in mind?"

The Principles

You can also show that you are aware of the key principles the organisation like their people to follow in the culture. Bearing these in mind, you can highlight how you will aim to follow these principles.

There may, however, be one caveat. Some organisations may not actually make these principles clear to their people. If this is the case, you can be proactive.

You can explain the principles – such as the strategies, guidelines or the Dos and Don'ts – you will aim to follow to achieve the goals. You can highlight these in general terms rather than going into detail.

Your aim is to show that you will act in ways that align with the organisation's guidelines. You will, of course, use your own strengths to translate these principles into action.

If appropriate, you can show your understanding of organisation's approach by saying something like the following.

"As far as I understand, the principles to follow – the Dos and Don'ts – on the way towards achieving the goals are:

"Do ...

"Do ...

"Do ...

"Don't ...

"Don't ...

"Are there any other things to bear in mind?"

The Progress Reports

You may also wish to reassure the stakeholders that you will take responsibility for delivering the results. It is possible to do this in several ways.

One approach is to describe how you will proactively keep people informed about the progress being made towards achieving the goals. You may also want to describe how you will aim to get some early successes.

There are several reasons for taking this approach. It can help:

To show that you understand the world from their point of view;

To reassure them by showing you will proactively keep them informed about the progress being made;

To show you will get some quick wins – this will buy you time to get on with the real work.

Let's return to the contracting process. Imagine that you have worked through the themes mentioned above. You can then meet with the key stakeholders:

To share your view of the picture of success, the principles to follow and the progress reports;

To ask if they would like to see anything added and if they have any other suggestions;

To make clear contracts about the outcomes to be delivered and how you will keep them informed about the progress towards achieving the agreed picture of success.

There are many ways to prepare for such a session. If you wish, you may want to adapt the following exercise on your own way. You can then use this as a basis for making clear contracts about the results to achieve in the interim role.

The Positive Interim Role

One approach is to make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the following themes.

The Picture Of Success

As far as I understand, the outcomes to achieve by ... are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

The Principles

As far as I understand it, the principles to follow on the way towards achieving the picture of success are:

The Dos:

- * Do ...*
- * Do ...*
- * Do ...*

The Don'ts:

- * Don't ...*
- * Don't ...*
- * Don't ...*

The Progress Reports

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards achieving the picture of success are:

- * To ...*

For example ...

- * To ...*

For example ...

- * To ...*

For example ...

You Can Prioritise The Important Things

Imagine that you have made clear contracts about the results to achieve in your interim role. As mentioned earlier, it can be useful to get some quick wins. This can reassure the key stakeholders and also buy time.

You can also focus on pursuing the strategies most likely to deliver success. When doing this it will be important:

To act as a positive model, be professional and help other people in the organisation to achieve success – this can help to build goodwill;

To focus on the top priorities – the important things – you can do to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success;

To, when appropriate, build on the positive people in the organisation and work with them to achieve success.

Bearing in mind you are in an interim role, it can be useful to focus on the things you can control. One person described their experience of doing this in the following way.

"Because I was an interim, my approach was to use the mission as 'the persuader'. It was not about me trying to persuade people. It was about whether they wanted to work towards achieving the mission.

"During the first week I met with each person individually. In the sessions we focused on the key strategies we could follow to achieve the team's mission.

"I invited each person to describe: a) the specific things they would like to contribute towards achieving the team's mission; b) the specific support they would like to help them to make their best contribution.

"Taking this approach gave me a good idea about each person's style. I then built on the people who wanted to make a professional contribution towards achieving the mission. This helped to produce some quick successes."

You will have your own views regarding the top priorities to focus on when working towards the goals. It will then be important to translate these into action and, where possible, get some quick successes.

You will have your own way of making this happen. If appropriate, however, you may start by using something like the following framework.

The Picture Of Success - The Top Priorities

The top priorities – the important things – to focus on and do to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

You Can Aim To Deliver A Positive Impact

Imagine that you have embarked on pursuing the top priorities. You can aim to get some quick successes, maintain the momentum and deliver the desired results.

Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to take the following steps. You can aim:

To keep reminding people of the outcomes to achieve – the picture of success;

To keep producing success stories that show how people are following the principles and delivering success;

To keep behaving in an encouraging way towards people throughout the organisation and make a positive impact by helping to achieve the picture of success.

Positive interim roles can provide the chance to encourage people and demonstrate excellence. Sometimes this involves aiming: a) to be a positive model; b) to perform superb work; b) to help people to achieve success and have a positive impact.

As mentioned earlier, many people long for something permanent but this is not always possible. A person may make a relatively permanent impression, however, by doing superb work and helping to create positive memories.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Interim Role

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Principles, Persistence And Positive Results Approach

There are many views on how people demonstrate resilience. Some talk about the importance of people showing grit or being able to manage setbacks.

Great workers demonstrate such qualities in the activities where they excel. Such people often show remarkable persistence. Let's explore how you can take this approach in your own way.

Imagine that you want to do a piece of work. You will start by having a positive attitude towards doing the task. This could be to write a book, do a creative project, run a business, lead a team or do another activity.

Looking ahead, you recognise it will be important to demonstrate resilience. One approach will be to follow the principles you believe in, be persistent and do your best to achieve positive results. Let's explore these themes.

Principles

Great workers prepare properly before doing a piece of work. This includes clarifying how they can follow the principles they believe in. Taking this approach gives them the strength to be persistent.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Bearing this in mind, you may want to take the following steps.

You can clarify the positive results you want to achieve

Start by clarifying the results you want to achieve. These will obviously differ depending on whether you aim to do a specific project, tackle a particular challenge or achieve a certain picture of success.

You can clarify the principles you want to follow to achieve the positive results

Belief is vital. Bearing this in mind, describe the principles you want to follow to do your best to achieve the desired results. You can then keep focusing on how to apply these principles when doing the work.

You can clarify how you can follow these principles and do your best to achieve the positive results

You can then make your action plan. Describe the specific things you can do to translate your principles into action. This can include how you can buy time to think, for example, when meeting certain challenges.

Imagine you want to clarify the principles you want to follow when doing a piece of work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Principles

The positive results I want to achieve when doing the piece of work are:

*

*

*

*The principles I want to follow
when doing the piece of work are:*

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to follow these principles and do my best to achieve positive results are:

*

*

*

Persistence

Great workers demonstrate persistence. Building in mind the principles they believe in, they follow a certain rhythm. They aim to keep doing the right things in the right way. They then do their best to get the right results.

Imagine that you want to take this approach. If appropriate, you can take some of the following steps.

You can plan how you want to follow your principles that day

One approach is to start by focusing on the results you want to achieve that day. If appropriate, you can rehearse how to follow your principles to do your best to achieve those results.

You can follow your chosen rhythm for being persistent when pursuing your principles

You may then want to go through the following steps. First, you can follow your ritual for clicking into action. Second, you can follow a certain rhythm for being persistent when following your principles. Third, you can keep reading reality and perform superb work.

Great workers demonstrate persistence when focusing on continuous improvement. They keep reading reality to check: a) what is working; b) what can be done better and how. They then implement these ideas and perform superb work.

Some people love the process of being persistent. They believe in the importance of earning things rather than being entitled to things. They love the process of absorption, adventure and achievement. This can lead to the next step.

Positive Results

Great workers continue to follow their principles and perform superb work. When appropriate, however, they are prepared to be pragmatic and do what is required to achieve the desired positive results.

Imagine that you are doing fine work but then face a challenge or an unexpected event. One approach is to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the principles I want to follow? How can I apply these principles in a pragmatic way in this situation to get positive results? What are the possible options going forwards? What are the pluses and minuses of each option?

Which option most fits with the principles I want to follow? How can I translate this into action? How can I build on the pluses and minimise the minuses? How can I then do my best to get positive results?

Let's return to the piece of work you described in the first exercise. You may have described aiming to do a specific project, tackle a challenge or do another activity.

Looking at this piece of work, how can you follow the persistence approach in your own way? How can you continue to follow your principles? How can you continue to be persistent? How can you do your best to achieve positive results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Principles, Persistence And Positive Results Approach

*The specific situation in the future
when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Strong Work Ethic Approach

Many people have a strong work ethic. It can be important for them to channel this into following strategies that work. They can then do their best to achieve success.

The strategies part is vital. Some people have a strong work ethic but do not follow such strategies. This can lead to them feeling tired or not reaching their goals. Let's explore these themes.

Strong Work Ethic

Different people develop such an ethic in different ways. These may include the following approaches.

The Strengths Approach

Some people develop a strong work ethic as the result of playing to their strengths. They aim to do what they do best and do their best. Here are some things that people mention when describing this approach.

"My parents taught me to follow my passion but also put in the effort required to do good work. This is a rule that I have tried to follow in my life."

"I was encouraged play to my strengths and aim to do superb work. The work I do sometimes feels like play. But it is serious play that aims to get positive results."

The Satisfying Work Approach

Some people develop a strong work ethic as the result of doing satisfying work. Here are some things that people mention when describing this approach.

"I love to do work that it is satisfying. People say that I work hard but I do not seem to notice it. Sometimes I can work for hours and the time just flies away."

"I look forward to doing my work each day. Since my early twenties I have followed the rule that 'work is something you do rather than a place you go to'. And I am lucky to get paid for doing satisfying work."

The Sweat Approach

Some people develop a strong work ethic by aiming to sweat. There are, however, different kinds of sweat.

Some people focus on positive sweat. They may do what they enjoy, apply themselves fully and work to achieve their picture of success. They may feel tired afterwards but this is a positive exhaustion.

Some people focus on painful sweat. They may do something they endure, strain themselves and work to achieve a goal that others say will help them to achieve success. They may experience negative exhaustion.

Some people develop a strong work ethic by combining elements of these approaches. They may build on their strengths, do satisfying work and be prepared to sweat. This may also involve focusing on the next step.

Strategies That Work

Many people have a strong work ethic but sometimes need to channel this in an effective way to achieve success. Some people believe that sweat will be enough to deliver the goods but this does not always work. Some people take another approach.

They clarify their picture of success;

They clarify the strategies most likely to achieve the picture of success;

They follow the strategies most likely to achieve the picture of success.

Different people follow these steps in different ways. Bearing in mind their strengths and specific situation, they often explore the following themes.

What are the real results I want to achieve? What are the key strategies I can follow to increase the chances of success? How can I translate these into action?

The following section describes how one person aimed to follow the strategies most likely to work for them. Other people would probably follow other approaches.

Anna had a strong work ethic and wanted to do more satisfying work. Her eventual aim was to follow the human resources path and support people in organisations. She was introduced to me by her father who described her in the following way.

"Anna is a great worker. She is a practical person rather than an academic and got a weekend job at the earliest opportunity. She then took the route of working in shops rather than going to university. Nor did she want to incur £50,000 of student debt.

"Now in her early twenties, Anna wants to work in hospitality. She sees this as a way of having more contact with people. At a certain point, however, she also wants to move into HR. Have you any clients who may be able to help?"

Anna was good with people and also able to organise things. She also wanted to develop and, at some point, begin part-time study in the HR field. Some traditional companies in the hospitality field may or may not provide such opportunities.

Bearing in mind Anna's strengths, we explored the strategies she could follow towards achieving her aims. It would be important to find a place where she could demonstrate her work ethic and also shine.

This led to me contacting the Managing Director of an events company that had a superb service ethic. Would she be willing to have an informal meeting with Anna? The meeting went ahead and, one week later, the MD sent the following message.

"Anna would certainly fit here for helping to host some of our events. I have offered her the opportunity to assist on a forthcoming event for one of our clients. She really wants to do this and will be using five days of her annual holiday to work on the event."

The event led to Anna being offered a permanent role. She took it immediately – even though it involved getting up each day at 5.30 to commute into London.

She worked with the events company for the next three years. This provided a great grounding in the service business. She also gained some initial qualifications in the HR field.

The company supported Anna in these ventures. It also encouraged her to apply the knowledge in the different roles she did during her three years with them. She then moved on to the next stage of her career.

Anna got a job working in the HR department of a hotel chain whose headquarters was closer to her home. Within twelve months she was promoted to become an HR Partner to practitioners in the business. She also continued to gather qualifications in the field.

Two years later she moved to a key HR role in another company. The head of HR liked Anna's work ethic, pragmatism and ability to find solutions to problems.

Anna followed strategies that worked for her. Bearing in mind her strengths, it made sense for her to start from the ground up. She then developed the savvy required to provide great service and also help people to succeed.

Different people will follow different strategies. Bearing in mind their specific situation, the key is to follow the strategies most likely to achieve success. It is then to focus on the next theme.

Success

People who have a strong work ethic believe in applying themselves fully to following strategies that work. They often have a certain attitude:

They believe in the philosophy of earning things ... They don't believe in the philosophy of entitlement.

Such people aim to do superb work and focus on continuous improvement. They aim: a) to keep building on what is working; b) to keep tackling areas for improvement. They also enjoy finding solutions to challenges.

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people have a strong work ethic, follow strategies that work and apply themselves in a way that involves positive sweat. They then do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Strong Work Ethic Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Spirit, Savvy And Success Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to embody a certain spirit and demonstrate savvy on the way towards producing success. Let's explore these themes.

Spirit

Great workers sometimes embody a certain kind of spirit and aim to follow certain principles in their lives and work. They may also aim to serve something greater than themselves.

The principles they follow may be based on a spiritual faith, philosophy or guidelines about how to live a good life. They then aim to translate these into action on the way towards achieving their goals.

Some individuals remind themselves of these principles every day. They measure their life by the extent to which they follow these principles during their time on the planet. Sometimes this can lead to them having a sense of peace.

During my life I have met many such people. They have been carers, educators, therapists, gardeners, environmentalists, medics, artists and people in other professions.

Such people sometimes going being spiritual. Some also have another quality which may sound paradoxical. Let's consider this quality that they demonstrate in their life and work.

Savvy

Different people have savvy in different areas. They may then apply it when doing certain activities, dealing with certain challenges or working towards certain goals. There are several definitions for the word savvy. Here is one view:

Somebody with savvy has the ability to apply their experience and expertise to achieve success in certain situations.

Some people may demonstrate this in some areas but not in others. A person may have the savvy needed to thrive in academia, for example, but not in the commercial world. And vice versa.

Looking back, can you think of a person who demonstrated savvy in a particular activity? How did they apply their experience and expertise to deliver success? What happened as a result of them taking those steps?

Success

Different people have different definitions of success. Much depends on the person and the context.

A care worker may see it as helping a person to feel better. An educator may see it as helping students to develop skills they can use to shape their futures. A leader may see it as building a culture that helps its stakeholders to succeed.

Looking back, can you think of a person who used their spirit and savvy to deliver success? How did they translate this into action? What happened as a result of them taking these steps?

People may show some but not all of these elements. Some people embody a certain spirit but have little savvy. Some have savvy but you are unsure about their spirit. Some combine each of these qualities and deliver success.

Can you think of a specific activity where you demonstrate elements of this approach? How you can you continue to follow your chosen spirit and demonstrate savvy when doing this activity? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Spirit, Savvy And Success Approach

The specific activity where I show elements of this approach is:

*

The specific things I can do to follow my chosen spirit and demonstrate savvy when doing this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Battle-Hardened, Brightness And Brilliant Work Approach

Imagine that you are about to build a team. You will have your own view about the qualities you will look for in the potential team-members.

This section explores one approach. It is to hire people who are battle-hardened yet still hungry, who exude brightness – such as positivity - and who are able to deliver brilliant work. Let explore these themes.

Battle-Hardened

Several years ago I worked with a leader who had been given the authority to build a new team. They began by hiring three people who would shape the culture.

When doing so, they brought in people who were battle-hardened. Such people were experienced and knew how to make things work. They were also still hungry.

The leader recruited one person they had worked with for many years. But they did not fall for the romantic idea of 'bringing the band back together'.

They took a more realistic approach. Whilst they rated some previous colleagues, many were now at a different stage of life and had different agendas.

They wanted people who were happy to put in the required commitment. This highlighted another quality they looked for in people.

Brightness

The leader recruited battle-hardened people who still exuded brightness – positivity. They would act as shapers and beacons for others in the company.

Such people had learned from experiences. They knew how to be positive models and create a positive environment. They also knew how to find solutions to challenges.

These people had retained their brightness and hunger rather than had become dulled. They were more likely to spread these feelings to other people in the company.

Brilliant Work

The leader made sure these people had the ability to do brilliant work in certain activities. Whilst it was important such people were positive, they also needed to deliver the goods.

Bearing in mind their own strengths as a leader, they needed people who had complementary skills. They started by hiring a coordinator they had worked with in several companies. The coordinator had the following skills. They were able:

To make clear contracts with the leader about the outcomes to be delivered;

To coordinate people's strengths to deliver these outcomes;

To encourage people in the company to focus on continuous improvement.

The leader also hired people who could lead superb teams across the company. Some of these leaders were specialists, however, whose strengths lay in particular activities. They needed help in running their teams.

Such people were therefore given the option of hiring people with complementary skills. This ensured that the teams were able to do superb work and deliver the goods.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking to the future, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the battle-hardened, brightness and brilliance approach?

You may want to focus on these themes when working as an individual in your professional role. For example, what are the specific activities where you display these qualities? How can you pursue these activities more in the future?

You may want to focus on these themes when building or rebuilding a team. How can you reward, retain or recruit people who demonstrate these qualities? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Battle-Hardened, Brightness And Brilliant Work Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Routine, Randomness And Results Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to follow a routine that works, manage any potential randomness and do your best to deliver the desired results.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can make this happen.

Routine

Great workers often follow a routine that works. Sometimes it can take a person years for them to find and follow such a routine. Here are some examples.

A writer may follow a certain routine in their daily work. They may make good use of their prime times – the times when they have most creative energy.

They may also follow a certain structure when composing an article or a story. This frees the writer to use their imagination to fill the framework with powerful writing.

A mentor may follow a certain routine when helping mentees. They may start by anticipating what the topics the mentee may wish to explore and rehearsing the session.

They then make the person feel welcome, clarify their goals and focus on the first topic they want to explore. They then pass on knowledge in a way the person can use to achieve their goals.

A leader may follow a certain routine to create a positive environment in which motivated people can perform at their best. They ensure that people are clear on the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

Such a leader may coordinate people's strengths to do superb work. They will then encourage, educate and enable people to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to do your best? What are the results you want to achieve in the situation?

How can you do your best to achieve these results? What are the strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success? What are those that are most likely to work?

What may be the routine you can follow to translate these strategies into action? How can you use your strengths – and follow your successful style – to do superb work?

Imagine that you have clarified the routine you want to follow when doing a piece of work. Sometimes you may meet challenges along the way. Let's explore this theme.

Randomness

Great workers like to make things as predictable as possible. This creates the platform for delivering consistently high standards. It also gives them the strength to ride the roller coaster of managing challenges and random events.

Some of these challenges will be predictable but others may be unexpected. They may therefore also explore how to manage randomness that may occur on the journey.

Many people cite Harold Macmillan, a former British Prime Minister, describing what could upset his plans. The quote was never actually verified, but he was rumoured to say that his main concerns were:

"Events, Dear Boy, Events."

Some events are more predictable than others. Looking back at my early work in therapeutic communities, for example, it was often possible to see people's patterns and how they would behave in certain situations.

There were, however, many roller coaster ups and downs – plus random events - that occurred. It was then our job to manage these situations in ways that helped both the individuals and the whole community.

Imagine you are following your chosen routine when doing a piece of work. What are the potential challenges you may encounter on the way? How can you prevent some of these happening? How can you manage some of these challenges if, despite your best efforts, they still happen?

What are the random events that could occur? Looking at each of these events, how can you ride the roller coaster? How can you buy time to think and clarify the potential ways forward? How can you decide on your strategy and manage the event?

Imagine that you are doing good work and managing the potential events. You may then move on to the next stage.

Results

Great workers do their best to achieve the desired results. Delivering the goods can be more predictable when doing some activities, however, rather than when doing others.

Imagine that you lead a team that delivers marketing campaigns. Each project will call for clarifying the brief, conducting research and running a superb campaign. Providing you do these things properly, you are more likely to achieve the predicted results.

Imagine that you coach a football team. Bearing in mind the team's strengths, you will aim to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. Whilst you can enable people perform at their best, there may be factors beyond your control that affect results.

Great workers recognise they can only do their best. That is why in sports, for example, many coaches follow the advice given by Bill Walsh:

Keep delivering the standards of performance and the score takes care of itself.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some of the steps we have explored?

Imagine you have clarified the results you want to achieve in the situation. How can you follow a routine that work? How can you manage any randomness? How can you do your best to achieve the desired results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Routine, Randomness And Results Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

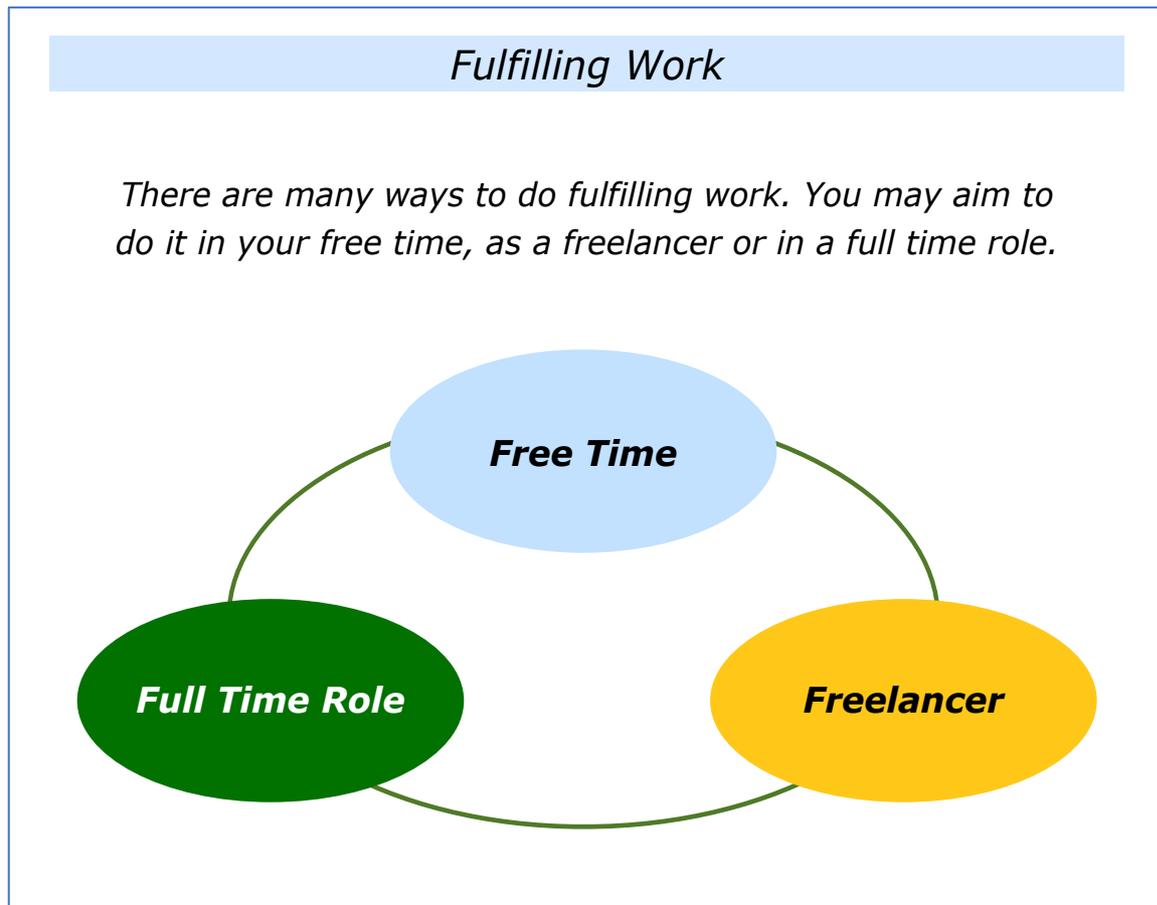

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Fulfilling Work Approach

There are many ways to do fulfilling work. You may aim to do it in a full time role, as a freelancer and in your free time. Let's explore these themes.

Fulfilling Work

People love to do fulfilling work. But some individuals may reach a point where they find it difficult to do such work in their full time role. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I used to love my work. At first it was a mission, then it became a career and now it is just a job. Much of my day is spent on work that is not satisfying. I would like to recapture the joy I had when looking forward to each day."

Imagine that you want to find ways to do fulfilling work. One way to start is by describing the kinds of work you find fulfilling. Here are some of the answers that people give when exploring this theme.

Fulfilling Work. The kinds of work that I find fulfilling are:

Encouraging people ... Passing on knowledge ... Helping people overcome setbacks ... Writing manuals ... Developing software ... Helping customers to succeed ... Solving certain kinds of problems ... Leading teams.

You will, of course, have your own approach to doing such work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Fulfilling Work

The kinds of work that I find fulfilling are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you have described the kinds of work you find fulfilling. You may then want to explore the different ways you can aim to do such work. Let's explore these situations.

Fulfilling Work In Your Free Time

Many people aim to do fulfilling work in their free time. They pursue a hobby, perform creative work or do other activities they find fascinating. They find this gives them strength to deal with other aspects of their lives.

Some people in full time work are now taking a three pronged approach to shaping their futures. Recognising that the world of work is changing, they are focusing on the following themes.

First, they are continuing to perform superb work in their day job. Acting as positive models, they are being super professional and making a great contribution to their employer.

Second, they are spending time doing a side project. They may be developing an app, starting a small business, having their own web site or doing another activity.

Some see this side project as their play pen – a place where they can do things they love. Some see it as a place where they can share knowledge. Some see it as a potential shop window.

Such people get positive energy from doing the side project. Sometimes it can also lead to their work getting noticed and, in some cases, lead to them being hired or developing a new career.

Third, they are encouraging people in their network. They are being generous and passing on knowledge. They are not looking for anything in return but sometimes it can result in other benefits.

There are many ways to doing fulfilling work. Some people can find more ways to do this in a full time role. Some make a living doing freelance work for different employers. Some do such work during their free time.

Imagine that you want to pursue the latter route. The final exercise invites you to complete the following sentences.

Fulfilling Work In My Free Time

*The specific kind of fulfilling work
I would like to do in my free time is:*

*

The specific things I can do to do this kind of fulfilling work are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing this kind of fulfilling work will be:

*

*

*

Fulfilling Work As A Freelancer

Some people see themselves as professional freelancers – even if they have a full time role. Seeing themselves on a rolling contract, they aim to build on their strengths, do superb work and deliver success. This increases the chances of the contract being extended.

Some people choose to do fulfilling work as an actual freelancer. Bearing in mind their strengths, they look for opportunities to do such work that will help people to succeed.

Some individuals focus on doing one main project – especially if it can provide a good financial platform. Some get their income from doing two, three or more projects.

Such people maintain a freelance mentality, however, and plant seeds for potential future projects. They believe in continually increasing their options for future work.

Different freelancers build their portfolios in different ways. One approach is for them to keep exploring the following themes.

What is the kind of fulfilling work I like to do? What are the specific things I can deliver? How would delivering these help people to reach their goals?

Who may be the specific kinds of people, employers or organisations that I could help? What are the challenges they face? How could I do fulfilling work and help them to succeed?

How can I keep helping my present customers? How can I continue to give great service? How can I continue to help them to succeed? How can I look for potential ways to help them in the future?

Imagine that you want to do fulfilling work as a freelancer. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Fulfilling Work As A Freelancer

*The specific kind of fulfilling work
I would like to do as a freelancer is:*

*

The specific things I could deliver to help a customer, employer or organisation to tackle challenges or achieve their goals are:

*

*

*

The specific steps I can take to find and do such work as a freelancer are:

*

*

*

Fulfilling Work In A Full Time Role

Some people grew up with the idea that they would be able to do their ideal work in a specific full time role. Sometimes this can be the case but there may be occasions when it is not true.

A person may find that much of their time is spent doing tasks that are unsatisfying. Whilst they try to play to their strengths, they may find it hard to squeeze in time to do satisfying work.

This can lead to frustration. Such a person may find their mind occupied by doing unrewarding tasks. They may also get out of the habit of doing what they do best.

How to tackle this challenge? One approach is to reverse the way in which they think about their role. It is to focus on the steps they can take:

To do fulfilling work in their full time role;

To do the other work in their full time role.

Certainly the other work needs to get done – because otherwise they might get the sack. It is important to start, however, by focusing on doing the kinds of work they find fulfilling.

This approach involves having a positive mindset. It encourages a person to focus on the things they can do: a) to rekindle joy in their job and make their best contribution; b) to find creative ways to do the other kinds of work.

Imagine that you want to take this approach. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to begin by focusing on the fulfilling work you can do in your full time role. It then invites you to clarify how to make sure the other work gets done.

The exercise calls for begin creative in your thinking and the answers may not come straight away. It is often possible to take these steps, however, and do fulfilling work in your full time role.

Fulfilling Work In A Full Time Role

Fulfilling Work: The steps I can take to do fulfilling work in my full time role are:

*

*

*

Other Work: The steps I can take to do the other work in my full time role are:

*

*

*

The Delight Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach to focus on doing things that give you or other people delight. It is then to do your best to deliver the goods.

There are many definitions for the word delight. Here are some that involve helping people to enjoy such an experience.

Delight

It is a positive feeling of enjoyment, satisfaction, pleasure, happiness or even rapture.

During the past fifty years I have met or learned from people who took this approach. These included people who worked in the caring professions, education, hospitality, sports, business and other walks of life. Let's look at some examples.

Delight In Education

Many educators believe it is vital to create a positive environment in which people can thrive. This approach can be used to encourage people to learn at any age.

Henry Pluckrose followed this approach at Prior Weston Primary School in the 1970s. This state school became famous and attracted visitors from around the world.

I was fortunate to visit the school on several occasions. It created a magical environment in which children and teachers were encouraged to do their best work.

The school was based on how children learn. The teachers translated these principles into action and enabled the children to master the basic skills – reading, writing and arithmetic – plus excel in the creative arts.

Here is an introduction to the principles people followed to help students to learn. This is followed by Henry's view on the purpose of schools.

Learning

- Learning must be based on how people learn ... Learning must be related to the individual's needs ... Learning must be relevant and able to be applied.
- Learning must help children to master the basic skills – such as reading, writing and mathematics ... Learning must encourage them to use their imagination and be creative.
- Learning must inspire them to be lifelong learners ... Learning must be for today and tomorrow ... Learning must encourage them to work towards a feeling of accomplishment.

*Henry's View Of The School
Of Tomorrow – Written In 1975*

My school of tomorrow will be rooted in the community. It will be a place of trust and openness.

It will be a place where young and old are respected for what they are, a place whose ethos is based upon the responsible use of freedom.

It will be a place where exploration and discovery are related to the young person's real needs for the present and the future.

It will be an institution flexible enough to meet change, yet one that gives a feeling of security and purpose to all who work within it.

And if we fail to adjust to the changes needed to enable schools to play a more radical part in our society?

If intellectual elitism is perpetuated to the exclusion of other, more eternal values?

Then I would suggest that we will be failing to prepare children for adult life in tomorrow's society.

Today's disenchanting child is tomorrow's disillusioned adolescent.

And tomorrow's disillusioned adolescent is the unsympathetic parent of a generation yet unborn.

Delight In Work Places

Many companies talk about the importance of delighting their customers. Some actually do this in a way that create wins for the customers, wins for the colleagues and wins for the company.

Renata Wallace pursued this approach when creating the four Wallace Spaces in London. These are stimulating venues that provide wonderful service, facilities and food for workshops, seminars and other events.

The places are well-designed and staffed by people who say 'Yes'. The perks include old-fashioned sweets that remind people of their childhoods. Everything is done in a professional way and give people positive memories for life.

I always chose The Wallace Space for running workshops. The participants were delighted and many booked their own courses there. Here are two of their many testimonials plus snapshots of the places.

Every single person, from front of house, through kitchen, washing up, replenishing coffee, doing IT/AV and serving cupcakes, was interested in who we were and what we were there for. No-one ever said to me it wasn't their job, even though I frequently asked questions to the wrong people.

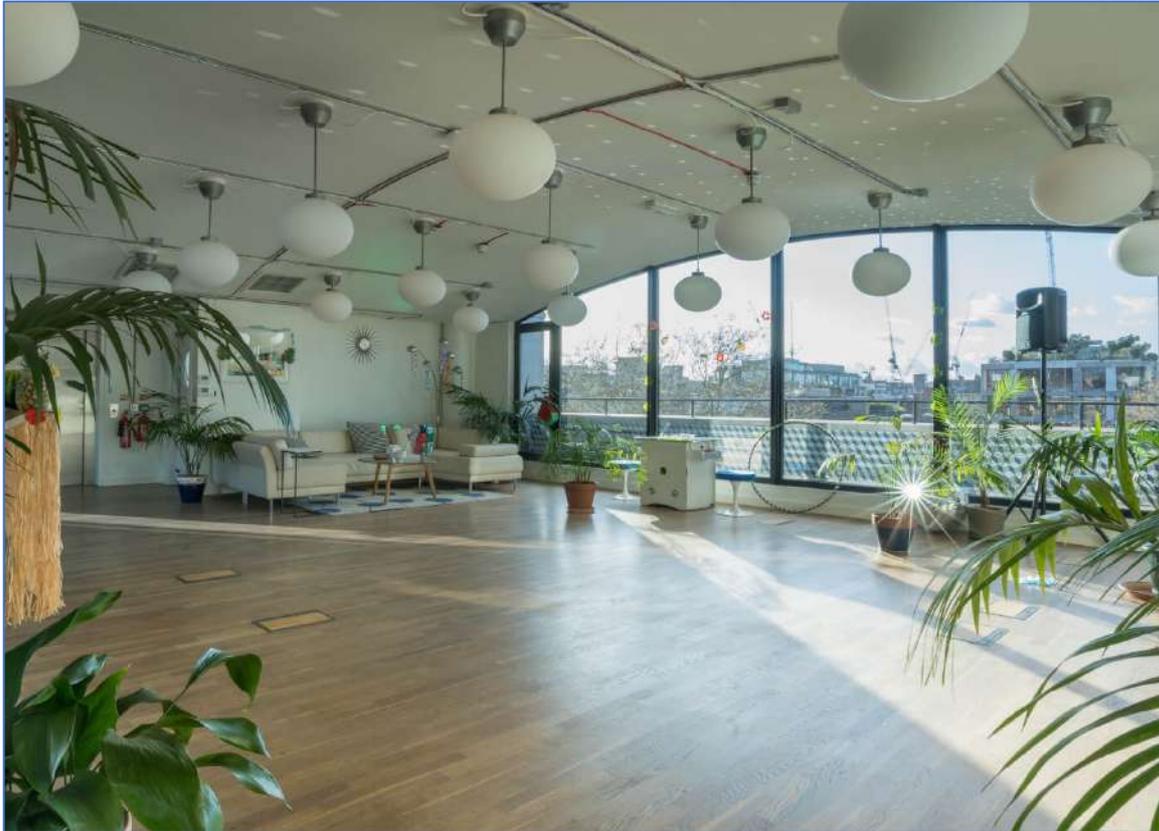

The food – was wonderful, it made me so proud to offer great British cooking and hospitality to people from almost 20 countries. The healthy food was delicious and the tasty meals were good for us – an ideal combination. The attention to detail – cupcakes and even champagne were such a treat. Suffice to say, I'm not sure that I can go back to the basement of an airport hotel with fixed tea breaks and sandwiches for lunch!

Sarah Wylie
Vodafone

The team at wallacespace made it their mission to provide the best service possible for our event. From the first time I enquired about using their space at Clerkenwell I knew we would be well looked after. I was invited to lunch and to look around and was immediately impressed by the quality of the food and the friendly atmosphere in the space. On the night I was thoroughly impressed as I walked in as I had expected to be running around trying to set up the space with tables and glasses, but instead everything was already done, the space looked smart yet elegant and the event went perfectly smoothly from start to finish. I had numerous compliments on the canapés and the venue choice.

Benedict
Wanderlust

Delight In Sports

There are many approaches to sport. Some people aim to create positive memories. Some people aim to produce medals. Some people aim to create positive memories and also sometimes produce medals.

Ange Postecoglou is a soccer coach who builds teams that spread joy and also achieve success. He learned many lessons from his father. During one interview he explained this in the following way.

"My father passed away a couple of years ago. When my teams play I still pretend my father is watching in the grandstand and ask: Would he be enjoying watching this team? That has always been the root of everything I have done."

Ange explained his approach in depth for the website Training Ground Guru. Here is an excerpt from the interview.

Sport Has A Bigger Purpose Than Just Winning

If you dig into the most successful coaches, it's more than just winning.

Most people want to be part of something that's more powerful than saying, 'We want to win this weekend.'

Every team in the world wants to win. That's not what sets you apart, that's not what's going to get your players and staff motivated to come into work the next day.

That never-ending cycle of just wanting to win will wear you out.

You need to make them believe they are part of something special, something more powerful than just winning.

For us, our utopia is playing the kind of football that means our supporters don't sit down for 90 minutes.

When you're striving for something like that, I think it gets people motivated to work.

They look forward to that buzz that's more important than winning.

Because sometimes you can win and not really know why you've won.

Everywhere I've coached I've tried for us to be on the front foot.

We have to respect what the opposition bring, but we're not going to let them move us from what we want to do.

Let's return to your own life and work. As mentioned earlier, there are many ways to do fine work. One approach to focus on doing things that give you or other people delight. It is then to do your best to deliver the goods.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How could you follow this approach in your own way? How could you do your best to deliver the goods and help yourself or other people to experience delight? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Delight Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

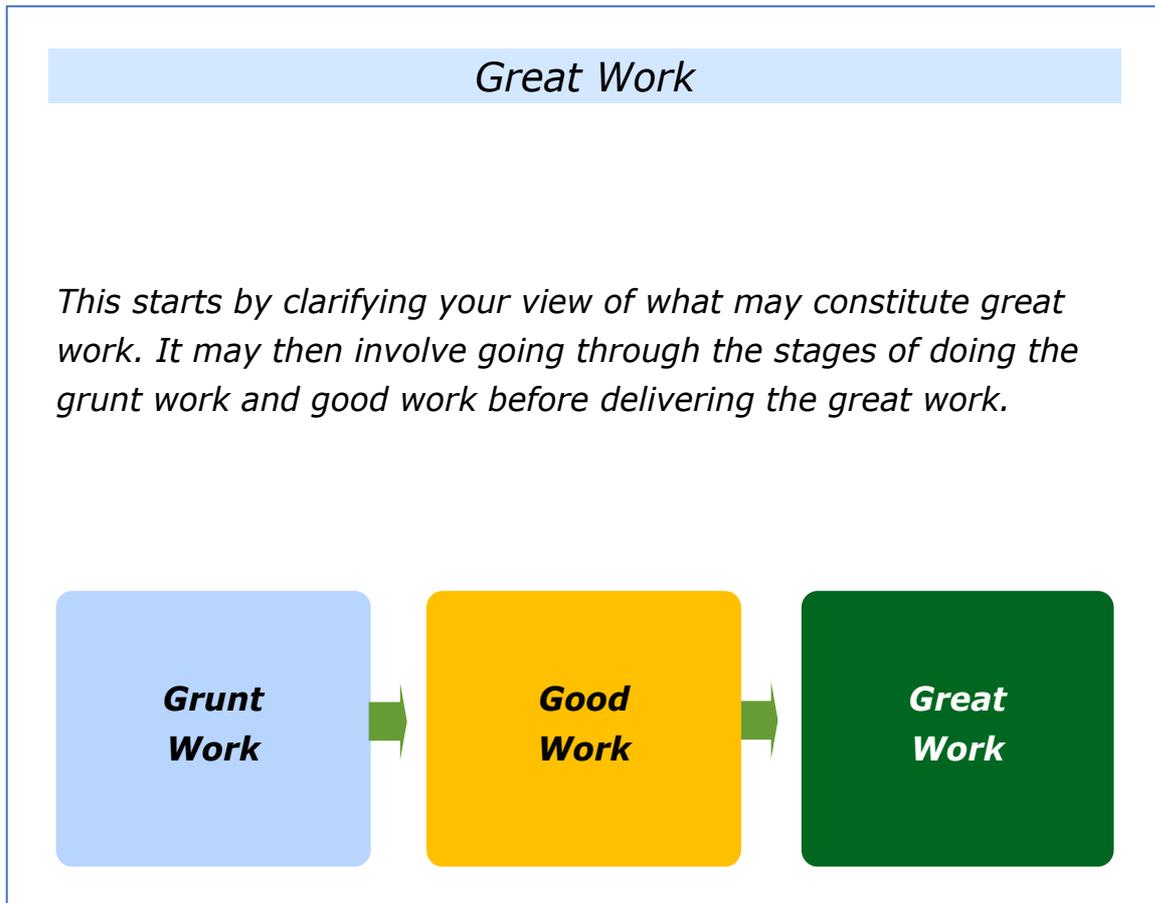

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Grunt Work, Good Work And Great Work Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on a specific activity where you may have the ability to do great work. If appropriate, you can take the following steps.

You can start by focusing on a specific piece of work and clarify what you believe would constitute great work. Moving into action, you can do the necessary grunt and good work on the way towards delivering the great work.

Imagine you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can take these steps.

Great Work

The first step involves building on your strengths and translating these into doing a specific piece of work. You can then clarify the specific results you want to deliver that you believe may constitute great work. Let's look at some examples.

The artist may imagine the finished picture they want to produce. The athlete may imagine the performance they want to deliver in the final of the Olympic Games. The mentor may imagine the actual words they would like a mentee to be saying after a mentoring session.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to start by describing the piece of work you want to do. Bearing this in mind, it then invites you to work through the following steps.

Great Work. The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The specific results I want to deliver that I believe may constitute great work are:

*

*

*

The specific strategies I can follow to increase the chances of achieving these results and delivering great work are:

*

*

*

Grunt Work

This step involves doing the grunt work necessary for providing the foundation for doing the great work. Different people will do this in different ways depending on their chosen work.

The gardener continues to create fertile ground in which things can grow. The aspiring actor works in repertory theatres to develop their skills. The sports team attends boot camp to master the basics that will later enable them to deliver brilliance.

People are often happy to do the grunt work providing they can see how it will contribute to doing the great work. Some actually love this part of journey towards achieving their picture of success.

Imagine you aim to do a specific piece of work. What may the grunt work you need to do to provide the foundation for doing the good work and the great work? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Grunt Work. The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The specific kinds of grunt work I need to do to provide the foundation for doing the good and great work are:

*

*

*

Good Work

This step involves developing the habit of doing consistently good work. This is an approach that many workers continue to follow throughout their life.

Great workers often have a pattern of starting to produce good work in their early careers. They may do this when working as a writer, chef, teacher, carpenter or in another role. They then begin to develop consistency.

Some young footballers, for example, sometimes produce good performances but then fall away. Some commit themselves to their careers and focus on continuous improvement. This can result in them beginning to deliver consistently good performances.

Imagine you are aiming to do a specific piece of work. How can you get into the habit of doing consistently good work? How can then you embody the Japanese concept of Kaizen and focus on continuous improvement? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Good Work. The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The specific things I can do to produce consistently good work and focus on continuous improvement are:

*

*

*

Great Work

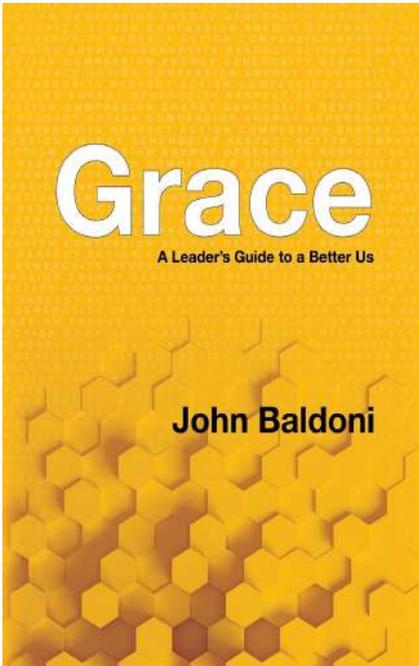

There are many models for doing great work. One approach is for people to build on their gifts. It is then to demonstrate the qualities of graciousness and grit on the way towards doing great work. Let's explore these themes.

Graciousness

Great workers are sometimes grateful for the gifts they have been given and demonstrate generosity of spirit. They may also show graciousness when pursuing the path they have been given the opportunity to follow.

John Baldoni explored these themes in his book Grace: A Leader's Guide To A Better Us. He created an acronym to describe some of the qualities demonstrated by such leaders. Here is an overview of his model.

John Baldoni On Grace

G is for Generosity: the will to do something for others.

R is for Respect: the dignity of life and work.

A is for Action: the mechanism for change.

C is for Compassion: the concern for others.

E is for Energy: the spirit that catalyzes us.

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the specific things you do well to demonstrate grace? What can you do better and how? What will be the benefits of continuing to do what you do well and also improve in the other areas?

Grit

Great workers demonstrate grit. Such people often retain the mentality of being a challenger. They continue to be positive, focus on possibilities and give everything to achieve their picture of success.

Grit is an interesting topic. A person may demonstrate it in the area they find fascinating and in which they excel but not necessarily in other areas. They may demonstrate it when doing a specific activity, playing a sport, managing certain kinds of crises or tackling particular challenges.

Grit

Some people demonstrate grit when doing specific activities and in certain situations. Drawing on their inner resources, they demonstrate the grit required:

-  To stay positive and manage their personal emotions;
-  To keep following their principles and be persistent;
-  To recover from potential setbacks and find solutions to problems.

What are the specific activities where you show grit? What are the things you do right then to demonstrate grit? How can you continue to follow these principles?

Great Work

Great workers aim to keep improving. They continue to build on their strengths and follow strategies that work. They then sometimes do something special to perform great work and achieve their picture of success.

Different people do this in different ways. Emma Barnett, the broadcaster, used her skills to promote care for women experiencing endometriosis. Deborah James raised millions for research into bowel cancer by using her communication talents and the twitter name bowelbabe.

Sadio Mané and Didier Drogba are just two of the many Champion's League winners who have used their wealth to fund social projects in their countries of birth. Tanni Grey-Thompson won 16 Paralympic Medal and then went on to become the patron of many charities.

Roy Orbison, the singer, acted with grace and humility when making use of his talents to give great performances. David Attenborough created compelling television series that increased people's awareness of the need to take care of the planet.

Let's return to your own situation. What may be the specific piece of work where you may want to do great work?

How can you do the necessary grunt work? How can you do consistently good work? How can you do your best to deliver great work? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Great Work

The specific piece of work I may want to do my best to do great work may be:

*

The specific things I can do to do the grunt work, good work and great work are:

*

*

*

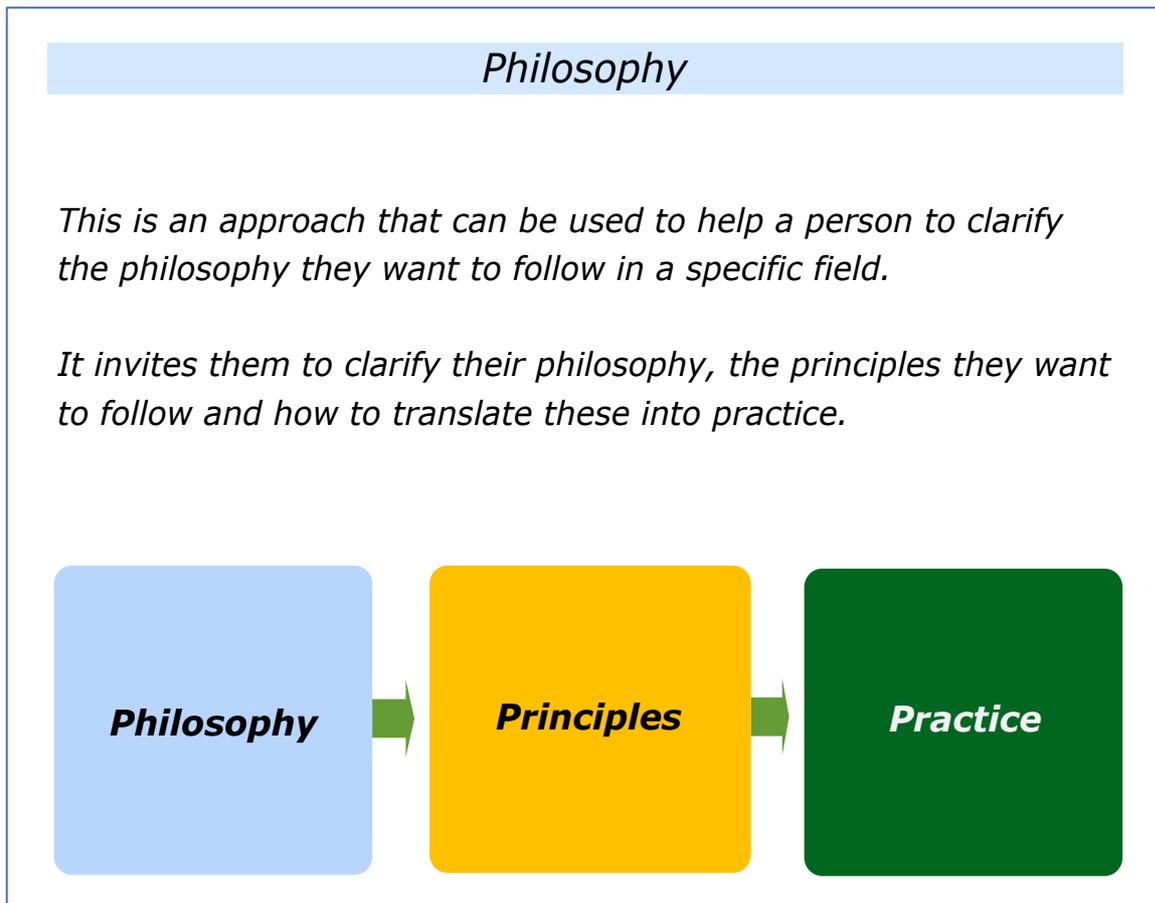

The specific benefits of delivering the piece of great work may be:

*

*

*

The Philosophy, Principles And Practice Approach

This is an approach that can be used to help a person to clarify the philosophy they want to follow in their professional work. They may be aiming to encourage people, pass on knowledge, lead teams or do another activity.

This approach also helps them to focus on the guiding principles they want to follow. The aim is to help them:

To clarify their philosophy;

To clarify the principles they want to follow to translate their philosophy into action;

To clarify the specific ways they want to put these principles into practice and, if possible, to get positive results.

The following pages describe one approach to making this happen. The example given is from a person who was working in the helping professions.

You can adapt this approach in your own way to customise it to the person and their professional contribution. It involves helping a person to work through the following steps.

Philosophy

John was already doing some work that involved counselling and coaching. Bearing this in mind, we began by exploring his strengths.

What were the specific ways in which John liked to help people?

What were the specific activities that - when he did these - gave him positive energy?

Which of these activities were those where he may have the ability to help people do superb work?

John enjoyed help people to develop. Sometimes he did this by counselling troubled people. Sometimes by helping people to take care of their wellbeing. Sometimes by helping young athletes to improve their performance.

Bearing these things in mind, I invited John to do an exercise that I have often done with people in the helping professions. This invited him to clarify his philosophy about how he believed people grew.

Here are the reasons for doing such an exercise with people in the helping professions. People workers can gain strength:

By clarifying their philosophy – their beliefs – about how people grow;

By clarifying the principles they therefore want to follow to help people to grow;

By clarifying how they can use their strengths to translate these principles into practice and help people grow.

Different people workers give different answers when exploring this theme. Here are some of the answers they give.

I believe that people grow by:

Being given encouragement ... Taking responsibility ... Setting clear goals ... Working to achieve those goals ... Building on their strengths ... Following strategies they believe in ... Learning from positive models.

Learning life skills they can use to shape their futures ... Learning to find solutions to challenges ... Being committed to continuous improvement ... Helping other people ... Getting successes.

John clarified how he believed that people could grow. This included caring for their wellbeing, doing fulfilling work and earning enough money to support their lifestyle.

As mentioned earlier, this kind of exercise can be adapted by people to fit their professional work. Here is a framework that people can use when clarifying their philosophy.

My Professional Philosophy

The professional work I want to do is:

*

The specific things that I believe in – such as the things that I believe are important - when doing such professional work are:

*

*

*

An educator may say, for example;

"I believe it is important to encourage, educate and enable people to achieve ongoing success."

A designer may say:

"I believe it is important to design things that are simple – but in a profound way - satisfying and successful."

A technical expert may say:

"I believe it is important to provide technical products and services that help people to simplify their lives."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific activity or area in which you would like to clarify your philosophy.

Describe your philosophy in this specific activity or area.

You may want to start brainstorming by beginning with the words: "I believe it is important to ..." or "I want to ..."

Keep going until you feel empty. Then try to summarise your beliefs or the things you want to do. The things you write may evolve over the years. For the moment, however, write this summary as your philosophy.

Describe the specific reasons why you believe in this philosophy.

You may believe in it because it follows certain beliefs or principles. You may also believe that following it will bring benefits to people.

Philosophy

*The specific activity or area in which
I want to clarify my philosophy is:*

*

The specific things that I believe in – such as the things that I believe are important – in this activity or area are:

*

*

*

The specific reasons why I believe in this philosophy are:

*

*

*

Principles

The philosophy clarifies what a person believes in and why. The principles describe the guidelines they want to follow to translate this philosophy into action.

How to take this step? One approach is for a person to revisit their philosophy. They can then brainstorm and settle on for, example, the three key principles they can follow to translate it into action. Here is the exercise on this theme.

My Philosophy is:

*

The principles I can follow to translate this philosophy into action are:

*

*

*

John revisited his philosophy. He wanted to help people to take care of their wellbeing, do fulfilling work and get enough wealth to support their chosen lifestyle.

Bearing in mind the work he enjoyed doing, John brainstormed the principles he wanted to follow when translating his philosophy into action. He wanted:

To work with motivated people who wanted to shape their future lives and help them to set clear goals;

To pass on knowledge and practical tips they could use to achieve their goals;

To help them to integrate this learning into their lives and achieve ongoing success.

Imagine that you want to define the principles you want to follow to translate your philosophy into action. Here is an exercise that you can use to begin shaping these principles.

Principles

The philosophy I have in the specific activity or area where I want to do professional work is:

*

*

*

The principles I can follow to translate this philosophy into action are:

*

*

*

Practice

Now comes the crunch part. Many people believe in philosophies and principles, but sometimes they find it challenging to put these into practice.

How to make this happen? One approach is for a person to bear in mind their strengths and the satisfying work they enjoy doing. It is then:

To clarify again their philosophy and the principles they want to follow;

To clarify the specific things they can do to build on their strengths and translate their principles into action;

To clarify their specific action plan for taking these steps and doing their best to achieve positive results.

John chose: a) to continue his counselling work with young people; b) to provide coaching services for people in organisations and help them to deliver high performance; c) to pursue a professional qualification that would enable him to focus on a specific niche in wellbeing.

He went on to publish a book that helped to establish his credibility. This led to John working with more organisations that wanted their people to stay healthy whilst also delivering high professional standards.

Let's return to your own professional work. Imagine that you have clarified your philosophy and principles. How can you build on your strengths and translate these into action?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Practice

The principles I want to follow in a specific activity or area are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on my strengths and translate these into action are:

*

*

*

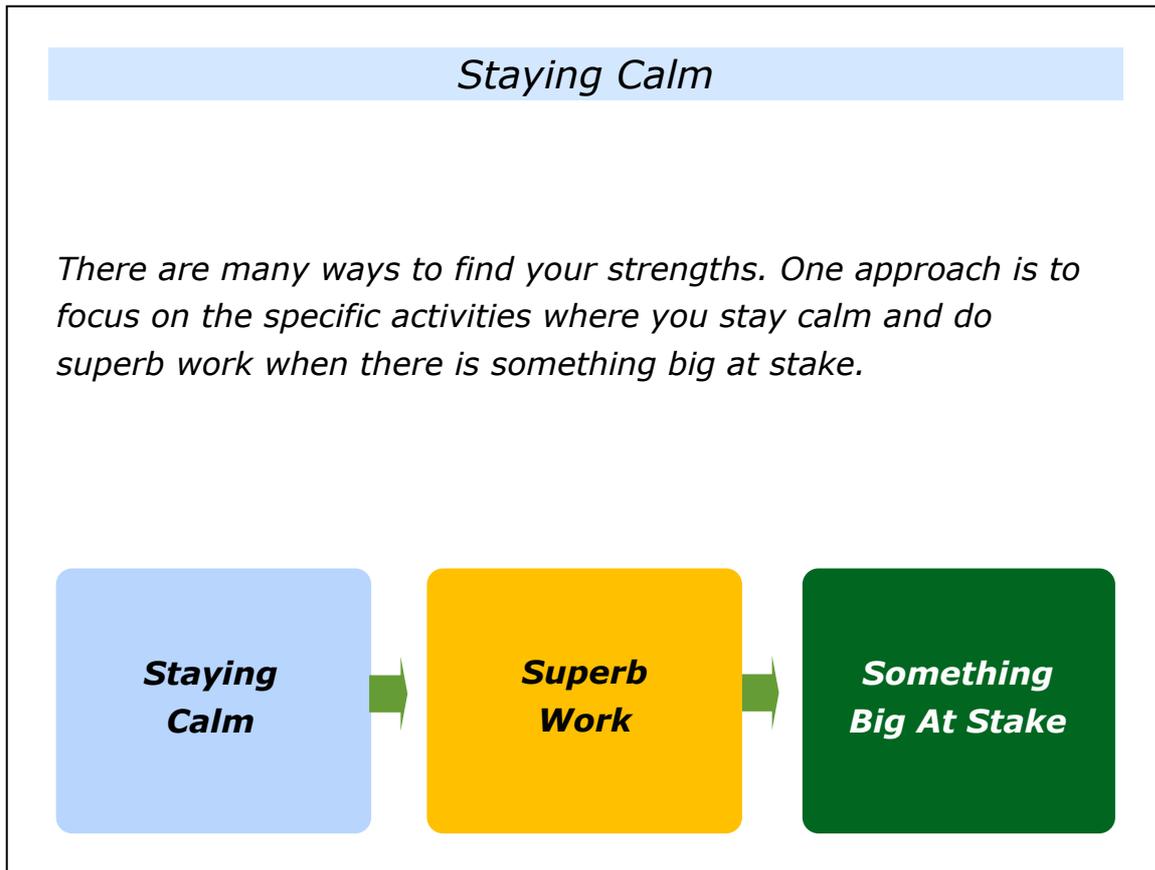

The specific benefits – for myself and for other people – of taking these steps will be:

*

*

*

The Staying Calm And Doing Superb Work When Something Big Is At Stake Approach

There are many ways to find your strengths. One approach is to focus on the specific activity where you stay calm and do superb work when there is something big at stake. Let's explore these themes.

Staying Calm

What are the specific activities where you stay calm? Different people do this in different situations.

Some people seem to do this naturally. They seem to have more time to do things than other people. They then apply their strengths to do superb work that delivers success.

Some great athletes do this on great occasions. Staying calm whilst others are frantic, they clarify the possible routes forward. Reaching into their repertoire, they then pursue their chosen strategy to deliver great performances.

The paramedic stays calm when arriving at the scene of the accident. Seeing the whole picture, they recognise what must be done to help people recover. Picking their way through the wreckage, they take the necessary steps towards saving lives.

Some people develop this ability over the years. They may explore many kinds of work and, whilst they may be successful, they may take some time to find their main strength.

Looking at my own work, for example, I spent much of my life running workshops for teams. These often involved following frameworks that worked and providing people with practical tools that delivered success.

The workshops were enjoyable and exciting. They also involved spending a lot of time being on stage. Sometimes this could be both exhilarating and exhausting.

During my fifties I began doing more one-to-one mentoring. I loved everything about the sessions. These involved preparing properly, clarifying the person's agenda and helping them to achieve their picture of success.

There was one surprise I got when mentoring. Whatever the issue we were tackling, I felt calm, clear and able to offer practical ideas that helped the person to achieve their goals.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a specific activity where you stay calm and do superb work when something big is at stake? What do you do then to do your best when performing the specific activity?

You may be facilitating a coaching session, giving a keynote speech, solving a computer problem, working in Accident & Emergency or doing another activity. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Staying Calm

The specific activity where I may stay calm and do superb work when there may be something big at stake may be:

*

The specific things I do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

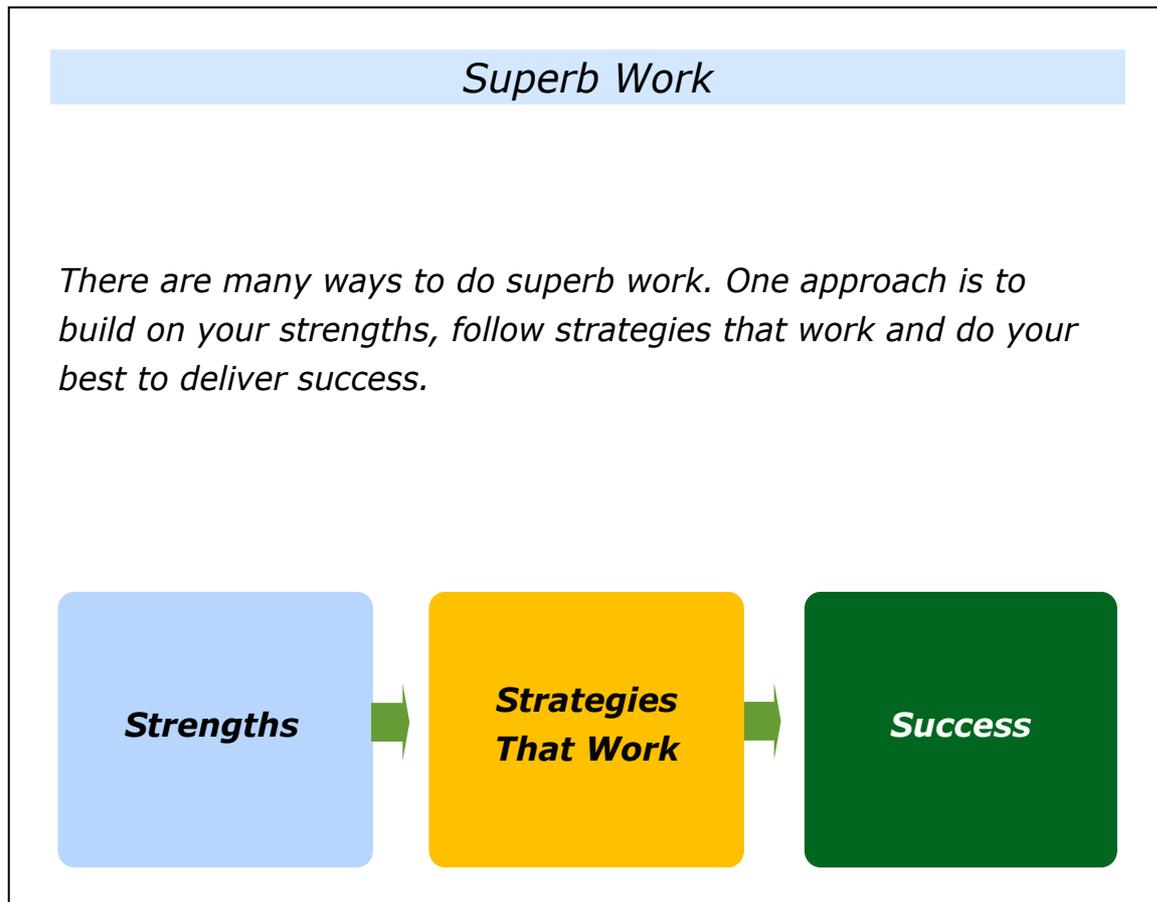

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Superb Work

Imagine that you are doing a specific activity where you stay calm even when there is something big at stake. You may then aim to do superb work.

Different people take this step in different ways. Bearing in mind the results they want to achieve, some people focus on the following themes when aiming to achieve success.

Strengths

Such people build on their strengths and compensate for any weaknesses. They also aim to follow their successful style of working when working to achieve their goals.

Strategies That Work

They study what works and aim to do what works. Bearing in mind the goals, they follow the strategies most likely to achieve success. They then apply themselves fully and deliver consistently high professional standards.

Success

Such people keep reading reality. They keep building on what is working and tackling areas for improvement. They then do their best to achieve the picture of success.

You will have your own approach to doing superb work. Sometimes this will also involve pursuing your own way of managing the following challenge.

Something Big At Stake

Different people use different strategies for managing situations where there is something big is at stake. Here are some ways that people describe their approaches.

"I aim to stay positive and follow my principles. The biggest thing at stake for me is my integrity. It is to do what I believe in and do my best to achieve the goals."

"I tell the sports team I coach to follow the advice given by Bill Walsh, the famous American Football coach. Providing we deliver the required standards of performance, the score takes care of itself."

"Whatever the size of the deal, I focus on helping the potential customer to achieve success. I take this approach rather than trying to sell something. Paradoxically, this often results in making the sale."

Many years ago I had an experience that mirrors some of these themes. A large technology company said they wanted a programme where people could build on their strengths.

The first contacts went well and several strengths workshops were arranged. But then the company made another request which threw the plans into chaos.

They had recently purchased an online training tool that was geared to people focusing on their weaknesses. Bearing this in mind, the company asked if we could change the workshops to match the training tool.

The contract was worth more than £250k but there were other things at stake. These involved following certain principles. I suggested they should go with the online training tool and maybe find another supplier who could support it with workshops.

The company promptly did another U-turn. They said they really wanted to do the strengths sessions and would find another use for the online tool.

Looking back, the conversation could have gone another way. But the company continued to use myself and several colleagues for the next five years.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may aim to stay calm and do superb work when there is something big at stake? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Staying Calm And Doing Superb Work When There Is Something Big At Stake

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The How Can I Use This Feeling? Approach

A Person Can Ask Either:

How can I use this feeling?

How can I use it to help myself or other people?

How can I use it to shape a positive future?

How can I let it use me?

How can I let it hurt me or other people?

How can I let it lock me into a negative past?

Many people are feelings driven. Different people follow this approach in different ways.

Sometimes they follow it in a proactive way. They aim to do things that will increase the chances of them feeling loved, happy or successful. They aim to shape a positive future.

Sometimes they follow it in a reactive way. They may try to understand the feeling they are experiencing. They may then aim to find ways to manage the feeling.

Feelings are the material of life. The way we choose to use these feelings can have consequences for both ourselves and other people. It can therefore be useful to try to control the feeling rather than let it control us.

Some people believe in trying to 'work through a feeling'. But there are some feelings you never work through. Another approach is to focus on how you can use the feeling.

Imagine that you have a feeling. This may be because of something you have done or something that has happened. You may have had a success or a setback. You may feel valued or disappointed. Bearing in mind the feeling you have, you can choose to focus on either of the following sets of question.

Positive Questions

How can I use this feeling? How can I use it to help myself or other people? How can I use it to learn from? How can I build on what I did well? How can I do things better in the future? How can I use the feeling to shape a positive future?

Negative Questions

How can I let the feeling use me? How can I let it hurt myself or other people? How can I dwell on the feeling? How can I focus on what I, other people or the world did wrong? How can I let it lock me into a negative past?

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a situation in the future when you may want to focus on how you can use a feeling? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may anticipate having a success or a setback. You may anticipate feeling happy or sad, feeling in control or having less control, feeling energetic or exhausted.

Looking ahead, how can you use the feeling in a positive way? How can you use it to help yourself or other people? How can you use it to shape a positive future?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

How Can I Use This Feeling?

The specific situation in the future when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Clarifying Your Professional Offering Approach

My Professional Offering

Bearing in mind my strengths, the specific things I can offer to help people are these

I can ...

*

*

*

Imagine that you want to clarify what you can offer people in your work. You may want to do this as a freelancer, a full-time employee or in another professional role.

Many people aim to take this step but find it difficult to clarify what they can offer people, teams or organisations. Some search to define their USP – their unique selling proposition – or their personal brand.

Another approach is to do the following exercise. This focuses on the What, How, Who, Why and When involved in clarifying a professional offering.

You can use this approach either: a) to clarify your own offering or; b) to help another person to clarify their offering. You can use it as a framework and, if appropriate, explore each part in depth. Here is the exercise.

Clarifying Your Professional Offering

The What

This involves clarifying the specific things you can offer to help people.

The How

This involves clarifying how you offer these things to people.

The Who

This involves clarifying the specific kinds of people that you can offer these things.

The Why

This involves clarifying the potential benefits to people of offering these things.

The When

This involves clarifying the specific situations when you can offer these things to people.

The What

Start by clarifying your strengths. What are the specific activities in which you can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? Looking back, when have you done satisfying projects that delivered success?

Imagine that you want to do satisfying work in the future. Bearing in mind your strengths, what are the specific things you can offer to people, teams or organisations?

Later you will be invited to clarifying these things in more detail. For the moment, however, try completing the following sentences.

Bearing in mind my strengths, the specific things I can offer to help people are these

I can ...

*

*

*

This seems a simple approach. But it can help to summarise what you can deliver to help people, teams or organisations. Much depends on your specific strengths, of course, and the kinds of work you do.

You may work in the field of health care, coaching, hospitality, technology, business or another area. You may be helping people to heal, enjoy great experiences, solve certain challenges or achieve success.

This approach involves clarifying What you can offer to people, teams or organisations. At this point, however, somebody may say something along the following lines.

"I can understand the importance of clarifying what you offer. But won't everybody in a particular field be offering similar things. What is it that can make you unique."

Let's explore this topic by focusing on the next theme.

The How

Many people will describe a similar What in terms what they say they can help customers to achieve. The difference comes in How they provide the service or product. This is what makes them unique.

You may work in a certain way, for example, that offers people a great customer service experience. You may also use your expertise or provide practical tools in a certain way that enables people to achieve their goals.

The Who

Let's move onto another aspect regarding what you offer – the Who. Who are the kinds of people, teams or organisations with whom you work best? It can be useful to clarify your target audience. How can you continue to work with these people in the future?

The Why

People buy success rather than the theory of success. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to clarify the Why – the potential benefits. How will the specific things you offer help people to have a good experience, solve certain challenges or achieve success?

The When

Finally, it can be good to clarify the kinds of situations When it can be appropriate to provide what you offer. You can also clarify any time frames regarding when and for how long you can offer these things.

There are many ways for a person to clarify their professional offering. Sometimes it can involve asking them the following question.

Bearing in mind your strengths, what are the specific things you can offer to help people?

Let's return to your own work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following steps. If appropriate, you can then continue to develop your professional offering.

My Professional Offering

The What - Bearing in mind my strengths, the specific things I can offer to people are these

I can ...

*

*

*

The How - The specific ways in which I offer these things to people are:

*

*

*

The Who - The specific kinds of people, teams or organisations that I can offer these things to are:

*

*

*

The Why - The potential benefits to people of offering these things are:

*

*

*

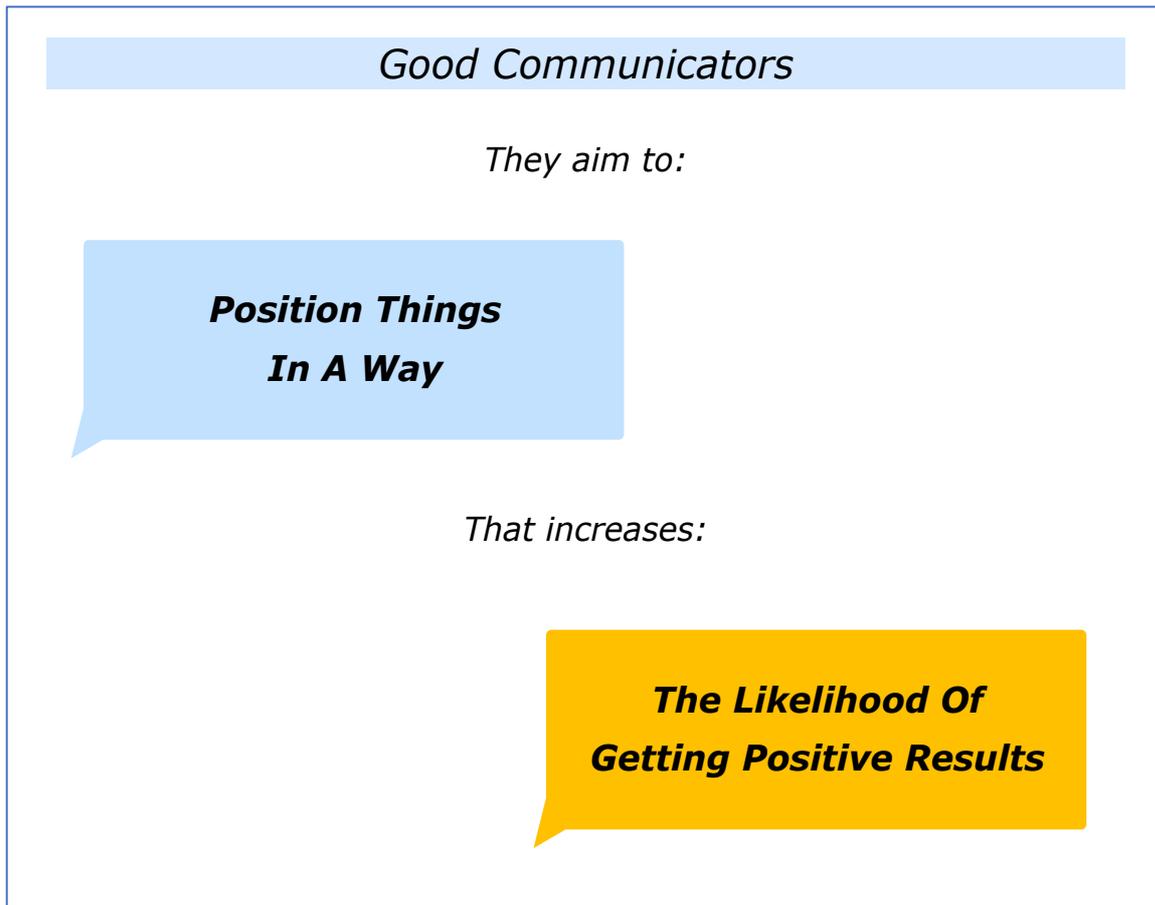

The When - The specific kinds of situations when these things can be offered to people are:

*

*

*

The Positioning Things To Get Positive Results Approach

Good communicators position their messages in a way that increases the chances of getting positive results. They may aim to do this when communicating with another person, a group of people or a specific target audience.

There are many books written on how to position an idea, service or product in ways that are attractive to certain people. Some of these ideas can also be applied to communicating and connecting with people in many settings.

Different communicators follow different models for making this happen. One approach is for them to explore the following themes.

The People

Who are the people that I want to reach? What is happening in their world? What may be the specific challenges they face? What may be their personal or professional goals? What may be their pictures of success?

The Positive Results

What may be the idea, service or product that I want to communicate to these people? What may be the benefits for them if they adopt the idea, service or product?

What may the key messages I therefore want to give people? What are the positive results I want to achieve? What would I like them to be saying, feeling, thinking or doing after the communication?

The Positioning

How can I prepare the ground properly before communicating with the people? How can I set things up to succeed? How can I make sure the messages connect with the audience? How can I bring the ideas to life? How can I show people the positive benefits?

Let's revisit what I want to do. What are the key messages I want to give to people? How can I communicate these in a way that people can accept and use to achieve their goals? What else can I do to increase the likelihood of achieving the desired positive results?

Good communicators aim to connect with their audience. Some say that: "Positioning is all." This is not completely the case. It is also vital to have a message that resonates with the audience and achieves the desired positive results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positioning approach? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positioning Things To Get Positive Results Approach

The specific situation where I want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Framing Conversations Approach

This approach involves setting the framework for focusing on certain themes in a conversation. It encourages people to channel their energies in a certain direction and achieve certain results. When appropriate, it can be used to encourage them to find solutions.

The approach is sometimes used by leaders, facilitators and others who bring people together explore specific topics. They recognise that the way they frame the conversation can have a profound on the process and the outcome.

Let's look at one huge issue in the UK – Brexit. The way this controversial topic has been framed as evolved since the referendum.

Before the June 2016 vote many people framed the conversation in terms of sovereignty. Rightly or wrongly, it focused on the UK having the right to control its own economy and laws.

During the subsequent years the framework for the conversation began to change. Professor Anand Menon pointed out that from 2022 onwards it focused more on economic issues. The conversation began to focus on whether the UK was financially better or worse off since leaving the EU.

The framework for each of these discussions produced different kinds of responses. Ardent Brexiteers maintained that Brexit not been implemented properly. Many other people began to look at the economic case for having better relations with the EU.

Frameworks Can Encourage People To Channel Their Energy In A Certain Way

The frameworks approach is one I was introduced to early in my work with people. Different conversations ensued if you asked, for example:

"What are your personal goals?" rather than "What are your problems?"

"When have overcome challenges successfully?" rather than "When have you failed?"

"How can we try to find – as far as possible – win-win solutions?" rather than "Who is to blame?"

The framework you use in a conversation can have a profound effect on the way people channel their energy. It can encourage them to focus on certain topics and, when appropriate, achieve certain results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the frameworks approach?

What may be the specific situation? What may be the framework you want to use? How can you use this in a way that, if appropriate, increases the likelihood of getting certain results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Framing Conversations

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the framing conversations approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

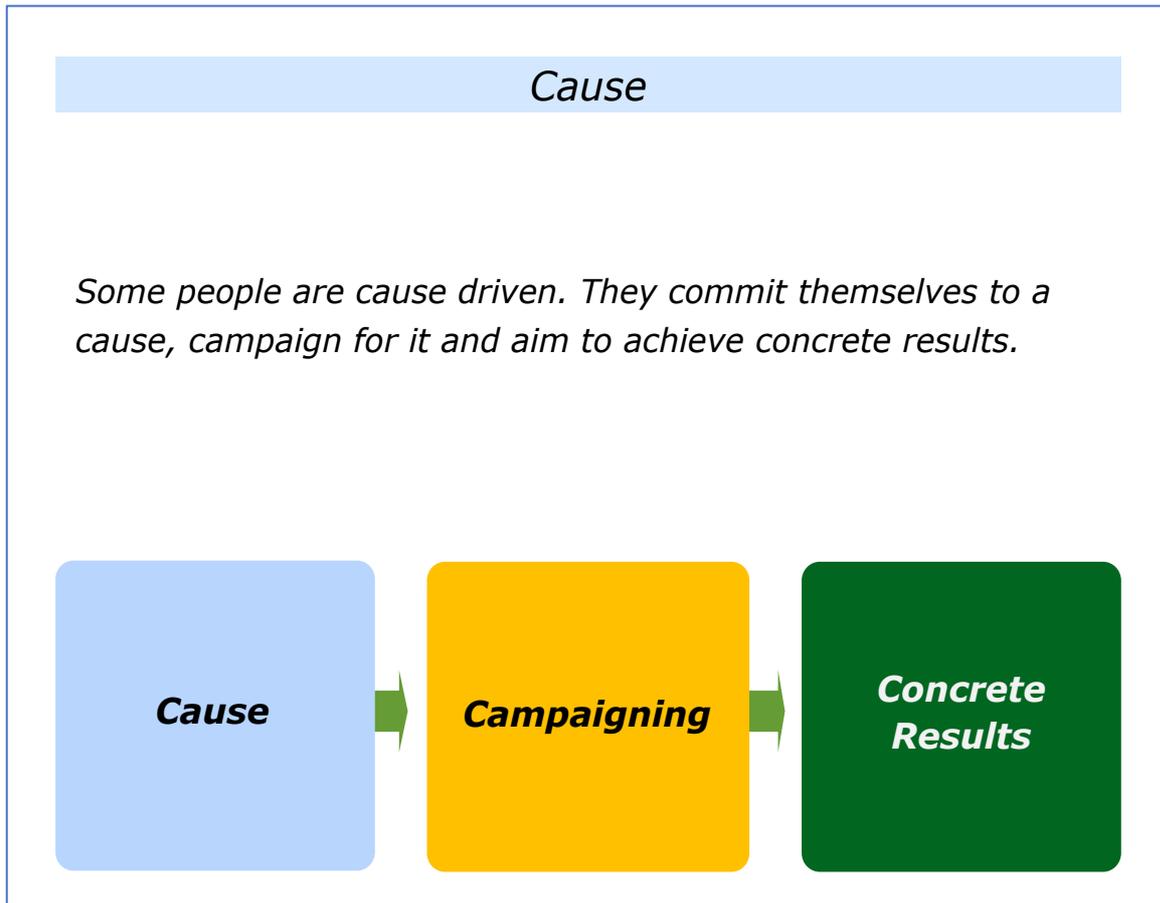

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Cause Driven Approach

Some people are cause driven. They commit themselves to a cause, campaign for it and aim to achieve concrete results. Such an approach can have pluses and minus for both themselves and other people.

Imagine that someone wants to take this approach. Let's explore how they may translate it into action.

Cause

Different people are motivated to pursue different causes for different reasons. These include the following approaches

Personal Cause

Some people follow a cause for personal reasons. They or their loved ones may have experienced an illness, injustice or challenging circumstances. They may then aim to help people who face similar situations.

Philosophical Cause

Some people follow a cause for philosophical reasons. They may believe in a spiritual path, principles or a moral code. They translate their beliefs into action by focusing on specific issues that embody their philosophy.

Political Cause

Some people follow a cause that, in the broadest sense, may have a political perspective. They may promote certain views regarding how people can be encouraged or allowed to live in a society.

Imagine that a person has found a cause they want to pursue. They may then move on to the next stage.

Campaigning

Different people choose to campaign for a cause in different ways. Let's explore some of these approaches.

Some people commit to practical action. They aim to act as positive models and take practical steps to follow their cause in their own lives or work.

A person who cares about helping children with dyslexia, for example, may run seminars that about how to build on the strengths of such children. They may also provide a web site and other tools on this theme.

Some people may focus on communication when campaigning. They may publish material or appear in the media to communicate their key messages to a specific audience.

Some do this in positive and professional ways. Some communicate in ways that play on fear or involve direct action that disrupts people's lives. They do this to draw attention to their cause.

Concrete Results

People who pursue a cause often want to raise other people's consciousness about the issues. They also want to achieve successes and see their desired concrete results.

Those that achieve their aims sometimes follow the principles most likely to produce success. They build on what they can control and take the following steps.

They focus on a specific issue, set an achievable goal and follow the strategies most like to achieve success;

They show people the benefits of achieving the goals and the practical ways to achieve success;

They focus on the people who are most likely to be open to the ideas, get positive results and publicise these by producing success stories.

Some people recognise that, whilst they can get some wins, they realise it may also be a lifetime journey. They know it can take a long time to produce long lasting change or sustainable success.

People who pursue a cause can experience both pluses and minuses. Some learn how to build on the pluses and manage the minuses.

The pluses may include having a sense of purpose, feeling alive and sometimes achieving positive results. The minuses may include neglecting other areas of life – such as their loved ones – and not achieving the desired results.

Some people continue to follow their chosen cause. Some choose to pursue another cause. Some move on to focusing on other areas of their personal or professional lives.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some elements of the cause approach?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Cause Driven Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

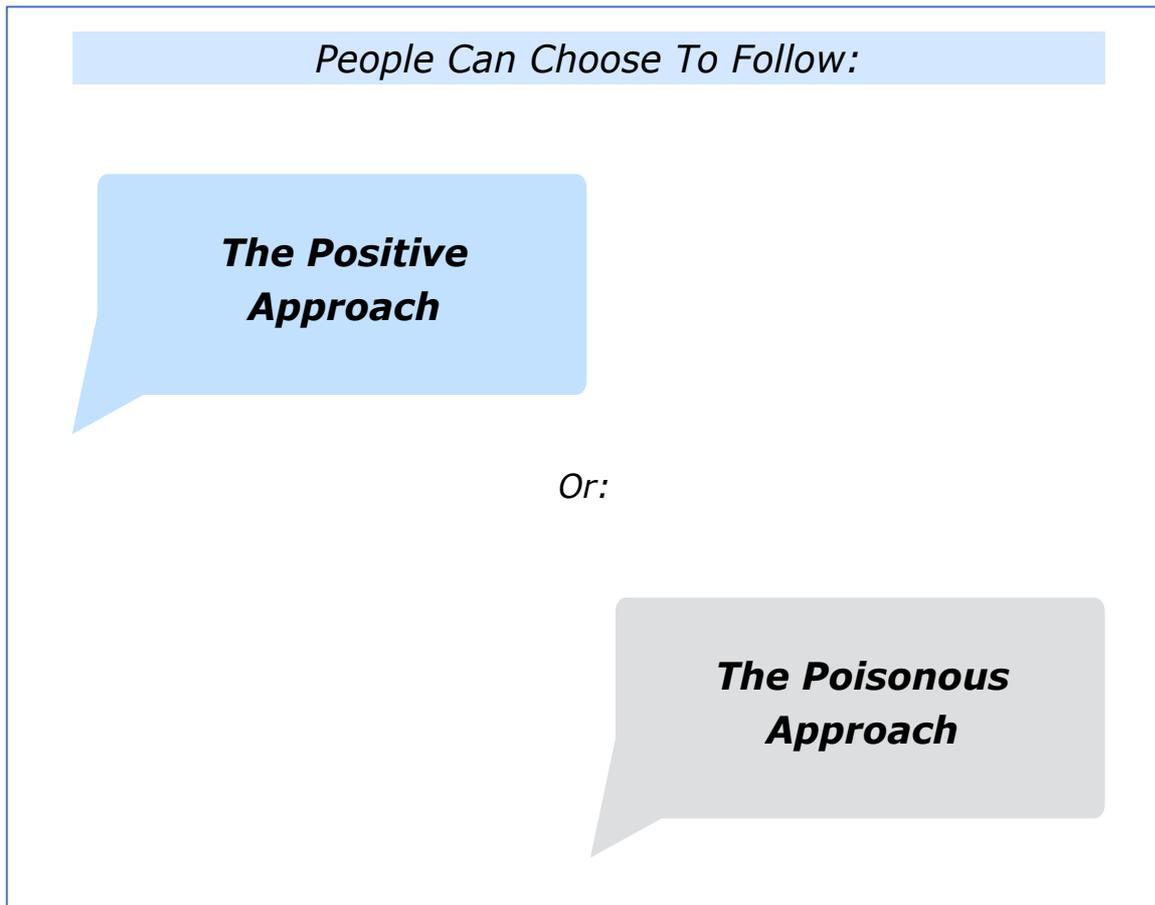

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Approach Rather Than The Poisonous Approach

Different people choose to follow different routes in life. The approach they follow can have positive or negative consequences for both themselves and other people.

Some people choose to follow the positive approach. They focus on positive attitudes, aspirations and actions. They also focus on positive alternatives – such as solutions to challenges – and achievements.

Some people follow the poisonous approach. They may be addicted to anger or hurting others. They may also act in ways that spread poison. This can create collateral damage and pain for other people.

Different people follow these routes for different reasons. Some choose to follow a certain route because they recognise the old saying that:

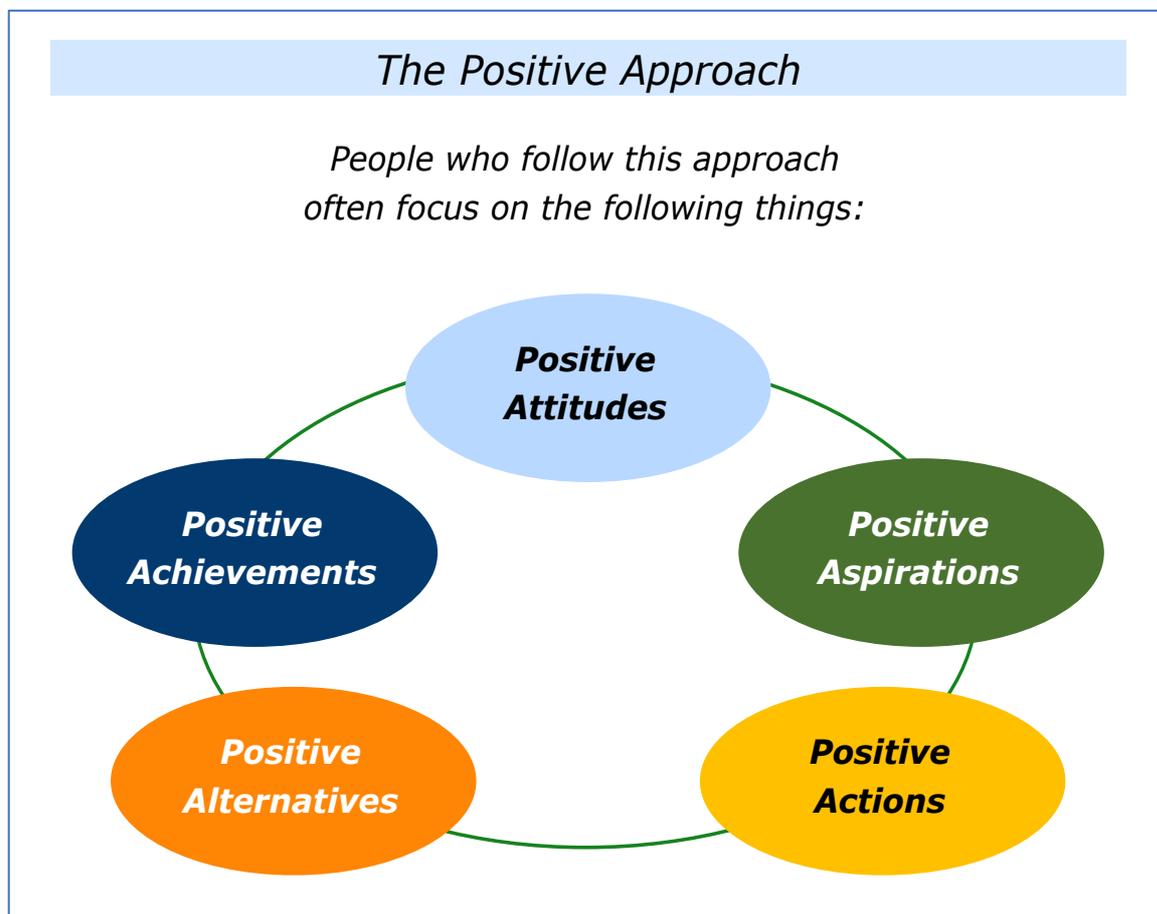

What We Focus On We Become

If we focus on positive things – and the possible solutions to challenges – we are more likely to feel positive. We are then more likely to behave in positive ways towards other people.

If we focus on poisonous things – without finding possible solutions – we are more likely to put poison into our system. We are then more likely to spread this feeling towards other people.

The Positive Approach

Some people choose to follow the positive approach. They focus on the following themes.

Positive Attitudes

People who take this approach start with themselves. They choose to be positive rather than negative, be creators rather than complainers, take responsibility rather than avoid responsibility.

They build on what they can control. They also good at reading reality and recognising patterns. They then aim to build on the successful patterns and manage the consequences of any unsuccessful patterns.

Such people study others who have positive attitudes. They learn from people who have built on their strengths, managed adversity and done their best to tackle challenges.

They have a sense of gratitude and enjoy being generous. They focus on what some people call the love part of the brain rather than the lizard part of the brain. They want to help other people during their time on the planet. This links to the next theme.

Positive Aspirations

People who take this approach often focus on positive aspirations. They may aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve their picture of success.

Such people may also help other people to focus on their aspirations. When appropriate, they may encourage them to work towards their personal or professional goals.

Some people take this approach in their work as educators, coaches, trusted advisors, leaders or in other roles. They then aim to provide practical tools that people can use to achieve their goals.

Positive Actions

People who take this approach may aim follow their chosen philosophy, a spiritual faith or a moral compass. They then aim to translate these principles into action in their daily lives and work.

Such people recognise that they make choices every minute. The choices they make have consequences – both for themselves and other people. They therefore aim to act in ways that help rather than hurt other people.

They may also study the characteristics that are admired across many civilisations. These include generosity, kindness and wisdom. They may try to follow these in their own way during their time on the planet.

Positive Alternatives

People who take this approach are prepared to tackle challenges. When doing so, they often study the positive alternatives and strategies that are most likely to work in such situations. Bearing in mind what they can control, they then aim:

To clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the possible options and the consequences – the pluses and minuses of each option – together with any potential creative solutions;

To clarify the route they want to follow, translate it into action and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Such people keep adding to their repertoires for tackling challenges. Some may also pass on these ideas to other people to help them to achieve success. This leads to the next step.

Positive Achievements

People who take this approach often go through the stages of awareness, application and achievement. They love to keep developing, expand their awareness and translate this into setting specific goals.

They then apply themselves fully, perform superb work and find solutions to challenges. They aim to keep improving and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Different people do, of course, have different definitions of success. They may aim to encourage other people, be healthy, build a happy family, deliver a creative project or give positive things to people during their time on the planet.

Some people may also enjoy helping others to achieve their goals. They may therefore aim to find ways to pass on knowledge and practical tools that other people can use to achieve success.

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to follow the positive approach, some follow the poisonous approach. The route they follow can help or hurt people.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, imagine that you want to follow some elements of the positive approach. How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Approach

The specific things I may want to do to follow elements of this approach in my own life or work may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Taking Charge Of Transitions Approach

Taking Charge Of Transitions

People like to feel in control when making transitions. One approach is to help them to build on the best of the past, focus on the present and shape a positive future.

People like to feel in control, especially when faced by the possibility of change. They want to have some influence on shaping their future lives.

This article describes how people can be helped to make transitions when part of a team. They can follow similar principles, however, to make transitions in other areas of their lives.

People sometimes want to cling to the past. Whilst it is good for them to respect the heritage they have built, they may also need to embrace the future.

Imagine that you lead a team that has to make changes in order to stay ahead of the game. Let's explore how to make this happen.

Setting The Scene

Gather people together and explain that you want to focus on how the team can continue to develop. One leader explained this in the following way.

The purpose of this session is to look at how we can continue to shape a successful future.

Looking back, we have done outstanding work when acting as trusted advisors to clients. We have also worked well together when tackling certain crises.

Looking ahead, we must continue to do what we do best. We also need to keep our internal stakeholders happy. The profit targets are mandatory, so we need to find ways to hit these targets.

We also need to be proactive in keeping our stakeholders informed about our progress towards achieving the goals. This will stop them worrying.

Many of our competitors are producing new applications that could put us out of business. We need to build on our strengths and develop ways to help our customers to achieve success.

As you know, several team members are in the process of moving on to other jobs, so we have some openings in the team. One option is to hire more technical specialists.

The other option is to hire more people who can act as co-ordinators. They will run the projects and free you up to do what you do best.

We are moving to a new office. This gives us an opportunity to reconfigure the way we work. At the same time, however, it will be important to keep the good things we like about working together.

My role as a leader is to create a culture in which motivated people can do fine work. Your role is to choose to opt in, encourage other people and help the team to achieve its goals.

Bearing these things in mind, I am going to invite you to share how we can continue to do superb work in the future.

There are many ways to set the scene when inviting people to take charge of a transition. People often work best, however, when they are able to see the big picture.

Building On The Best From The Past

Imagine that you have set the context in your own way. You can then invite people to do the following exercise. Give each person a pile of Post-it Notes. They are to each write ideas on the following themes.

The specific things we want to take forward from the past.

The specific steps we can take to do these things in the future.

The specific benefits of doing these things.

Give people 15 minutes to write their ideas. They are then to each go up in turn and put their ideas on flip charts.

People come up with interesting and sometimes unexpected ideas when doing this exercise. Those in one team wrote, for example:

The specific things we want to take forward from the past are:

The chance to have coffee with the leader ... The chance to input into how we achieve the team's goals ... The ethic of giving great customer service ... The charity work we do mentoring young people in schools ... The chance to work remotely providing we deliver the required results ... The profit share.

The Transition – Step One

Building On The Best From The Past

The specific things we want to take forward from the past are:

*

*

*

The specific steps we can take to do these things in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing these things will be:

*

*

*

If appropriate, you can have a discussion after people have put their Post-it Notes on the flip charts. Alternatively, you can leave the discussion until people have also done the next exercise.

Developing In The Future

You can then invite people to look into the future. If you wish, you can set the context by asking some of the following questions.

How can we continue to build on our strengths? How can we compensate for any weaknesses? How can we continue to perform superb work?

How can we be even better trusted advisors? How can we help customers to reach their goals? How can we generate and publish success stories?

How can we anticipate future challenges in the market? How can we prepare properly to deal with these challenges? How can we ensure our offering will provide better results than that provided by other suppliers?

How can we keep building good relationships with our internal stakeholders? How can we proactively inform stakeholders about our progress towards the agreed goals?

How can we implement effective processes in the team? How can we be clear on what we want to: a) keep doing; b) start doing; c) stop doing? How can we take ownership for making sure these ideas are implemented?

How can we maintain the morale in the team? How can we ensure that people are playing to their strengths? How can we ensure that all the other practical tasks are getting done?

Give people 15 minutes to write their ideas on Post-it Notes. They can then each go up in turn and put their ideas on the following flip charts.

The Transition – Step Two

Developing In The Future

The specific things we may need to add, develop or do differently in the future may be:

*

*

*

The specific steps we can take to do these things are:

*

*

*

If appropriate, have a discussion about the ideas people have put on the flip charts. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Taking Charge Of The Transition

Good leaders explain the reality of a situation, especially if a team needs to step up its game. They give the big picture and explain the strategic options for going forward.

Such leaders recognise it is vital to have a team of people who want to opt in and shape the future. So they may say something like the following.

The world is changing. Maybe we would prefer that things stayed the same, but we now live in a different world.

The team can succeed in this new environment, but we will need to manage the transition. This will call for believing in the agreed way forward and working together to make it happen.

Looking ahead, each of us has several options when facing the need to develop in a changing world. We can choose:

a) To carry on as before.

b) To try to fight the changes.

c) To say we will implement the changes, but only go through the motions.

d) To continue to build on our strengths, develop and manage the changes successfully.

e) To leave for other places.

Each option does, of course, have consequences. My choice is to go for Option (d).

Let me know if you want to continue to contribute towards helping the team shape a successful future.

Good leaders prepare people for making such decisions by doing the exercises mentioned earlier. People are then more likely to feel in charge of shaping their futures.

This piece has focused on helping people in a team to go through these steps. As mentioned earlier, however, individuals can follow similar principles in their own lives. Looking ahead at the transitions they may need to make, an individual can focus on the following things.

The specific things I want to take forward from the past.

The specific things I want to add, develop or do differently in the future.

The specific things I can do to take charge of the transition.

Let's return to your team. You have invited people to describe how to build on the best from the past and develop in the future. Many ideas will have been generated. Bearing these in mind, agree on the ones to be implemented. Get owners who will make these things happen.

Conclude the session by inviting these owners to do the exercise described at the end of this piece. They are to make action plans and build in some early successes.

People can meet in one month's time to describe: a) the specific things they have delivered in the past month; b) the specific things they plan to deliver in the next month.

Continue to meet with the team each month to share successes and tackle new challenges. Encourage them to build on the best from the past and also take charge of making the transition.

Here is the final exercise you can invite the owners to do when making actions plans.

The Transition – Step Three

Taking Charge Of The Transition

The specific things we can do to continue to build on our strengths, take charge of the transition and build a successful future are:

*

*

*

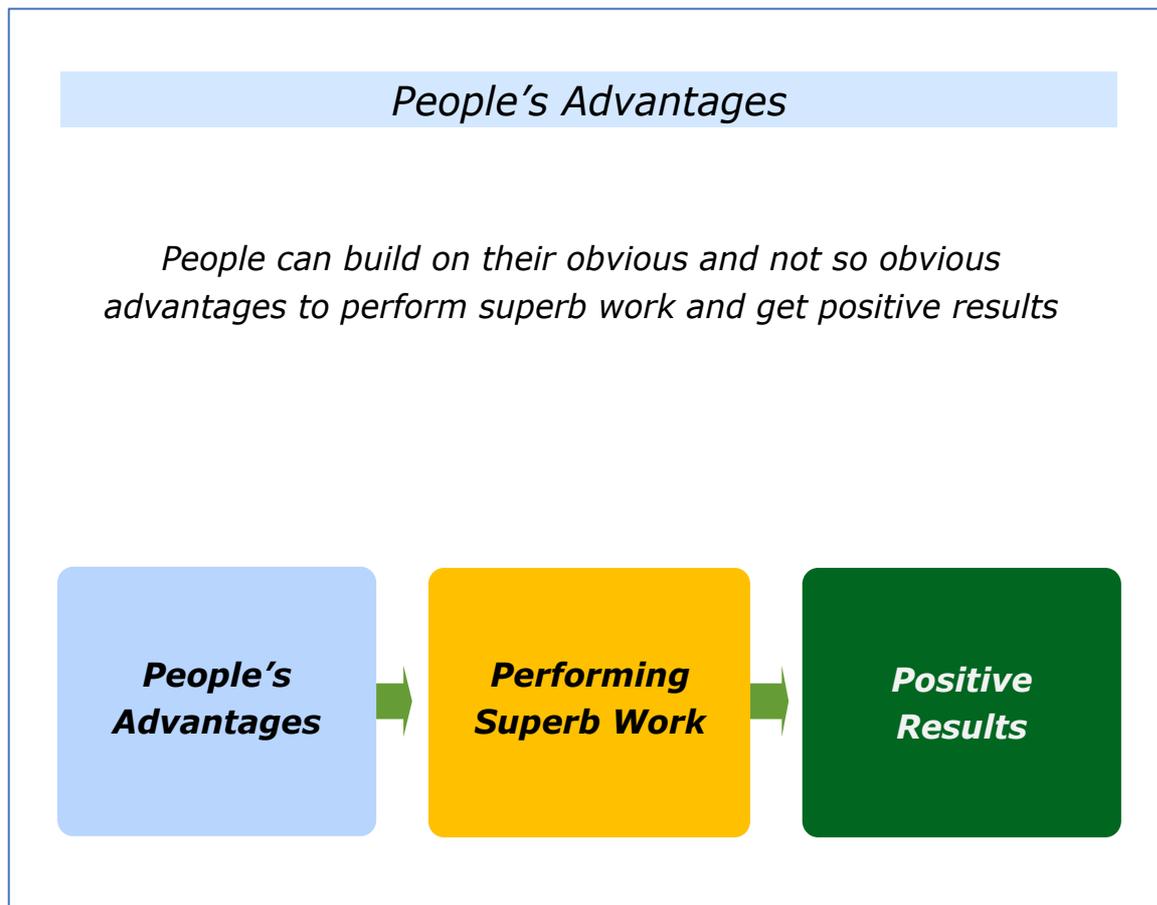

The specific benefits of doing these things will be:

*

*

*

The People Who Have Different Kinds Of Advantages Approach

Different people have different advantages in life. Sometimes these are obvious. Sometimes these are not so obvious.

People who may be labelled as introvert, dyslexic, ADHD or slow learners, for example, have many strengths. They can then build on these to perform superb work and get positive results.

Many creative people have a background of feeling different when they grew up. A person may have been a late developer, have had a lop sided personality or been different in another way. Those individuals who went on to thrive often had certain things in common.

They were supported by key people in their life - such as a parent, teacher or another significant person;

They were told to believe in themselves but were also taught how to survive or thrive in various situations;

They began to learn how use their differences to help themselves or other people.

Let's explore the approach of focusing on people's obvious and not so obvious advantages.

The Strengths Of People Who Have A Supportive Background

Some people have the advantage of growing up in an encouraging environment. They may be given love, the basic materials for life and many opportunities to develop.

People want stability, stimulation and the chance to succeed. Growing up in such an environment can give some people an advantage. They may then need to add the ability to manage challenges they meet in life.

The Strengths Of People Who Have Specific Talents

Some people may have specific strengths. They may be good at certain activities in sports, maths, music, the arts, helping people, design, technology or another field.

Such people can be helped to build on their strengths and do superb work. If appropriate, they can also be helped to earn a living by doing satisfying work and continuing to develop.

The Strengths Of People Who Are Slow Learners

Ian Leslie wrote an article called In Praise Of Slow Learners that described the advantages of such people. These include the following characteristics.

They learn slowly but methodically ... They take time to gather information and fully understand a topic ... They then put the ideas into action ... They keep practicing until they make things work ... They then internalise these strategies for achieving future success.

Ian says there are advantages and disadvantages to being such a learner. But sometimes it is possible to apply the advantages in ways that deliver success. He explains this in the following way.

Slow Learners Can Sometimes Have An Advantage

- Slow learners are more likely to dive deeply into things and do them the hard way. This is because they haven't been pampered by their brain and therefore learn to be persistent.
- Slow learners have a hidden advantage over fast learners. This is because they have had to learn adaptive strategies in order to keep up with their smarter peers.
- Slow learners can find these strategies prove valuable in the longer run. They may then overtake people who give quick answers but may not have a deep understanding of a topic.

The Strengths Of People Who Are Dyslexic

Some people who are dyslexic have specific strengths. These are described on the many websites that focus on helping people to build on these talents. Here is a summary of these qualities.

Dyslexics are highly aware of the environment ... They are more curious than average ... They think mainly in pictures instead of words ... They like to move and experiment with things.

They are highly intuitive and insightful ... They use many of their senses – which means they think and perceive multi-dimensionally ... They have vivid imaginations.

Dyslexics often do well in certain kinds of work. These include entrepreneurship, some aspects of business, the arts, work where they can move or create things and engineering.

The Strengths Of People Who Have Autism

Thorkil Sonne took this approach when his son Lars was discovered to have autism. He created the Specialisterne Foundation that aims to create one million jobs. Here is how Thorkil describes the strengths of such people.

People with autism often have outstanding memories, a remarkable eye for detail and do repetitive tasks with enthusiasm. These skills can be valuable for companies that specialise in developing technology.

My vision is to create new possibilities for people with ASD and to influence society to adopt a more positive attitude towards people with ASD.

It is believed that one percent of the world's population may have Autism Spectrum Disorder. This is equivalent to 68 million people worldwide.

Even more people may have other disorders on the autism spectrum, such as Attention Deficit Hyperactive Disorder (ADHD). These are all potential specialist people – with great business potential.

Focusing On Strengths – Not Difficulties

One percent of the world's population may have Autism Spectrum Disorder. This is equivalent to 68 million people worldwide.

Even more people may have other disorders on the autism spectrum. These are all potential specialist people – with great business potential.

We have set our goal: to provide meaningful and productive jobs for one million people with autism and other invisible disorders.

The Strengths Of People Who Have ADHD

Some people who have ADHD demonstrate certain strengths. They are often energetic, driven and focused. They love set goals, make a plan and follow it to achieve success.

Such people can be helped to channel their energies in ways they find stimulating. They may then do superb work when playing a sport, performing in the arts, driving sales or working towards achieving other goals.

The Strengths Of People Who Have Lop Sided Personalities

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Warren Buffett described himself in this way. Here is a summary of what he said.

"I have a lopsided personality. I am brilliant with numbers but I cannot tell you the colour of the wallpaper in my room at home. Even though I have lived in the same house for over fifty years."

A person with a lopsided personality may see things quickly in one area of life. They can tell you exactly what is happening and what is about to happen. In other areas they don't see a thing.

If appropriate, they can be helped to build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

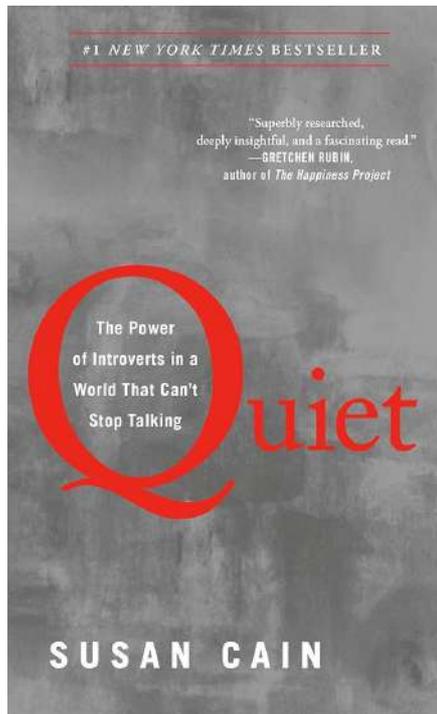

Lopsided Personalities

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Some may then aim.

- To recognise they have a lopsided personality;
- To build on the strengths of their lopsided personality;
- To manage the consequences of the weaknesses of their lopsided personality.

The Strengths Of People Who Are Introverts

Susan Cain's book Quiet: The power of introverts in a world that can't stop talking highlighted the strengths of such people. Some introverts display the following characteristics.

Introverts love to do deep work, research topics and make considered decisions.

They have the ability to be sensitive, empathetic and encourage certain kinds of people.

They can be a great asset to organisations provided they are given the opportunity to share their knowledge.

Introverts like to feel in control of their world. They therefore often rehearse what they are going to do next. Some also learn how to buy time to think and make good decisions when the unexpected happens.

Such people are happy in their own company but some make a living by going into role. They may do this by being a medic, trusted advisor, actor, leader or another role.

They then click into action. They feel in control because they know: a) the role; b) the rules to follow to get the right results. Such people may then go home and regain energy by do things that they find rewarding as an introvert.

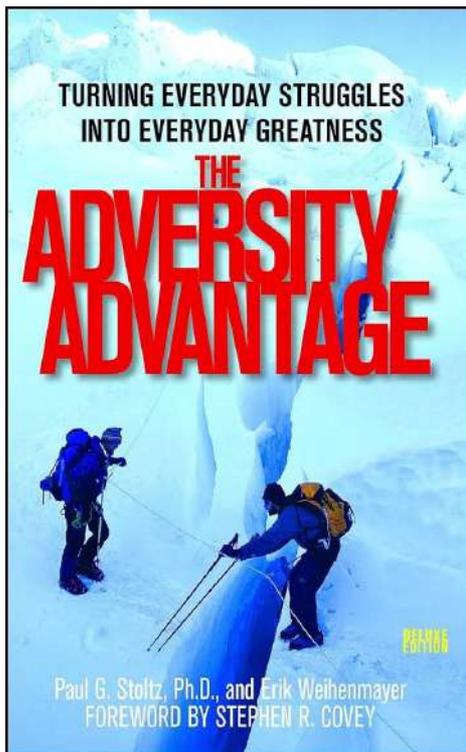

The Strengths Of People Who Have Fewer Strengths

Great workers are good at focusing. This highlights an approach that may sound counter intuitive. Sometimes people who have fewer strengths are fortunate. One of my teachers expressed this in the following way.

"Some people who have many talents spend lots of time deciding which to use. Some people are lucky and have only one main talent. They can then focus on making the best use of that ability."

The Strengths Of People Who Have Managed Adversity

Paul G. Stoltz and Erik Weihenmayer described this approach in their book The Adversity Advantage. This shows how overcoming setbacks can fuel a person's ability to produce greatness. Here is an introduction to the book and suggestions the authors offer for managing adversity.

Paul originally gained public attention for his work on AQ – Adversity Quotient. This enabled people to measure and improve their ability to overcome adversity.

*Erik became the first blind person to climb Everest. A journey he chronicled in his book Touch The Top Of The World.*

After seeing Erik featured on the front of Time Magazine, Paul sought him out. Building on what they had in common, they provided the following ideas regarding adversity.

- Take It On

Learn how to overcome frustration, helplessness and anger. Also learn how to benefit from adversity.

- Summon Your Strengths

Challenge the conventional wisdom that natural strengths drive success. Exceed expectations of what you and others can, or should, attempt to do.

- Engage Your CORE

Learn how to handle adversity better and faster. Engage your CORE and learn how to turn adversities into advantages. (CORE stands for Control, Ownership, Reach and Endurance.)

- Pioneer Possibilities

Devise signature systems for turning the impossible into the possible. Learn to create strategies that others fail to see.

- Pack Light, Pack Right

Learn how packing poorly cripples you, but how choosing the right things, people, obligations, and pursuits strengthen you. Spring clean, so you can rise up, rather than crumble, under the weight of adversity.

- Suffer Well

Character is forged in the flames of adversity. Done right, suffering can fuel greatness.

- Deliver Greatness, Every Day

This summit, the culmination, weaves together the most important ideas of the book, providing a coherent, portable package of practices that you can apply anywhere, anytime.

Let's return to your own life and work. What do you think may be some of your own personal strengths and advantages? How can you build on these and do your best to get positive results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Personal Advantages Approach

The obvious and not so obvious strengths and advantages that I may have may be:

*

The specific things I can do to build on these strengths and advantages are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Doing Both The Comfortable And Not So Comfortable Things Approach

Great workers sometimes take this approach. They are prepared to do both the comfortable and not comfortable things on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

They may do this when embarking on a course of medical treatment, climbing a mountain, leading a team or doing another activity. They choose to take this approach because they want to achieve a particular goal.

Different people follow it in different ways. Let's explore the steps that some people take.

They clarify the benefits of achieving the picture of success

Such people begin by clarifying their goal. They may aim to take care of their health, play in a sporting event, pursue a particular career, tackle a challenge or do another activity.

Bearing in mind their aim, they clarify the benefits of achieving the picture of success. They keep focusing on these benefits to motivate themselves during the journey.

They clarify what may be the comfortable and not comfortable things on the way to achieving success

Such people start by clarifying the specific things they may find comfortable on the way towards success. They may focus on how they can play to their strengths and do satisfying work.

They then clarify the specific things they may find not as comfortable. They may need to manage physical, psychological or other challenges. They focus on how they can manage these events.

Such people then look at the whole picture. Bearing in mind the goal they want to achieve, they clarify whether they are prepared to accept the whole package. If so, they move on to the next stage.

They do the comfortable and not so uncomfortable things on the way towards achieving success

Great workers move into action. Some take the following steps: a) they do the comfortable things; b) they do the not so comfortable things; c) they do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Much depends, of course, on the specific issue a person is tackling. One leader described their approach in the following way.

"Looking at my professional life, I am comfortable doing many things in my role as a leader. These include making decisions, setting the direction and guiding the team to success.

"I am also comfortable doing some things that may sometimes not be as comfortable. These include making tough decisions, managing my financial backers and rebuilding the team.

"Looking at my personal life, I followed a similar approach when doing a course of radiotherapy. This involved starting by clarifying the goal – which was regain my health and live longer.

"There were things I was comfortable doing during the treatment. I also decided to be comfortable with some of the more inconvenient aspects. This helped me on the way towards achieving the goal."

You may have encountered similar scenarios in your own life or work. Bearing in mind the goal to achieve, you may have decided: a) to build on the comfortable things; b) to do the not so comfortable things; c) to work towards the picture of success.

Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What may be the specific situation? What may be the goal you want to achieve? How can you build on the comfortable things and do the not so comfortable things? What may be the benefits of achieving the picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Doing Both The Comfortable And Not So Comfortable Things

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Choosing To Change Their Behaviour Because They Will Benefit Approach

People Buy Benefits

People sometimes choose to change their behaviour because they believe they or others will benefit. They may focus on the following things when taking this step.

- The Choices

They clarify their choices – their potential options – going forwards.

- The Consequences

They clarify the consequences – the pluses and minuses – of each option.

- The Concrete Benefits

They clarify the route they want to follow and may choose the one they feel will benefit themselves or other people.

There are many views about what motivates people to change their behaviour. One view is that people choose to take a different approach when they feel that they or other people will benefit.

There are many examples of this approach. A person may choose to change their behaviour when, for example:

They will get more pleasure or less pain;

They will get more benefits for themselves or other people;

They will be more likely to achieve their picture of success.

Different people choose to change their behaviour for different reasons. One of the main factors, however, is that they want to get the benefits. Let's look at some examples.

A person may experience a health warning and then choose to develop a healthier lifestyle. They may do so because they want to feel better, live longer and see their children grow up.

A parent may realise that focusing on negative things in life is not helping them or their loved ones. They may therefore choose to develop a sense of gratitude, focus on positive things in life and encourage other people.

A founder of a business may realise that micromanaging may not scale the business. They may then choose to learn how to manage by outcomes - rather than by tasks - and find ways to get the best from their staff.

Imagine that your work involves helping people to develop and, in some cases, changing their behaviour. There are several guidelines it can be worth bearing in mind. Let's explore these themes.

People Like To Feel In Charge Of The Change

People like to feel in control. They like to feel in charge of the change rather than that others are trying to change them. People need to have the will before they can learn the skill.

Different people reach this point in different ways. These include the following reasons.

They may realise that behaving in a certain way is not getting the desired results. They may keep doing the same things and hope it works. They may then reach a point where they want to try something different.

They may have a Eureka moment that leads to wanting to change their behaviour. They may experience an illness, a setback or another life-changing event. This encourages them to explore another way.

They may see a better way of achieving their aims. They may take this step by themselves through reading or learning from a positive model. They may on occasions be helped to do this by another person.

Looking at my own work as a mentor, for example, I normally only work with people who want to develop. There have been times, however, when people have been referred to me.

This can be more challenging. The aim is to create a positive environment in which the person feels at ease. It is to then give them the following messages.

Welcome to the session. I know that you have many strengths and want to achieve your personal or professional goals. I also know that sometimes you meet challenges along the road.

Bearing this in mind, it is up to you if you would like to explore the possible ways forwards. When doing so, the aims will be:

To start by clarifying the goals you want to achieve in your life or work – your picture of success;

To build on your strengths – the things that are working – and, if you wish, to offer some practical tools you can use to tackle any challenges;

To channel your personality rather than change your personality and also add to your repertoire to achieve your picture of success.

Let me know if you are interested. If so, we can focus on how you can build on your successful patterns – plus maybe add other skills – to get positive results and achieve success.

Some people spend a lot of time trying to convince others that they should change. They may try to persuade another person or try to find some trigger that will get the person to alter their behaviour.

This approach can come across as criticism and be counterproductive. The person on the receiving end can feel attacked and may respond badly to such messages.

There is another approach that can be effective when helping a person to change their behaviour. People must see there are benefits. They are then more likely to want to explore the possible options going forwards.

Sometimes they see these benefits themselves. Sometimes it is possible to paint a picture that shows the benefits for them, for other people, for their organisation or for the planet.

Let's assume that a person has begun to see the benefits of maybe behaving in another way. This can then lead to the next stage.

People Can Choose To Change Their Behaviour By Focusing On The Choices, Consequences And Concrete Benefits

Imagine that a person has asked for your help in exploring their possible ways forward. Different individuals may have different reasons for seeking help. These may include some of the following:

They may be encountering a problem and want to find ways to tackle the challenge;

They may want to change aspects of their personal or professional life and achieve positive results;

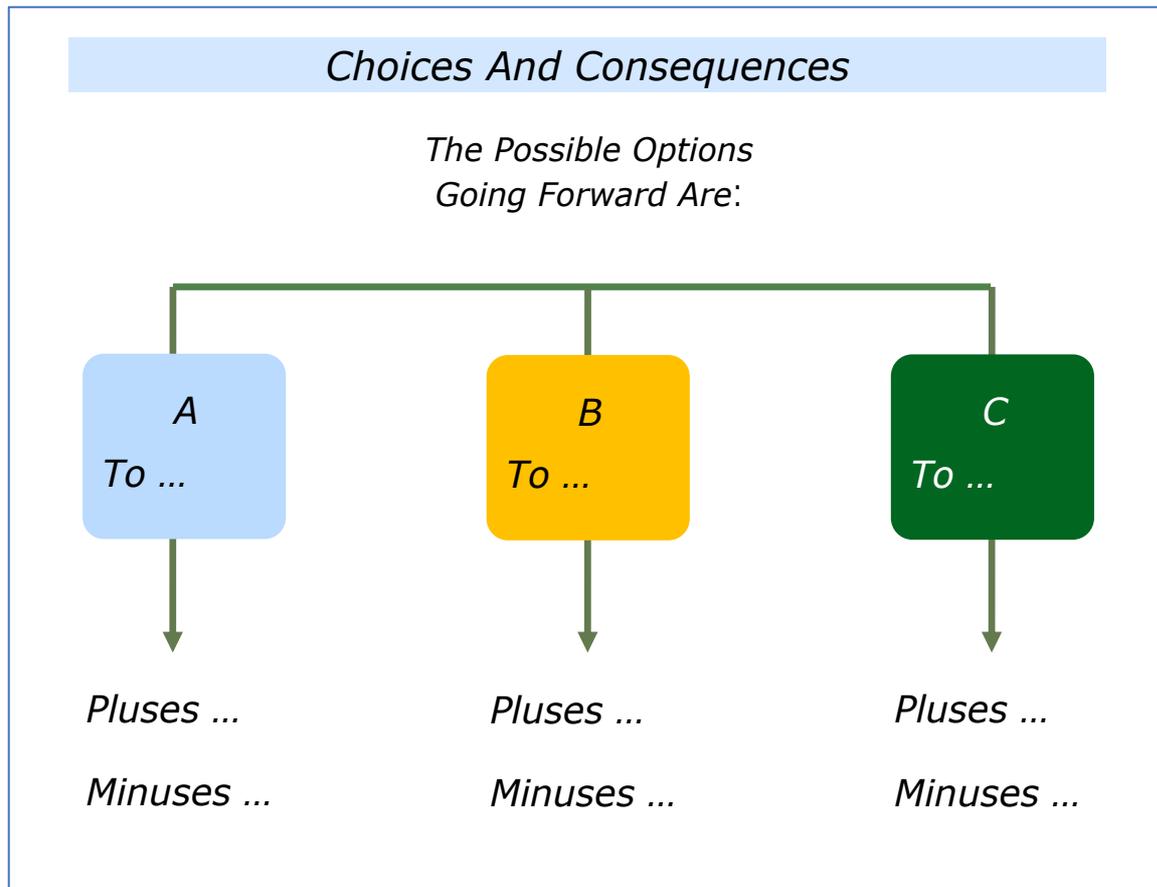

They may want to follow strategies that will help them to achieve their picture of success.

You will begin by making the person feel welcome. The next step will be to clarify the theme they want explore. It will be important:

To clarify what is happening at the moment and the results they want to achieve in the future – their picture of success;

To clarify their possible choices going forwards and the consequences – the pluses and minuses of each option – and potential creative solutions;

To clarify their chosen way forward – together with the benefits – and the strategies that will give them the greatest chance of success.

As mentioned above, sometimes it can be important to clarify what is happening at the moment and the results the person wants to achieve in the future. But sometimes the person may not have yet have an idea of the results they want to achieve.

If that is the case, you may simply want to move on to exploring their possible ways forwards. You can also invite them to consider what may be the pluses and minuses of each option.

If appropriate, and only after you have asked their permission, you can share what you see as any other possible ways forwards. This can include any potential creative solutions.

Imagine that the person has explored the potential options going forwards. If appropriate, you may then say something along the following lines.

Looking ahead, what is the option you find most attractive? What may be the pluses – the concrete benefits - of taking this route? We can also look at how to manage any potential minuses.

On a scale 0-10, how motivated do you feel to follow this route? If appropriate, we can explore how to maintain or improve this rating. We can also focus on the strategies most likely to achieve success.

Let's assume the person has chosen the route they want to follow. They can then focus on how to translate this into action. This can involve exploring their next step in helping people to change their behaviour.

People Can Build On Their Previous Successful Patterns To Change Their Present Behaviour And Get The Benefits

People often like to develop and are sometimes wary of trying to change. This highlights several key points in helping people to change their behaviour.

Sometimes it can be useful to follow the organic approach to help people to develop. This approach is based on the following themes.

The Organic Development Approach

This approach believes that people already have the seeds of development within them. It is based on the following beliefs:

- People already have a positive history of tackling challenges and behaving in certain ways to reach their goals and achieve success;
- People can be helped to find their successful patterns – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – to achieve success;
- People can then follow their successful patterns - plus add other skills – to work towards achieving their future picture of success.

Let's explore how it is possible to take this approach. Imagine that the person aims to follow a particular route and behave in a certain way to work towards their goals.

Bearing in mind the actions they want to take, it can be useful to explore their positive history. This involves taking the following steps:

To clarify their successful pattern by recalling a situation when they behaved in this way successfully – even if only for a short time;

To clarify what they did right then – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – to behave successfully;

To clarify how they can follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills – and behave in a way that is likely to increase the chances of success.

A person is more likely to believe in following a certain path if they are building on existing successful habits. They have succeeded in the past and can succeed again in the future. The key is:

To focus on how they can pursue these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

The organic approach is one that I have seen work many times. It is vital to apply it in a realistic way, however, and translate it into a clear action plan. Later we will explore how to take that step. Before then, however:

There Is Another Option

There may be times when it may be necessary for a person to add a totally new habit. It is possible to help them to do this but they need: a) to see the benefit; b) to rehearse following the habit in difficult situations.

Imagine that the person has chosen to follow a certain route and has translated this into a clear action plan. They may aim, for example, to do one or more of the following things:

To stay sober ... To follow a healthy lifestyle ... To encourage people ... To stay calm rather than get angry ... To be a positive leader ... To be better at managing key stakeholders ... To behave in another way that improves the chances of achieving their picture of success.

Sometimes it can be useful to go beyond talking about what they want to do. They can be helped to rehearse following their chosen strategy in a particular situation.

Different people rehearse things in different ways. Some take the following approach.

A Person Can Rehearse Their Chosen Way Forward

They can focus on a specific situation where they want to behave in a certain way. They can then take the following steps.

- They can rehearse following their chosen strategies and doing their best to achieve the desired results:*
- They can rehearse managing any challenges and continuing to work towards their desired results;*
- They can again rehearse following their chosen strategies and doing their best to achieve the desired results.*

This is an approach that many people find helpful. They find it useful: a) to rehearse following their chosen strategies; b) to rehearse learning how to manage trigger situations that could send them into a negative spiral.

Imagine that a person has gone through some of the steps we have explored and has settled on their action plan. The keys are for them:

To believe in the strategy they want to follow towards achieving their picture of success;

To follow their strategy, build in some early successes and encourage themselves on the journey;

To find solutions to challenges and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

As mentioned earlier, people are more likely to change their behaviour when they see the benefits. If appropriate, you can use the ideas described in this piece to help a person to achieve their goals.

Different people will, of course, make their action plans in different ways. One approach is for them to use the following framework. They can adapt this in their own way and work towards achieving their picture of success.

My Chosen Way Forwards

The specific situation where I want to behave in a way that is more likely to get positive results is:

*

The specific ways I want to behave in that situation – and how I can translate these into action – are:

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps – both for myself and other people – will be:

*

The Passion, Professionalism And Perspective Approaches

Great workers sometimes go through certain stages in their careers to deliver positive results. They get hired for their passion, promoted for their professionalism and build a reputation for being strategic and having perspective.

Different people go through these stages in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

Passion

Great workers may start by following their passions. They then focus on a specific activity where they may have the ability to do good work. They convey this enthusiasm during interviews and get hired to do work where they can develop their expertise.

Such a person may continue to be passionate about a specific activity. They may aim to do good work as a nurse, educator, technical specialist, sales person or in another role.

Professionalism

Great workers continue to build on their strengths. They do superb work and add skills to their repertoire. They also gain a reputation for delivering high professional standards.

Such workers may begin to climb the career ladder. Some continue to build on what they do best – such as becoming a specialist. Some may move into a management or leadership role.

Perspective

Great workers may begin to attend senior leadership meetings. Still feeling strongly about their chosen work, they may behave in either of the following ways.

Some may feel passionate about certain things and communicate in ways that are not unhelpful. They may argue strongly for their chosen projects, defend their territory or may even criticise other departments.

Some may develop the ability to see things perspective. Whilst still passionate about their work, they see things from the whole company point of view. They show they understand the big picture.

Such individuals may gain a reputation for being a person who thinks strategically and makes considered decisions. This can lead to them being used as a trusted advisor by colleagues and maybe even by the CEO.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the passionate, professionalism or perspective approaches? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Passion, Professionalism And Perspective Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of one of these approaches may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Who Follow Their Principles During Positive And Problematic Times Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people focus on the principles they want to follow. They then aim to follow these during both positive and problematic times.

Such people feel at peace following this path. They have a core compass they can keep returning to when making decisions. They then aim to do their best during their time on the planet. Let's explore this approach.

Principles

What are the principles you want to follow in your life? How can you translate these into action in your daily life? What may be the pluses and potential minuses of following these principles? How can you build on the pluses and manage any minuses?

Different people obviously have different principles. Here are some of the things that people write when exploring these themes.

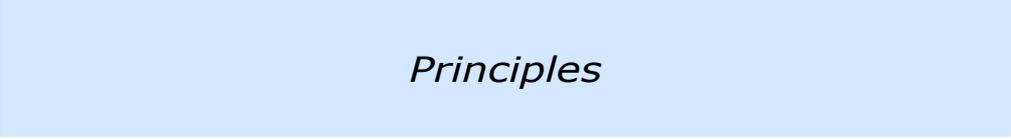

"I want to encourage people in my life and work ... I want to continue to have a sense of gratitude ... I want to care for my loved ones ... I want to create enriching environments in which people grow."

"I want to use my strengths to help people to succeed ... I want to build pioneering things that show people a better way ... I want to pass on knowledge that people can use to shape a positive future."

"I want to make full use of the talents I have been given ... I want to do my best during my time on the planet ... I want to give people positive memories for life ... I want to die feeling at peace."

How to clarify your own principles? One approach is to start by brainstorming and then settling on, for example, the three principles you want to follow in your life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to clarify the principles you would like to try to follow. If possible try to give examples of how you could translate these into action.

Principles

The principles I want to try to follow in my life are these.

I want:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Positive Times

Imagine that you have clarified the principles you want to follow. The classic approach is then to focus on how you can follow these during difficult times. This is something that we will explore later.

Before then, however, it can be useful to clarify how you can follow your principles during positive times. These could include encouraging people, reaching specific goals or building on successes.

Why take this approach? Sometimes people can forget to keep doing the things that resulted in them feeling positive. It can be useful to keep building on what worked plus maybe adding other skills.

One approach is to recall a time when you followed your principles and these helped to produce a positive outcome. What were the principles you followed then? How did you translate these into action? What were the benefits for yourself and other people?

Imagine you have clarified the way you followed some of your principles. Bearing these in mind, it can be useful to focus on possible events in the future.

Looking ahead, can you think of a positive experience that you may encounter in the future? You may encourage a person, do a creative project, get a success or do an activity that produces positive results for you or other people.

Imagine you have highlighted such an experience. How can you then follow and build on your principles? What may be the benefits for you or other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Times

The positive experience I may encounter in the future may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to continue to follow my principles are:

*

*

*

Problematic Times

People often gain strength from following their principles during problematic times. They may have experienced a loss, had a setback or be facing a daunting challenge.

One person who was embarking on a course of medical treatment described how following their principles gave them strength during this time. Here is a summary of what they said.

"My initial reaction to the diagnosis was one of shock, but then I began to plan ahead. The potential outcomes of the treatment were unknown, but I followed the old sporting cliché of focusing on what I could control.

"This meant organising my life around the treatment, but I also did things that gave me positive energy. I followed a daily routine of walking with my dog, encouraging my loved ones and continuing to work as a counsellor.

"Taking these steps involved following some of my principles regarding wellbeing. They also boosted my strength to manage the daily treatment."

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a potentially problematic time that you may encounter in the future? This could be in your personal or professional life.

Imagine that you have clarified your principles. How could you try to follow these in the specific challenging situation? What may be the pluses and minuses of taking these steps? How could you build on the pluses and manage the potential minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Problematic Times

*The potentially problematic experience
I may encounter in the future may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to continue to follow my principles are:

*

*

*

Peace

People who follow their principles are sometimes more likely to experience a sense of peace. This is a theme that comes up in mentoring sessions.

Sometimes I invite a person to imagine that they are looking back on their life in future years. What do they want to have done by then that will mean they feel their life has been successful?

Many people give the answers you would expect. They want to have built a happy family, encouraged other people and made a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

Some also mention a theme that is highlighted when interviewed people who are nearing the end of their lives. When asked about what they had tried to do in their lives, they said something along the following lines.

"I tried to be true to myself. Sometimes this was hard, but I am happy that I always tried to do what I believed in."

Imagine that you want to continue to follow your principles. Taking this approach can bring pluses and minuses. But it can also increase the chances of sometimes experiencing a sense of peace.

How can you follow this approach in your own way? What do you think may happen as a result? How can you build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to clarify how you can continue to follow your principles and maybe sometimes experience a sense of peace.

Peace

The things I can do to continue to follow my principles and maybe also sometimes experience a sense of peace are:

*

*

*

The Seeing Success Approach

Some people have the ability to see success in their area of expertise. They also see the strategies and solutions for achieving success. They then apply their skills to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Different people follow these principles in different activities. Let's explore how they take these steps.

They See Success

Great workers go into situations where they excel and quickly see the picture of success. They may do this when encouraging a person, pursuing a specific activity or tackling a certain challenge.

Such people quickly gather information and clarify the possible destination. They go A, B ... and leap to ... Z. They clarify the real results to achieve and translate these into a clear picture of success.

Different people do this in different situations. Here is how some individuals describe pursuing their chosen activity.

"I focus on people's strengths and can quickly see what a person can become ... I love retail: so put me in any shop and I can quickly see how it can improve its sales ... I am a garden designer and can quickly see how a garden can become a paradise."

Matt Damon said something similar when playing the maths genius in Good Will Hunting. At one point his girlfriend asks him how he solves a problem. Will says that he cannot explain fully but that he simply sees the solution.

People who are visual see pictures but some may use other senses when clarifying the destination. Some individuals I have worked with expressed this in the following ways.

"I love sales and can literally smell a deal ... I am a mediator: before a meeting I project myself to the feelings I would like people to have when they leave the room ... I clarify the actual words I would like people to be saying after I have done a piece of work for them."

Imagine that a person has taken this step and clarified the destination. They may then move on the next stage.

They See Strategies For Achieving Success

Great workers explore the possible ways forward. Drawing on their experience of what works, they consider various scenarios for achieving the desired results.

Different people explore the potential strategies in different ways. Some people do this in a logical way. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, they may ask themselves the following questions.

"What are the possible options going forwards? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses – of each option? What are the other potential creative solutions?"

"What is the route I want to pursue? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I translate these into a clear action plan?"

Great workers also sometimes use strategic intuition. Gary Klein studied people who took this approach. His books on the topic include Sources of Power: How People Make Decisions and The Power of Intuition.

Gary studied firefighters and other professionals who made decisions in pressure situations. The following section draws on an interview he gave to Bill Breen for The Fast Company magazine. He explained what he had learned in the following way.

"I noticed that when the most experienced commanders confronted a fire, the biggest question they had to deal with wasn't 'What do I do?' It was 'What's going on?'"

"That's what their experience was buying them - the ability to size up a situation and to recognise the best course of action."

Gary explained that firefighters saw the big picture and looked for patterns. They then began exploring potential strategies.

They reached into their experience – their hyperdrive - to scan previous scenarios and see what lessons might apply to the present situation;

They chose a potential course of action and played scenarios – like running a film in their heads – to see this might work in practice;

They ran the film to see if the strategy would work and, if so, they began pursuing it.

Imagine that a person has clarified the strategy – or combination of strategies – they want to follow. This may also sometimes involve focusing on the next theme.

They See Solutions For Achieving Success

Great workers are good at finding solutions in the areas where they excel. They are also good at managing unexpected events. They then buy time to think and explore the possible solutions.

Gary Klein said that firefighters kept exploring various strategies until they found one that worked. They then visualised how to manage potential challenges. He explained this in the following way.

Once they make a decision, firefighters evaluate it by rapidly running a mental simulation. They might run through several choices, but they never compare one option with another.

They rapidly evaluate each choice on its own merits, even if they cycle through several possibilities. They imagine how a course of action may unfold and how it may ultimately play out.

They don't need the best solution. They just need the one that works.

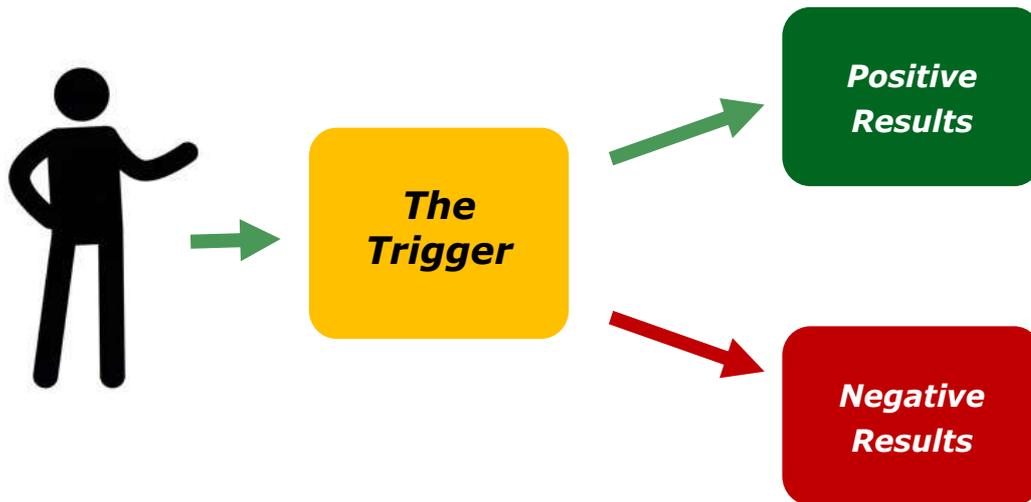

Different people explore how to find solutions in different situations. Recovering addicts and alcoholics, for example, rehearse how to manage triggers that could send them into a negative spiral.

Such people aim to avoid temptations and triggers. But they also rehearse how to manage such situations if, despite their best efforts, they encounter such events.

They aim: a) to recognise the trigger; b) to buy time to think; c) to sometimes use the STOP model for achieving positive results. This involves going through the following steps.

Managing Triggers

A person can recognise the trigger and buy time to think. They can then choose to take the route that will lead to them getting positive rather than negative results.

The STOP Model For Managing Trigger Situations

- Stop Recognise the warning signs and stop what you are doing.
- Think Breathe, buy time to think and see the big picture.
- Options Ask: "What are my possible options going forward? What are pluses and minuses of each option?"
- Positive Results Pursue the option most likely to get the desired positive results.

Imagine that a person has clarified their chosen strategy and the potential solutions to challenges. They may then move on to the next theme.

They Apply Their Skills To Achieve Success

Great workers aim to perform superb work. Some have the ability to helicopter above the situation to see the whole picture whilst also being able to be hands on.

Such workers often have a ritual for clicking into action. Being fully present, they then apply their professional skills:

To pursue their chosen strategies and deliver consistently high professional standards;

To embody continuous improvement by building on what is working and tackling areas for improvement;

To find solutions to challenges and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Such workers then take time to reflect. Like professional golfers, they look back on their equivalent of hitting a shot. They then mentally rehearse how they could do it again to increase the chances of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the seeing success approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Seeing Success Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

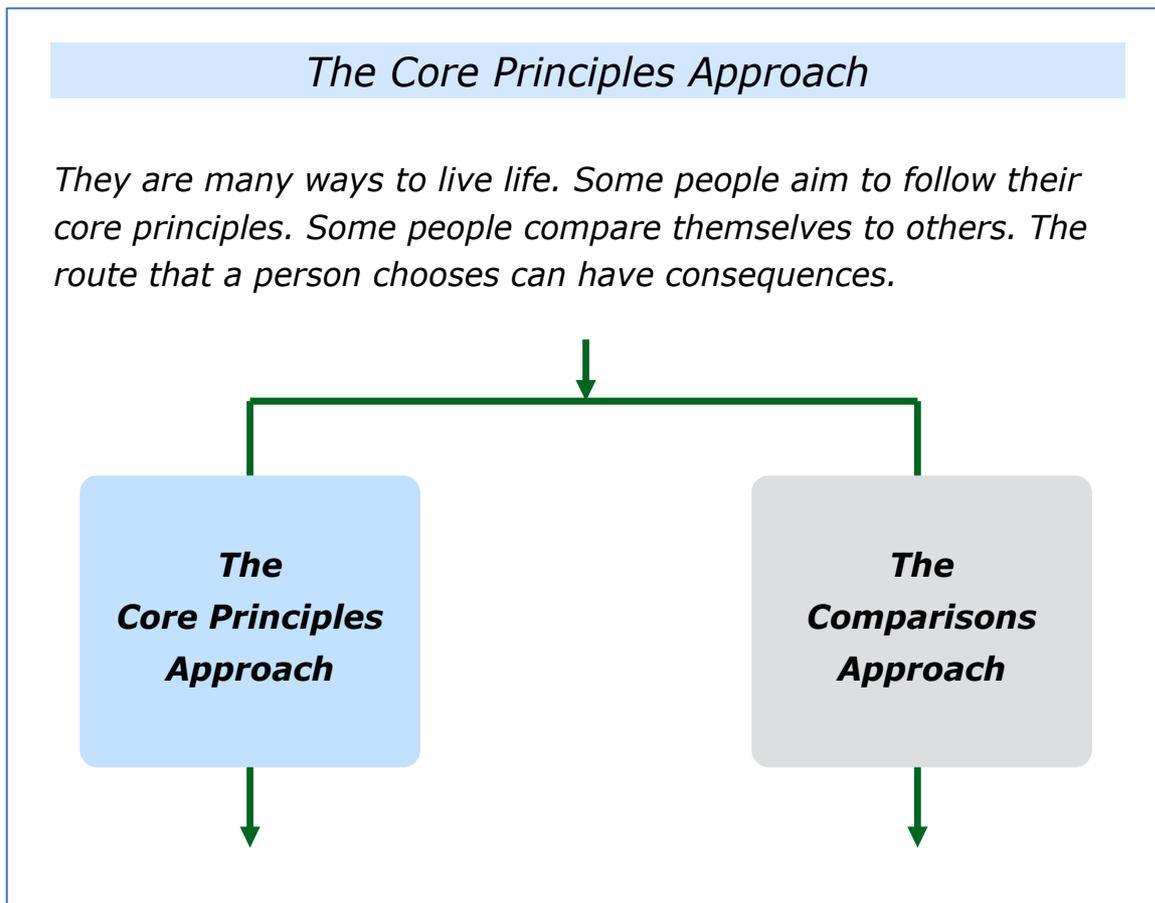

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Core Principles Approach Rather Than The Comparison Approach

Some people aim to follow their core principles in life. They aim to feel true to themselves and can sometimes experience a sense of peace. There may be times, however, when it can be challenging to follow this approach in certain situations.

Some people keep comparing themselves to others. They may do this when focusing on their life, school grades, career or status. This approach can sometimes be motivating. But it can also be exhausting and lead to a person feeling they will never be good enough.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore how they may take these routes.

The Core Principles Approach

People who take this route may do so for different reasons. Some may have grown up in a family where they were encouraged to follow certain principles. One person expressed this in the family way.

"My parents encouraged me to appreciate life, be grateful and help other people. They also encouraged me to follow my interests and keep learning. This was helpful because I was not very good at school."

Some people pursue certain core principles because they aim to follow a spiritual faith, a moral compass or a vocation. They may then aim to translate these principles into action.

People who follow this approach keep returning to their centre. They focus on how they can follow these principles in their daily lives and work. They aim to be the best they can be rather than trying to be the best.

Different people aim to follow different principles. Here are some themes that people may mention when describing their approach.

*My Core Principles – The principles
I want to follow in my life are:*

*To be grateful ... To be generous ... To be kind ... To encourage people ...
To care for my loved ones ... To a good partner and parent ... To respect all living things ... To follow my spiritual faith.*

*To build on my strengths ... To do good quality work ... To create beauty ...
To create cultures in which people can thrive ... To do positive things during my time on the planet.*

The core principles approach has many pluses. People are more likely to develop a sense of purpose. They also have a moral compass they can follow when making decisions.

People who take this approach can find it gives them strength when tackling tough challenges. Translating their principles into action can also lead to them sometimes experiencing a sense of peace.

The approach also has some minuses. People may find it challenging to follow their principles in certain situations. They may sometimes feel uncertain about what is the best route to take or be criticised for being different.

They may need to learn how to retain their centre but continue to thrive. This can involve continuing to follow their principles but applying these in a pragmatic way to get positive results. This can be challenging.

The Comparison Approach

Some individuals follow the comparison approach. They compare themselves to others or to the status they believe they should have achieved by a certain stage of life.

Some may have grown up with parents who told them to compare themselves to others in their school class. A young person who got five A grades and one B+ may have been greeted with the response:

"So what went wrong?"

The Psychology Today website provides some background to this approach. Here is an excerpt from the site.

Social Comparison Theory

People constantly evaluate themselves in domains like attractiveness, wealth, intelligence, and success.

The theory was developed in 1954 by psychologist Leon Festinger. Later research has shown that people who regularly compare themselves to others may find motivation to improve.

But they may also experience feelings of deep dissatisfaction, guilt, or remorse, and engage in destructive behaviours like lying or disordered eating.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow elements of the core principles approach. How can you do this in your own way?

What are the core principles you want to follow? How can you try to translate these into action? How can you build on the pluses of this approach and, if necessary, manage the consequences of any minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Core Principles Approach

The specific core principles I want to follow in my life are:

*

The specific things I can do to try to translate these principles into action are:

*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses of this approach and manage the consequences of any minuses are:

*

The Maintaining Your Agility Approach

Great workers aim to maintain their agility in their chosen field. They do this by continuing to develop their awareness and applying their agility to achieve their goals.

Such workers aim to maintain their personal, psychological or professional agility. Taking this approach enables them to continue to feel alive and creative. This can help them to grow as people and as professionals.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. This sometimes involves focusing on the following themes.

Awareness

Great workers keep developing awareness in their chosen field. Some do this by focusing on their personal, professional and patterns awareness. Here is an introduction to these themes.

Personal Awareness

Such workers continue to develop their personal awareness. Some aim to be aware of: a) their personal goals; b) their strengths and weaknesses; c) their behaviour and the potential impact it may have on other people.

Professional Awareness

Some people aim to develop their professional awareness. They aim: a) to recognise future developments and challenges in their chosen field; d) to add to their professional knowledge and do what is required to thrive in their work.

Patterns Awareness

Pattern recognition is one of the keys to peak performance. Great workers are good at recognising both successful and unsuccessful patterns in their area of expertise. They then aim to build on the successful patterns and find ways to manage any unsuccessful patterns.

Such people often focus on their professional field. They aim to be aware of: a) what is happening; b) what could happen; c) what they would like to make happen. This can lead to the next theme.

Agility

Great workers continue to build their strengths. They then apply their personal, psychological or professional agility to be proactive and stay ahead of the game.

They use their agility - experience, knowledge and creativity - to explore the following questions.

What is actually happening? What may happen in the future? What may be the implications of these things happening – both for myself and for other people?

Bearing in mind what I can control, what do I want to do in the future? What are the goals – the real results I want to achieve? What may be the picture of success? What would be the benefits of achieving these goals?

What are the possible options going forwards? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses - of each option? Are there any other potential creative options?

What is the route I want to follow? Bearing this in mind, what are the key strategies I can follow to increase the chances of success? How can I translate these into a clear action plan?

Such workers often rehearse the steps they are going to take. This includes using their agility to clarify how to prevent or manage certain challenges along the way. They leads to the next stage.

Achievement

Great workers move into action. They aim to be fully present, pursue their strategies and perform superb work. At the same time, they also keep reading reality.

They use their antennae to recognise what is happening. They then use their agility to respond by aiming: a) to build on what is working; b) to tackle areas for improvement.

Such workers have what is called personal radar in the areas where they excel. They have the ability to see patterns and predict what may happen. They then reach into their repertoire of skills and apply these to achieve the desired results.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to keep maintaining your personal, psychological or professional ability. This helps to keep you alive and creative.

Imagine you want to maintain your agility in a specific activity. How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Maintaining Agility Approach

The specific activity in which I would like to maintain and develop my agility is:

*

The specific things I can do to maintain and develop my agility in this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Predicting How A Person Will Probably Behave In The Future Approach

Predicting How A Person Will Behave

Pattern recognition is one of the keys to predicting how a person will behave in the future. It can be useful to focus on their behaviour and explore the following themes.

- The Person's Previous Patterns
- The Person's Probable Behaviour In The Future
- The Person's Possible Effect On Other People

There are many models for predicting how a person may behave in certain situations. One approach is to recognise a person's patterns. This is based on the view that:

A person's behaviour in the past is the most likely predictor of their behaviour in the future.

Several things are worth considering when focusing on a person's behaviour. These include the following:

The person's patterns of behaviour may be specific to certain kinds of situation;

The person may have positive or negative patterns that have consequences for themselves and other people;

The person may or may not be aware of the consequences of their patterns and the effects these have on other people.

The recognising patterns approach is one that I first encountered when working in therapeutic communities. When appropriate, the aim was then help a person:

To recognise their positive and negative patterns;

To recognise the consequences of their positive and negative patterns;

To recognise how to build on their positive patterns and manage the consequences of any negative patterns.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow elements of the predicting how people will behave approach. You may want to do this in your personal or professional life.

Imagine that you lead a team and are considering a person for a certain role. If appropriate, you can focus on the following themes. (You can apply similar principles in other aspects of your life or work.)

You Can Clarify A Person's Patterns

You can start by clarifying a person's patterns. Much depends, of course, on whether you already know the person. Sometimes this can help but it can also cloud your judgement. This is because finding a person's pattern calls for asking specific questions. These can include the following.

How does the person behave in certain situations? What do they actually do? Can we give any examples? What are the consequences of their behaviour?

What happens if you do not know the person? It will then be important to do lots of research. You can aim to build up a picture of the person's strengths and style of working.

If appropriate, you can also invite the person to describe their own style of working. Bearing in mind the results you want them to deliver in a potential role, you can invite them:

To describe a specific situation in the past when they delivered similar results to those required in the potential role;

To describe the specific things they did then – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – to deliver those results;

To describe the specific things they would actually do to deliver the desired results in the potential role.

Let's assume you have some information about the person. Here are some of the themes you can then explore regarding their pattern in certain situations.

Recognising A Person's Pattern In A Certain Situation

This involves exploring the following themes.

- What is the person's pattern in this kind of situation? How do they behave? Are they positive or negative? Do they take responsibility or avoid responsibility?*
- How do they do the work? Do they set clear goals, make clear contracts and reach those goals? How do they relate to other people? What is the effect they have on people?*
- Looking at the person's behaviour, are there any recurring patterns? What may be the positive or negative consequences of these patterns for themselves and other people?*

You Can Clarify A Person's Probable Behaviour In The Future

Imagine that you have recognised some of a person's behaviour patterns in the past. You have to be able to recognise:

The specific ways they often behave in certain situations;

The specific ways they take or avoid responsibility and the ways they relate to other people;

The specific ways that their behaviour has positive or negative consequences in certain situations.

You may be considering hiring a person for a specific role. They may be working as a leader, a customer account director, a team member, a specialist or in another role.

Looking ahead, what may be the kinds of situations where they need to do good work. Bearing in mind their pattern, how are they likely to behave in this situation? If you wish, try exploring the following themes.

Predicting How A Person Will Probably Behave In A Certain Situation

This involves exploring the following themes.

- Bearing in mind their previous pattern, how is the person likely to behave in a certain situation? What are they likely to actually do in that situation
- Will they take responsibility or avoid responsibility? What are they likely to do when performing the work? How will they communicate and relate to other people?
- What may be the positive or negative consequences of the way they behave in the situation? What may be the possible effect on other people?

You Can Clarify What You Want To Do Regarding The Person

Imagine you have clarified how the person the likely to behave in a certain situation. You can then decide what you want to do regarding the person.

Much will depend, of course, on the actual situation. This can also be influenced by whether the decision is going to affect your personal or professional life.

Imagine you are a leader and are considering a person for a specific role. You may then explore the following themes.

What is the role? What are the results we want a person to deliver when doing this role? How would we rate their ability to deliver the goods in the role?

Imagine you are recruiting somebody to lead a team. What are the specific results we want them to deliver in terms of profits, product quality and people management?

Looking at the person's pattern, how are they likely to behave in this role? For example, on a scale 0-10, what how would we rate their ability to lead a team in the following areas:

Delivering the required profitability: _____ /10

Delivering the required professional standards, customer service and product quality: _____ /10

Delivering the required positive environment and people morale: _____ /10

People develop, they seldom change. Bearing in mind the person's positive and potentially negative patters, be realistic when giving your view of the ratings.

There are times, of course, when it is possible to help a person: a) to build on their positive patterns; b) to manage the consequences of any negative patterns.

The person must want to take this step. If so, then it is possible to provide them with practical strategies and tools they can use to build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

Predicting how people will behave is not an exact science. But a person's previous patterns are often the most likely predictor to their future behaviour in a certain situation.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Predicting How A Person Will Probably Behave In The Future Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Work Approach Rather Than The Paralysed By Worry Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to follow the positive work approach rather than the paralysed by worry approach. They aim to do work that helps people to shape a positive future.

Different people follow this route in different ways. Some aim to build on their personal strengths, follow certain principles and do work that helps people or the planet.

Positive Work

Different people follow this route in different ways. Some people aim:

- To build on their personal strengths;
- To follow certain principles;
- To do positive work that helps people or the planet.

Different people also have different reasons for following this route. Some may have had parents, teachers or other significant people who encouraged them to take this approach.

Some may reach a point in their lives where they decide to do positive work rather than be paralysed by worry. This is a path sometimes taken by people who are highly sensitive. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I am a person who is very open to influences around me. There was a point in my life when I was addicted to consuming bad news. This did not help anyone. Looking ahead, I realised that I had a choice.

"The first option was to spend my life paralysed by fear. This is a tactic often used by authority figures who want to make people feel impotent and it can lead to despair.

"The second option was to have a positive attitude. It was to focus what I could control rather than what I could not control. I chose to build on my strengths and do my best to help people in my life and work."

Different people choose different ways to translate the positive work approach into action. Some focus on the following themes.

Personal Strengths

Some people build on their personal strengths and do things that give them positive energy. They translate this into doing work that helps people or the planet. Let's look at some examples.

Dame Cecily Saunders translated her compassion into helping to found the modern hospice movement. Maria Montessori translated her passion for education into helping children and founding the Montessori Schools approach.

Dame Cicely Saunders

Maria Montessori

Principles

Some people believe in following certain principles. They may take this approach when working as a medic, craft worker, artist, scientist, leader or in another role.

John Wooden, the great basketball coach, encouraged his players to follow certain principles and become the best they could be. The players who followed this approach were more likely to find peace of mind.

Nelson Mandela encouraged people to see others as human beings and to build on what they had in common. People who followed these principles were more likely to find solutions that benefited both them and their society.

Positive Work

Some people aim to build on their personal strengths, follow their principles and do their best to get positive results. They aim to do work that helps people or the planet. Let's look at examples of people who took this route.

Bronnie Ware – Learning From People Who Are Dying

Bronnie's life changed when she worked in palliative care. She found that many people experienced a sense of peace before they died. Learning from them, she discovered that some had regrets.

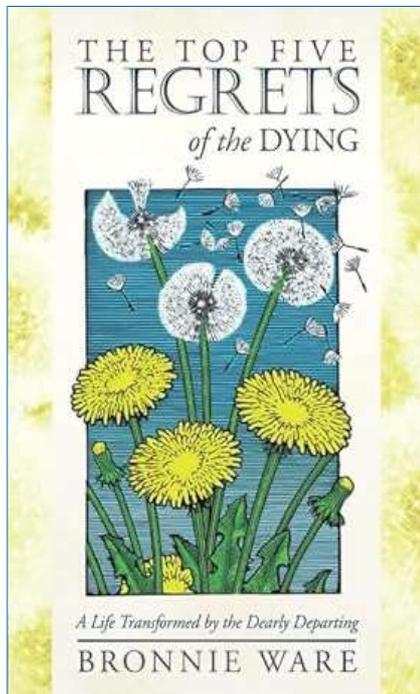

She found these often followed certain themes. Bronnie began writing about these themes in a blog, which she later expanded into a book. Here are some excerpts from her work.

For many years I worked in palliative care. My patients were those who had gone home to die. Some incredibly special times were shared. I was with them for the last 3 to 12 weeks of their lives.

People grow a lot when they are faced with their own mortality. I learnt never to underestimate someone's capacity for growth.

Some changes were phenomenal. Each experienced a variety of emotions, as expected, denial, fear, anger, remorse, more denial and eventually acceptance. Every single patient found their peace before they departed though, every one of them.

When questioned about any regrets they had or anything they would do differently, common themes surfaced again and again. Here are the most common five.

I wish I'd had the courage to live a life true to myself, not the life others expected of me.

I wish I didn't work so hard.

I wish I'd had the courage to express my feelings.

I wish I had stayed in touch with my friends.

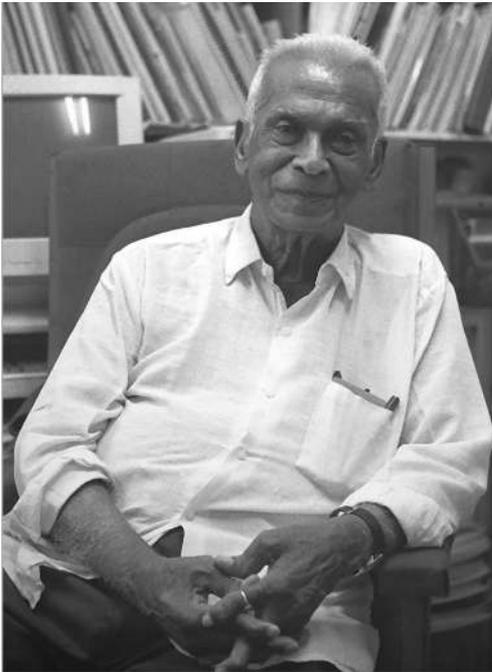

I wish that I had let myself be happier.

When you are on your deathbed, what others think of you is a long way from your mind. How wonderful to be able to let go and smile again, long before you are dying.

Life is a choice. Choose consciously, choose wisely, choose honestly. Choose happiness.

Dr Govindappa Venkataswamy – Giving People The Gift Of Sight

Known as Dr V, Govindappa Venkataswamy dedicated his life to providing people with the gift of sight. His individual work and the founding of the Aravind Eye Hospitals has led to helping millions of people to see. He believed in the following philosophy.

We aim to give sight to all and to see all as one.

"Intelligence and capability are not enough. There must be the joy of doing something beautiful.

"When we grow in spiritual consciousness, we identify with all that is in the world there is no exploitation.

"It is ourselves we're helping, ourselves we're healing."

Here is an introduction to Dr V's work. This is based on an article by David Kemer in which he cites the doctor as his hero.

Dr V. was born in 1918 to a farming family in South India. He gained a medical degree, planned to practice obstetrics but then experienced a setback. Contracting rheumatoid arthritis which affected his hands, he decided to change field. David Kemer describes what Dr V. did next.

He began studying ophthalmology and had instruments specially designed for his arthritic hands - each one custom-made to fill a specific need.

These instruments enabled him to perform as many as 100 cataract surgeries a day. He quickly became the most admired cataract surgeon in India.

Dr V. performed eye surgeries at this rate for 25 years before exploring how to scale his approach. Inspired by the McDonald's approach to selling burgers, he aimed to provide millions of sight-restoring operations.

This led to setting up the Aravind Eye Hospital. This had 11 beds in a rented house in Madurai, India. David Kemer describes what has happened since.

Today, there are some 3600 beds in five Aravind Eye Hospitals that perform more than 200,000 operations each year. And 70% of the patients pay little or nothing.

Hundreds of thousands of India's poor have been granted the gift of sight. Dr V. lowered the cost of cataract operations to nearly $10 per surgery compared to almost $1650 in the U.S.

He reorganized how cataract surgeries are done. By training a team of paramedicals to do 70% of the work required in each surgery, doctors are freed up to do a great many more of them.

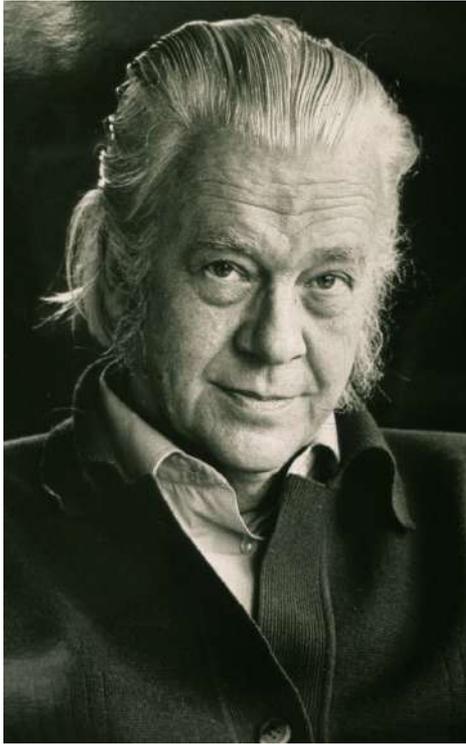

All of the treatments performed at Aravind Eye Hospitals are financed by those patients who are most able to afford them - roughly 30% - who seek out Aravind's world-renowned quality and happily pay competitive prices.

As such, Aravind Hospitals have become a business model for health care systems the world over.

E.F. Schumacher – Small Is Beautiful

Fritz Schumacher is best known for his book Small Is Beautiful. He believed that economics should serve people rather than the other way round. The aim of societies should be to enable people:

"To obtain the maximum amount of well-being with the minimum amount of consumption."

"Call a thing immoral or ugly, soul-destroying or a degradation to man, a peril to the peace of the world or to the well-being of future generations: as long as you have not shown it to be 'uneconomic' you have not really questioned its right to exist, grow, and prosper."

Background

Ernst Friedrich Schumacher was born in Germany in 1911. He studied as a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford before settling in England in 1936.

After the Second World War he acted as an economic advisor to organisations helping to rebuild the German economy. He then became Chief Economic Advisor to the British Coal Board, a post he held between 1950 and 1970.

Despite playing a key role in shaping British industry, Fritz began exploring alternative models. During the 1950s he acted as an economic advisor to countries in Asia.

This led to him developing what he called Buddhist Economics. The principles he espoused included:

That good work plays a vital part in healthy human development;

That developing local resources for local needs is the most rational way of economic life;

That it is possible to empower local communities to employ appropriate technology they can use to shape their futures.

These ideas need to be seen in relation to the economic beliefs prevalent from the 1950s onwards – the belief that bigness was best. This led to building bigger schools, hospitals, factories, institutions, aid programmes and government departments.

Such an approach produced some upsides, but there were also downsides. Bureaucrats controlling the levers of power were further away from the effects of their decisions.

Small Is Beautiful

Writing in Alias Papa, Fritz's eldest daughter Barbara Wood says he made a key decision in 1970. He left full time work with the Coal Board to write the books that had been in his mind for years.

He wrote Small Is Beautiful, which was published in 1973. The book would have a remarkable effect on people for several generations. More than thirty years later, Kamran Mofid would describe the book in the following way.

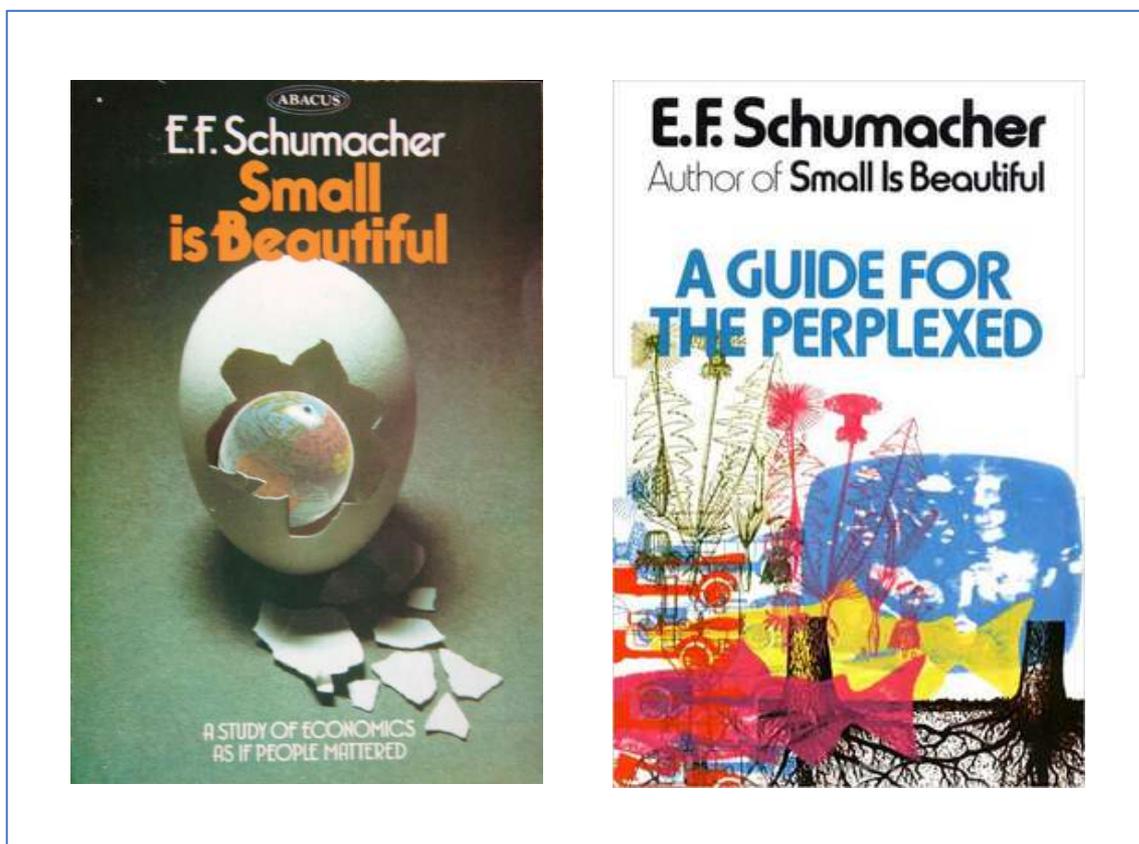

Schumacher's Small is Beautiful is an appeal to the deep instinctive understanding of the common good that all people share.

It is an appeal to our essential humanity. It deals with some of the most pressing concerns of people the world over, concerns which every generation must consider and answer.

The book encourages us to reflect on and understand things we seem to have forgotten: What is Education? What is Knowledge? What is Wisdom? What is the source of happiness and wellbeing?

What is the good life? What is the purpose of economic life? What does it mean to be a human being living on a spaceship with finite resources?

The remedy he proposed - a holistic approach to human society, which stressed small scale, localised solutions - flew in the face of economic orthodoxies of the time.

The Role Of Work

Fritz believed work had a three-fold purpose:

To provide people with useful goods and services; To provide people with the chance to use and perfect their gifts; To provide people with the chance to collaborate with others in order to liberate themselves from inbuilt egocentricity.

Ever the practitioner, Fritz began translating his ideas into action. This led to creating The Intermediate Technology Group. This enabled local communities to employ the appropriate technology to meet their needs.

The Role of Education

Fritz believed education could play a key role in enabling people to develop wisdom. Unfortunately, he said, modern education has become atomised.

Education should instead enable people to connect with the key issues of life – such as how they could be truly healthy and happy. He said that it should help people:

To act as spiritual beings; To act as neighbours and to render service; To act as responsible people; To be creatively engaged, using and developing the gifts that they had been blessed with.

Fritz believed it was vital to be true to the spirit of the Earth that has given us life. The danger was that we would become disconnected. Therefore we needed to recognise what was truly important in life.

Writing in A Guide For The Perplexed, he explained this in the following way.

The generosity of the Earth allows us to feed all mankind. We know enough about ecology to keep the Earth a healthy place; there is enough room on the Earth, and there are enough materials, so that everybody can have adequate shelter.

We are quite competent enough to produce sufficient supplies of necessities so that no one need live in misery.

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to do positive work that helps people or the planet. Different people follow this route in different ways.

Some do it in their daily lives. They aim to encourage their loved ones, friends and colleagues. Some aim to do it in their work as educators, medics, craft workers, scientists, leaders or in other roles.

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach. How can you do this in your own way? How can you build on your personal strengths, follow your principles and do positive work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Work Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow the positive work approach rather than the paralysed by worry approach may be:

*

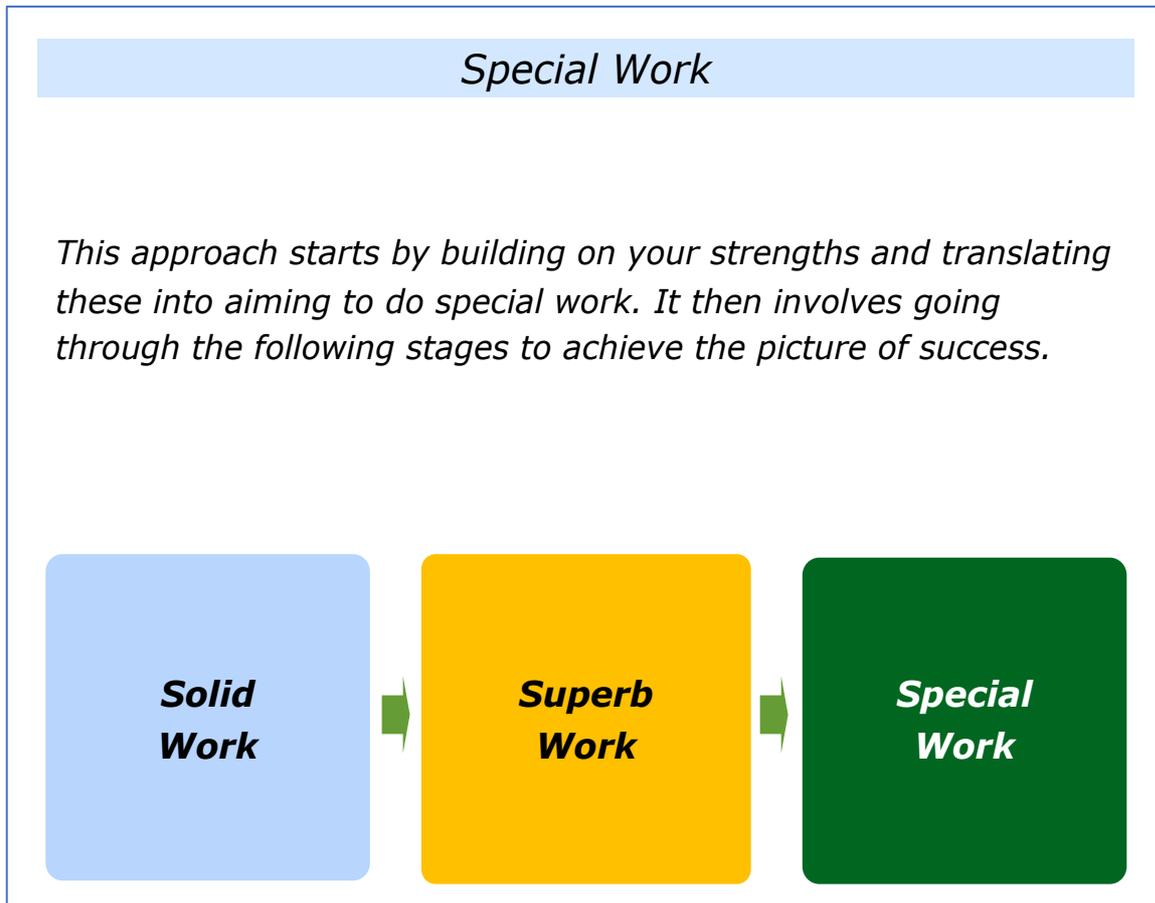

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Special Work Approach

This approach starts by a person building on their strengths and aiming to do something special. They then do the solid work, superb work and special work to achieve the picture of success.

There are several definitions for the word special. These include doing something unique or outstanding. Sometimes it involves going into another dimension and doing something extraordinary.

A person may do such work in the arts, sports, medicine or another activity. They may do it when working as an individual, in a team or in an organisation.

Many specialists combined their talents during Covid 19, for example, to produce vaccines. They created something special that saved many lives. They also passed on knowledge that could be used to treat future pandemics.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the special work approach. This involves focusing on the following themes.

Clarifying The Picture Of Success

Great workers build on their strengths and love to explore future possibilities. Arie de Geus, author of The Living Company, said that such people have what he called a memory of the future.

They anticipate challenges and find potential solutions in their area of expertise. Looking ahead, they use their imagination to create potential pictures of success. Some follow the path described in the often cited quoted by Arthur Schopenhauer.

Talent hits a target no one else can hit; Genius hits a target no one else can see.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you aim to do a piece of work in an activity where you excel. If appropriate, you can explore the following questions.

What is the piece of work I want to do? What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals?

What are the strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I do the required solid work and create the right foundation?

How can I deliver high professional standards and do superb work? How can I go further and do something special? How can I add that touch of class and deliver the picture of success?

Imagine that you have explored these themes. You may then want to do the following exercise.

The Picture Of Success

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The specific results I want to achieve when doing the piece of work – including making it something special – are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing this piece of work will be:

*

*

*

Solid Work

Great workers do the solid work that is required to build a platform for success. The kinds of solid work will depend on their chosen activity. Whatever work they do, however, it may involve aiming:

To prepare properly and plan ahead ... To clarify their strategy ... To translate this into a clear action plan... To do the practical things required to set things up to succeed.

The athlete prepares properly – both physically and psychologically. The leader makes sure their team will be following the right strategy with the right people in the right way.

Great workers then move into action. They follow their chosen strategy, perform good work and get some early successes. They continue to follow good habits and maintain the momentum.

Such workers always do the solid work. They begin by making sure they always achieve 7+/10. This provides the foundation for moving on to the next stage.

Superb Work

Great workers aim to do superb work. One approach is for them to continue to deliver high professional standards. The way they do this will obviously depend on the kind of work they are doing.

A mentor will prepare properly before meeting a person. They will clarify what the person may want to explore, rehearse the session and then do their best to help the person to achieve their goals.

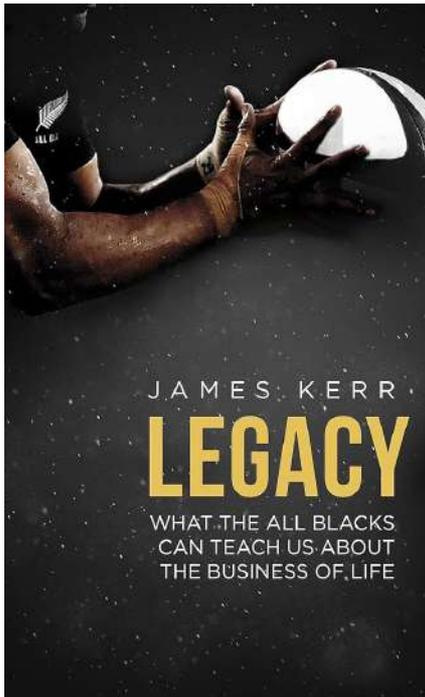

Good organisations also encourage the people to perform superb work. They show how people can follow certain principles and deliver high professional standards.

James Kerr's book Legacy describes how the New Zealand All Blacks rugby team took this approach. They did this after the team had failed to go beyond the semi-finals in the Rugby World Cup.

They encouraged the players to behave in ways that would create a positive legacy. They created a mission that was based on the words of Jonas Salk, who pioneered one of the polio vaccines. They encouraged the players to be good ancestors.

The All Blacks were then urged to follow certain principles that would help them to achieve this mission. Here is an overview of the approach that the players were urged to take.

The New Zealand All Blacks – Creating A Legacy

The All Blacks focused on the higher purpose: To be good ancestors and create a legacy.

This meant following the values of humility, excellence and respect. When you become an All Black the mission is clear:

To leave the jersey in a better place;

To add to the legacy;

To represent all the players that have come before and all the players that will come after.

'The First XV' 15 ALL BLACK PRINCIPLES

By James Kerr, Legacy, 2015

1. Sweep the Sheds
Never be too big to do the small things that need to be done

Before leaving the dressing room at the end of a game, all the players stop and tidy up. They literally and figuratively 'sweep the sheds', an example of personal humility, a cardinal All Blacks value

2. Go for the Gap
When you're on top of your game, change your game

The philosophy and focus on continual improvement and continuous learning leaves no room for complacency

3. Play with Purpose Ask 'Why?'

Better people make better All Blacks is a core belief, and understanding Why? identifies the purpose of being an All Black. The power of purpose galvanises individuals in an organisation, what's the purpose of yours?

4. Pass the Ball
Leaders create leaders

Shared responsibility means shared ownership, a sense of inclusion unites individuals, and collaboration means advancement as a team

5. Create a Learning Environment
Leaders are teachers

For the All Blacks, leaders are learners, are teachers, as Jack Hobbs, former captain said: Get up everyday and be the best you can be. Never let the music die in you

6. No Dickheads
Follow the whanau

The All Blacks select on character over talent, which means some some promising players never pull on the black jersey – because they don't have the right character.

NO ONE IS BIGGER THAN THE TEAM
THE TEAM ALWAYS COMES FIRST

7. Embrace Expectations

Aim for the highest cloud

A culture of expectation enables the asking and re-asking fundamental questions: how can we do better? Taking risks and responsibilities is one of the skills you learn from rugby, a contest of strength, skill and intelligence

8. Train to Win

Practice under pressure

The philosophy means finding ways to do more by preparation and practice. There's a Maori saying: the way the sapling is shaped determines how the tree grows

9. Keep a Blue Head

Control your attention

One minute can decide the outcome of a game, as it can the outcome of a business situation. Avoiding poor decision making under pressure is vital

10. Know Thyself

Keep it real

Honesty drives better performance, attributed to Socrates, the phrase know thy self, is a key tenet of All Blacks philosophy, believing that development of the authentic self is essential to performance

11. Invent your own language

Sing your world into existence

It is a system of meaning that everyone understands, a language and vocabulary, a set of beliefs that bind the group.

12. Sacrifice

Find something you would die for and give your life to it

Don't be a good All Black, be a great All Black. Give everything you have – then a little bit more

HUMILITY RESPECT excellence

13. Ritualise to Actualise

Create a culture

Rituals reflect, remind and reinforce the belief system to reignite their collective identity and purpose

AU, AU, AUE Bā! - IT'S OUR TIME! IT'S OUR MOMENT!
THE FINAL LINE OF THE HAKA

14. Be a Good Ancestor

Plant trees you'll never see

As the sun shines on you for this moment, this is your time, it's your obligation and responsibility to add to the legacy – to leave the jersey in a better place. The legacy is more intimidating than any opposition

15. Write Your Legacy

This is your time

When a player makes the All Blacks, they're given a small black book. The first page shows a jersey from the 1905 Originals, the first tour. On the next page is another jersey, that of the 1924 Invincibles, and thereafter, pages of other jerseys until the present day. The rest of the pages are blank, waiting to be filled, by the player himself

MANY OF US ARE MORE CAPABLE THAN SOME OF US. BUT NONE OF US IS AS CAPABLE AS ALL OF US. THE ALL BLACKS SHOW IT IN EVERY GAME. MAKE SURE YOUR BUSINESS HAS THIS HEART BEAT TOO

Special Work

Great workers sometimes go into another dimension and do something special. The footballer scores a remarkable goal. The dancer does a quadruple turn.

The inventor has an enlightening breakthrough. They translate this into action and go beyond excellence. They produce a piece of work that is extraordinary.

Danny Boyle took this approach with the Isles Of Wonder segment for the opening ceremony of the 2012 London Olympics. He helped to coordinate a cast of thousands to create something special.

In 2022 The Guardian newspaper looked back at the ceremony which had shown the best sides of the Britain. It described in in the following way.

Isles of Wonder was one of the few attempts to tell a fresh, modern, inclusive story about what Britain was, is and could be.

We might not have lived up to it in the short term, but the fact that the vast majority of us responded so positively to it is as important now as it was then. Given all that's happened since, Britain needs stories like this more than ever.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to build on their strengths. It is then for them to do the solid work, superb work and special work to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Special Work Approach

The specific piece of work where I may like to follow elements of the special work approach may be:

*

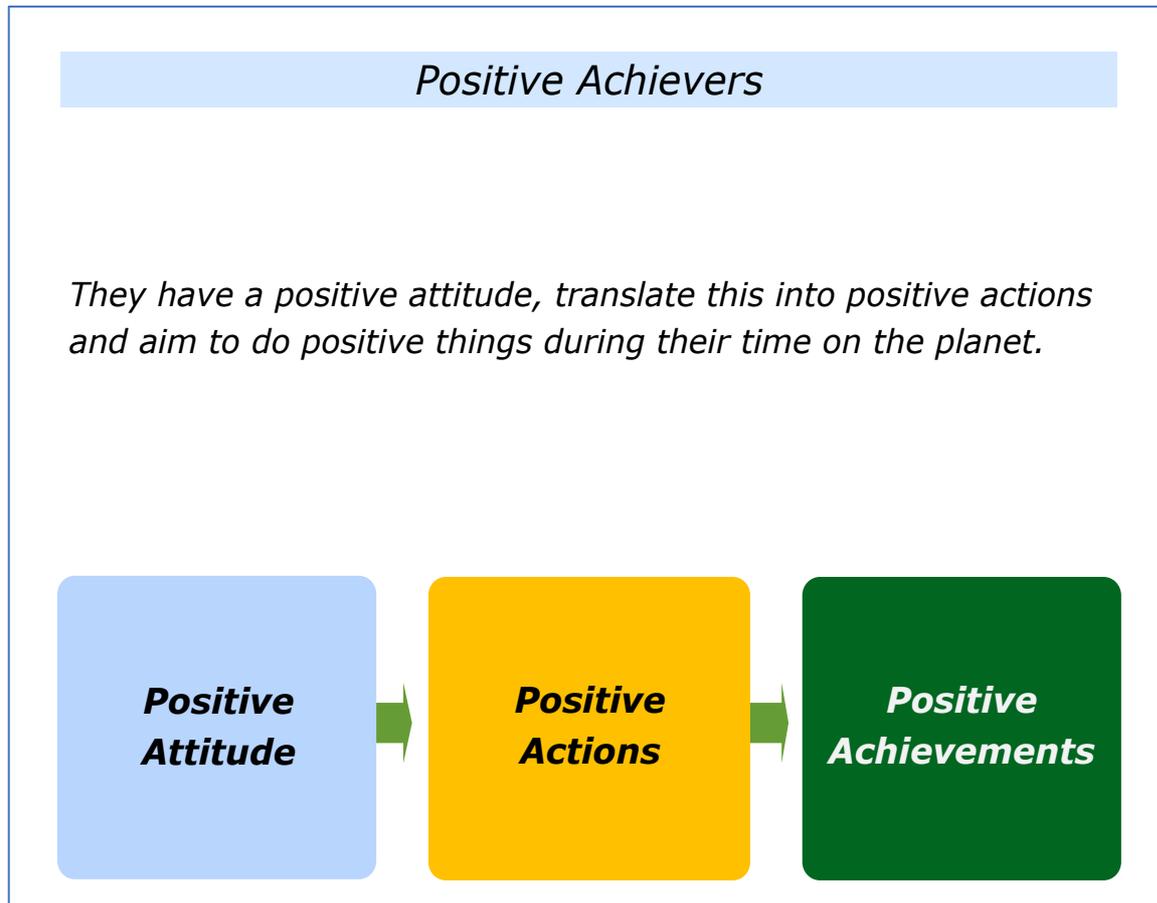

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Achiever Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to follow the steps taken by some positive achievers. Such people often have a positive spirit but also the drive to do superb work.

They have a positive attitude, translate this into positive actions and aim to do positive things during their time on the planet. Let's explore how some people follow this approach in their lives and work.

Positive Attitude

Such people are often positive realists. They have a positive approach to life but are also good at reading reality. They are good at seeing both successful and unsuccessful patterns in the areas where they excel.

Building on what they can control, they focus on what they can do rather than what they can't do. Bengt Elmén, who founded a pioneering organisation in Sweden, takes this approach in his life. He describes this in the following way.

My own experiences with difficulty began early on – as early as birth, in fact. I had a rough delivery, during which I suffered lack of oxygen that resulted in a type of brain damage known as CP, or Cerebral Palsy. As far as I'm concerned, though, CP actually stands for:

"Cool and Powerful".

The brain damage diminished my ability to walk, talk and use my hands. Early on I had to learn to think of creative solutions to daily situations. I could sit for days, for example, using my mouth and nose to piece together a 500-piece jigsaw puzzle.

This taught me that it's always worth the effort to face your difficulties rather than trying to run away from them. Such lessons have been invaluable to me as an adult.

Such people often choose to follow certain principles in their lives. These act as a compass when making decisions and working to achieve certain goals. This leads to the next stage.

Positive Actions

Positive achievers aim to translate their principles into action in a positive way. They may do this when acting as a parent, educator, mentor, leader, trusted advisor or another professional role.

Such people love to focus on achieving deliverable dreams. They rehearse properly, move into action and perform superb work. They then do their best to deliver the goods.

Different people take these steps in different ways. Some take the following approach. They plan ahead and do something like the following exercise.

My Principles

The principles I want to follow in my life and how I can translate these into action a positive way.

The First Principle I Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to translate this into action in a positive way are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Second Principle I Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to try to translate this into action are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Third Principle I Want To Follow Is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to try to translate this into action are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Positive Achievement

Positive achievers love to set goals, cross off tasks from their list and achieve their goals. This can give them a great sense of satisfaction. They then focus on the next goal they want to achieve.

Some people may reach a stage, however, where they begin to reconsider their approach. Certainly they feel high when reaching a goal, but this can be temporary.

They may then begin to explore other themes. These often revolve around the eternal questions.

Who am I? Where am I going? What do I want to do in my life? How can I achieve these goals? When do I want to take these steps?

Different people explore these themes in different ways. Some focus on the following questions.

What do I want to do in the future? What are the things that I believe are important in life? How can I help people or the planet? How can I focus on these things and do my best to achieve a sense of peace?

Some people reach this stage later in life, some experience it earlier. They may then channel their drive into achieving things that give them a more long-lasting sense of satisfaction.

Some people take this step by doing the following exercise. They describe the specific things they can do in their life which, if they do them, are more likely to lead to experiencing a sense of peace.

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to have a positive attitude, translate this into positive actions and achieve positive things in your life and work. Here is the final exercise on this theme.

Peace

The specific things I want to do in the rest of my life which, if I do them, are more likely to lead to me experiencing a sense of peace.

The Specific Things I Want To Do In The Rest Of My Life Are:

* To ...

The steps I can take to do these things are ...

* To ...

The steps I can take to do these things are ...

* To ...

The steps I can take to do these things are ...

*The Specific Benefits Of Doing These Things
- Both For Myself And Other People – Will Be:*

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Follow Up Questions Approach To Finding Out About A Person

The Follow Up Questions Approach

There are many ways to find out more about a person. One approach is to start by asking a question on a particular theme.

It is then to ask follow up questions in order to go deeper and also ask for examples. This helps to build a fuller picture of the person.

- The first question is ...

- The second question is ...

- The third question is

Imagine you are going to have a conversation with somebody or you are interviewing them for a role.

The first thing you say or the question you ask will set the tone for the conversation. You can then explore further by building on what they say or by asking follow up questions.

Good follow up questions can also help to provide a reality check to clarify what a person really means. This can be especially useful when interviewing candidates who apply for jobs or when talking with people who make sweeping statements.

Today's fast moving world has encouraged people to use sound bites or speak in generalities. Such concepts can be alluring but sometimes it is can be useful to invite them to give concrete examples.

Political leaders, for example, often speak in slogans. When asked to explain, they jump to giving another slogan. Sometimes it is important to stop them and explore the implications of what they are saying.

Good journalists, for example, invite the politician to explain how their idea would be translated into action. They also ask them to explain the consequences – the pluses and minuses - of making this happen.

When interviewing a politician who is talking in sound bites they may say something like the following.

"Let's explore this with you a little further. As far as I understand it, you are suggesting doing the following ...? Is that right?"

"I understand the principle, so let's look at how this may work in practice. How would you translate this principle into action? What would you actually do to implement the idea?"

"What would be the consequences of taking these steps? What would be the pluses and the minuses? How would you deal with the consequences?"

Follow up questions can help us to do a reality check. So let's explore this process of asking questions to find out more about a person.

Follow Up Questions In Interview Situations

Imagine that you are interviewing a person for a leadership role. They may have read books on leadership and come ready with various quotes.

Several years ago a company invited me to sit in on such an interview. At one point the candidate was asked about their leadership style. They come out with the following statement.

"I will communicate a clear vision and empower people to deliver it."

The interviewing panel seemed to like this and were ready to move on to the next theme. Before they did so, however, I asked if it was okay for me to ask a few questions. These were along the following lines.

"I wonder if it is okay to ask a few things. Please accept that these questions are designed to explore how you will translate the ideas into action rather than to catch you out.

"It is also okay to reflect and take your time when considering the questions. Let's start with a few questions about clarifying the team's vision.

"What will you actually do to meet with the key stakeholders – such as your manager – and agree on the team's specific goals? How will you make clear contracts about how you will keep the stakeholders informed regarding the progress towards achieving the goals?

"Let's move on to working with the team. What will you do on your first day when meeting the team? What will you do to get to know each of the people and their strengths?

"How will you present the vision and the reasons for working towards it? How will you get their input to add to the vision? How make clear contracts with the team members about their best contributions to achieving the goals?

"How will you manage by outcomes rather than tasks? How will you make sure the team is on track when working towards the vision? What else will you do to build a successful team?

"Those are a lot of questions. I would like you to reflect, pick up on a few of the questions and share how you might translate some of these themes into action. Is that okay?"

We gave the candidate some time to reflect and then respond. Unfortunately they still answered with generalisations and a few more clichés. They were familiar with the concepts regarding leadership. But they found it hard to describe how they would translate these into concrete actions.

Later we met another candidate. They were able to describe some of the things they would actually do – in behaviour terms – to lead the team to success. This led to them being offered the role.

Follow Up Questions Can Uncover A Person's Successful Style

The follow up questions approach is one that can also be used to clarify a person's successful style of working. Let's look at one example.

Many years ago I was asked to interview a person who was applying for a leadership role. The company wanted to hire the person but was not sure if they would fit with the role that was advertised. Bearing this in mind, I invited the person to do the following things:

To describe when they had led a team successfully;

To describe the principles they followed when leading the team successfully;

To describe what they actually did – in behaviour terms - to translate these principles into action and lead the team successfully.

The person started by describing how they built a team from scratch, led a pioneering project and delivered success. At my request, they then described another project they had led to fruition.

The person's leadership style soon became clear. Looking at their successful pattern, they made his best contribution when they took the following steps.

They found a place where they could build a successful prototype;

They agreed on the goals with their key stakeholders;

They set a deadline to work towards – because that was how they worked best – and for this to involve some sort of public launch;

They got some quick wins that reassured their stakeholders;

They built a team of committed people who wanted to achieve the goal;

They explained the professional deal clearly to people before they joined the team – people needed to know what they could and could not expect - then decide if they wanted to join the team;

They played to their strengths – which was focusing on the strategy and partnering with customers – and had a coordinator who kept things on track;

They continued to act as the flag bearer by keeping the stakeholders informed and also communicating through the media;

They kept people’s eyes on the compelling goal and flagged up where the team were on the journey;

They hit the deadline and sometimes did a public launch that involved customers who shared how the team had helped them to achieve success.

The leader’s style was more suited to doing pacesetting work rather than the advertised role. Bearing this in mind, the company invited him to consider running a new part of the business it was about to set-up.

This proved to be a much better fit. It produced a win for the person and a win for the company.

Let’s return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to use elements of the follow up questions approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Follow Up Questions Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach in my way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Person Writing Questions You Can Ask Them To Find Out More About Them Approach

Finding Out More About Me

Here are five questions that you can ask to find out more about me.

*

*

*

*

*

There are many ways to find out more about a person. This is an old exercise that takes a unique approach.

It invites a person to write five questions you can ask them to find out more about them. The person then hands over the questions and you can proceed to ask the questions. You can also add any other questions you wish to ask.

This seems a simple exercise but it can reveal a lot about a person. It is one that can be used when interviewing a person for a role or in many other situations. You can also adapt it how you wish. Here are the instructions.

Step One

You invite the person to write down five questions you can ask them to find out about them. The person writes these questions on a piece of paper.

Step Two

The person gives you the piece of paper with the questions. You then interview them by asking the questions they have written. If appropriate, you can invite them to expand on their answers.

Different people do, of course, write different questions. Once when I did this exercise the first question that one person wrote was:

"What is your deepest problem?"

This said a lot about the person. They were mainly focused on what they saw as the barriers to their growth.

Other people write other questions that you can ask them. Here are some of the ones that individuals write.

"What is important to you in life? What do you enjoy doing? What do you feel passionate about?"

"What do you believe in? What are the principles you want to follow in your life? What are your personal and professional goals?"

"What are your strengths? What are the kinds of work you find most satisfying? How do you want to use your strengths to help other people?"

This is a tough but interesting exercise. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to give a person at least ten minutes to write the questions.

Some people write personal questions – such as about their family and passions. Some write professional questions – such as about their strengths and career goals. Some write philosophical questions – such as about their purpose, principles and personal goals.

As mentioned earlier, you can use this exercise in many situations. It can reveal a lot about a person, their drives and their goals. It can also be useful to test the approach on yourself.

Imagine that somebody asked you to do this exercise. What would be the five questions you would write that a person could ask to find out more about you?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Finding Out More About Me

The five questions that a person could ask to find out more about me would be:

*

*

*

*

*

The Natural Talent, Knowledge And Nous Approach

Natural Talent

There are many ways to help a person to develop. One approach is to encourage them to have the nerve to build on their natural talent.

It is then to help them to develop their knowledge and, when appropriate, to add the nous. You can then help them to apply these elements to do fine work.

There are many ways to help a person to develop. One approach is to encourage them to have the nerve to build on their natural talent. It is then to help them to develop their knowledge and, when appropriate, to add the nous.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach to help a person to do fine work. If appropriate, you can focus on the following themes.

Natural Talent

This step starts by encouraging a person to have the nerve to be themselves and do what they do best. Such an approach may seem unnecessary, but sometimes it can be important to encourage a person:

To be true to themselves, to build on their natural talent and to become the best they can be.

This also calls for encouraging them to follow their core principles rather than to compare themselves to others. At the same time, it involves helping them to do what they do best, do their best and keep developing.

Sometime people need an outside talent spotter to help them to follow this path. One approach is to watch a person in action or see an example of their work. It is then to explore the following themes.

When does the person come alive? When are they in their element – at ease and yet able to excel? When do they have positive energy? When do they make complicated things appear simple?

What are their strengths? What are the specific activities in which they can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What is their successful style of working? How can they continue to follow this style and do superb work?

Looking ahead, how would they like to use their natural talent? What may be their professional goals? How can you help them to work towards achieving their picture of success?

Imagine that a person wants to build on their natural talent. If appropriate, you can then invite them to do the following exercise. This involves them focusing on the following themes. They can aim:

To clarify the specific goals they want to achieve;

To clarify their responsibilities in working to achieve the specific goals;

To clarify the help they would like to work towards the specific goals;

To clarify the specific things that will be happening that will show they have achieved the specific goals.

Here is a framework that a person can use to focus on how they want to develop their natural talent.

My Talent Development Plan

The specific talent – the specific strength – I have that I would like to continue to develop is:

*

The Specific Goals. The specific results I want to achieve by developing this talent are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Responsibilities. The specific things I see as my responsibilities in working towards achieving these goals are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Help. The specific kinds of help I would like in working towards achieving the goals are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Measures. The specific things that will be happening that will show I have achieved the goals will be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Knowledge

This step involves helping a person to add to their knowledge. There are many ways to take this approach. These include the following.

You can watch the person in action and help them to improve

This is an approach taken by many coaches. They watch the person in action or see an example of their work. They may then use the following framework to help a person to improve.

If you wish, you can follow elements of this approach in your own way. Here is the framework you can use.

Good Coaches

They try to pass on knowledge in a way that helps a person to achieve their goals.

This often involves watching the person in action or seeing a piece of their work. It then involves focusing the following themes.

- What are the person's goals? What are real results they want to achieve? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their goals?
- What is the person doing right that will help them to achieve their goals? How can they do more of these things in the future? What can they do better in the future and how?
- What are the positive models and practical tools that I can pass on to help them? What are the key messages I want to give them? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can accept and use to achieve their goals?

You can invite the person to clarify the knowledge they want to develop and then pass on this in a coaching session

This approach involves the person doing some prework before having a coaching sessions. It invites them to complete the following framework.

The specific topic I would to explore is ...

The specific background to this situation is ...

The real results I want to achieve in this situation are ...

The specific things I have tried and the results of these have been ...

The specific ideas and practical tools I would like your thoughts on regarding the possible options in this situation are ...

The person can send this prework to you before the session. You can then share your knowledge and ideas in a way they can use.

My Knowledge Development

The specific topic I would like to explore is:

* How to ...

Here is a bit more background about the specific situation:

*

The real results I would like to achieve in this situation are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The specific things I have tried to do in this situation and the results of trying these things have been:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The specific ideas and practical things I would like your thoughts on about the possible options in this situation are:

* How to ...

* How to ...

* How to ...

Nous

This step involves helping a person to add the nous required to make the best use of their talent. There are several definitions of the word nous. These include a person using their experience:

To apply common sense and practical intelligence to get the desired results in certain situations.

A person may show talent during the early part of their career but may not always use this properly. They can be helped to develop their nous by learning by educators, coaches or mentors.

Here is an exercise a person can do before meeting with you – or another coach or mentor. This involves them aiming:

To clarify the situation – such as a recent or past experience - they want to explore and to give some background;

To clarify what they learned from the situation – such as what they did well and what they could do better in the future;

To clarify the specific knowledge they would like to get about how to manage such situations.

Imagine that a person has sent this prework to you. If appropriate, you can then pass on practical ideas the person can use to manage such situations in the future. This can help to develop their nous.

Here is the framework the person can use to do some prework and then, after the session, focus on their future action plan.

Developing Nous – The Ability To Manage Certain Situations

The specific situation – such as a recent or past experience - I want to explore is:

*

*Here is a bit more background
about the specific situation:*

*

*

*

The specific things I learned from the situation - such as what I did well and what I could do better in the future - are:

*

*

*

The specific knowledge I would like to get about how to manage such situations is:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to apply this knowledge in similar situations in the future are:

*

*

*

There are many ways to help a person to develop. One approach is to encourage them to have the nerve to build on their natural talent. It is then to help them to develop their knowledge and, when appropriate, to add the nous.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Natural Talent, Knowledge And Nous Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Things Approach And The Poisonous Things Approach

There are many ways to live life. The route that people follow can have consequences for both themselves and other people.

Some people follow the positive things approach. They aim to be positive, spend time with positive people and do positive things in their life and work. This can have beneficial effects for themselves and other people.

Some people follow the poisonous things approach. They behave in ways that spread animosity, cause pain and hurt others. They may feel justified but this can have negative effects for other people.

Some people follow the positive things approach but also find ways to deal with poison. They aim to do practical things that can help rather than hurt themselves and other people.

Some people take a similar step to reclaim their lives after spending time in a poisonous environment. They choose to do things that give them positive energy. They are then more able to heal themselves and help other people.

Different people choose to follow these different routes in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

The Positive Things Approach

Some people learn to follow this approach early in their lives. They may grow up in a family where they are given love, encouragement and the chance to be themselves.

This is a pattern followed by many people who may have had difficulty in school. They may have been dyslexic, had ADHD or been seen as slow learners. They report that their parents aimed:

To give them support ... To build on their strengths ... To find ways to manage school whilst doing stimulating things on the side that helped them to achieve success.

Such people learn to follow similar principles in their relationships. They have a positive attitude and encourage people. They also spend time with people who have similar approach.

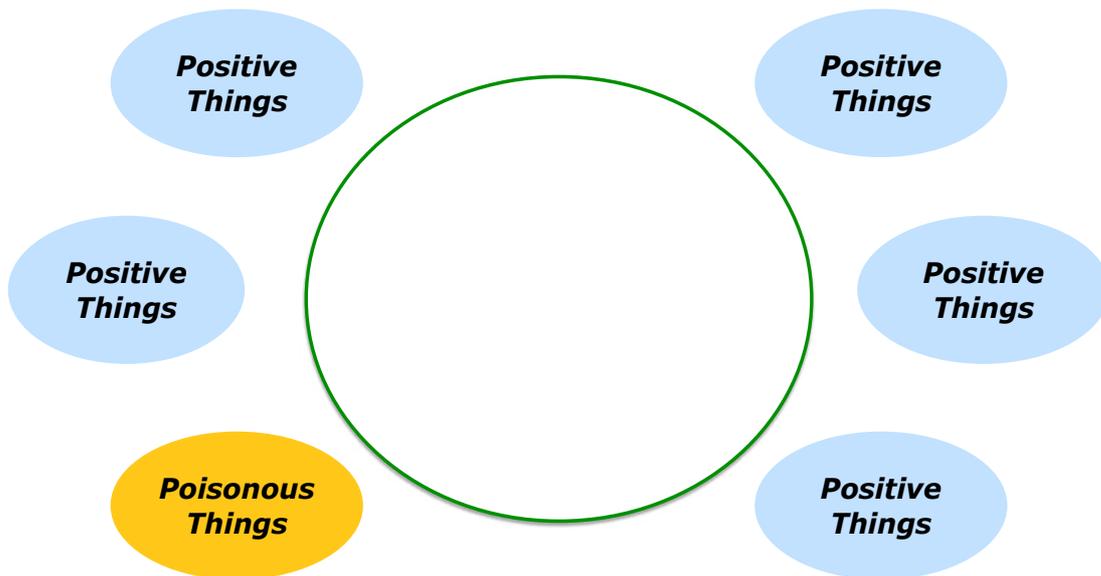

They may aim do work that gives them positive energy. Some people follow this path early in their working lives. Some transition to this approach later in their careers.

Some individuals also learn to recognise warning signs if others try to fight dirty. They may learn to do this in their early adult years. Some may learn it later after spending years trying to change other people.

People who take the positive things approach sometimes follow the philosophy that everything is food. Let's explore this theme.

Positive Things – The Everything Is Food Approach

Some people aim to put positive things rather than poisonous things into their system. They do this because they recognise that everything is food.

Everything is food. The things we encounter each day have the ability to affect our system. These may be sounds, sights, people and the things we choose to focus on. What we do about these experiences is, of course, up to us.

Positive Food

One person described becoming aware of the experiences they were exposing themselves to in the following way.

"My Eureka moment came one morning on the Motorway. Sitting in the traffic jam listening to politicians arguing on the radio, I found myself getting more depressed.

"So I switched off the radio, put on my favourite music and let my mind wander. It didn't shift the traffic, but something changed within me.

"Now I start the day by listening to music, rather than arguments.

Instead of 'garbage in, garbage out', I go for 'good things in, good things out'."

What is the positive food that you put into your system? You may choose, for example, to do some of the following things.

Be with encouraging people ... Do stimulating work ... Listen to your favourite music ... Eat healthy food ... Spend time in the countryside ... Surround yourself with beauty ... Pursue creative activities – such as writing, gardening, painting or whatever ... Set aside time to reflect.

Poisonous Food

Is there any poisonous food that you experience in your life or work? What are the negative things that affect your system? You may choose, for example, to do some of the following things.

Listen to negative people ... Eat tasteless food in hotels ... Spend too many nights away from home ... Work with dispiriting clients ... Have back-to-back meetings during the day ... Meet in windowless rooms ... Feel out of control at work ... Neglect your health.

There are many kinds of food that affect our systems. The old rule applies: "What we focus on, we become."

People can choose to study many of the positive things happening around the world, for example, rather than listen to a constant diet of bad news put out by the traditional media.

They can study the work done by social enterprises to tackle some of humanity's most pressing problems. These include organisations such as Ashoka, Acumen Fund, Skoll Foundation, Echoing Green and Schwab Foundation.

They can study the many educational projects that are helping young people to develop Twenty-First Century Skills. These skills include Clear Thinking, Creativity, Collaboration and Communication. Studying these is more uplifting than complaining about schools still geared to the Industrial Age.

People who aim to stay healthy often follow the approach described by Barbara Fredrickson. Let's explore this approach.

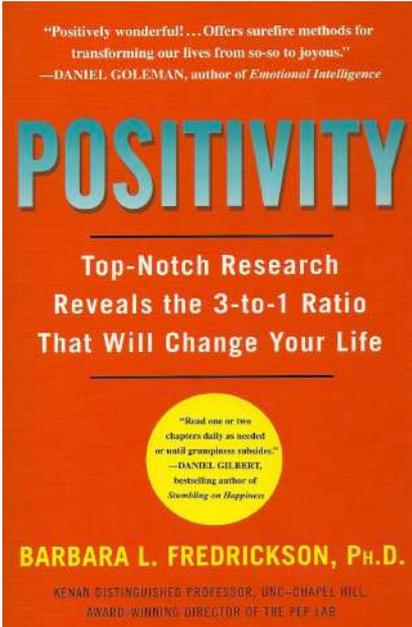

Barbara Fredrickson's Work On Positivity

Barbara did pioneering work that demonstrated how positive emotions can improve our lives. Twenty years of research into emotions culminated in her book Positivity. Here is the key theme she highlighted.

People who have positive emotions in a ratio of 3:1 in relation to negative emotions are more likely to flourish.

Barbara saw this pattern repeated in marriages and teams that thrived. People who experienced more negativity were more likely to have difficulties.

Positive Emotions

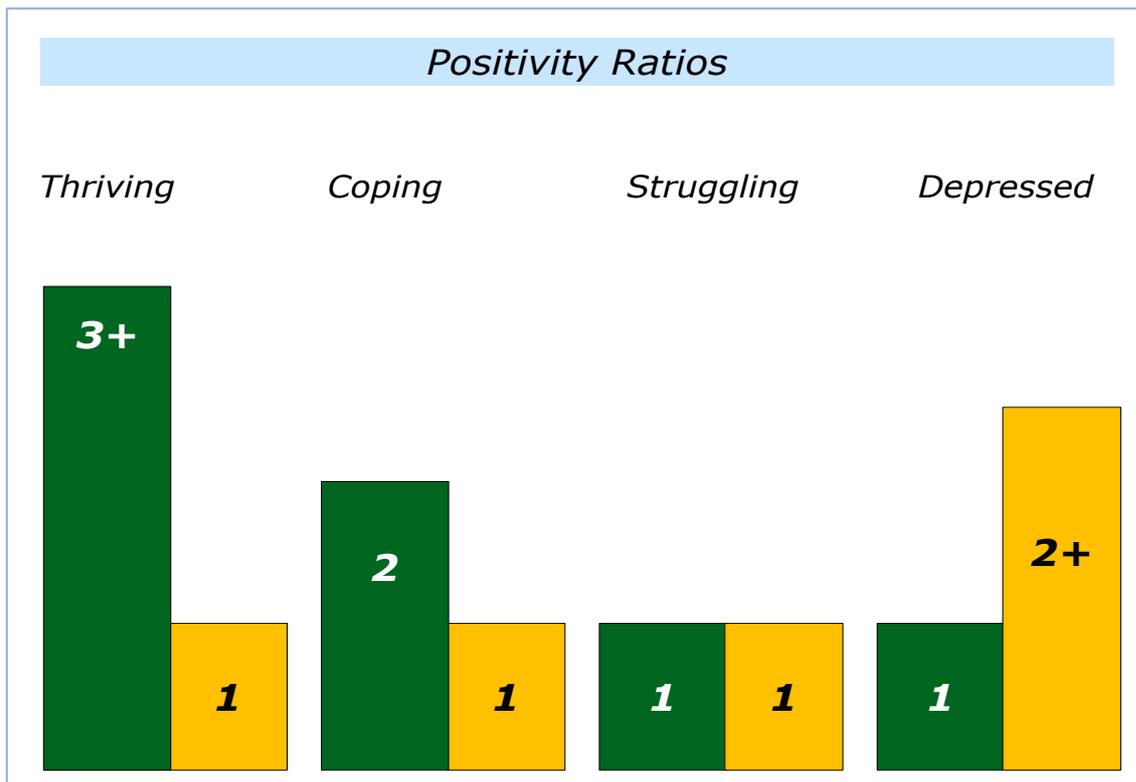

KENAN DISTINGUISHED PROFESSOR, UNC—CHAPEL HILL
AWARD-WINNING DIRECTOR OF THE PEV LAB

Individuals, marriages and business teams that flourish have positivity ratios above 3 to 1.

We need a ratio of 3 to 1 to lift us, develop and increase our resilience.

Individuals who don't overcome their depression, couples who fail in their marriages, and business teams that are unpopular and unprofitable each have ratios in the gutter, below 1 to 1.

Barbara explains that positivity is more than simply being happy. It certainly isn't putting on a smiling face to grin and bear things.

Positivity is based on being true to ourselves. It embodies gratitude, love, playfulness, curiosity and adventure. These emotions trigger each other and create an upward spiral. They 'broaden and build', helping us to make breakthroughs and bring new things into being.

Such emotions provide the basis for creativity, problem solving and even evolution. They enable us to open our hearts and minds. Negativity, on the other hand, closes down our ability to think, create and grow. Barbara explains this in the following way.

Positivity consists of the whole range of positive emotions – from appreciation to love, from amusement to joy, from hope to gratitude, and then some.

Barbara discovered that people could improve their wellbeing by improving their positivity ratio. She likened this to changing their diet to eat healthier food. They needed maintain this positive diet, however, rather than keep exposing themselves to negativity.

She listed ten forms of positivity that can nourish the soul. People can do both simple and big things that generate the following emotions in themselves and other people.

Gratitude ... Joy ... Love ... Hope ... Inspiration ... Amusement ... Awe ... Interest ... Pride ... Serenity.

People who maintain these habits will create an upward spiral that takes them beyond the tipping point. They are then more likely to increase the wellbeing of both themselves and other people.

People who follow the positive things approach often aim to feel grateful, generous and to help other people. They are also more likely to experience a sense of peace.

The Poisonous Things Approach

Some people follow the poisonous things approach. They behave in ways that spread animosity, cause pain and hurt others. They may feel justified but this can have negative effects for other people.

Some people learn to follow this approach early in their lives. They may grow up in a family that is painful. They may have been denied love, stability and the chance to grow in a positive way.

Such individuals may then aim to feel in control by being narcissistic or hurting others. They may seek conflict, scapegoat people who are different or find other ways to feel superior. They spread poison rather than positivity.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to be positive and do positive things in your time on the planet. How can you follow these approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Things Approach

The specific things I can do to follow elements of the positive things approach in my own way are:

*

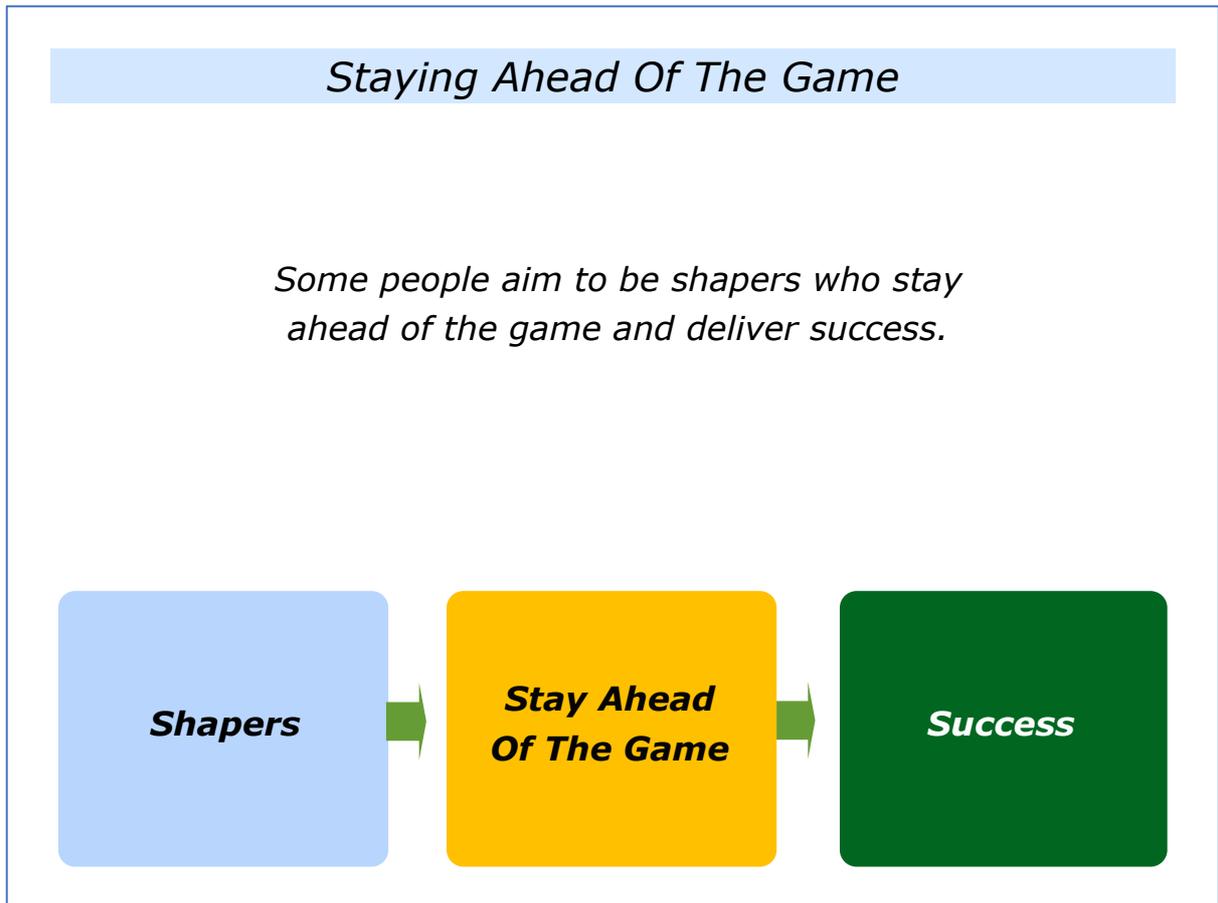

The specific things I can do to manage some of the less positive things are:

*

The specific benefits of following this approach – both for myself and other people – may be:

*

The Shapers Who Aim Stay Ahead Of The Game And Deliver Success Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. This piece explores how shapers aim to stay ahead of the game and deliver success. They then aim to repeat the process to continue to do fine work.

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach. Let's consider how you can do this in your own way.

Shaping

Many people love to feel in control. They often like to look ahead, be proactive and shape things in their lives and work. They may do this when making decisions, doing projects or working towards their goals.

What are the specific activities where you like to shape things? Here are some of the answers that people give when exploring this theme.

I like to look ahead and shape things when I am:

*Taking care of my health ... Focusing on my area of expertise ...
Anticipating trends in the market ... Leading my team ... Helping my customers to succeed ... Developing my ability to achieve peak performance.*

Imagine that you have focused on a specific activity where you like to shape things. It can then be time to explore the next stage.

Staying Ahead Of The Game

Shapers aim to stay ahead of the game in their chosen field. Different people do this in different ways. Some take the following steps.

Continuing To Be Proactive

Great workers aim to stay on the front foot. They aim to make things happen rather than just let things happen. This calls for being proactive, looking ahead and planning how to increase the chances of success.

Continuing To Anticipate And Plan How To Manage Future Events

Such workers focus on their chosen activity. They then look ahead to anticipate potential events and challenges. This involves exploring the following themes.

What may happen in my chosen field in the future? What may be the likely innovations? What may be the potential challenges? How can I use my strengths to manage these innovations and challenges successfully?

Continuing To Do Pacesetting Work

Shapers aim to do pacesetting work. They often have a different kind of psychology. They aim to take the lead, maintain the lead and extend the lead. They make the new rules for the game.

Such people may introduce a new paradigm – a new way of looking at the world - that can bring success. They also show how taking this approach can be practical and, in the broadest sense of the word, profitable.

Imagine that you have followed some of these steps in your own way. It may then be time to focus on the next stage.

Success

Great workers aim to deliver the goods in their chosen field. This involves being able to manage today's business whilst also shaping tomorrow's businesses. Different people do this in different ways. Some do it by focusing on the following framework.

Shaping – The specific things I can do to continue to shape things in my chosen field are:

*

*

*

Staying Ahead Of The Game – The specific things I can do to stay ahead of the game in my chosen field are:

*

*

*

Success – The specific things I can therefore do to continue to deliver success in my chosen field are:

*

*

*

Shapers focus on the strategies they can follow to deliver the goods both today and tomorrow. They then do their best to shape a positive future and achieve ongoing success.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in the activity where you excel. How can you follow it in your own way to stay ahead of the game?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Shaping, Staying Ahead Of The Game And Delivering Success Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Enjoyment Of Encouraging People And Evolving Approach

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to enjoy the process of encouraging people and also evolving. A person may do this as a parent, educator, medic, mentor, leader or in another role.

Different people follow these steps in different ways. Let's explore how they may do this by focusing on the following themes.

Enjoyment

Different people have different reasons for helping others. Many people love to be kind and see others grow. Here are some things that individuals say regarding their motivations.

"I simply enjoy encouraging people. Many people have helped me in the past. I simply want to pass on the help that I was given."

"Much of my professional life has been spent encouraging people. This has involved being a counsellor, therapist and mentor. I still look forward to every day when I can help people."

"I used to get nervous before giving a keynote speech. Whilst I still prepare massively, I now just feel enjoyment when looking forward to a session where I am passing on knowledge that may help people."

Let's return to your own life and work. What do you enjoy about encouraging people? What is the specific kind of situation where you feel in your element taking this approach?

Are there certain kinds of people that you particularly like encouraging? What are the characteristics of these people? What may be the benefits – both for them and for yourself – of encouraging them?

Encouragement

There are many ways to encourage people. You may, for example, offer them practical, personal or professional encouragement.

Practical Encouragement

This can involve providing people with the basic materials for life. It can mean making sure they have the food, shelter and other resources needed to maintain their health, hope and happiness.

Personal Encouragement

This can involve giving people the love and support they need to develop. It can mean helping a person to follow their principles and work towards achieving their picture of success.

Professional Encouragement

This can involve helping people to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and achieve specific goals. It can also mean helping them to pass on their knowledge and leave a positive legacy.

Different people encourage others in different ways. Some may offer a safe environment, a listening ear and empathy. Some may offer practical strategies and tools that help people to achieve success.

Let's return to your own life and work. What is your way of offering encouragement to people? How do you translate this into action? What sometimes happens as a result?

Evolution

Some people may simply find it rewarding to help others to grow and evolve. Some may also find that they learn and develop. One person expressed this in the following way.

"My aim is always put the other person first because it is about them, it is not about me. Nevertheless, I love helping them to achieve their goals. Sometimes I get what is called the helper's high.

"I also get encouragement when encouraging people. It is as if I am following a vocation in which I feel fully alive. This helps me to explore new ways to develop.

"After the session I reflect on what went well and what I could have done better. I feel lucky to be doing stimulating work where I can help people and also continue to develop."

Imagine that some of your work involves encouraging people. How may you sometimes help them to develop? How do you try to learn from these experiences and aim to keep evolving?

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to enjoy the process of encouraging people and also evolving. How can you continue to follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Enjoyment Of Encouraging People And Evolving Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Developing By Doing Your Best When Dealing With Challenges Approach

There are many ways to develop. One approach is to do your best when dealing with challenges. Some people even reframe difficult challenges as delightful. They then aim to do their best and develop.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you developed by tackling a stimulating or stretching challenge? What did you learn from doing your best to tackle the challenge? Did you learn anything that helped you to develop?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Developing By Doing My Best To Deal With Challenges In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I developed by doing my best when dealing with a challenge was:

*

The specific things I did then to do my best when dealing with the challenge were:

*

*

*

The specific things I learned or the specific ways I developed as a result of dealing with the challenge were:

*

*

*

Different people learn different lessons depending on the type of challenge they are tackling. They may be doing a creative project, climbing a mountain, rescuing people at sea, solving technical problems, making key decisions or doing other activities.

Whilst the challenges may be different, some common themes often emerge. Here are some things that people say about what they learned and how they developed.

I learned about the importance of:

Being clear on your goals ... Learning from when you have tackled similar challenges in the past ... Learning about what works ... Clarifying the principles you want to follow.

Getting some quick successes ... Continually focusing on your principles – because these may be the only constant as events unfold ... Producing success stories.

Taking time to do reality checks ... Building on what is working ... Tackling areas for improvement ... Getting a second wind and even a third wind ... Following your successful pattern for finishing.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific situation in the future where you may want to develop by dealing with a challenge? This could be something in your personal or professional life.

What may be the kind of challenge that you want to tackle? What may be the results you want to achieve? How can you do your best achieve these goals?

What do you think you may learn by tackling the challenge? How do you think that these may help you to develop? How could you then apply these lessons in your future life or work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Developing By Doing My Best To Deal With Challenges In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may want to develop by dealing with a challenge may be:

*

The specific things I can do then do to my best when dealing with the challenge are:

*

*

*

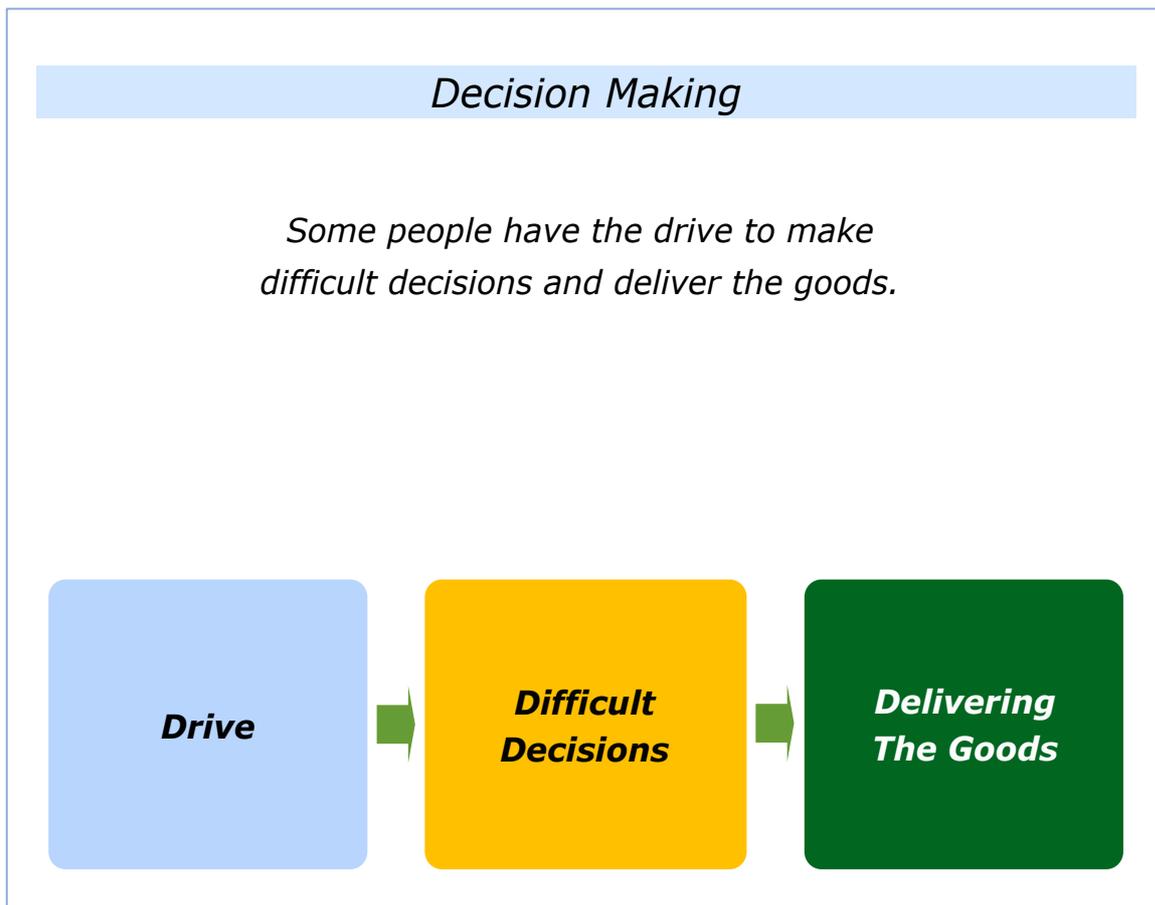

The specific things I may learn or the specific ways I may develop as a result of dealing with the challenge may be:

*

*

*

The Drive To Make Difficult Decisions And Deliver The Goods Approach

Some people have the drive to make difficult decisions in a certain field. When appropriate, they may then aim to translate these into action and deliver the goods.

They may be medics, parole officers, law makers or leaders in other professions. Such people may also feel a sense of duty to make such decisions.

They may have been on a long journey, however, towards choosing to take such responsibility. At a certain point, they may have asked themselves the following questions.

What are the difficult decisions to be made in this field? Who should make these decisions? If not me, then who? Am I prepared to make these decisions? If so, how can I make them in the best possible way?

Such people may also have met significant individuals who have had a strong impact on their lives. These may have been parents, teachers, mentors or others who acted as positive models. These have inspired them to take responsibility for making difficult decisions.

Different people then choose to apply these skills in different ways. They may focus on managing crises, helping troubled people or making decisions that have consequences for others in society.

Such individuals often have a strong moral compass. They also demonstrate some of the following qualities;

They enjoy taking responsibility ... They believe in following certain principles ... They have a strong feeling for a certain activity or profession ... They have in the past stepped up to take tough decisions in this area.

They actually enjoy taking tough decisions ... They are prepared to accept the consequences - the pluses and minuses involved - in making such decisions ... They continue to develop their skills in making such decisions.

They have a strong feeling for the activity but can also become quite cerebral when making tough decisions. Having a sense of perspective, they recognise what they can and control in situations. They then use their preferred model for making decisions.

Such people learn how to take care of their own emotions. They do things that give them positive energy and, when appropriate, know how to heal themselves. This increases their strength for being able to manage challenging situations in the future.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Drive To Make Difficult Decisions And Deliver The Goods

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

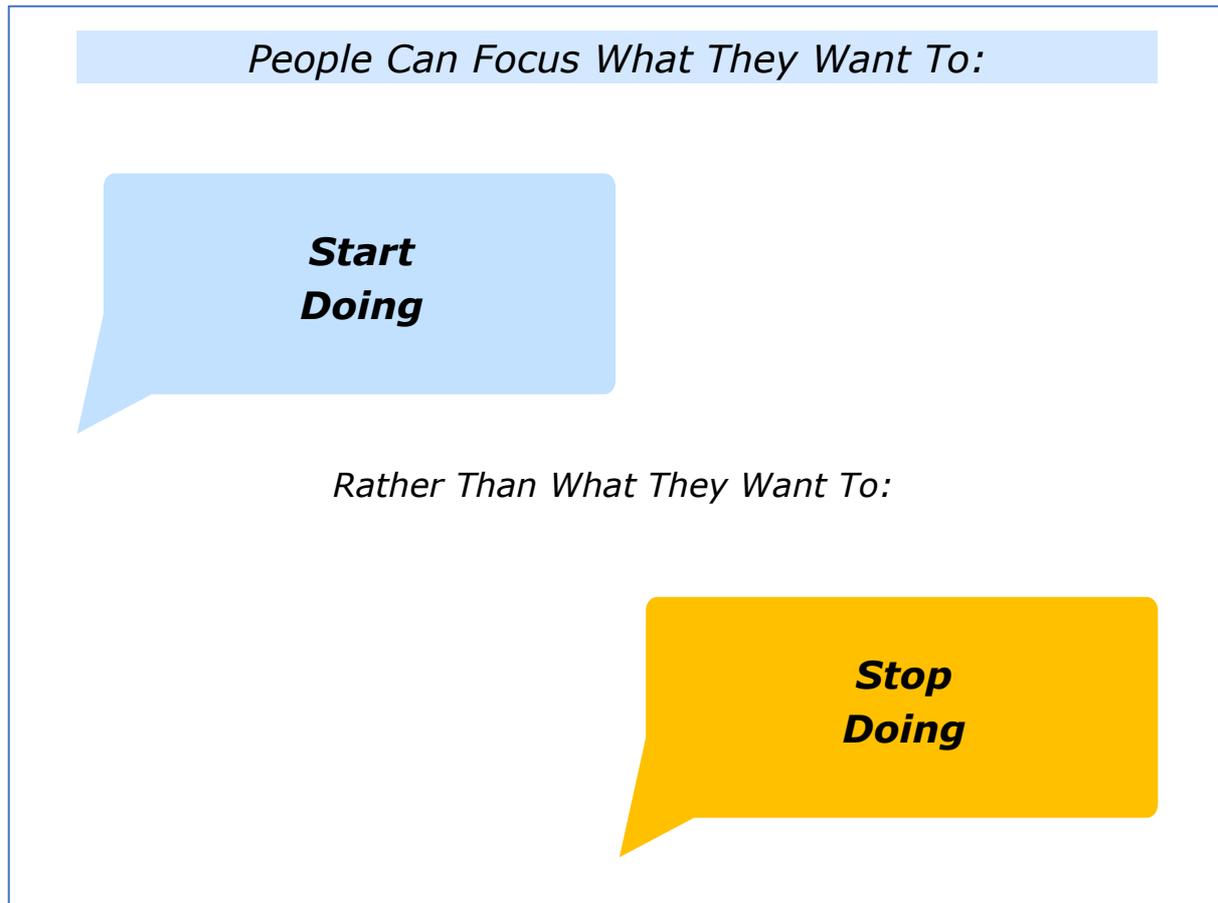

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Start Doing Rather Than Stop Doing Approach

People sometimes talk about what they want to stop doing in their lives or work. A person may focus on negative things, for example, and say something along the following lines.

I want to stop:

Feeling stressed ... Feeling depressed ... Feeling angry.

This is a scenario I sometimes encountered when doing therapy sessions. A person would describe what they wanted to stop doing or stop feeling. At a certain point, I would ask them:

"What do you want to start doing instead?"

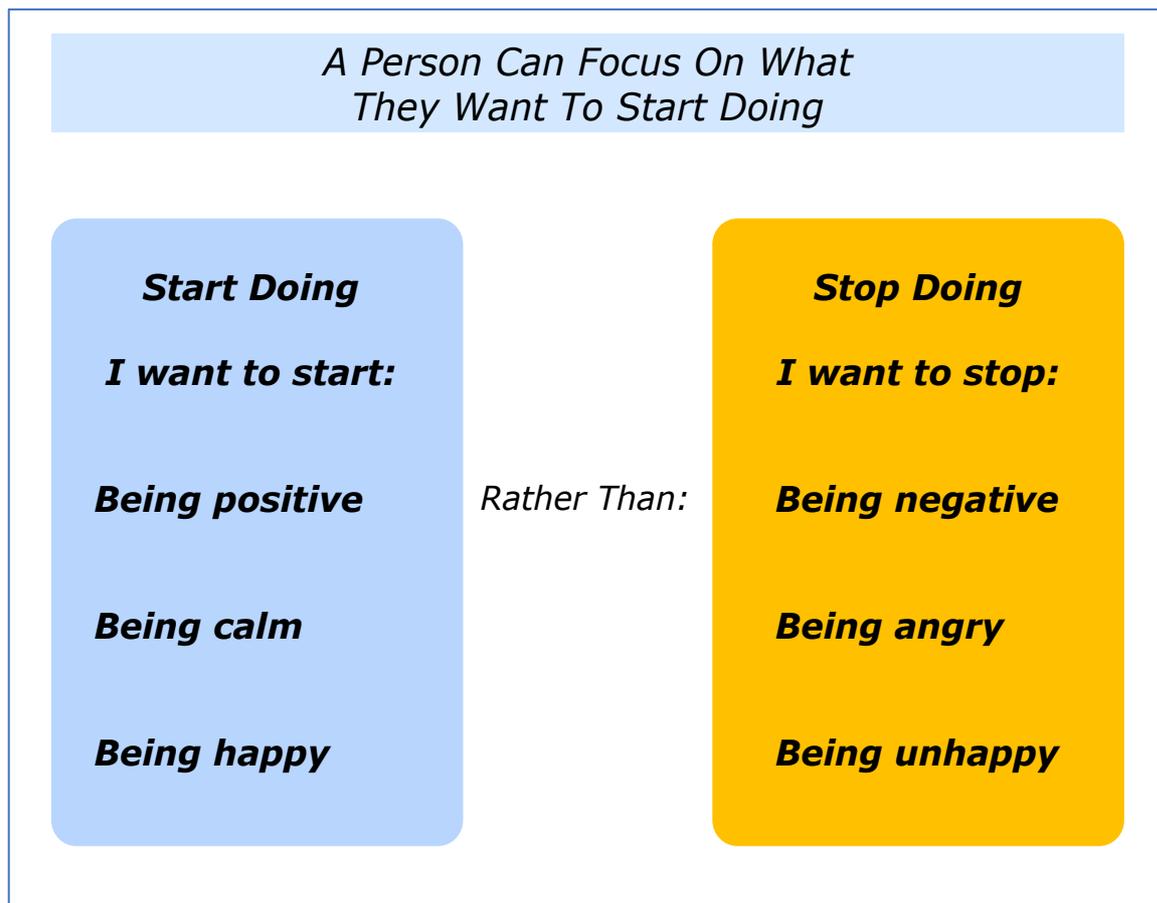

There are several reasons for taking this approach. The main reason is that it can be more positive and more effective for a person:

To start focusing on a positive goal rather than to stop focusing on a negative goal.

Such an approach is more uplifting and practical. This is because: a) it is possible to achieve a positive goal; b) it is not possible to ever be sure you have achieved a negative goal.

This approach also involves following the old rule that: 'what we focus on, we become.' If we focus on what we want to start doing, we are more likely to be positive. If we focus on something we want to stop doing, we are giving it more power over us.

Let's look at some examples of where a person can focus on what they want to start doing and work towards a positive goal. These can include the following.

There are many ways to help a person to take these steps. Let's look at one approach. This involves using the What, How, When approach. It invites a person to focus on the following themes.

First: What they want to do. Second: How they can do it. This part including recalling times when they have done something similar successfully in the past. Third: When they want to do it.

If appropriate, you can also ask if it is okay for you to share some ideas that may help. They can then take the ideas they like and use them in their own way. Here is a summary of the themes to explore.

The What, How, When Approach

This involves inviting a person to explore the following themes.

- What Do You Want To Do?

What do you want to stop doing? What do you want start doing instead? What will be the benefits of doing these things – both for yourself and maybe for other people?

- How Can You Do It?

How can you start doing those things? When have you done some of these previously? What did you do right then? How can you follow similar principles in the future? Is it okay for me to share some ideas that you may want to use in your own way?

- When Do You Want To Do It?

Let's return to what you want to do. How do you want to try to do it? When do you want to begin? How can you then do your best to start and continue doing it? Again, what will be the benefits of doing this?

The following section gives an example of one way this approach can be translated into action. There are, of course, many other ways to help a person to focus on what they want to start doing rather than stop doing.

Laura – Wanting To Feel More In Control

Laura was a person who wanted to feel more in control of her life. She explained this in the following way.

"I want to stop feeling so stressed and also stop having panic attacks. I am going through a phase that is unusual for me.

"I am normally organised person and pride myself in being able to deal with problems. That is what I do in my work, where I manage the accounts of several difficult customers.

"My father died recently, however, and since then I have been having panic attacks. I have been to the doctor who ran some tests. He says there is no medical reason for the attacks.

"My father and I were close and his death was unexpected. Since then I have taken care of everything - the funeral, my mother, relatives, solicitors, everything. This is normally the case in the family and at work.

"But now I don't take care of myself. Suddenly I get panic attacks in the street or at work and it is embarrassing.

"It will take time to come to terms with my father's death. But I just need to find a way to deal with the panic attacks and get on with my life."

Laura recognised that she may not be able to control her mood swings because these were part of grieving. Trying to fight the feelings did not work, so we focused on what she wanted to start doing.

She wanted to start being calmer and stop having panic attacks.

How to take these steps? We began by exploring if she knew when the attacks were going to happen. What were the warning signs? Laura described the following sequence.

She felt tired through lack of sleep, often after spending hours counselling other people in their extended family;

She felt a tingling sensation in her hands, which then crept up her body;

She felt detached and began to feel dizzy;

She had difficulty breathing and started to sweat;

She wanted to escape from the situation and, if possible, find a place to be quiet;

She managed to recover after 10 minutes and was able to resume whatever she had been doing before the attack.

Looking at this sequence, Laura saw that they could intervene at the first warning sign, the tingling sensation in her hands. She could probably do something to start a positive sequence which had more healthy effects, rather than fall into the negative sequence.

The question was: "How?" Looking back on her life, we explored when she had managed to stay calm in a challenging situation? Laura gave the following answer.

"I used to compete as a high jumper. During the events I used to put on my headphones and play soothing music. This also helped me to breathe more deeply.

"Putting on the music, I went into my own world, even if only for a few minutes. This worked. It helped me to deal with any nerves and do my best."

How could she follow similar strategies in her daily life? Laura could certainly put on her earphones and play music when travelling to work on the tube. This would help her to feel calmer, but it would be more difficult at work. Laura began to explore this theme.

"Breathing is probably the key. I can contact my old sports coach. He knows several people who help athletes to perform under pressure. Failing that, I will revisit my old breathing techniques."

We explored strategies she could use to manage her feelings when experiencing difficulties at work. These included practical things she could do:

To buy time to collect her thoughts;

To clarify the results she wanted to achieve and rehearse what she was going to do in the situation;

To follow her chosen strategy and do her best to achieve the desired results.

Looking ahead, we rehearsed how she could follow these steps in specific situations. These included during meetings and when thrown a curve ball by her boss. She began building her repertoire for buying time, reflecting and then doing her best to get the desired results.

Laura also planned to take more care of her physical and psychological health. This called for getting more sleep, eating properly and returning to daily exercise. She aimed to spend more time with her encouragers rather than only counsel other people.

Two months later she reported that, whilst experiencing some mood swings, she felt more able to manage her feelings. It would take time, but Laura felt more in control of being able to shape her future life.

There are many ways to manage emotions. One approach is for a person to focus on what they want to start doing rather than stop doing. They can then take practical steps to achieve their aims.

Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? What do you want to start doing in that situation? What are the steps you can take? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Start Doing Rather Stop Doing Approach

The specific thing I want to start doing rather than stop doing is:

*

The specific steps I can take to start doing this thing are:

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

The Focusing On The Results To Achieve Rather Than The Running Commentary Approach

Great workers focus on the results to achieve and cut out irrelevant noise. This sounds easy in theory but it can be harder in practice.

Observer critics, the press, bloggers and many others want to provide a running commentary. They want to express their views about what is happening.

Sometimes this can be helpful and provide a reality check. But sometimes it is possible to get diverted by people who have other agendas, especially they are provocative.

Looking back, can you recall a time when you focused on achieving a specific goal and cut out the running commentaries? You may have aimed to pass an exam, launch a web site, complete a project or do another activity.

What did you do right then? How did you maintain your concentration? How did you keep focusing on the picture of success? How did you filter the running commentaries? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Imagine that you want to do a piece of work in the future. Let's explore how you can stay concentrated and not be side-tracked. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

You can clarify the results to achieve

J.K. Rowling focused on her specific vision in her writing. She did this even when experiencing severe difficulties during her twenties. Recalling her early years of writing, she said:

"I had a daughter I adored, a typewriter and a big idea."

She aimed to produce an epic for young readers that chronicled the adventures of Harry Potter. She was clear on the road map, the milestones and the feelings each book should evoke. She explained this in the following way.

"I just wrote the sort of thing I liked reading when I was younger and still enjoy now."

Certainly there were ups and downs along the way but she pursued her daily disciplines to reach the goal. J.K. Rowling chose to focus on the things that were vital in her life. As she later wrote in Harry Potter and The Chamber of Secrets:

"It is our choices that show what we truly are, far more than our abilities."

Looking ahead, can you think of a piece of work you want to do? You may want to write an article, do a creative project, build a prototype or do another activity. What are the real results you want to achieve?

How motivated are you – on a scale 0-10 – to achieve the goal? What can you do to maintain or improve the rating? How can you encourage yourself on the journey?

Imagine that you have explored these questions. You can then move on to the next theme.

You can clarify the potential noisy running commentaries

Great workers are dreamers who do and deliver. They are, by definition, extremists. They focus on a few things and do these extremely well. But doing great work sometimes creates waves.

Some people will appreciate their efforts but others will criticise them. This is especially so if their work is in the public eye - such as in sports, the arts or other fields.

Great workers learn to focus on the results rather than get distracted by other people's running commentaries. One entrepreneur expressed this in the following way.

"Customer feedback is vital because I want to a reality check and keep improving. I also like to learn from people I respect. They give me honest suggestions about how to get results.

"I have little time for observer critics or those with other agendas. It is vital to listen to constructive suggestions. But it is important not to get dragged down by complainers."

Let's return to the piece of work you may want to do. Are there any potential running commentaries that may occur? Who might give these running commentaries?

What might such people be saying? Will they be constructive, critical or a combination of both? What might be the agendas of such people? What might be the other kinds of commentaries, noises or diversions?

You can clarify how to focus on the results to achieve rather than the noisy running commentaries

Great workers seem to exist in their own space - their own zone, tunnel or bubble. Some athletes, for example, often have physical rituals they use to brush off criticisms, heckling, mistakes and other disruptions.

Concentrating on the concrete results to achieve, they cut off other distractions. They keep following their chosen principles towards achieving the picture of success.

Wise people seem to have an inner compass they follow rather than get caught in other people's agendas. The Dalai Lama, for example, aims to follow his philosophy in many situations. He explains this in the following way.

"My religion is kindness. I find hope in the darkest of days and do not judge the universe.

"Our prime purpose in this life is to help others. And if you can't help them, at least don't hurt them."

Let's return to your chosen piece of work. How can you keep focusing on the results to achieve? How can you listen to people you respect? How can you get reality checks and keep improving?

How can you encourage yourself on the journey? How can you avoid getting distracted by unhelpful running commentaries? What will be the benefits of taking this approach?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Results To Achieve Approach

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The specific results I want to achieve when doing that piece of work are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to focus on achieving those results rather than be distracted by running commentaries are:

*

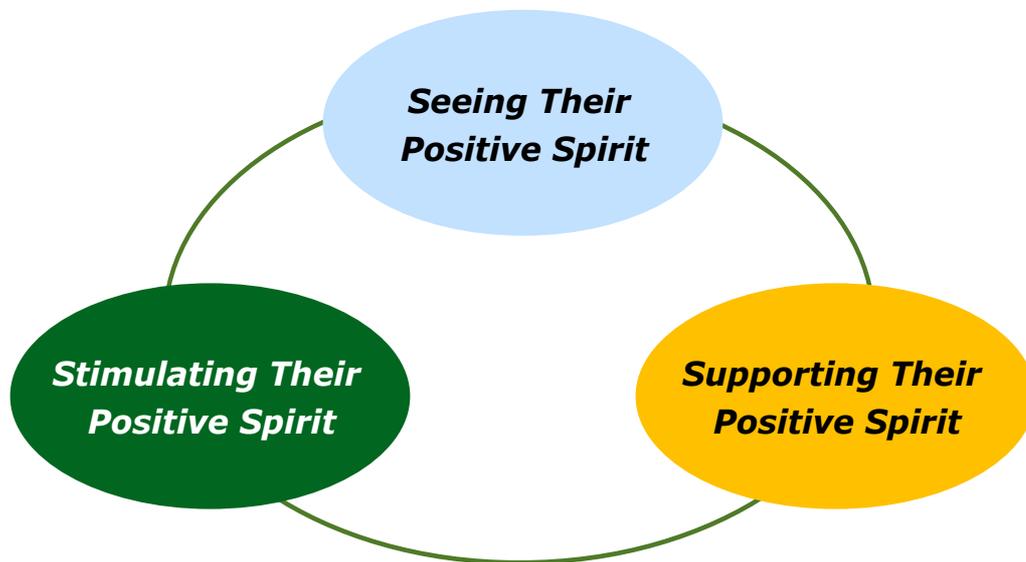

*

*

The Positive Spirit Approach To Encouraging People

The Positive Spirit

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to focus on their positive spirit. This involves taking the following steps when working with individuals, teams or organisations.

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to see, support and stimulate their positive spirit. This is an approach that can be used to help individuals, teams and organisations to achieve success.

It is also possible to help people to build on their positive spirit. They can be helped to set goals, follow strategies that work and achieve success. This can strengthen and sustain their spirit.

This approach may seem rather vague but, when done properly, it is extremely practical. It builds on people strengths and offers them practical strategies they can use to achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to follow this approach. Let's explore how these can be translated into action.

Seeing People's Positive Spirit

There several definitions for a person's spirit. These include the following.

The spirit of a person is characterised by their personality - their attitude, abilities and actions. The way a person then behaves can create a certain atmosphere and have a certain effect on other people.

The spirit of a person is something that other people pick up on. On one level it is intangible but on another level it has a tangible effect on people.

Sometimes this can be hard to define but there are exercises that can help. One of these is to invite somebody to focus on a person and ask them following question.

What are the three words you would use to describe the person's spirit?

A person will, of course, merge their own feelings about somebody with any other considerations. But their answers can be interesting.

Imagine that they are looking at three different people. Here are some of the words they may use to describe each person's spirit – their attitude and actions.

Person A - Positive ... Encouraging ... Uplifting

Person B - Mean ... Cruel ... Selfish.

Person C – Alive ... Creative ... Exciting.

The spirit approach can also be applied to the cultures in organisations. Imagine that you are looking at a particular organisation.

What are the three words you would use to describe the organisation?

These can help to describe the spirit - the attitudes, abilities and actions – that are embodied in the organisation. If appropriate, it is also possible to ask people to describe the qualities they would like to see an organisation embody in the future.

Let's return to the concept of seeing the positive spirit in people. One approach is to focus on when a person, team or organisation performs at its best. It is then to explore the following themes.

Seeing People's Positive Spirit

One approach is to explore the following themes.

- When do they come alive? When are they in their element – at ease and able to excel? When do they flow, focus and finish? When do they emit positive energy?
- What are their strengths? What is their successful style of working? What are they doing right then? What are the principles they are following? How do they translate these into action?
- When do they behave in a way that helps people? What do they do right then? What are the principles they follow? What are the positive effects they have on other people?

Supporting People's Positive Spirit

There are many ways to support the positive spirit in people. Let's explore some of the main approaches.

You can create an encouraging environment

One approach is simply to create an environment where people feel safe and able to grow. You can also give people the message:

"You can be yourself. You can feel safe, explore and develop. You can do all these things and many more. You can also aim to help other people."

You can give people specific encouragement

Good coaches sometimes take this approach. They watch a person in action or see an example of their work. Bearing in mind the results the person may want to achieve, they then take the following steps.

They clarify the specific things the person may be doing right that will help them to reach their goals.

They clarify the specific messages they want to give the person regarding what they are doing right and aim to bring this to life by giving examples.

They choose an appropriate time to tell the person about the specific things they are doing well and how they can do more of these things in the future.

You can, when appropriate, encourage people to work towards their specific goals

This is an approach that we will explore in the next section on stimulating the positive spirit. When appropriate, however, it can be useful to explore some of the following themes.

How can I support their positive spirit? How can I encourage them to follow it more in the future? How can I help them to build on it and work towards their goals?

What may they want to do in their lives? If appropriate, how can I give them the opportunity to talk about their aims? How can I help them to focus on their personal or professional goals?

Stimulating People's Positive Spirit

Many people love to learn, explore and develop. Bearing this in mind, one approach is to focus on the following themes when building on their positive spirit.

You can encourage people to do things they find stimulating

This is one of the most enjoyable and effective ways to help people to maintain their spirit. It is to encourage them to clarify and do more of the things that give them positive energy. Here is an exercise on this theme.

Positive Energy

Personal Life – The things that give me positive energy in my personal life are:

- *
- *
- *

Professional Life – The things that give me positive energy in my professional life are:

- *
- *
- *

You can share knowledge that people may find stimulating

This is a path taken by educators, mentors and others who want to help people to achieve success. They do lots of preparation before meeting a person or a group of people. They explore the following questions.

Who is the person or group of people I am going to meet? What may be their interests? What may be the topics or challenges they may like to explore? What may be their personal or professional goals?

What are the ideas I can share that may help them to achieve their goals? What are the models, frameworks and practical tools I can pass on? How can I share this knowledge in a way that resonates with them?

What are the actual words I would like them to be saying after the meeting? How can I do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things? What else can I do to make the session stimulating?

You can, when appropriate, help people to work towards goals they may find stimulating

Success

When appropriate, people can be helped to build on their positive spirit and take the following steps.

- They can set a stimulating goal;
- They can follow strategies that work;
- They can do their best to achieve success.

This is a route that can help people to continue to feel positive and develop. They can be encouraged to build their positive spirit – the things that give them positive energy – and take the following steps. They can be helped:

To set a stimulating goal;

To follow strategies that work;

To do their best to achieve success.

Many people set goals but one of the keys is to follow strategies that increase the likelihood of achieving success. This is where they can get help from people who provide practical models and tools that work.

Such a person can pass on this knowledge in a way that people can accept and use. People can then do their best to achieve their picture of success.

The positive spirit approach is one that I have seen work with individuals, teams and organisations. It has been used to help people to set and achieve stimulating goals.

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to see, support and stimulate their positive spirit. When appropriate, people can be helped to do this in their personal or professional lives.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of specific situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Spirit Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the positive spirit approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Partnership Approach Rather Than The Provocative Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the partnership approach. Some people follow the provocative approach. The route they follow has consequences for themselves and other people.

Different people follow these routes in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action.

The Partnership Approach

People who follow this approach often have a positive attitude. They do things that give them positive energy and also like to encourage other people.

They sometimes like to work as individuals. They may aim to build on their strengths and follow strategies that work. They then do their best to achieve success.

Such people also sometimes like to build partnerships with others. Different people do this in different ways. Some explore the following questions.

What are the partnerships I would like to build in my life? Who are the individuals, work colleagues, teams or organisations with whom I would like to build partnerships?

How can I build these partnerships in my personal or professional life? What may be the mutual benefits? When do I want to build these partnerships?

Imagine that a person has explored these themes. They may then take the following steps.

They Build On What People Have In Common

Different people have different approaches to building partnerships. The way they do this may differ, of course, depending on whether they are doing it in their personal or professional life.

Some people borrow ideas from mediators who help people to build successful partnerships. They aim: a) to focus on what each party wants; b) to clarify some of the goals they have in common; c) to build on this common ground.

People who do this in personal relationships may start by focusing on what both they and the other person wants. They may then clarify the possibilities for building the relationship.

People who do this in professional relationships may start by clarifying what they would like to do in such a relationship. Let's look at how this may work in practice.

Imagine that you are helping a group of individuals or teams to work together. The ideal scenario would be that they are already committed to working towards achieving a common goal. You can then help them to coordinate their talents to achieve the picture of success.

Let's assume, however, that the parties are still in the process of clarifying their potential aims. One approach is to do some prework before bringing people together. You can start by aiming:

To use your imagination and put yourself in their places;

To think about what each party – each person or each team – wants to achieve in the future;

To consider whether there may be some potential common ground.

The next step will be to meet with each of the parties. Sometimes it can be important to have individual meetings with each of them before bringing people together.

Good mediators, for example, often take this approach. They find that this helps: a) to create a safe and non-judgemental environment in which people are able to explore; b) to clarify what each party's wants.

Such mediators then take time to reflect. They clarify what each of the parties want and what each may have in common. They then begin to clarify the possible areas for cooperating and getting some quick successes.

Some people do the following exercise when clarifying what different individuals or teams want. You can also adapt this approach when clarifying the common ground in a personal or professional relationship.

Building On Common Ground

The different parties – the individuals or groups – and what each wants. (Here there are just two parties mentioned. You can add more if others are involved.)

Party A: The things they want are:

- *
*
*

Party B: The things they want are:

- *
*
*

The Common Ground

The specific things that each party wants in common are:

- *
*
*

The specific things we can do to maybe translate these into common goals and get some quick successes are:

- *
*
*

Let's assume that a person has taken some of these steps to clarify the potential common ground. They may be doing this in their personal or professional life. They then move on to the next stage.

They Set Agreed Positive Goals

Some people follow the approach taken by good mediators. They create an encouraging environment, gather the parties involved and then take the following steps.

They focus on the areas that people have in common

Good mediators create a positive atmosphere, show respect to people and describe some of the areas that people have in common. They explain that it may be possible to build on these areas and get some successes.

They also emphasise, however, that it is up to people to choose whether they want to take this route. If so, it may be possible build a successful partnership where there may be mutual benefits.

They set agreed positive goals

Let's assume that a person has worked with others to focus on what they have in common. They may then encourage the parties to go through the following steps:

To focus on the common aims that are the easiest to achieve and to translate these into setting positive goals;

To clarify the benefits – for all the parties involved – of achieving these agreed positive goals.

To clarify the things that people can do – such as the strategies they can follow - to increase the likelihood of achieving the agreed positive goals.

Imagine that people have taken these steps. They can then aim to focus on the specific things they can do to get some quick successes. Successes can help to build confidence and encourage people to take the next step in building the partnership.

They Work To Achieve The Picture Of Success

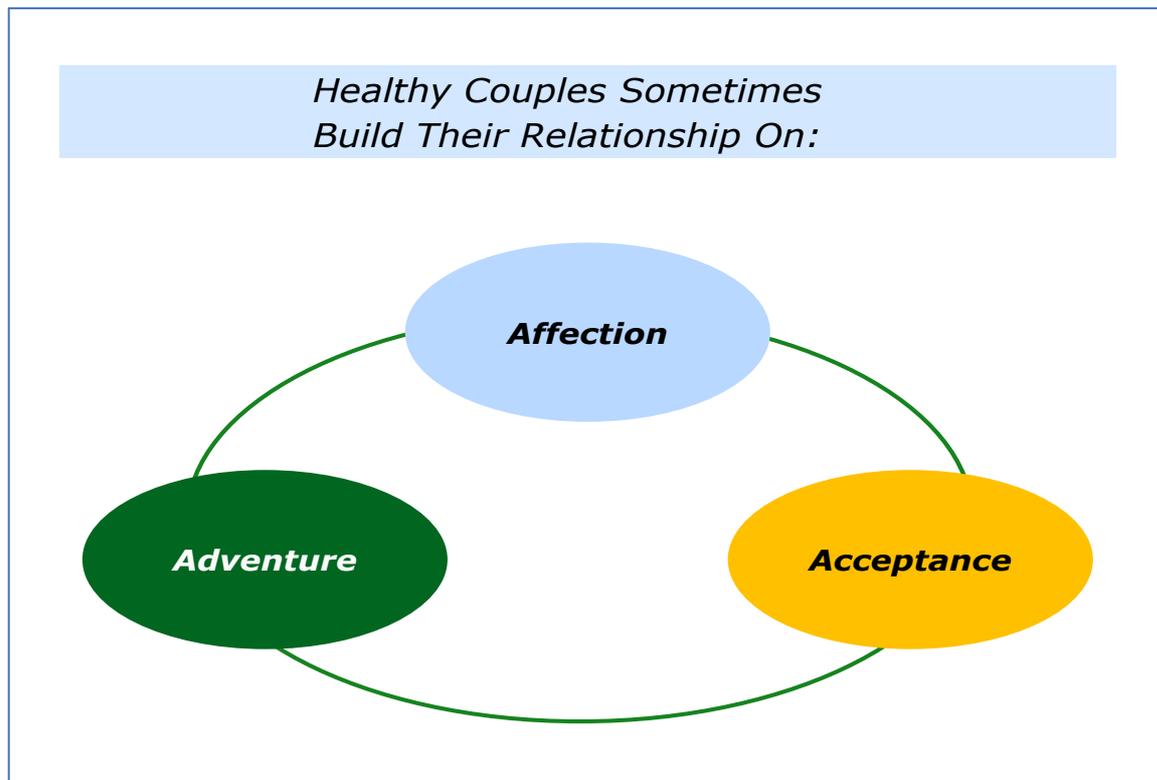

Let's assume that the various parties have focused on their positive goals. They may then aim to coordinate their strengths to work together towards achieving this picture of success.

Different people will do this in different situations. Let's look at some examples, beginning with personal relationships.

Personal Relationships

People who are in a committed romantic relationship or marriage, for example, may set some long-term goals. They may aim to encourage each other, build a family and live fulfilling lives.

Healthy couples, for example, often focus on the themes of affection, acceptance and adventure.

Affection

They show each other affection. Some may do this in a physical way. Some may do it in a psychological way.

They may show affection by making the other person feel welcome and helping them to feel the centre of their world. They may do it in simple ways, such as making them a cup of tea, listening and encouraging them.

Acceptance

They build on the things they have in common. They also find ways to encourage and, in some cases, manage any differences. They recognise that differences can make or break a relationship.

Healthy couples accept each other rather than constantly try to change each other. They realise that, after a certain time, people do not change all that much. They are clear on:

The differences they want to encourage, because these make the other person special;

The differences they are prepared to accept, because the person probably won't change certain habits;

The differences they would like the person to change and how. It is vital for them to give a positive alternative.

Regarding the latter differences, they may suggest how they would like the person to behave in the future. But what if the person refuses to change? The person making the suggestion has a decision to make.

They can recognise that the other person is not going to change and accept the difference. They can keep trying to persuade the person to change. They can, if they feel the difference is too painful, choose to leave the relationship because there is no point in being a victim.

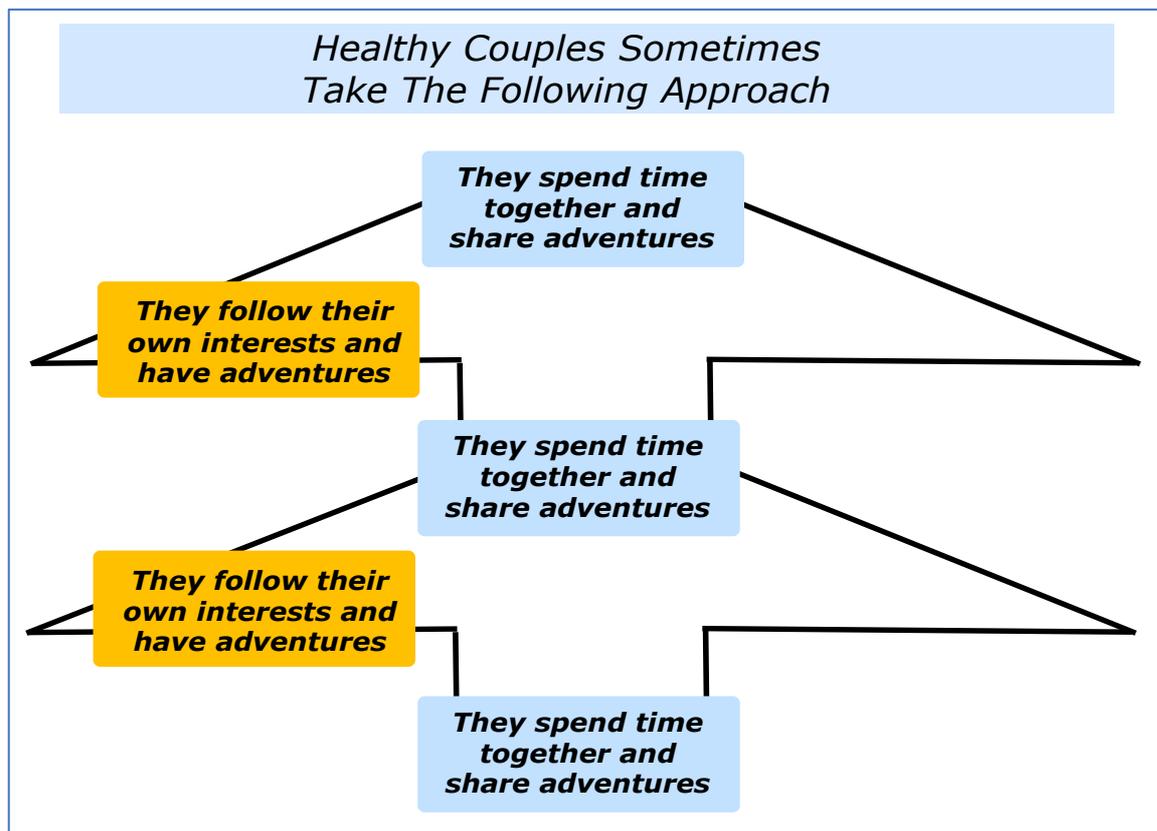

Adventure

Healthy couples share adventures together. These can be big adventures or even simply enjoying small talk together. They feel uplifted after their time together.

They may then individually go apart and pursue their own interests and adventures. This are ones that help them to feel alive but that do cause pain in the relationship.

The couple may then come back together to share what they have each been doing. They then build on what they have in common and share adventures. Sometimes this is simply chatting but in a positive way.

Such couples aim to enjoy their time together and also when they are apart. They take this approach to building an enriching relationship.

Different people follow these principles in their own way to build different kinds of personal relationships. Let's look at how people may achieve their aims in professional relationships.

Professional Relationships

Building Partnerships That Achieve The Picture Of Success

People sometimes take the following steps to achieve their goals. They build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

People who build professional partnerships may follow some of the well-known principles for working towards their agreed positive goals. They take the following approach.

They build on their strengths

They encourage each party to build on their strengths. They then make clear contracts about each person's their best contribution towards achieving the goals.

They follow strategies that work

They coordinate their strengths and follow strategies that work. They continue to give each other support and focus on continuous improvement.

They do their best to achieve the picture of success

They do what they say they are going to do, encourage each other and find solutions to challenges. They fulfil their contracts and do their best to achieve the agreed picture of success.

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people follow the partnerships approach. They aim to, as far as possible, get win-wins that benefit all the par

Such people believe in following the together approach rather than the tribal approach. Other people take the latter approach. Let's look at this route.

The Provocative Approach

Some people follow the provocative approach. They focus on people's differences and exploit these for their own personal gain. There are several definitions for the word provocative. These include the following:

Intending to do or say something that provokes a reaction such as an argument, anger or annoyance.

People who take this approach may do so in ways that hurt others and scapegoat people who are different. This can cause collateral damage and fracture society.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

How can you build on what people may have in common? How can you set agreed positive goals? How can you then do your best to help the people involved to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Partnership Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

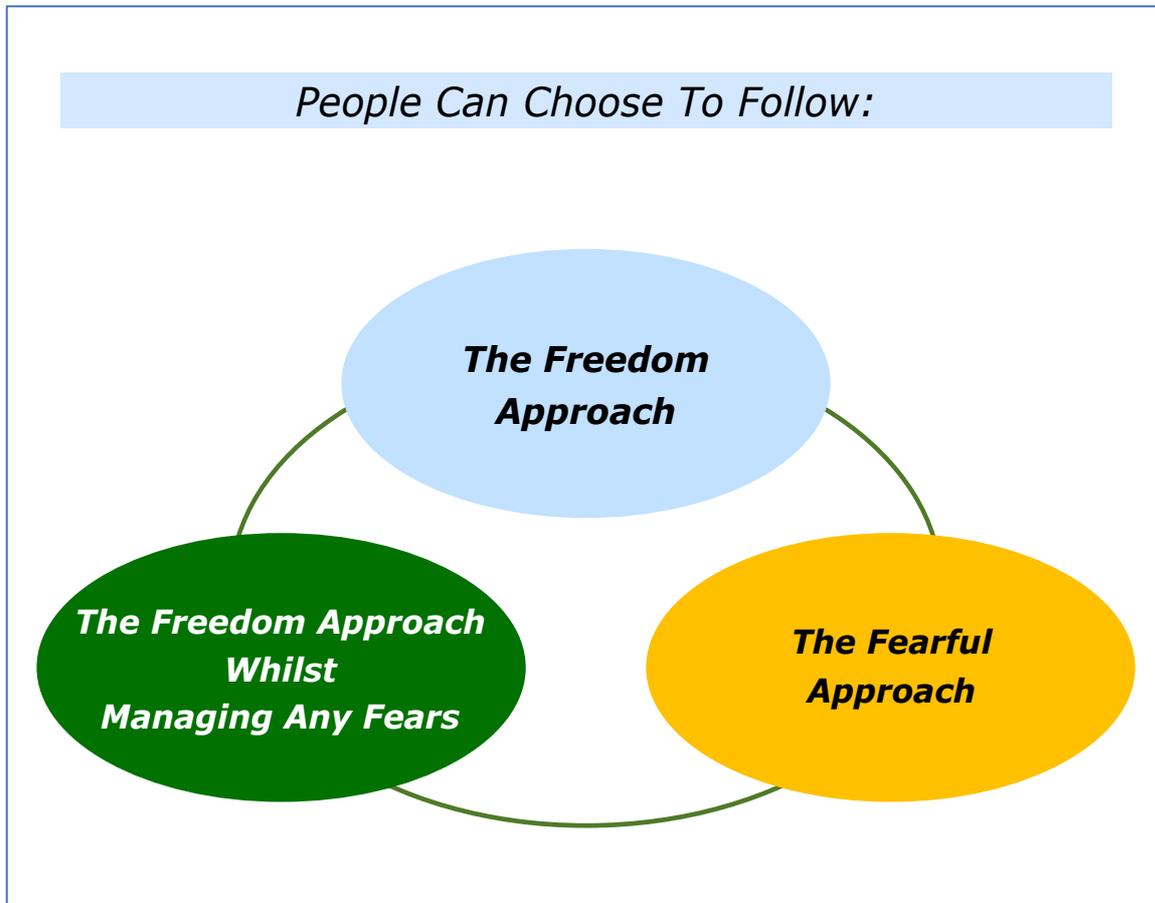

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Freedom Approach Rather Than The Fearful Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the freedom approach. Some follow the fearful approach. Some follow the freedom approach whilst also managing any fears. Let's explore these themes.

The Freedom Approach

Some people learn this approach early in their lives. They may learn to feel free and follow certain frameworks – such as certain principles – that enable them and other people to find fulfilment.

They may grow up in a family, for example, where they are encouraged to be true to themselves and also help other people. They are given the follow messages:

"You can be true to yourself and follow your own path. But it is important to do this in a way that helps rather than hurts other people."

Such young people may also be encouraged to follow the interests they find fascinating. They may love learning, helping people, sport, dancing, drama or other topics.

Some may pursue their hobbies and develop what are now called the Four Cs of Twenty-First Century Skills. These include Clear Thinking, Creativity, Collaboration and Communication.

Some young people have strengths that are not rewarded by some schools. They can therefore be helped to build on what they do best and, at the same time, learn how to manage their time at school.

Some are good at applying themselves to academic tasks and passing exams. This can be encouraged whilst, at the same time, helping them to develop the strengths they may have in other areas.

Some people follow the freedom approach when setting out on their careers. They are helped to find ways to do fulfilling work and, in the process, also get funding.

They are then more likely to take initiatives rather than become institutionalised. They sometimes develop the professional freelancer mindset even if they take a full-time role.

The Professional Freelancer Approach

Some people recognise that there are few fixed jobs anymore but there will always be projects. They therefore act like professional freelancers and aim to find or create stimulating projects.

Such people make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the goals to achieve. They then build on their strengths, do superb work and help their stakeholders to achieve success.

People who follow the freedom approach may have a positive attitude to dealing with events in society. They focus on what they have the freedom to control rather than being bogged down by what they can't control.

The Fearful Approach

Some people learn this approach early in their lives. They may grow up in a family where they are not encouraged to be true to themselves. They may be given the follow messages:

"Be careful, fit in and don't make mistakes. If you want to get on, sometimes you have to compromise. Don't expect too much and you won't be disappointed."

Some young people may experience difficulties at school. They may fear being judged because either: a) they are not good academically, or; b) they are taught to continually compare themselves to others.

Successful students who are used to getting A grades may be afraid that one day they will get a B+. This could lead to inquests when they return home with the school report.

Some people may move into boring jobs to pay the bills. Some may put in long hours, compete with others and climb the corporate ladder. Some may no longer enjoy their work but are fearful of losing their share options.

Some athletes may forget their love of their sport and instead feel anxious. They may fear losing forget how to flow. They may freeze instead and not perform at their best.

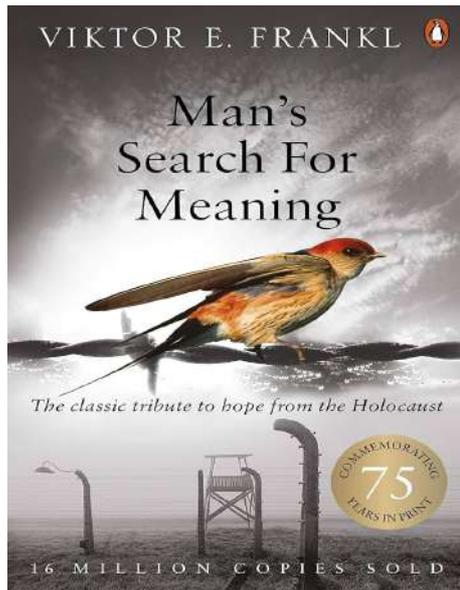

Some people focus on events they cannot control in society and feel paralysed. This does not help them or other people. They may become more afraid and fail to enjoy the simple things in life.

The Freedom Approach Whilst Also Managing Any Fears

People who take this approach may follow the principle described by Viktor Frankl in his book Man's Search For Meaning, which chronicled his journey through concentration camps. Viktor said that, whatever the circumstances, people could choose their attitude.

Viktor Frankl

"The last of the human freedoms: to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way."

People who take this approach have a positive attitude but are also realistic. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I try to build on what I can control. Certainly I have fears about some things happening in the world, but I deal with it by focusing on what I can do in my own life. That is the best way to help myself and other people."

Some people take the following steps to maintain their sense of freedom and make their best contribution during their time on the planet.

They do what they believe in. They often focus on a specific purpose, follow their principles and work towards achieving their picture of success.

They do their best. They aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and find solutions to challenges on the way towards doing superb work.

They try to build a better world. They aim to be positive, encourage other people and do positive work that helps people or the planet.

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the freedom approach and, if appropriate, manage any fears? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Freedom Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow the freedom approach and, if appropriate, manage any fears may be:

*

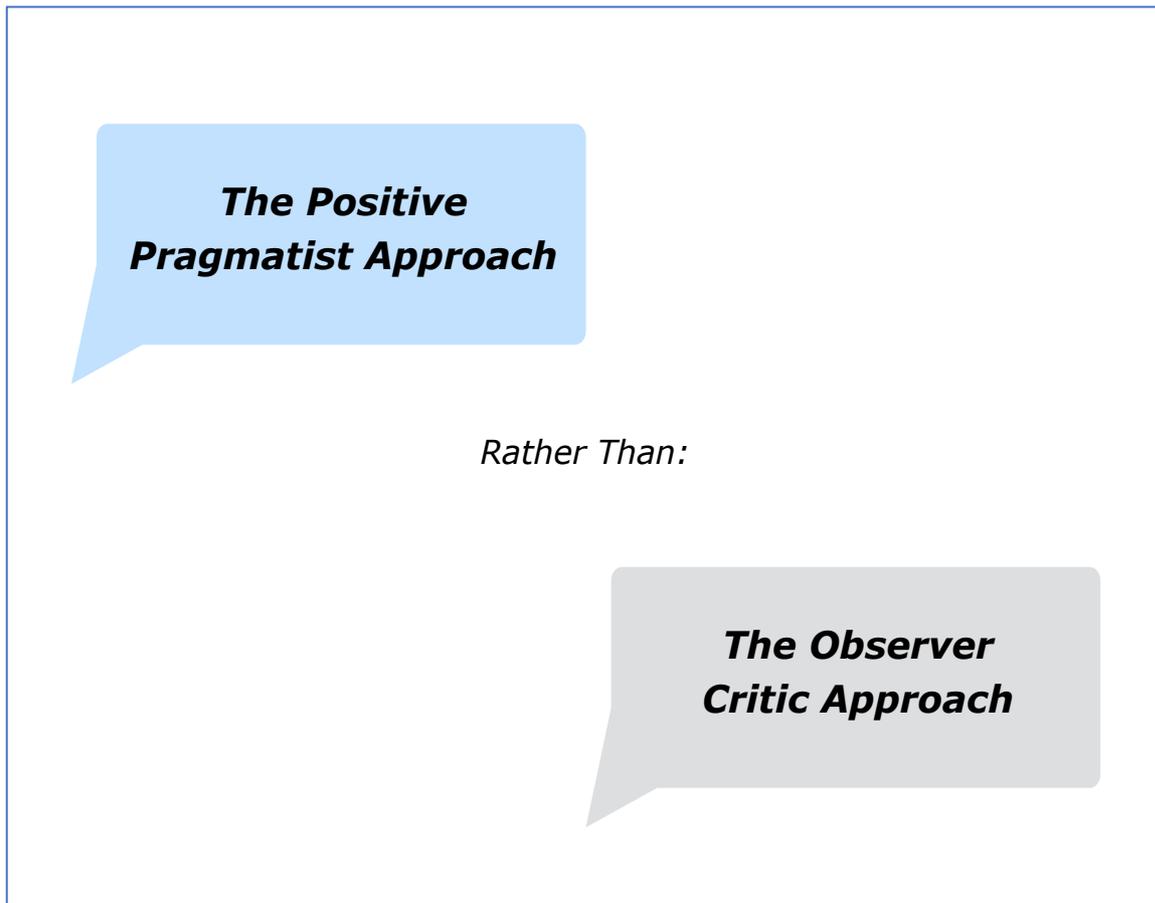

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Pragmatist Approach Rather Than The Observer Critic Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the positive pragmatist approach and focus on what works. They are positive but also realistic.

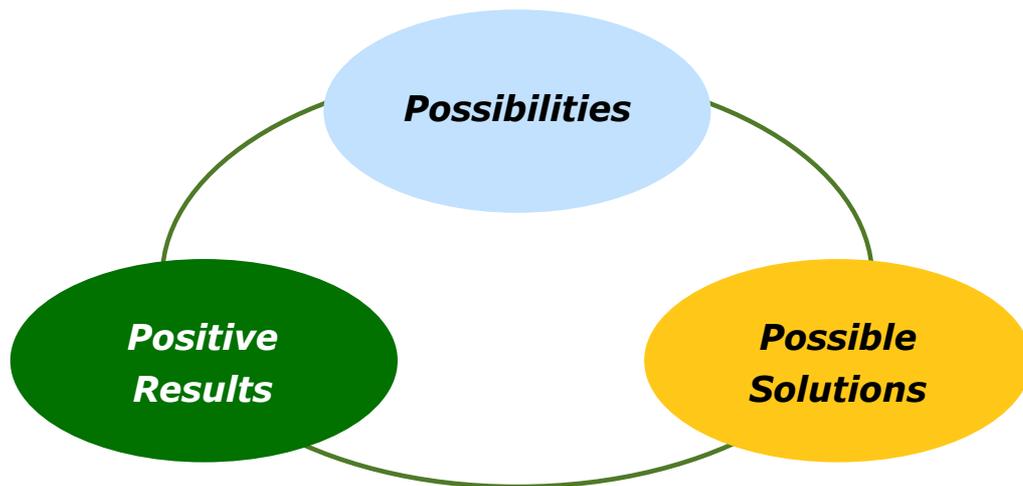

Such people tend to focus on possibilities, practical solutions and achieving positive results. Observer critics tend to sit on the side and point out problems.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a person who followed elements of the positive pragmatist approach? How did they demonstrate these qualities? What was the effect they had on other people?

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how somebody may translate his approach into action.

Positive Pragmatists

Such people focus on the positive things in life but are also realistic. They are good at reading reality and then explore the following themes.

Such people are not starry-eyed optimists. They have a positive attitude but are good at reading reality. They focus on the following themes.

Positive Things

They build on the positive things in life. They often have a sense of gratitude and aim to do their best. Going into a specific situation, they may ask the following questions.

"What is actually happening? What are the positive and negative things? What are the successful and unsuccessful patterns? What may be the consequences of these patterns?"

"How can I build on the positive things? How can I build on the successful patterns? How can I manage the consequences of any unsuccessful patterns?"

Possibilities

Such people see things from a positive angle. They focus on possibilities and apply this approach in many situations. Such people may explore the following questions.

"What are the possibilities in the situation? What are the possible opportunities? What are the available strengths and assets? How is it possible to use these shape a positive future?"

They take this approach when building on successes or recovering from setbacks. They aim: a) to explore all the possible ways forwards; b) to pursue the strategy most likely to achieve success.

Possible Solutions

Such people focus on what works and enjoy finding solutions to challenges. When appropriate, some may also be good at helping others in to find solutions to conflicts. Such people may explore the following questions.

"What is the specific challenge? What are the possible options going forwards? What are the consequences of each option? What is the route – or combination of routes – that it would be helpful to follow?"

"Looking at a potential conflict situation, what does each party want? What do they have in common? How can I help them to build on these things? How can I help them to find, as far as possible, win-win solutions?"

Positive Results

Positive pragmatists like to translate ideas into action. They often aim to set specific goals, follow strategies that work and deliver success. Looking at a situation, they may explore the following questions.

"What are the real results to achieve? What are the strategies that are most likely to achieve success? How can these be translated into an action plan? What will be the benefits of achieving the picture of success?"

Such people are lifelong learners. They love to keep adding to their repertoire of knowledge and practical tools. They then like to apply these and their best to achieve positive results.

Observer Critics

Observer critics may sit on the side and point out problems. They may criticise others but not provide solutions. Such an approach can be deflating and not offer a positive way forwards.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive pragmatist approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What may be the specific situation? How could you build on any positive things? How could you explore the opportunities or possible solutions? How could you then do your best to get positive results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Pragmatist Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Being Focused On The Big Goal And Bypassing Any Noise Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to continually focus on the big goal. It is then to aim to do brilliant work and bypass any noise on the way towards achieving the big goal.

Great workers often follow this approach. Let's explore how they translate this into action.

They Focus On The Big Goal

Good leaders, for example, start by clarifying the goal they want to their team to achieve. Different leaders do this in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

They may focus on a purpose and translate this into working to achieve a specific big goal

They may aim to ensure that every child has enough to eat, find a cure for a particular illness, build a country that achieves net-zero or achieve another purpose. They translate this into working to achieve a big goal.

They may focus on a principle and translate this into working to achieve a specific big goal

They may aim to care for people, provide superb medical treatment, help their clients to succeed or follow another principle. They then translate this into working to achieve a big goal.

They may focus on a picture of success and translate this into working to achieve a specific big goal

They may aim to help people to achieve a peace in their country, send people to the moon and return them safely or achieve another picture of success. They then translate this into working to achieve this big goal.

Great leaders, for example, then communicate the big goal to their people. Different people will do this in different ways. Some use elements of the following framework.

The Big Goal

The Goal. The big goal we want to achieve – together with some examples to bring this to life - is:

* To ...

For example, we want:

* To ...

* To ...

* To

The Strategies. The strategies we want to follow to do our best to achieve this goal - together with the reasons for these - are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Benefits. the benefits of achieving this goal – for the various stakeholders - will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Roles. The roles of various people in working to achieve the goal - and the support we will give them – will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Measures. The specific things that will be happening that will show we have achieved the goal will be:

*

*

*

Imagine that a leader has communicated the big goal to their people also given them the big picture. It can then be time to move on to the next step.

They Do Brilliant Work

Different people take different approaches to doing brilliant work. People who work as individuals may focus on doing the basics and then adding the brilliance on the way towards achieving their big goal.

Good leaders encourage their people to focus on similar themes. They may take the following steps, however, to encourage their people to do brilliant work.

They keep communicating the team's goal, the strategies to follow and the benefits of achieving the big goal;

They make clear contracts with people about their contributions to achieving the big goal;

They encourage people to keep doing the basics and deliver consistently high standards on the way towards achieving the big goal;

They manage by outcomes and give people the support they need on the way towards achieving the big goal;

They keep publishing success stories that show how people are doing superb work on the way towards achieving the big goal.

Good leaders share these success stories to show what good looks like. They then encourage people to keep doing these basics and, when appropriate, add the brilliance on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Different workers have different ways of doing brilliant work. Some also take the following step on the way towards achieving their aims.

They Bypass Any Noise On The Way Towards Achieving The Big Goal

Great workers continue to focus on doing good work every day. They also learn to bypass any irrelevant noise that could be distracting.

Some people take the following steps. They aim: a) to focus on what they can control; b) to cocoon themselves; c) to keep doing creative work on the ways towards achieving the big goal.

An artist may cocoon themselves by focusing on the things that give them positive energy. They also cut themselves off from negative things that are happening in the world.

A golfer may cocoon themselves by following a positive mantra and aiming to produce their best performance. They may cut themselves off from any negative scripts or crowd noise.

A good leader may protect their team by managing upwards and providing air cover. This can be necessary if there is interference from other people in the organisation.

Such a leader recognises that sometimes outside events mean that the team needs to be agile. It may then be necessary to change or develop the big goal.

The leader will protect their team, however, if it gets conflicting messages from the top or is distracted by unreasonable requests from other departments. The leader will then meet with the key stakeholders:

To clarify that the organisation still wants the team to work towards the big goal;

To make sure the team is given the support and space they need to achieve the big goal.

Great workers bypass any unnecessary noise on the way towards achieving their aims. They continually do reality checks, however, and are prepared to learn from people they respect.

They then focus on continuous improvement. They gather information and data about: a) the things they are doing well; b) the things they can do better. They then implement these idea to keep improving.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on the big goal. It is then to do brilliant work and bypass any noise on the way towards achieving the big goal.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you with, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

*The Being Focused On The Big Goal
And Bypassing Any Noise Approach*

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Pleasure Of Helping People To Get Positive Results Approach

The Pleasure Of Helping People

There are many ways to do fine work. Sometimes this can involve the pleasure of helping people to get positive results.

There are many ways to do fine work. Sometimes this involves the pleasure of helping people to get positive results. Different people follow this approach in different ways.

They may do this as educators, medics, counsellors, specialists or in another role. It can involve helping people to have positive experiences and also passing on tools they can use to shape a positive future.

People who take this approach may get the helper's high but their main aim is to help other people. The following section looks at three ways that people may take these steps. You will, of course, have your own approach to helping people to achieve positive results.

The Encourager's Approach

People who are encouragers love to give to others and help them to achieve success. Some do this in their personal life, some do it their professional life. Let's look at those who do it in their work.

Good encouragers create a positive environment in which a person feels at ease and able to explore their goals. They then use their experience to encourage, educate and enable the person to achieve their picture of success.

The Solutions-Focused Therapist's Approach

People who take this approach encourage a person to build on their inner resources, set goals and shape a positive future. Here is a description of this approach from the British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy website.

Solution-focused brief therapy is a short-term therapy which focuses on setting goals and working out how to achieve them. It's about the future rather than the past and promotes positive change by encouraging you to focus on what you can do, rather than what you can't.

The Specialist's Approach

People who take this approach focus on a specific specialism that can help people to achieve their goals. They may do this when working as a subject matter expert, trusted advisor, technical specialist or in another professional role.

Such specialists start by clarifying people's challenges or goals. They then use their expertise to help people to solve problems, follow strategies that work and achieve success. They sometimes also pass on knowledge that helps people to shape a positive future.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own life or work. What may be the specific activity where you get pleasure from helping people to achieve positive results? How can you continue to follow this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

*The Pleasure Of Helping People
To Get Positive Results Approach*

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Emotional Approach And The Evidence Based Approach

There many ways to make decisions in life. Sometimes we may follow the emotional approach, sometimes we may follow the evidence based approach. Sometimes we may combine elements of both approaches.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action.

The Emotional Approach

Human beings are emotional beings. They often have strong feelings and may respond to situations in an emotional way. Sometimes this can be positive, sometimes it can have other consequences.

Some people learn how to use their feelings in a way that helps them and other people. Some let their feelings use them and behave in ways that may hurt them or other people.

People make decisions every minute and the choices they make have consequences. When making decisions, it can be useful to clarify the emotional consequences – both for themselves and other people.

Some people make decisions based on the pleasure and pain principle. They choose the path that appears most likely to help them to have more pleasure or less pain.

Sometimes they may do things that give them short-term gratification. Sometimes this works out well, sometimes it can create longer-term problems.

Some people are good at getting short-term wins and also working towards long-term success. They are also good at encouraging themselves and others on the way towards achieving success.

People may also make decisions based on their confirmation bias. They look for examples that confirm their feelings or present view of the world. They tend to see what they believe rather than believe what they see.

As mentioned earlier, different people make decisions in different ways. Let's look at another approach.

The Evidence Based Approach

Human beings have the ability to make considered decisions. Whilst taking feelings into account, they may operate in a more cerebral way. They then make decisions by using the evidence based approach.

Let's look at one example. A current example at the time of writing is a debate in the UK about the effectiveness of prisons. One observer described this in the following way.

"We seem to be addicted to punishing people and putting them in prison. The evidence suggests, however, that there are better ways of reducing reoffending than putting people in what can be a university for crime.

"Certainly some people need to be in prison. The question is: Do we want to implement these more effective ways of reducing reoffending or do we want to continue with the punishment approach?"

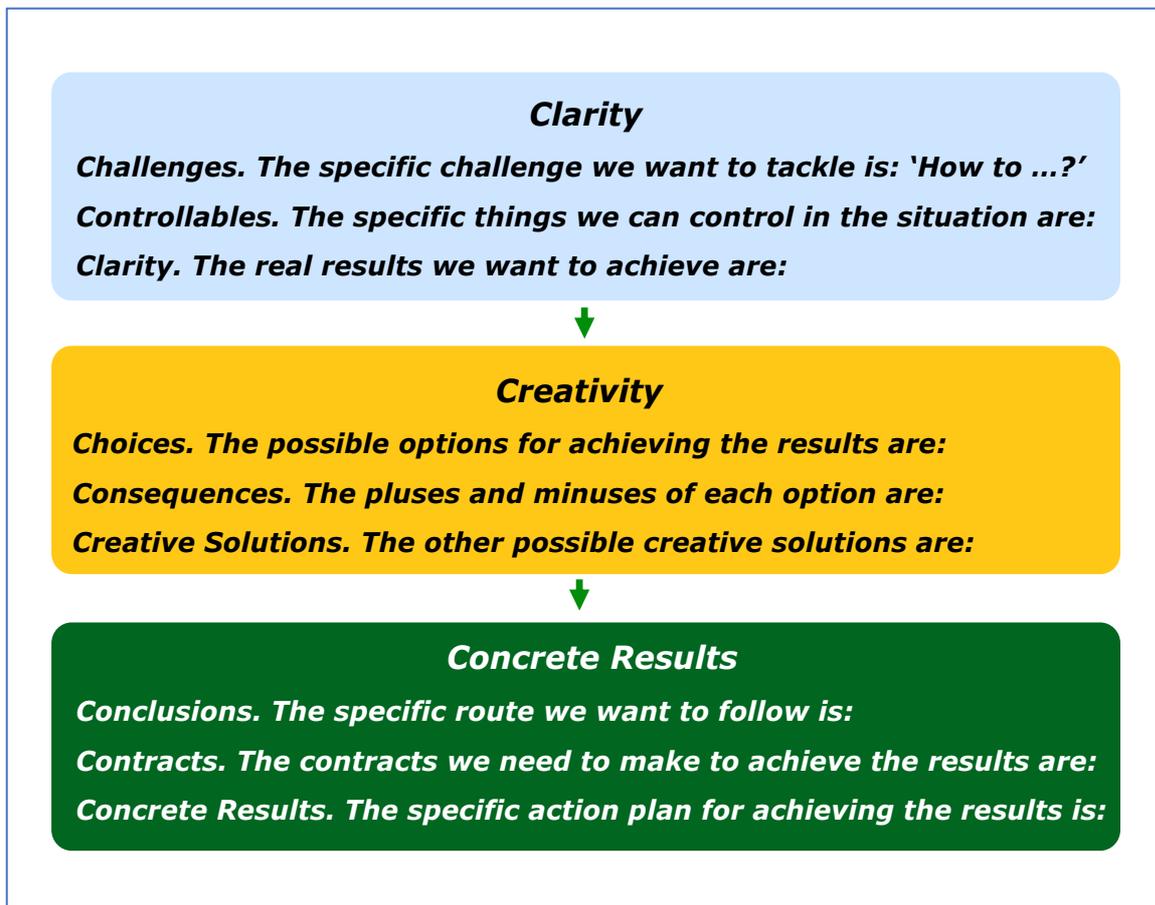

People who take the evidence based approach believe in gathering as much data as possible. They may then use something like the Three C model for making decisions.

Such people go through the following steps and, as far as possible, back up each one with evidence. Here is an overview of this approach.

Making Decisions – The Three C Approach

There are many models for making decisions. Some people use the Three C approach. This involves going through the stages of focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

Imagine that you lead a team of people who want to follow elements of this approach when making a decision. This can involve working through the following stages.

The evidence based approach can help people to make considered decisions. Sometimes it is also possible to use another model.

The Emotional Approach And The Evidence Based Approach

People sometimes combine elements of both approaches. They believe, for example, that emotion is evidence. It is vital to take this into account when also using the evidence based approach.

Let's look at one example. Imagine that a person wants to move from feeling depressed to feeling happier. One approach they can use is to recall a time when they did this successfully. They can explore the following themes.

Looking back, when was a time that I moved from feeling depressed to feeling happier? What did I do right then? What were the principles I followed? How did I translate these into action? What happened as a result?

Looking ahead, how can I follow these principles in the future? Based on what has worked in the past, how can I follow these steps in the present? What other skills may I need to add? How can I translate these ideas into action? What else can I do to increase the chances of being happier?

As mentioned earlier, there are several ways to make decisions. Some people follow the emotional approach, some follow the evidence based approach. Some combine both approaches.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow one or more of these approaches? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Emotional Approach And The Evidence Based Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow one or a combination of these approaches may be:

*

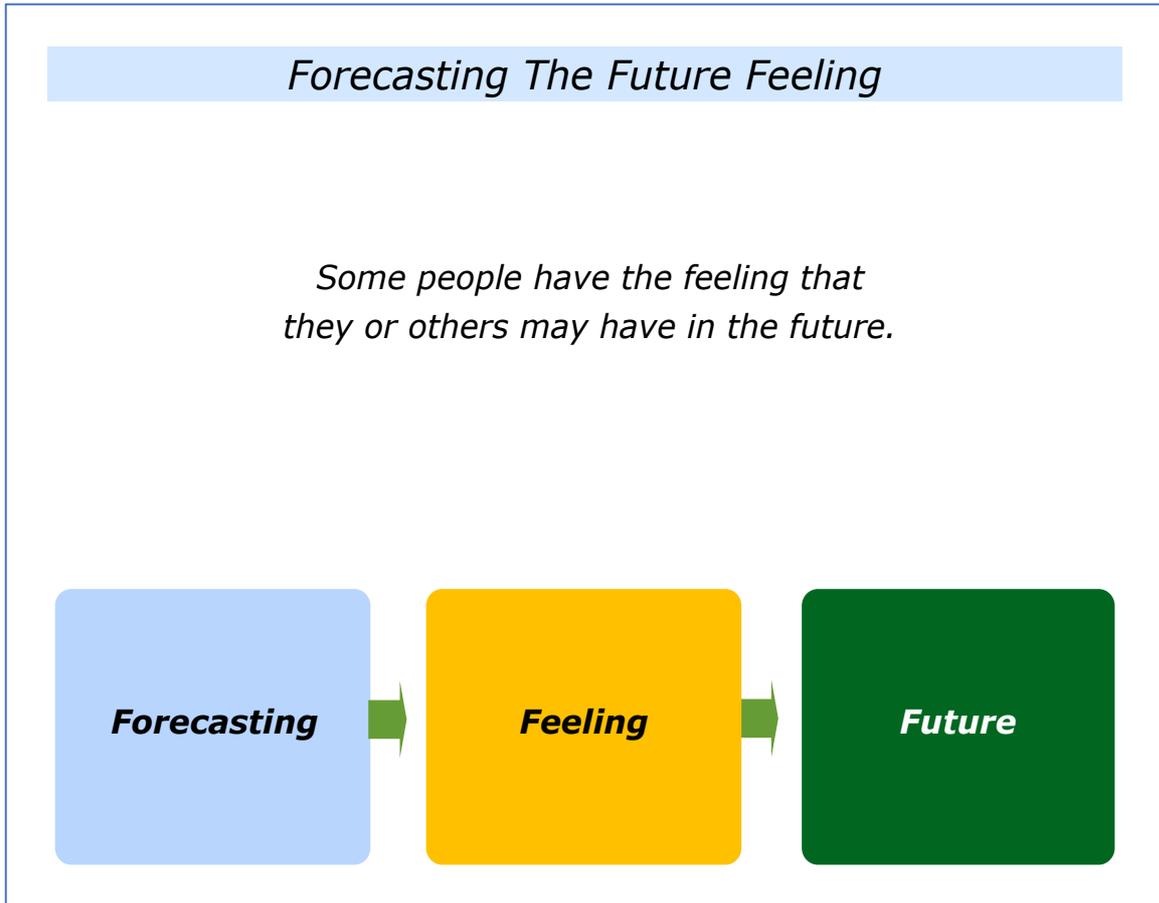

The specific things I can do to follow my chosen approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Forecasting The Future Feeling Approach

Some people can forecast the feelings they may experience in certain situations in the future. This involves them taking the following steps.

They look ahead and explore the possible options they can pursue in the future;

They forecast the feelings they are likely to experience when pursuing each of these options;

They follow their chosen path and manage the feeling they are likely to experience when pursuing this option.

Many people can forecast the feelings they are likely to have in relatively straightforward situations. They may be aiming to visit a friend, do satisfying work, go for a walk or do another activity. They say:

"If do this activity and behave in a certain way then I am likely to have the following feelings."

Some people can forecast what they may feel in challenging situations. They may be dealing with a micromanaging boss, turning around an unsuccessful team or doing another activity.

Some can forecast what they may feel during a complex or uncertain experience. They may be launching a business, opting for a certain kind of medical treatment or leading a first responder team.

Some individuals have a memory of the future. They seem able to envisage many scenarios and find solutions. It is almost as if they have already been there. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I transport myself into the future and aim to see, touch and feel what it is like in various scenarios."

"This helps me to deal with any feelings and also find solutions. I can then make better decisions when meeting such challenges."

Some decision makers have the ability to forecast what other people may feel during an experience. They recognise that people may be about to suffer a loss, make a transition or encounter another challenging experience.

They may therefore aim to shape the experience in a certain way. They may aim to help people: a) to manage any challenging emotions; b) to, when appropriate, build on any possibilities that may emerge from the situation.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity where you have the ability to forecast the feeling that you or others may have during an experience? How can you use this ability in a positive way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Forecasting The Future Feeling

The specific activity where I may have the ability to forecast the feelings that I or others may experience in a particular situation is:

*

The specific things I can do to use this ability in a positive way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Lopsided Personality Approach

Lopsided Personalities

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Some may then aim.

- To recognise they have a lopsided personality;
- To build on the strengths of their lopsided personality;
- To manage the consequences of the weaknesses of their lopsided personality.

Some people have lopsided personalities. They may be brilliant in some areas but totally blank in others. Warren Buffett described himself in this way. Here is a summary of what he said:

"I have a lopsided personality. I am brilliant with numbers but I cannot tell you the colour of the wallpaper in my room at home. Even though I have lived in the same house for over fifty years."

A person with a lopsided personality may see things quickly in one area of life. They can tell you exactly what is happening and what is about to happen. In other areas they don't see a thing.

Great workers sometimes demonstrate characteristics that may be labelled as aspects of autism, OCD, savant qualities or another name. Some individuals learn how channel those characteristics in a positive way. Let's explore how they may take this approach.

Some individuals recognise they may have a lopsided personality

Some individuals get to a point where they recognise they may have a lopsided personality. Different people do this in different ways and at different stages of their lives.

Some people take this step through raising their own awareness. They may learn about other people who demonstrate such characteristics. They may read books, watch films or gather knowledge about people who behave in certain ways and go on to do great work.

Some people take this step through others helping them to recognise their strengths. A parent, teacher, coach or another person may help them to see they have great abilities in some areas but not in others.

Today it is more common for individuals who have elements of dyslexia, synaesthesia, autism or other characteristics to be told to build on their abilities. Some talk about using their super strengths whilst also recognising they may have shortcomings in other areas.

Some individuals may also be considered to be twice-gifted or twice-exceptional. They may have great ability in some areas and also demonstrate great resilience to manage certain disabilities.

Can you think of ways in which you may have elements of a lopsided personality? What are the specific areas where you may have the ability to be brilliant? What are those where you may be totally blank?

One person described aspects of their personality in the following way.

"I am good at solving certain kinds of problems but am hopeless in other areas. My partner said it took years to understand this was the case.

"They could not understand why I was so good at managing certain kinds of crisis but that I am nature blind. I can anticipate what is going to happen in certain areas but cannot tell you about the trees and flowers in our garden."

Some individuals build on the strengths of their lopsided personality

Some individuals recognise that they excel in the intelligences that are rewarded by the school system. They may be good at writing, music, maths, art, science or other subjects.

Some may excel in other types of intelligence. They may be good at helping people, creative thinking, selling, inventing or in an activity that is not rewarded by academia.

Some individuals have parents, teachers or other people who help them to develop their talents. Many dyslexic young people, for example, have been helped by adults who supported their abilities in creative work, cooking, selling, dance, leadership or other activities.

Some individuals may get to a point where they experience a eureka moment. This leads them to saying something along the following lines.

"I am going concentrate on the areas where I am able to do stimulating work and deliver success."

Such people then sometimes aim: a) to do what they do best; b) to do their best; c) to make their best contribution towards helping other people to achieve success.

This approach can help them to make a living doing what they love. At the same time, it can be important for them to develop the following skill.

Some individuals manage the consequences of the weaknesses of their lopsided personality

Some individuals recognise that, whilst they can be brilliant in some activities, they can have blind spots in certain areas. They may get away with some of these if they are positive and treat other people with respect.

They may be like the classic mad professor who regarded fondly for their brilliance and their quirks. Such a person may get by because people see them as a great asset.

Some individuals may be totally blank in certain areas of life, however, and this can have consequences. It may result in them causing harm to themselves or other people.

They may be great at caring for strangers but sometimes neglect their loved ones. They be superb at teaching maths but have a gambling problem. They may be good at making decisions in their professional life but poor in their personal life.

Some individuals build on their strengths and learn how to manage their consequences of their weaknesses. The second part can be challenging, however, because they can become preoccupied and not notice they are behaving in a certain way.

One approach is for a person to recognise the triggers that show they may be drifting into difficult territory. They can then aim: a) to buy time to think; b) to consider the possible options going forward; c) to rehearse following their chosen option. They can then move into action.

Let's return to your own life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on the themes we have considered. This invites you to explore the following themes

First, to describe the specific ways you may demonstrate elements of having a lopsided personality.

Second, to describe the specific things you can do to build on the strengths of this personality.

Third, to describe the specific things you can do to manage the other consequences of this personality.

Here is the exercise. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Lopsided Personality Approach

The specific ways in which I may demonstrate elements of having a lopsided personality may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on the strengths of this lopsided personality are:

*

*

*

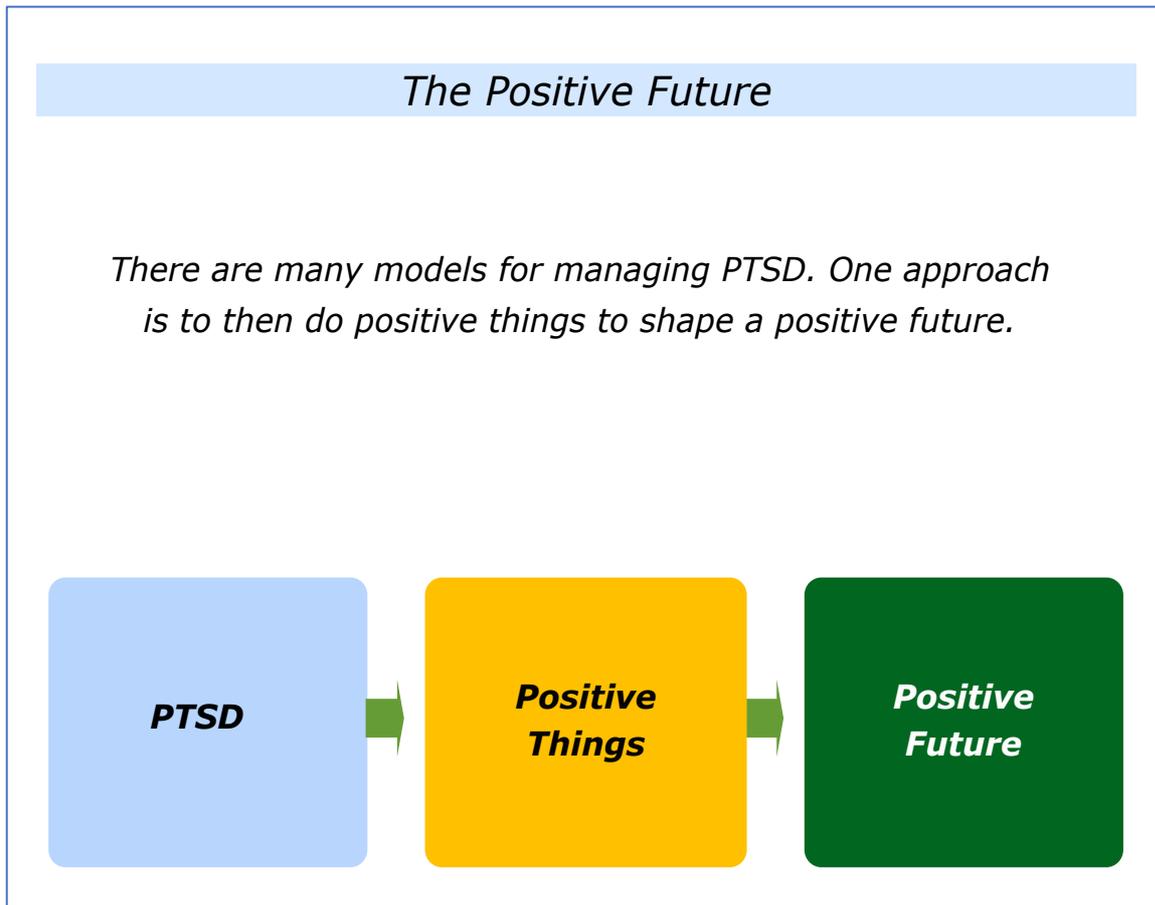

The specific things I can do to manage the other consequences of this lopsided personality are:

*

*

*

The Positive Future After PTSD Approach

There are many models for managing Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. The following section describes one approach. It then focuses on how a person may do positive things to shape a positive future.

Different people follow these steps in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

Managing PTSD

Imagine that a person has experienced a traumatic event. They may have had a serious injury, been the victim of crime, suddenly lost a loved one or had another event that has shattered their life.

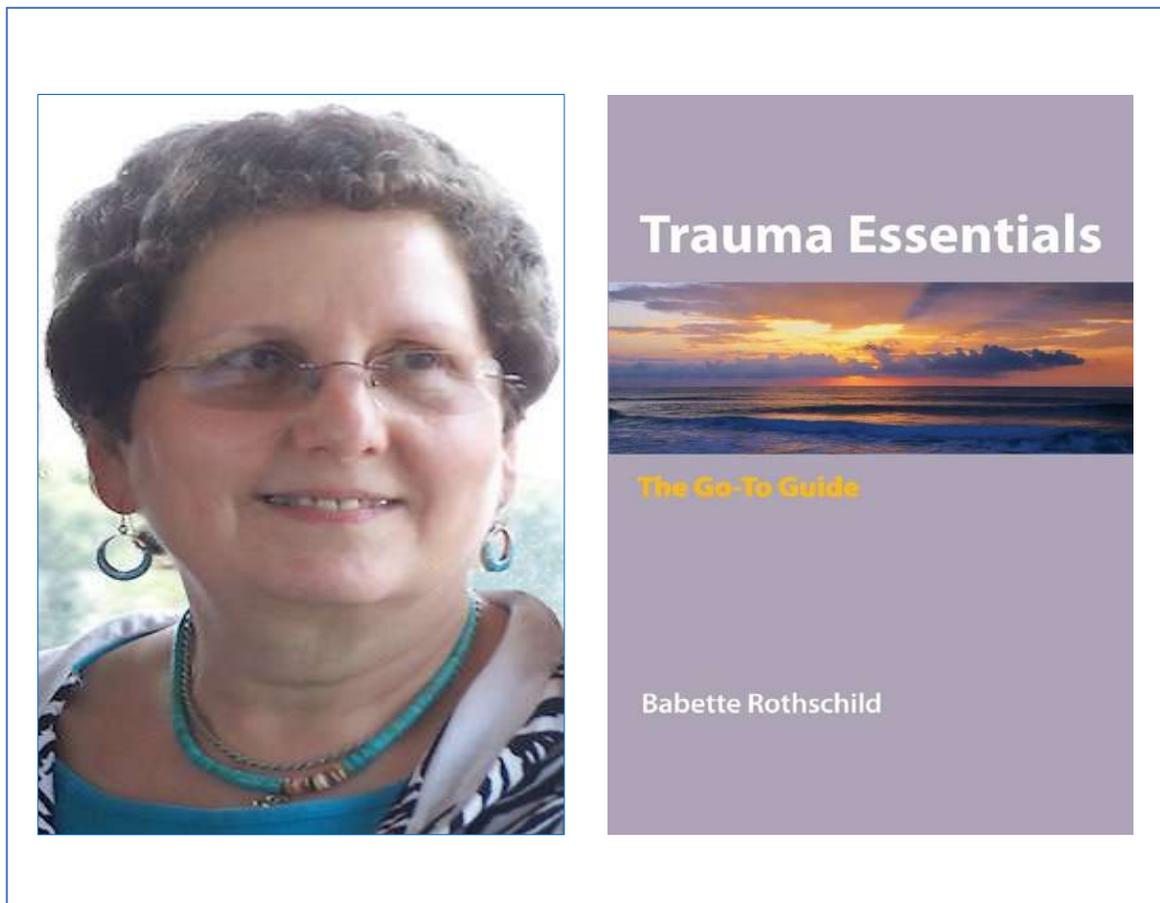

They may then experience Post Traumatic Stress Disorder. There are several definitions for this condition. Here is one description.

PTSD is a mental health condition that is triggered by a traumatic event that a person may have experienced or witnessed.

The symptoms may include flashbacks, nightmares, severe anxiety and uncontrollable thoughts about the event.

There are many models for helping a person to manage such emotions. The following section describes one approach.

Babette Roschild – The Safe Trauma Therapy Approach

Babette has helped many people to deal with traumas. Her work combines kindness, wisdom and practical tools. She says:

"The first goal of trauma recovery should and must be to improve your quality of life on a daily basis."

She creates a safe environment in which a person feels at ease. She then, if appropriate, provides practical tools that they can use:

To manage flashbacks and traumatic feelings;

To build on their inner strengths and successful patterns for dealing with challenges;

To add further skills they can use to improve the quality of their lives.

Babette is considered an expert in her field but she also believes that people often resolve many issues without requiring professional help. She explains this in the following way.

"The vast majority of humans who experience traumatic events resolve them on their own, relying on internal resources, the family, the community, the environment, spiritual beliefs and so forth."

When people do seek Babette's professional help, however, she helps them to add to their repertoires for shaping their futures. Writing in her book Trauma Essentials, she describes ten principles she believes are essential for safe trauma therapy.

Below is a summary of these principles. The direct quotes from Babette are written in italics. The other text is mine.

Safe Trauma Therapy

- First and foremost: Establish safety for the client within and outside the therapy.

Create a safe atmosphere in which the client can explore challenges at their own speed. Provide the person with tools or techniques they can use to calm themselves and take control when provoked by traumatic memories.

- Develop good contact between therapist and client as a prerequisite to addressing traumatic memories or applying any techniques – even if that takes months or years.

Carl Rogers, a founding father of modern counselling, described the importance of creating a safe atmosphere in which the client is able to feel safe. Babette underlines this approach. The client needs to feel at ease and able to proceed at their own pace.

- Client and therapist must be confident in applying the brakes before they use the accelerator.

The client should learn how to apply the brakes to stop the process or take control of flashbacks or other symptoms. They will then feel more confident in being able to proceed with the therapy.

- Identify and build on the client's internal and external resources.

Babette underlines the importance of building on the client's strengths. When the focus is on trauma, she says, it is easy to forget the accompanying mechanisms that have helped people to survive and carry on, even when they have PTSD.

Resources of both the past and the present are important allies; they mediate the negative effects of trauma. Resources are partners that make survival and life after trauma possible.

- Regard defences as resources. Never get rid of coping strategies or defences; instead, create more choices.

Babette explains this in the following way. By definition, defence mechanisms are coping strategies. They enable us to deal with adversity. The therapist can help a person to expand their repertoire of options for dealing with difficulties. This gives them more choices and freedom to shape their futures.

- View the trauma system as a pressure cooker. Always work to reduce – never to increase – the pressure.

The therapist can provide tools the person can use to reduce this pressure. Some pressures result from blaming themselves or not knowing what is actually happening on the physical and psychological levels.

- Adapt the therapy to the client, rather than expect the client to adapt to the therapy. This requires that the therapist be familiar with several theory and treatment models.

Good therapists will provide lots of options and help the client to build on what works for them. The client will then feel more able to shape the future in their own way.

- Have a broad knowledge of theory – both psychology and physiology – of trauma and PTSD. This reduces errors and allows the therapist to create techniques tailored to a particular client's needs.

Good therapists ensure they have a broad knowledge of the many factors that can trigger PTSD. They also keep expanding their knowledge in order to add to their repertoire of techniques for helping the person.

- Regard and respect the client's individual differences. Never expect one intervention to have the same result with two clients.

Every person is different. It is vital to understand them, their back story and the resources they have. It is then possible to help them to channel their personality and strengths to work towards achieving their aims.

- The therapist must be prepared to at times – or even for the whole course of therapy – to put any and aside all theories and just talk with the client.

Sometimes it is helpful to just sit and talk. Simply speaking person to person can benefit the client and provide a platform for future work. Never underestimate the power of simple human contact.

Let's conclude with a somewhat controversial view. Babette says there is a prevailing belief in the trauma recovery world that all traumas need to be resolved by the memories being processed.

This may be a useful approach for some people, she says, but it is not always the case. At lectures Babette asks people:

"How many of you have had a trauma in your history that you have not worked on but nonetheless function fairly well in spite of?"

She says that around two thirds of the people raise their hands. They have shown it is possible to progress their recovery without being obliged to relieve painful memories. They can be helped to move forward in other ways.

Babette continues to do superb work with safe trauma therapy. She provides many practical tools that people can use to enrich the quality of their lives.

Imagine that a person has developed ways of managing their PTSD. They may then move on to the next stage for shaping their future.

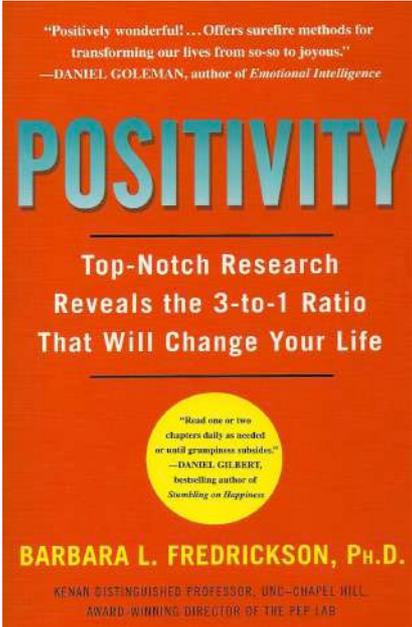

Doing Positive Things

People who experience traumas can find themselves going into negative cycles. They may need to relearn how to do things that give them positive energy. These can help them to heal and re-energise their system.

Imagine that a person who has had a trauma wants to take this step. One approach is for them to follow some of the guidelines described by Barbara Fredrickson. Let's explore this theme.

Barbara Fredrickson – Positivity

Positive Emotions

Individuals, marriages and business teams that flourish have positivity ratios above 3 to 1.

We need a ratio of 3 to 1 to lift us, develop and increase our resilience.

Individuals who don't overcome their depression, couples who fail in their marriages, and business teams that are unpopular and unprofitable each have ratios in the gutter, below 1 to 1.

Barbara did pioneering work that demonstrated how positive emotions can improve our lives. Twenty years of research into emotions culminated in her book Positivity.

The book was based on solid research but it also captured the imagination. Why? Interviewers and readers focused on a key theme that provided a signpost to the future.

People who have positive emotions in a ratio of 3:1 in relation to negative emotions are more likely to flourish.

Barbara saw this pattern repeated in marriages and teams that thrived. People who experienced more negativity were more likely to have difficulties.

She explains that positivity is more than simply being happy. It certainly isn't putting on a smiling face to grin and bear things. Positivity is based on being true to ourselves.

It embodies gratitude, love, playfulness, curiosity and adventure. These emotions trigger each other and create an upward spiral. They broaden and build, helping us to make breakthroughs and bring new things into being.

Such emotions provide the basis for creativity, problem solving and even evolution. They enable us to open our hearts and minds. Negativity, on the other hand, closes down our ability to think, create and grow. Barbara explains this in the following way.

Positivity consists of the whole range of positive emotions – from appreciation to love, from amusement to joy, from hope to gratitude, and then some.

The term is purposely broad. It includes the positive meanings and optimistic attitudes that trigger positive emotions as well as the open minds, tender hearts, relaxed limbs, and soft faces they usher in.

It even includes the long-term impact that positive emotions have on your character, relationships, communities and environments.

Barbara discovered that people could improve their wellbeing by improving their positivity ratio. She likened this to changing their diet to eat healthier food. They needed maintain this positive diet, however, rather than keep exposing themselves to negativity.

She listed ten forms of positivity that can nourish the soul. People can do both simple and big things that generate the following emotions in themselves and other people.

Gratitude ... Joy ... Love ... Hope ... Inspiration ... Amusement ... Awe ... Interest ... Pride ... Serenity.

People who maintain these habits will create an upward spiral that takes them beyond the tipping point. They are then more likely to increase the wellbeing of both themselves and other people.

Imagine that a person who has experienced trauma takes this approach. They can do things that give them positive energy and increase their positivity ratio. This can the help to increase their personal wellbeing.

Shaping A Positive Future

People need hope so it can be important for them to focus on how they can shape a positive future. One approach is for them to do something each day towards achieving their life goals. Here is an exercise on this theme.

My Lifetime Picture Of Success

Looking back in future years, I will feel my life has been successful if I have done the following things.

* I have ...

For example ...

* I have ...

For example ...

* I have ...

For example ...

Everybody has different pictures of success. Looking back on their life in future years, what for them will mean they have had a successful life?

Many people say they want to have built a happy family and had a successful career. Some also recognise that success can mean having a sense of peace.

It means looking back and feeling they have done their best during their time on the planet. People often cover three themes when doing this exercise.

Positive Relationships

People may describe how they want to be remembered as a parent, partner or friend. A person may say, for example:

I want my partner and I to have given our children the opportunity to enjoy a happy childhood. For example, I want them to say things like:

"Our parents were always there for us. They encouraged us, helped us to develop our talents and learn how to make good decisions."

Positive Experiences

People often focus on how they want to enjoy life, pursue experiences and have no regrets. A person may say something like:

I want to have lived life fully. For example, I want to have visited many countries ... To have completed the book I promised myself I would write ... To have made full use of my talents.

Positive Contribution

People often talk about wanting to make a positive contribution to the world. Sometimes this can lead to having a sense of peace.

This may involve them following their vocation or doing something that improves life for other people. So a person may write something like:

I want to have used my strengths to have done positive work that has helped other people. For example, I want: To have ... To have ... To have ...

Different people clarify their life goals in different ways. Whatever approach they take, clarifying these goals can act as a long-term compass.

A person can bear these aims in mind when making key decisions. When given the opportunity to take a new job, for example, they can ask themselves:

Will taking this step help me to achieve my longer-term picture of success?

Let's return to the person who has experienced a trauma. If appropriate, they may want to clarify their life goals. They may then find it useful to do one thing early each day towards achieving their aims.

Some people find this provides a sense of meaning to the day. They also feel more in charge and are doing something towards achieving their long-term picture of success.

Every person is different so different people choose different ways to manage and move forwards from PTSD. Some aim to do positive things and work towards shaping a positive future.

Let's return to your own life and work. Whilst you may not have PTSD, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Future After PTSD Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

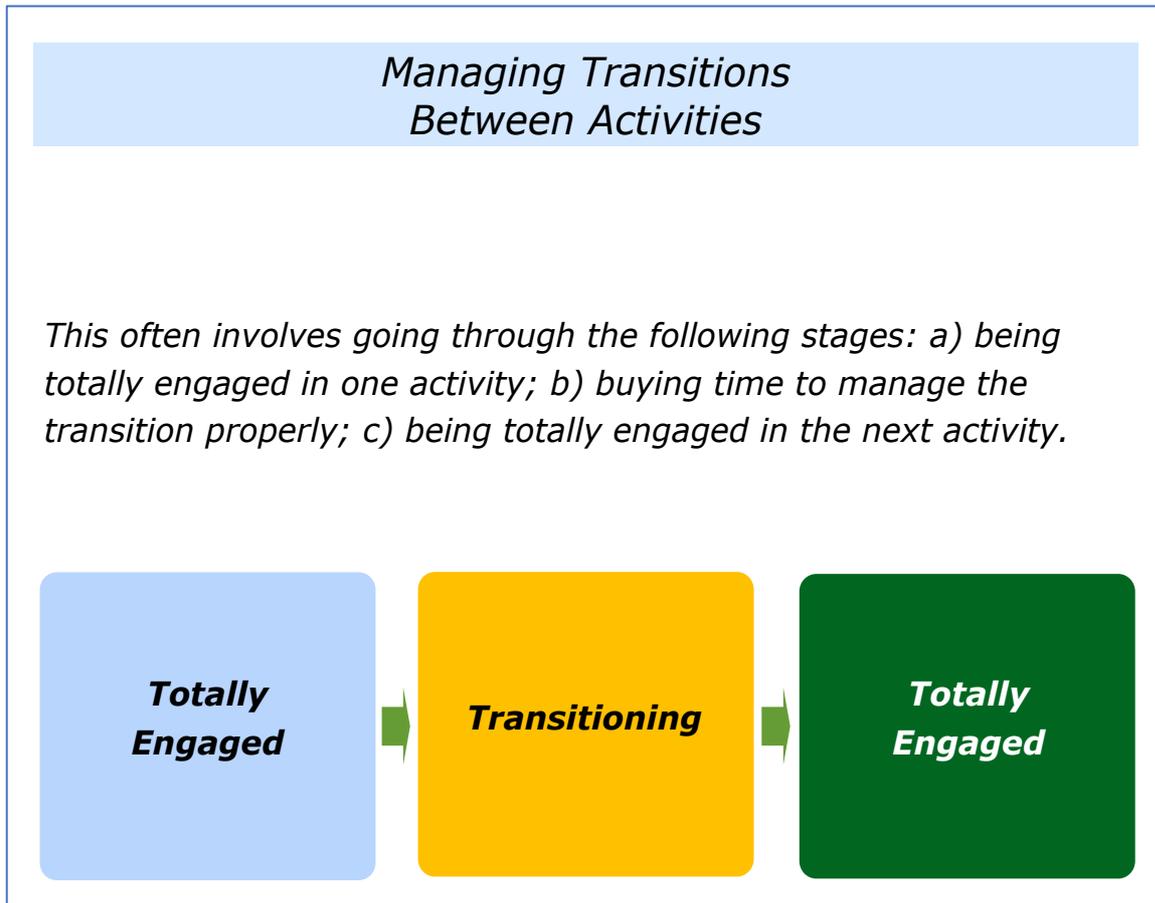

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Managing Transitions Between Activities And Being Totally Engaged Approach

Peak performers often immerse themselves deeply in their chosen activities. They love to go through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement. Sometimes they enter a state of flow.

This has huge benefits, but there can also be challenges. They may be deeply engaged in a creative activity, for example, but then need to give full attention to their child or partner.

Top performers also need to make such transitions. The skills they learn to do this may have some things in common but the ways they practise these may differ.

A soccer player may move from being adrenaline driven to being calm before taking a penalty kick. A business leader may move from making big strategic decisions to giving personal attention to individuals they meet in the corridor.

Looking back, can you think of a situation in the past when you managed to make a transition successfully? This could have a situation in your personal or professional life. You may have been deeply engaged in a task but suddenly your flow was interrupted.

This may have involved an everyday event, such as breaking off what you were doing to welcome home your loved one. Or it may have been something more dramatic, such as an emergency at work.

What did you do right then to make the transition? You may have taken time to breathe deeply, relax and refocus on the next activity.

Clarifying your aims in the new situation, you then did everything possible to achieve success. What did you actually do to make this happen?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific situation when you were totally engaged in one activity and then made a successful transition to become totally engaged in the next activity.

Describe the specific things you did to make this transition successfully.

Describe the specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps.

Transitioning In The Past

The specific situation when I was totally engaged in an activity and then transitioned successfully to be totally engaged in the next activity was:

*

The specific things I did then to make the transition successfully were:

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking those steps were:

*

Different people follow these steps in different ways in their own fields. Here is a look at how some athletes take these steps.

Learning From Biathletes

Tom Weede wrote an article on this theme for Men's Fitness magazine. He describes how people competing in the biathlon must switch from high intensity skiing to the calmness required to shoot at a target.

He interviewed top US biathletes such as Jay Hakkinen, plus the team coach Algis Shalna.

DE-STRESS IN SECONDS

As a result of the alternating demands of furious cardio and calm precision, these biathletes have to know how to relax and focus in highly stressful situations.

Remain Calm

On days when you'll be called upon to do something stressful, practise staying relaxed throughout the day — as opposed to hastily trying to compose yourself when you're about to give a presentation or line up a one-metre putt.

Breathe Deeply

In addition to being in good condition, biathletes increase their ability to relax and lower their heart rates by breathing correctly, deeply inhaling and exhaling as they approach the shooting range during a race.

Make It Mechanical

One way to reduce stress is by practising something over and over until it becomes automatic.

But biathletes can miss their targets, just as the rest of us miss free throws or lose our train of thought. So what happens if you fall out of the automatic mode and mess up?

"You definitely have to stop," says team member Jeremy Teela, who deals with such times by taking two breaths, closing his eyes for a second and then starting over.

"I jump back into it, just like I would if it was a new shooting," he says. "And then I shoot the next shots just as fast as normal ... so I totally clear what I just did (from my mind) and then start over."

Different people use different tools for making transitions. Many of these techniques involve going through the following process.

Relax

Relax your mind and body. Breathe deeply and buy time, even if only for a few seconds.

Rehearse

Clarify the real results you want to achieve in the situation. You can then rehearse how to achieve these aims.

(It is important to clarify what you can and cannot control in the situation. You can do your best but you cannot always completely control the outcome.)

Refocus

Focus fully on the new situation and move into action. Be totally aware of what is happening and do your best to achieve the desired results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may be totally engaged in an activity and then need to make a transition?

What can you do to be calm, controlled and centred? What can you do to, if appropriate, buy time – if only for a few seconds? What can you then do to be totally engaged in the new situation?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking to the future, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific situation in which you may be totally engaged in one activity but then need to make a successful transition to become totally engaged in the next activity.

Describe the specific things you can do to make this transition successfully.

Describe the specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps.

Transitioning In The Future

The specific situation when I may be totally engaged in an activity and need to transition successfully to be totally engaged in the next activity may be:

*

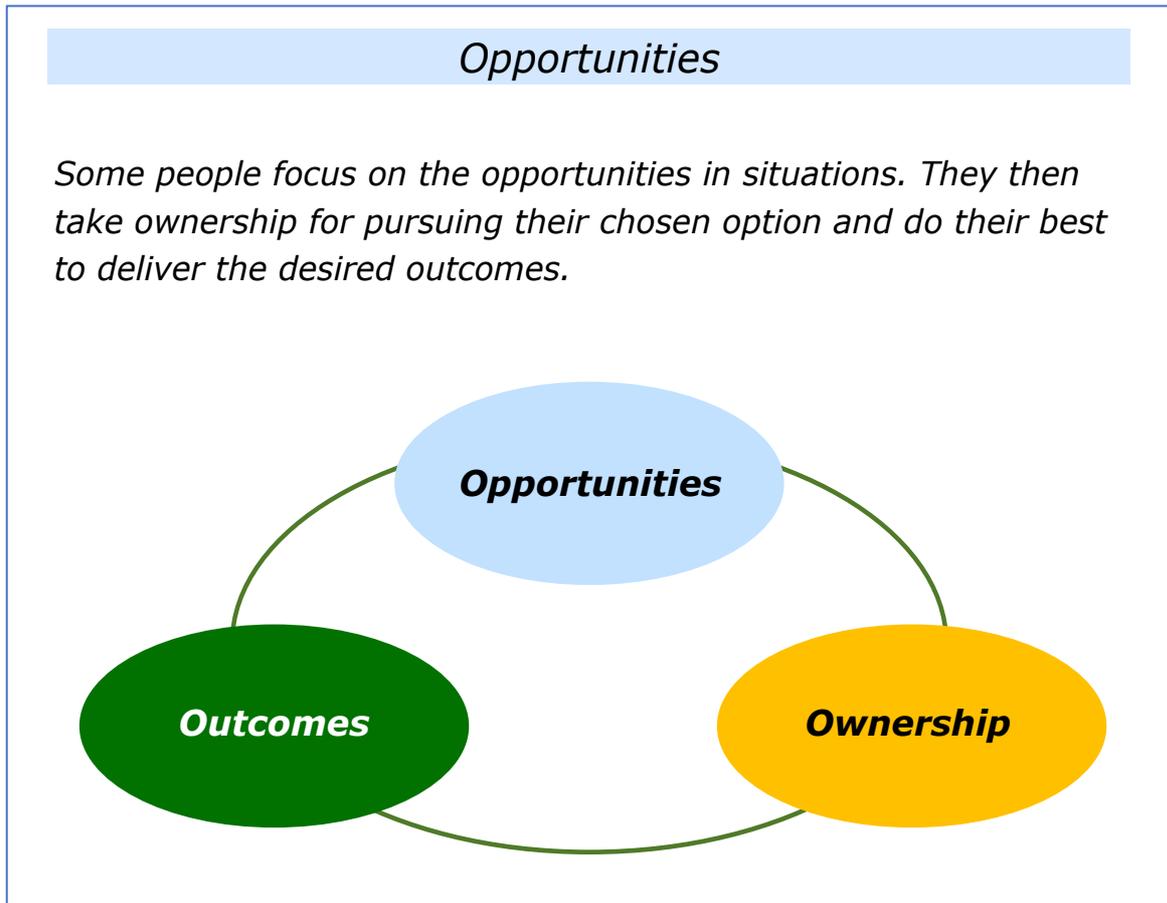

The specific things I can do then to make the transition successfully are:

*

The specific things that may happen as result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Opportunities Approach

Some people have a positive frame of mind and apply it in many situations. They are good at reading reality and exploring the possible scenarios. Such people may then aim:

To focus on the opportunities and options ... To take ownership of pursuing their chosen option ... To do their best to deliver the desired outcomes.

Different people see the world in different ways. Some people see opportunities, some see only obstacles. Some see possibilities, some see only problems.

There are different reasons why people take these approaches. Sometimes these have to do with their background. Sometimes it depends on how they choose to view life.

Some people reach to a point in their lives where they choose to take the positive route. This involves them focusing on the following themes.

Opportunities

Everybody encounters both successes and setbacks in life. The attitude they take can influence both their own and other people's futures. Let's look at examples of people who focus on the opportunities in situations.

Person A – Focusing On Opportunities

During a mentoring session the CEO of a company outlined the following challenges. Here is a summary of what they described.

"The headline is that things are going well for the company. We made lots of changes during the Covid pandemic and those have helped us to be successful.

The changes involved going back to basics. We chose: a) to focus on what we did best; b) to focus the customers with whom we worked best; c) to create the best kind of working environment for our people.

"Since then we have managed to improve both our customer service and our profits. The internal morale score has also gone up. These are all good signs.

"But now there are several challenges. During the past month the following things have happened.

"First, the people from whom we rent the office have said that our ten-year lease is going to be cut to five years. We could try to fight this but I am not sure it is worth.

"We have a hybrid working system but many people still enjoy coming into the office. Some do this only a few days a week but we try to put on special events that provide inspiration for people.

"Second, two of our senior leaders have been headhunted. This is good for them but presents us with a challenge. I think we can turn this into an opportunity but would like to explore the possibilities.

"Third, one of our top clients is going to be taken over. They enjoy working with us and the service we provide. But it is likely that future decisions about their spend with us will be reviewed.

"My guess is that the company acquiring them will put the contract out to tender or bring in their own preferred supplier. It will then be up to us to choose how we respond."

Looking ahead, we explored the opportunities in each situation. These included the following options.

*The Work Place Move –
The Potential Opportunities Are:*

To review whether we really need such a big work place ... To save money ... To use the move as a Trojan Horse for creating a new way of working ... To move to an even better work place.

To explore with our staff what they do and don't want in a work place ... To involve our staff in helping to design the work place ... To use the move to hold a series of launch events with our clients.

*The Senior Leaders Moving On –
The Potential Opportunities Are:*

To make positive changes to the leadership team ... To have a core leadership team rather than one that has kept growing as we have taken over more companies ... To give those leaders more autonomy to run their parts of the business.

To promote some of the positive people in our company ... To use this as an opportunity to move some people into places where they are more able to play to their strengths ... To continue to build our reputation as a company where people can develop and move on in their careers.

*The Top Client Being Taken Over -
The Potential Opportunities Are:*

To continue to deliver great service to the client ... To connect with the key people in the acquiring company and show we understand their goals ... To show how we would like to continue to help them to achieve success.

To plan how to potentially replace this client ... To have a dedicated task force that will take urgent action to develop ways to make up for any potential loss of income ... To devote even more time to the clients who love us and maybe get more repeat business.

Different people will obviously explore different options depending on the situation. Whatever options they produce, however, they may then go on to the next stage.

Ownership

Imagine that a person has considered the potential options for going forwards. They may then take ownership for pursuing their chosen option or a combination of options.

Different people will do this in different ways and much depends on the specific situation. The following section looks at the route taken by one person who faced a challenging issue.

Person B – Taking Ownership For Pursuing Their Chosen Option

Everybody encounters both successes and setbacks in life. Their attitude they take can influence both their own and other people's futures.

Person B chose to reframe an illness as opportunity to pursue their chosen option. This sounds challenging but here is a summary of how they explained the situation.

"During one of my annual health checks I got warning signals about a possible cancer. This led to more tests and confirmation of the illness. At the time this was scary.

"Looking back, however, it provided a wake-up call. I would not wish the illness on anybody, but it helped my partner and I to focus on what is important in life.

"I recognise it is my responsibility to take care of my health. Bearing this in mind, I gathered information from reputable sources about the treatments available.

"This meant I was reasonably well-informed when meeting to discuss the ways forward. The consultant was excellent. They outlined the possible options, the chances of success and the possible side effects.

"My initial thought had been to go for the most radical option. It came with potential side effects, however, such as incontinence. This seemed too big a risk.

"Bearing this in mind, I chose to follow the route of radiotherapy. This stood a good chance of success. It also had the potential for limited side effects.

"So what was the opportunity? My partner and I talked about our aims – both as individuals and as a couple. This enabled us to clarify what we wanted to do in the rest of our lives.

"Looking back, the illness helped us to develop a sense of perspective. We now do more of the things we love and see each day as a bonus. We also have an increased appreciation of life."

Person B was helped by medics who believed in the principle of body autonomy. There are many times when it is vital to listen to the opinion of specialists. But it still the person's right to take ownership for their own decisions. Here is how this described by the British Medical Association.

In medical practice, autonomy is usually expressed as the right of competent adults to make informed decisions about their own medical care.

The principle underlies the requirement to seek the consent or informed agreement of the patient before any investigation or treatment takes place.

Looking back at your own life, can you think of a situation where: a) you explored the potential opportunities; b) you took ownership for pursuing your chosen option? You may have then focused on the next theme.

Outcomes

Different people explore different opportunities and pursue different options. Whatever the route they take, however, many do their best to achieve the desired outcomes. Let's look at an organisation that supports people who take this approach.

Echoing Green – Supporting People Who Do Their Best To Achieve The Desired Outcomes

Echoing Green supports people who pursue opportunities whilst others may focus only on obstacles. It was founded in 1987 by leaders of General Atlantic. Since then it has supported thousands of social entrepreneurs who have worked to improve life on the planet.

The name comes from William Blake's poem Echoing Green. The poem combines the joy of life with the realisation that we are only here for a short time. We can nurture and care for the Earth so that others may enjoy it in the future.

Echoing Green therefore supports people who aim to encourage both present and future generations. Below are some excerpts from its website.

Echoing Green

The organisation supports social entrepreneurs who aim to make a positive impact in the following areas.

Climate Change

Education

Health

Human Rights

Poverty

Racial Justice

About Us

Our mission is to unleash next generation talent to solve the world's biggest problems.

We believe positive change is only possible when you live boldly, taking responsibility for finding your unique role in making the world a better place.

Echoing Green's premier program is its highly competitive global Fellowship, which provides more than $2 million in seed support to a diverse group of emerging social entrepreneurs every year.

From thousands of applicants, typically fewer than one percent are ultimately selected to receive up to $90,000 over two years to support the launch of their new organizations.

DISCOVERING VISIONARY LEADERS

We find and support people with the best ideas to positively impact the world. Through our intensive 18 month fellowship program and beyond, we provide the tools they need to bring their solutions to life and lead transformative change.

901 leaders who have kickstarted ideas with our help

86+ countries in which they're making a difference

$54M

total invested in Fellows

80%

of Fellows remain in the social sector

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to have a positive frame of mind and apply it in many situations. They focus on the opportunities, pursue their chosen option and aim to deliver the desired outcomes.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Opportunities Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Patterns Approach

Positive Patterns

There are many ways to encourage people. This approach involves seeing, simplifying and sharing the positive patterns followed by people. It involves:

- Seeing The Positive Patterns;
- Simplifying The Positive Patterns;
- Sharing The Positive Patterns.

This approach starts by studying people who are doing positive things in their lives or work. It then involves seeing, simplifying and sharing the positive patterns that people follow.

Many educators take this approach. They also pass practical tools that people can use to follow these patterns in their own ways. This involves focusing on the following steps.

Seeing The Positive Patterns

Great educators start by studying people who do positive things in their lives or work. They may aim:

To study people who encourage others, overcome challenges or work to achieve specific goals;

To study people, teams or organisations that build on their strengths, do superb work and achieve success;

To study people, groups or organisations who do positive work that cares for people or cares for the planet.

Great educators sometimes watch these people in action or see an example of their work. They then explore the following questions.

What are the positive things that people are doing? What are some of the things that happen as a result? What are the benefits?

What are people doing right when they do these activities? What are the principles they are following? How do they translate these into action?

Looking at what people do right, can I see any recurring patterns? Are there any patterns that people pursue to get positive results?

Such educators may then summarise what they see by doing the following exercise.

Seeing Positive Patterns

The specific activity I am studying where people do positive things is when they are ...

The specific things that people do right – some of the positive patterns I see them following – when pursuing this activity are:

* They ...

* They ...

* They ...

* They ...

Imagine that a person has gathered information about what people do right. They may have also begun to summarise these into describing some of the patterns. This can lead to the next stage.

Simplifying The Positive Patterns

Great educators then aim to simplify the positive patterns. Looking at the information they have gathered, some may do this by taking the following steps.

They clarify the positive patterns they have discovered;

They aim to summarise and simplify these patterns - but in a profound way;

They translate these patterns into a model or other media that they can share with people.

Different people do this in different ways. Some do it by again exploring the following questions.

What do people do right when doing the specific activity? What are the positive patterns they follow? What are the benefits of them following these patterns?

How can I summarise and simplify these patterns in a profound way? How can I translate these into an illustration, model or other media? How can I create something that is possible to pass on to people?

Great educators may then create a model that summaries the patterns. They then take the following steps.

They keep testing the model to make sure it works in reality;

They keep clarifying how to bring the model to life with real examples;

They keep polishing the model until they feel it is both simple and profound.

Imagine that a person has been able to simplify the patterns in a way that can be helpful to people. This may lead to them taking the next step.

Sharing The Positive Patterns

Great educators often follow the philosophy that the learner learns what the learner wants to learn. When appropriate, they take this approach when sharing the positive patterns with people.

Such educators prepare properly before meeting a person, teaching a class or running a workshop. This involves exploring the following themes.

Who is the person or group of people I am going to meet? What is happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face or the specific goals they want to achieve?

What may be the topics they want to explore in the session? How can I make clear contracts with them about the goals to achieve in the session? How can I then do my best to run a successful session?

How can I create a positive environment? How can I focus on the first goal they want to explore? How can I clarify the real results they want to achieve? How can I clarify their picture of success?

How can I, when appropriate, pass on knowledge they can use to achieve their aims? How can I share some of the positive patterns they may wish to follow? How can I do this in a way they can use in their lives or work?

If appropriate, how can I clarify the route they want to follow to achieve their aims? How can I pass on practical tools they can use in their own way? How can I encourage, educate and enable them to achieve success?

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to share the positive patterns that some people follow in their lives or work. It is also to offer practical tools that people can use to follow these in their own way.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive patterns approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Patterns Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

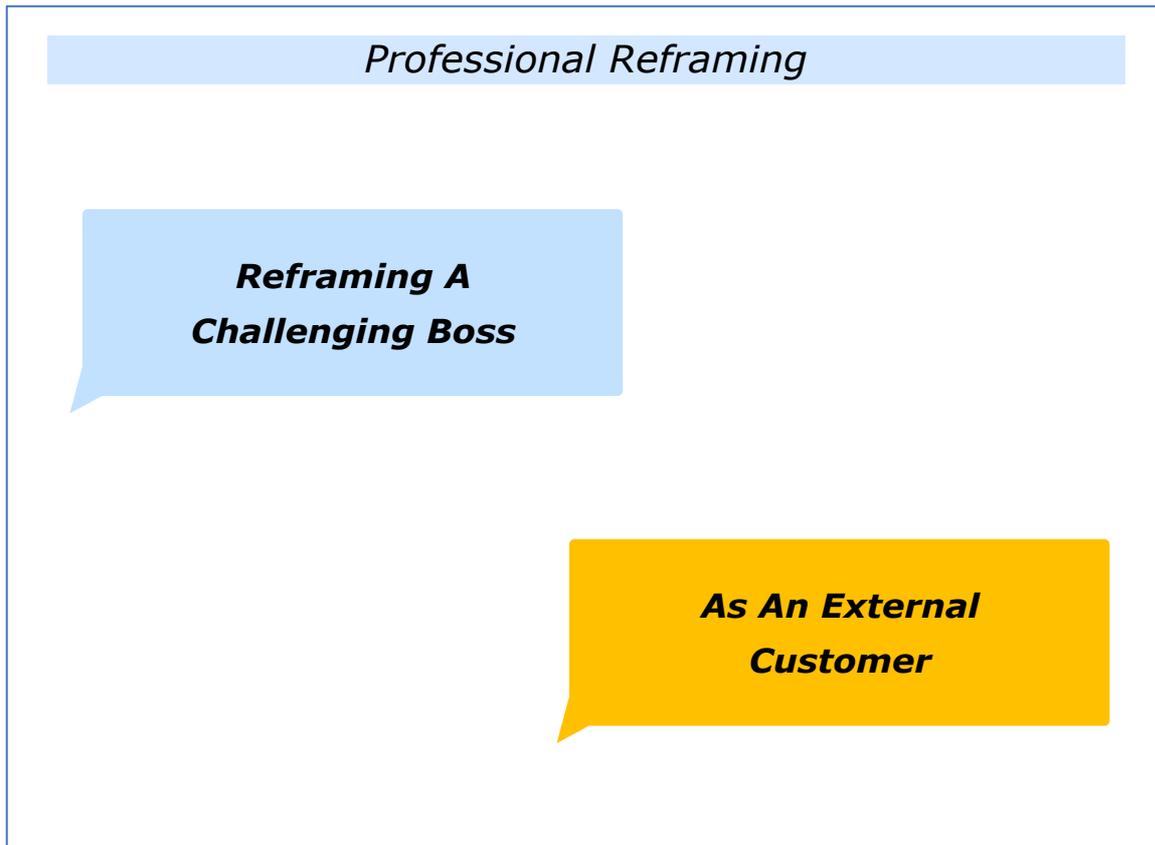

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Reframing A Challenging Boss As An External Customer Approach

This is an approach that I have seen work in the short to medium term. It can help a professional person to manage their manager, do good work and retain their sanity.

Looking to the long term, however, there may be decisions to make if a person has a manager who continues to behave in a difficult way. For the moment, let's explore how this approach can work in action.

Tom was a senior leader in a company. He enjoyed leading his team and working with customers. One issue he faced, however, was that his newly appointed boss could sometimes be challenging.

The new boss showed signs of being a micromanager and wanted to be kept informed about events on an almost daily basis. They also had a tendency to criticise rather than encourage.

How to manage such a situation? Talking with Tom, we explored the following idea.

"One approach is to reframe your boss as an external customer. It is to take the emotion out of the situation and ask yourself the following questions.

"How would I behave if they were an external customer? How would I approach my meetings with them? How would I behave in a professional way? How would I show that I understood their goals?"

"How would I make clear contracts with them about the outcomes to be delivered? How would I get some early successes? How would I proactively keep them informed about the progress towards the goals?"

"How would I take the emotion out of the situation? How would I simply focus on doing my best to help them to reach their goals? How would I retain my own sanity?"

Tom took this approach. It was a bit difficult at first because he had a strong emotional investment in the company and his own career. It could also be hard to manage a boss who behaved in challenging ways.

Several months later Tom reported that the approach had . Following the same principles he used with external customers, he aimed:

To show the new boss that he understood their aims and how he could help them to achieve these goals;

To make clear contracts about the outcomes to achieve and the specific ways the boss wanted to be kept informed;

To proactively keep in touch with the boss: a) to report the progress being made; b) to focus on the boss's aims and challenges for the next few weeks; c) to deliver their part in helping them to achieve these aims.

Tom reframed the situation in a professional way. He kept asking himself: How would I behave if this was an external customer? He then did his best to deliver the goods.

The new boss began to settle down and, for the most part, backed off micromanaging Tom. This still called for keeping them proactively informed, however, and achieving the agreed outcomes.

Tom said that the professional relationship was much better. He had also managed to see things in perspective and maintain his own sanity. There might come a point, however, when he looked for another place to work.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you reframe a challenging boss or another person as an external customer? How can you behave towards them in a professional way and also retain your sanity?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Reframing A Challenging Boss As An External Customer

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Peak Performers Who Demonstrate Paradoxes Approach

Peak Performers Sometimes Demonstrate Paradoxes

They may demonstrate the ability:

- To be visionary and detailed;
- To be intellectual and intuitive;
- To be serious and playful.

Peak performers defy old style psychometric tests in the activities where they excel. Why? They often demonstrate what appear to be paradoxes when they perform superb work.

When being interviewed by a psychologist, they may be asked if they are a visionary or have attention to detail. The peak performer may answer that they do both. This may not fit the psychometric system.

Great workers may demonstrate a variety of paradoxes. They may be intellectual and intuitive, serious and playful, confident and humble when doing their work.

Such people are also able to be both helicoptering and hands on. They are completely involved in the task, yet also hover above it to get perspective to see what is happening.

They are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They are good at pattern recognition and quickly able to see both successful and unsuccessful patterns.

They may demonstrate a relaxed relentlessness. They are able to be relaxed but also relentless when working towards achieving their goals.

Al Siebert describes some of these qualities when studying life's survivors. He recorded the characteristics of such people in his books The Survivor Personality and The Resiliency Advantage.

A paratrooper in the 1950s, Al met the few remaining survivors from a unit that had served in WWII and Korea. They weren't the gung-ho types and had unusual qualities. He described these in the following way.

During our training I noticed that combat survivors have a type of personal radar always on scan. Anything that happens, or any noise draws a quick, brief look.

They have a relaxed awareness. I began to realize it wasn't just luck or fate that these were the few who came back alive. Something about them as people had tipped the scales in their favour.

Al found that such people had good radar in certain situations. They seemed to know what would happen before it happened. They then applied their repertoire of skills to get the desired results.

Great workers are often extremely focused. When appropriate, however, they also choose to be flexible within a certain framework in order to achieve their goals.

Such people make complicated things look simple when doing certain activities. They may appear to do things slowly but they accomplish these more swiftly than other people. One person described this in the following way.

"Everything seems to slow down when I am doing certain activities. Others say that the situation seems chaotic. But I am able to get the heart of the matter quickly and get the desired results."

Let's return to your own work. What may be a specific activity where you embody what may appear to be paradoxes? When do you see the big picture and have attention to detail?

When are you both helicoptering and hands-on? When do you make complicated things appear simple? When are you both fully present in the moment but also able to work towards the picture of success?

How can you put yourself into more of these situations in the future? How can you perform superb work? What may be the benefits of doing these things – both for yourself and other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Peak Performers Sometimes Demonstrate Paradoxes

The specific activity where I may follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to put myself into more of these situations and aim to perform superb work are:

*

*The specific benefits of taking these steps
– both for myself and other people – may be:*

*

The Raw Talent, Routine And Results Approach

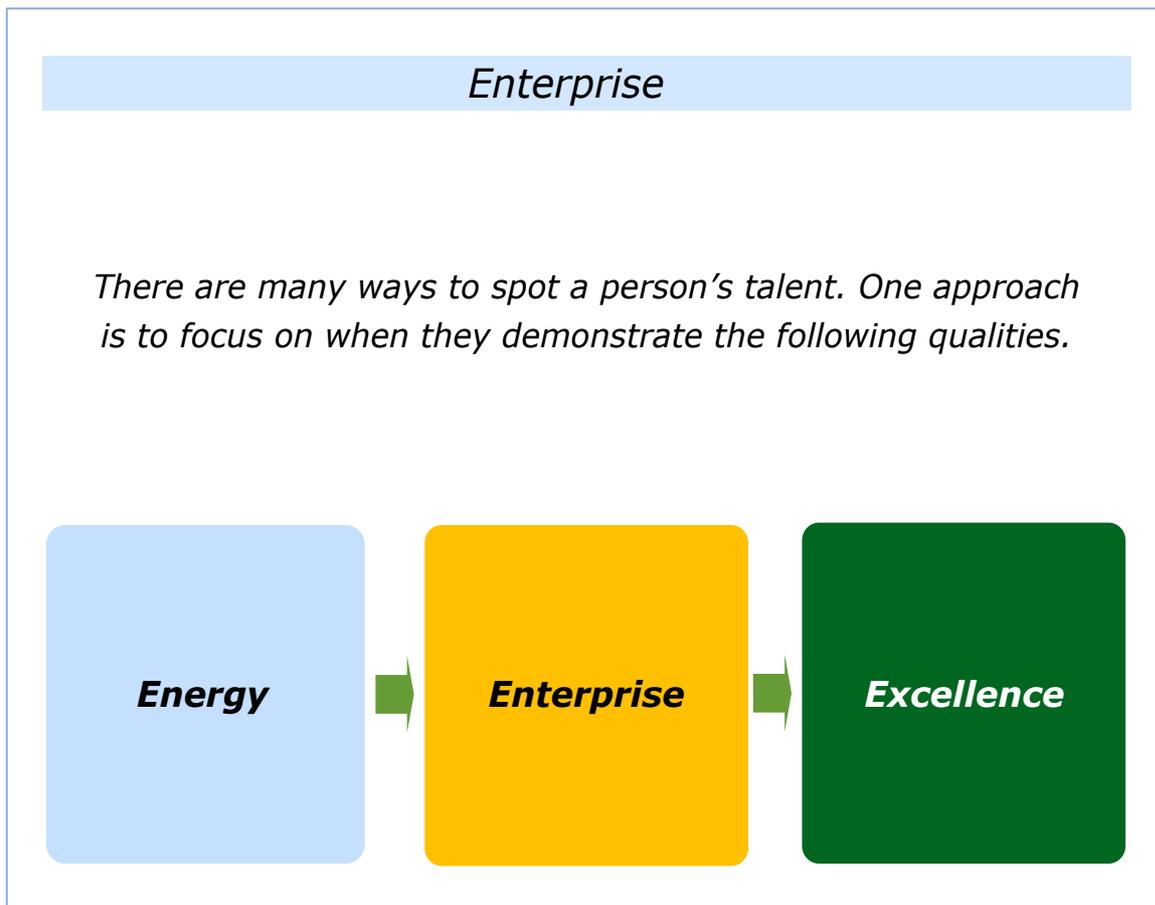

There are many ways to help a person to do superb work. One approach is to help them to build on their raw talent, follow routines they believe in and deliver the desired results.

Imagine that you are working with a person who wants to take these steps. Let's explore how you may can help them by focusing on following themes.

Raw Talent

There are many models for spotting a person's talents. You can look for when they are in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. There is another approach that is worth considering. This is when a person demonstrates the following qualities.

This approach involves looking for when a person comes alive. Let's look at one example of how this can be used.

During the 1970s and 80s I ran many programmes for young people. These aimed to help them to earn a living doing satisfying work.

During the sessions I invited the young people to do many different activities. Looking at each person, the aim was spot when the individuals demonstrated the following qualities.

Energy

They were doing something they enjoyed that gave them positive energy

Enterprise

They were proactive, showed initiative and found solutions to challenges.

Excellence

They had expertise in the specific activity and the potential to deliver excellence.

Many of the individuals went on to do satisfying work. One person built and sold a company that specialised creating clothing for mountaineers, fire fighters and steeplejacks. Another built and sold companies that produced medical solutions.

The aim was to look for when a person did work they enjoyed. It was also to look for when they showed enterprise and had the expertise to maybe go on to deliver excellence.

Routine

Great workers often apply their talents by following routines they believe in. They then keep following these principles on the way towards performing superb work.

Some workers spend years before finding their successful style of working. They then keep following this framework to flow, focus and finish. Sometimes this leads to a sense of fulfilment.

Great workers often follow an organic pattern. They build on their strengths and follow their successful style of working. They do what they do best and work in the way they work best.

Some people intuitively adopt this approach early in their lives. Some people take much longer. They then keep following these principles and also add to their repertoires.

Imagine that you are helping a person to apply their talents. If appropriate, you can help them find and following routines that they believe in. This sometimes involves focusing on the following themes.

Routines

You can help a person to find and follow routines they believe in:

- To build on their talents, focus on what they can control and clarify the desired results;
- To apply their talents, perform superb work and do their best to achieve the desired results;
- To develop their repertoire and manage challenges on the way towards achieving the desired results.

You can help the person to follow their own routine for building on their talents and setting goals. One approach is to encourage them to work through the following questions.

What are my talents? What are the specific activities where I may have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? Which of these talents do I want to build on?

What are the things I can control when building on these talents? What are the things I can't control? How can I build on what I can control and manage what I can't?

Bearing in mind what I can control, how can I build on these talents? What are the goals I want to achieve? What are the desired results?

You can help the person to follow their own routine for applying their talents and doing superb work. One approach is to encourage them to work through the following questions.

How can I build on my strengths and follow my successful style of working? Looking back, what is my successful pattern for working?

When have I done successful work in the past? What did I do right then? What were the principles I followed? How can I follow those principles in the future?

What are the routines I can follow to pursue these successful patterns? What other skills can I add? How can I then perform superb work and do my best to achieve the desired results?

Imagine that you have helped a person to focus on these themes. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Results

Great workers often follow certain routines to keep performing superb work. They then do their best to deliver the desired results.

Such people often find and follow their successful pattern for finishing things. They may be good, for example, at managing their energy, organising their time in blocks and doing deep work.

They may be good at adding to their repertoire of skills. They may also develop their ability to anticipate challenges and manage difficult challenges.

You can help the person to follow their own routine for doing their best to achieve success. One approach is to encourage them to work through the following questions.

How can I keep performing superb work? What can I do to keep following good habits? What can I do to keep focusing on what is working and what can be improved?

What can I do to keep adding to my repertoire? How can I keep developing my strategic thinking and practical skills? How can I anticipate any manage any potential challenges?

How can I follow my successful pattern for finishing? How can I do my best to deliver the desired results? How can I deliver ongoing success?

There are many ways to help a person to develop. One approach is help them to build on their talent, follow their chosen routine and do their best to deliver the desired results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your own life or when helping another person.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Raw Talent, Routine And Results Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

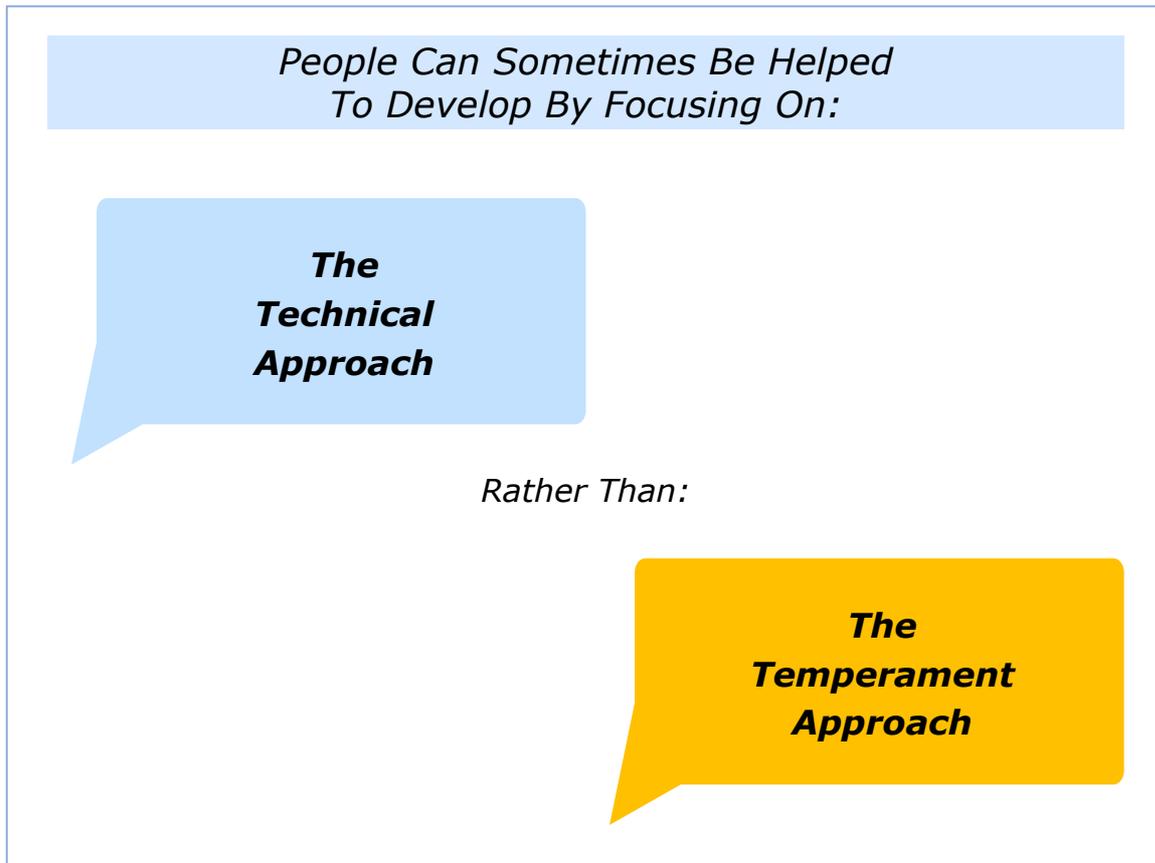

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Focusing On The Technical Approach Rather Than The Temperament Approach

Imagine that you are a coach who is helping a person to develop. You may have the skills to help them to improve as an artist, athlete, therapist or in another profession field.

This piece looks at an approach that sounds cerebral but can be effective. It can help a person to be calm, clear and do their best to deliver the desired concrete results.

Great performers often have the temperament, talent and technical skills required to succeed in their chosen field. They then apply these qualities to do fine work.

Having the right temperament and talent is crucial. But sometimes a person can be helped to perform best by focusing on getting the technical parts right. This can particularly be the case in situations that are challenging emotionally.

This approach may sound counter-intuitive in today's world where there is a great emphasis on emotions. A person obviously needs the right temperament to work as a nurse, brain surgeon, bomb disposal expert, athlete or in another profession.

The key is to channel these emotions in a positive way, however, in order to do fine work. Sometimes this means a person can

Reframe things as technical challenges rather than temperament challenges.

Different people do this in different ways. One person described their approach in the following way.

"I feel passionately about my work but this can be both a blessing and a curse. The passion drives me to improve but on occasions it can get in the way.

"Sometimes I do my best work when I reframe situations as a technical problem to be solved. I then focus on the specific things I can do to get a positive result.

"Being clear on the results to achieve, I use my head rather than just my heart. I then get great satisfaction from solving the problem and achieving success."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach to help a person to develop?

What can you do then to help them to reframe it as a technical challenge rather than a temperament challenge? How can you clarify the technical aspects that can be improved? How can you then help the person to develop?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Technical Approach Rather Than The Temperament Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way:

*

*

*

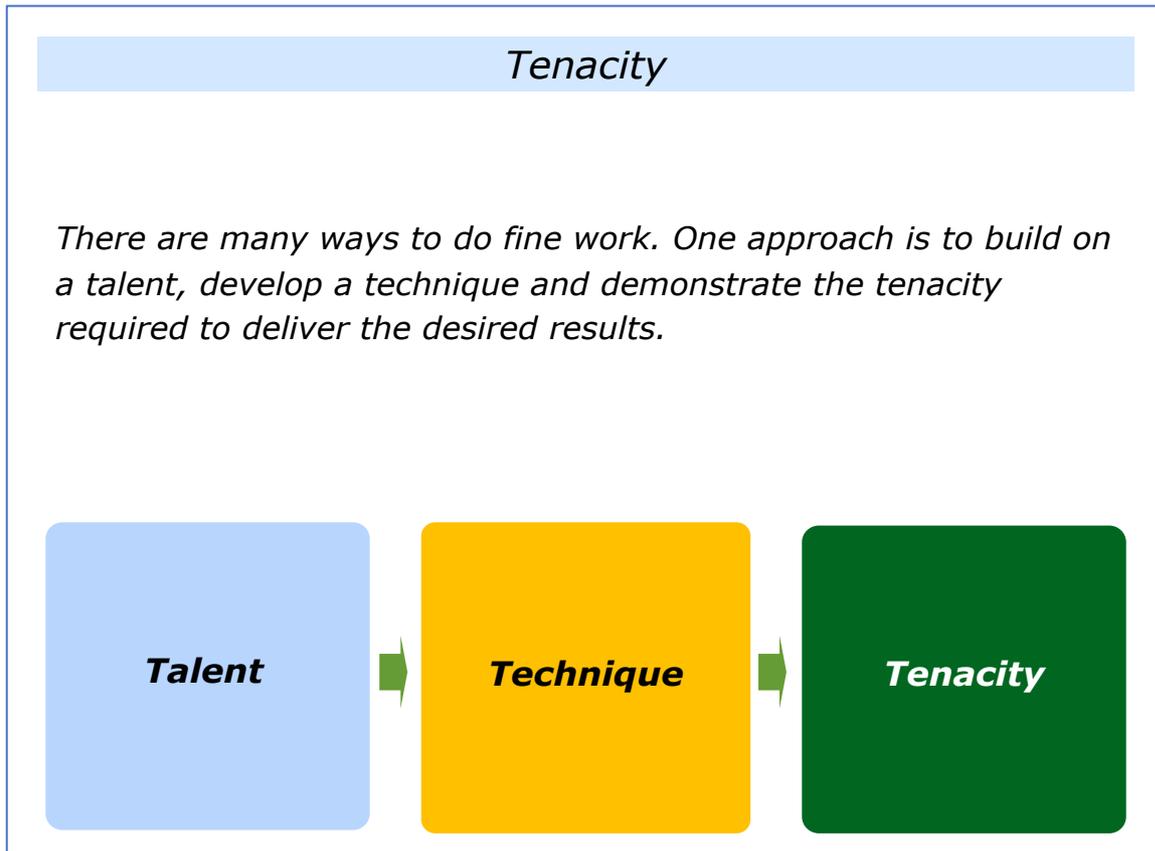

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Tenacity Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to build on a talent, develop a technique and demonstrate the tenacity required to deliver the desired results.

Talent and technique can take somebody a long way. But sometimes it is tenacity that gets them over the line. There are several definitions for tenacity. These include the following:

The ability to be persistent and perform superb work in tough situations.

This definition comes with a proviso. A person may demonstrate tenacity in certain situations but not in others. They are more likely to show it when doing tasks where they have the attitude and ability to do superb work.

Different people develop tenacity in different ways. Let's explore some of these approaches.

Some people seem to have natural tenacity

Some people seem to have natural tenacity when doing certain kinds of work. They may be helping a troubled person, solving a maths problem, playing a sport, leading a team or doing another activity. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I have always loved doing this activity. I enjoy setting a goal, making a plan and then working through the tasks.

"There are occasions when I need to tackle challenges. Whilst I keep following my disciplines, sometimes I need to do something special to solve the problem. This can be very satisfying."

Let's return to your own life and work. If you wish, try exploring the following questions.

What are the activities in which you seem to have natural tenacity? How do you plan ahead before doing the activity? How do you then translate the tenacity into action? What are the disciplines you follow?

What do you do when meeting a challenge? How do you buy time to think? How do you decide on your chosen way forwards? How do you then aim to perform superb work?

People who have talent and tenacity in a certain area can sometimes outstrip others may be more gifted. As the old saying goes in sports:

"Hard work beats talent when talent doesn't work hard."

Some people choose to develop their tenacity

Different people do this in different ways. Some athletes, for example, choose to test themselves in increasingly challenging situations. This can help them to develop their tenacity and apply it when it matters.

Other people take other routes. Some choose to test themselves physically or psychologically. Some choose to explore different experiences and widen their repertoires. One person described their chosen route in the following way.

"Nowadays I work in a hospice and, contrary to some beliefs, the work can be uplifting as well as challenging. People who are dying can teach us a lot about living."

"Originally I wanted to be a doctor but I am also dyslexic. Today there are more pathways into medicine for such people, but in then there were many barriers. I had lots of fighting spirit, however, and decided to test myself in some tough situations."

"During my early twenties I worked in orphanage next to a war zone. I then moved to working with drug addicts, alcoholics and in a psychiatric unit for criminals."

"These experiences taught me how to stay calm and do what works when dealing with unexpected events. These are lessons I have carried over to other areas of my life."

"I feel privileged to work at the hospice. Sometimes it can be exhausting – both physically and psychologically. But am grateful for the experiences I have had in the past. They have given me the strength to do rewarding work each day."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to demonstrate tenacity? How can you do this in your own way? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Tenacity

The specific situation where I may want to demonstrate tenacity may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to demonstrate tenacity in the situation are:

*

*

*

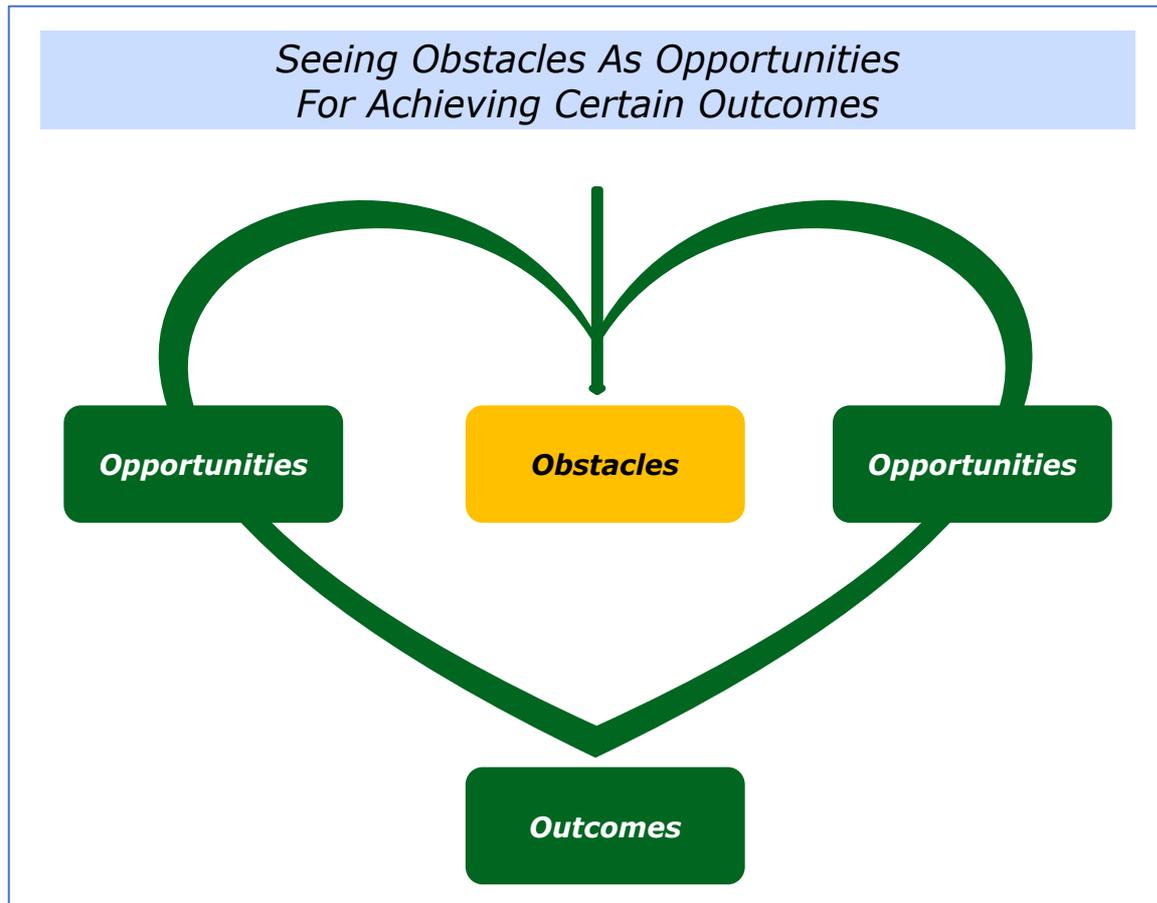

The specific benefits of taking these steps will be:

*

*

*

The Seeing Obstacles As Opportunities For Achieving Certain Outcomes Approach

Different people see life in different ways. Some people see obstacles as opportunities for achieving certain outcomes. Let's explore this approach.

Person A had difficulties at school. They then did a variety of jobs but wanted to become a social worker. This proved difficult because they had not passed certain exams.

They continued to do their day job and also began doing voluntary work with homeless people. This led to them specialising in helping people to recover from addictions.

After several years they reached a point where they felt the need to study and go to university. This eventually led to them being accepted as a mature student.

The first months went okay but they began to find the academic work frustrating. They found it difficult to write in an academic style and this led to them failing the end of first year exams.

The person needed to make a decision. They could choose: a) to try overcome the obstacle of learning to write in a certain way; b) to leave university and do project work in recovery programmes for addicts.

They chose the second option. Building on their contacts from the therapeutic network, they got their first two projects. This eventually led to them setting-up a business that provided practical ways to help recovering addicts.

Person B faced a different kind of obstacle. This was a long series of treatment sessions to tackle an illness. At first they felt depressed. They did not look forward to the thirty five sessions spread over seven weeks.

They then began to reframe the situation. Here is how they described their approach.

"First, I started by focusing on the overall goal – which was to be healthy and live longer. It was more heartening to focus on that one goal rather than making a list of thirty five sessions that had to be attended.

"Second, I organised my days so that I could do creative work in the morning and go for treatment sessions in the afternoon. This helped me to feel more in charge of my days. I got the creative kicks in the morning and the health help in the afternoon.

Third, I reframed the two hours of driving – plus the two hours of treatment – as a chance to reflect and explore ideas. This helped me to make good use of the travelling and treatment times."

Person C was a talented footballer I met when he was eighteen. Spotted at an early age, he spent time in the academies of several clubs. A resilient yet sensitive person, he was often made captain of the various teams.

During our mentoring session he expressed doubts about following the professional player route. He described this in the following way.

"I could probably make a living in the game but I do not like the culture in some clubs. Some coaches are good but some still seem in the stone age. They bully people and cause harm. I am strong enough to survive but I want to go a different route.

"After lots of research, my agent has got me a soccer scholarship in America. This involves playing for the university team but also studying sports psychology. I want to keep playing but also begin taking my coaching badges."

They took this route. Whilst captaining the university team, they began coaching young people in the area. This led to the university offering them the chance to do an MA and also take a paid part-time coaching role for younger players.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may see an obstacle as an opportunity? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What may be the situation? What may be the potential obstacle? What may be the potential opportunities? What may be the outcomes you want to achieve? How can you do your best to achieve these aims?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Seeing Obstacles As Opportunities For Achieving Certain Outcomes

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Who Perform Better At A Higher Level Rather Than A Lower Level Approach

Some people may perform better at a higher level rather than at a lower level. This is an approach that can sometimes be used when helping a person to do superb work. Let's look at some examples.

A football club signed an international midfielder from another country. They then started him in a reserve team match against a lower league team.

The player was like a fish out of water. He kept watching the ball fly over his head, found it difficult to play with his teammates and was unable to influence the game.

One week later he made his Premier League debut against one of the top teams in the country. The player performed superbly. He controlled the midfield and made a strong contribution to the team's victory.

What happened? He was in his element. The game was played at a higher technical level and his teammates were more in tune with where he wanted to pass the ball.

The player had risen through the system and had previously played well at a lower level. But he was now used to playing with teammates who operated on a higher level. He felt at ease on this stage and delivered fine performances.

Some films portray a similar theme. A protagonist may be brilliant at tackling maths problems, for example, but find it difficult to fit into institutions they don't respect. They may function better at Harvard than in their old high school.

Some people can be helped to find a place where they are in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. They can also be helped to find ways to avoid or manage situations where they are uncomfortable.

A similar approach can be used when working with challenging young people. During my early career, I often gave leadership roles to individuals who sometimes caused problems when working in a team.

The key was to outline their responsibilities and the overall Dos and Don'ts. Many rose to the occasion. They functioned better when invited to take a higher level of responsibility and to deliver the goods.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How could you do this in your own way?

This could involve working at a higher level in your own profession or helping a person to take this step. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

People Who Perform Better At A Higher Level

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

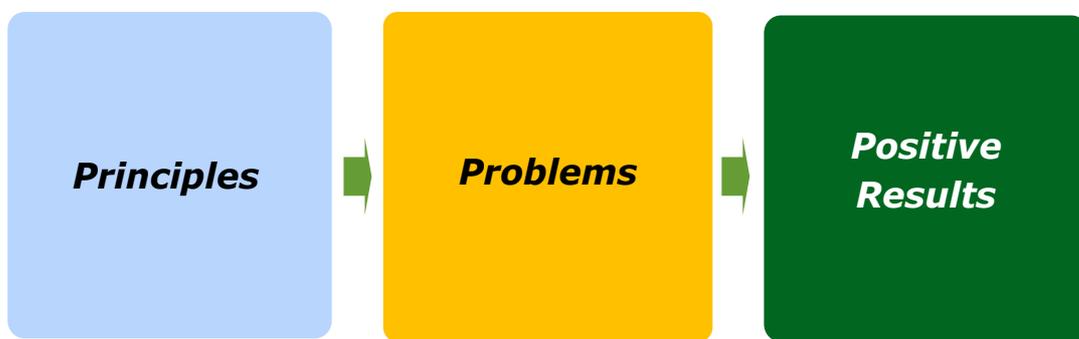

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Following Your Principles When Managing Problems Approach

Following Your Principles

There are many ways to manage situations. One approach is to follow your principles when managing problems. It is then to do your best to get positive results.

There are many ways to manage situations. One approach is to follow your principles when managing problems. It is then to do your best to get positive results.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

People Who Follow Their Professional Principles

Some people aim to follow principles that apply to their profession. These principles provide a compass they can use when making decisions in their daily work.

People who work in medicine, for example, focus on certain ethics that guide their actions. They are encouraged:

To follow the key medical principles – such as being caring, respecting a person's autonomy and aiming to do good rather than harm;

To apply their medical skills and deliver consistently high professional standards;

To do their best to help the patient and achieve the desired positive results.

People who work as mediators also aim to follow certain principles. Here is an excerpt from the Mediate.com website that gives an overview of such themes. Good mediators are encouraged:

To think before reacting - such as to buy time and consider the possible ways forward;

To respect people – to listen actively and check you have understood what people have said;

To assure fair process – to behave in a fair way and, as far as possible, ensure that people see the process is fair;

To focus on the future – to understand what has happened in the past but to then focus on how things can be in the future;

To seek options for mutual gain – to aim to, as far as possible, find win-win solutions for people.

Different people follow principles that relate to their particular profession. They may do this when working in healthcare, education, sports, business, government or other fields.

Many people who follow the principles approach are serious. They actually aim to follow the principles when making decisions and translating these into action. They find this can be useful – especially during tough times.

Some people say they follow stated principles but actually follow other principles. Some organisations, for example, may find ways to justify doing things that stray from their stated principles.

People Who Follow Their Personal Principles

Some people follow their personal principles. They may aim to follow their own moral compass, a spiritual faith or a philosophy that they believe in following.

They focus on their principles when making decisions, managing situations or working towards a goal. They take this approach when building on successes or managing setbacks.

Different people may follow different principles. Here are some that people mention when describing their approach.

*My Principles – The principles
I want to follow in my life are:*

To encourage people ... To care for my loved ones ... To do positive work that helps people ... To deliver high professional standards ... To find positive solutions to challenges ... To do my best during my time on the planet.

Such people find that following their principles gives them strength when tackling challenges. They may also borrow from various creative problem solving approaches when tackling situations.

Some take the following approach. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they translate the particular challenge into 'How to ...?' and positive terms. Let's look at some examples.

Imagine that a leader has a talented team member who behaves in an unprofessional way towards their colleagues. The leader will focus on the real results they want to achieve.

The real results to achieve may be: "How to build a positive team that consistently delivers peak performances?"

The real results to achieve may not be: "How to spend time trying to get the unprofessional person to behave in a professional way?"

Imagine that a parent has a dyslexic child who has certain strengths but finds it difficult at school. The parent will focus on the real results to achieve.

The real results to achieve may be: "How can I help my child to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and achieve success?"

The real results to achieve will not be: "How to get my child to fit into the academic world's targets for achieving success."

Imagine that a person is worried about the way people are mistreating the planet. Bearing in mind what they can control, the person may focus on what they can do rather than what they can't do.

The real results to achieve may be: "How can I be a positive model for other people and do positive work – however small – that helps people or the planet?"

The real results to achieve will not be: "How can I stop worrying about what people are doing to the planet?"

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to follow your principles when focusing on a specific problem. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, you may want to explore the follow questions.

What are the real results I want to achieve in the situation? How can I translate these into 'How to ...?' and positive terms.

Imagine that you have taken this step. If appropriate, you can then explore the following themes.

What are the principles I want to follow in my life? How can I follow these principles in this situation and do my best to get positive results?

People who take this approach build on what they can control and follow their principles. They aim to be true to themselves and do their best during their time on the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This involves completing the following sentences.

The Principles Approach To Managing Problems

The specific problem I want to focus on – put in 'How to ..?' and positive terms - is:

 How to ...*

*My Principles - The specific principles
I want to follow in my life are:*

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

My Plan - The specific things I can do in this situation to follow my principles and do my best to get positive results are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Making Learning Personal, Practical And Profitable Approach

“The learner learns what the learner wants to learn,” we are told. Good educators often follow this approach when designing educational experiences. They aim to make the learning personal, practical and, in the widest sense, profitable.

Personal - It must relate to the person and their goals.

Practical – It must be practical and provide tools that help the person to reach their goals.

Profitable – It must be, in the widest sense, profitable and help the person to achieve their goals.

This is an approach that can be used when teaching, coaching, mentoring or running workshops. It aims to provide people with practical tools they can use to achieve their picture of success.

Looking back, when have you used some of these principles to help people to learn? You may have been helping a person to develop a skill, a team to tackle a challenge, a chief executive to build a successful organisation or whatever.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific time when you helped people – a person or a group - to learn something they found personal, practical and profitable.

Describe the specific things you did then to help them to learn something they found personal, practical and profitable.

Personal, Practical And Profitable In The Past

The specific situation when I helped a person or a group of people to learn something they found personal, practical and profitable was:

*

The specific things I did then to help them to learn something personal, practical and profitable were:

*

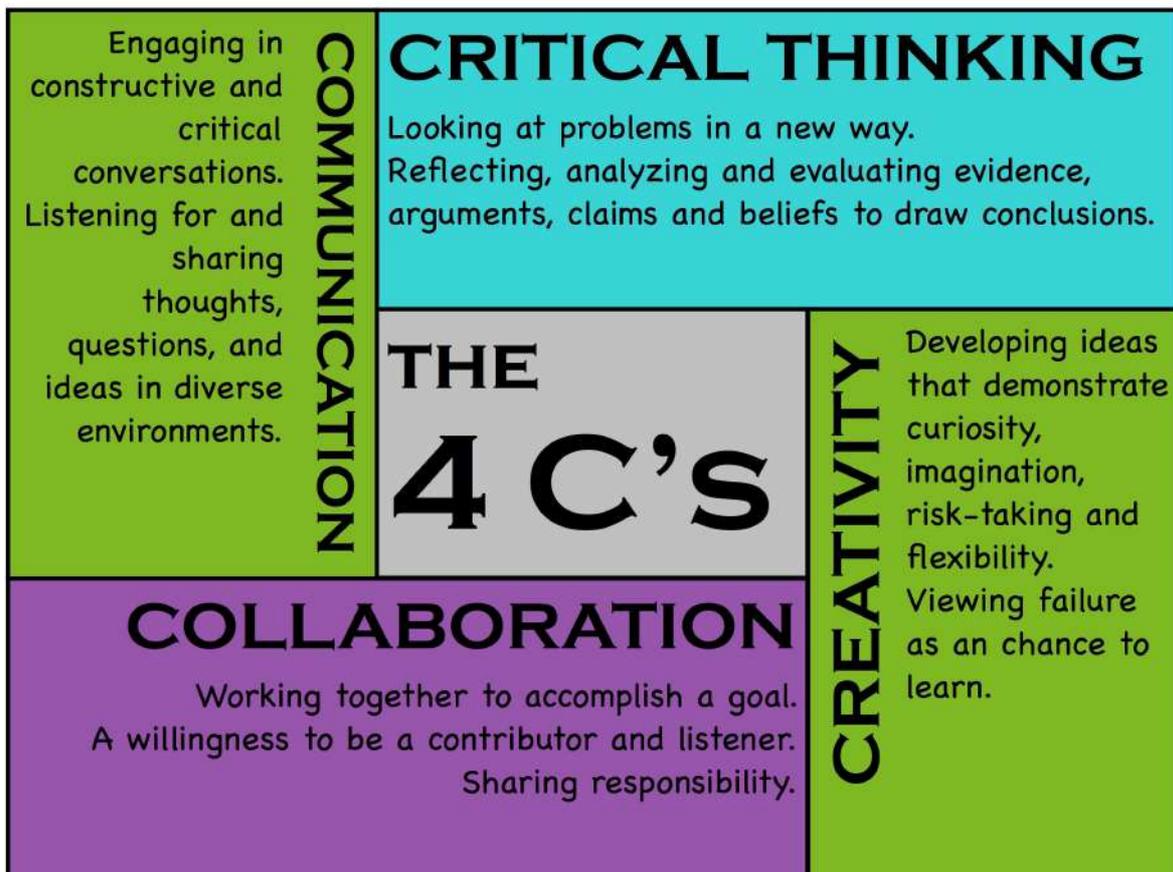

*

*

Making Learning Personal

People love to learn. They love to go through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement. They do, however, like the learning to be relevant.

Today there are many educational projects that are helping young people to develop what are called 21st Century Skills. These are Critical Thinking, Collaboration, Creativity and Communication.

Young people need to learn the basic skills of reading, writing and arithmetic. They often learn best if they have good relationships with their educators, however, and see the relevance of what they are learning. They are then more likely to develop the rigour to deliver results.

Educators now talk about the importance of young people demonstrating grit. One key point to remember, however, is that different people show grit in different areas.

A person may demonstrate grit when learning how to assemble a motorbike, for example, but not when learning algebra. They are prepared to put in the grunt work when they feel it will contribute towards achieving the great work.

As people get older, they often become more selective about what they want learn. Adult learners, for example, want to learn things they see as relevant towards achieving their personal or professional goals. This highlights another key step in education.

Making Clear Working Contracts With Individuals

Imagine a person has asked you to be their coach. You will begin by welcoming the person and creating an encouraging environment. It will then be useful to make clear contracts about what they want to get from the session.

In my own work, for example, I do a lot of coaching via Zoom. Before our first meeting I explain what I can help with and, sometimes just as importantly, what I can't. Some of my work is with performing artists, so then I explain.

The topics I can help with include:

How to clarify your picture of success;

How to build on your strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses;

How to pursue practical strategies for achieving your goals;

How to find solutions to particular challenges you face in your personal or professional life;

How to continue to do your best to achieve your picture of success.

I can't help them with technical things, such as how to be a better singer. What I can help with, however, are things like how to manage their emotions and be calm during performances. We then focus on what the person wants to explore and take away from the session.

Making Clear Working Contracts With Teams

You will probably go through a similar contracting process when working with teams. Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to talk with the key stakeholders beforehand and ask some of the following questions.

What are the goals for the session? What are the key themes it would be useful to focus on? What are the concrete things that you and other people would like to take away from the session?

Who are the people who will be involved? What is happening in their world? What are some of the challenges they face? What are the specific results they want to deliver – or must deliver - in their work?

What are their strengths? What are the specific areas in which people deliver As, rather than Bs or Cs? How can they build on these strengths? What are the things they need to learn to manage the consequences of any weaknesses?

What for you would make it a successful session? What are the specific things you would like people to be saying, thinking, feeling and doing after the session? What are the steps they could take towards achieving their picture of success?

Bearing their answers in mind, play back your understanding regarding the goals for the session. Make sure everybody is agreed on the desired outcomes. When starting the team workshop, you can then say something like:

Welcome To The Session

Today the aim is to provide practical tools you can use to continue to build on your strengths, find solutions to challenges and achieve success. Some of the topics we aim to explore today are:

How to ...

How to ...

How to ...

My role is to provide an encouraging environment and practical tools that work. The role I would like you to take is to encourage each other and also apply the tools in your own way.

Bearing in mind what I have outlined, are there any other topics you would like us to explore?

If appropriate, you can also add other topics that will contribute towards the team achieving success. People often say, however:

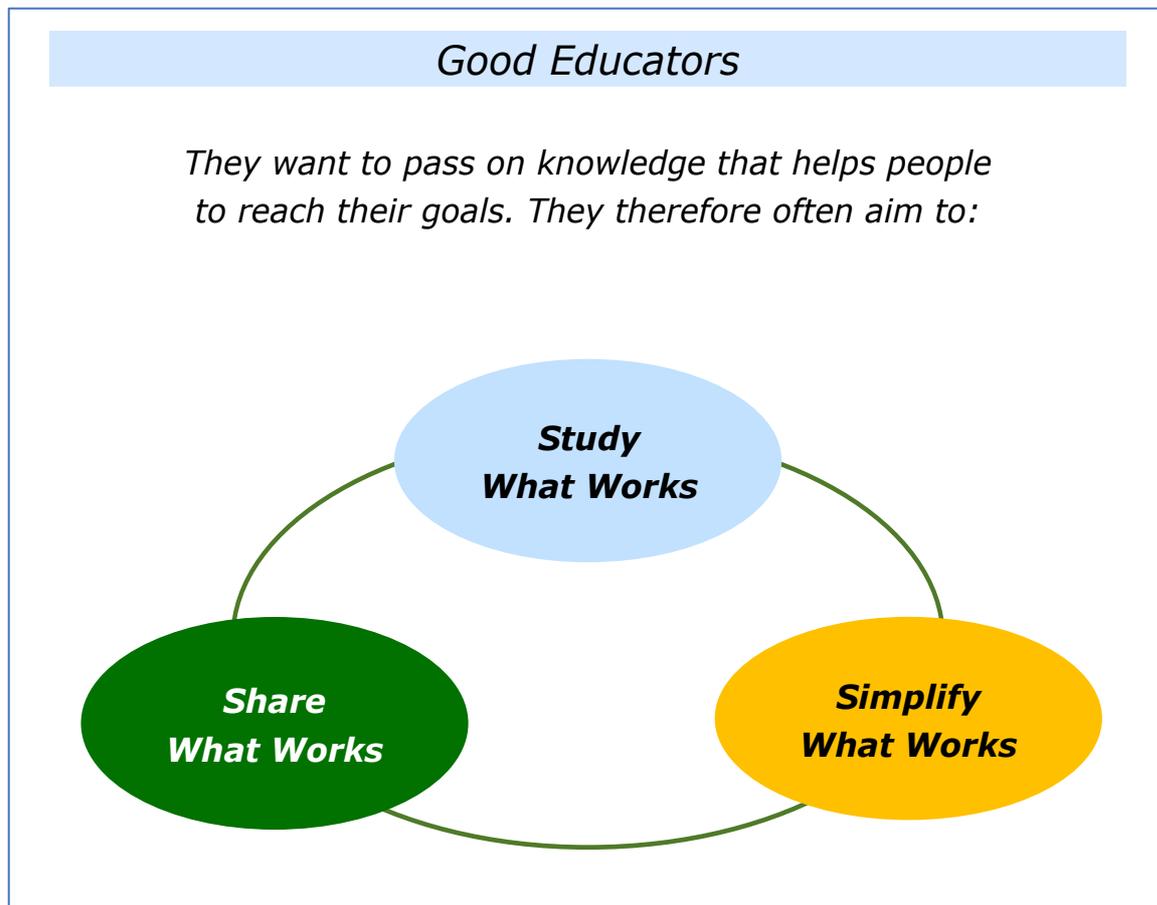

"That sounds enough to be going on with. If we do those things, then we will be well on our way."

Good educators make sure that the learning relates to people's personal or professional goals. They then move on to the next stage.

Making Learning Practical

Good educators often focus on success. They also study how to find solutions to particular challenges.

They study what works, simplify what works – in a profound way - and share what works. They then provide people with practical tools they can use to follow these principles in their own way.

Great organisations, for example, implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. This sounds simple, but it is vital to focus on what really works in practice. You can then help people to follow these steps and achieve their picture of success.

Different educators pass on this knowledge in different ways. Many focus on the Three Is: inspiration, implementation and integration.

They create an inspiring environment, provide implementation tools that work and help people to integrate the learning in their daily lives and work.

Good coaches, for example, often like to watch the person in action or see examples of their work. They then ask themselves.

What are the person's goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?

What are they doing well? How can they follow these principles more in the future? What can the person do better and how? What are the skills they need to learn?

What are the key messages I therefore want to give them? What are the positive models and practical tools I can use to help them to achieve their goals? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can use to achieve their picture of success?

Different educators help people by passing on learning in different ways. Kiran Bir Sethi and her colleagues at the Riverside School in Ahmedabad, India, encourage their students to follow the design process of Feel, Imagine, Do, Share.

This became the basis for the Design For Change programme involving children around the world. Here is an introduction from the DFC website.

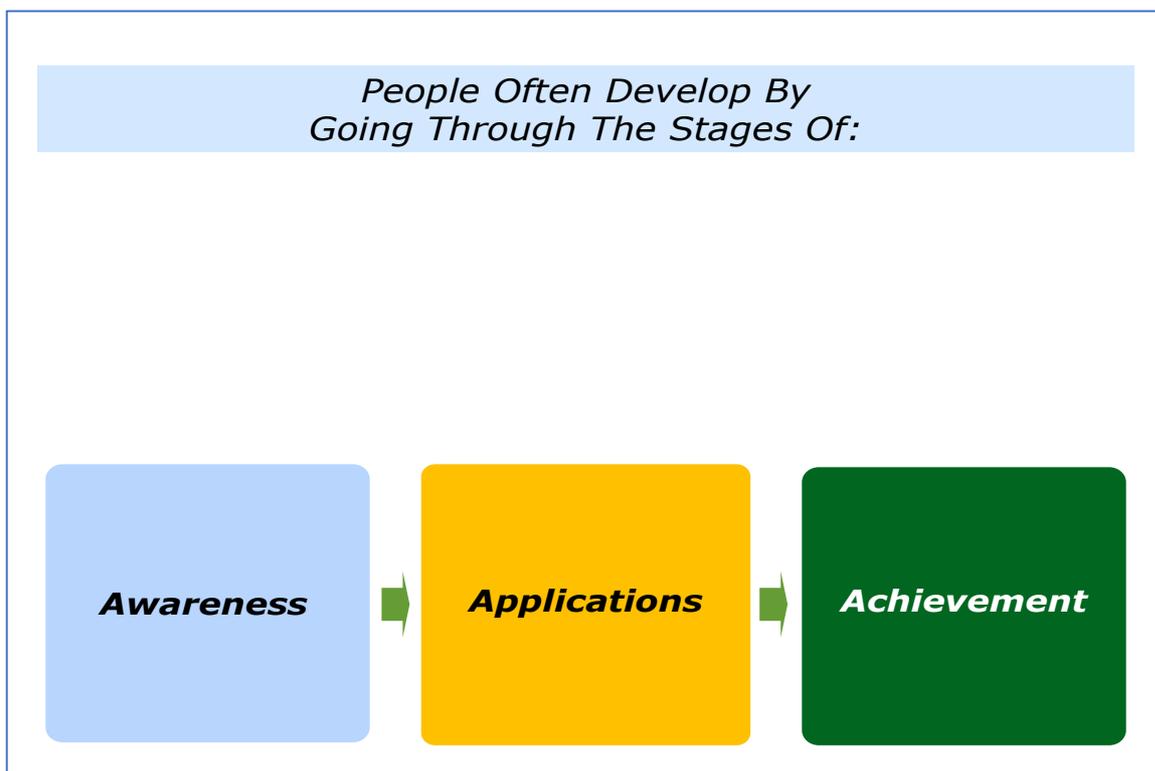

This year, Design for Change reaches 34 countries and over 300,000 schools inspiring hundreds of thousands of children, their teachers and parents, to celebrate the fact change is possible and that they can lead that change!

The challenge asks students to do four very simple things: Feel, Imagine, Do and Share.

Children are dreaming up and leading brilliant ideas all over the world, from challenging age-old superstitions in rural communities, to earning their own money to finance school computers to solving the problem of heavy school bags – children are proving that they have what it takes to be able to 'design' a future that is desired.

Making Learning Profitable

Good educators aim to make the learning, in the widest sense, profitable. You will have your own way of helping people to get tangible benefits. One approach is to help them to go through the stages of awareness, application and achievement. Let's explore how this works in practice.

People start by clarifying the goal they want to achieve. They then raise their awareness about how to reach the goal. They gather information, learn from experts, study best practice or whatever.

Awareness is a good starting point, but it is vital to translate the ideas into action. People then apply the knowledge. They develop their skills and build on what works. They find solutions to challenges, reach their goals and gain a sense of achievement.

Some people, of course, become awareness junkies. They simply want to collect more ideas, but seldom translate these into action. This can lead to frustration, both for themselves and other people.

Many employers, for example, want their people to develop their awareness, but they actually pay for application and achievement. People who apply their learning - and who are persistent - are more likely to achieve their goals.

If you work in the coaching profession, for example, you may be judged by your ability to provide people with practical tools they can use to achieve success. One business leader expressed this sentiment in the following way.

"Many people are aware of the guiding principles for living an enjoyable life, leading a business or running successful teams.

"People can surf the web and see these principles repeated time and again. There are thousands of experts on organisations, for example, who want to market their latest idea.

"What leaders pay for, however, is application. They want people to be helped to apply the ideas in real life situations and deliver success."

The process starts, however, by clarifying people's goals. As we mentioned at the beginning:

"The learner learns what the learner wants to learn."

Such an approach sounds sensible, but sometimes it is not translated into action. This was highlighted during a conversation I had with one of the world's best coaches for goalkeepers in soccer.

He was hired by a famous club to work with a goalkeeper who had won several championships and the European Cup. The coach reported:

"Before the first session I asked him what he wanted to learn and how he wanted to develop as a goalkeeper. The reply was surprising.

"He said that, during his twenty years as a goalkeeper, no coach had ever asked him those questions. So we sat down together and came up with a development plan.

"The goalkeeper went on to extend his career and win even more trophies."

Good educators encourage, educate and enable people to achieve ongoing success. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to look to the future and do the following things.

Describe a situation where you may want to help a person or a group of people to develop by learning something they find personal, practical and profitable.

Describe the specific things you can do to help them to learn the thing they find personal, practical and profitable.

Personal, Practical And Profitable In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to help a person or a group of people to learn something personal, practical and profitable may be:

*

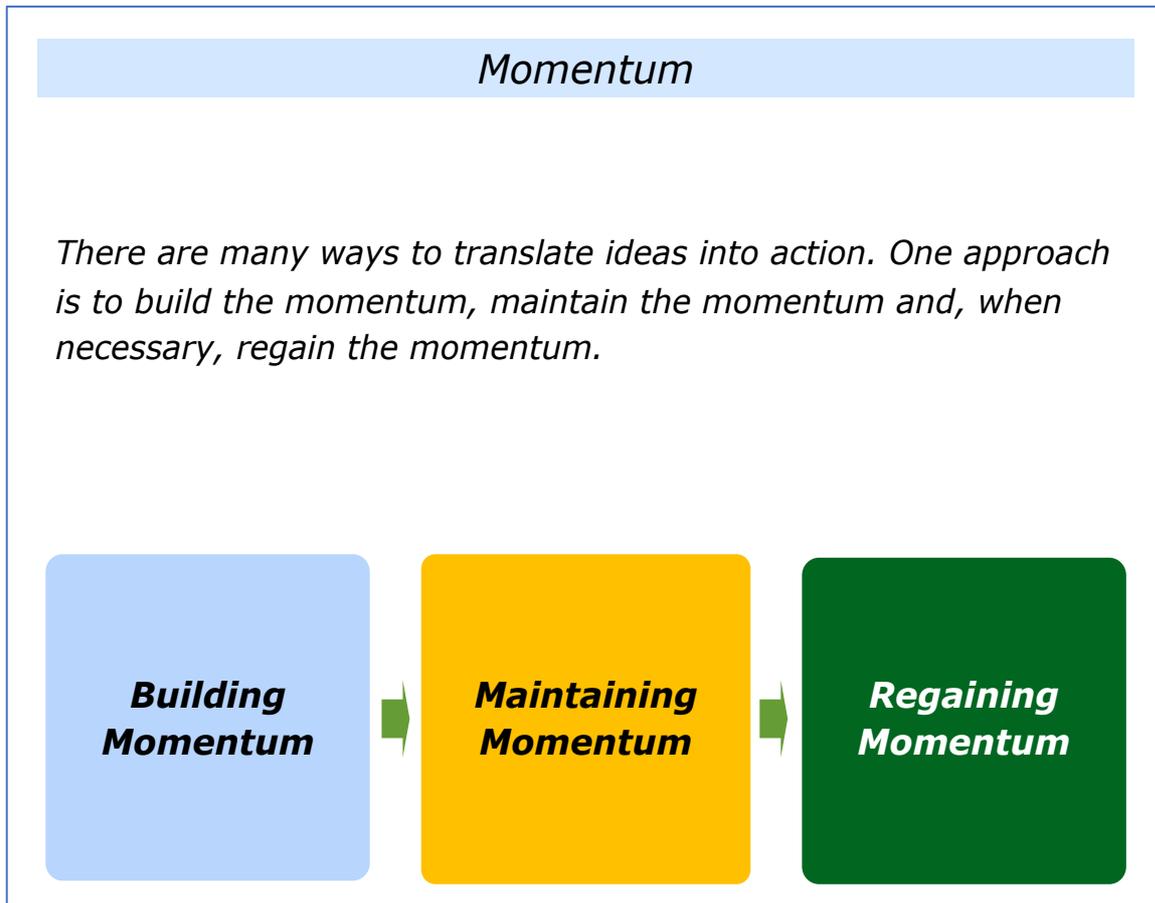

The specific things I can do then to help them to learn something personal, practical and profitable are:

*

*

*

The Momentum Approach

There are many ways to translate ideas into action. One approach is focus on what some people call the Big Mo. It is to build momentum, maintain momentum and, when necessary, regain momentum.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some follow certain principles that increase the chances of achieving success. Let's explore how this can be translated into action.

Building The Momentum

Some people are good at building momentum. They may aim to do this when developing a healthy lifestyle, doing a creative project, shifting an organisational culture or doing another activity.

Such people set things up to succeed. They start by clarifying the real results they want to achieve. They also clarify the benefits of achieving this picture of success.

They then plan ahead. Bearing in mind what they can control, they aim: a) to build on their personal or professional strengths; b) to follow principles that work; c) to do their best to get positive results.

They keep following their daily disciplines, do what works and get some early wins. Success breeds self-confidence and can lead to other successes.

Some people follow this approach in their personal lives by making a positive start to the day. They may wake up, focus on their goals and do something to encourage themselves or other people. They then feel more in charge of the day.

Good leaders follow a similar approach when aiming to shift a culture in an organisation. Such leaders sometimes take the following steps with their people:

They communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

They build on the positive people who want to follow the principles and enable them to produce some quick successes;

They communicate the successes stories that show how people have followed the principles and worked towards the picture of success.

Good leaders recognise that people buy success rather than the theory of success. They therefore build on the people who follow the principles and want to contribute to helping the organisation to achieve success.

Imagine that a person, team or organisation has built momentum. They may then move on to the next stage.

Maintaining The Momentum

The Big Mo is a term that is used in daily life, sports, business and other fields. It refers to how people can follow good habits and build momentum. This can carry them on a wave to achieving the desired results.

People who take this approach keep following the principles that will increase the chances of success. They maintain momentum rather than fall into the trap of declaring victory too early. Let's look at some examples.

The Principles Approach – One Day At A Time

This is an approach followed by people ranging from recovering addicts to peak performers. The keys are for the person:

To make the internal decision they want to follow certain principles – such as good habits – and get the benefits of achieving certain positive goals;

To keep following these principles one day at a time on the way towards achieving the positive goals;

To get successes and then plan how they want to follow the principles the next day towards achieving the positive goals.

People who take this approach keep focusing on the benefits. They do this to keep encouraging themselves on the journey towards achieving the positive goals.

The Principles Approach – Focusing On Continuous Improvement

Great workers, teams and organisations sometimes follow this approach to maintain the momentum. Some leaders also encourage their people to build on what they are doing well and also tackle areas for improvement. Such leaders may take the follow steps:

They keep producing success stories that show how people are following the principles and doing superb work:

They keep encouraging people to follow these principles plus also tackle areas for improvement;

They keep encouraging people to produce more success stories that show what good looks like when they translate the principles into action.

There are many ways to produce such success stories. Here is one framework that some people use to maintain the momentum.

The Success Story

The title of the success story is:

*

Specific Situation

The specific situation we faced – including the specific challenges and the desired picture of success - was:

*

*

*

Specific Principles

The specific principles we followed - and how we translated these into action - to tackle the situation and achieve the picture of success were:

*

*

*

Success

The specific results that were delivered were:

*

*

*

Shaping The Future

Here is a summary of: a) the specific things that worked and how we can follow these principles in the future b) the specific things we could do better in the future and how; c) the specific benefits of implementing these ideas.

*

*

*

Such leaders also keep people informed about the progress that is being made towards the picture of success. They tell people about the following things:

The specific things that have been achieved so far by following the principles on the way towards achieving the goals;

The specific future plans and how people can keep following the principles when working towards achieving the goals;

The specific future challenges and how people can follow the principles to tackle these successfully when working towards achieving the goals.

Great workers aim to keep following good habits. There may come a time, however, when they need to focus on to the next theme.

Regaining The Momentum

People can sometimes be knocked off-course. A person may experience a setback, a football team may concede an early goal, an organisation may be hit by market conditions.

Different people react in different ways when losing momentum. Some panic, some look for others to blame, some make hasty decisions that can result in collateral damage.

Great workers buy time in such situations. Staying calm, they act to stop any haemorrhaging. Looking ahead, they again clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success. They then take the following steps:

They clarify the principles they can follow in the situation to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success;

They rehearse how they can follow the appropriate principles and do their best to achieve the picture of success;

They translate these principles into action, get a quick success and aim to regain their momentum on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Stefan Edberg, the former Wimbledon Tennis Champion, said that he saw setbacks as an opportunity. Here is a summary of what he said.

"I sometimes actually welcome setbacks in a match because I know that my opponent will also have setbacks at some point. Being a resilient person, this gives me the chance to show that I can overcome setbacks better than other people."

Great teams go back to basics to regain their rhythm. Some organisations, for example, reverted back to their core business after Covid. They took the following steps to focus on regaining the Big Mo.

They aimed: a) to do what they did best; b) to focus on the customers with whom they worked best; c) to enable their people to do their best and deliver success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the momentum approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Momentum Approach

The specific situation in the future when I may want to follow elements of the momentum approach may be:

*

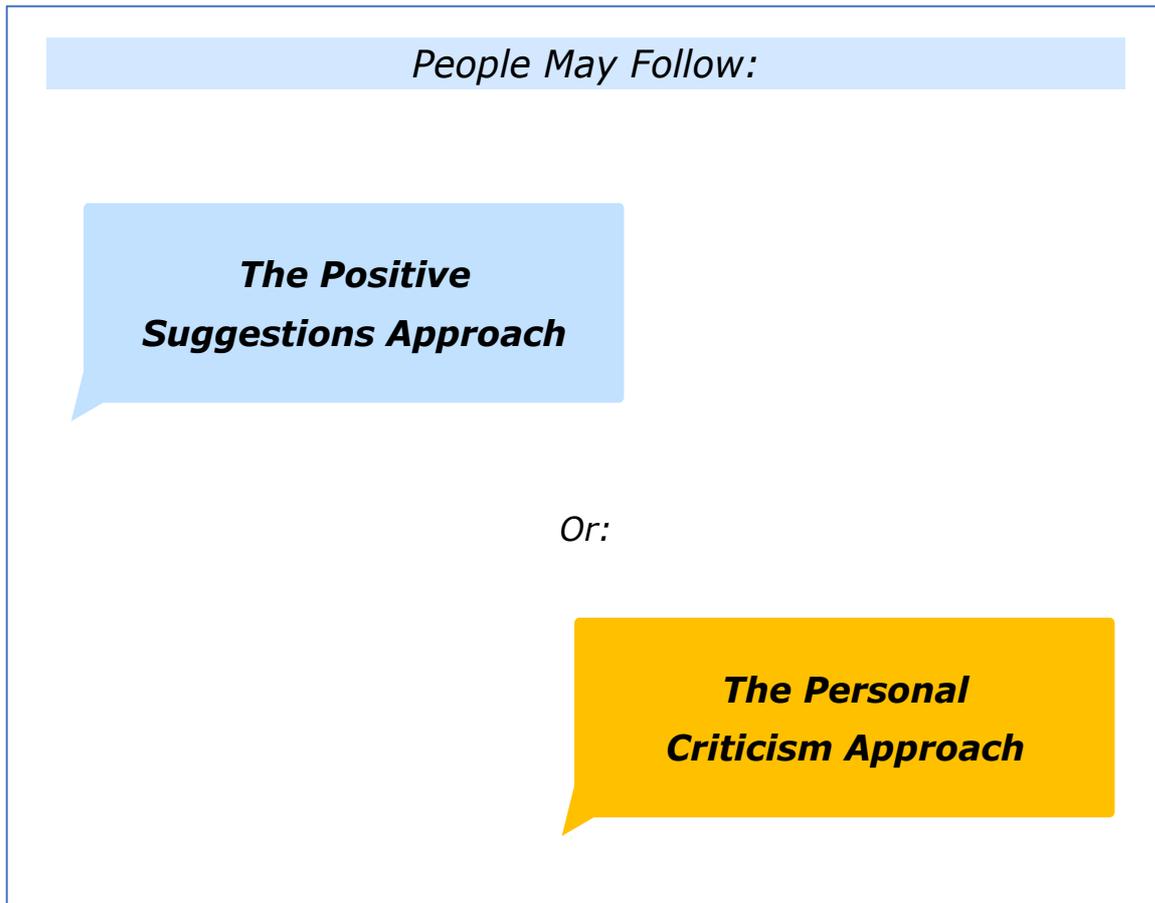

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Positive Suggestions Approach Rather Than The Personal Criticism Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the positive suggestions approach. They do this when focusing their own life and, but only when appropriate, offering positive suggestions to other people.

Some people take the personal criticism approach. They focus on what they see as other people's shortcomings. Some may be addicted to criticising other people.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action.

The Positive Suggestions Approach

People who take this approach often have a positive attitude. They want to build on the best in themselves and other people. They focus on what people do well and how they can build on these things in the future. Such people focus on continuous improvement in their own life. They may encounter situations where other people can improve, but they are careful about when and how to share these ideas.

There are many ways to follow the positive suggestions approach. Some people focus on the following themes.

Positive Suggestions For Themselves

Some people follow this approach in both their personal and professional lives. Different people do this in different ways. Some take the following steps.

They build on the best things in life. They count their blessings, have a sense of gratitude and appreciate life. They often reflect on what they have enjoyed that day and how to keep doing these things.

Such people build on their strengths, passions and what gives them positive energy. They aim to do more of these things in ways that help themselves and other people.

They love to encourage other people. They focus on other people's strengths, what they do well and when they come alive. They encourage people to do more of these things in the future.

Such people embody the concept of continuous improvement. They clarify what they can do better and how. They then aim to implement these ideas in their personal or professional life.

Positive Suggestions For Tackling Challenges

Some people are lifelong learners and love to explore positive suggestions for tackling challenges. They may do this in both their personal and professional lives.

Different people do this in different ways. They may read books, scour the internet or learn from educators. They study success and see what works. Some do this by focus on the following themes.

What is the challenge I want to tackle? What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals?

Looking at my own life, when have I tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did I do right then? What were the principles I followed? How did I translate these into action? What happened as a result?

Looking at other people's lives and work, when have they tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action? What happened as a result?

Looking around the world, what may be some of the positive approaches that people or organisations are taking to tackling such challenges? What are they doing to translate these ideas into action? What may be some of the positive results?

Looking at all this information, what are the strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How could I translate these into action? How could I do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Lifelong learners love to keep adding strategies, skills and solutions to their repertoire. They then have more ideas they can use to get positive results.

Positive Suggestions For Other People

Some people encourage others to keep building on their strengths. There may be times, however, when they consider offering positive suggestions, options or alternatives to people. Let's look at how they may do this in different situations.

Positive Suggestions In Professional Life

Some people may follow this approach in certain professional situations. They aim to be encouraging when doing this, however, and only do so when appropriate.

Imagine a mentor or coach has watched a person in action or seen an example of their work. They may then explore some of the following themes before making any suggestions.

Looking at what the person is doing, what are their real results they want to achieve? What are they doing well and how can they do more of these things in the future? What could they do better and how?

What do I want to do in this situation? Do I want to stay quiet or offer ideas? If I want to offer ideas, how can I do this in a way that the person can accept and use to achieve their desired results?

Such people may also follow certain guidelines when offering positive suggestions, options or alternatives. This may involve taking the following steps.

They ask the person if it is okay for them to share some ideas

This is an approach taken by some mentors. They create an encouraging environment in which a person feels at ease. Focusing on the first topic the person wants to explore, they clarify the real results they want to achieve.

The mentor may then help the person to explore the possible strategies going forward and the consequences of each option. Then, at a certain point, they may say something like:

"Is it okay for me to share some ideas?"

This is vital because it is important to get the person's psychological permission to share ideas. Imagine that the person says this is okay. The mentor then aims to pass on ideas that the person may be able to use in their own way.

*They focus on the future
when sharing the ideas*

A mentor may sometimes explore the person's past but mainly to find their successful pattern. They then focus on what the person did right to tackle a challenge successfully or achieve a specific goal.

It is important to focus on the future, however, because there is little a person can do to change the past. But there may be things a person can do to shape a positive future.

Let's assume a mentor, for example, has asked a person if it is okay for them to share some ideas. Bearing in mind the results a person wants to achieve, they may use some of the following phrases.

"Looking to the future, here are some possible options you may want to consider ..."

"Looking to the future, one approach you may wish to consider is ..."

"Looking to the future, an alternative approach could be ..."

Good mentors look to see if any of the ideas resonate with a person. If so, they ask if it would be useful to explore these further. This can lead to a person beginning to clarify how they can use some of the ideas in their own way.

Such mentors also recognise, however, that a person may need time to reflect. This is particularly the case with somebody who is an introvert who wants to let things sink in before moving into action.

They emphasise it is up to the person whether they want to apply any of these ideas in their own way

Good mentors may share ideas, options and alternatives but they also follow a certain rule. They emphasise that it is up to the person to decide if they want to implement any of the ideas in their own way.

The person must believe in the idea. It is their life or work. There may come a point, however, where they also ask for help in translating the ideas into action.

The example described above may work when a person wants to explore possible suggestions. It can be more challenging, of course, if a person has previously behaved in a way that has caused problems for other people.

The person's manager, for example, may then offer the person a positive alternative about how they can choose to behave in the future. They may say something along the following lines.

"Looking ahead, one option is for you to behave in a professional way by doing the following things ... This could help other people and also yourself in the following ways ...

"The other option is for you to behave in another way that will not help yourself or other people.

"Let me know which option you would like to follow in the future. Then we can go from there."

Such an approach sounds tough: but it is also positive and clear. It offers a person the chance to consider whether they want to behave in a professional way. If so, there will be benefits. If not, then there will be consequences.

Positive Suggestions In Personal Life

The positive suggestions approach can work well in a professional situation but it can be more sensitive in personal relationships. There may be many emotions involved and it is important to remember the old rule:

You can't do therapy in your own family.

There may be some personal situations, however, where a person wants to offer somebody else a positive suggestion. They may want either:

To encourage a person to keep building on what they do well;

To encourage a person to consider behaving in another way in the future.

People who take this approach may also consider two things. First, to make sure they do not come across as patronising or trying to fix the other person. Second, to recognise the different kinds of scenarios where this may or may not be appropriate. Let's explore these themes.

The Positive Scenario

Imagine that somebody wants to encourage a person to build on what they are doing well. Before saying anything, they may explore the following themes.

What is the other person doing well? Do I want to encourage them to do more of these things? Would it be appropriate in this situation? If so, how can I encourage them in a positive way?

The Positive Alternative Scenario

Imagine that somebody wants to encourage a person to consider behaving in another way in the future. Before saying anything, they may explore the following themes.

What is the other person doing? Would I like them to behave in another way? If so, how would I like them to behave in the future? What would be the positive benefits for them or myself?

Do I actually want to suggest a positive alternative? If so, when would be the appropriate time? What would I like to say to the person? How could I put this in a positive way that the person is more likely to consider or accept?

Different people are comfortable with using different phrases when taking this approach. One person may offer a positive alternative to somebody by saying something along the following lines:

"In the future, I wonder if it would be possible for you to ..."

What happens if the other person says they are not interested or replies in a negative way? Then it may be best to leave it rather than get into an argument. But at least a positive alternative has been offered.

Some people follow the positive suggestions approach in their lives and work. Some people choose to take another route.

The Personal Criticism Approach

Some people follow the personal criticism approach. They focus on what they see as other people's shortcomings. Some may be addicted to criticising other people.

They believe they are right and that others are wrong. Some get a kick from criticising others. Whilst they may feel justified, they can spread negativity. This can create collateral damage.

Some people spend much of their lives following this approach. They may do so as politicians, observer critics or keyboard warriors. Whilst they may feel superior, they do not spread happiness.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive suggestions approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Suggestions Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

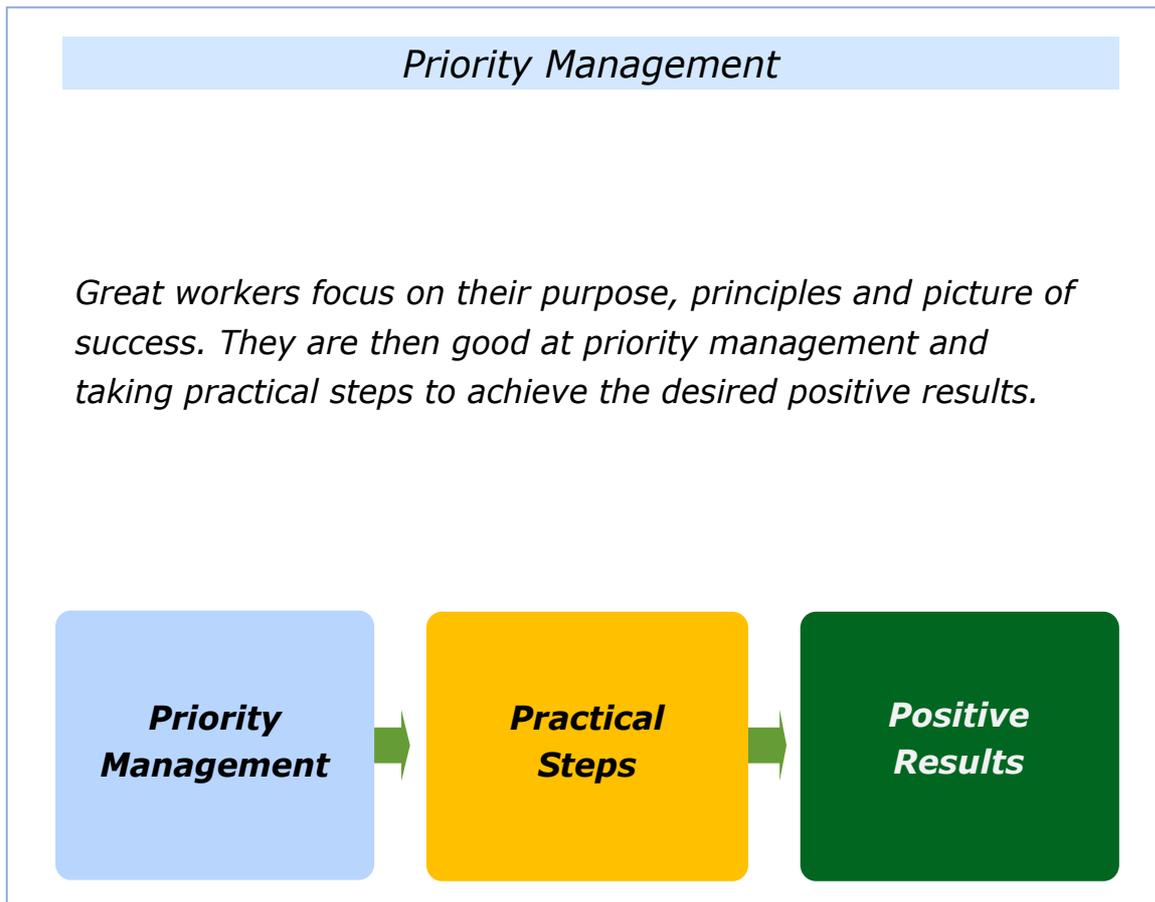

The specific things I can do then to follow it in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Priority Management Approach

Great workers focus on their purpose, principles and picture of success. They are then good at priority management and taking practical steps to achieve positive results. Let's explore how to this works in action.

Imagine that a person is clear on their purpose and the principles they want to follow. They may then translate this into doing a specific piece of work – such as a creative project or working to achieve a compelling goal.

Such workers then establish clarity. They clarify the specific results to achieve and translate these into a clear picture of success. They also clarify the strategies they want to follow and the benefits of achieving the goals.

Different people do this in different ways. Some people use the following framework. You would, of course, have your own approach to setting clear goals.

The Picture Of Success

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The Specific Results

The specific results I want to achieve by doing this piece of work are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Specific Strategies

The specific strategies I can follow to increase the chances of delivering these results are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Specific Benefits

The specific benefits – to all the various stakeholders – of delivering these results will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Imagine that a person has clarified these things. They will then move on to the next stage.

Priority Management

Priority management is one of the keys to doing effective work. Some people talk about the importance of time management. That is fine, but it is vital:

To focus on the key things to do – in order of priority – that will increase the chances of achieving the goals.

Great workers are good priority management. Bearing these priorities mind, they then do effective work by channelling their time and energies properly to deliver the goods.

Different people use different models for clarifying the key priorities. Some people work through the following stages.

Priority Management

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The Top Priorities – The First Priorities

The first set of priorities I need to focus on in order to deliver the desired results are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The Second Priorities

The second set of priorities I need to focus on in order to deliver the desired results are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The Third Priorities

The third set of priorities I need to focus on in order to deliver the desired results are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

As mentioned earlier, different people use different frameworks for clarifying their priorities. The following section describe some of these approaches. Whatever model a person uses, however, one of the keys is to ask:

"What are the top priorities I need to focus on in order to increase the chances of success?"

The Focusing On Your Life Goals Approach

Positive people aim to build on what they can control and manage what they can't. They also keep focusing on their life goals.

There have been many books on this topic. One of the most influential was Alan Lakein's 1970 book How To Get Control Of Your Time And Your Life. These ideas seem commonplace now, but many people found them helpful. Here are some ideas from the book.

Keep focusing on your lifetime goals – put these in a place where you can see these each day.

Clarify your A, B and C priorities – remember these may evolve over time.

Focus on your top priorities – do something towards these each day and get some quick successes.

Do weekly & daily planning – schedule your time so you have the chance to do things properly.

Cross off items as you do them – this will give you the feeling of success.

Ask Alan Lakein's question:

"What is the best use of my time right now?"

The following pages show one way that a person can apply Alan's approach. This can also help them with their priority management. A person can use this:

To focus on their life goals – such as clarifying their A, B and C goals together with the sub-goals under each category;

To focus on their priorities – such as the specific actions they want to take towards achieving their A, B and C goals.

Different people applied Alan's ideas in different way. The next pages describe one framework that people use to focus on their priorities.

My Life Goals

The following pages describe the three main goals I want to work towards achieving in my life.

These are listed as my A, B and C goals – together with the sub-goals under each of these.

Therefore I have my A1, A2, A3 goals and so on.

The Three Main Goals I Want To Work Towards Achieving In My Life Are:

A) To ...

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

B) To ...

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

C) To ...

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

My Priorities

The following pages describe the specific actions I want to take towards achieving each of my goals.

The top priority will be work towards my A goals, then my B goals, then my C goals.

The Priorities – The Actions I Want To Take Towards Achieving Each Of These Goals Are:

A) To ...

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

B) To ...

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

C) To ...

1) To ...

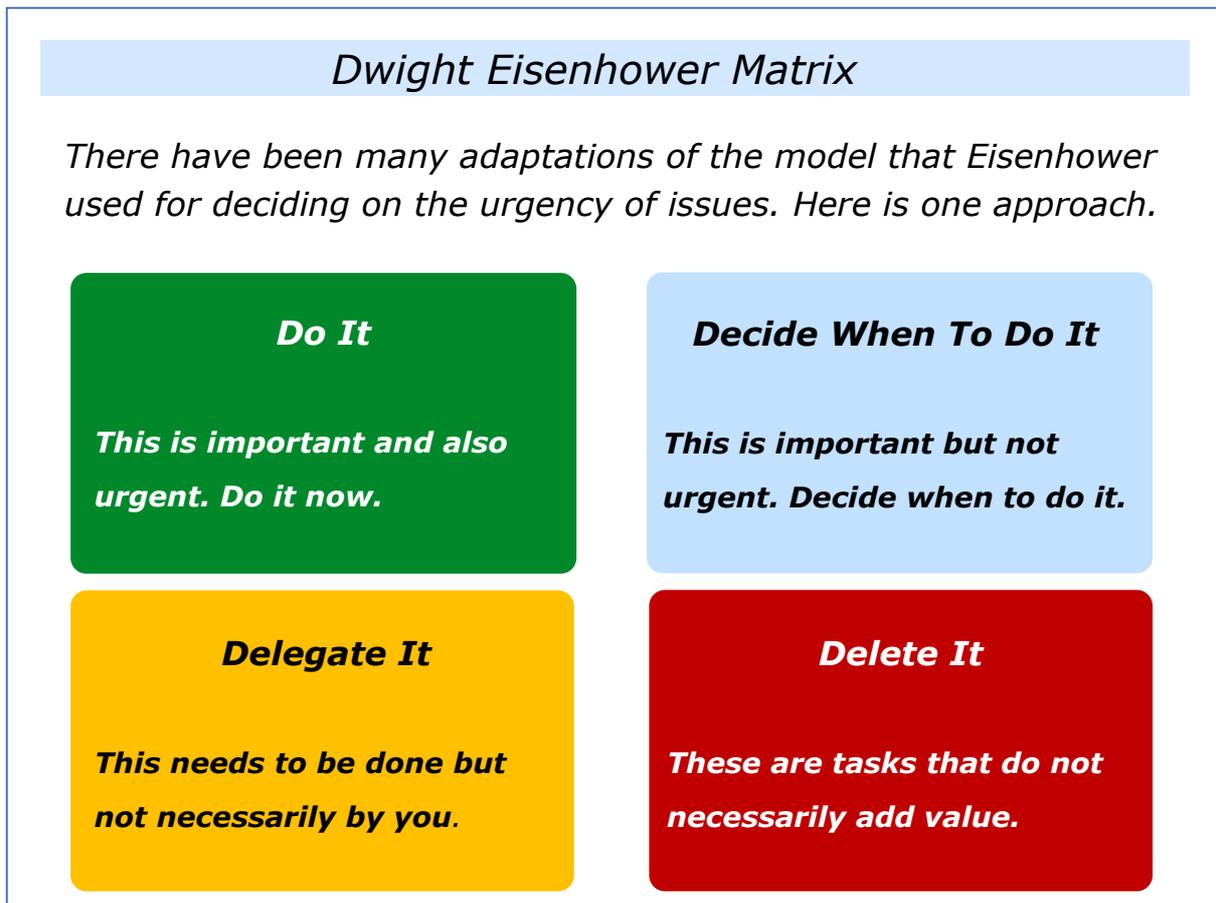

2) To ...

3) To ...

The Dwight Eisenhower Matrix

President Eisenhower had an approach that has since been adapted and developed by other people. One model was popularised by Stephen Covey in his book The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People.

The approach divides tasks into certain quadrants based on the importance and urgency. You can then look at each task and choose which action you want to take. Here is one adaptation of the model.

Imagine that a person has clarified the priorities they want to focus on to do a piece of work. They may then move on to the next stage.

Practical Steps

Great workers focus on their priorities and take practical steps to make these happen. Different people do this in different ways. Some explore the following themes.

Bearing in mind the results to achieve, what is the first priority I want to focus on? What are the practical steps I can take to make this happen and work towards the goals?

What are the key strategies I can follow to increase the chances of success? How can I translate these into action? How can I get a quick win? How can I then do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Great workers may use the following framework for taking practical steps to pursue their first priority. They then expand this to cover the other priorities.

Practical Steps

The specific piece of work I want to do is:

*

The Top Priorities – The First Priorities

The first thing I want to focus on is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to take practical steps to making this happen are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The next thing I want to focus on is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to take practical steps to making this happen are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The next thing I want to focus on is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to take practical steps to making this happen are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Positive Results

Great workers pursue each of the priorities and do they best to achieve the desired positive results. They also take time to reflect and make sure they are still focusing on the things that are most likely to deliver the goods.

Different people do this in different ways. Some use the following framework: a) to perform superb work; b) to continue to focus on priority management. They explore the following themes.

Performing Superb Work

Bearing in mind the priority I am pursuing, how can I continue to perform superb work? What am I doing well? How can I build on these things? What can I do better and how? What else can I do to pursue this priority and achieve the desired positive results?

Priority Management

Bearing in mind the piece of work I am doing, is it still relevant to work towards delivering the original specific results? Has anything happened to mean that the aims have changed or evolved?

If so, what is the new picture of success? What are the key priorities I need to focus on to deliver these results? How can focus on these priorities and do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Great workers continue to perform superb work but they also recognise that things can evolve. Bearing this in mind, they continue to focus on the key priorities that are likely to deliver the goods.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of the priority management approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Priority Management

*The specific piece of work
I may want to do may be:*

*

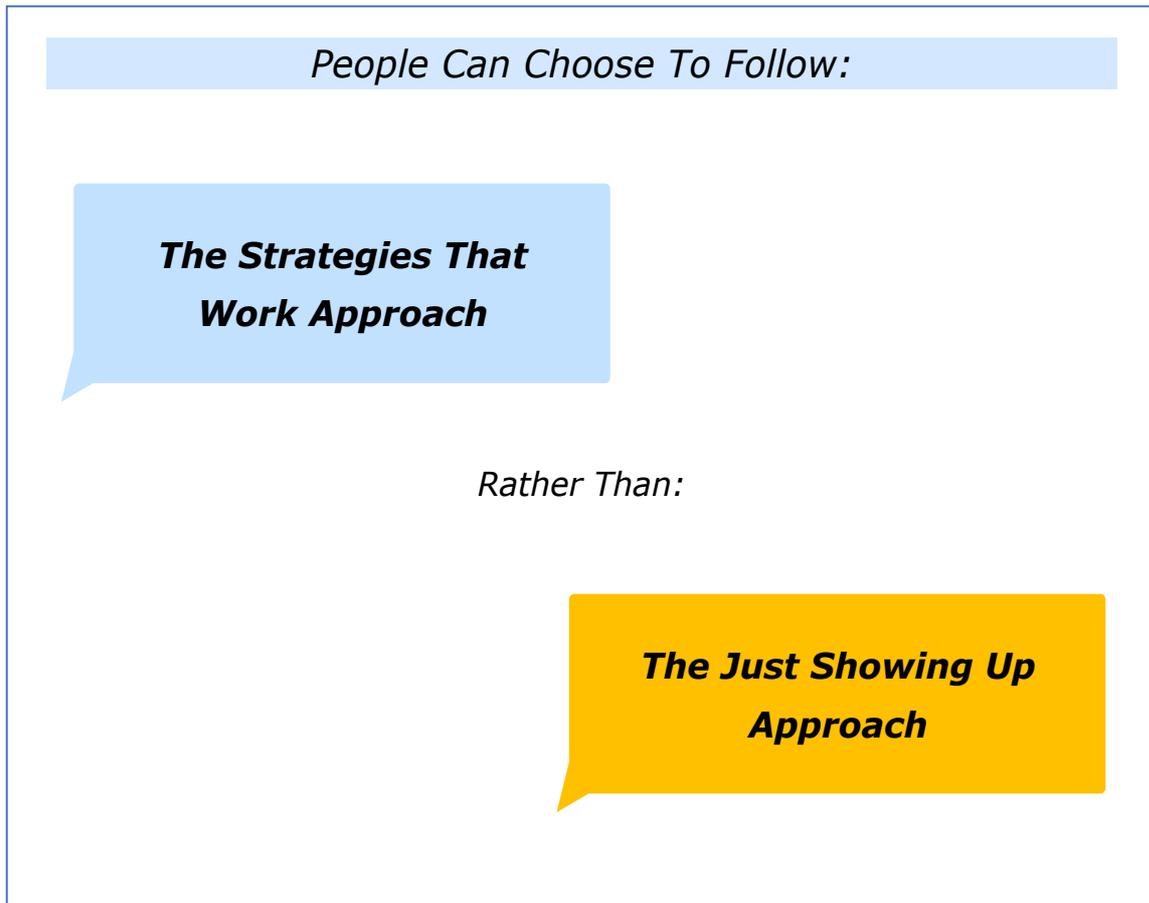

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of the priority management approach in my own way are:

* To ... :

* To ...

* To ...

The Strategies That Work Approach Rather Than The Just Showing Up Approach

Great workers often follow the strategies that work approach rather than the just showing up approach. One person expressed this in the following way.

"When I was younger I sometimes turned up and used my talent to busk it. But I then reached the stage when this was not good enough and I got caught out.

"I now take the approach that preparing properly increases the chances of producing peak performances. This is my version of the old 7P military saying: Proper Planning and Preparation Prevent Piss Poor Performance."

There are many ways to prepare properly for different events. You may take this step before doing fine work, communicating with people, having challenging meetings or doing other activities.

One approach is to focus on strategies that work rather than just showing up at the event. Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

You can clarify the picture of success

Imagine that you are preparing for an event. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, the first step will be to clarify the real results you want to achieve – the picture of success.

The strategies you focus on will depend on your role and the type of event. Let's look at some examples.

You may be a person who is going for interview and aim to do your best to get a job;

You may be a leader who aims to communicate the team's strategy and build with the people who want to contribute towards achieving the goals;

You may be a doctor who is going to share challenging news and outline the possible options to a patient;

You may be preparing for another kind of event where you want to increase the chances of achieving success.

Great workers do lots of research when preparing properly. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they clarify the real results they want to achieve. They then translate this into a clear picture of success.

As mentioned earlier, much depends on the specific event. Whatever the situation, however, there are certain themes it can be useful to explore when clarifying the aims. Here is a summary of these themes.

You Can Clarify The Picture Of Success

- One approach is to start by clarifying your aims. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, you can explore the following themes.
- What may be the specific piece of work I want to do or the situation where I want to achieve certain goals? What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success?
- What will be happening that will show I have achieved the goals? What will be the benefits of achieving the aims? What may be actual words that people are saying that will show I have achieved the goals?

You can clarify the strategies that work and are most likely to achieve the picture of success

Imagine that you have prepared to do a piece of work and have clarified the aims. The next step is to focus on the strategies you want to follow to achieve the picture of success.

Sometimes it can be tempting to launch into brainstorming the possible strategies. Sometimes this can work, but sometimes it can be useful to take another approach. Bearing in mind the results you want to achieve, you can explore the following themes.

When have I or other people tackled a similar situation successfully? What did I or they do right then? What were the principles that were followed? How were these translated these into action? What happened as result?

How can I follow some of these principles – plus maybe add other skills - in the present situation? What other things are likely to work in the situation?

What are the key strategies I can follow to increase the likelihood of success? How can I follow these in my own way? What else can I do to do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Different people follow this approach in different situations. Let's look at some examples.

A growing company was failing to win as many business pitches as it did in its early days. They tackled this problem by holding inquiries into what had gone wrong but this did not seem to work. They then tried another approach.

Looking back, they had won lots of business during the company's early days. Bearing this in mind, they focused on what they had done right then. This included taking the following steps.

They were hungry for the business ... They had done lots of research about the potential client and the challenges they faced ... They had clarified how their company could help the client to achieve success.

They had put together a superb pitch team ... They had connected with the client to make sure they understood what the client wanted the pitch to focus on ... They had prepared properly and rehearsed the pitch.

They had begun the pitch by focusing the client's goals rather than bigging up their own company ... They had given specific examples that resonated with the client ... They had shown how they could help the client to succeed.

The company could follow these strategies again - plus maybe add other skills. They returned to putting together hungry pitch teams that connected with the clients and prepared properly. These teams went on to improve the company's success rate in getting new business.

There are many other examples of how people can focus on following strategies that work. Let's look at another example.

A leader charged with creating a more professional culture started by communicating the company's purpose, principles and picture of success. They then built on the people who wanted to contribute towards achieving the goals.

The leader worked with these people to produce success stories that showed how they had followed the professional principles to do superb work. These stories showed what good looked like.

They maintained momentum by continuing to build on the people who wanted to follow the principles. They replaced those who chose not to follow the principles but handled this in a fair and generous way.

The company's culture became more professional, customer focused and successful. This approach was more effective than spending lots of time trying to change people who did not want to follow the principles.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you know the results you want to achieve. Bearing these in mind, you can clarify the strategies that are most likely to work.

You can then build on these strategies and, if appropriate, add other skills. As mentioned earlier, one approach is to explore the following themes. You can then settle on the strategies you want to follow to achieve the picture of success.

You Can Clarify The Strategies That Work And Are Most Likely To Achieve Success

- One approach is focus on the picture of success. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, it is then to explore the following themes.
- What are the strategies that work in this kind of situation? When have I or other people tackled a similar challenge successfully? What were the principles I or they followed? How can I follow these plus add other skills in this situation?
- What are the key strategies I can therefore follow to increase the chances of success? What are the potential challenge and how can I prevent or manage these? What else can I do to do my best to achieve the picture of success?

You can clarify your action plan and then do your best to achieve the picture of success

Imagine that you have settled on your strategies. You can then translate these into a clear action plan. The next step will be to get some early successes, perform superb work and deliver consistently high standards.

You can also focus on continuous improvement. You can then follow your successful pattern for finishing and do your best to achieve the desired picture of success.

Different people take these steps in different ways. Much depends on the kind of specific results they are aiming to deliver. Let's look at one example.

A senior leader was having difficulties in their relationship with the CEO. They often had strong views on subjects but found it difficult to express these in a way that had a positive impact. They described this in the following way.

"The CEO does not like it when I challenge them. They go through the motions of listening but do not take things on board. This can be difficult, especially when the team makes decisions that are wrong."

The senior leader's challenging approach was not working. Bearing this in mind, we focused on the real results they wanted to achieve. This could be summarised in the following way.

They wanted their knowledge to be respected and, when appropriate, taking into account when making decisions.

We explored the strategies that could increase the chances of their views being respected. This involved the senior leader taking a more positive role rather than that of continually challenging people.

Looking ahead, we focused on a forthcoming one-to-one session they were going to have with the CEO. This would involve discussing a specific project the company planned to do.

The senior leader had reservations about the company's plan and would normally challenge the approach. After some discussion, they decided to try another route. This involved them taking the following steps.

They would contact the CEO ahead of time to agree on the topics to explore in the one-to-one.

They would focus on what the CEO wanted to discuss and also say that, if there was time, there were some topics they would like to discuss to help the business achieve success.

They would make the meeting about the CEO's agenda and helping them and the business to achieve success.

They would, if time permitted, ask if it was okay to explore the specific project that they has strong views about but they would then behave in a certain way.

They would focus on the results the project aimed to achieve and, instead of challenging the present plan, ask if it was okay for them to outline the possible options for working to achieve the results.

They would, in a considered way, describe what they saw as the pluses and minuses of each option. They would ask the CEO if there were any other potential options.

They would be happy to give their recommendation but they would, of course, aim to make their best contribution to whatever route the leadership team chose to pursue.

The senior leader translated this approach into action. Whilst sometimes needing to bite their tongue, they found the session to be rewarding. It also helped to improve their relationship with the CEO.

Whilst they still had some reservations about the project, they adopted a similar approach in their interactions with colleagues. Instead of challenging people, they looked to the future and offered options.

The senior leader wanted to keep their integrity so there might come a point where they dug their heels in. They took a more positive role in the C-suite, however, and this resulted in more people respecting their knowledge.

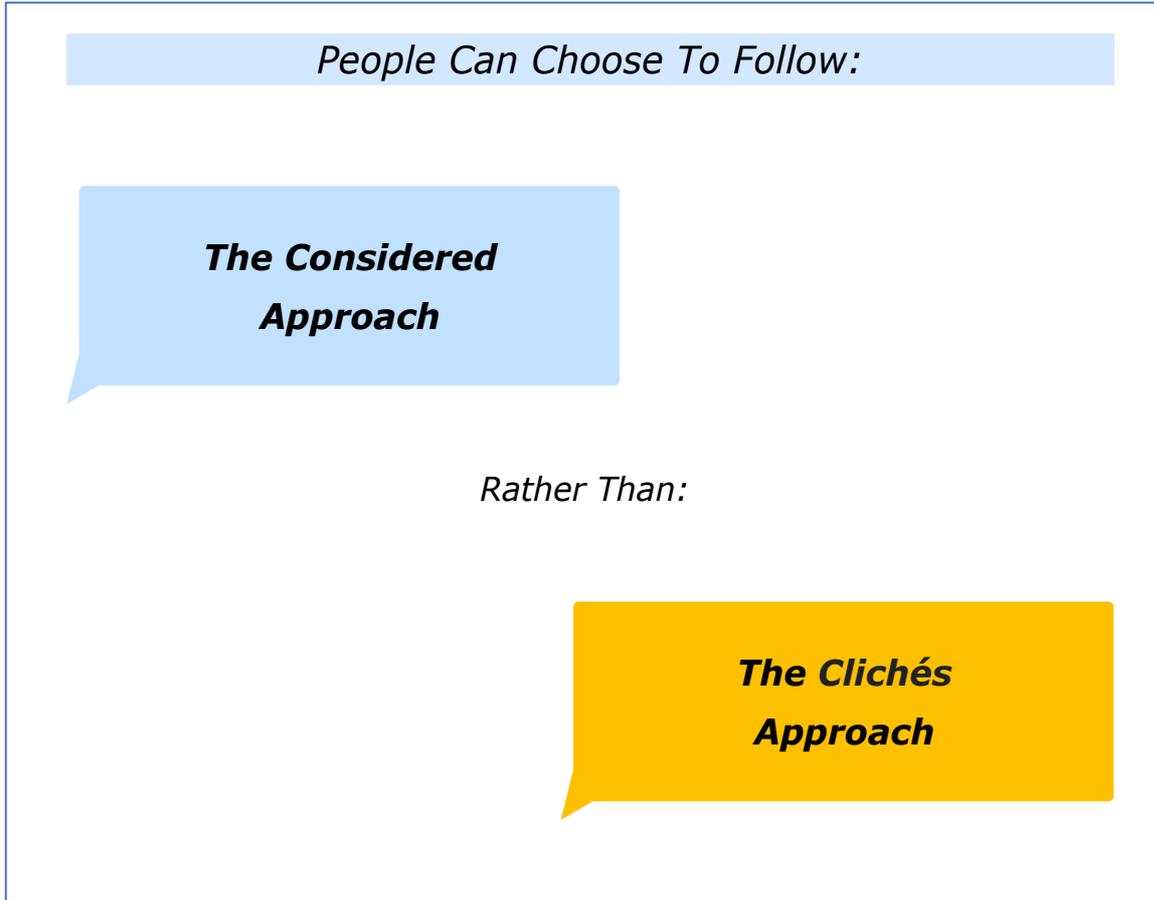

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to follow strategies that work rather than just show up and busk it. You will, of course, follow this approach in your own way.

Imagine you have clarified the strategies you want to follow. Here is a summary of the themes you may want to explore before moving into action. You can then do your best to achieve the desired picture of success.

You Can Clarify Your Action Plan And Then Do Your Best To Achieve The Picture Of Success

- One approach is focus on the picture of success. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, it is then to explore the following themes.
- How can I translate my chosen strategies into a clear action plan? How can I rehearse what I am going to do? How can I get an early success, perform superb work and deliver consistently high standards?
- How can I focus on continuous improvement? How can I buy time to think to find solutions to unexpected challenges? How can I follow my successful pattern for finishing? How can I do my best to achieve the picture of success?

The Considered Approach Rather Than The Clichés Approach

There are many ways to make sense of life and make decisions. Some people aim to follow the considered approach rather than the cut and paste clichés approach.

People who follow the first approach aim to be considered, clear and sometimes even creative. They take this approach when making sense of experiences, communicating with other people or aiming to do good work.

People who follow the second approach may respond quickly to issues by using a list of clichés or sound bites. They may or may not have a full understanding of a situation.

People who follow the considered approach may also communicate in a compelling way. They may do this by giving a full view of the situation, however, and then bringing it to life with real examples. Let's look at these different approaches.

The Considered Approach

People who take this approach may sometimes appear to be sages. They tend to see themselves as lifetime students, however, who still have a lot to learn.

They make decisions in a considered way. They gather information, clarify the goals to achieve and explore the possible options going forwards. When appropriate, they pursue the option most likely to achieve success.

Such people see themselves as small in the great sweep of history. They may study some topics in depth and see the big picture. They also see patterns and how things are connected.

They study what works, test what works and share what works. They may also find creative solutions to challenges. When appropriate, they may pass on this knowledge to help people to achieve their goals.

Some people who take this approach are good at communicating with certain kinds of people. They move from explaining the concept to giving concrete examples that bring the ideas to life.

Such people often have strong beliefs but they try to remain humble. They recognise that there are many ways to live life. They therefore try to pass on ideas in a considered way that respects other people.

The Clichés Approach

People who take this approach sometimes talk in cut and paste clichés. They may have heard a sound bite or a slogan they like. They may then apply it without fully understanding the complexities of a situation.

Some politicians follow this approach. They may be continually in campaign mode. They may not know how to coordinate things in real life, however, or deliver the desired concrete results.

They may simply repeat slogans without substance. When asked to give a real life example, or be confronted by one, they resort to repeating the slogan or try to bluster their way through.

Some individuals aspire to be what they call 'the smartest person in the room' by repeating sound bites from the latest article they have read. They may also use cliches such as 'thinking outside the box'. They may find it difficult, however, when asked to give a concrete example.

There are times, of course, when there are elements of truth in a cliché – which is why it has become a cliché. It can be important for a person to show they understand the full picture, however, and give evidence about why the cliché applies to that situation.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the considered approach? How could you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Considered Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Defining What A Person Actually Does And Delivers Approach

Defining A Person's Contribution

There are many ways to define a person's contribution. One approach is to focus on what a person actually does and delivers.

Does. The specific things that the person actually does are:

They ...

They ...

They ...

Delivers. The specific things that the person actually delivers are:

They ...

They ...

They ...

There are many ways to define a person's contribution. One approach is to focus on what the person actually does and delivers. It is to focus on these things rather than what a person says they do.

Let's explore how this approach can be translated into action. Imagine that you aim fill a specific position in a company.

The first step will be to define the specific results – the outcomes - you want a person to deliver in the role. The next step will be to find a person who is likely to deliver these results

Whilst the role may be advertised externally, imagine that you want to begin by focusing on two internal applicants. When looking at each person, you can aim:

To clarify what a person actually does and delivers in their work;

To clarify whether a person has the attitude and ability required to deliver the desired results in the role.

If you are looking externally, it will also be vital to do similar extensive research when considering applicants. This may take time and also involve inviting a person to do certain kinds of prework.

The following section describes how you can apply this approach when looking at two people you know. It describes what may be extreme examples. But you will obviously apply your own observations when considering each person's previous and present work.

Imagine that you are looking at Person A and Person B. Below may be some of the things that they do and deliver. (Again, these may be extreme examples, but you will obviously have your own examples when looking at individuals.)

Person A

Does. The specific things that the person actually does are:

They have a positive attitude and encourage people. They make positive contributions to meetings. They are good at providing possible suggestions to tackling challenges.

They are proactive, think ahead and make clear working contracts with people. They keep their key stakeholders informed about what is happening. They think strategically about what is good for the company.

They help to create a good atmosphere in the office. They are upbeat but thoughtful when it comes to managing challenges. They are also prepared to tackle difficult people issues and find solutions.

Delivers. The specific things that the person actually delivers are:

They achieve their performance targets. They are good with customers and deliver high levels of customer satisfaction. This often leads to getting repeat business.

They have acted as good mentors for new joiners. They taught these people about the Dos and Don'ts for making their best contributions to the company. They have also led several excellent modules on our academy for new managers.

They have a track record of leading successful project teams. They have led teams that successfully launched two new products. They also led a team that successfully integrated a business that we had acquired.

Person B

Does. The specific things that the person actually does are:

They tend to be theoretical in the way they speak. They are good at outlining concepts but find it hard to show how these can be applied in a concrete way.

They have a tendency to point out problems in the company and whilst only sometimes moving on to exploring solutions. This means that people stop listening to their views.

They often talk about their department's issues – they lead a team of specialists – and the problems they face. They don't seem to think strategically in terms of focusing on the company's goals.

Delivers. The specific things that the person actually delivers are:

They deliver good work within their specialist area of expertise. They sometimes need to be reminded, however, that it is important to focus on the whole company's goals.

They deliver mixed morale scores in their department. This is partly because they lead a group of specialists who sometimes want to focus on their own agenda. But there are things they could do to improve the morale.

They deliver mixed results in terms of their department's relationships with various stakeholders within the company. They sometimes talk about why things can't be done rather than try to satisfy their internal customers.

Imagine that you have done such an exercise when looking at several candidates. You will then make a decision regarding the likelihood of a person having the attitude and ability required to deliver the desired results.

There are many models for defining a person's past or potential contribution. One approach is to clarify what a person actually does and delivers. This is because their previous behaviour can be a good predictor to how they may behave in the future.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Defining What A Person Actually Does And Delivers Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

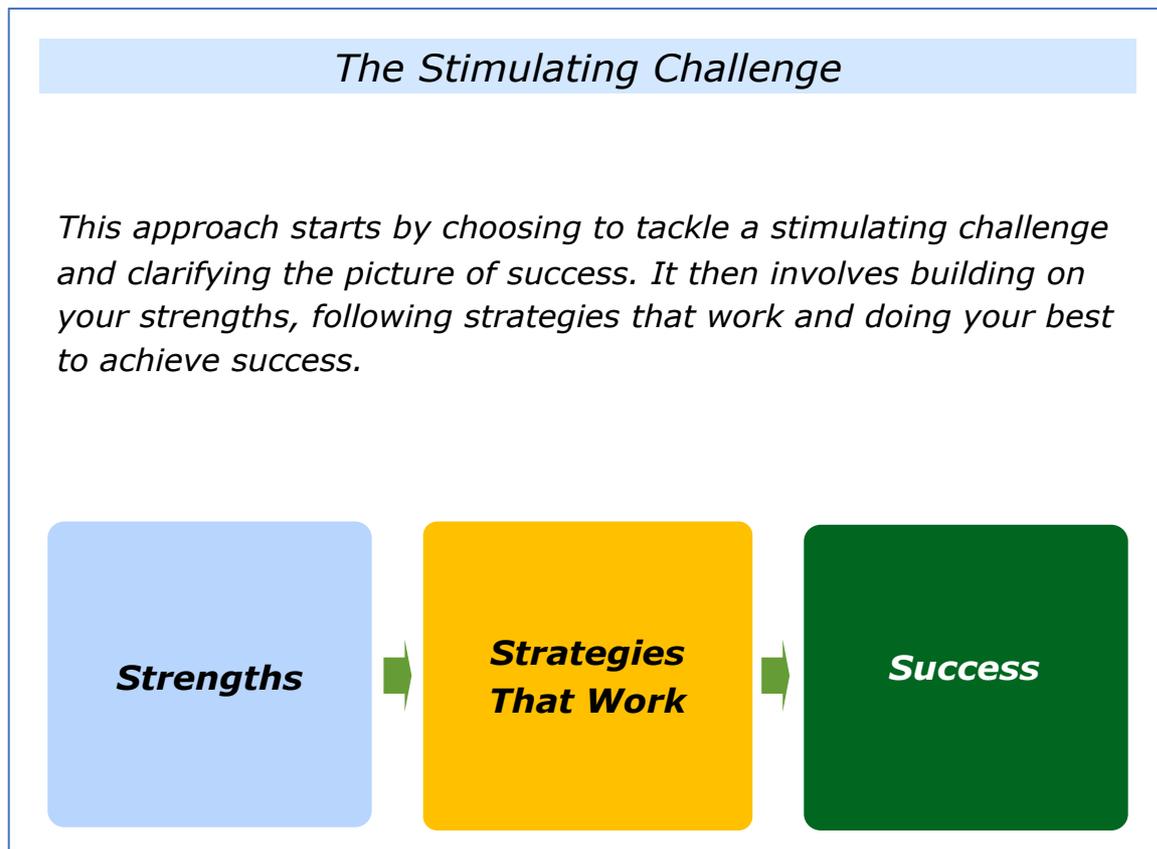

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Stimulating Challenge Approach

This approach starts by choosing to tackle a stimulating challenge and clarifying your goals. It then involves building on your strengths, following strategies that work and doing your best to achieve success.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you followed elements of this approach? This could have been something you did in your personal or professional life.

You may have been aiming to improve your health, find a job or do a creative project. You may have been managing a crisis, tackling a problem or doing another activity.

What motivated you to tackle the challenge? How did you clarify your goals? How did you then to your best to achieve the picture of success? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stimulating Challenge Approach In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I followed elements of this approach was:

*

*The specific things I did then to follow
this approach in my own way were:*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in the future. If appropriate, you may wish to take the following steps.

You Can Choose To Tackle What You Define As A Stimulating Challenge

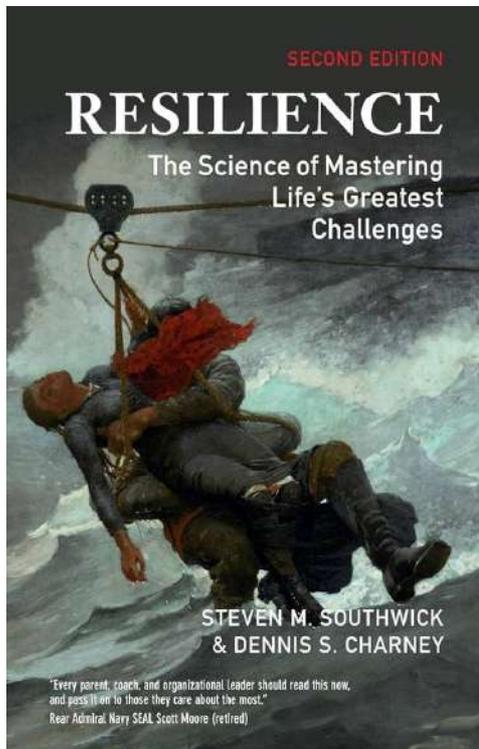

This step involves two interrelated parts. It involves: a) you choosing to tackle a specific challenge; b) you choosing to define it as a stimulating challenge. Different people take such decisions for different reasons.

Some people aim to take more control of their lives. They then reframe the situation in a positive way. They see how tackling a specific challenge will bring more pleasure, less pain or have other positive benefits.

Some people choose to take responsibility out of a sense of duty. They look at the situation and ask the following questions. What needs to be done and who needs to do it? If not me, then who? They then choose to tackle the challenge.

Some people reframe a situation as an opportunity to follow their life principles. Some see it as a chance to build on their strengths, put themselves into a stimulating situation and do their best to achieve success.

Dennis Charney and Steven Southwick described how some people take this approach in their book Resilience: The Science of Mastering Life's Greatest Challenges. Here is a summary of their findings.

Dennis and Steven studied returning prisoners of war and other people who had overcome violence and other traumas.

They found that some of these people went on to overcome adversity and thrive in their lives.

They also found that similar themes emerged when focusing on the people who had managed such challenges successfully.

People Who Overcome Adversity And Thrive – Some Demonstrate The Following Characteristics

- They have a positive attitude but are also be realistic;
- They have a clear-eyed view about the challenges they are facing;
- They have a clear moral compass, such as a set of values, spiritual faith or sense of altruism;
- They have resilient role models and a strong social support network;

- They draw lessons from their own traumatic experiences and develop active coping skills;
- They care for their physical wellbeing;
- They train regularly and rigorously in multiple areas – such as their emotional intelligence, moral integrity and physical endurance;
- They welcome challenges and believe they can find solutions;
- They recognise and foster their strengths, using them to deal with challenging situations.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may choose to tackle a challenge that you define as a stimulating?

What may be the challenge you want to tackle? How could you reframe it in a positive way? What may be the benefits – for yourself or other people – of tackling the challenge?

Imagine that you have taken this step. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

You Can Clarify The Picture Of Success

People who choose to tackle a challenge often focus on the real results they want to achieve. Some then get extra motivation by focusing on the benefits of achieving this picture of success.

Ellen MacArthur is somebody who follows this approach. She did this as a yachtswoman and now when enabling people to build a circular economy. The following piece is taken from her foundation's website.

In 2005, Ellen MacArthur became the fastest solo sailor to sail around the world. Five years later, she set up the Foundation in her name to accelerate the transition to a circular economy.

After circling the globe – carrying everything she needed with her – she returned with new insights into the way the world works, as a place of interlocking cycles and finite resources, where the decisions we make today affect what's left for tomorrow.

Spending 71 days alone at sea, confronted by the awesome power and dazzling beauty of nature, Ellen began to ponder the fragility of the systems we've built.

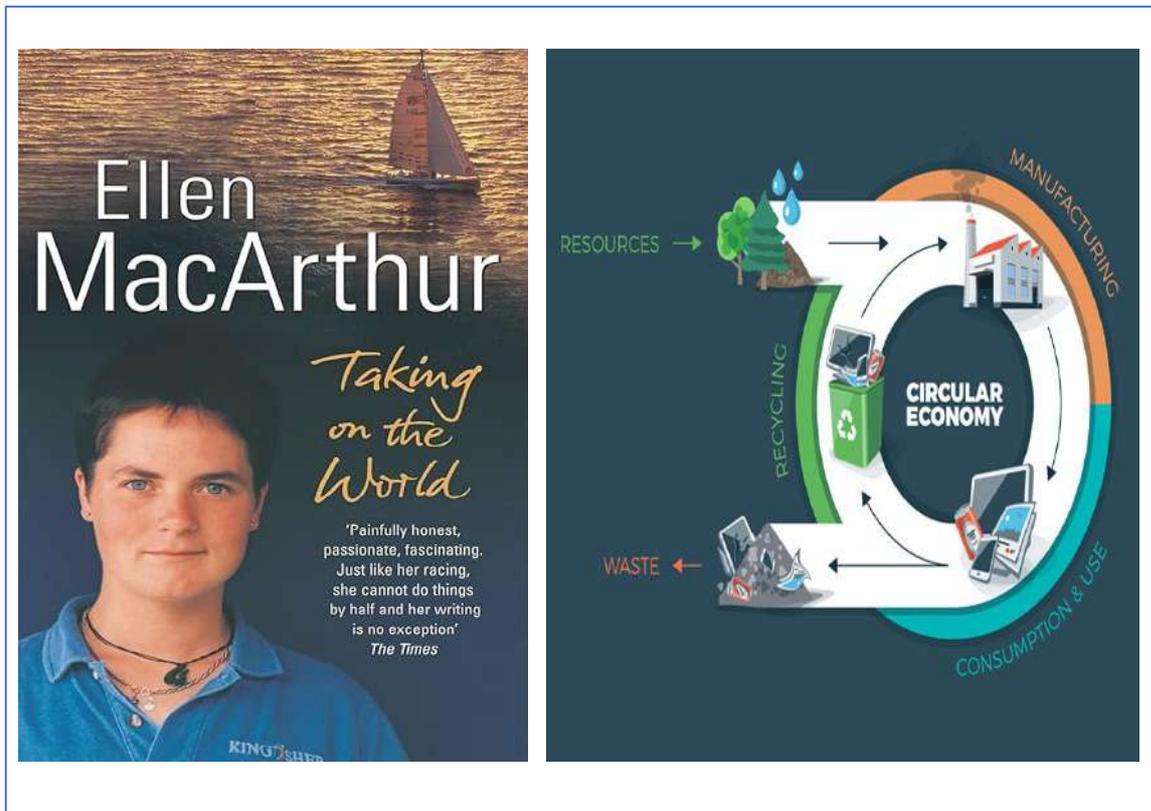

Her boat was her world and her survival was entirely dependent on the limited food, fuel, and other supplies she'd brought with her. She realised that our global economy is no different – it relies completely on the finite resources we extract, use and then dispose of.

She found that the linear system in which we live is fundamentally flawed. She asked herself what would a successful economy that uses things, rather than uses them up look like?

After talking with business leaders, engineers and other experts, she concluded that building a system that could work in the long term is within our reach.

But we would need to transform our extractive, throwaway economic model to one that was based on the principles of a circular economy – an economy designed to keep materials in use, eliminate waste and regenerate natural systems.

She did a massive amount of research before setting up the Ellen MacArthur Foundation. This now works with businesses, cities and other organisations that aim to apply the principles of a circular economy.

Ellen recognises that people are more likely to make changes when they see that these will be beneficial. The foundation therefore aims to deliver projects that provides financial or other positive benefits.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to tackle a stimulating challenge. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goals? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the picture of success?

Let's assume you have clarified your aims. Before setting out on the journey, it can then be useful to focus on the following theme.

You Can Build On Your Strengths

Great workers often build on their strengths when aiming to tackle a challenge. Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some do it by exploring the following themes.

What are my strengths? What are the areas in which I deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? How can I use these to tackle the challenge? What other skills do I need to add?

What is my successful style of working? When have I tackled a similar challenges successfully in the past? What did I do right then? How can I follow similar principles to tackle the present challenges successfully?

Let's return to how you can tackle your chosen challenge. How can you build on your strengths and follow your successful style? If appropriate, how can you work with people who have complementary strengths?

Imagine that you have clarified how you can build on your strengths. Bearing in mind the goal you want to achieve, it can then be useful to focus on the next step.

You Can Follow Strategies That Work

Great workers study what works. They study success in life, education, creativity, business, sports, social enterprises and other fields. They then apply these strategies in their own way to achieve success.

Bearing in mind the challenge they want to tackle, some people explore the following questions.

What are the strategies that work in this area? What do people, teams or organisations do to achieve success? What are the principles they follow? How do they translate these into action?

Bearing in mind my strengths, how can I follow these principles in my own way? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I encourage myself along the way?

How can I translate the strategies into action? How can I anticipate and manage any challenges? How can I clarify what is working and what can be done better? How can I do my best to achieve the picture of success?

As mentioned earlier, some people study what has worked in different fields. People who want to improve life on the planet, for example, may study success stories in this area. Some may learn from the organisations that back social entrepreneurs.

They may study the success stories on the websites of The Ashoka Organization, Echoing Green, The Skol Foundation, Edutopia and The Right Livelihood Foundation.

They may also follow news feeds that show how people are finding solutions to challenges. These include Axiom News, Sparknews, Pioneers Post and The Solutions Journalism Network. Here is a description of the latter.

What Is Solutions Journalism?

Solutions journalism is rigorous and compelling reporting about responses to social problems, which includes these key elements:

Response

Focuses on a response to a social problem — and on how that response has worked, or why it hasn't

Insight

Shows what can be learned from a response and why it matters to a newsroom's audience

Evidence

Provides data or qualitative results that indicate effectiveness (or a lack thereof)

Limitations

Places responses in context; doesn't shy away from revealing shortcomings

Solutions journalism investigates and explains, in a critical and clear-eyed way, how people try to solve widely shared problems.

While journalists usually define news as "what's gone wrong," solutions journalism tries to expand that definition: Responses to problems are also newsworthy. By adding rigorous coverage of solutions, journalists can tell the whole story.

Solutions journalism complements and strengthens coverage of problems. Done well, solutions stories provide valuable insights that help communities with the difficult work of tackling problems like homelessness or climate change, skyrocketing housing prices or low voter turnout.

We also know from research that solutions stories can change the tone of public discourse, making it less divisive and more constructive. By revealing what has worked, such stories have led to meaningful change.

Imagine that you have clarified the strategies most likely to succeed when tackling your chosen challenge. You will then move into action. This involves taking the next step.

You Can Do Your Best To Achieve The Picture Of Success

Great workers do their best to achieve their goals. They aim to follow their chosen strategies, follow good habits and deliver consistently high standards.

Such workers also keep reading reality. They build on what is going well and tackle areas for improvement. Some follow their successful pattern for finishing and reach the goals by adding that touch of class.

There are many models that people can follow to do fine work. Some people, teams and organisations follow elements of the Appreciative Inquiry approach. Here is an overview of this approach.

Appreciative Inquiry

This is an organic approach to development. It studies humanity at its best and builds on what works. It invites people to focus on a particular theme they want to explore. It then invites them:

- To clarify when they have done superb work in this area in the past;*
- To clarify the principles they followed then to do superb work;*
- To clarify how they can follow these principles - plus add other skills - to do superb work in this area in the future.*

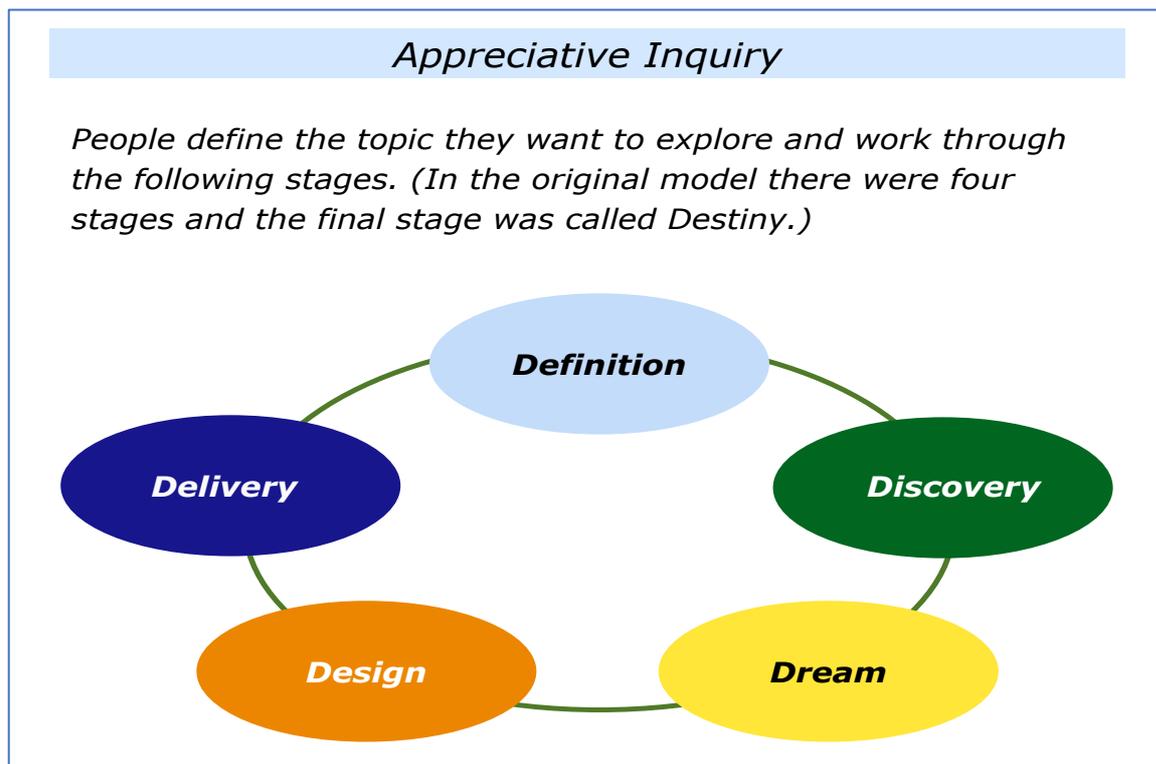

David Cooperrider began developing Appreciative Inquiry in the early 1980s. At that time he was completing his doctorate by doing organisational development work at The Cleveland Clinic.

He began with traditional change management questions, looking at deficits and gaps in performance. Then something happened. Impressed by the co-operation and innovation he found, he focused more on people's strengths and professional high points.

David began helping people, teams and organisations to find and follow their successful patterns. Joined by other pioneers, he and Diana Whitney co-authored the first book on the topic. This was called Appreciative Inquiry: A positive revolution in change.

AI can be used with small and big groups. Sometimes it can involve thousands of people. It enables them to tackle challenges in their daily lives, work and communities.

People start by Defining the theme, challenge or question they want to explore. They then go through the stages of focusing on Discovery, Dream, Design and Delivery. Let's explore these themes.

Definition

AI starts by inviting people to define the particular topic they want to explore. Here are examples of what they may focus on but they will define their own chosen topic.

How can we work well together? How can we enable our young people to flourish? How can we develop successful new products? How can we tap into the creativity in our organisation?

How can we find solutions that – as far as possible - benefit all the stakeholders? How can we build a superb organisation? How can we combine our strengths to build a sustainable community?

When defining the theme it can be useful to follow certain guidelines. These include the following:

To define the theme, challenge or question they want to explore;

To frame this in a positive way - because this determines the way in which people will channel their energy;

To frame it as a question, such as 'How can we ...'

Defining the topic is crucial. It creates the framework within which people can channel their positive energy. People can then embark on the next stage of the AI process.

Discovery

The Discovery phase taps into the positive core – the life-giving forces of a team, organisation or community. It encourages people to build on their inner strengths and successful patterns.

Imagine that you are using this approach with a group of people who have defined the topic they want to explore. They have also defined it in terms of: "How can we ...?" Invite people to form small groups and each person:

To describe a specific situation in the past when they - or the team they were part of at that time - did superb work in this area;

To describe the specific things they did right then - the various principles that people followed - to do superb work;

To describe the specific things they did to translate these principles into action and what happened as a result.

Invite people to present their findings back to the big group. Here is one framework they can use. They can then move on to the next stage.

Discovery Presentation

The specific examples we focused on were:

* When ...

* When ...

* When ...

The principles that people followed - and the things they did to translate these principles into action - to do superb work were:

* They ...

For example ...

* They ...

For example ...

* They ...

For example ...

The specific things that happened as a result of following these principles and translated them into action were:

*

*

*

Dream

Appreciative Inquiry is different from most visioning approaches in a crucial way. It builds on the stories, strengths and successful principles that have already emerged. People are doing several things.

They are building on the organic principles they know work;

They are then more confident about extrapolating these principles into the future;

They see how these principles might be expressed in a picture of success.

People may be dreaming but, because they are following successful principles, they have a belief they can deliver. This is because they have started from within. The dream is organic rather than something grafted on.

AI practitioners find the Dream and Design parts sometimes start to overlap. This is okay, because there is often a moving forwards and backwards between the two elements.

There are, however, a few things to mention in relation to defining the dream. It can be useful:

To make sure the dream is an expression of the principles that people know have worked already;

To make sure the dream is stimulating, stretching and yet within the scope of the controllables – the things they can control in the situation;

To, if appropriate, invite people to make a picture - or other representation - of them achieving the dream.

People can draw a picture to show what will actually be happening when they reach the goal. They can bring this to life by adding the actual words they want to be hearing from customers, colleagues, the press and other stakeholders. They can then put the picture in a place where they see it each day.

One key point is worth underlining. People who deliver a dream are often positive realists. They have a positive approach but they are also realistic.

They are like mountain climbers. They focus on achieving a particular goal but also do their due diligence. Such people often go through the following stages when exploring the potential project.

They clarify the benefits - for all the stakeholders – of achieving the goal ... They clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving the goal ... They clarify how to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

They clarify whether they are prepared to accept the whole package ... They check their motivation by asking: "On a scale 0–10, to what extent are we really serious about doing what is required to achieve the goal?" ... They make sure the rating is at least 8+/10.

Here is a framework people can follow during the Dream stage. They can then present these findings to the whole group.

Dream Presentation

*The dream we want to achieve
- the picture of success - is:*

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Here is a picture - a visual representation - of the actual things that will be happening when we achieve the dream:

Design

The Dream is the What - the real results to achieve - and the Why - the benefits of achieving the goal. The Design is the How - the strategies for achieving the goal.

Different people use different approaches to clarify their strategies. You will, of course, have your own method. Here is one approach. Bearing in mind the picture of success, people who work in a team may ask some of the following questions.

What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success? How can we implement these strategies successfully? What support will people need to deliver success?

What are people's best contributions towards achieving the goals? What are people's strengths? How can we build on and co-ordinate these strengths to reach the goal? How can we do any remaining tasks that must be completed?

How can we make clear contracts with people about their best contributions? How can we encourage them to do superb work? How can we manage them by outcomes rather than by tasks?

What are the potential difficulties people may face along the way? How can we anticipate and prevent these difficulties happening? How can we manage the difficulties if they do happen?

What is the road map – the action plan – for achieving the dream? Who will need to deliver what and by when? What will be the actual things that will be happening that will show we have reached the goal?

Imagine you are leading a team that is taking these steps. You can invite people to clarify the key strategies they will follow to achieve the goals.

If appropriate, people can then form small teams where they focus on their elements of implementing the strategy. They then can present these back to the whole group.

They can start their presentations, however, by completing the following headlines. Then, if appropriate, they can break these down into more detailed action plans.

Design Presentation

The key strategies we can follow to achieve the dream are:

- * To ...

- * To ...

- * To ...

Delivery

The Delivery phase translates the dream into reality. People throw themselves into the work and get some early wins.

Maintaining the momentum is crucial, so it is vital to have follow up meetings. One approach is to gather people together at least once a month to report their progress.

If you are running such sessions, keep people's eyes on the big picture. You can start, for example, by reminding people of the Dream. People can then be invited to present the following things.

The specific things they have delivered in the past month towards achieving the dream;

The specific things they plan to deliver in the next month;

The specific challenges they face and their plans for tackling these challenges;

The specific support they would like to help to deliver the dream;

The specific other topics they would like to explore regarding how to deliver the dream.

You can encourage people to build on their successes and develop the habit of constant improvement. This will increase the chances of achieving the goal.

Different people apply AI in different ways. Whichever approach they use, however, they invite individuals, teams or organisations to build on their positive core.

This approach can be used with small and big groups. Sometimes it can involve thousands of people. They are asked to share their ideas to help shape the future.

In my own work I have used elements of it when working with organisations in business. Every time that people have applied the approach properly they have delivered success.

Let's return to your own work and the stimulating challenge you may want to tackle. This starts by clarifying the results you want to achieve. It then involves building on your strengths, following strategies that work and doing your best achieve the picture of success.

Looking to the future, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you follow it in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Stimulating Challenge Approach In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Delivering The Scorecard Whilst Also Doing Stimulating Projects Approach

People who thrive in organisations often get the right blend between delivering the scorecard and doing stimulating projects. Such projects need to benefit the organisation and produce success stories. Let's explore how to make this happen.

Delivering The Scorecard

Every organisation has its own version of a scorecard. This describes the mandatory things that, for example, each team must deliver. Each person will also be given a scorecard. This describes what they must deliver in a specific role.

Some scorecards mainly focus on the 'What'. They are written in outcome terms and outline the specific results a person must deliver. The person is given freedom, within parameters, regarding how they deliver these results.

Some scorecards are much more detailed. They describe not only the 'What', but also have strict controls on the 'How'. The centre wants to feel more in control – not only of what people deliver, but how they go about it in their daily work. One manager explained this in the following way.

"The scorecard has changed as our business has got bigger.

"Ten years ago it contained a few top line targets. These covered the normal 3 Ps of Profits, Products and People. We had lots of freedom in terms of how we worked to hit these targets.

"During the past few years, however, the scorecard has contained more and more micro-targets. Sometimes it is hard to see the relevance of these to running a successful business.

"Some people get upset about the scorecard. But, as I say to the people who join my team, we have several choices. We can choose:

To ignore the scorecard.

To fight the centre about the scorecard.

To grumble about the scorecard and let it dominate our lives.

To complete the parts of the scorecard we believe in.

To deliver the scorecard – but in a way that is creative – and get on with doing other stimulating work as well.

"I tell the people who join my team that we are going with final option. This is the way we can keep the centre off our backs and create the space to do other good work.

"If people don't want to do that - if they just want to do the things they find interesting without delivering their part of the scorecard - they should find another team.

"We deliver the scorecard and also aim to do satisfying work. But there is a proviso.

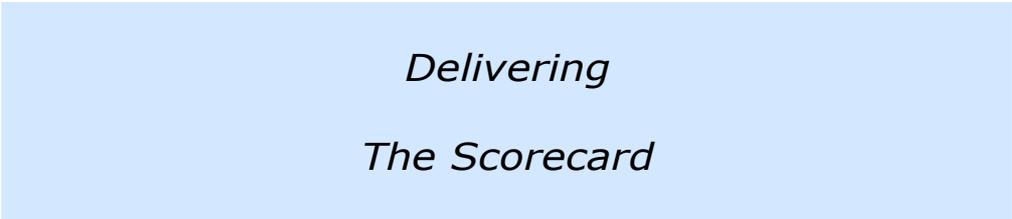

"One day it may be that the scorecard becomes debilitating. If so, then we each need to make a choice.

"We may choose to move on to work places that give people more autonomy regarding how they deliver the required results."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to focus on your present role – or to look at one you may want to apply for in the future – and to do the following things.

Describe the specific results you must achieve to deliver the scorecard.

Describe the specific things you can do to do your best to achieve these results and deliver the scorecard.

*Delivering
The Scorecard*

The specific results I must achieve to deliver the scorecard are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to do my best to achieve these results and deliver the scorecard are:

*

*

*

Doing Stimulating Projects

People can continue to deliver the scorecard, but they often want to pursue additional stimulating projects. The manager mentioned above explained this approach.

"We deliver the scorecard to keep the centre off our backs. In our market, however, we also need to adopt fresh approaches to helping our customers to succeed.

"Bearing this in mind, I did the following exercise before the start of the financial year. Looking ahead, my team focused on how to do the following three things.

To deliver the scorecard and satisfy our key stakeholders in the company.

To do stimulating projects that would deliver benefits for both the customers and the company.

To translate these projects into success stories that could be published and deliver benefits for the company.

"Each team member clarified the projects they wanted to deliver. Again, it was vital to show how these could benefit the company. In practical terms, this also meant passing on some of the other tasks to members of their teams who wanted to prove their worth.

"Eventually we settled on the projects to deliver, the support required and when people would produce the success stories."

If you wish, however, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This again invites you to focus on your present role – or to look at one you may want to apply for in the future – and to do the following things.

Describe the specific stimulating projects that you would like to deliver.

Describe the specific things you can do to do your best to deliver these projects.

Doing
Stimulating Projects

*The stimulating projects
I want to deliver are:*

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to do my best to deliver these stimulating projects are:

*

*

*

Getting The Right Blend Between The Scorecard and The Stimulating Projects

That sounds fine, somebody may say, but what if it gets out of kilter?

"What if you spend all your time fixing the scorecard and have no time to do the other satisfying stuff? What if you haven't got anybody to whom you can hand over some of the daily tasks or you don't get the required support?"

People who sign-up to organisations realise that, in exchange for a monthly pay cheque, they are accountable for making sure the mandatory tasks are delivered.

The key word is accountable. A team leader, for example, will not need to do every piece of work. But they are judged on whether or not their team completes these tasks successfully.

Sane organisations communicate the overall scorecard. The scorecard is written in outcome terms. It focuses on three key areas, for example, and describes the headline results that people must deliver. People are also given the support they need to do the job.

Insane organisations communicate a detailed scorecard. The scorecard covers many areas and is written in task terms. It tells people what they have to do and how they have to do it. People are over-stretched and not given the support to do the job.

Bearing these things in mind, each person must make their own decision. Looking at your own work, for example, ask yourself the following questions.

Do I believe it is possible to get the right blend between delivering the scorecard and doing stimulating projects?

If so, how can I do my best to make this happen? How can I, for example, find satisfying ways to deliver the scorecard?

How can I manage the centre by proactively keeping them informed about progress towards achieving the results? How can I also do stimulating projects?

If I have a team, how can I coordinate people's talents to deliver the scorecard and do stimulating work?

How can I help the team members: a) to each play to their strengths and; b) to make their best contributions towards delivering the team's scorecard?

How can I find creative ways to make sure the team does the remaining tasks that must be done to deliver the team's scorecard.

How can I ensure we get on with doing the stimulating projects and delivering success stories.

Looking at these answers, let me return to the first question.

Do I believe it is possible to get the right blend between delivering the scorecard and doing stimulating projects?

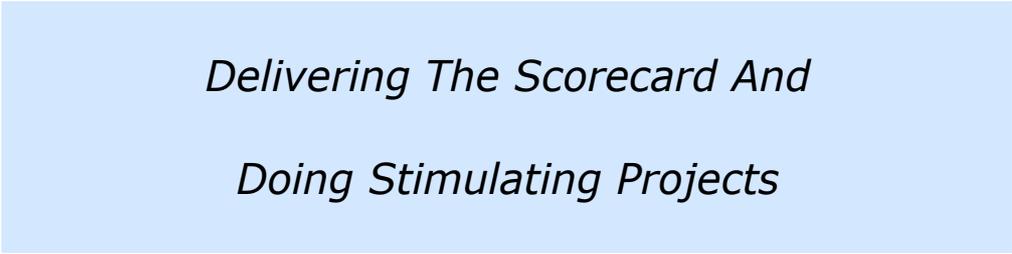

If so, good. If not, what is the decision I want to make?

You will have your own way of asking and answering these kinds of questions.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This again invites you to focus on your present role – or to look at one you may want to apply for in the future – and to do the following things.

Describe the specific things you can do to get the right blend between delivering the scorecard and doing stimulating projects.

Describe the specific benefits – both for yourself and for your organisation – of getting the right blend.

Delivering The Scorecard And Doing Stimulating Projects

The specific things I can do to get the right blend between delivering the scorecard and doing stimulating projects are:

*

*

*

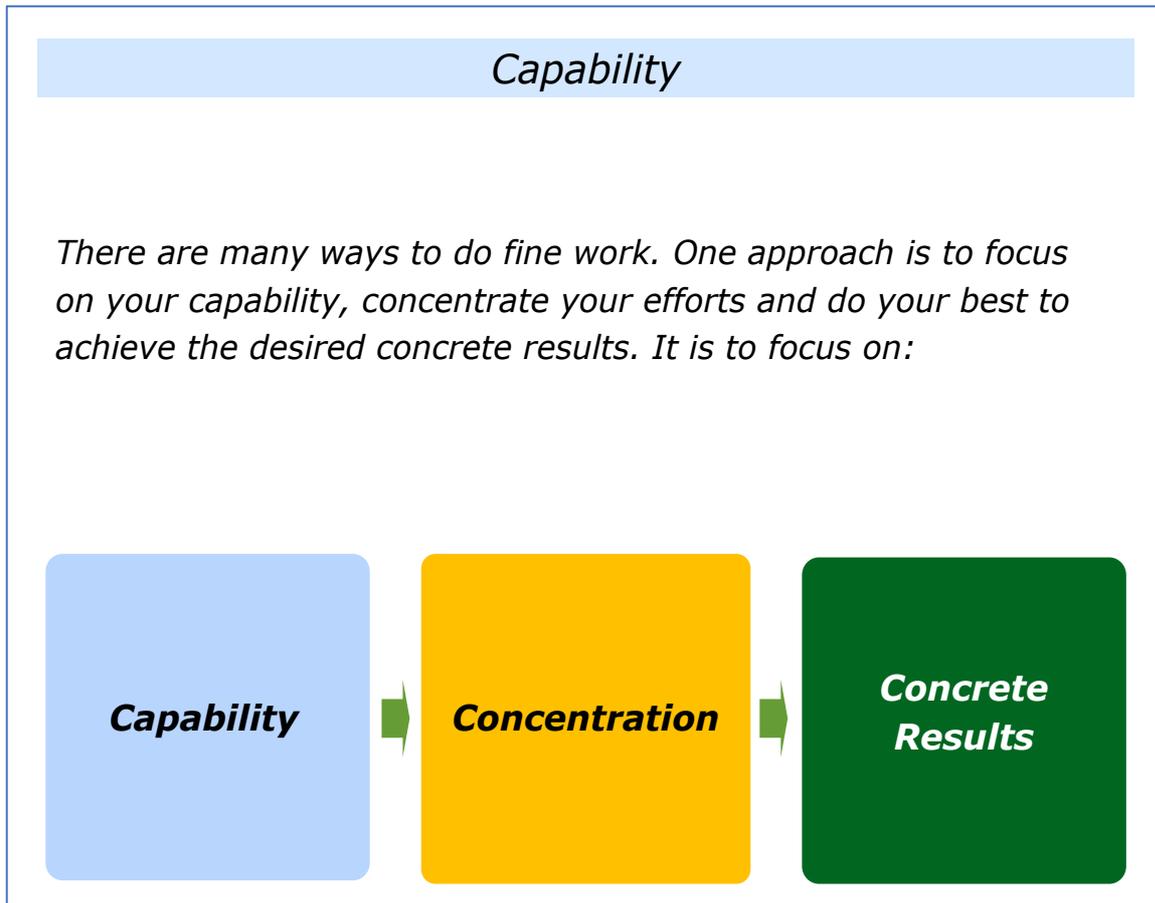

The specific benefits – both for myself and for the organisation – will be:

*

*

*

The Capability, Concentration And Concrete Results Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on your capability, concentrate your efforts and do your best to achieve the desired concrete results.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. This involves focusing on the following themes.

Capability

There are several definitions for the word capability. These include the power or ability to do something. Bearing this in mind, you may want to explore the following themes.

What are you capable of doing? What are your strengths? What are the specific activities where you can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What is your successful style of working? How can you follow this in the future?

Some people may be able to clarify their own abilities. Some may also need help from a talent spotter who can help them to identify their strengths. This could be a friend, teacher, coach or another people who can see a person's possibilities.

Some people are naturally good at seeing when people come alive and do good work. Others learn to develop this ability as they get older. One of my mentors emphasised this theme when we met during the late 1960s. They expressed this in the following way.

"When looking at people, try to have positive eyes. Anybody can tell you what people do wrong. The key is to look for what people do right. When is a person in their element – at ease and yet able to excel?"

"What are they doing right then? What are the specific things they are doing to get positive results. It is then to encourage them to do more of these things and explore their potential."

Such a talent spotter may watch a person in action or see an example of their work. Providing they have the person's permission, they may say something along the following lines.

"As far as I can see, you can do superb work in the following areas. You have the ability:

"To ...

"For example ...

"To ...

"For example ...

"Looking ahead, you have the capability to do the following things. You have the ability:

"To ...

"For example ...

"To ...

"For example ...

"This is what I see you have the ability to do. It is up to you, of course, if you want to do any of these things."

Different people are good at different things. You may be good at encouraging people, managing technology or doing other activities. You may be good at decision making, leading teams or playing other professional roles.

Let's return to the original question. What are your strengths? What are the specific activities where you may have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs?

Bearing these strengths in mind, what may you be capable of doing in your work? What may be the concrete results you may be able to deliver? Which of these would you like to deliver?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Capability

My Strengths – The specific activities in which I may have the ability to deliver As rather Than Bs or Cs are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

My Capabilities – Bearing in mind my strengths, the specific kinds of things I may be able to do or deliver are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Concentration

This step involves concentrating your efforts in the most effective way to get the desired concrete results. Several points are worth underlining about this approach.

It does mean that sometimes you will prepare properly before then concentrating your efforts at the right time in the right way to get the right results.

It does not mean that you will be concentrating 100 percent all the time.

Imagine that you have clarified your strengths and what you may be capable of doing. Bearing these in mind, you may then wish to focus on the following themes.

Concentrating Your Efforts

This step involves preparing properly. It then involves clarifying what you want to do, concentrating your efforts and doing your best to deliver the desired concrete results.

Clarifying what you want to do and the concrete results you want to achieve

Preparation is crucial. Sometimes this involves resting, reflecting and then refocusing on what you want to do.

Imagine that you have clarified your strengths and capabilities. Bearing in mind your possibilities, you can clarify the specific thing you want to focus on doing. One approach is to do the following exercise.

Clarifying The Concrete Results

Bearing in mind the things I may be capable of achieving, the specific goal I want to concentrate my efforts on doing is:

* To ...

The specific concrete results I want to achieve by concentrating my efforts on doing this thing are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Clarifying the strategies you can follow to concentrate your efforts on achieving the concrete results

Let's assume you have clarified the results you want to achieve. One approach is to then go through the following steps. You can aim:

To clarify the key strategies you can follow to increase the chances of achieving the concrete results;

To clarify how you can concentrate your efforts – such as how to focus on your priorities and manage your time - to achieve these concrete results;

To clarify how to translate these efforts into action by rehearsing how to follow your action plan for achieving the concrete results.

Imagine that you have prepared properly. You have rested, refocused and rehearsed. You are then ready to move into action. This involves focusing on the next step.

Concrete Results

Great workers aim to be effective rather than just efficient. They therefore concentrate their efforts on following the strategies that are most likely to work.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Bearing in mind what you are capable of achieving, you may aim to manage your energy properly and take the following steps:

To concentrate your efforts on following the strategies most likely to achieve the desired concrete results;

To concentrate on continuous development by building on what is working and tackling areas for improvement;

To concentrate on finishing properly – such as by following your successful pattern for finishing – and doing your best to achieve the desired concrete results.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on your capability, concentrate your efforts and do your best to achieve the desired concrete results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Capability, Concentration And Concrete Results Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Humble, Honest And Hard-Working Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people who do such work demonstrate the following characteristics. They are humble, honest and hard-working.

Such people also embody a paradox. They don't see themselves as hard-working. They simply apply themselves properly and do their best to get the desired positive results.

Good organisations have many such people. They play to their strengths and give them the support to do the job. They then put the right people in the right places to get the right results.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate this into action.

They Are Humble

Such people are humble in a certain way. They aim to serve something greater than themselves. They may believe that the work is important, for example, rather than they themselves are important.

They are humble in their search for knowledge. They are often life-long learners who love to explore and add to their repertoires for doing fine work. They maintain this quality throughout their lives.

Such people may be humble but they also hold strong convictions. They may believe in following a certain philosophy and pursuing certain principles in certain areas of their lives.

Whilst they have strong beliefs, they respect other people. They are prepared to take a stand, however, if they see certain principles being compromised. This sometimes relates to the next theme.

They Are Honest

Such people have integrity. They are honest with themselves, honest in their work and honest with other people. They may translate this into action in the following ways.

They are honest with themselves. They have a moral compass that they believe in following. They aim to follow their beliefs in both positive and challenging situations.

They are honest in their work. They recognise their strengths and, in some cases, their limitations. They then aim to become the best kind of person or professional they can be.

They are honest with people but in a positive way. They aim to encourage people and help them to succeed. When appropriate, they may offer people positive alternatives about how they could behave in the future.

They Are Hard-Working

Such people are hard-working but in a certain kind of way. They apply themselves properly and do their best to achieve the desired positive results.

They may not see themselves as hard-working. They may see it as natural to apply their strengths, follow strategies that work and aim to achieve success.

They often start by making clear contracts about the outcomes to achieve and the guidelines to follow. They then aim to be effective, do what works and deliver consistently high standards.

Such people often embody the qualities described by Carol Dweck regarding people who have a growth mindset. They apply themselves fully, continue to improve and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of the humble, honest and hard-working approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Humble, Honest And Hard-Working Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Purpose, Principles And Peace Approach

There are many models for finding peace. This approach starts by having a positive attitude. It then involves focusing on a purpose, following your principles and finding peace.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's assume that you have a positive attitude to your life or work. You may then want to focus on the following themes.

Purpose

People love to have a sense of purpose. Different people take this step in different ways.

Some people look within to develop a purpose. They may start by focusing on their life philosophy, passions or principles. They then translate these into working towards this picture of success.

Some people look outside themselves to develop a purpose. They may aim to solve a particular problem, achieve a certain position or gain a prize. They then do their best to achieve this outer goal.

Some people combine elements of both. They may align their personal philosophy to pursuing a spiritual path, vocation or mission. They translate this into achieving certain goals on their chosen path.

Looking ahead, can you think of something you would like to do that would mean focusing on a specific purpose? This could be something small or big.

It may be as simple as encouraging a person, running a workshop, renovating a house or doing another activity. It may involve doing something on a larger scale. You may aim to produce a book, make a film, invent a product, build a company or achieve a big goal.

How to develop such a project? One approach is to create or choose one where:

You can get positive energy – even when you think about it;

You can follow principles that you believe in;

You can work towards achieve a clear picture of success.

Imagine that you are focusing on an activity that provides a sense of purpose. It can then be time to move on the next theme.

Principles

Many people aim to principles they believe in when pursuing an activity. They may do this when encouraging a person, practicing a craft, tackling a challenge or working towards a goal.

Some people gain strength from following such principles. They may also find that following these enables them to flow, focus and find fulfilment.

Imagine that you are going to do a piece of work. It may be important :

To clarify the principles you want to follow;

To translate these into action and perform superb work;

To find solutions to challenges when working towards the picture of success.

Some people simply love to follow their principles. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I enjoy the journey as much as reaching the goal. Every day that I get the chance to follow the principles is a win. It is a joy to be able to do what I believe in and work towards a compelling goal."

You will have your own view on the principles you want to follow. This may sometimes lead to the following stage.

Peace

People who pursue a purpose sometimes experience a sense of peace. Different people achieve this in different ways. One approach is for them:

To follow their principles;

To perform superb work;

To do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Sometimes this will involve them reaching a specific goal but sometimes they may not be in control of achieving the outcome. One person described their approach in such situations.

"My aim in life is to make a positive contribution. The main thing is to feel that I have done my best. Providing I have done that, I sometimes feel a sense of peace."

As mentioned earlier in the book, some individuals also aim to pass on their knowledge. They may do this when acting as leader, mentor, coach or in another role.

They want to share what they have learned and help other people to succeed. Some find that that passing on this knowledge can also lead to a sense of peace.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

How can you create or find a purpose? How can you follow your chosen principles? How can you do your best and maybe experience a sense of peace?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Purpose, Principles And Peace Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

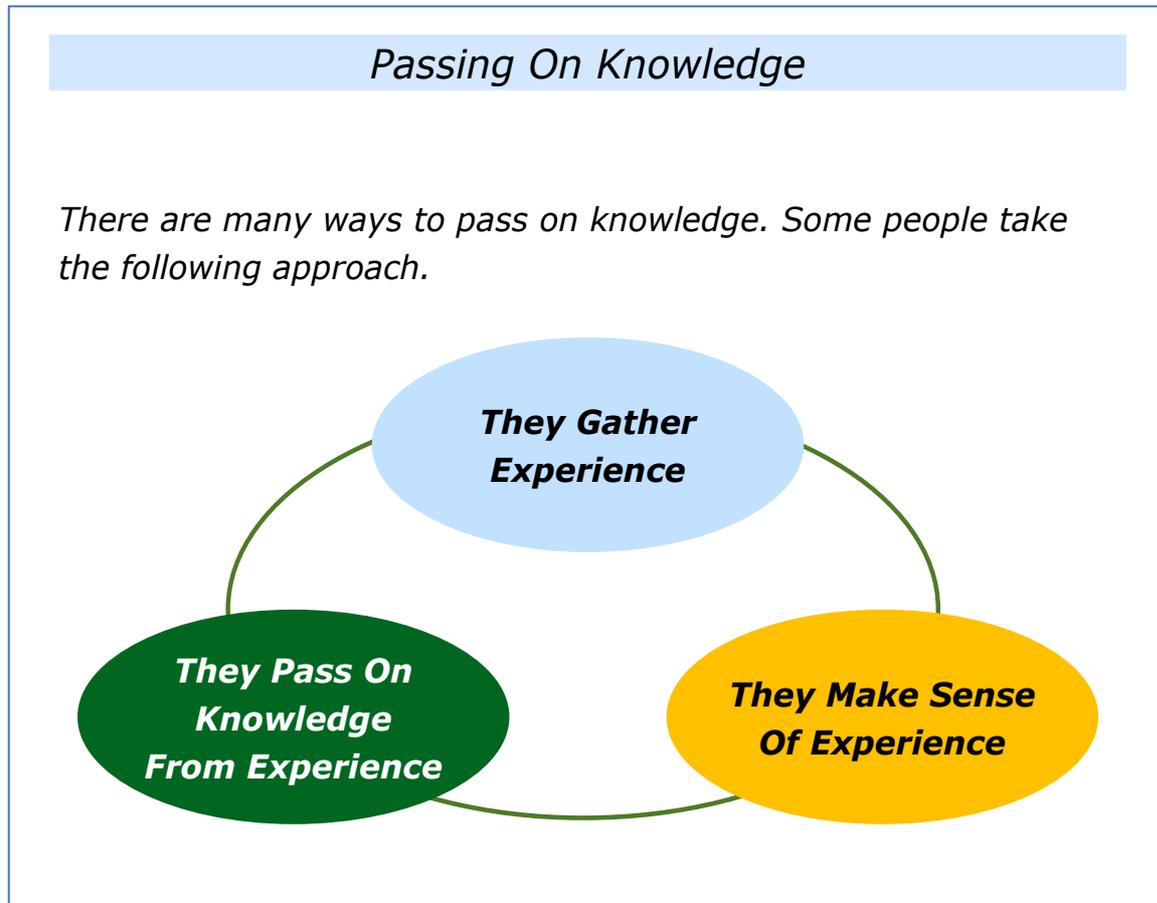

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Passing On Knowledge From Experience Approach

There are many ways help people to achieve their goals. Some people take the following approach. They aim to gather experience, make sense of experience and pass on knowledge from experience.

Such people study what works, simplify what works – in a profound way - and share what works. They aim to pass on this knowledge in a way that people can use in their own lives and work.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Whatever approach they use, however, they often pursue the following themes.

They Gather Experience

Such people want to get a good grounding. They therefore throw themselves into gathering experiences in their chosen activity. They believe in learning by doing and getting the experience in their bones.

A psychotherapist may start by doing voluntary work with children, refugees and in a hospice. They may also explore many different therapies before settling on how they want to help people.

A footballer whose career is ended by injury may start coaching at grassroots level. They may coach children, drive the team bus and work through their coaching badges before getting a full-time coaching role.

A journalist may work in local radio, interview different kinds of people and learn to hit deadlines. They may also produce their own videos before getting a paid job and continuing to develop their broadcasting skills.

Let's return to your own work. How did you aim to gather experiences before settling on your chosen route? You may have done this in the field of education, hospitality, technology or another area.

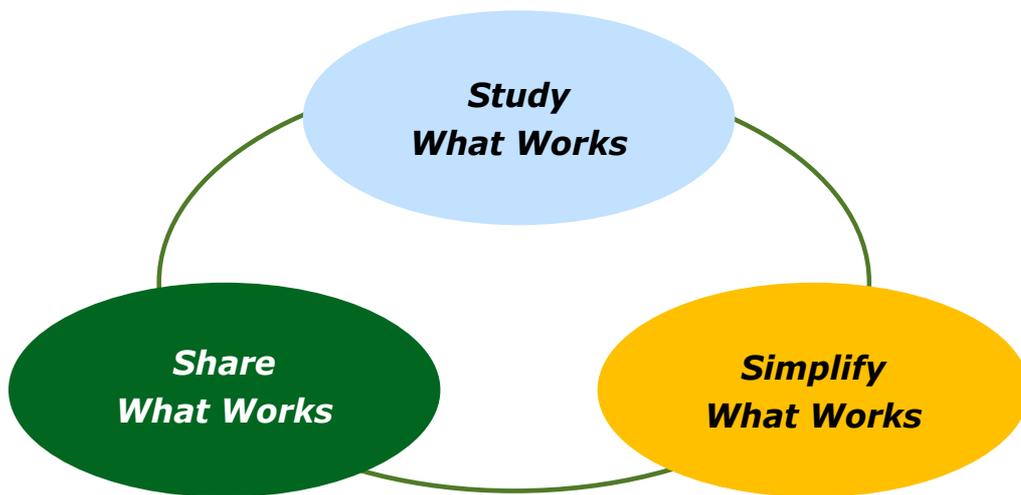

Sometimes we choose to gather experience in a particular field and this leads to taking a relatively predictable path. Sometimes we pursue one path and then serendipity means we take an unexpected route.

Great workers often begin by gathering experiences. They may then follow the path that gives them positive energy. This can lead to the next stage in their development.

They Make Sense Of Experience

Making Sense Of Experience

There are many ways to make sense of experience. One approach is to recognise both successful and unsuccessful patterns. It can then sometimes be useful to:

Great workers are often lifelong learners. They love to learn, develop and make sense of experiences. Some do this by following the path taken by many educators.

Good educators often aim to study success. They study what works, simplify what works - in a profound way - and share what works. They then love to pass on this knowledge to other people.

There are many ways to make sense of experiences. One of the key elements is pattern recognition. It is the ability to see both the successful and unsuccessful patterns in certain activities.

People like to learn about how to achieve their goals. Bearing this in mind, it is important study and recognise successful patterns. You can then help people to follow these patterns in their own ways.

Imagine that you want to follow this route in your own way. The approach starts by focusing on a specific topic you want to learn about. Depending on your interests, you may want to explore one of the following themes.

I want to learn about:

How to be a good counsellor ... How to help troubled teenagers ... How to help people to build on their strengths and do satisfying work ... How to coach young footballers ... How to transform a negative culture into a positive culture ... How to lead successful teams.

Imagine you have chosen the topic you want to explore. Bearing this in mind, you can ask yourself the following questions.

How can I study success? When have people done superb work in this activity? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action?

How can people follow these successful patterns in their own way? What are the key strategies they can follow to increase the chances of achieving success? How can they translate these into action?

Imagine that you have focused on a specific activity you want to learn about. The next step may be to simplify what works but to do this in a profound way. How to make this happen?

As mentioned earlier, one approach is to look for patterns in a specific activity. Good educators often take the following steps to study and simplify knowledge in a particular field.

They focus on what people do right - the successful patterns they follow - to achieve their picture of success;

They translate these patterns into principles that people can follow to achieve their picture of success;

They aim to provide practical tools that people can use to follow these principles in their own ways to achieve their picture of success.

Different people choose different ways make sense of experience and study success. Some then move on to the next stage.

They Pass On Knowledge From Experience

Imagine that you have clarified knowledge about works in a specific activity. You may want to apply this knowledge to reach your own goals. Alternatively, you may want to share what works to help other people to succeed.

Let's assume that you want to follow the second route. One approach is to focus on the What, Who, Why, How and When. Let's explore these themes.

Passing On Knowledge

●	The What	The specific knowledge I would like to pass on to people is ...
●	The Who	The specific people I would like to pass on this knowledge to are ...
●	The Why	The specific reasons why I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...
●	The How	The specific ways I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...
●	The When	The specific situations when I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...

The What

What is the knowledge you want to pass on? This may depend on the project or other activity you have been pursuing.

You may have learned lessons from gardening, counselling, building houses, managing crises, coding, leading teams, solving particular problems or whatever.

The Why

Why would you like to pass on this knowledge? What would be the benefits for people? What are the practical tools they could take away and use in their daily lives and work? How could these things help them to succeed?

The Who

Who would you like to reach with the knowledge? Would they be young people, those with learning difficulties, budding entrepreneurs, athletes, leaders, scientists, social entrepreneurs, therapists or other people?

What would be the characteristics of these people? Would they be motivated and wanting to learn? What other qualities would you like to see in your ideal students?

The How

How would you like to share your knowledge with people? Different people prefer different methods for sharing know how. They may prefer, for example:

To act a positive model and show what good looks like on a daily basis by, for example, running a business;

To act as a mentor, coach, trusted advisor or to run teaching sessions, seminars, workshops or other forms of education;

To write articles, create websites, write blogs, produce learning materials, make videos, make television programmes or whatever.

The When

When do you want to share the ideas with people? What would be your preferred setting? Would you like to run a seminar, produce a blog, run a coaching session or do another activity?

How can you bring the learning to life? How can you make sure it relates to people's personal or professional goals? How can you do your best to make sure that it resonates with people?

There are many ways to help people to reach their goals. One approach is to gather experience, make sense of experience and pass on knowledge from experience.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you follow this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Passing On Knowledge From Experience Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Aiming To Win But Not Being Afraid Not To Win Approach

The Winning Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people follow the approach taken by some people in sports.

They Do Their Best To Aim To Win

But:

They Are Not Afraid Not To Win

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people follow the approach taken by some athletes in sports. They do their best to aim to win but they are not afraid not to win.

Some people find this approach to be liberating. It frees them to flow, focus and do fine work. They then aim to finish properly and, as a by-product, sometimes find fulfilment. Let's explore some aspects of this approach.

There Are Different Views About Winning

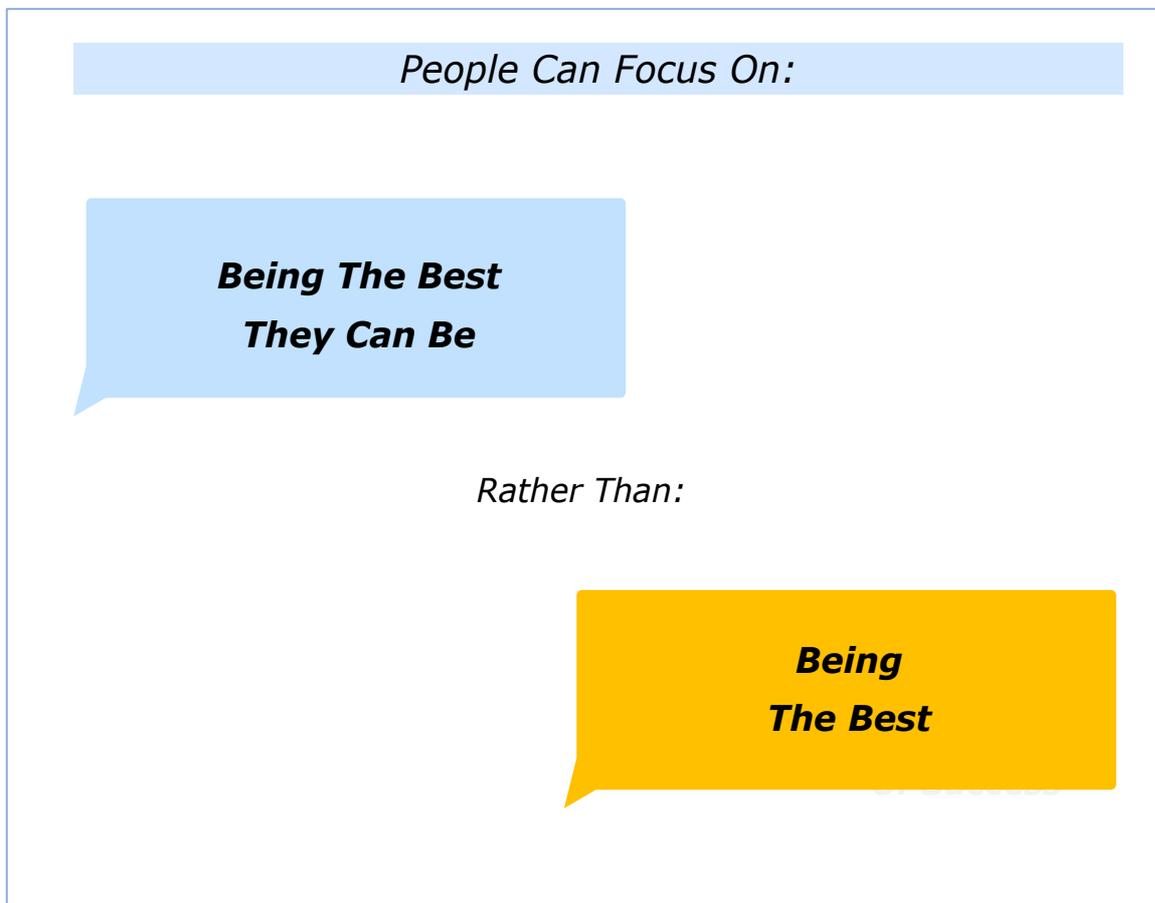

Different people have different views about what constitutes winning. Here are some of these views. Winning can mean:

Winning a prize ... Being true to yourself ... Doing your best ... Helping other people ... Doing superb work ... Getting win-win solutions.

John Wooden, the famous basketball coach, never talked about winning but his teams won many championships. He encouraged players to always do their best and, in this way, achieve peace of mind. He said:

"Success comes from knowing that you did your best to become the best that you are capable of becoming."

Some people take a similar approach in their lives or work. Bearing in what they can control, they aim to become the best kind of person, athlete, artist, carpenter or professional they can be.

Some individuals take another approach. They focus on what they can't control and compare themselves to others. This can be a spur but it can also have downsides. They may only feel satisfied if they are continually seen as being the best in their field.

Some individuals aim to become the best they can be and, as a by-product, are seen as the best in their field. They then continue to build on what they can control, however, and focus on how they can make the best use of their talents.

There Are Different Approaches To Aiming To Win

Different people may follow different approaches when aiming to achieve their definition of winning. Here are some they may follow. They may aim:

To build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success;

To focus on a clear purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success;

To do what they believe in, do the basics and, when appropriate, add the brilliance.

Whatever approach they take, people often prepare properly. They then aim to be fully present, perform superb work and do their best to deliver peak performances.

Some people also follow the 'win the next moment' approach. Paul O'Connell, the former Irish Rugby Union player, described this in talk he gave to a Pendulum Summit in 2018.

Paul called the approach 'mindfulness for dumb rugby players'. The team's coach Joe Schmidt kept giving his players the following message.

Forget the mistake you have made, forget the try you have scored. Be fully present and win the next moment in front of your face.

Paul O'Connell – Mindfulness For Rugby Players

"Win the moment in front of your face."

Joe Schmidt

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some apply it to doing their best in the next moment, the next hour or the next day. They may do this when aiming:

To perform the next task superbly when doing a piece of work ... To stay healthy one day at a time when recovering from an addiction ... To focus on one shot or one game at a time when playing a sport.

People who take this approach do their best to achieve their definition of winning. Sometimes they reach their chosen goals, sometimes they don't. They may then focus on the next theme.

There Are Different Responses To Not Winning

Different people respond in different ways to not winning. Here are some of these responses.

Some people see things in perspective and focus on what is important in life. They continue to have a positive attitude, build positive relationships and make a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

Some people focus on what they have already gained in life. They have a sense of gratitude, count their blessings and build on both their personal and professional assets.

Some people respond to successes and setbacks by enjoying the journey and focusing on continuous improvement. They aim to build on that they do well and tackle areas for improvement.

Cath Bishop described elements of this approach in her book The Long Win. An Olympic Medal Winner in rowing, she encourages people to explore their definitions of success.

Some Olympic Gold Medal winners get an immediate high. But for some the main emotion is relief rather than joy. Some then find it hard to develop a new sense of purpose.

Cath suggests focusing on the long-term wins in life. Here is an excerpt from an article she wrote on this theme.

What Does Winning Really Mean?

Of course, in sport it seems so temptingly obvious and simple – it's about crossing the line first, being on the top step of the podium, holding that trophy.

Yet those are all split-second moments. Those need to be translated into meaning beyond that split-second if they are to be long-lasting positive experiences.

When they aren't translated, that allows a world to exist where it's possible for an Olympic gold medallist to walk back into the village feeling 'empty' and 'hollow', or where 'winning sport stars' can actually be suffering depression and worse.

'Powerful and profound'
MATTHEW SYED

The
LONG WIN

The search for a better way to succeed
.....
CATH BISHOP

I propose a new way of redefining success. The Long Win is based on:

Clarity of what matters: developing a sense of purpose and meaning beyond simply coming first or hitting short-term targets

Constant learning: recognizing and focusing on learning, progress and personal growth rather than outcomes and extrinsic rewards

Connection: prioritizing cooperation and collaboration over competition, creating authentic relationships and understanding each other

The best sports coaches are those who are not afraid to ask their athletes what they want to do after sport.

They are strong enough to ask and listen to the deeper motivations that have driven their athletes to be in this unnatural high performance environment striving to be the best in the world.

That's the beginning of building a wider perspective and deeper meaning about the extreme and often short-lived experience of elite sport. Purpose starts a conversation about success that goes beyond winning.

It's about a longer-term timeframe, never just a split-second. It's about a wider perspective, not a narrow view. And it's about people's whole lives, as individuals and communities, not measured in short-term results, but longer-term experiences.

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people aim to do their best to win but they are not afraid not to win. They choose to enjoy the journey and develop on the way towards achieving their aims.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Aiming To Win But Not Being Afraid Not To Win Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Surfing Both Successes And Setbacks On The Way Towards Achieving Success Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to start by clarifying the picture of success. It is then to surf both successes and setbacks on the ways towards achieving success.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

Success

Great workers often start from their destination and work backwards. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they take they following steps:

They clarify the real results to achieve and translate these into a clear picture of success;

They clarify the specific strategies they can follow to increase the likelihood of achieving the picture of success;

They clarify the benefits – for themselves and other stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success.

Great workers also prepare properly. They set things up to succeed and rehearse following their chosen strategies. They focus on how to anticipate and manage any challenges they may meet along the way.

Imagine that you want to do a piece of work. You may want to publish an article, do a creative project, launch a new product, build a positive organisational culture or do another activity.

If appropriate, you can focus on some of the themes mentioned above. You can aim to clarify: a) the picture of success; b) the strategies you want to follow; c) the benefits to the various stakeholders.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on these themes. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Success

The specific piece of work that I want to do is:

*

The Specific Picture Of Success

*The real results I want to achieve
by doing this piece of work are:*

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Strategies

The specific strategies I can follow to increase the likelihood of success are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Benefits

The specific benefits – for all the stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success may be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Imagine that you have worked through these stages. You may then want to focus on the next theme.

Successes

Great workers often get some quick wins. They then also aim to maintain momentum by getting further successes on the road towards achieving their goals.

Imagine that you have settled on doing a piece of work. How can you get some quick wins? How can you encourage yourself on the journey by getting more successes?

How can you build on what you did right – such as the principles you followed – to get the successes? How can you continue to encourage yourself and other people on the way towards achieving the goals?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Successes

The specific piece of work that I want to do is:

*

The Specific Successes I Can Aim To Get And May Also Achieve Along The Way May Be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

*The Specific Things I Can Do To Build On
And Learn From These Successes May Be:*

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Setbacks

Great workers anticipate and manage any potential setbacks. Such workers may ask themselves the following questions.

*What are the potential setbacks or challenges I may meet along the way?
How can I prevent some of these happening? How can I manage these successfully if, despite my best efforts, they do happen?*

*How can I then aim: a) to establish clarity – the real results to achieve;
b) to clarify the choices and the pluses and minuses of each option; c) to clarify any creative solutions? How can I then rehearse my chosen way forwards and do my best to achieve the desired results?*

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach when doing your piece of work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Setbacks

The specific piece of work that I want to do is:

*

The Specific Setbacks I May Experience Along The Way May Be:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

*The Specific Things I Can Do To Prevent
Some Of These Setbacks Happening Are:*

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Specific Things I Can Do To Manage These And Other Setbacks If Some Of Them Do Happen Are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Success

Great workers aim to finish properly and do their best to achieve their goals. Different people do this in different ways. Some people take the following approach:

They clarify their successful pattern for finishing by recalling the principles they followed to finish similar pieces of work successfully;

They clarify how they may be able to follow these principles – plus add other skills – to finish the present piece of work successfully;

They clarify how to translate these principles into action, perform superb work and add that touch of class to finish the piece of work successfully.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to start by clarifying the goals. It is then to surf successes and setbacks and do your best to achieve the goals.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. How can you follow your successful pattern for finishing plus maybe add other skills? How can you do your best to achieve your picture of success?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Success

The specific piece of work that I want to do is:

*

The Specific Things I Can Do To Finish Properly And Do My Best To Achieve The Picture Of Success Are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

The Pleasure Approach Rather Than The Pain Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the pleasure approach rather than the pain approach. They aim to do things that give pleasure to themselves or other people.

Such people are also have a certain attitude towards physical and psychological pain. They aim to recognise, manage and, when appropriate, make good use of the pain.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate this into action.

The Pleasure Approach

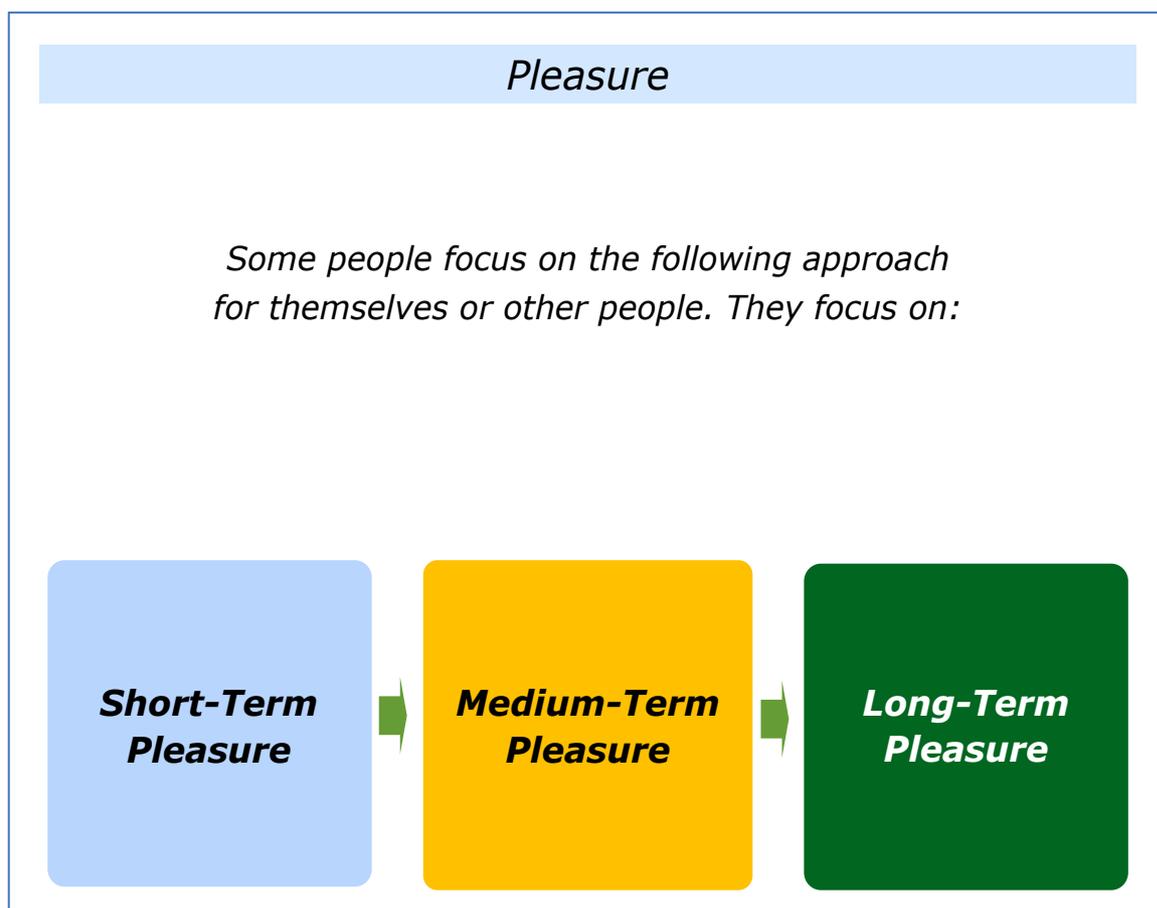

Some people learn this approach early in life. They may have had parents who encouraged them to explore and do what they enjoyed - providing they didn't hurt other people.

They may have had teachers who encouraged them to do inspiring projects. They may then have learned to follow certain principles, be persistent and do their best to get positive results.

Some individuals may have embarked on their working life by exploring several fields before following one that gave them positive energy. They may then have aimed to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and help other people to achieve success.

They may have learned from challenging experiences. They may then have developed the ability to make good decisions that aimed to produce positive results for themselves or other people.

Such individuals may focus on doing things that give short-term, medium-term or long-term pleasure. They may also be prepared to tackle difficult challenges, for example, that will produce longer-term benefits.

Such people may become more decisive as they get older. They may explore the following themes before spending time with people, embarking on a venture or going into a situation.

What is the specific thing I want to do? What is the situation I may go into? Will doing this give pleasure to myself or other people? Will it in any way painful? If so, what can I do to prevent, manage or even make good use of the pain?

Bearing these things in mind, what do I want to do? Do I want to embark on the venture or go into the situation. If so, how can I make it pleasurable and, if appropriate, minimise any pain?

Such people then aim to make the situation as positive as possible for themselves and other people. Other people may follow another approach in their lives or work. Let's explore this theme.

The Pain Approach

Some people learn to adjust to this approach early in life. They may have grown-up in a troubled family that was beset by conflicts. They may still find it challenging to manage their parents.

They may not have learned how to build positive relationships or find win-win solutions to problems. This could have led to pain for both themselves and other people.

They may have chosen to throw themselves into work and do what is required to get a well-paid job. Some people may also be addicted to the philosophy of no 'pain, no gain'.

Sometimes this takes the form of a Faustian pact. They may work long hours in a well-paid soul-destroying job in a toxic culture. They hope that one day they will be rich enough to retire and regain their soul.

They may develop negative addictions to numb the pain. They may drink, become resentful or blame others for their situation. This can have negative consequences for themselves or other people.

Some people may get to a point, however, where they look ahead and recognise the potential physical or psychological pain. They may then aim to prevent or manage the pain.

Some may also learn to make good use of the pain. Based on their own experience, they may choose to follow the pleasurable route and, as far as possible, minimise the pain.

They may also pass on their knowledge to help other people. They may work as counsellor, publish articles or create a website that enables other people to prevent or manage painful situations.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to follow elements of the pleasure approach? If appropriate, how can you prevent or manage any pain?

You may enjoy encouraging people, cooking, walking and doing other things that give you positive energy. You may enjoy doing satisfying work and helping other people to achieve success.

How can you keep doing these things in your life and work? How can you add more activities that may give pleasure to yourself or other people? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

*The Pleasure Approach
Rather Than The Pain Approach*

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Serving People Approach Rather Than The Self-Promoting Approach

Some people prefer to follow the serving people approach rather than the self-promoting approach. Let's explore how people may follow these paths.

The Serving People Approach

People who follow this approach want to help other people. They may do this when working as a carer, educator, craft worker, scientist, trusted advisor, leader, decision maker or in another role.

Some people follow this path because they simply want to help others. Some may want to serve a spiritual faith, a vocation or a sense of mission. Some want to care for people and the planet.

Some people follow this path in their daily lives. Some do it in their professional work. They may then aim to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and help people to succeed.

They like to focus on a purpose and follow their principles. They enjoy encouraging people but, at the same time, recognise warning signs if they stray into becoming a victim.

Such people love to give and, on occasions, may experience the helper's high. The real work is about serving something greater than themselves, however, it is not about them.

They love to share knowledge. They are happy to promote the work and how it can help people. But they often don't feel comfortable promoting themselves.

The Self-Promoting Approach

People who follow this approach make everything about them. They may focus on their own agenda, brag about their achievements and even come across as narcissists.

Some may say they are serving other people but are using these people as pawns in pursuit of their own goals. Some individuals may claim to be the smartest person in the room or take credit for other people's achievements.

People who are self-promoting are addicted to getting attention and can never get enough praise. Some may do increasingly extreme things to make sure that people are talking about them.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the serving people approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Serving People Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Strengths Coaching Approach

The Strengths Coaching Approach

There are many ways to help people. This is an approach that can be used with individuals, teams and organisations.

The approach starts by clarifying their picture of success. It then offers practical tools that they can use to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to achieve their goals. The strengths coaching approach is one that can be used to help individuals, teams and organisations to achieve their picture of success.

The approach starts by clarifying the real results people want to achieve. It then involves helping them to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve success.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. The following section looks at how you can use it to help a person to achieve their goals. You can also adapt this approach when helping teams or organisations to achieve their aims

Clarifying The Picture Of Success

Imagine that you are running a session with a person who has asked for your help. The first step is to create an encouraging environment in which they feel welcome and at ease.

You can then invite them to describe the specific topics they would like to explore. Some people may aim to regain a sense of control, overcome setbacks and refocus on their life goals. Some may aim to encourage other people.

Some may aim to find creative solutions to challenges. Some may aim to do satisfying work that pays a salary. Some may aim to achieve peak performance. Some may aim to leave a positive legacy.

Bearing in mind what the person wants to explore, explain what you can and can't offer. You can then make clear contracts about the topics to cover in the session.

Moving on to the first topic the person wants to explore, you can clarify what the person wants to achieve. Bearing in mind what the person can control in the situation, one approach is to explore the following themes.

What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving their goals? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their picture of success?

Imagine that you have explored this step. Before moving forwards, it can be useful to check that you are clear on what the person wants to achieve. You may want to say something along the following lines.

As far as I understand, the real results you want to achieve in this situation are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Is that right?

Sometimes you may immediately help a person to focus on finding solutions to a challenge or taking steps to reach a goal. You may also be able to offer some practical tools they can use to get some early successes.

On other occasions it can be useful to go through the following stages. You can help the person:

To build on their strengths ... To follow strategies that work ... To achieve their picture of success.

Let's explore how you can go focus on these themes. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

Strengths

Every person has strengths. Bearing this in mind, you can clarify how the person can use these to achieve their goal. Here are some themes it can be useful to explore.

What are the person's strengths? When do they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What are the things that give them positive energy? When are they in their element - at ease and able to excel? When do they flow, focus and finish?

When do they see the destination quickly? When do they go A, B ... and then leap to Z? Where do they have the ability to recognise patterns? Where do they have good radar and seem to know what will happen before it happens?

When do they make complicated things simple? What are the specific activities where they enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal? When do they have a sense of purpose, follow certain principles and achieve their picture of success?

Imagine you have clarified some of the person's strengths. It is then time to move on to the next stage.

Strategies That Work

The next step to help the person to follow strategies that work. This can involve helping them to learn from both their own and other people's successes.

Every person has a positive history. They have overcome challenges and worked to achieve specific goals. Bearing in mind what the person wants to achieve, you may want to explore the following themes.

Looking back, when has the person tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow some of these principles in the future?

When have other people tackled similar challenges successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can the person follow some of these principles in their own way?

Every person may also benefit by adding certain skills to their repertoire. Bearing this in mind, you may want to explore some of the following themes.

What is the person's goal? What are the strategies that work in these situations? Are there any other positive models and practical tools that can help them to achieve their goals? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can use?

Bearing these things in mind, what are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they translate these into a clear action plan?

Imagine that you have explored these themes. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Success

You can help the person to do their best to achieve their picture of success. If appropriate, look ahead and help the person to translate their strategies into a clear action plan. Here are some themes it can be useful to explore with the person.

How can they keep building on their strengths and following their successful style? How can they follow strategies that work? How can they get some early successes?

How can they do superb work? How can they encourage themselves on the journey? How can they anticipate and manage potential challenges? How can they do their best to achieve the picture of success?

There are many ways to help people to reach their goals. The strengths approach helps a person to build on their assets and add to their repertoire. It then enables them to do their best to achieve success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the strengths approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Strengths Coaching Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Redemption Approach

The Redemption Approach

Sometimes this can mean a person taking responsibility for their actions and working through the following steps.

- Step One – Responsibility and Recognition
- Step Two – Remorse and Recompense
- Step Three – Redemption and Rehabilitation

Everybody makes mistakes in life. Sometimes these only affect ourselves. Sometimes we may also do things that cause pain or problems for other people. We may do these consciously or unconsciously.

Whatever the reasons for our behaviour, we have several choices regarding how we react to what happened. We can choose:

To ignore or deny the consequences, or;

To take responsibility, recognise the consequences and act in ways that may in some way lead to atonement and redemption.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you made a mistake that may have hurt others? What did you do to try to redeem the situation? On reflection, what else would you have liked to have done?

Imagine that a person wants to atone for their actions and seek some form of redemption. They may focus on the following themes.

Step One - Responsibility and Recognition

This involves a person taking responsibility for their actions and recognising the consequences. Every person make mistakes that do not have huge consequences. But sometimes a person may act in ways that cause serious difficulties for people.

Different individuals react in different ways. Some refuse to take responsibility. They may blame others or try to justify their behaviour. Some abusers, for example, claim that they are actually the victims.

Some people who hurt others double-down on what they have done. They may claim to be right and refuse to apologise. Some may say others are at fault for taking offence.

The first step in any recovery programme is for a person to take responsibility for their actions. They need to say something like the following.

"I am responsible for my behaviour. Whatever the circumstances, I am responsible for how I react and how I behave in the future."

People who take this step also need to recognise the potential consequences of their actions. They may have caused pain, distress or hurt people in other ways.

Such individuals may have refused to have empathy. Whilst recognising that other people may react in different ways, they are still responsible for trying to behave in a caring way.

Imagine that a person has chosen to take responsibility and also recognised the potential consequences of their behaviour. They may then move to the next stage.

Step Two - Remorse and Recompense

This involves a person showing remorse and, where possible, aiming to make recompense for the problems they may have caused. Let's explore how a person may take this approach.

Some individuals express true remorse and sorrow for the pain they have caused. They may feel a deep aching in their gut and not yet know how they can help to repair the situation.

Some people may not really be remorseful. They may go through the motions of shedding crocodile tears or issue statements to say they are sorry for having caused any offence.

People who are really remorseful may aim to make recompense. Sometimes this can be possible but it may also be more difficult in certain situations.

A person who has caused financial problems may be able to make financial recompense. A person who has caused physical damage to property may act to restore it to its original condition.

It is harder to make recompense for causing psychological damage. Sometimes the only way is to ensure that the people who have been hurt are provided with the right support.

This may also involve the person who caused the damage to respect the healing process that is being done. They can also show remorse by staying away from the situation and letting others get on with their lives.

Some people who show remorse and make recompense may then move on to the next stage. They may focus on the following themes.

Step Three - Redemption and Rehabilitation

This involves a person taking a path towards redemption and, as a result, sometimes towards rehabilitation. Let's explore how a person may pursue these themes.

There are several definitions for the word redemption. The one we are using here is 'the act of aiming to atone for guilt, a fault or a mistake'. Different people do this in different ways.

Some individuals commit themselves to following a certain moral code or a set of principles. They may follow a spiritual faith, a Twelve Step programme or do good work that helps others.

Some individuals who have transgressed ethical standards or broken the law may confess their guilt and serve a criminal sentence. They may then aim to pursue a new life where they serve other people.

People who follow this path aim to pay for their actions and lead a better life. They do not do it for any self-serving motive of feeling satisfied that they have redeemed themselves.

Some individuals may also reach a point of rehabilitation. There are several definitions for this state. The one we are using here is 'the process of returning to or pursuing a healthy or good way of life'.

Those who take this path may find it to be a long journey. It may involve being rehabilitated in their own eyes and being rehabilitated in other people's eyes.

They therefore focus on what they can control. They then aim: a) to follow their chosen principles; b) to be caring towards other people; c) to continue to follow this path one day at a time.

They also rehearse how to avoid or manage trigger situations that previously resulted in them going into a negative spiral. They learn how to stay calm, clarify their options and choose to follow a positive way forwards.

Such people realise that redemption and rehabilitation may be a journey rather than a destination. They therefore aim to do their best during their remaining time on the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the redemption approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Redemption Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Putting In A Shift Approach

Putting In A Shift

There are many ways to do fine work. This approach involves taking the following steps. You can aim:

- To prepare properly before putting in a shift;
- To be fully present when putting in a shift;
- To perform superbly when putting in a shift.

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people can always be relied on to commit themselves fully and put in a shift. There are several definitions for this phrase. The one we are using here is:

To prepare properly, be fully present and perform superbly when doing a piece of work.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach. You may aim to do a counselling session, run a workshop, lead a project or do another piece of work. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

You Can Prepare Properly Before Putting In A Shift

Great workers set things up to succeed before doing a piece of work. They make sure that: a) they really want to do the work; b) they have at least a 7+/10 chance of achieving the goals; c) they do what they can to increase the chance of success.

You will prepare properly in your own way before doing a piece of work. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, one approach is to explore the following themes.

What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the picture of success?

How can I play to my strengths when doing the work? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I anticipate and manage any challenges?

How can I translate these strategies into a clear action plan? How can I rehearse following these strategies and also managing any challenges? What else can I do to increase the chances of achieving success?

Imagine that you have taken these steps. When appropriate, you may move on to the next stage.

You Can Be Fully Present When Putting In A Shift

Great workers have their own ritual for clicking into action. They may follow a certain routine, repeat their chosen mantra or follow their own approach for being positively engaged.

They are alive, alert and use their antennae to focus on what is happening. Some have the ability to helicopter above the situation to see patterns whilst also being hands-on and doing superb work.

Such workers concentrate fully. They also recognise that it may only be possible to maintain this state for a certain period of time. They therefore manage their energy properly by aiming:

To rehearse properly, follow their ritual for moving into action and be fully present;

To pursue their chosen strategies, get some early successes and perform superb work;

To build in times for rest, reflection and rehearsing what they are going to do next.

Imagine that you have taken these steps in your own way to be fully present when putting in shift. When appropriate, you may move on to the next stage.

You Can Perform Superbly When Putting In A Shift

Great workers aim to deliver high professional standards when doing a piece of work. They aim to do this when working as an educator, medic, technical specialist, leader or in another role.

They perform superb work but also keep reading reality. They focus on: a) what is happening; b) what is going well; c) what can be improved and how.

They also buy time to think when faced by challenges. They aim to clarify the real results to achieve, the possible options and the pluses and minuses of each option. They then pursue their chosen route.

Such workers finish properly. They continue to put in shift, do their best and keep improving. When appropriate, they may add that touch of class when achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of the putting in a shift approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Putting In A Shift Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

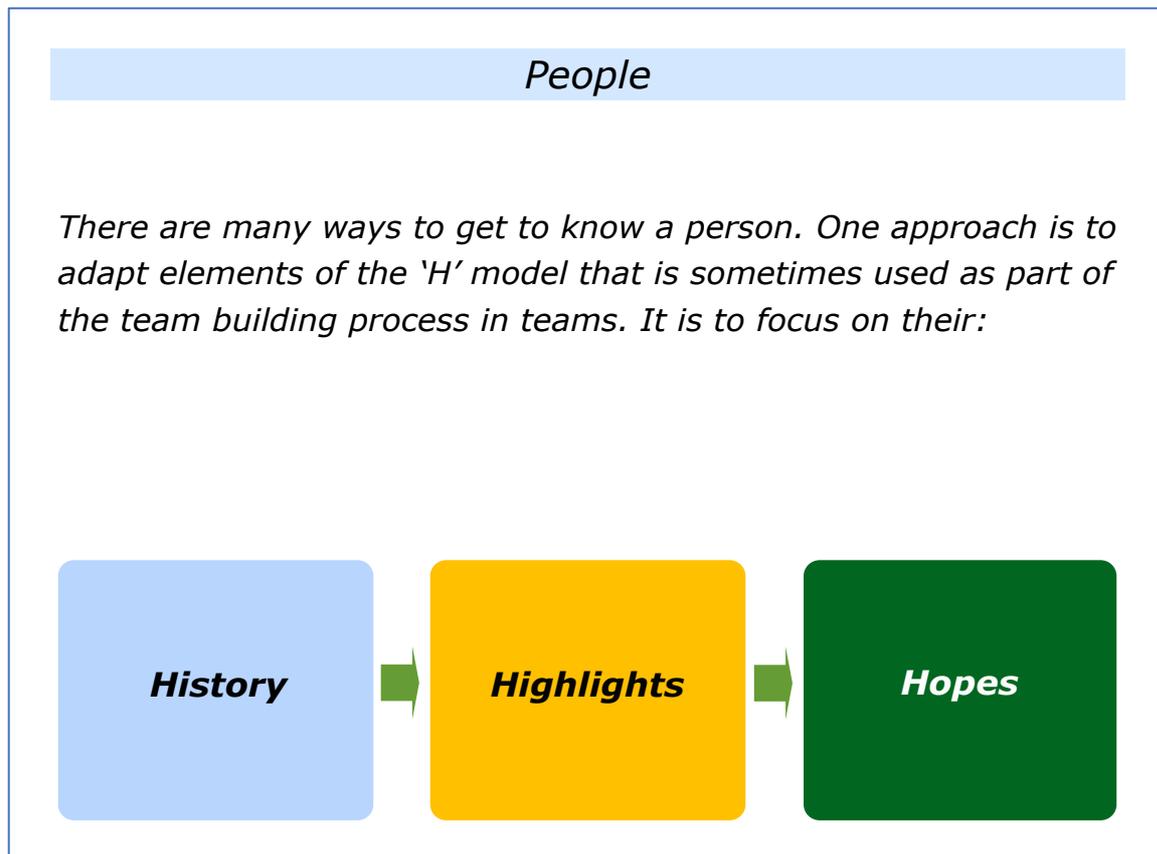

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The History, Highlights And Hopes Approach

There are many ways to get to know about a person's background and hopes. One approach is to adapt elements of the 'H' model that is sometimes used during team building in different kinds of teams.

The 'Four H' approach came to prominence after being used by sports teams such as the Cleveland Browns. The players were invited to open up at boot camp by describing their history, heroes, heartaches – such as disappointments - and hopes.

It has since been used by many coaches who want their athletes to get to know each other on another level. Some report that it helps to build camaraderie and teamwork.

The approach has a long history. Below is an excerpt from an article by Valerie Morby in which she describes how a different version has been used with people who work in various kinds of camps.

A Better Way to Break the Ice: The Five H's

The Five H's are a simple relational tool developed by Carrie "Duchess" Langemeier that she has used for nearly 20 years to get to know camp staffers on a deeper level.

Beginning with a few light topics, the Five H's then move into a place that necessitates more vulnerability, and finally ends on an exceedingly hopeful note!

Heritage: Your personal history. What type of family did you grow up in? Were you brought up in the faith? What is significant about your heritage that has shaped who you are today?

Heroes: Who has impacted you in a significant way? Who do you look up to?

Heartaches: What things have broken your heart? A parent's divorce? The death of a friend? Deep rejection at school? This is a safe way to allow a window into your soul.

Highlights: What are a few things in your life that you're most proud of? This is a fun way to share what you are really passionate about and what makes you soar. It can be anything from academic achievement to athletic success to getting the lead in the school play!

Hopes: What are some hopes you have for life? To what do you aspire? What are you expectant on the Lord to do or bring forth in your life?

Different people may use elements of this approach in different ways and for different reasons. A coach or mentor, for example, may use it to find out more about a person who has asked for their help.

The following pages describe some of the questions that such a professional may use. If appropriate, you may want to adapt these in your own way.

History

- Tell me about yourself. Where did you grow up? What did your parents do? What were you interested in as you grew up and as a teenager? What were your passions? How did you try to explore the things you were interested in?
- Who were the key people you learned from? Did you have any people – such as teachers or others – who took an interest in helping you? Were there any people who acted as positive models for you – these could be people you knew or admired?
- When did you begin work? What have been some of the jobs you have done? What have been the various things you have done in your personal and professional life? What have you learned from some of these experiences?

Highlights

- What have been some of the highlights in your personal and professional life? What did you do to help to create some of these positive things? What may other people have done to help you?
- What are your strengths? When have you done satisfying projects? What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? When have you also tackled challenges successfully?
- When have you encouraged other people? What did you do then to encourage them in your personal or professional life? What are some of the things you do now to try to encourage people and, when appropriate, help them to achieve success?

Hopes

- What are your hopes for the future? What are the specific things you want to do in your personal and professional life? What are your life goals? What will be the benefits of achieving these things - both for yourself and other people?
- What are the things you believe are important in life? What are the principles you want to follow? How do you want to behave in the future? What are the actual words you would like people to say about how you behave and what you do in life?
- Bearing these things in mind, what may be the top priorities you would like to focus on in your life or work? If you want to, we can explore some practical ways you can work towards achieving these goals and your picture of success.

There are many ways of following the 'H' approach when working with people. It can be used in groups – such as in workshops or boot camps – and in one-to-one meetings.

The key is to create a safe environment in which people feel able to open up. This can create the platform for them building on their strengths and working towards their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the history, highlights and hopes approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The History, Highlights And Hopes Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Obligations, Options And Outstanding Work Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people who have a sense of duty start by doing what they see as their obligations. They then focus on their further options and sometimes aim to do outstanding work.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

Obligations

Different people feel they have different obligations. These may be practical, psychological or philosophical.

Some may feel an obligation to care for their loved ones. Some may aim to follow their moral compass or faith. Some may aim to make full use of their talents. Some may aim to care for both present and future generations. Some may feel an obligation to care for the planet.

Different people fulfil their obligations in different ways. The following section describes how one person followed this approach before then focusing on their options.

Donna was a former athlete who felt ambivalent about her role as a psychologist in a state school. She enjoyed helping the individual students but worried about the school system.

She had reached her mid-thirties and felt at a critical point in her life. This was compounded by the need to care for her partner who was recovering from cancer.

Donna felt she had certain obligations regarding her relationships and vocation. She explained these in the following way.

Obligations

The obligations I have are:

To be the wage earner in the relationship with my partner and support her during her recovery from chemotherapy;

To support my parents as they get older – this will be emotionally, financially and practically;

To use my knowledge to help people – such as working with students and former athletes who have asked me to mentor them in their careers.

We looked at how Donna could follow what she believed to be her obligations. This involved finding a way to balance doing good work, earning a salary and caring for her loved ones.

She also needed to build in time for her own rest and recovery. Doing activities in which she could revitalise herself would give her more energy to give to other people.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. What do you believe to be your obligations? How do you want to do your best to fulfil these obligations?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Obligations

The specific things that I believe to be my obligations are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The specific things I want to do to do my best to fulfil these obligations are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Options

Imagine that you are doing your best to fulfil your obligations. It can then be useful to explore your future options. These can include the possible routes you can follow in your life and work.

Different people will have different options. Much will depend on their situation and the possible opportunities they have in their personal and professional lives.

Donna chose to take this approach but before going further it was important to know more about her background. This involved focusing on her strengths and successful style of working.

She had always been good at sports. Donna excelled at football, tennis and fencing. Whilst being able to compete at a high level, she became disillusioned with the ruthless cultures in some sports academies.

Continuing with her sporting career until her late-twenties, Donna then decided to qualify as a physical education teacher. She also developed an interest in coaching. This led to her coaching junior teams in football, hockey and individual sports.

Donna believed sport gave some young people a chance to flourish, but many others never got a chance to shine. Bearing this in mind, Donna decided to specialise in psychology.

She went on to take a series of jobs as a psychologist helping students in schools. The individual work was rewarding, but she found aspects of the educational culture to be troubling.

Donna had reached her mid-thirties and felt at a critical point in her life. The road she took in the future might define the rest of her career. What were her options?

We explored the routes she could pursue in the future. After some encouragement, she explored many possibilities she had not previously considered.

Options

The options that I have in my personal and professional life include the following:

I can stay in my present work ... I can do a similar role in another organisation ... I can try to influence the educational system by producing a blog or articles about how to help students who are different.

I can move to another country ... I can return to the US where I was on a sporting scholarship ... I can take a bigger role in sports coaching ... I can pursue a career in sports administration.

I can set up a business with my partner ... I can apply what I learned from sport in other fields ... I can use these skills to help people in business to achieve peak performance.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, what may be the possible options you could pursue? If you wish, try brainstorming all these possibilities.

Later we can focus on the route – or the combination of routes – you may want to follow. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Options

The possible options – the possible routes I can follow – in my personal and professional life are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Outstanding Results

Imagine that you have explored your obligations and the options going forwards. The next step will be to focus on how to follow your chosen option.

Different people pursue this part of the approach in different ways. When doing so, they sometimes aim:

To continue to fulfil their personal and professional obligations;

To follow the option – or combination of options - that gives them positive energy;

To then do their best to perform outstanding work.

Donna aimed to build what some people call a portfolio career. This involved bringing in enough income to support her loved ones and combining the following elements. She aimed:

To continue with her school psychologist role but eventually move to doing this three days a week;

To use her sports background to do peak performance coaching with some of the people she knew in businesses;

To provide support services for young people who were released from sports academies.

Donna worked on the plan for doing the coaching in business. It proved relatively simple to do such work on a complementary basis but it took longer to generate funding. This eventually happened, however, when she enable people to produce positive results.

Drawing on her work with sports, she helped sales people and others to set achievable goals. She then helped them to follow their chosen disciplines, manage setbacks and do their best to achieve peak performance.

Donna's journey is still a work in progress. Like many people in today's world, she is trying to fulfil what she sees as her obligations. She is also following her chosen option and aiming to do superb work.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you have clarified the option - or combination of options - that you want to follow in the future. If appropriate, how can you pursue this route and do your best to perform outstanding work?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Outstanding Work

The specific option – or combination of options – that I want to follow in the future is:

* To ...

The specific things I can do to do my best to do outstanding work when pursuing this option are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The Infrastructure Approach

Some people aim to put a good infrastructure in place to make sure that the basic important things get done. They may do when acting as parents, educators, leaders, decision makers or in other roles.

Getting this infrastructure right may not be the most glamorous of tasks but it provides a good platform. It takes care of the hygiene factors and makes sure the practical tasks get done.

People feel more secure when there is a predictable infrastructure in the family, school, work place or society. Getting this right releases people to do inspiring things in their lives or work.

Different people take this approach in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

An individual may take care of their health, get enough money and spend time with encouraging people. They may also follow a daily structure and manage their priorities. This provides a platform for them doing their best in life.

A couple may ensure all the practical tasks get done in a routine way. Sometimes this may also involve hiring domestic or other help. Putting these things in place can free them to care for their loved ones and also enjoy satisfying careers.

A leader may create a structure that ensures all the practical tasks get done. They communicate the organisation's purpose and principles. They then give people the support they need to make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

A caring society puts an infrastructure in place that ensures all people have the basic materials for life. Providing such an environment increases the chances of enabling people to shape their futures and live healthy and happy lives.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to put a good infrastructure in place? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you put this structure in place? What are the practical steps you can take? What will be the benefits? How can you build on this infrastructure and, for example, do things you find inspiring?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Infrastructure Approach

The specific situation where I may want to put a good infrastructure in place may be:

*

The specific things I can do to put a good infrastructure in place are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of putting a good infrastructure in place will be:

*

*

*

The Positive Goal Approach Rather Than The Wrong Problem Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to focus on trying to achieve the positive goal rather than trying to solve the wrong problem.

Good decision makers take this approach. They focus on the real results to achieve – the positive goal – and translate these into a clear picture of success.

Some decision makers take a different approach. They focus on fixing a certain problem. Sometimes this may be necessary. But it may or may not help to achieve the big positive goal.

There are many ways to focus on the positive goal rather than tackle the wrong problem. Let's look at one of the most common ways to follow this principle.

The Effectiveness Approach Rather Than Just The Efficiency Approach

Many organisations aim to be more efficient but this approach comes with a caveat. Some organisations may not focus on the right goals. They may simply be more efficient at climbing the wrong mountain.

Good organisations focus on being effective. They start by clarifying the real result to achieve – the right goals. They then implement the right strategies with the right people in the right way.

Great workers follow a similar approach. They aim to achieve effectiveness plus efficiency to deliver excellence. Bearing in mind the real results they want to achieve, they focus on the following themes.

Effectiveness

They clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

Efficiency

They follow the key strategies in the most efficient way whilst continually checking what is working and what can be improved to achieve success.

Excellence

They continue to pursue the effective strategies in an efficient way and deliver excellence on the way towards achieving success.

Looking back, I remember one workshop where the CEO expressed their concern regarding these themes. They expressed this in the following way.

"I am a bit worried that we may have fallen into the trap of aiming to be efficient but not actually focusing on being effective. We may need to go back and make sure we are aiming for the right goals in the right way."

The CEO and their leadership team clarified the real results to achieve in various situations. For example, when making a pitch to a potential client they focused on the outcomes they wanted to achieve. These were:

To start by showing that their company understood the client's goals;

To show how the company could use its strengths to help the client to achieve their goals;

To deliver a wonderful pitch that increased the chances of the client hiring the company to help them to achieve their goals.

The CEO also appointed a Mission Holder who would coordinate the company's resources and people to deliver a great pitch. That person made sure everything was done to increase the likelihood of working with the potential client.

Let's return to the theme of focusing on the positive goal rather than tackling the wrong problem. Here are some examples of how people have applied this approach in their personal and professional lives.

The Strengths Approach Rather Than The Fitting Into The System Approach

During one mentoring session a parent asked how to help her son to do better at school. She explained this in the following way.

"My fifteen-year-old son is dyslexic and also has ADHD. I would like him to pass the exams required to get into university. He struggles to do this, however, and I am uncertain if he will get in.

"Looking back at my own life, going to university helped me a lot. Being away from my family helped me to shape my future. It also gave me some friends for life. I would like him to have the same opportunity.

"My son has a short attention span, however, and sometimes gets impatient with the teachers. We have hired private tutors but this does not seem to help. Have you any suggestions to help him with his studies?"

Bearing these things in mind, I asked about her son's strengths. What did he enjoy doing? When did he come alive? What were the activities in which he showed self-discipline?

We explored these themes. At first she found it hard to clarify her son's strengths but then went on to give some clues. These provided some obvious ways forward. Here is a summary of what she described.

"Two years ago we went to Egypt. He spent a lot of time – and a lot of his money - in the markets. He bought lots of leather wallets and purses which he then sold to his friends.

"He invested the earning in buying lots of different things which he again sold at a profit. Recently he has started a Saturday job in a local vinyl record store. He talks about wanting money in his pocket rather than going to university."

Her son was a trader. He loved to buy, sell and make money. He was also good at it. This gave him a feeling of success and self-confidence. The opposite of what he got in school.

After some discussion we clarified the positive goal. This was to help her son to develop the ability: a) to build on his strengths; b) to do satisfying work; c) to earn a good salary.

There was little point in trying to fix the wrong problem. Certainly he could be helped to develop some skills to help him pass exams, but he was a pragmatist. He needed to see the point of what he was learning and then be able to apply it.

Some people will say that the solution was obvious – it was vital to build on the son's strengths. At the same time, it was important to recognise his mother's had good intentions. But maybe these were focusing on trying to solve the wrong problem.

The son went on to set up his own business selling goods on the internet. He then took a sales role in a high tech company but also continued to have several websites which provided him with an ongoing income.

The Destination Approach Rather Than The Change Approach

The CEO of a company faced a challenge that also called for shifting elements of the culture. He explained the situation in the following way.

"We have moved from being a relatively small business to one that now has over sixty people. We still provide good products but have expanded too quickly and also made mistakes by over-hiring.

"Some of our staff seem more intent on pursuing their own agendas rather than providing great service to their internal and external customers. This has resulted in internal conflicts and losing customers.

"Maybe it is our fault. We need to improve our recruitment and induction to make sure we get people who are service-minded. But that does not solve the immediate challenge.

"Yesterday I met the leaders of two specialist functions. They seem more interested in protecting the work of their own departments rather than focusing on the company's goals.

"I have tried to change their mindsets but have not succeeded. They seem more intent on following their own departments' processes rather than providing great service. Have you any suggestions?"

The CEO and I explored the possible options going forwards. The approach we chose was:

To focus on the positive goal – the company's picture of success - rather keep trying to get the two leaders to change their mindsets.

The CEO and I explored how to communicate the company's picture of success to the leaders. It would then be up to them to decide if they wanted to contribute. This involved taking the following approach.

There are many ways to build fine teams. One approach is to describe the following things to people.

The Destination – the team's goals and the benefits of achieving the picture of success;

The Dos – the strategies people can follow to do their best to reach the destination;

The Delivery – the specific things that need to be delivered – and by when – on the way to reaching the destination.

The next step is to invite people to take time to reflect and decide if they want to contribute. If so, it is then to make clear contracts about their best contribution towards helping the team to reach the destination.

The CEO took this approach when holding individual sessions with the two leaders. Here is the framework they used to invite each of them to decide if they wanted to contribute towards helping the company reach its destination.

The Destination

This is the destination. The outcomes we aim to achieve as a company are:

* To

* To

* To

The benefits of reaching this destination will be:

* To

* To

* To

The Dos

Here are some of the Dos to follow that will give us the greatest chance of reaching the destination.

* Do

* Do

* Do

The Delivery

*Here are some of the things that we aim to deliver
- and by when - on the way towards the destination*

*

*

*

The CEO emphasised the importance of each department focusing on the company's goals. This included giving good service to both their internal and external customers.

The individual sessions had mixed results. One department leader agreed to keep focusing on the big picture. They also ensured their department would proactively keep others informed about their progress towards making their contribution to the company's goals.

The other department leader adopted a different position. They reiterated why their people followed their certain processes. They wanted to protect their department's way of working rather than take another approach.

The CEO recognised the department's expertise. But they wanted the staff to channel this towards achieving the company's goals rather than their present aims. This would not happen under the present leadership.

Bearing this in mind, the CEO took they following steps. They replaced the present leader with somebody who, to use the well-known phrase, was:

A leader of experts rather than an expert who had been appointed as a leader.

The new departmental leader took they following steps. They were able:
a) to establish credibility in their own way; b) to coordinate the strengths of each person to work towards the company's goals; c) to deliver the desired concrete results.

The CEO helped the company to continue to achieve success. They did this by focusing on the positive goal which, in the process, also helped to solve the original problem.

The Positive Goal Approach Rather Than Rather Than The Wrong Problem Approach

There are many ways to apply this approach. Some people follow it, for example, when aiming to build a healthy society. They do practical work that focuses on helping people to maintain or improve their health, hope and happiness.

Some people – such as politicians – do not follow this approach. They prefer instead to focus only on the symptoms of failing to create a healthy society. This produces mixed results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to focus on the positive goal rather than the wrong problem? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Goal Approach Rather Than The Wrong Problem Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Individual, Inspiring And Institutional Approaches To Working

Different individuals follow different paths in the way they work. These include the individual, innovative and institutional ways. Sometimes they may also combine elements of each of these approaches.

The route a person chooses to follow may be influenced by their personality, their personal strengths and their professional goals. Let's explore these different ways to work.

The Individual Approach

People who take this route often want to follow their inner drive. They want to feel in control and follow their own way of working. They may work as a freelancer or, at times, as an individual contributor in a team or an organisation

Such an approach has certain pluses. The person can build on their strengths, follow their successful style of working and – if they are savvy – earn a reasonable salary. They may be able to do satisfying work that helps themselves and others to achieve success.

Sometimes there are minuses. The person may find that their style of working may not be accepted or, if they do not manage it properly, may bring them into conflict with others. They may also find it challenging to earn a living doing their preferred kinds of work.

The Inspiring Approach

People who take this route often want to do inspiring work. They may do this as an individual or with other people in a team or an organisation. They may then work through the stages of innovation, implementation and delivering a positive impact.

Such an approach has certain pluses. The person feels alive, alert and creative. They also keep learning. This can help them to keep developing and fulfil their professional goals.

Sometimes there are minuses. The person may need to keep finding or creating inspiring projects. They may also need to manage the workings of some institutions that find it difficult to evolve.

The Institutional Approach

People who take this route often want to work in an institution. They want to contribute to an organisation that has an influence and impact on people's lives. Some may even want to create an institution.

Such an approach has certain pluses. The person may feel they are in a relatively secure and stable role. They may also like the structured way of working and feel they are doing good work.

Sometimes there are minuses. The person may feel they have little control and are unable to influence the strategy of the institution. They may also find that what appears to be a secure role disappears as a result of changes in the world.

Some people combine elements of each approach. A person may do individual and inspiring work. They then want to pass on this knowledge by institutionalising it in a positive way.

Many people have followed this route. They did good work and passed on a body of knowledge. This led to the setting up of trades, professional bodies or institutions.

Some of these institutions acted as powers for good. They continued to follow their guiding principles – such as the rule of law or maintaining high professional standards.

Some institutions failed to follow their original purpose. They failed to evolve, became obsessed with their own survival or, in some cases, became corrupt.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow one or a combinations of these approaches?

How can you do this in your own way? How can build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses? What may happen as a result of you taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Individual, Inspiring And Institutional Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow one or a combination of these approaches may be:

*

The specific things I can do to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Improving By Working At A Higher Level Approach

A Higher Level

*There are many ways to keep improving.
These include the following ways.*

- You can work by yourself and deliver to a higher level;
- You can work with other people who have high standards and deliver to a higher level;
- You can work by yourself and with other people and deliver to an even higher level.

Many people want to keep improving in their personal or professional lives. They may aim to be better at encouraging other people, managing challenges, doing superb work, leading teams or doing another activity.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. Let's explore several ways it may be possible to deliver to a higher level.

You can work by yourself and deliver to a higher level

Some people take this route when aiming to develop. They do things that give them positive energy, gather practical information and start putting into practice.

Some do this when aiming to improve in their personal lives. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I have had a rewarding career which has helped to create a good lifestyle for myself and my family. Looking back, I probably have only one regret.

"I could probably have been kinder in several situations. So I spent a lot of time studying people who were kind. This opened my eyes to several of the principles followed by people who took this route.

"First, I then followed the path taken by many people – which is to focus on being grateful. Counting my blessings helped me to see things in perspective and be more patient in certain situations.

"Second, I tried to be kinder in my actions. These could involve encouraging a person, spending time with staff members to explore their career aspirations or doing other things to lift people's days.

"Third, I learned to buy time before responding to triggers that sometimes made me angry. This involved recognising the warning signs, staying calm and then following my chosen response. This helped a lot."

Some people take the individual route in their professional work. They may follow the passion, focus on the principles they want to follow and aim to do their personal best.

A person may do this when working as an artist, writer, gardener, therapist, crafts person or in another role. They follow their drive, maintain a daily discipline and deliver high quality work.

Whilst learning from the masters of their craft, they take home these lessons and apply them as an individual. They focus on becoming the best kind of professional they can be.

Imagine that you have aimed to develop by yourself – albeit by also being eclectic in what you learn from others. At a certain point, however, you may want to explore the following stage.

You can work with other people who have high standards and deliver to a higher level

Some people develop by working with people who consistently operate at a higher level. This is a step taken by many athletes, artistic performers and people in other professions.

People sometimes take this step in an organic way as part of their natural physical, psychological or professional development. They then aim to perform well at the next level.

Some individuals stretch themselves to take a bigger step than would be expected at a particular stage. Such a person may take time to adjust but then begin to deliver the required higher professional standards.

Some individuals take this step because, whilst they are still doing good work, their career may have plateaued. A professional footballer described this in the following way.

"Two seasons ago the club I played for was relegated to the second tier. I stayed with them for their first season in the new division. I enjoyed playing but the standard was different.

"I also play for my national team and the coach said it would be better for me to play in the top division. He made the point that I would soon become regarded as a second tier player.

"My club understood this and we found a solution. The club got a good fee and I moved back to the top division. This has helped me to develop and perform at a high level."

Looking at my own work, I have been stimulated by working with people who embody high standards. During my early career I was invited to work with a team of superb therapists. They acted as positive models and expected us to deliver great work.

Many years later I learned a lot when running a creativity workshop for entrepreneurs. Much of my previous work had been with motivated educators and leaders in business.

Suddenly I was working with high energy people who wanted something extra. Many of the people in the room were more creative than I would ever be - but it was possible to find a solution.

During the sessions I offered them several practical frameworks they could use to help themselves and their staff to channel their creativity. This taught me something about my work.

The previous groups I worked with liked the creative inputs I provided, but my work was actually quite structured. The entrepreneurs preferred the structures I provided to help them channel their creativity.

This led to creating more frameworks that could be offered to creative people, knowledge workers and decision makers. These enabled them channel their talents to continue doing top class work.

Imagine that you have developed by working with people who embody high standards. You may also want to consider the following stage.

You can work by yourself and with other people and deliver to an even higher level

Some people reach a stage their career where they follow this path. They may do so for the following reasons.

They want to return to focusing on their individual area of expertise

A person may want to do this for certain reasons. They may have a strong desire to build on their strengths, focus on a specific niche and do superb work.

They want to devote the majority of their time to pursuing their particular interest. They may find it is difficult to do this if, for example, much of their working day is taken up by organisational or administrative matters.

They may behave in a professional way within an organisation but feel driven to focus on a specific activity. They may then move on to pursue their individual route but, at the same time, take the following step.

They may collaborate with some people and deliver on an even higher level

Some individual workers like to spend some of their time working with stimulating people. This provides the inspiration to deliver work at an even high level. Different people follow this path in different ways.

Such a person may continue to do individual work but also do stimulating work with a small group, team or organisation. They may do this as an associate, consultant, contractor or in another role.

They may then aim: a) to use their strengths to make a positive contribution; b) to enable themselves and the people they work with to deliver great work.

Such a person may also continue to collaborate with kindred spirits. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I enjoy working alone but occasionally it is good to talk or work with people who share similar values. Sometimes we just share ideas but there are times when we work together."

"During the past two years, for example, we have collaborated on several stimulating projects. These have helped both our customers and ourselves to develop and deliver success."

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a specific activity where you would like to follow elements of the higher level approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Improving By Working At A Higher Level Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

*The specific things I can do to follow
this approach in my own way are:*

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result to taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Continuous Development Approach

There are many models for continuing to develop as a person or as a professional. The following section describes one approach that individuals can follow in their own way.

Imagine that you want to try using this approach. This involves focusing on the following steps.

Caring

The first step is to choose a specific activity that you care about in which you would like to develop. Different people choose different activities when taking this step. Here are some of the topics they may mention.

The specific activity I care about in which I would like to develop is:

Encouraging my daughter ... Developing as a writer ... Counselling people who have PTSD ... Building a successful team ... Managing my manager ... Presenting to large groups ... Being a better sports coach ... Scaling a business.

The caring part is crucial and provides the motivation to keep developing. It involves the heart as well as the head. You are then more likely to deliver the desired results. Imagine that you want to take this step. If so, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

What is the specific activity I care about in which I would like to develop? What would be the benefits – both for myself and for other people? On a scale 0-10, how motivated do I feel to develop in this area?

Let's assume you have worked through these questions. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Clarity

Imagine that you have chosen a specific activity in which you want to develop. The next step is to clarify what you want to achieve in this area. You can then aim:

To clarify the real results you want to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the key strategies you can follow to do your best to achieve the picture of success;

To clarify how you can build on your strengths and maybe add other skills to achieve the picture of success.

Let's look at one example. A person I worked with wanted to develop as a leader. This involved inviting them to work through the following framework. I have included given examples regarding some of the themes they covered.

Clarity

The Picture Of Success - The real results I want to achieve are:

- * To build a positive team that does superb work and achieves its picture of success.*

The strategies I can follow to do my best to achieve this picture of success are:

- * To clarify and communicate the team's purpose, principles and picture of success;*
- * To build a team of people who are positive, professional and want to help to achieve the picture of success;*
- * To make clear contracts with people about their best contributions, enable them to perform superb work and do my best to ensure we achieve the picture of success.*

The specific things I can do to build on my strengths and add other skills to do my best to achieve the picture of success are:

- * To be a positive and keep communicating the picture of success;*
- * To coordinate people's strengths to achieve the picture of success;*
- * To be better at keeping my key stakeholders informed – such as people at the centre – and produce success stories that show we are on the way towards achieving the picture of success.*

Imagine that you have established clarity about the results to achieve. It can then be useful to focus on the next theme.

Consistently High Standards

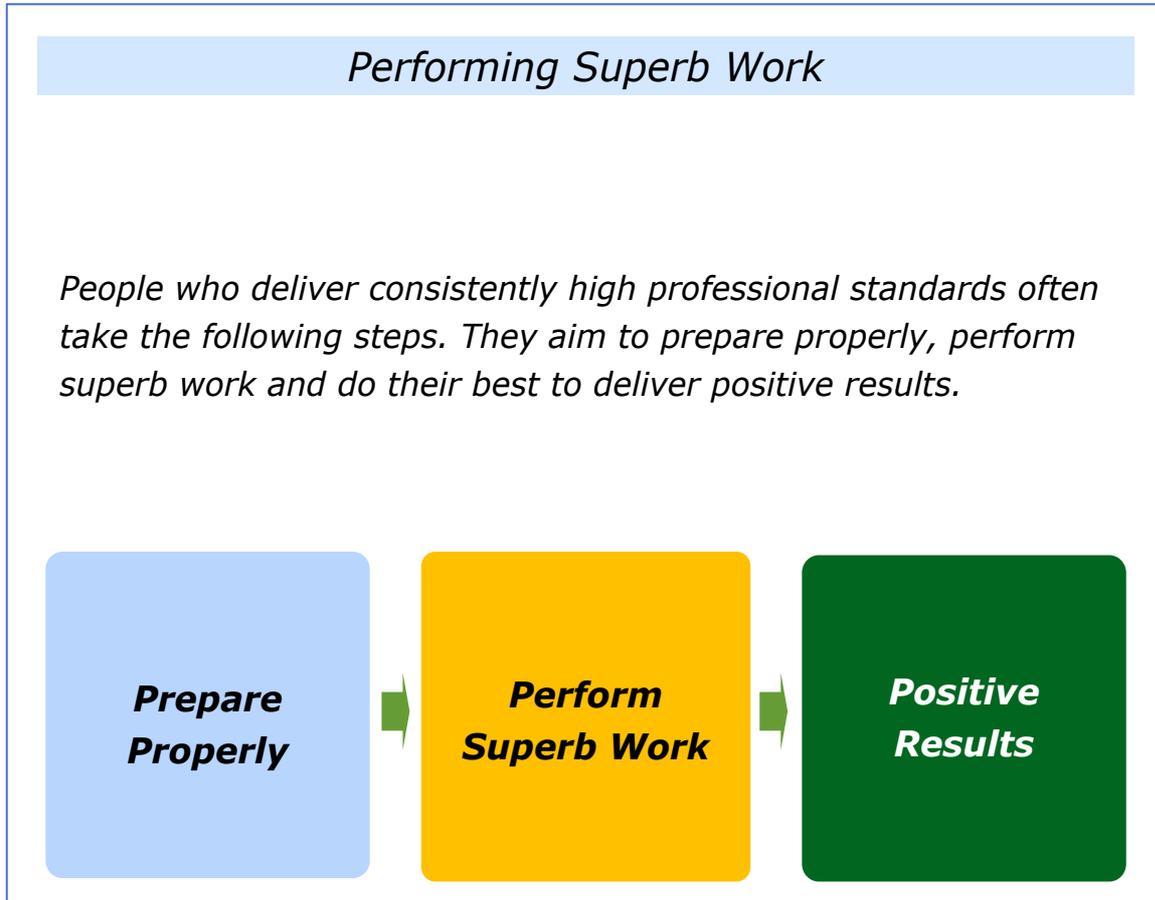

People who choose to develop often aim to deliver consistently high standards in their chosen activity. One approach is for them to prepare properly, perform superb work and get positive results.

Let's assume that you have clarified the strategies you can follow to do your best to achieve the desired results. If appropriate, the next steps may be these.

To rehearse following these strategies – plus anticipating how to manage any challenges – on the way towards achieving the desired positive results;

To translate the strategies into action, perform superb work and find solutions to any potential challenges;

To deliver consistently high standards and do your best to achieve the desired positive results.

Great workers follow the old rule that practice makes permanent. They rehearse what they are going to do, do their best to achieve their goals and reflect on their performance.

They then aim to keep improving and repeating the process until they consistently deliver high standards. They may then move on to the next stage.

Creativity

Some people apply their creativity and do something special to deliver the desired results. Different people do this in different ways. Here are some of the approaches they may use.

Some people have great personal radar – they seem to know what will happen before it happens. They then reach into their repertoire of skills and apply these to get the desired results.

Some people quickly see patterns in a situation. They then build on the successful patterns – and manage the negative pattern – to do what is required to deliver the desired results.

Some people apply their strengths to do superb work. They then seem to go into another dimension – their equivalent of flow or the zone – and produce something magical to achieve the picture of success.

You will have your own approach to making creative breakthroughs. At some point you may buy time to think, however, and explore the following themes.

Clarity. What are the real results I want to achieve?

Creativity. What are the potential creative solutions? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? Is it possible to combine any of these options? Are there any other things I can do to achieve the goals?

Concrete Results. What is the route I want to follow? How can I do my best to achieve the desired concrete results?

Sometimes you will try several things and look for what works. Spotting a potential successful strategy, you will keep following it. You will then do your best to find creative solutions to the challenges.

Concrete Results

Great workers aim to achieve the desired concrete results. They may aim to implement a strategy successfully, hone a skill or do something else that achieves the picture of success.

Different people measure success in different ways. One approach is for them to clarify the actual things that will be happening that will show they have achieved their goals.

Some people take another approach. They clarify the actual words that they would like to hear people - such as their various stakeholders - saying about the work they have done or are doing.

The leader mentioned earlier took this approach. They then did their best to increase the likelihood of people saying these things. Here is the exercise. You would, of course, describe your own group of stakeholders.

My Stakeholders

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like the various stakeholders to be saying about the work that I have done or am doing are the following.

The CEO

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like them to be saying about the work that I and my team are doing are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

My Peers

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like them to be saying about the work that I and my team are doing are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

Our Clients

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like them to be saying about the work that I and my team are doing are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

My Team Members

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like them to be saying about the work I am doing as the leader of the team are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

Myself

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like to be saying about the work I am doing as a leader are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to do my best to increase the likelihood of me saying these things are:

*

*

*

Let's return to your own development. Imagine that you have delivered the desired positive results. If appropriate, you may also want to take time to reflect. This can also involve focusing on the following theme.

Continuous Development

Different people choose different ways to continue to develop. Some keep a journal, diary or other form of log. One approach is to keep something called My Development Book.

Imagine you have done a piece of work. If appropriate, you can reflect on the following themes:

The specific things you did right or did well and how you can follow these principles more in the future;

The specific things you could have done better and how you can apply these lessons in the future;

The specific other things that you learned from the experience and how you can apply these lessons in the future.

Some people continue to follow elements of this approach throughout their lives. They may do this by keeping a journal or by using the framework to clarify their thoughts and then continuing to develop. Here is the exercise on this theme.

My Development Book

The specific things I can do to build on my strengths and also tackle areas for improvement.

The specific piece of work I did was:

*

The specific things I did right or did well when doing this piece of work were:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to follow these principles in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific things I could have done better when doing the piece of work – and how I can apply these lessons in the future- were:

*

*

*

The specific other things that I learned from the experience – and how I can apply these lessons in the future - were:

*

*

*

Many people love to develop. This piece explored one approach where a person can focus on the themes of caring, clarity, consistently high standards, creativity and concrete results.

Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How could you follow this in your own way? This could be when developing yourself or helping another person to develop.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Continuous Development Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Successful Recruitment Approach

Successful Recruitment

There are many models for recruitment. The following pages provide an introduction to the following approaches.

-  The Specific Principles Approach;
-  The Specific Results And The Successful Patterns Approach;
-  The Specific Strengths Approach;
-  The Specific Stakeholders Approach;
-  The Specific Legacy Approach.

Great organisations aim to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. They therefore employ people who aim:

*To follow the organisation's principles ... To be positive and professional ...
To make their best contribution towards achieving the organisation's picture of success.*

There are many models for recruitment. The following pages describe some of the approaches that are more likely to increase the chances of success.

These approaches also come with a caveat. It can be vital to build in a period of probation. You will then be more able to see whether a person actually behaves in a way that contributes to the organisation. Let's explore these approaches.

The Specific Principles Approach

Great organisations sometimes start by being personality driven by a strong founder or leadership team. They may only thrive in the long-term, however, if they become principles driven.

Such organisations often focus on clarifying and communicating their principles. These provide a guiding compass. People can then use their personalities to follow these principles in their work.

Bearing this in mind, such organisations aim to recruit people who want to apply their strengths to follow the principles. Some take the following approach before interviewing a person.

The organisation sends the candidate its culture handbook. This describes:

The specific principles it encourages people to follow on the way towards achieving the organisation's goals;

The specific reasons for following these principles on the way towards achieving the organisation's goals

The specific examples of how people have translated these principles into action on the way towards achieving the organisation's goals.

The organisation then invites the candidate do some prework which they present at the interview. They are asked:

To describe a specific situation in the past when they have aimed to follow some of these principles in their personal or professional lives;

To describe the specific things they did to translate some of these principles into action;

To look ahead and describe the specific things they would aim to do to follow some of these principles in their potential work for the organisation.

This sounds like a lot of work and it is. When appropriate, however, the candidates are given lots of support and suggestions regarding how to complete the task.

Great organisation take these steps, however, to increase the chances of recruiting the right people. They then encourage them to keep following the principles and work towards the organisation's picture of success.

The Specific Results And The Successful Patterns Approach

Specific Results

This approach involves focusing on the candidate's successful pattern for delivering the desired results. It involves focusing on the following themes.

- What are the specific results we want a person deliver in a particular role?*
- When has the candidate delivered these kinds of results in the past?*
- What would the candidate do to deliver the desired results in the particular role?*

This approach involves clarifying the results to be delivered in a particular role and whether a person has a successful pattern of delivering such results. It involves focusing on the following themes.

The specific results that you want a person – such as an A Player - to deliver in a particular role. For example: We want them: a) to .. b) to ... c) to ... Try to be as specific as possible.

The candidate's successful pattern in the past for delivering these kinds of results. It is useful to focus on what they did right then – the principles they followed – to deliver the results.

The specific things that the candidate would actually do to deliver the desired results in the particular role. It is important to explore this theme with them.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. There are different ways of advertising a particular role.

Some organisations still list all the tasks that the person should be good at doing. Another route is to focus on the qualities they want people to demonstrate and the results they want them to deliver.

Imagine that your organisation wants to hire a Chief Operating Officer. There are many ways to advertise such a role. One approach is to describe the headline results you want them to deliver.

These headlines can, of course, be brought to life by giving specific examples. Here is one way of describing such a position.

Chief Operating Officer

We are looking to hire a positive and professional COO who wants to help us to achieve our picture of success. The specific results we want somebody in this role to deliver include the following:

- To stay close to the CEO, coordinate the organisation's agreed strategies and partner with their senior peers and other colleagues to ensure that these are delivered successfully;*
- To lead a superb operations team that partners with the key stakeholders and colleagues to ensure that the organisation's strategies are implemented successfully;*
- To build in enough space to anticipate and deal with potential challenges, support continuous improvement and manage any other crises successfully.*

Imagine that you are ready to interview somebody for this role. You then aim:

To clarify whether the person has a successful pattern for delivering the desired results.

How to take this step? One approach is to invite them to do some prework before the interview. Here is one way to describe what you would like to them do. You can send them the following email.

The COO Role – The Prewrite And Presentation

We are looking forward to seeing you at the interview for the COO role. We would like you to do some prework before the meeting. Here is an introduction to what we would like you to do.

The specific results we want somebody to deliver in this role include the following:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Bearing these things in mind, we would like you to present the following things during the interview.

To describe a specific situation in the past when you have delivered some of these kinds of results;

To describe the specific things you actually did then – such as the principles you followed and how you translated these into action – to deliver these results;

To describe the specific things you would do to deliver the results we want the COO to deliver for our organisation.

Let us know if you would like any information that will help you to make this presentation. You can then make this presentation in any way you wish.

Again, we look forward to seeing you at the interview.

People develop rather than change. It is therefore vital to find whether a person has a successful pattern for delivering the kinds of results you want. If appropriate, you can help them build on this ability to deliver the required results for your organisation.

The Specific Strengths Approach

Some organisations recruit people who may have specific strengths. They are therefore always on the lookout for talent and may recruit a person because either:

The person has strengths the organisation can use to fulfil a present need – such as a role to be filled - to help it achieve its picture of success;

The person has strengths the organisation may be able to use in some way – such as an associate, consultant, specialist or in a future role - to help it achieve its picture of success.

This approach is one that also involves a person doing some prework before the interview. When taking this approach, it can be useful to send the person some information about the organisation's principles and picture of success.

The way that the person tackles the exercises can provide clues about their character. Here are the exercises. You can, of course, adapt these in your own way.

My Strengths And Best Contribution To The Organisation

Introduction

The following slides invite you to clarify your best contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals.

We appreciate that it will take you some time to do this exercise but it can be useful to do this before the interview. When doing it, bear in mind the organisation's goals – we can explain more about these if you wish.

Also bear in mind the values we try to follow in our work. You will find more information about these in the organisation's cultural handbook that we have sent to you.

Two points are worth bearing in mind when doing the exercise.

First, try to be honest as possible when doing it. Second, do the exercise to the extent to which you feel able with the information that you have available.

Describe your strengths – the activities in which you have the ability to deliver As.

Describe the deeply satisfying activities in which you have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. These may be particular kinds of tasks, activities or projects. Try to be as specific as possible and give concrete examples.

Describe the activities in which you may deliver Bs or Cs.

The B activities are probably those that you do reasonably well. They are not your As. The C activities are those in which you have little aptitude.

Describe your best contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Bearing in mind the organisation's goals and your strengths, the exercise then invites you to describe the following things.

Describe the specific results you aim to deliver towards achieving the organisation's goals.

These aims should be written in outcome terms - such as the specific results you will deliver - rather than as a list of activities. As mentioned earlier, we can give you more information about the goals and the values we aim to follow when doing our work.

Describe the specific benefits - to the various stakeholders - of delivering these results.

Describe the specific things you will do to proactively update people about your progress towards achieving the results.

Describe the specific support you would like to help you to achieve the results.

Describe specific early successes you will aim to deliver.

Some Background

We aim to build a strengths-based organisation and coordinate these strengths to reach the goal.

We must, however, deliver the organisation's goals. These are the mandatory things that people must contribute towards delivering. This will sometimes mean everybody getting involved in doing great work and helping to do the other tasks.

We want to encourage you to build on your strengths, because you are then more likely to do great work. At the same time, however, it is your responsibility to manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

We want to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Once the outcomes are agreed, we ask you to be accountable for delivering the goods. How you achieve this - providing you follow the organisation's agreed principles - is up to you and your team.

My Strengths

My Strengths

The specific activities in which I have the ability to deliver As - rather than Bs or Cs - together with some examples are:

1)

For example:

*

*

*

2)

For example:

*

*

*

3)

For example:

*

*

*

Bs. The specific activities in which I deliver Bs are:

1)

For example:

2)

For example:

Cs. The specific activities in which I deliver Cs are:

1)

For example:

*My Best Contribution Towards Achieving
The Organisation's Goals*

My Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the organisation's goals and my strengths, the specific results I want to deliver towards achieving the goals are:

1) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

2) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

3) To

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Specific Benefits

The specific benefits of making this contribution - for the organisation, customers, colleagues and other stakeholders - will be:

1) To ...

For example:

2) To ...

For example:

3) To ...

For example:

Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering the results will be:

1) To ...

For example:

2) To ...

For example:

3) To ...

For example:

Specific Support

The specific support I would like to help me to achieve the goals, plus the support I will give to other people, is:

1) To ...

For example:

2) To ...

For example:

3) To ...

For example:

Specific Early Successes

The specific early successes I will aim to deliver will be:

1) To ...

For example:

2) To ...

For example:

3) To ...

For example:

The Specific Stakeholders Approach

This is an approach starts by describing the key stakeholders a candidate may need to satisfy and the results each of these may want them to deliver. After giving this background, it then invites the person to do the following prework.

To list the key stakeholders they want to satisfy – such as their bosses, the various customers, their colleagues and other stakeholders;

To describe the actual words they would like to hear each of these stakeholders saying after their first three months about the work they are delivering;

To describe the specific things they can do to increase the likelihood of each of these stakeholders are saying these words.

Imagine that a person is applying to lead a team that aims to provide great service to both its external and internal customers. They may then write something like the following.

The Team's External Customers – The actual words I would like them to be saying about the service we offer are these.

"The team really understands our business ... They deliver great service that helps us to achieve our goals ... They act as one-stop shop for dealing with problems ... They are true partners and help us to achieve success."

The Team's Internal Customers – The actual words I would like them to be saying about the service we offer are these.

"The team helps us to deliver our targets ... It delivers great service to its internal customers ... It is self-managing, proactive and makes a good contribution to the business."

Here is the exercise. A person can describe what they want their stakeholders to be saying and then aim to deliver this picture of success.

My Stakeholders

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like my key stakeholders to be saying about my contribution after my first three months at the organisation.

Introduction

This is an old exercise that you may have done many times in service organisations but it can still be useful to do before the interview. It invites you:

To write the names of your key stakeholders both inside and outside the organisation – let us know if you want more information about whom these may be;

To describe the actual words or phrases you would like each of these stakeholders to be saying after three months about your work and what you are delivering for the organisation;

To describe the specific things you can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things.

We can then explore some of the practical steps you may want to take to increase the chances of these stakeholders saying some of these things. Here is the exercise.

The CEO (only if you are reporting directly to them)

The actual words I would like them to be saying about the work I am delivering and the contribution I am making to the organisation are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

My Manager

The actual words I would like them to be saying about the work I am delivering and the contribution I am making to the organisation are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

My Colleagues

The actual words I would like them to be saying about the work I am delivering and the way I am working with them are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

The Clients

The actual words I would like them to be saying about the work I am delivering and the way I am helping them to achieve success are:

"....."

"....."

"....."

The specific things I can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these things are:

*

*

*

The Specific Legacy Approach

There are many model for recruiting people. You will obviously use the approach that you feel will increase the likelihood of recruiting successfully. Here is a final exercise on this theme.

People often want to pass on a positive legacy. They may want to achieve certain things or help other people. They may also want to pass knowledge or practical tools that enable people to shape a positive future.

This is an approach that can be used when interviewing a person for a role or helping them to set goals in a new job. Here is one way to introduce it to a person.

"There are many ways to set goals. One approach I would like you to explore is to look into the future and do an exercise called My Specific Legacy.

"This invites you to describe three things you want to have achieved or to have passed on by the time you move on from the role. We can then explore how to achieve these things. Here is the exercise."

Different people write different things when doing this exercise. The HR Director of a famous company said that they wanted:

To have helped to build a strengths based company that continued to achieve ongoing success;

To have built a professional HR team that continues to implement the company's strengths based people strategies and enables it to achieve ongoing success;

To have delivered a pioneering corporate responsibility programme that has applied the company's strengths to partner with a social enterprise and achieve ongoing success.

Here is the exercise you can invite a person to do. If appropriate, you can then explore with them how they can aim to deliver this specific legacy.

My Specific Legacy

The three things I want to have achieved or to have passed on by the time I move on from the role are:

* To have ...

For example ...

* To have ...

For example ...

* To have ...

For example ...

Helping People To Develop

The following section focuses on possible ways to continue to help people to develop.

The Trusted Advisor Approach

The Trusted Advisor Approach

There are many ways to act as a trusted advisor. One approach is to create an encouraging environment and clarify the topics a person wants to explore. They then take the following steps.

- They clarify the real results the person wants to achieve and clarify the picture of success;*
- They clarify the strategies the person can follow to achieve the picture of success;*
- They pass on knowledge and practical tools the person can use to achieve their picture of success.*

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to act as a trusted advisor. Different advisors have different kinds of expertise.

They may be good at helping people to shape their future lives, develop their careers, tackle business issues, deal with crises or find solutions to other challenges. One common theme, however, is that:

They use their knowledge to help people to achieve their picture of success.

This article is based on the workshops I used to run for organisations that wanted their people to act as trusted advisors.

If you wish, you can take the ideas you like from this article and use them in your own way to run such workshops. Here is the introduction to the workshop.

The Trusted Advisor Workshop

This workshop focuses on how people can build on their strengths and be good trusted advisors. It shows how they can use their knowledge to help their clients and their organisation to achieve ongoing success.

The workshop provides practical tools that people can use:

To identify the qualities demonstrated by good trusted advisors;

To prepare properly for a session with a client and make sure they understand the person's world;

To create a positive environment in which the person feels ease and able to explore their challenges;

To clarify the real results the person wants to achieve and translate these into a clear picture of success;

To use the Three C Model – focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results – to help the person to achieve their goals;

To pass on knowledge in a way that the person can use to achieve their picture of success;

To continue to build good relationships that enable both the client and their own organisation to achieve ongoing success.

The workshop will be positive and practical. The session is best followed up by producing success stories. These are to show how people have used the principles to help both the clients and their own organisation to achieve success.

The following sections provide ideas you can adapt in your own way to run a workshop. The article also invites you to do some of the exercises that you can give to people. Let's start by exploring the first theme.

The Qualities Demonstrated By Trusted Advisors

Looking at your life and work, are there any times when you act as a trusted advisor to other people? You may take this role as a friend, educator, mentor, client manager, technical advisor, problem solver or other kind of professional.

There are many books on this topic. One of the most respected is The Trusted Advisor by David Maister, Charles Green and Robert Galford. They believe that such people earn their client's trust by building good relationships and offering effective advice.

So how can you be a good trusted advisor? What are the qualities you can demonstrate to help people to feel valued? How can you then help them to achieve their goals?

One approach is to begin by looking at your own experiences. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme called My Trusted Advisor.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a time when somebody acted as a trusted advisor for you? They may have been a friend, teacher, coach, mentor, doctor, lawyer or in some other role. What did they do right then to act as a trusted advisor? Try describing the following things.

Describe the person who acted as a trusted advisor for you.

Describe the specific things they did – the principles they followed – to act as a trusted advisor for you.

Here is the exercise on this topic. This is followed by a list of the common themes that emerge when people do this exercise.

My Trusted Advisor

The name of the person who acted as a trusted advisor for me at some point in my life was:

*

The specific things the person did well – the principles they followed - to act as a trusted advisor for me were:

*

*

*

My Trusted Advisor

Some of the common themes that emerge when people do this exercise

My Trusted Advisor Did Some Of The Following Things

- They were warm and welcoming. They made me feel the centre of their world.
- They listened to my story and showed that they understood what I wanted to achieve. They played back what they believed were my goals.
- They outlined some of the possible options for going forward together with the pluses and minuses of each option.
- They then asked if it was okay for them to share some ideas.
- They passed on their knowledge and provided practical tips that added to the possible options for going forwards.

- They shared their knowledge in a way that I could understand and use to achieve my goals.
- They underlined that it was ultimately my decision regarding the route I wanted to follow.
- They gave me time to reflect. They then, once I had made my decision, again explained the implications.
- They explained what I could expect to happen and the various roles - their role, my role and the roles of other people - as we moved forwards.
- They then used their compassion, knowledge and skills to provide support and do their best to help me to reach my goals.

Building On Your Strengths As A Trusted Advisor

Before meeting with a person, it can be useful to clarify your strengths as a trusted advisor. Different advisors have different areas of expertise, so it can be useful to know what you can offer to people.

You may be good at helping people by passing on knowledge, strategies or practical tools. You may be good at creative problem solving, providing technical solutions or helping people in other ways.

It can also be useful to clarify your organisation's strengths. You may then be able to involve other people in the organisation who can provide these things to help clients.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on these themes.

*Building On My Strengths
As A Trusted Advisor*

My Strengths As A Trusted Advisor

The strengths I have as a trusted advisor is that I can help clients in the following ways:

*

*

*

My Organisation's Strengths

The strengths we have as an organisation is that we can help clients in the following ways:

*

*

*

Trusted Advisors Prepare Properly For The Session

The following section provides a framework that you can use to prepare for the session. It focuses on: a) How you can understand the person you are going to meet; b) How you can help them to achieve their picture of success.

This exercise invites you to do the following things to increase the chances of running a successful session. It asks you:

To clarify what you know about the person and what is happening in their world;

To clarify the topics the person may want to explore;

To clarify how you and your organisation can help them to achieve success;

To clarify the actual words you would like the person to be saying after the session;

To clarify how you can do your best to ensure they are saying these things.

This is a key exercise that I use on the workshops. People spend around 20 minutes completing the written part of the exercise. They then share their ideas with others in the group.

People say that they find it extremely useful. Some have introduced it throughout their organisations to ensure their staff prepare properly for meetings with clients.

The following section starts with some of the questions the trusted advisor can ask themselves before meeting a person. This helps to ensure they understand the person and what may be happening in their world.

Trusted Advisors Prepare Properly For The Session

They ask themselves the following questions:

- Who is the person I am going to meet? What is happening in their world at the moment? What may be the challenges they face in their life and work? What may be their goals and picture of success?

- What is the reason they want to meet? What may be the topics they want to discuss? What for them would make it a valuable session? What are the practical things they may want to do after the session to help them to achieve their goals?

- How can I make the person feel welcome? How can I clarify the topics they want to explore? How can I provide knowledge and practical tools they can use in their daily lives and work? How can I help them to achieve their picture of success?

Imagine that you have answered some of these questions. You can then move on to completing the following exercise.

Write the name of the actual person you are going to meet and work through the following steps. Trusted advisors often do this before meeting each of their clients because it increases the chances of achieving success.

Being A Trusted Advisor

*The name of the person - the client -
I want to help by acting as a trusted advisor and helping them to succeed is:*

*

The Person's World

The specific things that may be happening in the person's world at the moment, the challenges they may face and the goals they may want to achieve in their work are:

*

*

*

The Person's Agenda

The specific topics the person may want to explore in the meeting are:

 How to ...*

 How to ...*

 How to ...*

The Specific Ways That I And Our Organisation Can Help The Person

The specific things I (We) can do to help the person to tackle their challenges and achieve their goals are:

The actual words I would like the person to be saying after the meeting are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to increase the likelihood of them saying these kinds of things are:

*

*

*

Trusted Advisors Follow Their Chosen Model For Running A Successful Session

Different trusted advisors have different areas of expertise. They also follow their chosen model for running a session. One common factor, however, is that they often rehearse a session.

They rehearse welcoming the person, creating an encouraging environment and helping the person to feel at ease;

They rehearse clarifying the topics that the person wants to explore and agreeing the goals for the session;

They rehearse exploring the various topics and, when appropriate, passing on knowledge and practical tools the person can use to achieve their goals;

They rehearse any possible challenges or unexpected things that might happen in the session and how to help the person in these situations;

They rehearse checking with the person that everything has been covered and doing whatever is required to run a successful session.

The following section outlines one approach to running a session. You will, of course, have your own approach.

One Approach To Running A Session

You can prepare properly for the session. You start the actual session by making the person feel welcome and clarifying the topics they want to explore.

You can then go through the following steps. You can then repeat these for focusing on each theme the person wants to explore.

- You can focus on the first theme the person wants to explore. Clarity is vital. Bearing in mind what the person can control in the situation, take the following step. You can clarify the real results the person wants to achieve – their picture of success.*

- You can follow your chosen model for helping the person to achieve their goals. You can help them to clarify the possible ways forward together with the pluses and minuses of each option. You can then ask if it is okay to share some ideas.*

- You can pass on knowledge and practical tools the person can use to achieve their goals. You can see which ideas resonate and explore these further. You can invite the person to make their own plan for working to achieve their picture of success.*

Trusted Advisors Sometimes Follow Elements Of The Three C Model For Helping A Person To Achieve Their Picture Of Success

You will have your own approach to helping a person to achieve their goals. One approach is to use the Three C Model that focuses on clarity, creativity and concrete results.

Clarity is crucial. Sometimes a person comes with specific problem they want fixed and it important to deal with this issue. At the same time, however, it is vital to clarify the real results a person wants to achieve.

You will do this in your own way but one approach is to clarify the person's short and longer-term goals. Bearing in mind what the person can control in the situation, you can help to clarify the real results the person wants to achieve. Here are some examples.

Person A originally said:

How can we fix an immediate problem with a difficult customer? They have hired us to do work that doesn't play to our strengths and they make life miserable for our people. What can we do?

Person A settled on two things:

How can we fix the immediate problem in a way that is, as far as possible, a win for the customer and a win for our company? How can we also build strategic relationships with the kinds of customers with whom we work best – because this is the way forwards for our company?

Person B originally said:

How can I as a leader understand and motivate the talented but difficult people in my team?

Person B settled on:

How can I build a successful team? How can I do this by creating a positive environment in which self-motivated people can achieve peak performance?

Person C originally said:

How can I deal with my manager who insists on micro-managing me every day?

Person C settled on two things:

How can I deal with the present situation by behaving professionally towards my manager and delivering positive results? How can I find a rewarding role where I work with a manager whom I respect?

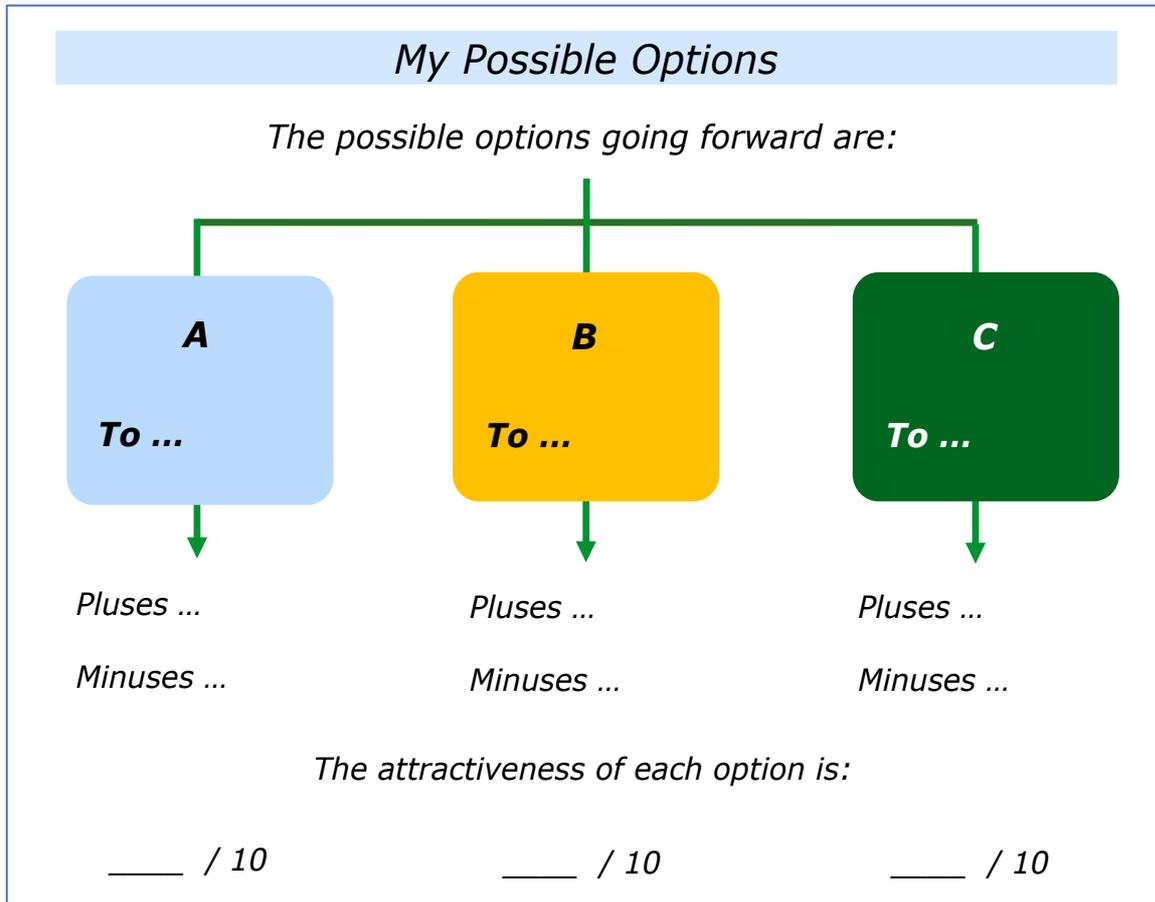

Sometimes the person has many issues they want to tackle. If so, can be useful to list these in order of priority and then focus on the first theme.

As mentioned earlier, it is important to clarify what the person can control in the situation. Bearing this in mind, imagine that you are clear on the real results the person wants to achieve. You can then help them:

To clarify the possible options for going forwards;

To clarify the pluses and minuses of each route;

To clarify the attractiveness of each option.

Keep going until you have explored the obvious routes forward. If appropriate, you can then ask the person if it is okay for you to share other potential solutions.

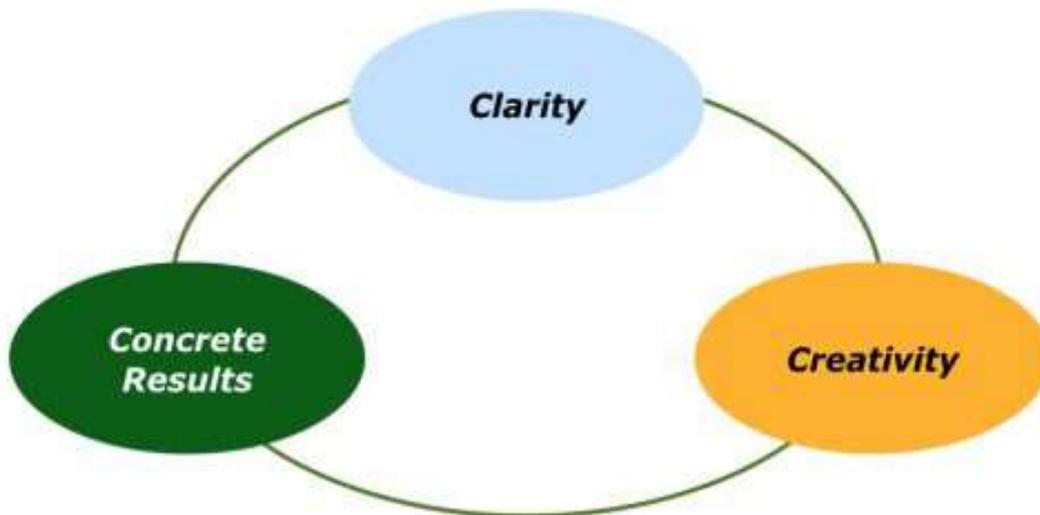

It is important to get the person's psychological permission that it is okay to share ideas. You can then pass on knowledge, strategies and practical tools that can help the person to achieve their goals. Look for the ideas that resonate with the person and explore these further.

At a certain point it may be appropriate to invite the person to settle on their chosen way forward. You can encourage them to focus on the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They can then settle on an action plan that they believe in.

You can move on to the next theme the person wants to explore. Here is an overview of the Three C Model.

The Three C Model For Helping A Person To Achieve Their Picture Of Success

There are many models for helping a person to achieve their goals. One approach is to use the Three C model that focuses on clarity, creativity and concrete results. The following page provides some themes it can be useful to explore when working through these steps with the person.

Clarity

What is the theme or challenge the person wants to explore? For example: 'How to ..?' What are the things they can control in the situation? What are the real results they want to achieve – the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals?

Creativity

What are the possible options going forwards and the pluses and minuses of each option? How attractive is each option on a scale 0-10? Are there any other potential creative solutions? What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success?

Concrete Results

What is the route – or combination of routes – they want to follow? How can they translate this into a clear action plan? How can they get some early wins? How can they encourage themselves on the journey and do their best to achieve the picture of success?

Continuing To Develop As A Trusted Advisor

There are many ways to help people. This article has explored how trusted advisors can pass on knowledge to help people to achieve their picture of success.

Trusted advisors are committed to the ethic of constant improvement. Bearing this in mind, here is one final exercise. Looking at your work as a trusted advisor, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe how you can keep building on your strengths.

Describe how you can tackle any areas for improvement.

Describe your specific action plan for continuing to develop.

Take the ideas you like from this article and use them in your own way. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Developing As A Trusted Advisor

Strengths - The specific things I can do to build on my strengths as a trusted advisor are:

*

Improvement - The specific things I can do to improve as a trusted advisor are:

*

Action Plan - The specific things I can therefore do to keep developing as a trusted advisor are:

*

The Professional Guarantee Approach

My Professional Guarantee

Can Guarantee

The things I can guarantee are:

- *
*
*

Can't Guarantee

The things I can't necessarily guarantee are:

- *
*

This is an approach that can be used in many situations. Imagine that you have a professional role. It can be useful to clarify and communicate what you can guarantee and maybe what you can't necessarily guarantee.

The work you do will obviously influence the kind of guarantee you can give. If you are a teacher, medic, coach, therapist or lawyer you will offer different things to people.

People who work in companies may also aim to guarantee certain things to their colleagues and customers. Let's look at one example.

The Good Leader's Guarantee

Imagine that you lead an organisation. You may be able to guarantee some things but not others. Here are some themes you may focus on when describing what you can guarantee.

My Professional Guarantee

I can guarantee that I will aim:

To be positive, professional and encourage people to deliver peak performances;

To create an encouraging environment in which motivated people can perform superb work;

To encourage us to build on what we can control whilst doing our best to manage the things we can't control;

To continually communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To encourage people to play to their strengths and make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To make clear contracts with people about the results to deliver and then manage by outcomes rather than by tasks;

To encourage people to deliver consistently high professional standards and also focus on continuous improvement;

To encourage people to keep adding to their professional repertoires and shaping their future careers;

To ensure we do our best to deliver today's business whilst also shaping tomorrow's business and laying the foundations for future success;

To make decisions based on our principles and translate these into action when doing our best to achieve the picture of success.

I can't guarantee that I will be able:

To ensure that we always achieve success but I will make sure we do our best to achieve this aim;

To predict all of the events that may be beyond our control but I will make sure we prepare ourselves to manage potential future challenges;

To ensure that everybody has lifetime employment with us but I will ensure that we help people to shape their future careers.

The professional guarantee approach can help people to clarify what they can and can't offer to their customers, colleagues or other stakeholders. When appropriate, they can then communicate this to people in a positive and professional way.

Let's return to your own work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

First, describe the professional role that you do. Second, describe the specific things you can guarantee that you will aim to do in your role. Third, describe the specific things you can't necessarily guarantee.

Here is the exercise. If appropriate, you can use it as a framework you can follow to do your best and perform superb work in your professional role.

The Professional Guarantee Approach

My Professional Role Is:

*

Can Guarantee. The specific things I can guarantee are:

*

*

*

*

*

*Can't Guarantee. The specific things
I can't necessarily guarantee are:*

*

*

*

The Using Your Strengths To Help People To Achieve Success Approach

Success

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to use your strengths to help people to achieve success. This involves going through the following steps.

- You can clarify your strengths;*
- You can clarify the kinds of people with whom you work best;*
- You can use your strengths to help these people to achieve success.*

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to use your strengths to help people to achieve their picture of success. There many ways to follow this approach.

Bearing in mind your strengths, you may be able to help people by doing superb work as a:

Medic ... Teacher ... Counsellor ... Writer ... Sports Coach ... Mentor ... Craft Worker ... Creative Artist ... Scientist ... Crisis Manager ... Team Leader ... Coordinator ... Thought Leader ... Film maker ... Or In Another Role.

Imagine that you want to elements of this approach in your own way. If appropriate, you can focus on the following steps.

You Can Clarify Your Strengths

You may be good at counselling, making furniture, nursing, coaching a sport or developing software. You may be good at managing crises, leading certain kinds of teams or doing another activity.

How to clarify your strengths? One approach is to explore the following questions.

Clarifying My Strengths

What are the deeply satisfying activities in which I deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What are the activities that give me positive energy? When do I feel in my element – at ease and yet able to excel?

What are the situations in which I see the destination quickly? When do I go 'A, B ... and then leap to ... Z'? What are the activities in which I am a good finisher and have a track record of delivering Z?

What are the situations in which I see patterns quickly? Where do I have good personal radar - I seem to know what will happen before it happens? Where do I always do the basics and then add the brilliance?

Imagine that you have clarified some of your strengths. Bearing in mind what you do well, what are the specific things you can offer that could help people to achieve success?

Much depends, of course, on the specific activity where you can do superb work. Bearing in mind your strengths, it can be useful to explore the following question.

What are the specific things I can offer to help people - individuals, customers, teams or organisations - to tackle their challenges or achieve their goals?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

*Clarifying
My Offering*

The specific things I can offer to help individuals, customers, teams or organisations to tackle their challenges or achieve their goals are:

 I can ...*

 I can ...*

 I can ...*

You Can Clarify The Kinds Of People With Whom You Work Best

The next step is to clarify the kinds of people with whom you work best. There are some kinds of work – such as medical care – where you need to help many different kinds of people.

Bearing this in mind, however, it can be useful to explore the characteristics of people with whom you work best and who may be open to what you offer. This can also highlight those who are more challenging.

Great workers position what they offer in a way that is attractive to their potential target audience. This increases the chances of planting seeds in the fertile ground rather than frozen ground. One approach is to ask yourself the following questions.

Working With Individuals

Who are kinds of people with whom I work best? What are the characteristics of these people? When have I done good work with such people?

What are the challenges such people face – both now and in the future? What may be the goals they want to achieve? What are the specific things I can offer that can help them to achieve success?

Working With Organisations

Who are the kinds of customers, managers, team or organisations with whom I work best? What are the characteristics of these groups of people? When have I done good work with them?

What are the challenges some of these may face – both now and in the future? What may be their goals? What are the specific things I can offer that can help them to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Clarifying The Kinds Of People With Whom I Work Best

The characteristics of the people, customers, teams or organisations with whom I work best are:

*

*

*

The challenges that some of them face or the goals they want to achieve are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can offer to help some of them achieve success are:

*

*

*

You Can Clarify The Steps You Can Take To Help People To Achieve Success

Imagine that you have clarified: a) the kinds of people with whom you work best; b) the specific things you can offer them. The next step is to help people to tackle challenges and achieve success.

A counsellor may help a person to take control of their life. A carpenter may produce bespoke furniture that delights customers. A marketer may run a campaign that increases sales.

A medical specialist may help a person to regain their health. A mediator may help people to solve a conflict. A project director may build a successful prototype that helps a company to shape a positive future.

Great workers believe it is important to get out there and work. Bearing this in mind, here are some steps you may consider to find work and help people to succeed.

You can focus on the people in your network

Many people find that their work comes from either: a) the people they have worked with in the past: b) the recommendations that these people make to others in their network.

Great workers sometimes find a way to keep in touch with people in their network. They may, for example, send them articles, materials or ideas that these people may find interesting.

Such workers do, when appropriate, find a way to have a conversation with potential customers. They then aim to act as a trusted advisor rather than doing a hard sell.

Before having such a conversation, they research what may be happening in that person's world. They aim to clarify:

The challenges the person may face in their team, organisation or market;

The knowledge, positive models and practical tools that they could pass on to help the person succeed.

During the conversation they aim to help the person to feel at ease and able to explore. At an appropriate point, they may ask about the kinds of challenges that the person may face.

Following the trusted advisor approach, they then ask if it is okay to share some ideas. If so, they try to pass on knowledge that resonates with the person and can help them to achieve their goals.

Much then depends on the potential customer's reactions. These may include the following kinds of responses.

They may simply listen and process the ideas in their own way;

They may thank them for the ideas and say they may get back to them;

They may show an interest in the ideas and say something along the lines of: "How can we take this further?"

Imagine that you have followed this approach in your own way and, as a result, have got a piece of work. You can then move on to the next step.

You can make clear working contracts

Clear contracting is vital in many areas of life. This is especially so when providing services or products. It can therefore be useful to make clear working contracts with the person, team or organisation about the following things:

The specific results to achieve – the picture of success;

The specific responsibilities of the various parties in working to achieve the picture of success;

The specific guidelines – such as any Dos and Don'ts – to follow when working towards the picture of success.

Imagine that you have agreed on these things. It will then be time to move into action.

You can help people to achieve success

Great workers apply their strengths and specialist knowledge to help people to succeed. Such workers aim to do their best each day. Some imagine that they are on a rolling contract. They therefore aim:

To continue to make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the specific results to deliver;

To get some quick wins, do superb work and keep people informed about the progress being made towards achieving the results;

To embody the ethic of continuous improvement on the way towards achieving the results.

Great workers continue to do their best to deliver the desired results. This sometimes leads to them getting more work where they can do what they do best.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to use your strengths to help people to achieve success? How can you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Using My Strengths To Help People To Achieve Success Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Enjoyable And Effective Educational Session Approach

Running An Enjoyable And Effective Educational Session

There are many ways to run an enjoyable and effective educational session.

One approach is to follow the One-Two-Three model when running workshops or other types of sessions. This involves going through the following steps.

You Can Create A Positive Environment And Agree On The Goals For The Session

One

Introduce The Theme

*Give an introduction to the theme.
Give examples from everyday life and work.
Give practical models and tools.*

Two

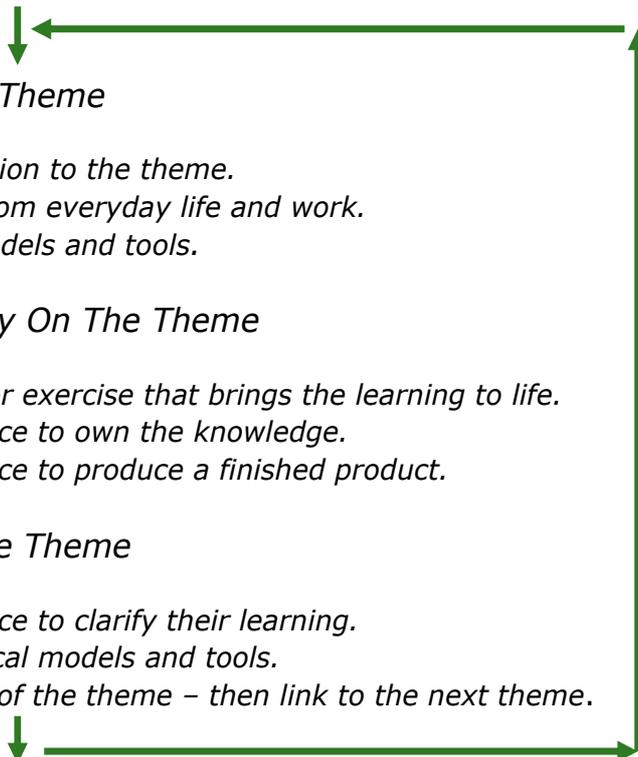

Give An Activity On The Theme

*Give an activity or exercise that brings the learning to life.
Give people chance to own the knowledge.
Give people chance to produce a finished product.*

Three

Summarise The Theme

*Give people chance to clarify their learning.
Give more practical models and tools.
Give a summary of the theme - then link to the next theme.*

There are many ways to help people to learn. One approach is to use the One-Two-Three model for running an educational session. This is a basic model but it can be both enjoyable and effective. Let's explore how it works in action.

Imagine you have been asked to run a seminar on great leadership. This will involve learning passing on knowledge and practical tools that people can use in their own ways.

You will obviously prepare properly before the session. One approach is to settle on the themes you want to cover. You may, for example, want to focus on the following themes.

Great leaders

Giving an introduction to what great leaders do right and bring this to life with relevant examples.

Great leadership in people's own experiences

Giving activities or exercises that involve people learning from their own experiences of great leadership.

Great leadership in action

Giving people positive models and practical tools that they can use to apply the ideas their own work.

Imagine that you have clarified the themes you want to cover. You may then focus on how to bring these to life in the session. One approach is to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the specific things that people may want to learn? How can I help them to learn these things in an enjoyable and effective way? When do I want to cover the various themes during the session?

Collecting these ideas together, you can clarify the map for the session. If appropriate, you can take time to reflect before settling on the plan for running a successful session.

The Actual Session

Imagine that you have prepared properly. Moving on to the session, you can create a positive environment in which people feel able to explore. It will then be important to clarify the goals for the session. One approach is:

To outline the themes you will cover and ask people if they want to add any other topics to the agenda;

To agree on the themes to cover and the goals for the session – such as people taking away tools they can use as leaders in their daily work;

To make clear contracts about your role – such as to provide practical tools that work - and the participants' roles in the session.

The next step may be to follow the One-Two-Three model for running the session. You will, of course, apply this in your way.

You Can Introduce The First Theme

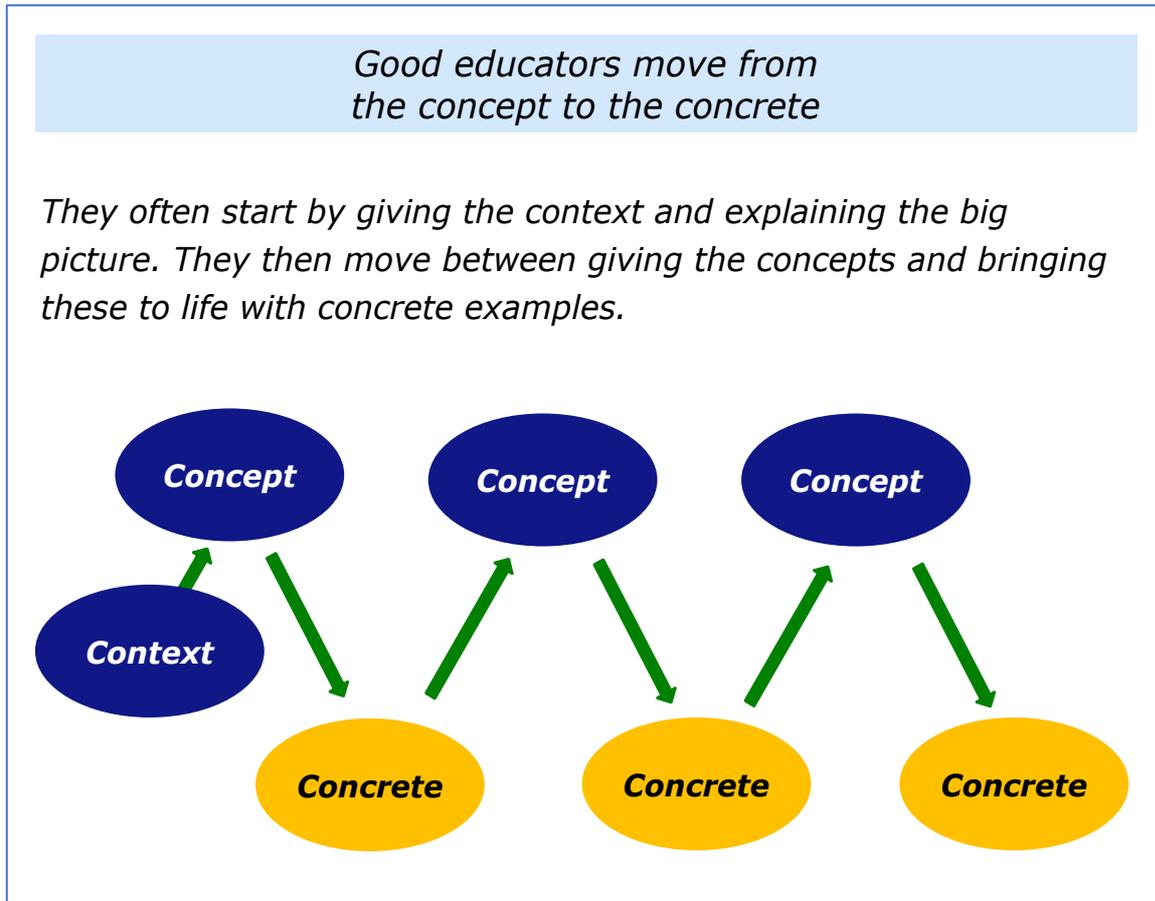

Give an introduction to the first theme. It can be useful to give specific examples that relate to people's daily work. If appropriate, you may want:

To invite people to identify what they think great leaders do right;

To give them an overview of models about great leadership;

To begin to pass on practical tools they can use to as leaders in their own work.

Good educators keep moving from the concept to the concrete. Bearing this in mind, it will be important to give examples that bring the learning to life and resonate with people.

Imagine that you have gone through these stages. You may then want to move on to the next step.

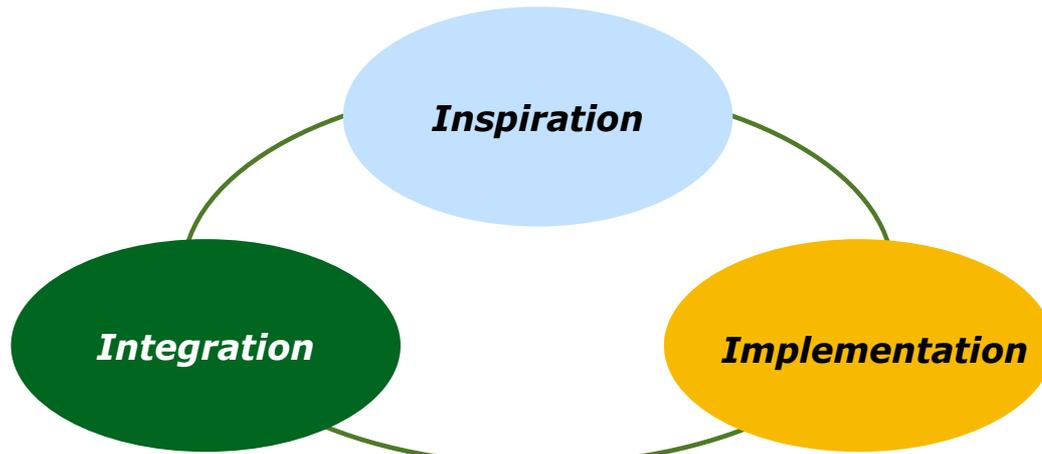

You Can Give An Activity On The Theme

Good educators recognise that people want own the knowledge. Bearing this in mind, they often follow the Three I model - Inspiration, Implementation, Integration.

They create an inspiring environment and provide implementation tools that work. They then help people to integrate the learning into their lives and work.

Good Educators

They often follow the Three I approach. They create an inspiring environment, provide implementation tools that work and help people to integrate the learning in their own ways. They focus on:

You may want to follow elements of this approach in your own way during the session. One way can be to invite people to do an activity that is relevant to the first theme.

This may involve some learning by doing, such as an exercise or other learning experience related to their work. Make sure it is relevant and provides real take away value.

People obviously learn in different ways, so use different media. These might include giving input, using flip charts, visuals and giving the participants chance to clarify their own experiences.

When giving people group work, make sure they must produce a finished product – such as a presentation. This also gives them chance to pass on their ideas. Then move onto the next step.

You Can Summarise The Theme And Link To The Next Theme

Summarise the key points that have emerged for exploring the first theme. If appropriate, you can give more input such as passing on knowledge, giving positive models and providing practical tools.

You can again show how these ideas can be applied in people's work. Keep moving from the concept to the concrete. Answer any questions and conclude your input on the first theme. Then link to the next theme.

You can repeat the One-Two-Three Model until you have covered all the themes. Finish the session by inviting people to clarify what they have learned or relearned. One approach is to give them the following exercise.

My Learning

The specific things I have learned – or relearned – today have been:

*

*

*

If appropriate, ask people to share these points, either in pairs or with the whole group. This helps to develop a feeling of success and also provides people with further ideas they may want to use in their own ways.

Good educators believe in constant improvement. So after the session clarify what you did well and what you can do better next time. You can then continue to develop as an educator.

My Development

The specific things that went well in the session – and how I can do more of these things in the future – were:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do better in the future – and how - are:

*

*

The One-Two-Three approach is a basic model. When employed properly, however, it can make the learning enjoyable and effective. This can help people to continue to learn and develop.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Running An Enjoyable And Educational Session Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

*

*

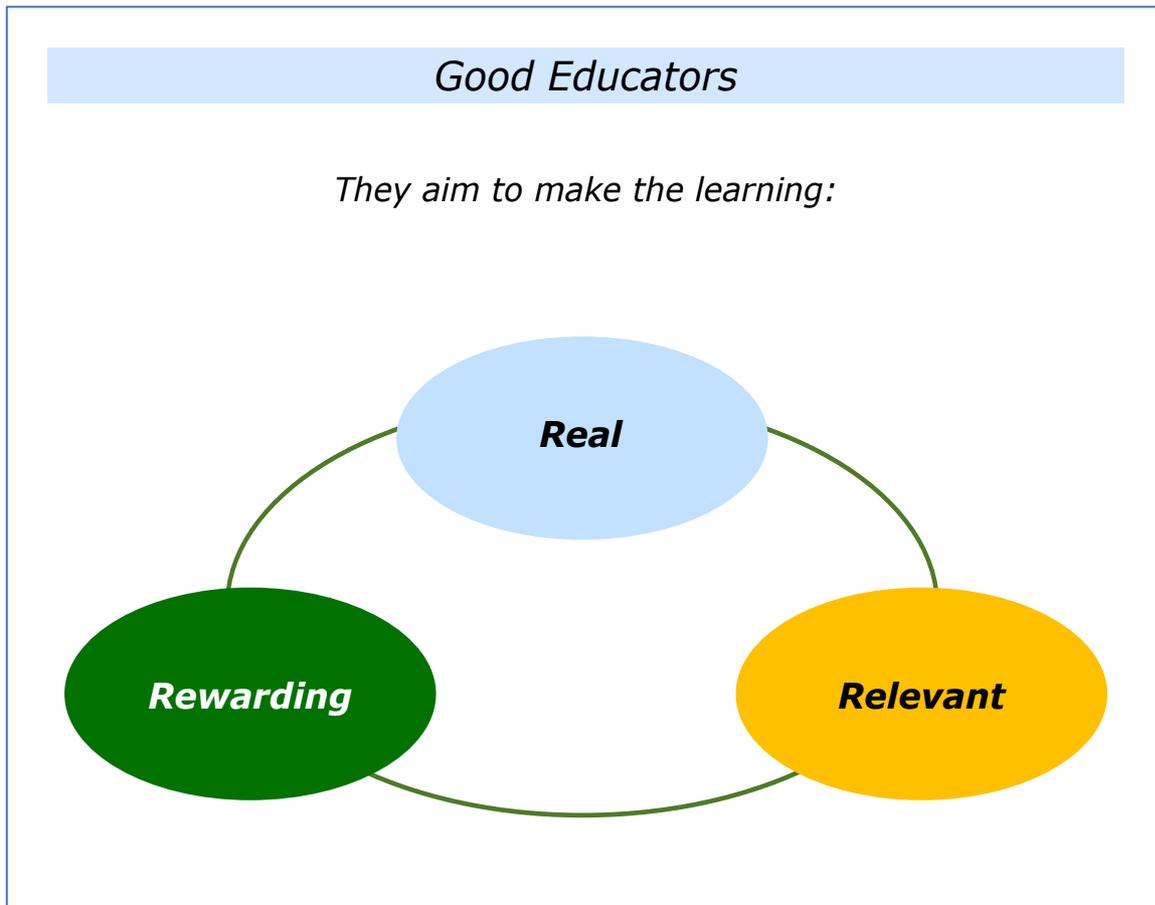

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be are:

*

*

*

The Making Learning Real, Relevant And Rewarding Approach

There are many models for helping people to grow. One approach is to make the learning real, relevant and rewarding. Let's explore these themes.

Making Learning Real

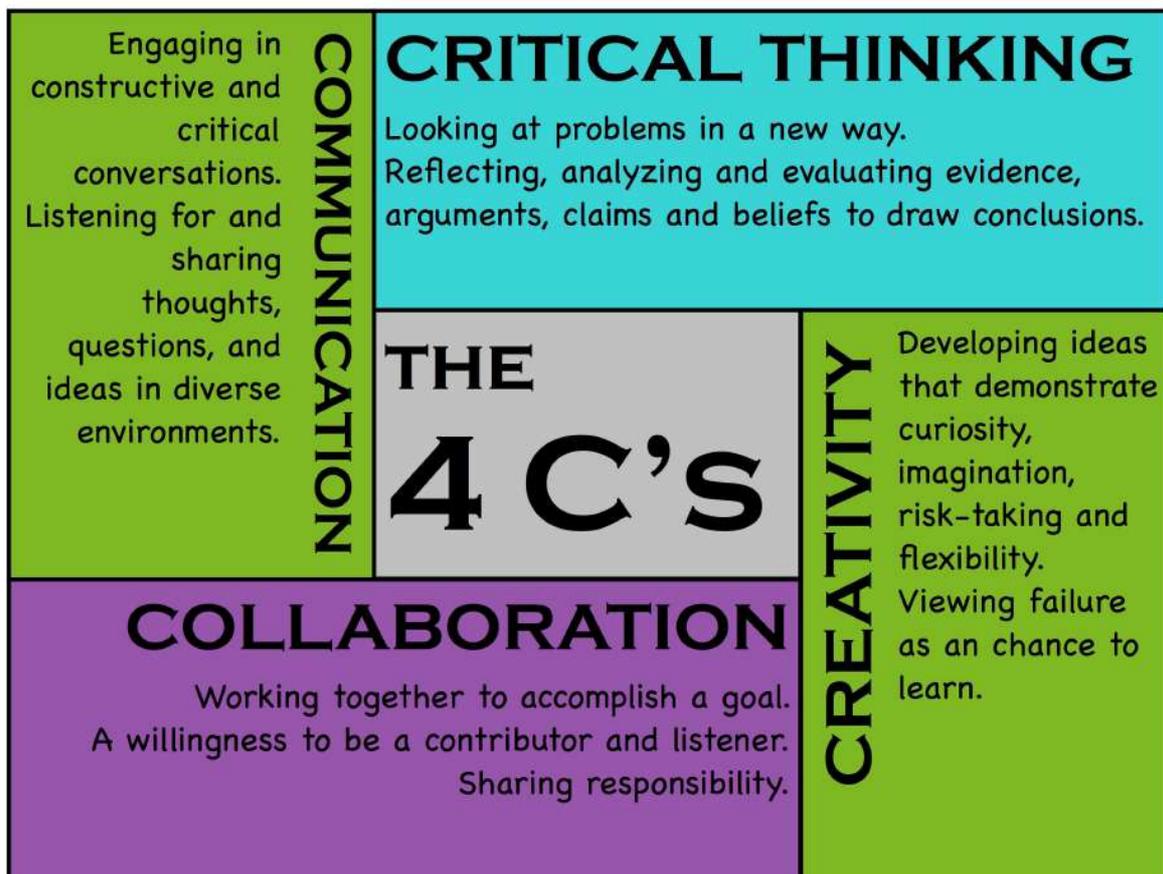

People want to learn things that resonate with them and relate to their agendas. Good educators often follow these rules. They aim to focus on a person's real experience and real goals. They then help the person to negotiate reality and achieve success.

This approach can be applied in many situations. It can be followed when working with students, adult learners, executives or other people. People are more likely to learn if they feel it will help them to succeed in the real world.

Such an approach has a long tradition in education. It became well-established in Europe by thinkers such as Pestalozzi, Froebel and Montessori.

John Dewey was one of the first to promote it in the United States and his influence remains to this day. Many of his ideas are embodied in what are now sometimes called the Four Cs of 21st Century Skills.

These are eternal skills, of course, that have featured in many educational approaches. Here is an overview of the skills.

Many educational organisations and companies now promote these skills. Below is excerpt from the website of The Partnership For 21st Century Skills.

We have a clear mission. We aim:

To serve as a catalyst to position 21st century readiness at the center of US K12 education by building collaborative partnerships among education, business, community and government leaders.

Twenty-First Century Children

Every child in the U.S. needs 21st century knowledge and skills to succeed as effective citizens, workers and leaders. This can be accomplished by fusing the 3Rs and 4Cs.

There is a profound gap between the knowledge and skills most students learn in school and the knowledge and skills they need in typical 21st century communities and workplaces.

To successfully face rigorous higher education coursework, career challenges and a globally competitive workforce, U.S. schools must align classroom environments with real world environments by fusing the 3Rs and 4Cs:

The 3Rs include: English, reading or language arts; mathematics; science; foreign languages; civics; government; economics; arts; history; and geography.

The 4Cs include: critical thinking and problem solving; communication, collaboration; and creativity and innovation.

As the 3Rs serve as an umbrella for other subjects and core content, the 4Cs are a shorthand for all the skills needed for success in college, career, and life.

Imagine that you are following elements of this approach when helping a person to group of people to learn. You may then move on to the next step.

Making Learning Relevant

Good educators recognise that many people are pragmatists. People want the learning to be relevant. They also want to know how to apply it in a practical situation.

Bearing this in mind, it is vital to invite a person to describe the specific things they want to learn. Here are some themes they may mention.

I want to learn ...

How to take the next step in my career ... How manage my anger in a specific situation ... How to manage a talented but challenging person in my team ... How to deal with my boss who is a micromanager.

How to recover my zest for life ... How to get more satisfaction from my work ... How to ensure my great team stays ahead of the game ... How to give an effective keynote speech ... How to feel more at peace.

Imagine that a person has described the topic they want to explore. It can then important to focus on a specific example or situation. Bearing this in mind, you may say something along the following lines.

As far as I understand it, you want to focus on how to ...? Looking at what you want to achieve, can we look at a specific example?

What is happening in that situation? What would you like to happen? What are the real results you would like to achieve? What is your picture of success? What would be the benefits of achieving these goals?

Bearing these things in mind, as far as I understand it, the real results you want to achieve are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Are there any other things you want to achieve? Is it okay for me to share some ideas and practical tools you may be able to use? These are based on what works but you will, of course, use these in your own way.

Imagine that you have clarified the results the person wants to achieve. You can then aim to pass on practical tools that the person can use to achieve their goals. This takes us to the next step.

Making Learning Rewarding

People like to do what works. They like to feel they have learned something valuable and have also achieved success. Educators therefore sometimes take the following steps to make the learning real, relevant and rewarding. They aim:

To clarify what the person wants to learn and the real results they want to achieve;

To pass on relevant knowledge and tools that the person can use to achieve these results;

To enable the person to achieve these results and find the experience to be rewarding.

A teacher may follow this approach to help a student to develop a skill. A sports coach may follow it to help an athlete improve. A consultant may follow it to help a managing director tackle a challenge in their company.

This approach has a long tradition in education. Maria Montessori, for example, encouraged children to focus on things they wanted to learn and continue until they had achieved what she called their 'inner goal'.

Imagine that you are visiting a Montessori class for the youngest children. You will probably see over 30 children spanning a three-year age range.

The room has a prepared environment in which children can follow their natural tendency to work.

It will embody the characteristics of beauty, simplicity, order, accessibility and reality. Children will have many enticing materials that are designed to help them explore their world and develop their skills.

The children will be 'working'.

Some will be totally concentrated on their activity; some will be co-operating with others; some will be tidying up after their last activity and moving onto the next. Some may be preparing food. Some may be engaged in other activities.

The children will be given freedom to work and move around within suitable guidelines that enable them to act as part of a social group.

They can pursue their own interests. They will also be encouraged to respect others and, when appropriate, work to with them to achieve certain goals.

The educator will be watching the children.

They will see when they become enraptured, follow their flow and, when appropriate, encourage and guide them to further exploration on this theme.

The children will continue to develop their skills, repeating an activity until it satisfies an 'inner goal'.

They will continue to do the activity until they feel satisfied. They will then move onto the next activity they want to explore.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to make the learning real, relevant and rewarding? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Real, Relevant And Rewarding Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach in my way are:

*

*

*

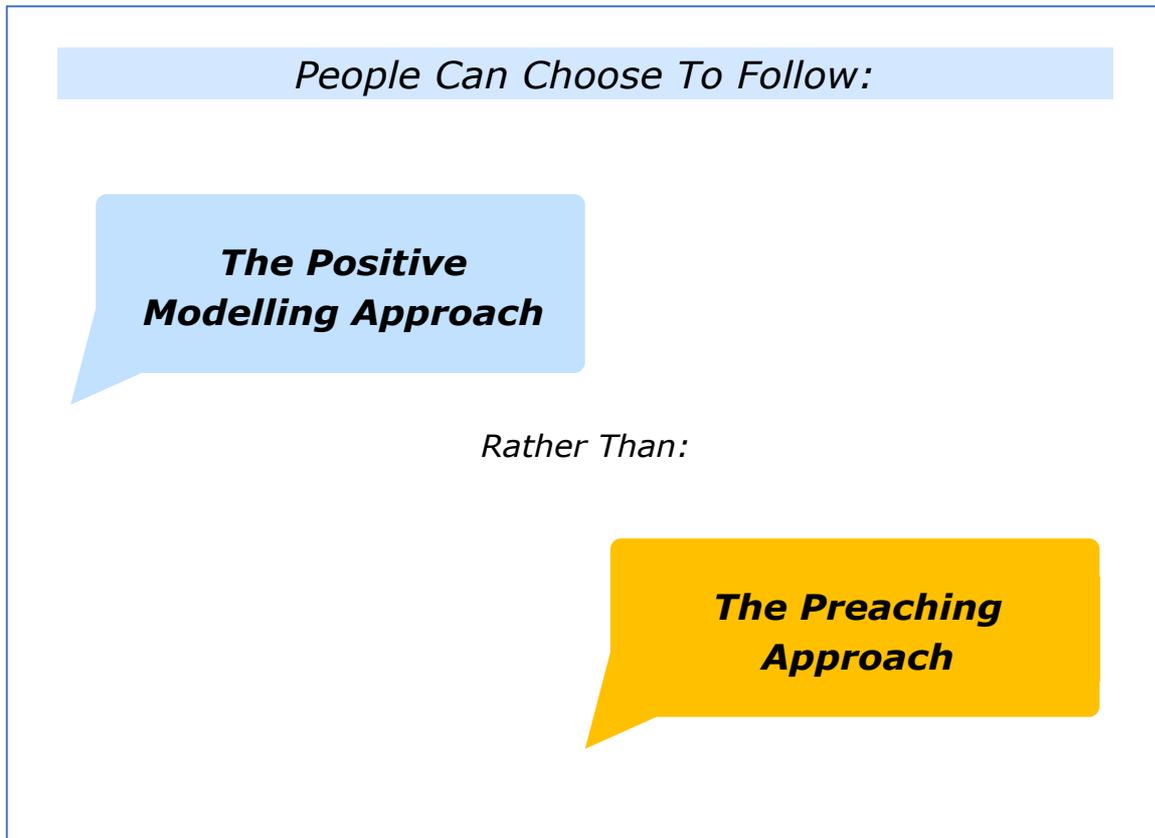

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Modelling Approach Rather Than The Preaching Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the positive modelling approach. Some people follow the preaching approach. Let's explore these themes.

The Positive Modelling Approach

Some individuals follow this approach in two ways. First, to act as a positive model in their own life and lead by example. Second, to pass on a positive model – a way of doing things – that other people can follow in their own way.

Such individuals follow certain principles that have been handed down over the ages. They aim to show what can work rather than moralise to others. They follow this approach even though they may have strong views on certain subjects.

They also recognise that people are more likely to believe what they see rather than what they are told. They therefore aim to do their best:

To show rather than tell ... To demonstrate success ... To build successful prototypes in their chosen field ... To show possible ways forward.

Some pioneers follow this approach. They may do this when showing possible ways forward in education, medicine, sport, business and other fields.

Such individuals recognise that people buy success rather than the theory of success. They may therefore pass on positive models and practical tools that work. They may do this by producing articles, films or using other media in a way that resonates with people.

They aim to communicate this knowledge in a humble way and show respect for others. People can then take the ideas they like and use these in their own way to achieve success.

The Preaching Approach

Some people aim to preach to others. They want to tell people that there is a certain way to live, work or do other things. They may do this when acting as leaders, politicians, campaigners or in other roles.

Some individuals do this in a humble way. Some do it by using powerful means that aim to control people. Some do it in a pious or patronising way.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive modelling approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Modelling Approach

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

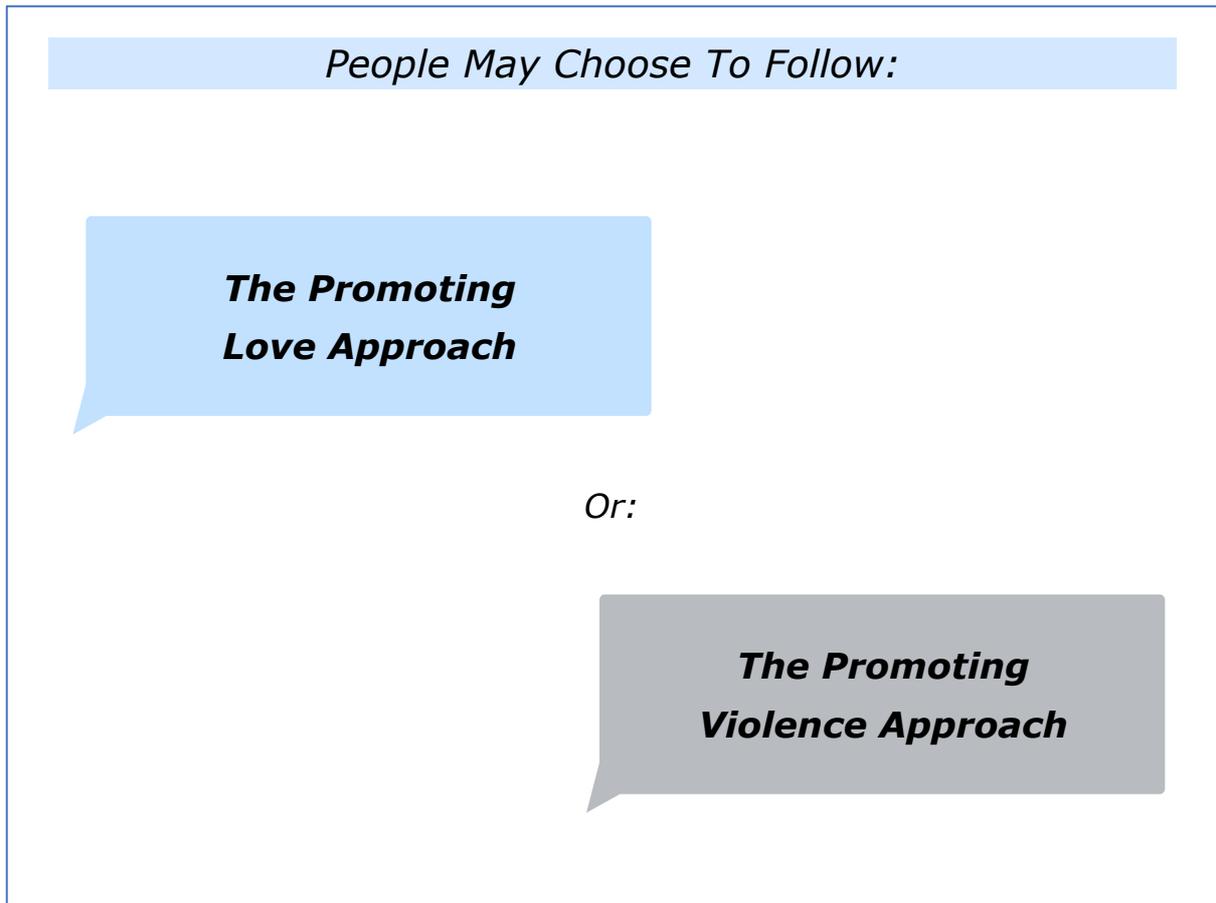

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Promoting Love Approach Rather Than The Promoting Violence Approach

Different people choose to follow different approaches in life. The route they choose to follow can have consequences for both themselves and other people.

Some people follow the promoting love approach and also aim to be positive models. They try to go beyond words and practice this approach in their lives and work.

Some people follow the promoting violence approach. This may produce even more violence by stirring division and hate. It can also create collateral damage and affect innocent people.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action.

The Promoting Love Approach

People who take this approach aim to show love for people and the planet. They encourage people, provide practical hope and promote peace. They aim to support both present and future generations.

Many people have taken this approach. They include Nelson Mandela, after his release from prison, Mary Robinson, the former President of Ireland, the Quakers and many spiritual leaders.

Such people are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They aim to help people to build on their successful patterns and manage any unsuccessful patterns.

They aim to build positive environments in the family, education, work place and society. They build systems that provide people with the opportunity of stability, stimulation and success.

People who take this approach believe in following certain ethics. They aim to behave in a caring way that is respectful and helps to build a civil society.

They recognise that people make choices every minute and each choice has consequences. They therefore aim to take responsibility, help people and find solutions to challenges.

Such people aim to promote peace rather than provoke war. They therefore behave in a certain ways during times of uncertainty, turbulence or conflict. Being peace builders, they aim to stay calm and focus on the following themes.

They build on what people have in common

They recognise that most people want similar things in life. They therefore help people to focus on what they have in common. Such as to be healthy, hopeful and happy.

They focus on helping people to set common goals

They may, when appropriate, help people to look to the future rather than blame each other for the past. They help them to set common goals and see the benefits of achieving these common goals.

They help people to achieve their common goals

They may, when appropriate, help people to follow strategies that work and achieve the common goals. This helps to build confidence and encourages people to work together to achieve future success.

Such people believe in following their principles in both positive and challenging times. They gain strength from doing this and aim to give strength to others. They also have a sense of perspective.

They see themselves as small in the great sweep of history. They do not see themselves as important but recognise that their actions can have consequences. They therefore aim to plant positive seeds of hope during their time on the planet.

The Promoting Violence Approach

People who promote violence may produce even more violence. They may focus on how people are different, create divisions and provoke war. This can create collateral damage and fracture society.

They may aim to get power and pursue their own agenda. They may create conflicts and scapegoat certain people. They find this becomes addictive and then do even more outrageous things to get attention.

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the promoting love rather than violence approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Promoting Love Rather Than Violence Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Supporting The Ordinary Person Who Has An Extraordinary Talent Approach

Supporting The Ordinary Person Who Has An Extraordinary Talent

This approach starts by creating a supportive environment. It then involves going through the following steps.

-  Supporting The Ordinary Person
-  Supporting The Person's Extraordinary Talent
-  Supporting The Whole Person To Achieve Success

This is an approach described by coaches who work with athletes, artists or other kinds of peak performers. It is one that I have found useful when working with people who may be well-known or stars in their particular field.

One coach expressed this in the following way:

"It is important to support the Norma Jeane rather than become starstruck by the Marilyn Monroe."

The approach calls for recognising that the individual may in some ways be an ordinary person with ordinary needs. They want to be able:

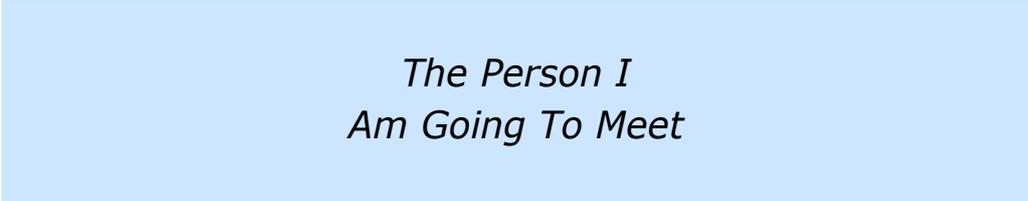

To shape their future ... To be supported ... To achieve success.

Bearing this in mind, sometimes it can be useful to focus on encouraging them as a person as well as a professional who has an extraordinary talent. It is, of course, important to do this in way that the person finds appropriate.

Some peak performers welcome other relating to them as a person rather than as a well-known personality. Others may simply want to focus on the professional aspects of their work.

How to take these steps? One approach is to prepare properly before meeting the person. It then involves following aspects of The Mentoring Approach that is described elsewhere in the book.

You will, of course, do this in your own way. Bearing this in mind, however, here are some of the themes you may wish to consider.

The Person I Am Going To Meet

Clarifying what I know about the person I am going to meet

The Personal Side

● Who is the person I am going to meet? What is their background? What may have been their personal journey? What may they have achieved in their life? What may be the challenges they have overcome?

● What may be happening in their personal life at the moment? What may be their top priorities? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their short, medium and long-term goals?

● What are their personal strengths and qualities? How do they translate these into action? What is their style of interacting with other people? What are the pluses and minuses of their style?

The Professional Side

● What are the person's professional strengths? What may be the extraordinary talent (or talents) they have? What has been their professional journey? What have they achieved along the way? What have been the challenges they have overcome?

● What is happening in the professional life at the moment? What do they want to do with their extraordinary talent? What may be their top priorities? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their short, medium and long-term goals?

● What is their style of interacting with others in their professional life? What are the pluses and minuses of their style? How can they build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

The Practical Steps Regarding The Session

- Before the session, ask yourself: What may be the possible topics or challenges the person may want to explore in the session? For example: 'How to ... How to ... How to ...?'

Moving on to the session, consider the following questions.

- How can I help the person to feel at ease and able to explore any topics they wish?
- How can I focus on the first topic they want to explore and clarify the real results they want to achieve?
- How can I, when appropriate, pass on knowledge, models and practical tools that the person can use to achieve their goals?

The Positive Results

- What else can I do to ensure the session is successful? What can I do to set things up beforehand to increase the chances of success? What can I do during the session to ensure the person is finding it relevant and rewarding?

- What can I do to ensure that the session is personal, practical and profitable. Personal – it relates their agenda and goals. Practical - it provides practical tools they can use. Profitable – it helps them to achieve their goals.

- What are the actual words I would like the person to be saying after the session? How can I do my best to increase the likelihood of them saying these things? If appropriate, how can I then follow up the session in a positive way?

One final point is worth underlining regarding working with peak performers. Such people like to feel in control. Bearing this in mind, clear contracting is crucial. You can do this in several ways.

Before the session you can let the person know it is okay to explore any topics they want to focus on. You can also explain your approach to running a session. If appropriate, they can then prepare for the session in their own way.

Starting the session you can make clear contracts about the topics they want to explore. Focusing on the first topic, you can clarify the real results they want to achieve. You can then use your skills to help them to work towards achieving these goals.

Sometimes you may want to pass on knowledge that they can use in their own way. Before doing so, however, it can be useful to ask if it is okay for you to share some ideas.

The person will probably say 'Yes,' but it is important to make this psychological contract. You can then share the knowledge in a way they can use in their daily life and work.

You may want to conclude the session in a positive way. If appropriate, one approach is to give the person chance to clarify their take-aways from the session. Finally, you may also explain how you will follow up the session by sending along any relevant material or taking any other agreed actions.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the approach described in this section? If appropriate, how can you focus on helping a person who has an extraordinary talent?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Supporting A Person Who Has An Extraordinary Talent

The specific situation where I may aim to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Follow Up Questions To Get To Know More About A Person Approach

The Follow Up Questions Approach

There are many ways to find out more about a person. One approach is to use a series of follow up questions and asking for examples. This can help to build up a picture about the person.

- The First Question ...
- The Second Question ...
- The Third Question ...

Imagine you are going to have a conversation with somebody or you are interviewing them for a role. The first thing you say or the question you ask will set the tone for the conversation. You can then explore further by building on what they say or by asking follow up questions.

Good follow up questions can also help to provide a reality check to clarify what a person really means. This can be especially useful when interviewing candidates who apply for jobs or when talking with people who make sweeping statements.

Today's fast moving world has encouraged people to use sound bites or speak in generalities. Such concepts can be alluring but sometimes it is can be useful to invite them to give concrete examples.

Political leaders, for example, often speak in slogans. When asked to explain, they jump to giving another slogan. Sometimes it is important to stop them and explore the implications of what they are saying.

Good journalists, for example, invite the politician to explain how their idea would be translated into action. They also ask them to explain the consequences – the pluses and minuses - of making this happen.

When interviewing a politician who is talking in sound bites they may say something like the following.

Let's explore this with you a little further. As far as I understand it, you are suggesting doing the following ...? Is that right?

I understand the principle, so let's look at how this may work in practice. How would you translate this principle into action? What would you actually do to implement the idea?

What would be the consequences of taking these steps? What would be the pluses and the minuses? How would you deal with the consequences?

Follow up questions can help us to do a reality check. So let's explore this process of asking questions to find out more about a person.

Follow Up Questions In Interview Situations

Imagine that you are interviewing a person for a leadership role. They may have read books on leadership and come ready with various quotes.

Several years ago a company invited me to sit in on such an interview. At one point the candidate was asked about their leadership style. They come out with the following statement.

"I will communicate a clear vision and empower people to deliver it."

The interviewing panel seemed to like this and were ready to move on to the next theme. Before they did so, however, I asked if it was okay for me to ask a few questions. These were along the following lines.

"I wonder if it is okay to ask a few things. Please accept that these questions are designed to explore how you will translate the ideas into action rather than to catch you out."

"It is also okay to reflect and take your time when considering the questions. Let's start with a few questions about clarifying the team's vision."

"What will you actually do to meet with the key stakeholders – such as your manager – and agree on the team's specific goals? How will you make clear contracts about how you will keep the stakeholders informed regarding the progress towards achieving the goals?"

"Let's move on to working with the team. What will you do on your first day when meeting the team? What will you do to get to know each of the people and their strengths?"

"How will you present the vision and the reasons for working towards it? How will you get their input to add to the vision? How will you make clear contracts with the team members about their best contributions to achieving the goals?"

"How will you manage by outcomes rather than tasks? How will you make sure the team is on track when working towards the vision? What else will you do to build a successful team?"

"Those are a lot of questions. I would like you to reflect, pick up on a few of the questions and share how you might translate some of these themes into action. Is that okay?"

We gave the candidate some time to reflect and then respond. Unfortunately they still answered with generalisations and a few more clichés. They were familiar with the concepts regarding leadership. But they found it hard to describe how they would translate these into concrete actions.

Later we met another candidate. They were able to describe some of the things they would actually do – in behaviour terms – to lead the team to success. This led to them being offered the role.

Follow Up Questions Can Uncover A Person's Successful Style

The follow up questions approach is one that can also be used to clarify a person's successful style of working. Let's look at one example.

Many years ago I was asked to interview a person who was applying for a leadership role. The company wanted to hire the person but was not sure if they would fit with the role that was advertised. Bearing this in mind, I invited the person to do the following things:

To describe when they had led a team successfully;

To describe the principles they followed when leading the team successfully;

To describe what they actually did – in behaviour terms - to translate these principles into action and lead the team successfully.

The person started by describing how they built a team from scratch, led a pioneering project and delivered success. At my request, they then described another project they had led to fruition.

The person's leadership style soon became clear. Looking at their successful pattern, they made his best contribution when they took the following steps.

They found a place where they could build a successful prototype;

They agreed on the goals with their key stakeholders;

They set a deadline to work towards – because that was how they worked best – and for this to involve some sort of public launch;

They got some quick wins that reassured their stakeholders;

They built a team of committed people who wanted to achieve the goal;

They explained the professional deal clearly to people before they joined the team – people needed to know what they could and could not expect - then decide if they wanted to join the team;

They played to their strengths – which was focusing on the strategy and partnering with customers – and had a coordinator who kept things on track;

They continued to act as the flag bearer by keeping the stakeholders informed and also communicating through the media;

they kept people’s eyes on the compelling goal and flagged up where the team were on the journey;

They hit the deadline and sometimes did a public launch that involved customers who shared how the team had helped them to achieve success.

The leader’s style was more suited to doing pacesetting work rather than the advertised role. Bearing this in mind, the company invited him to consider running a new part of the business it was about to set-up. This proved to be a much better fit. It produced a win for the person and a win for the company.

Let’s return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to use elements of the follow up questions approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Follow Up Questions Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach in my way are:

*

*

*

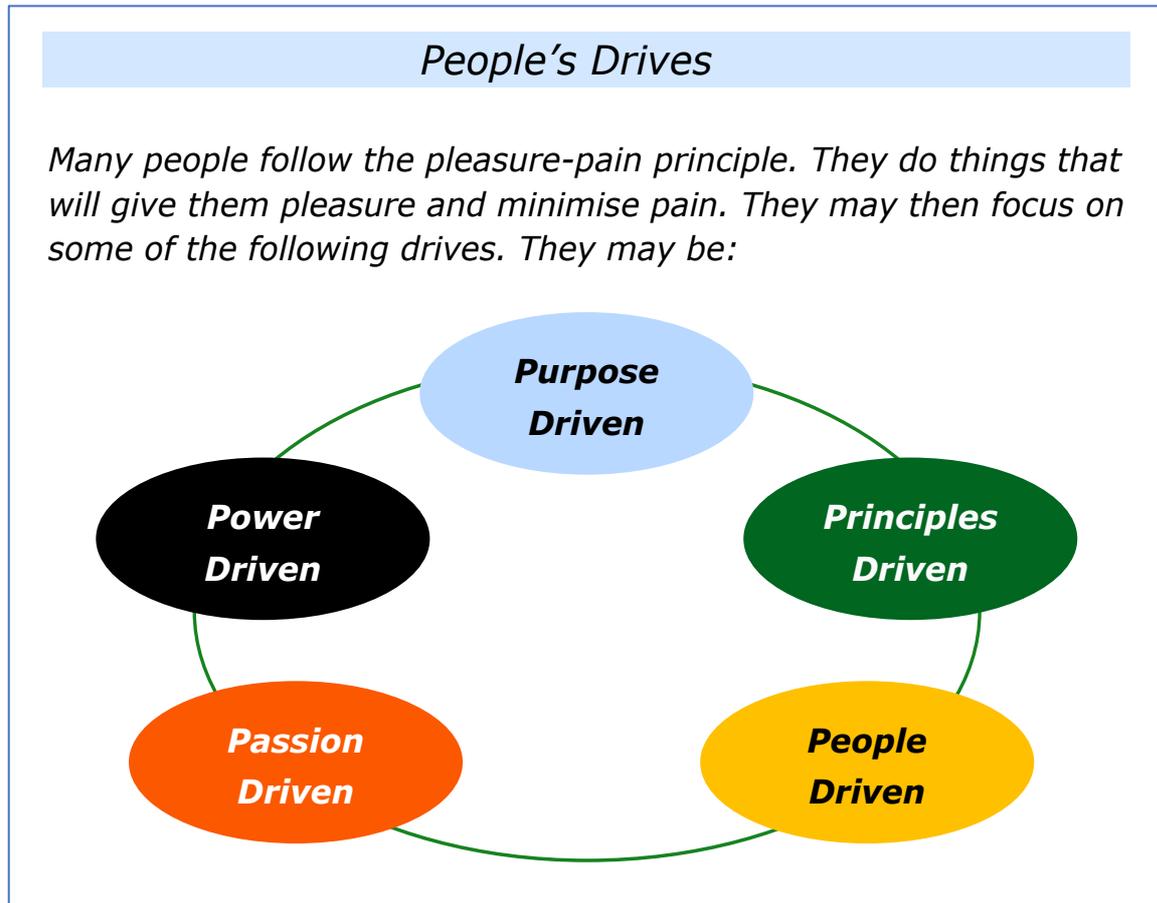

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People's Drives Approach

Many people follow the well-known pleasure and pain principle. They want to increase their pleasure and minimise any pain. They also want to feel in control and get the basic materials for life.

Different people are then driven by different things in their lives and work. They may then translate these into working towards achieving their picture of success.

This piece summarises some of the drivers that people may follow. There are, of course, many other drivers. People may also combine some of the different drivers and translate these into action.

Purpose Driven

Some people are driven by a sense of purpose. They may aim to follow a spiritual faith, follow their vocation or pursue a mission. They then work towards achieving a compelling goal.

Such people wake up each day and focus on how they can pursue their purpose. They may then aim to use their strengths to do superb work and achieve their view of success.

Principles Driven

Some people believe in following certain principles. These principles act as guiding compass that provide a framework for making decisions in their life and work. They then they aim translate these principles into action.

Some may actually be principles driven rather than prize driven. They get a win every day by following their principles and sometimes, as a by-product, they may also get prizes.

People Driven

Some people love to help other people. They love to give them encouragement and help them to succeed. They want to give positive things to people during their time on the planet.

Different people express this drive in different ways. They may aim to build a happy family, provide an inspiring education or build a positive work place. They aim to support people and provide them with positive memories for life.

Passion Driven

Some people love to do what they feel passionately about. They may focus on the specific activities that give them positive energy and where they have the ability to perform superb work.

Some love to do things where there is an element of performance. They then aim to follow certain principles, deliver peak performances and achieve their picture of success.

Power Driven

Some people are power driven. They want to feel important, gain a certain status or become famous. This can lead to constant striving. It can also lead to behaving in ways that have consequences for themselves or other people.

Such people may also want to achieve actual power. They want to get into positions where they can control people or tell other people how they should live. This can become addictive and lead to them wanting even more power.

Some people combine several of these drivers. Sometimes this can be positive for both themselves and other people. Sometimes it can be negative and create collateral damage.

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the specific things you do to be purpose driven, principles driven, people driven, passion driven or follow other drives? How do you translate these into action?

What are the potential pluses and minuses of taking these steps? What are the specific things you can do to build on the pluses and minimise the potential minuses?

My Personal Drivers

The specific things I do to be purpose driven, principles driven, people driven, passion driven or follow other drives are:

*

*

*

The specific potential pluses and minuses of doing these things are:

*

*

*

The specific things I do to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses are:

*

*

*

The Back Story, Building On Strengths And Brilliant Work In The Future Approach

Building On Strengths

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for a person to gain knowledge from their back story, build on their strengths and do brilliant work in the future.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for a person to gain knowledge from their back story, build on their strengths and do brilliant work in the future. Let's explore these themes.

Back Story

Imagine that a person has asked you to help them to develop. Sometimes it can be helpful to know their back story. It is then possible help them to clarify and apply what they have learned during their lives.

Everybody has a back story. They have experienced and done many things in their lives. Some people use their back story as an opportunity to grow and help other people. Some may choose another route.

Different people have different back stories. They may have had a happy childhood, had difficult parents or grown up on a tough estate. They may have been good at school, been dyslexic or had other learning challenges.

They may have left school early, earned their own money and forged their own path. They may have been successful at sport and then had a severe injury. They may now work in a big company, enjoy their work or have a challenging boss.

Bearing these things in mind, it can sometimes be useful help them to gain knowledge from their back story. You can invite a person:

To describe their back story;

To describe the knowledge they have gained – such as what has worked and what they could do better in the future;

To invite them to build on what they have gained from this knowledge.

You will have your own approach to helping a person to clarify what they have learned. If appropriate, however, you can invite them to explore the following themes.

What is their back story? What have they done and experienced? What have been their successes? What did they do right to achieve these successes? What have been their setbacks and how have they recovered?

What have been the choices they made in their life or work? What have been the consequences? What have they learned from making these choices?

Looking back, what is the knowledge they have gained? What have they learned about: a) what works; b) what does not work? How can they use this knowledge to grow or help other people?

Imagine that a person has described their back story. If appropriate, you can then invite them to explore the next theme.

Building On Strengths

Different people use their back story in different ways. Some use it as a resource for building on their strengths, setting specific goals and doing superb work. Some may use it as a reason for refusing to develop.

During the past fifty years I have worked with many people who chose the first option. These included individuals who took the following steps.

A woman who grew up in care decided to have children and become the best parent she could be. A dyslexic person learned to harness their creative ability, go into sales and eventually become the CEO of a giant technology company.

A footballer whose career ended early through injury became the youngest person to get the UEFA Pro Licence – the highest in the game. They went on to make a living acting as an advisor to elite football academies.

There many other examples of people who used their experiences to do superb work. Such individuals often aimed to build on what they can do rather than worry about what they can't do.

Imagine that you are helping person to take this approach. If appropriate, you can help them to build on their strengths, set specific goals and achieve success.

One approach is for them to translate their strengths into doing a specific project. They may aim, for example:

To help people to have access to food, water and the basic materials for life ... To help children who have difficulties in school ... To help retiring sports people to find a new purpose ... To build a successful prototype in their chosen field ... To build a business ... To do another activity.

There are many ways to help a person to take such steps. One approach is to invite them to focus on the following themes.

Strengths

What are the specific activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What are the things they feel passionately about where they may have the ability to deliver peak performance?

What are the activities that give them positive energy? When are they in their element – at ease and yet able to excel? What are the activities where they do superb work and have a track record of delivering success?

Specific Goals

How can they build on their strengths? How can they translate these into doing a specific project? Looking at this project, what may be the real results they want to achieve? What is the picture of success?

What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they follow strategies that work? How can they translate these into a clear action plan?

Success

How can they follow their chosen strategies? How can they do superb work? How can they get some early wins? How can they anticipate and manage potential challenges?

How can they focus on continuous improvement? How can they follow their successful pattern for finishing? How can they do their best to achieve their picture of success?

Imagine a person has followed some of these steps and achieved their picture of success. If appropriate, you may also help them to focus on the following theme.

Brilliant Work In The Future

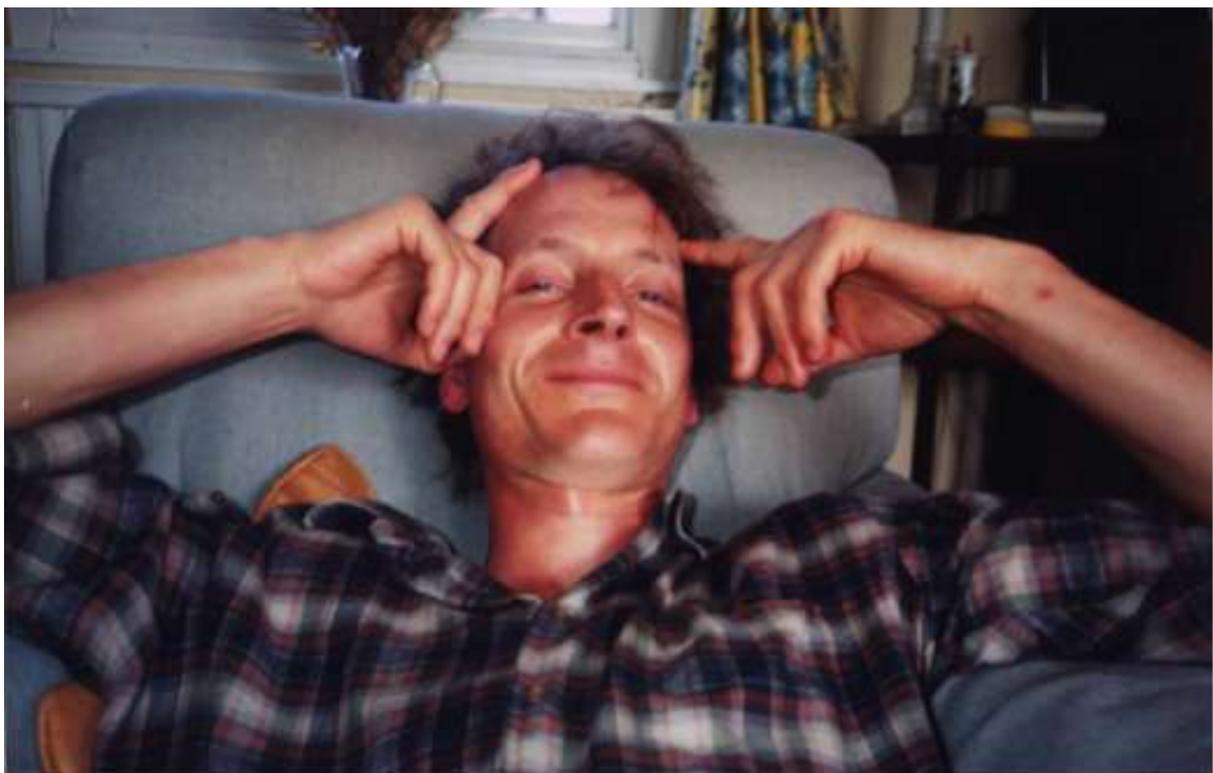

Some people are able to go into another dimension and do brilliant work. This can involve them focusing on a specific activity where: a) they do what they believe in; b) they do the basics; c) they add the brilliance.

Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at one person who followed these principles and passed on a positive legacy.

Nicholas Albery was a lovely and remarkable person who I had the good fortune to know. Born in 1948, he accomplished much in his short life. He was probably best known for setting up The Institute for Social Inventions.

The Institute build a formidable track record of enabling people to imagine and implement creative for tackling challenges. He defined a social invention as:

A new and imaginative way of tackling a social problem or improving the quality of life.

Writing the Foreword to The Book Of Visions: A Catalogue Of Social Inventions, Anita Roddick explained:

That is why I am so fond of the Institute for Social Inventions. We all have visions of a better world. Far too often we treat them as mere dreams, precisely because they are not linked to tasks.

The Institute gives voice to the many incremental but bold tasks people have invented to take us towards our visions - to make hope in this world.

Nicholas Albery – Two Of The Many Books He Published

Incredibly generous, Nicholas inspired many people to use their talents to build a better world. Here are extracts from his Obituary in The Guardian, written by Walter Schwarz.

Nicholas Albery, who has died in a car crash aged 52, was a prolific social inventor, writer and activist. He was funny, exuberant and much loved.

His self-deprecating manner gave him a peculiarly English charm, which concealed the originality of his mind; most of his friends considered him a genius. Uninterested in fame for himself, his passion was to open up the search for innovation to all.

An intellectual hippie during the 1960s, he refused to shed his irreverence, and developed a passion for lateral thinking to fill gaps in social provision and improve the quality of life.

The Institute for Social Inventions, which he founded in 1984, with Edward de Bono, Anita Roddick and Fay Weldon among its patrons, collects non-technological innovations from around the world and gives £1,000 annual awards for the best ones.

Inventions which have been applied in practice have ranged widely in education, DIY and social and political life. They include a highly successful apprentice-master alliance directory, which has linked hundreds of would-be apprentices to master professionals in many fields.

Child-to-child counselling in primary schools, a children's parliament and similar schemes have empowered children and adults to reinvent their world.

Albery and his wife Josefine Speyer, a psychotherapist, became interested in ecological approaches to death and funerals. In 1991, with Christianne Heal, they founded the Natural Death Centre, offering advice on DIY burials.

*The much-patronised centre provides midwives for the dying, death exercises, recyclable coffins and The New Natural Death Handbook, now in its third edition.*

Born at St Albans, Albery was the son of Sir Donald Albery, the impresario and theatre owner, and his wife Heather, and went to Stowe school. While a student at St John's College, Oxford, he became involved with psychedelic and spiritual movements in San Francisco, dropped out of college and joined the anti-university in London.

In this period, his friendship began with Nicholas Saunders, whom he helped in setting up the popular Neal's Yard wholefood complex of alternative enterprises in Covent Garden, London. Saunders died, also in a car crash, three years ago.

Albery's life was full of irreverent gestures with a constructive purpose. In the late 1970s, he was a minister in the Frestonia Republic he helped to found, after the residents of Freston Road, in northwest London, threatened with eviction to make way for a factory, voted in favour of independence from Britain.

The Greater London Council held a public inquiry, where Albery represented the community. The area became a site for housing and craft workshops, and the foundation of the Notting Hill Housing Trust.

Albery is survived by his wife and their son Merlyn, who will bury him in private woodland, according to the wish he expressed in a book:

"When I die, I want to be buried under an apple tree. I think of death as like a leaf falling off a tree."

There are many ways to help people to develop. One approach is to focus on their back story, build on their strengths and help them to do brilliant work in the future.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Back Story, Building On Strengths And Brilliant Work

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Clarifying A Person's Potential Future Performance Approach

A Person's Potential Future Performance

There are many ways to clarify a person's potential. One approach is to clarify their successful patterns – plus what they can improve – in their past and present performances. It is then to project what they may be able to achieve in their future performances.

There are many models for assessing a person's ability to perform superb work in the future. This include focusing on a person's attitude, ability and desire to achieve certain goals.

This article explores one approach. It is to clarify a person's successful patterns – plus what they can improve – in their past and present performance. It is then to focus on their potential future performance.

Imagine that you are interviewing a candidate or considering a person for promotion. You will explain to them:

The specific goals to achieve in the role – the picture of success;

The specific principles to follow to achieve the picture of success.

You will then invite them to describe the steps they would take to achieve the goals.

Bearing these things in mind, however, you may also want to consider the person's strengths and successful style of work. This can give clues to their attitude and ability to deliver the goods.

As mentioned earlier, one approach is to focus on their past, present and potential future performance. Let's explore these themes.

The Person's Past Performance

People often follow certain patterns in their lives and work. They may have both successful patterns and unsuccessful patterns. It can therefore be useful for a person:

To keep building on their successful patterns;

To manage any unsuccessful patterns;

To keep improving as a person and as a professional.

People develop and add to their repertoire, of course, but they often follow their chosen patterns. When considering a person for a future role, it can therefore be useful to explore their successful and potentially unsuccessful patterns.

How to take this step? One approach is to focus on the person's past performances. When doing so, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

What have been the person's successes? What have been the projects, results and other things they have delivered successfully? What have been the benefits of delivering these results?

What may be the person's successful patterns? What did they do right to deliver the successes? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action?

What may be the person's strengths? What may be their successful style of working? What do other people – their colleagues, customers and others – say about the person?

What may be the person's limitations? What may be their potential weaknesses? Do they recognise these? How do they try to manage the potential consequences?

What have been the situations in which they have delivered the successes? What have been the circumstances around them? What support were they given? Are there any other things it is worth noting?

Imagine that you are aiming to explore some of a person's patterns. You will, of course, do this in your own way. If appropriate, however, you may want to use aspects of the following framework.

The Person's Past Performance

Their Successes In The Past

The specific successes they have delivered in the past have been:

*

*

*

Their Successful Pattern

The specific things they did right then to deliver some of these successes were:

*

*

*

*

*

The specific things it may be useful to consider about some of these situations are:

*

*

*

The Person's Present Performance

Imagine that you have explored a person's past work. It can then be time to focus on the present performance. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful:

To clarify the person's recent successes;

To clarify their successful pattern – what they did right – to deliver the successes;

To clarify any of the person's areas for improvement and also the person's view of how they can improve in the future.

You will, of course, do this in your own way. If appropriate, however, you can use aspects of the following framework.

The Person's Present Performance

The specific successes they have delivered in their most recent work have been:

*

*

*

The specific things they did right then to deliver some of these successes were:

*

*

*

*

*

The specific things that the person can improve in their work – and their view of what they can improve – are:

*

*

*

The Person's Potential Future Performance

Imagine that you have explored the person's patterns. When considering them for a future role, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

*What are the specific results we want a person in this role to deliver?
What is the attitude, ability and application a person must demonstrate to deliver success?*

Looking at the person's patterns, do they demonstrate some of the required qualities? If so, how can they build on their successful patterns to deliver the goods? How can they compensate for any weaknesses?

Bearing these factors in mind, on a scale 0-10 how would we rate the chances of the person delivering the goods? If appropriate, what could they and we do to increase the probability of them achieving the goals?

It will be important for the probably of success rating to be at least 7+/10. If appropriate, you can explore how to increase the probability of the person delivering the goods.

People can develop but they seldom make radical changes. Bearing this in mind, it is vital understand their successful and unsuccessful patterns. You can then decide whether they may be able to deliver the goods. If appropriate, you can work through the following framework.

The Person's Potential Future Performance

The specific results a person needs to deliver in the specific role are:

*

*

*

The specific attitude, abilities and application a person needs to demonstrate to deliver these results are:

*

*

*

Bearing in mind the person's patterns, the probability of them delivering these results and achieving success in the role is:

_____ / 10

If appropriate, the specific things that they and we can do to increase the probability of them achieving the desired results are:

*

*

*

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may use elements of this approach? This may be where interviewing a candidate or consider somebody for promotion.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Person's Potential Future Performance

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

*The specific things I can do to follow
this approach in my own way are:*

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Being A Buddy To Somebody Who Wants To Follow A Positive Programme Approach

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to act as a buddy to a person who wants to follow a positive programme.

This is an approach that has often been used to help people who are recovering from addictions. The approach can be adapted, however, to help people who want:

To take charge of shaping their future and set positive goals;

To clarify and follow a positive programme – such as an action plan – to achieve their positive goals;

To have somebody who acts as a buddy – rather than as a therapist or a policeman - to support them as they work towards achieving the positive goals.

This approach can work well with somebody who has elements of being an addictive personality. It enables them to channel their personality rather than change their personality.

They can then follow positive addictions rather than negative ones. They can do this in a way that enables them to work towards achieving their goals.

The pluses of this approach can include the following. It helps a person to accept and channel their personality; to build on their strengths; to follow their rhythm and achieve their positive goals.

The approach can also sometimes help a person to accept who they are rather than try to be something they are not. This can sometimes help them to feel more at peace.

The possible minuses include the following. It works best with somebody who wants to move beyond talking and move into action – so it does not necessarily work with everybody. The person will get highs on the journey but may find it hard to experience a long-lasting sense of peace. This is something that can be worked on in other kinds of sessions.

Imagine that somebody has asked you to be their buddy when shaping their future. You can act as a companion on their journey and sometimes help them to clarify the possible ways ahead.

When appropriate, you can at times ask if it is okay to offer suggestions. It is then up to them whether they want to use some of the ideas in their own way.

Two key points. First, you are not acting as a therapist - though they may find your help to be therapeutic. Second, you are not acting as a policeman who is holding them accountable. They need to hold themselves to account.

Here are some guidelines that you may want to consider. You can then follow these in your own way to help the person to work towards their goals.

Being A Buddy To Somebody Who Wants To Follow A Positive Programme

Here are some guidelines - the Dos - that a buddy may may want to follow. The Don'ts are the opposite of these Dos.

Dos - The Preparation Stage

- Do make sure the person is prepared to take responsibility for shaping their future;*
- Do make sure the person is prepared to set themselves and work towards positive goals;*
- Do make sure the person is prepared to follow a positive programme to do their best to achieve the positive goals;*
- Do make clear contracts with the person about their role and responsibilities in working towards their positive goals;*
- Do make clear contracts about your role and responsibilities in helping them to work towards their positive goals.*

Dos - The Planning Together Stage

- Do encourage the person to clarify their goals and the benefits of working towards these positive goals;
- Do, if appropriate, help them to clarify the specific strategies they can follow and the actual things they can do to achieve the positive goals;
- Do encourage them to then write the programme they want to follow to work towards the positive goals;
- Do make sure they believe in and want to follow their programme towards achieving the positive goals;
- Do encourage them to write a positive mantra they can follow – especially when things get tough – when working towards their positive goals.

Dos - The Person Following Their Programme Stage

- Do encourage the person to follow their successful style of doing things and aim to get some early successes;
- Do encourage the person to keep building on what they are doing well when following their programme;
- Do, when appropriate, help the person to focus on specific ways to manage any challenges – Don't Do Therapy;
- Do help the person to encourage themselves and, when appropriate, encourage other people
- Do encourage the person to reflect on: a) their successes; b) the goals they want to achieve in the future; c) the programme they can follow to achieve these goals. You can encourage them to keep following this positive programme.

The Deciding, Doing And Delivering Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for a person to focus on the specific activity where they are good at deciding, doing and delivering. Let's explore where you may take these steps.

Deciding

Great workers are good at decision making in the activities where they excel. They may demonstrate this when working as a counsellor, medic, crisis manager, leader or in another professional role.

Looking at your own work, what may be specific activity where you are good at decision making? What are the kinds of decisions you are good at making? What is the process you go through when making decisions?

Imagine that you are focusing on a specific activity where you score highly on decision making. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Doing

Great workers are good at the doing. They maintain high professional standards and produce high quality work. Such people may do this in either of the following ways.

They may do the good work themselves;

They may enable other people to do good work.

Great workers aim to do work that is effective, excellent and maybe sometimes extraordinary. When leading teams, they encourage others to follow these principles and perform superb work.

Imagine that you are focusing on a specific activity where you score highly on decision making and doing. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Delivering

Great workers deliver the goods. They aim to apply their strengths, follow their chosen strategies and do superb work. They do their best to find solutions to challenges and achieve the desired picture of success.

Looking at the specific activity where you may excel, when have you delivered the goods? What did you do right then? How can you follow these principles to deliver successfully in the future?

Looking ahead, how can you continue to do superb work in this activity? How can you continue to improve and develop? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Deciding, Doing And Delivering Approach

The specific activity where I score highly on deciding, doing and delivering is:

*

The specific things I can do to continue to do superb work and develop in this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People's Souls Approach

This an approach that has been followed by spiritual leaders, philosophers, therapists and many others down the ages. They may practice this in a philosophical way, a practical way or a combination of both.

The aim is to encourage individuals by focusing on the following themes.

The person's soul – this is who they are;

The person's spirit – this is how they express themselves;

The person's picture of success – this is what they want to do and achieve during their time on the planet.

Different people choose to focus on different parts of people's souls. They may do this when communicating with people or doing certain kinds of work.

The Positive Parts

Some people focus on positive parts of people. They aim to build on what some call 'the better angels' of people's personalities.

Some leaders, mentors and educators take this approach. They remind people of their strengths and their successful patterns. They then encourage people to apply these qualities in the future.

Some great workers, singers and artists take this approach. They produce work that helps people to feel joyful, happy and alive. They create experiences that can give people positive memories for life.

The Possibilities Parts

Some people focus on the possibilities parts of people. They encourage people to consider their ambitions, hopes and goals.

Some inspiring orators take this approach. They may use uplifting language and show the practical ways that people can work towards achieving deliverable dreams.

Some mentors, coaches and therapists take similar steps. They then encourage, educate and enable people to pursue their possibilities and achieve positive results.

The Painful Parts

Some people focus on the painful parts of people. Sometimes the results are positive, sometimes they are negative.

People who are caring often show compassion and help others to manage their pain in healthy ways. This can lead to solutions that produce positive results.

People who are callous sometimes capitalise on other people's pain. Some tyrants aim to remind people of their grievances and look for scapegoats. They then use this pain to propel themselves to power.

Imagine that you want to follow the soul approach in your own way. This can involve taking the following steps.

You can support the positive parts of the person's soul. This involves helping them to feel safe and able to explore. If appropriate, you can encourage them to talk about their philosophy, strengths and goals.

You can support the positive parts of the person's spirit. This involves encouraging them to explore their principles and successful patterns. If appropriate, you can encourage them to focus on how they can express these in the future.

You can support the person's desire to achieve certain goals. This involves encouraging them to explore what they want to do in their personal and professional life. You can then pass on knowledge and practical tools they can use to achieve their picture of success.

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to encourage a person by using elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may want to do this as a parent, partner or friend. You may want to do this when acting in the role of educator, counsellor, therapist, coach, mentor, trusted advisor or in another role.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People's Souls Approach

*The specific situation in the future
when I may want to follow
elements of this approach may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People's Aspirations Approach

There are many ways to help people to develop. One approach is to focus on their aspirations. It is then to offer them practical tools they can use to apply themselves and achieve their goals. Let's explore these themes.

Aspirations

Every person has aspirations. They may have passions they want to follow, challenges they want to solve or goals they want to achieve. They can be helped to translate these into action and achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to focus on their aspirations. One approach to help them to channel their energy in a positive way and also provide practical tools they can use to achieve their goals.

Here are some of the questions that I explore before meeting a person. These can be also adapted when working with a team or organisation.

Who am I going to meet? What may be happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their top priorities at the moment?

What may be their short-term and long-term aspirations? What may they want to do in their lives and work? What may be their life goals? What may they want to do to be healthy and happy?

What are the things that give them positive energy? What may be their vocation? What would they do if they had a guaranteed income for the rest of their life? How can they focus on these things in the future?

What may be their strengths? What may be their successful style of working? How can they do satisfying work? How can they build on their strengths and get paid a reasonable salary?

What may be the specific challenges they face? What may be happening in these situations? Bearing in mind what they can control, what would they like to happen? What are the real results they want to achieve?

What may be their purpose in life? What may be the principles they believe in following? How can they pursue their purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success?

There are many other themes it is possible to explore when focusing on a person's aspirations. Whatever route is followed, it is important:

To create an environment in which the person feels at ease and able to explore their aspirations;

To encourage the person to explore and then, when they feel ready, to settle on the goals they want to achieve;

To play back your understanding of the person's aims and make sure you are clear on their picture of success.

Let's assume that a person has clarified their aspirations. When appropriate, it can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Application

Imagine that a person has decided to work towards their goals. How to help them to take this step? One approach is to explore the following questions.

What are the person's goals? Looking at the first goal, what are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goal?

What are their possible options for working towards their goal? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses - of each option? Which is the option – or the combination of options – that is most attractive?

What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they build on their strengths – and compensate for any weaknesses - when following these strategies?

What is the route they want to follow to achieve their goal? How can they translate this into an action plan? How can they get the support they need? How can they get some early successes?

How can they prepare properly before moving into action? How can they rehearse following their chosen strategies? How can they rehearse managing any potential challenges?

How can they apply themselves properly when following their chosen route? How can they manage their energy? How can they organise their time in blocks? How can they set achievable goals and get successes?

How can I help them to help them to work towards their goal? What are the positive models and practical tools that I can share? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can accept and use to reach their goal?

Let's assume a person has begun applying themselves to work towards their goal. When appropriate, it can be time to move on to the next stage.

Achievement

Imagine that the person is following their chosen strategies. It is important for them to keep reading reality. They can build on what is working and also tackle areas for improvement.

A person is also more likely to reach their goals if they know their successful pattern for finishing. They can follow this – plus maybe add other skills – to achieve their picture of success.

How to help a person to take these steps? One approach is to focus on the following themes and help them to achieve their aims.

How can I help the person to keep following their chosen strategies? How can I help them: a) to build on what is working; b) to tackle areas for improvement?

How can I help them to manage their energy? How can I help them to take time to reflect, re-energise and refocus? How can I help them to rehearse what they are going to do next?

How can I help them to buy time when faced by unexpected events? How can I help them to anticipate challenges? How can I help them to explore the possible ways forward and find solutions?

How can I help them to follow their successful pattern for finishing? How can I help them to reach their goals? How can I help them to maybe also add that touch of class?

There many ways to help a person to develop. One approach is to help them to focus on their aspirations. It then to help them to apply themselves and achieve their goals.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People's Aspirations Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way may be:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Catching People Doing Something Right Approach

Catching People Doing Something Right

This is an approach that has often been used by encouragers. It is also now used in education, sports, business and other professions. It involves going through the following steps.

- You can catch people doing something right;
- You can clarify the principles people followed to do something right;
- You can encourage people to follow these principles to keep doing things right.

There are many ways to support people. One approach is to catch people doing something right. It is an approach that has been used by encouragers throughout the ages. It is now used more often in education, sports, business and other fields.

The approach involves aiming: a) to give specific examples of what the person did right; b) to clarify the principles they followed; c) to encourage them to follow these principles in the future.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can translate this into action.

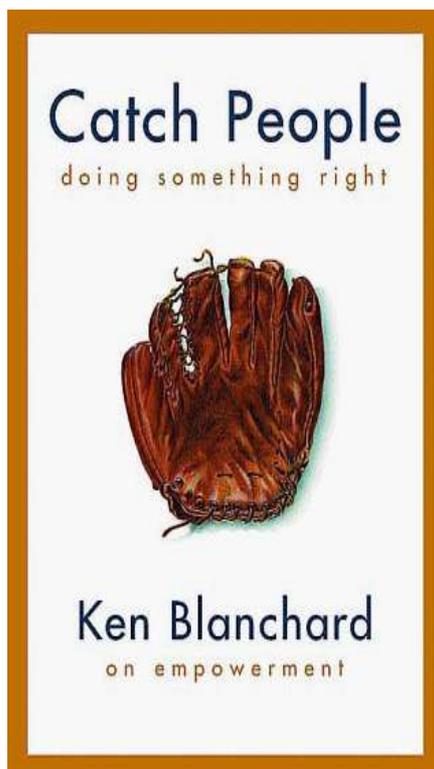

You can catch people doing something right

One of my mentors emphasised this theme when we met during the late 1960s. They expressed this in the following way.

"When looking at people, try to have positive eyes. Look for when they are doing things right. Anybody can tell you what people do wrong. The key is to look for what people do right."

"Try to focus on their specific actions – the specific things they do and say – to get the right results. It is then to encourage them to do more of these things in the future."

Ken Blanchard, the author of many books on leadership, underlined the value of this approach. He explained this in the following way.

Catching people doing something right is a powerful management concept to use with direct reports.

You can create, nurture, and repair relationships by catching people doing things right.

Give specific examples of the things they did right – such as what you saw them do and say - to make a positive impact.

The next time you see great performance from a team member, a colleague, or even your boss, let them know that you noticed.

You can clarify the principles people followed to do something right

Encouragers sometimes going deeper than highlighting when people do things right. They encourage people to focus on: a) the principles they followed; b) the specific things they did to translate these into action.

Why take this approach? Great workers and organisations are often principles driven. They keep following certain principles in order to do great work.

Some organisations are started by charismatic founders. They have strong personalities and inspire people to reach compelling goals. This approach works for a while but it is hard to scale.

Such organisations then need to become principles driven. They need to keep reminding people of the principles they can follow to do superb work and help the organisation to achieve success.

Different organisations do this in different ways. Some produce success stories that highlight when people do fine work. When doing so, they sometimes use the following framework.

The Success Story

The specific example of when a person or a team did superb work was:

*

The specific principles they followed – and how they translated these into action – were:

*

*

*

The specific results that were achieved were:

*

*

*

The specific ways we can follow these principles in the future are:

*

*

*

This final point highlights a key aspect of catching people doing something right. Let's explore this theme.

You can encourage people to follow these principles to continue doing things right

Great workers keep following the principles that work. They may believe, for example, in aiming: a) to build on their strengths; b) to provide great service to customers; c) to help customers to achieve success.

Such workers keep following these principles. The ways they translate these into action, however, may develop over the years. Bearing this in mind, they keep asking themselves the following questions.

What are the principles we want to follow in our work? What are the reasons why we want to follow these principles? What are the benefits to the various stakeholders?

What are we doing right to follow these principles? How can we keep doing these things in the future? What can we do better and how?

What else can we do to perform superb work and help our customers to achieve success?

Great educators encourage people: a) to clarify the principles that work; b) to clarify how they can translate these into action in the future. People then have a framework they follow to achieve future success.

They also encourage people to keep doing reality checks to ensure that what they are doing is working. Why take this approach? This is because the principles for doing great work often remain the same. The ways these are applied, however, can evolve over the years.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the catching people doing something right approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What may be the specific situation? How can you follow this approach in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Catching People Doing Something Right

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

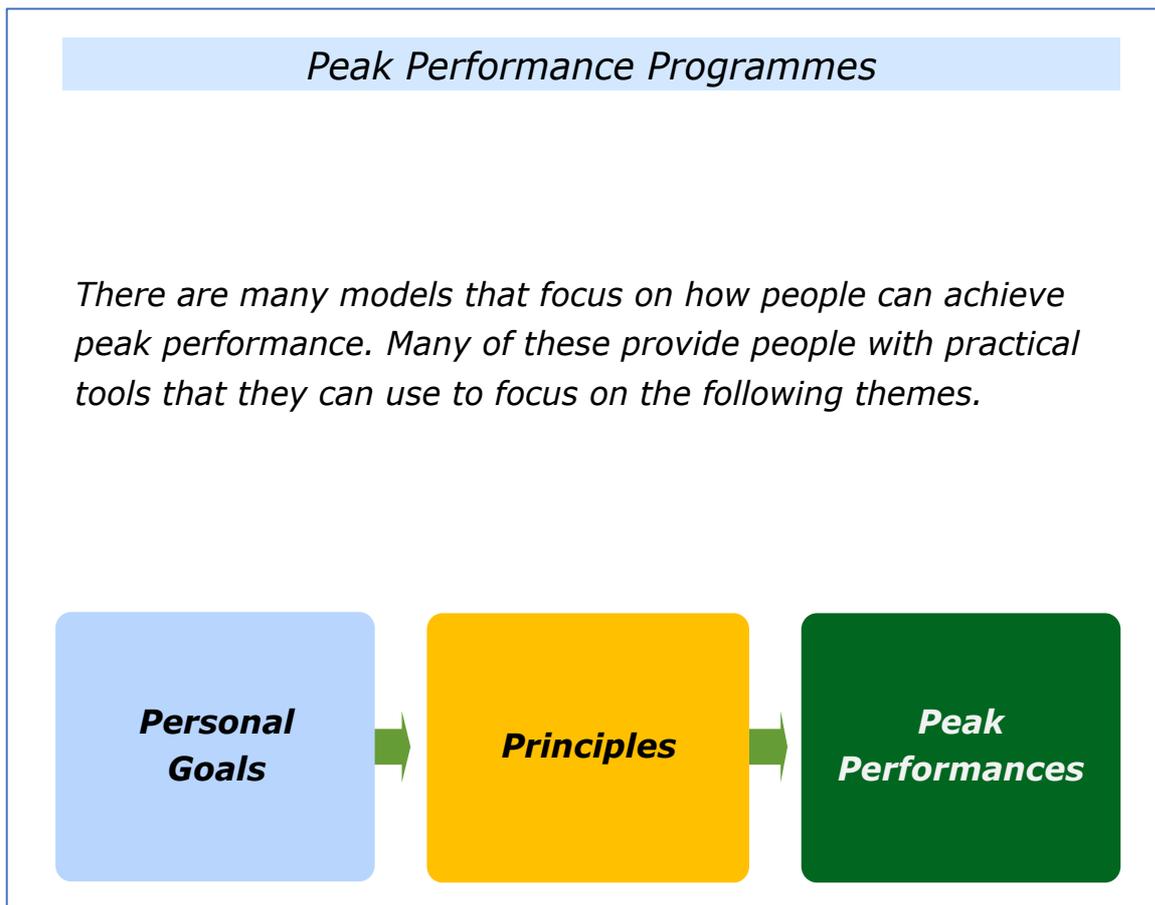

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Peak Performance Programmes Approaches

During the past fifty years there have been many books and programmes that focus on how people can achieve peak performance. Whilst each of these tend to emphasise their own approach, many of them provide practical tools on the following themes.

Personal Goals

This involves focusing on a person's goals – these can be both their personal and professional goals.

Principles

This involves focusing on the principles a person can follow – and how they can translate these into practice – to achieve their goals.

Peak Performances

This involves focusing on how a person can do their best to deliver peak performances on their way towards achieving their goals.

Some programmes also focus on how teams and organisations can translate these themes into action. They then provide tools that people can use coordinate their talents to achieve peak performance.

The Modern Interest In Peak Performance

Much of the modern interest in peak performance stems from the work done by people in sports, business and other fields. As we will see later, however, many of these principles have been followed by people throughout history.

*Charles Garfield inspired people to pursue these themes. Writing in his 1986 book Peak Performers he encouraged people to become the best they could be. He wrote:*

"Do not compete with anyone except yourself."

He said it is vital for people to work towards a compelling goal. He saw this when working as a computer analyst and leading engineers, scientists and staff on the Apollo 11 project.

Charles also founded the Shanti Project. This is a volunteer organisation that deliver excellence for patients and families facing life-threatening illness.

Alongside this he worked as a clinical professor at the University of California Medical School in San Francisco. Charles said he first heard the phrase peak performance from a cancer patient who said:

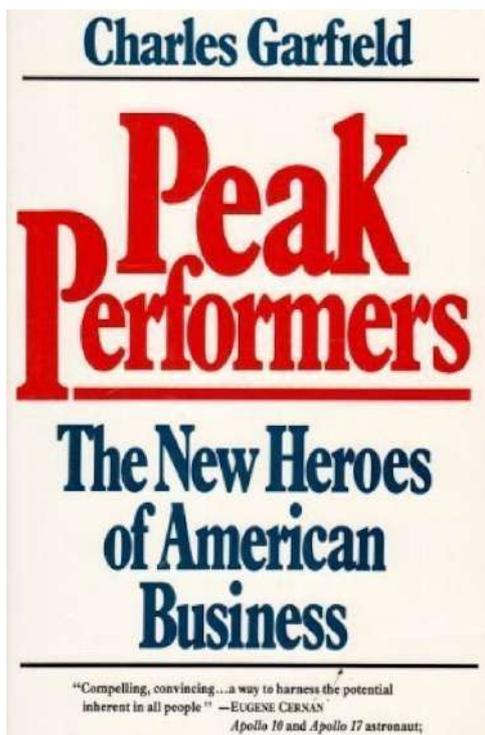

"Staying alive these days is my peak performance."

He remembered the phrase and went on to study great workers in many fields. These included people in medicine, sports, business and the NASA work in which he was participating.

Charles said that towards the end of the 1970s he discovered a common trigger for peak performance. People were often motivated to follow certain principles. They then translated this into pursuing a mission that gave them a sense of purpose.

The key factor, said Charles, was for them to make an internal decision to perform at their best. He wrote:

Now I began to understand what I was hearing and seeing, as one peak performer after another spoke of self-training, learning by experience, organizing that experience around a single theme, speaking and finding a purpose, a personal mission that represents something important. They were talking about what management theorist Warren Bennis calls 'working near the heart of things.'

People want to feel proud of themselves, to achieve something, to leave a mark and a contribution.

They want to follow their plans for doing all that purposefully and tenaciously. That is what I – and many others I knew – wanted.

Peak performers are not merely exceptions. They represent a kind of person any of us can be – once we find the capacity in ourselves.

The Different Definitions Of Peak Performance

There are many definitions for peak performance. These include the following:

Being the best you can be ... Being the best version of yourself ... Doing extraordinary work ... Producing optimal performance ... Getting a Perfect 10 (this from a previous measures of performance in gymnastics).

John Wooden, the basketball coach, described something similar in terms of competitive greatness. He explained this in the following way.

Be at your best when your best is needed. Success is peace of mind attained only through self-satisfaction in knowing you have made the effort to do the best of which you are capable.

There are several dictionary definitions of peak performance, some of which are exceptionally long. Several of these can be summarised in the following way.

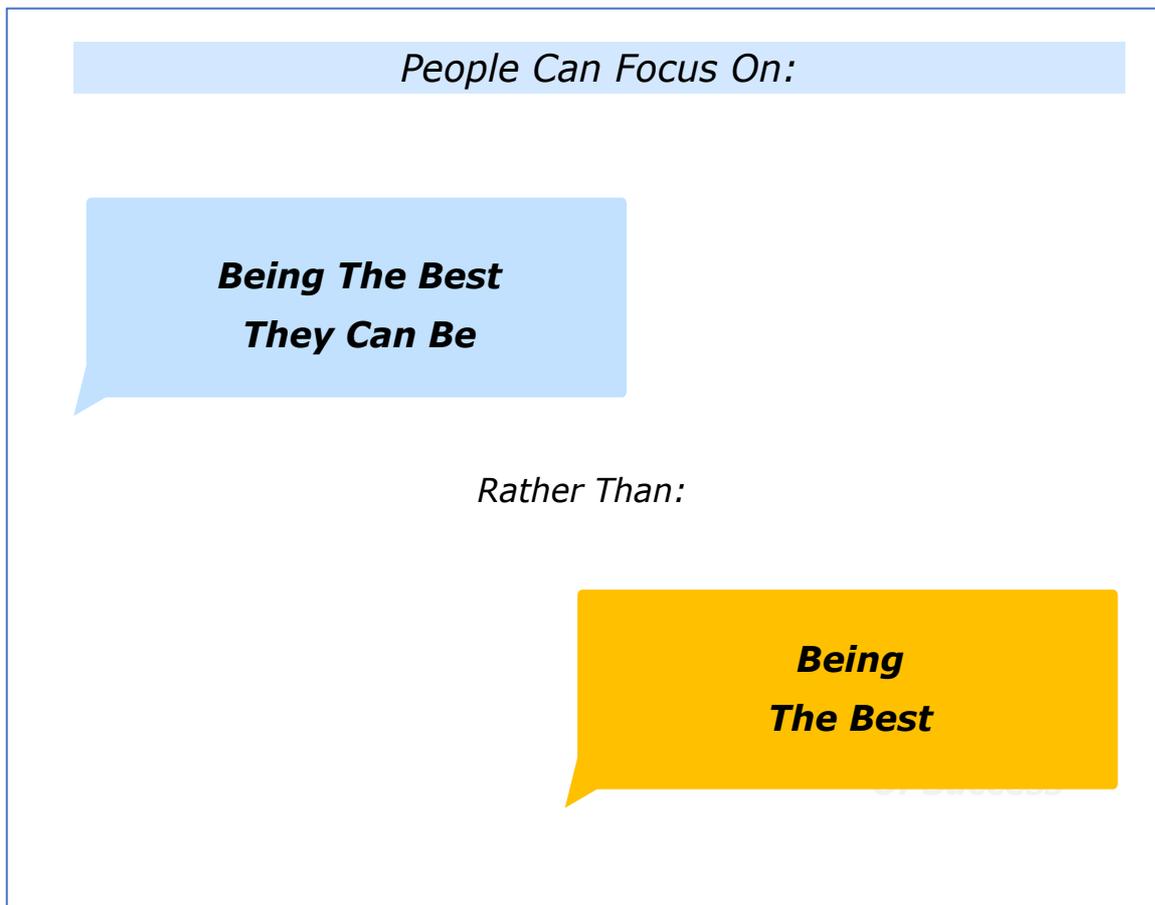

Peak performance involves being fully focused and applying your abilities to achieve the highest possible level of performance.

There are many philosophical and psychological approaches to delivering such work. Here is one that is drawn from spiritual philosophies but is also applied in sports and other fields.

Peak performance involves going in your equivalent of the zone, following the principles of effortless effort and delivering exceptional performances.

As mentioned earlier, there are several definitions of peak performance. For the moment, let's focus on a short version. This is:

Being the best you can be.

This definition has its shortcomings but it can be a useful starting point. There is also an interesting paradox when it comes to defining peak performance. This can be explained in the following way.

Doing your personal best – your personal peak performance – may not equate to what others consider to be peak performance.

Let's look at one example. This is one from sports but it can apply in other fields.

You may run 100 metres in 9.4 seconds - which will be your personal peak performance - but the winner may run it in 9.3 seconds.

You can still aim to be the best you can, however, and continue to improve. This involves focusing on the following themes.

You can do your best to achieve peak performance.

You can recognise that other people's natural talents may sometimes lead to them achieving higher levels of performance.

You can continue to improve, however, and aim to achieve your highest level of peak performance.

The Historical Approaches To Peak Performance

Many writers, researchers and practitioners have contributed to our understanding of this field. Some refer back to Eastern and Western philosophies that describe ways of being that are akin to what we now call flow. Pursuing these paths can contribute to peak performance.

Alison Coleman describes these in a piece she wrote for the Iwoca website. Here is an excerpt from her article.

It's been called many things over the centuries in both Western and Eastern philosophical writing, but the concept of being 'in the flow state' or 'in the zone' is almost universal across civilisation.

The ancient Japanese martial artists are credited with coining the term 'mushin' which originates from 'mushin no shin'. This is a Zen term for 'mind of no mind'.

It describes a heightened state of awareness where thoughts or emotions no longer get in the way of achieving peak human performance. This concept still remains central to Japanese martial arts today.

In Chinese history, the philosophy of flow is referred to as 'wu wei', which means effortless action or effortless doing. In some traditions of ancient India the concept of samyama is a form of flow state, sharing many similarities with mushin and wu wei.

The scientific study of flow began early in the 20th century when Harvard researcher William James began exploring and recording how the human brain can alter consciousness to improve performance.

One of his students, physiologist Walter Bradford Cannon, discovered a link between mind and body that helped to explain how the brain is able to reach a state that amplifies performance.

The ScienceDirect website refers back to Greek historical thought and describes the concept of eudaimonia. It defines this in the following way.

Eudaimonia and concepts of the good life and human flourishing have been of central concern for philosophy and not least with reference to Aristotelian thought.

This is a state attained by an individual living their life with the moral boundaries set by their virtues and fulfilling their roles and attaining their goals in life.

Catherine Moore explores the concept of eudaimonia in an article she wrote for the Positive Psychology website. Here is how it is defined.

Eudaimonia is a process of fulfilling or realizing one's daimon or true nature. It is fulfilling one's virtuous potentials and living as one was inherently intended to live.

Self-Help And Self-Improvement Influences

Some of the early self-help and self-improvement literature influenced later approaches to peak performance. These encouraged individuals to have a positive attitude, take responsibility and fulfil their potential.

Many people are familiar with writings of people such as Norman Vincent Peale. There were other writers, however, who preceded his work. Let's look at one such person.

James Allen was born in Leicester in 1864 and spent much of his life in the manufacturing industries. In 1902 he moved to Ilfracombe, Devon, and devoted the rest of his life to writing.

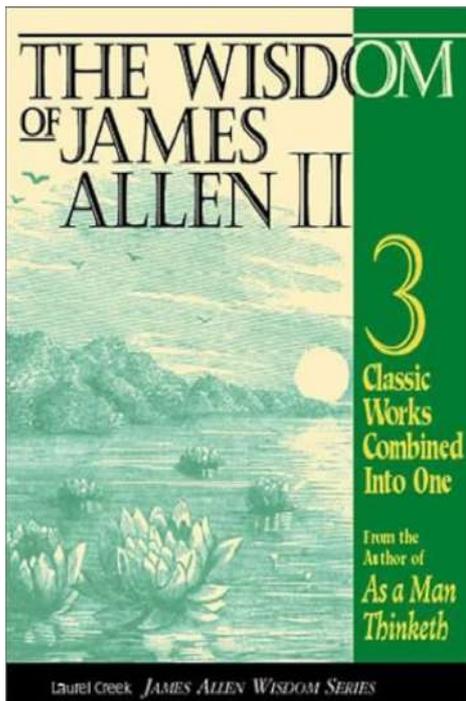

He believed we could control our thoughts. We could then spread goodness by translating these thoughts into action. Here are some of the things he wrote. (As you will see, he used the term 'man' when referring to both men and women).

A man sooner or later discovers that he is the master-gardener of his soul, the director of his life. All that you accomplish or fail to accomplish with your life is the direct result of your thoughts. Our life is what our thoughts make it.

Good thoughts bear good fruit, bad thoughts bear bad fruit. No duty is more urgent than that of returning thanks.

The law of harvest is to reap more than you sow. Sow an act, and you reap a habit. Sow a habit and you reap a character. Sow a character and you reap a destiny.

The more tranquil a man becomes, the greater is his success, his influence, his power for good.

Calmness of mind is one of the beautiful jewels of wisdom.

Work joyfully and peacefully, knowing that right thoughts and right efforts inevitably bring about right results.

A man should conceive of a legitimate purpose in his heart and set out to accomplish it.

He should make this purpose his supreme duty and devote himself to its attainment.

The More Recent Approaches To Peak Performance

Charles Garfield inspired people with his work on peak performance. Many other writers and practitioners focused on these theme. Different people did this in different ways.

Some learned from their own experiences of delivering great work. Some studied great performers in sports, business and other fields. Some produced their own models for delivering high performance.

Many people have since produced books on this topic. Such books often focus on one or more of the following themes - Positive Models, Personal Journeys or Practical Tools. Some combine all three elements.

Books On Peak Performance

There are many books on peak performance. These sometimes focus on one or more of the following themes.

- Positive Models

These books provide positive models that people can use to achieve peak performance

- Personal Journeys

These books describe people's personal journeys when aiming to do their best and, in some cases, achieve peak performance.

- Practical Tools

These books provide practical tools that people can use to achieve peak performance.

Positive Models

Some of these books aim to study peak performance and pass on positive models that people can use in their own ways. Let's consider some that fall under this heading.

During the 1970s and 80s there was increased interest in sports psychology and how it could increase performance. This often involved helping athletes:

To revisit the times when they had performed superbly and clarify the principles they followed to deliver peak performance;

To clarify how they could follow these principles in the future to deliver peak performance;

To mentally rehearse following these principles in a forthcoming situation and then do their best to deliver peak performance.

Willi Railo, a Norwegian sports psychologist, wrote an influential book on the topic. Published in 1983, it was called Bäst när det gäller – which roughly translated means Best When It Matters. This provided a positive model that sports people could use to perform at their best.

Tim Gallwey helped athletes to develop by focusing on what he called the inner game. From the early 1970s he published many books on this theme. These included The Inner Game of Tennis, The Inner Game of Golf, The Inner Game of Skiing and The Inner Game of Work.

Tim said individuals had two selves within their inner game. Self 1 was the negative or critical self that a person may have learned over the years. This could create noise and stop the person performing.

Self 2 was the positive and creative self. It embodied the passionate, curious and non-judgmental approach they may have had as a child. This could be revitalised to enable them to perform superbly.

Different people applied Tim's ideas in different fields. One coach summarised how they used it in the following way.

The Inner Game And The Outer Game

People who play sports may focus on both their inner game and the outer game. The inner game is played within the person and involves have a positive or negative approach. The outer is played in an external arena and involves aiming to reach an external goal.

The inner game can be played in a positive way. It is for the person to have a positive attitude, be present in the moment and do their best. It is to focus on the process and be non-judgemental.

The inner game can also be played in a negative way. It is for the person to be negative, fearful and unfocused. This can lead to self-doubt and poor performance.

My role is it help people to develop their positive inner game and do their best when playing the outer game. They are then more likely to achieve peak performance.

Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi did much of the pioneering work on flow. He described this in his books Flow: The psychology of optimal experience and Creativity: Flow and the psychology of discovery and invention.

Mihaly studied individuals, artists, doctors and other people who had what he called flow experiences. Such people followed certain principles.

They chose to work towards a stimulating goal. They concentrated fully and used their skills to do fine work. They became so absorbed in the activity that time went away. They reached the goals and had a sense of fulfilment.

Mihaly provided a framework people could follow in their own way. Here is a summary of this approach which could lead to peak performance.

The Flow Approach

Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi passed on a model that you could follow in your own way. This involved taking the following steps.

- You can focus on a stimulating task that you have a chance of completing and set clear goals.
- You can become fully engaged, feel a sense of control and apply your skills in a way that gets immediate feedback.
- You may experience a deep and effortless sense of involvement and feel that time goes away.
- You may find that your sense of self disappears but afterwards your self emerges stronger.
- You can find solutions to challenges, complete the task and may experience a sense of fulfilment.

Many other people created models for achieving peak performance. Some chose, however, to focus on the following theme.

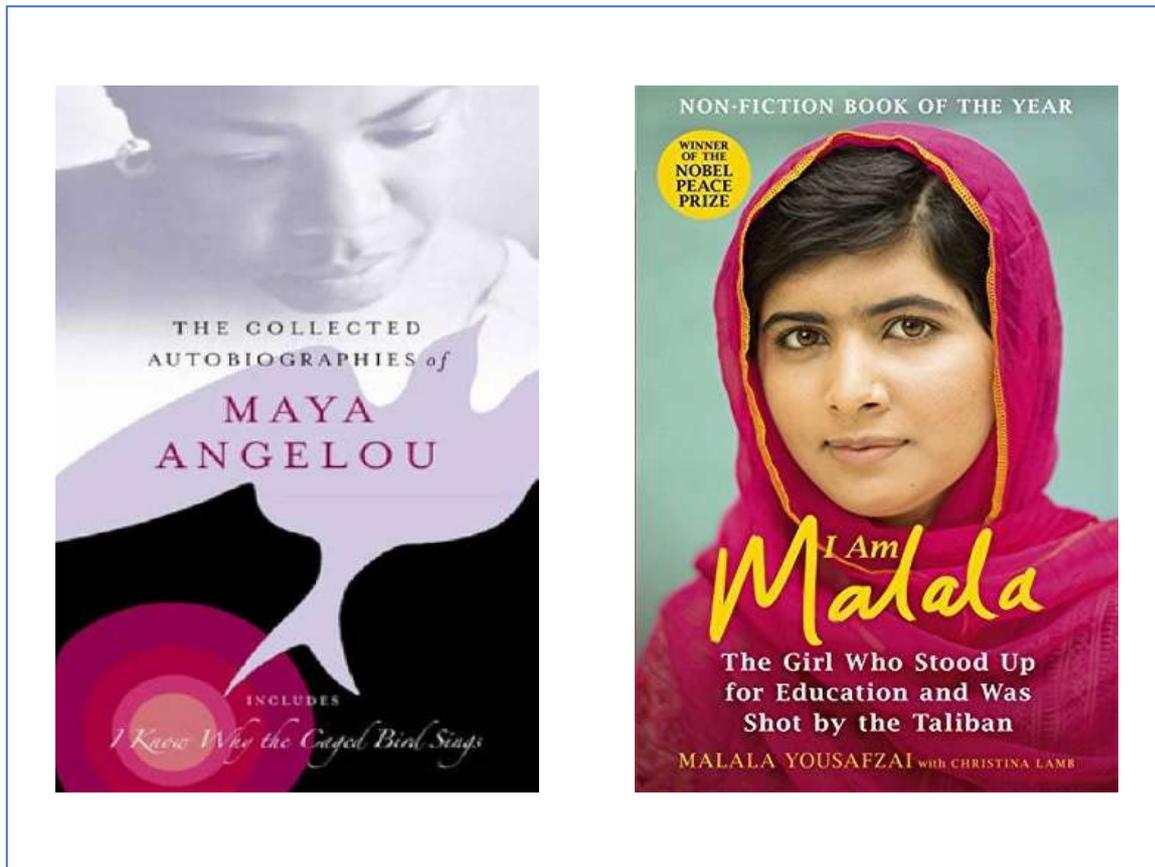

Personal Journeys

Some people describe their personal journeys towards doing their best. They aim to show rather than tell and share experiences from their lives and work.

Many such books are written by or about women. They describe the journeys taken by women artists, explorers, scientists, mountaineers and change makers.

People often feel inspired and learn from such stories. They feel encouraged to be their authentic selves and follow their chosen path in life. They then aim to be the best they can be.

Here are two of the most well-known autobiographies – from Maya Angelou and Malala Yousafzai.

Brené Brown reached a wide audience with her TED talk on vulnerability and her book Daring Greatly. She also explored the following theme.

What are the qualities demonstrated by people who live wholeheartedly?

She found that such people are prepared to be real and live with their imperfections. They focus on joy and gratitude. They give themselves to life and are prepared to live with uncertainty.

Brené went on to offer what she called Ten Guideposts that people could follow in their own way. Here is an overview of those themes.

Ten Guideposts For Living Wholeheartedly

- Cultivating Authenticity: Letting Go of What People Think
- Cultivating Self-Compassion: Letting Go of Perfectionism
- Cultivating a Resilient Spirit: Letting Go of Numbing and Powerlessness
- Cultivating Gratitude and Joy: Letting Go of Scarcity and Fear of the Dark
- Cultivating Intuition and Trusting Faith: Letting Go of the Need for Certainty

Practical Tools

Some writers and practitioners aim to offer practical tools that people can use to achieve peak performance. Some focus on a specific activity whilst others take a more wholistic approach.

Alan Lakein, for example, encouraged people to channel their energies towards achieving their life goals. In 1973 he published How To Get Control Of Your Time And Your Life. This book offered many tools that people could use to achieve their goals. It also spurred a growth in people offering course in Time Management and Priority Management.

Stephen Covey popularised these and other tools in his book The 7 Habits of Highly Effective People. John Whitmore and his colleagues produced the practical GROW Model. This encouraged a person to focus on: a) their goal; b) the realities; c) their options; c) their will to do the work involved to reach the goal. This became the basis for many coaching programmes.

Some practitioners pursued the strengths approach. They provided practical tools that people could use to build on their strengths, follow strategies that worked and achieve their picture of success.

Tom Rath headed the Gallop Organization's approach to helping people to build on their strengths. He then moved on to providing practical tools that people could use to take care of their wellbeing. These can be found in his books Eat Move Sleep and Are You Fully Charged?

The rise of positive psychology has led to many books and programmes that provide practical tools that people can use to flourish. Some of these focus on the topic of happiness.

Tal Ben-Shahar ran one of Harvard's most popular programmes which provided tools people could use to focus on happiness. He described some of these in his best-selling books Happier and Being Happy.

Sonja Lyubomirsky made a scientific study of people who were happy. This led to her producing the book of practical ideas called The How Of Happiness: A New Approach To Getting The Life You Want. Below is a summary of Sonja's findings. These are in line with many of the finding from other researchers.

The How Of Happiness

Sonja is frequently asked how people can increase their happiness. She often answers by saying that she is a scientist and tends to avoid self-help books.

Nevertheless, she says, the research seems to show that some of the advice passed down through the ages often hold true. These include some of the following activities.

- Developing Gratitude.

Research shows that people who set aside time to count their blessings increase and maintain their happiness.

- Being Kind.

Giving to others creates a good feeling in both oneself and, hopefully, in others. This creates a positive circle in one's life.

- Having A Positive Attitude.

Developing positive scripts. Reflecting on positive experiences, recalling times of overcoming difficulties, talking to oneself in a positive way regarding future opportunities.

- Focusing On Life Goals.

Listing and taking action on small steps towards these goals.

- Being Forgiving.

Forgiving people in one's life, but not at the expense of becoming a victim.

- Savouring Positive Experiences.

Such as using one's five senses to relish daily moments.

- Using One's Signature Strengths In New Ways.

Continuing to develop by doing the things one does best.

Steve Peters is a psychiatrist who has enabled many athletes to deliver peak performances. He describes the brain as comprising of three interacting parts. These are the human, the computer and the chimp.

The chimp can get out of control and produce negative thoughts. Steve shows people how can do great work by managing their chimp and rising to the occasion when it matters. He describes the techniques for doing this in his books such as The Chimp Paradox.

The past twenty years has seen a rise in programmes that encourage people to focus on their purpose. Many owe their origins to Viktor Frankl's work and his book Man's Search For Meaning.

Some programmes help people to clarify their purpose. They then provide them with practical tools they can use to follow their principles and, when appropriate, achieve peak performance.

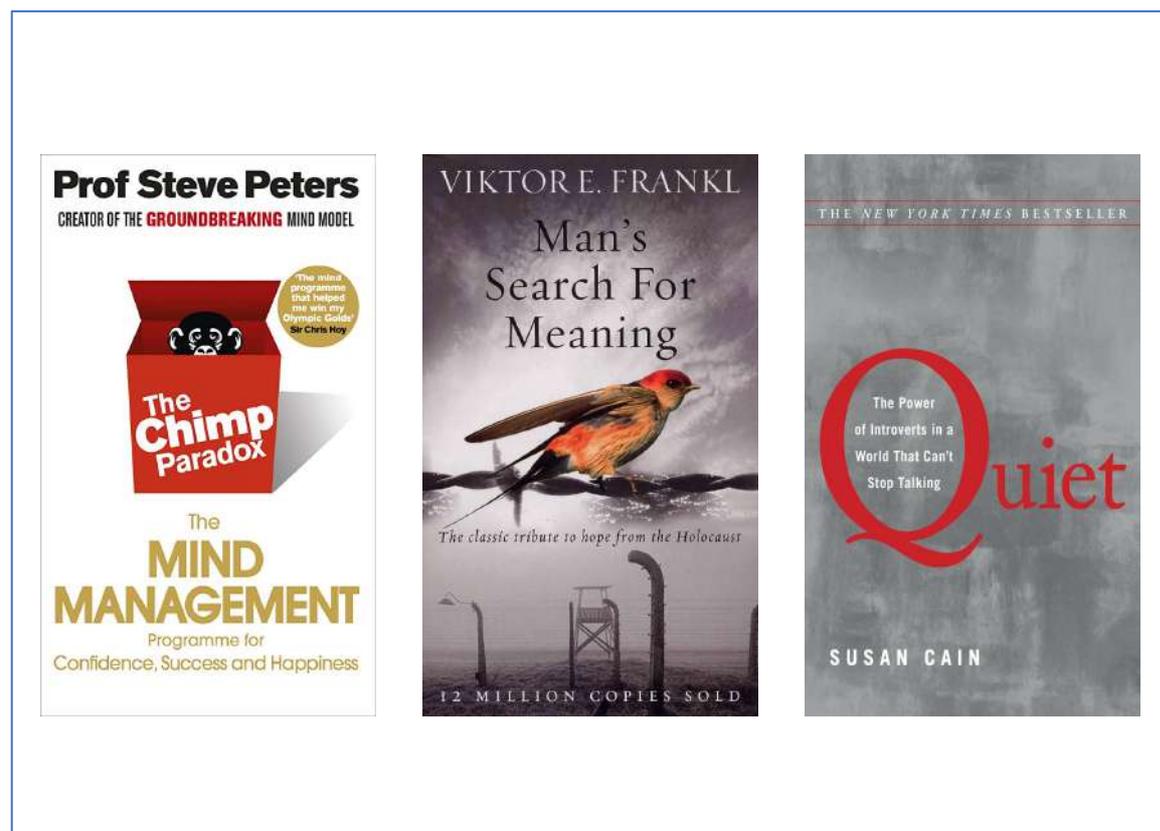

There are now programmes that help people to manage the challenges of what has been called a VUCA World. This is a world that is full of volatility, uncertainty, complexity and ambiguity.

The acronym VUCA has become a cliché but people may still need help to manage such situations. One approach is to provide them with tools they can use to follow their values and thrive in such an environment.

Some writers and practitioners encourage such individuals to build on their unique strengths. They provide tools that people can use to channel their personalities rather than change their personalities.

People are different. Some are introverts, some are extroverts, some move between these ways of operating. Some behave in ways that could be considered bipolar, autistic or having elements of ADHD.

Susan Cain provided many such tools for people who may be considered to be introverts. She wrote Quiet: The power of introverts in a world that can't stop talking. This enabled many introverts to continue to build on their strengths and do superb work.

Running Peak Performance Sessions

There are many ways to run such a session. Different mentors, for example, will have different philosophies about the principles people can follow to achieve peak performance.

Whatever their views, however, they will prepare properly. Different people will do this in different ways. One approach is for them to explore the following questions.

Preparing For The Session

Here are some of the basic questions to explore.

- Who is the person I am going to meet? What is happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their personal or professional goals? What may be their picture of success?

- What may be the topics they want to explore in the session? Looking at each topic, how can I clarify the real results they want to achieve? How can I pass on knowledge that will help them to achieve their goals?

- What are the actual words I would like them to be saying after the session? How can I do my best to ensure they are saying these things? What else can I do to help them to achieve their picture of success?

The mentor will aim to create a positive environment in which the person feels at ease and able to explore. They may then focus on the following steps to when helping them to achieve peak performance.

*Personal Goals – Establishing Clarity About
The Real Results The Person Wants To Achieve*

This step involves focusing on a person's goals. These can be personal, professional or peak performance goals. It is important to make clear contracts about the outcomes - the real results - the person want to achieve.

One approach is for the mentor to welcome the person to the session and explain the approach they will use. They may do this by saying something along the following lines. They will, of course, do this in their own way.

Welcome to the session. As you know, we can explore any topics you wish. These can be things you want to focus on as a person, as a professional or as somebody who wants to achieve peak performance.

For example: How to build on your strengths ... How to tackle specific challenges ... How to achieve peak performance ... How to achieve your picture of success ... Or any topics.

We will start by clarifying the various topics you want to discuss. We will focus on the first one you want to explore and clarify the real results you want to achieve.

We will then clarify the principles you can follow to do your best to achieve these aims. If you wish, I can also share practical ideas that you can use in your own way to achieve your picture of success.

We will then move on to the action part. If appropriate, we will focus on how you can translate your chosen principles into action and work towards you goals.

We will clarify how you can follow strategies that work to achieve the aims. This can include how you can deliver peak performances on the way towards achieving your picture of success.

Are you okay with taking these steps? Are there any other things you would like us to cover?

Different mentors have different philosophies but most will begin by explaining their approach. They will also invite the person to describe the topics they would like to discuss. They will then aim:

To focus on the first topic the person wants to explore and invite them to give some background about the specific situation;

To clarify the specific things the person can control in the situation – such as their attitude, professionalism and other things;

To clarify the person's specific goals – the real results they want to achieve – and translate these into a clear picture of success.

Imagine the mentor has taken these steps. They will then double check they are clear on what the person wants to achieve. Sometimes this can involve focusing on both their short and long-term aims.

Some mentors then underline the point that Steve Peters often makes to the people with whom he works. The person is encouraged:

To focus on what they can control in the situation and to do their best to achieve the goals.

Bearing these in mind, the mentor may say something along the following lines to make sure they understand the person's picture of success.

As far as I understand, the goals you want to achieve are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Is that right? Are there any other things you want to achieve?

Imagine that the mentor has clarified the goals the person wants to achieve. They may then move on to the next theme to help them to reach their goals.

Principles

This step involves focusing on the principles the person can follow to achieve their goals. Before exploring this step, however, it is important to recognise a key factor that will influence this part of the process.

Different mentors will have different philosophies about the principles that a person can follow achieve their aims. They may also have different approaches to helping a person to translate these principles into action.

There is also another factor to bear in mind. Depending on their approach, the mentor may aim either:

To encourage the person to clarify their own view of the principles they want to follow to achieve peak performance;

To pass on knowledge about some of the principles the person may be able to follow to achieve peak performance.

Some mentors combine both approaches. They help the person to learn from their own experiences and, with their permission, also pass on knowledge the person can use in their own way to achieve their goals.

Imagine that the mentor wants to combine these approaches. Let's look at how they may take these steps.

The Mentor Clarifying The Person's Successful Principles

Everybody has a positive history of tackling challenges or reaching specific goals. It can therefore be useful to help a person to clarify their successful style of achieving their aims.

One approach is to borrow from sports psychology. It is: a) to clarify the principles a person has followed to do superb work in the past; b) to clarify how they can follow those principles – plus add other skills – to do superb work in the future.

Bearing this in mind, the mentor may say something along the following lines to the person.

Let's start by focusing on your strengths and successful style. We can then explore how to build on these in the present situation.

Looking back, when have you tackled a similar challenge successfully in the past? What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action?

Looking ahead, how can you follow some of these principles to tackle the present challenge? How can you translate these into action? What other skills may you need to add to achieve the picture of success?

This is an organic approach to helping a person to develop. It is encouraging the person by explaining that: a) they already have successful patterns; b) they can build on these – plus add other skills – to achieve their goals.

The Mentor Passing On Knowledge About Successful Principles

Many mentors have studied what works. They may also, when appropriate, pass on this knowledge about what works. Before doing so, however, the mentor will probably have explored the following questions.

What are the real results the person wants to achieve? What do we know works in these kinds of situations? Bearing this in mind, what is the knowledge I can pass on to help them to achieve their aims?

What are the principles they can follow? What are the positive models they can use? What are the practical tools I can share that will help them to achieve their aims?

How can I pass on this knowledge in a way that they can accept and use? How can I bring it to life with specific examples? How can I do this in a way that resonates with them and helps them to achieve their goals?

Imagine that the mentor wants to share some ideas. Before doing so, however, it is important to get the person's permission to take this step. They may therefore say something along the following lines.

Bearing in mind the goals you want to achieve, is it okay to share some ideas that we have seen work in similar situations? You can take the ideas you like and use them in your own way.

The person will probably agree. The mentor will then try to pass on this knowledge in a way that the person can accept and use.

Different mentors may, of course, share different ideas. Much depends on their philosophy about the principles people can follow to achieve peak performance. They may believe that it can be useful for a person to do some of the following things:

To focus on a clear purpose, follow their principles and aim to achieve peak performance;

To build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and work to achieve their picture of success;

To focus on their beliefs, do the basics and, when appropriate, add the brilliance;

To follow their values, translate those into a clear vision and deliver visible results;

To aim to do work where they enjoy the journey, be effective and deliver excellence;

To aim to flow, focus, do fine work, finish and, as a by-product, find fulfilment;

To use their personal radar – their ability to see patterns quickly - apply their repertoire and deliver the desired positive results;

To channel their inner champ – focusing on the principles they have followed in the past to perform brilliantly – and manage their inner chimp;

To demonstrate certain characteristics, deliver consistently high standards and add that touch of class;

To follow their passion, be professional and do their best to achieve their picture of success;

To follow other principles to perform superb work and deliver peak performances.

The mentor will then aim to pass on ideas the person can use to achieve their goals. When doing so, it will be important to see which of these ideas resonate with the person.

Sometimes this can be easy because the person may show their interest in a particular topic. If the person is an introvert, however, it can be useful to give them chance to reflect. They may time to process the information and, if appropriate, focus on the ones that resonate.

Imagine the mentor has created such a time for reflection. When appropriate, they may then say something along the following lines.

Looking at the ideas we have mentioned, are there any that it would be good to explore further? We can then look at how to apply these in your particular situation.

Imagine that the mentor has helped the person to clarify the principles they want to follow. They may then move on to the next stage.

Peak Performances

This step involves focusing on how the person can translate their chosen principles and specific plans into action. The person can then do their best to deliver peak performances.

Every person has their own way of making action plans and the mentor will respect their approach. When appropriate, however, they may offer practical ideas the person can use to follow their chosen principles. They may help the person:

To clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

To clarify the specific things they can do to follow these strategies, get some quick successes and do superb work;

To clarify the specific things they can do to find solutions to challenges, keep improving and do their best to deliver peak performances.

As mentioned earlier, different people have different definitions of peak performance. Whatever their view, however, many people aim:

To be the best they can be.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the peak performance programmes approach? How can you do this in your own way?

You may want to follow some of these principles in your own life or work. Alternatively, you may want to follow them to help another person to achieve peak performance.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Peak Performance Programmes Approaches

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow these in my own way are:

*

*

*

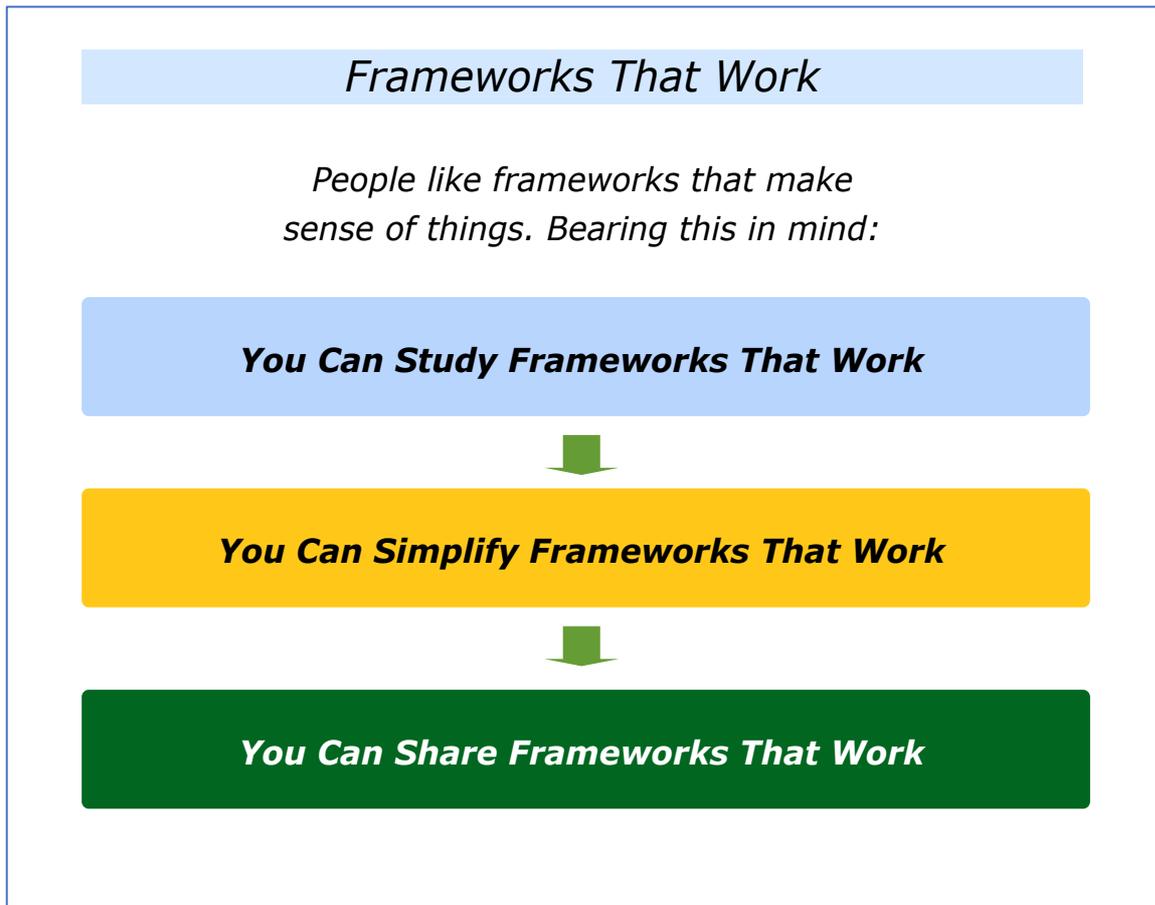

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Sharing Frameworks That Work Approach

People like frameworks that help them to succeed. Bearing this in mind, you can study and share frameworks that work. People can then follow these frameworks in their own way to continue to shape a positive future.

There are several definitions for the term frameworks. These include the following:

A framework provides a structure that enables people to make sense of things and achieve success

Imagine that you want to use this approach to pass on knowledge to people. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

You Can Study Frameworks That Work

The first step is to study a specific topic where you would like to find a framework that works. Let's look at some examples of people who have followed this route.

Abraham Maslow chose to study healthy people. This resulted in him producing a framework of human needs which has since been used by people in all walks of life.

Maria Montessori studied how children learned. This resulted in her producing a framework that educators have followed and adapted to help young people to develop.

Willian Strunk Jr. and E.B. White focused on how writers could communicate successfully. This resulted in them producing The Elements of Style that many people still use to this day.

Imagine that you want to study what works in a specific activity. If appropriate, you can frame this as a question in 'How to ...?' terms. For example:

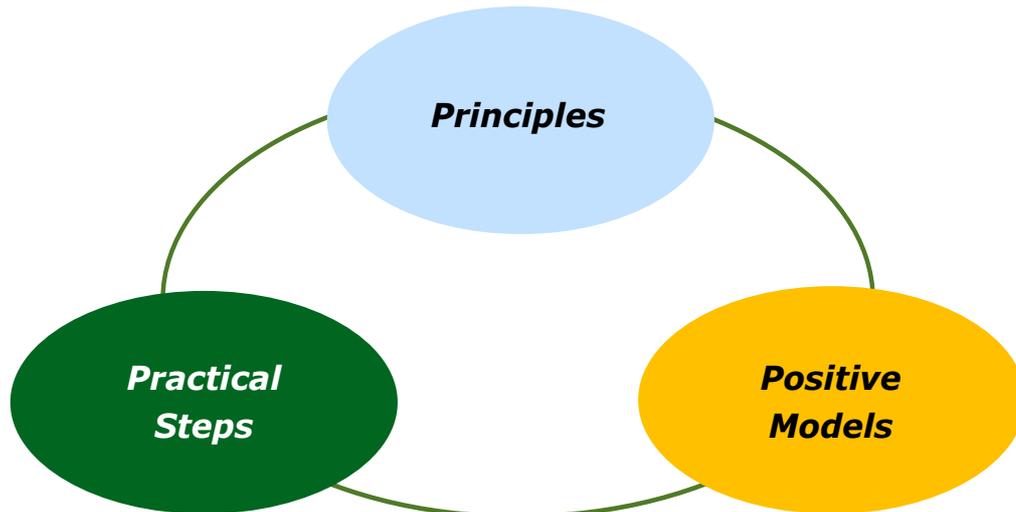

How to encourage people ... How to help people to build on their strengths ... How to help dyslexic children to learn ... How to write articles that have an impact ... How to make successful transitions.

How to tackle specific challenges ... How to do satisfying work ... How to build successful teams ... How to transform an organisation ... How to help people to shape a positive future.

Let's assume that you have settled on a topic you want to study. You may then want to explore the following themes to clarify what works when studying success.

Studying Success

One approach is to look for successful patterns. It is to focus on the principles, positive models and practical steps that people take to achieve success.

Some Themes To Explore

Looking at the specific activity, what are the examples of success? What do people do right to achieve success? What are the principles they follow? How do they translate these into action? What else do they do to make things work and achieve success?

Looking at this information, can I see any recurring patterns? What are some of the principles, positive models and practical steps that people follow? How can I translate this information into a framework that people can follow to achieve success?

Imagine that you have gathered this information. You may then want to begin putting together a provisional framework. There are many ways to take this step. One approach is to complete the following sentences.

Studying Frameworks That Work

The specific activity I want to focus on is:

 How to ...*

The specific things that work when doing this activity are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The specific examples of people following these principles and making things work are:

You Can Simplify Frameworks That Work

Imagine that you have settled on the framework you want to share. Bearing in mind the messages you want to give to people, you can create a framework that follows the rules of design.

Simple

Great design is simple but in a profound way. One approach is: a) to make the framework easy to remember; b) to be able to bring it to life with examples that show the depth of the thinking.

Satisfying

Great design is satisfying on a number of levels. Physically it looks and feels good. Practically it works and is user-friendly. You can follow these guidelines to make the framework satisfying.

Successful

Great design is successful. It works and does the job it is supposed to do. You can aim to create a framework that people can follow in their own way to achieve success.

Imagine you know the key points or messages you want to give people in the framework you create. You may summarise these in the following way.

The Framework

*The specific activity
I want to focus on is:*

 How to ...*

*The key points or messages
I want to give people when offering them this framework are:*

You Can Make The Framework Memorable

Imagine that you want to share the framework in a way that is useful to people. One approach is to simply write about the framework and pass on the information.

Another approach is to try to make it memorable. Different people use this different approaches to making this happen. Here are some of the most common methods.

Frameworks That Work

You can pass on your chosen messages to people by using either:

- A picture, model, illustration or other visual device;
- A mnemonic, alliteration or other literary device;
- A framework that follows the rule of three (or other number).

You can use a visual device – such as a picture, model or illustration. Many people find it easier to remember information when it is presented in a visual way. It can be useful to create a visual that brings the framework to life.

You can use a literary device – such as a mnemonic, alliteration or simply a list of points. These tools can help to make the framework memorable.

You may need to give concrete examples, however, to show the depth of the thinking.

You can use a numerical device – such as following the rule of three or another number. Some keynote speakers, for example, build their presentations around three key points.

Some presenters prefer to create illustrations around four, five, six, seven or even more points. George Miller wrote a famous article in 1956 called:

*The Magical Number Seven, Plus or Minus Two:
Some Limits on Our Capacity for Processing Information*

Some consultancy organisations, for example, use Seven Step Models which they advise their clients to follow. They then aim to guide people through these steps.

You will have your own approach to bringing your chosen framework to life in a memorable way. This may then lead to the next step.

You Can Share Frameworks That Work

Imagine that you want to share the framework with a particular person or group of people. How to make this happen?

One approach is to focus on the What, Who, Why, How and When. Here are some steps you may wish to consider regarding sharing the information with people.

Sharing The Framework With People

- The What The specific framework I would like to share with people is ...
- The Who The specific people I would like to share this framework with are ...
- The Why The specific benefits of sharing this framework with people may be ...
- The How The specific ways I would like to share this framework with people are ...
- The When The specific situations where I would like to share this framework with people are ...

Imagine that you have gone through the previous steps. You have been able:

To focus on a specific topic and study success;

To settle on a framework that works in this specific activity;

To simplify this framework in a way that people will find useful.

The final step will be to share this framework. It will be important: a) to use your strengths as writer, facilitator, mentor or in another role; b) to clarify the specific people you want to reach; c) to share the knowledge in a way that resonates with these people.

Imagine that you want to take this step. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Sharing Frameworks That Work

The specific framework I want to share with people is:

*

The specific things I can do to share this framework with people are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of sharing this framework with people may be:

*

*

*

The Strengths And Suggestions Approach To Helping People To Achieve Success

There are many ways to help people to achieve their goals. One approach is to start by clarifying their picture of success. It is then to then offer support by aiming:

To help them to build on their strengths ... To, if appropriate, offer suggestions they can use to tackle areas for improvement ... To help them to work towards achieving the picture of success.

Such an approach is encouraging but also gives a reality check. It can help people to continue to do what they do well and also tackle areas for improvement.

Imagine that a person has asked for your help in working towards achieving a goal. You can help them to focus on the following themes.

Success

The first step is to clarify their aims. One approach is to say something along the following lines.

"Looking to the future, what are your short and longer-term goals? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving the picture of success?"

The person may want to achieve many things, of course, so it can be useful to list these in order of priority. As a reminder, you may then want to summarise the person's goals in the following way.

The Picture Of Success

The real results the person want to achieve – in order of priority – are:

- *
- *
- *

Let's assume that you have followed elements of this approach. When appropriate, you may then move on to the next stage.

As mentioned earlier, this involves offering support. It is to help them to build on the strengths and, when appropriate, offer suggestions they can use in their own way to achieve their picture of success. Let's explore these themes.

Strengths

Imagine that you are clear on the person's goals. The next step is to focus on the strengths they can use to achieve their aims. There are several themes you can focus on at this stage.

The first theme to focus on is what they are doing well. Bearing in mind the results they want to achieve, you can explore the following questions.

What is the person's strengths? What are they doing right that will help them to achieve their goals? What are the principles they are following? How are they translating these into action? What are the specific examples of them doing these things?

How can I encourage the person to build on these strengths? What are the key messages I can give them about what they are doing well? How can I bring these to life with specific examples? How can I encourage them to do more of these things?

The second theme is to focus on the person's positive history. Looking at their past, it is to explore when they have tackled similar challenges or achieved similar goals successfully.

The most effective approach is to explore these themes with the person. On other occasions, however, you may need to explore their background and use your imagination. When doing so, you can ask the following questions.

What is the person's positive history? What is their successful pattern? Looking back, when have they tackled a similar challenge or achieved a similar goal successfully?

What did the person do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action? How can they follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – in the future?

Imagine that you have explored some of these themes. If appropriate, you can list your findings in the following way.

Strengths

*The specific things the person is doing well
- or has done well in the past - that can help them to achieve the desired results are:*

*

*

*

The specific steps the person can take to continue to do these things to help them to achieve the desired results are:

*

*

*

Let's assume that you have followed elements of this approach in your own way. When appropriate, you may then move on to the next stage.

Suggestions

Imagine that you have clarified what the person is doing well that can help them to achieve their goals. The next step is:

To clarify what the person can do better - and how - to help them achieve their aims;

To clarify the knowledge and practical tools you can pass on to help them achieve their aims;

To clarify how you can pass on these suggestions and ideas in a way they can accept and use to achieve their aims.

How to take these steps? One approach is to explore the following themes.

What can the person do better – and how – to help them to achieve their goals? What can they do to increase the chances of success? What are the specific things they can add to their repertoire?

What are the positive models and practical tools I can pass on? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way that resonates with the person? How can I do this in way they can accept and use to achieve their goals?

Imagine that you have explored some of these themes. If appropriate, you can list your findings in the following way.

Suggestions

The specific things the person can do better – and how – to help them to achieve the desired results are:

*

*

The specific knowledge and practical tools I can pass on to help them to achieve these results are:

*

*

The specific things I can do to pass on these suggestions in a way they can accept and use to achieve these results are:

*

*

Let's assume that you have followed elements of this approach in your own way. When appropriate, you may then move on to the next stage.

Success

Imagine that you have clarified the results the person wants to achieve. You have also explored the specific things they can do: a) to build on their strengths; b) to increase their chances of achieving their goals.

The next step is to have a conversation with the person about how they can continue to work towards achieving their goals. Before doing so, however, it can be useful for them to do a piece of prework.

This involves them developing the habit of self-development. If appropriate, you can invite them to do the following exercise.

My Development
The specific results I want to achieve are:
* * *
The specific things I am doing well – or have done well in the past – that I can continue to do to help me achieve these results are:
* *
The specific things I can do better – and how – to help me achieve these results are:
* *

Imagine that the person has done this exercise. It is important to give them the opportunity to talk through what they have written. This approach can provide an insight into a person's mindset.

Some people may be good at clarifying their strengths and areas for improvement. Some may be overly self-critical. Some may talk in generalisations or have a particular view of reality.

Imagine that the person has described their self-evaluation and given some specific examples. When appropriate, you may then say something along the following lines.

"Looking at what you have said, I think you are spot on in the following areas you mention. For example:

*

*

*

"Bearing in mind the goals you want to achieve, is it okay to share some ideas you may be able to use in your own way?"

The person will probably say yes, but it is important to get their psychological permission. This helps to create the environment where they are open to ideas.

Imagine that they have taken this step. If appropriate, you may want to say something along the following lines.

"Let's go back to the goals you want to achieve. As far as I understand it, you want to:

*

*

*

"Bearing these goals in mind, here are some ideas you may want to use to build on your strengths.

"One possibility is to ... For example to ...

"Another possibility is to ... For example to ...

Imagine that you are following this approach in your own way. As mentioned earlier, it can be important to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the key messages I want to give to the person? How can I put these in a way that resonates with them? How can I pass on these ideas in a way they can accept and use to achieve their goals?

Let's assume you are sharing some ideas. When doing so, it can be useful to look for those that are resonating with the person. You can then explore these in greater depth.

Sometimes it is easy to see which ideas are resonating but this is not always the case with introverts. At some point you may therefore want to create a time out where a person can clarify their thoughts.

Imagine that you have shared some specific ideas regarding how the person can build on their strengths. You may then focus on what they can do better – or what they can add to their repertoire – to improve their chances of achieving their goals.

Sometimes it can be more challenging for a person to focus on what they can improve. Bearing this in mind, you may want to say something along the following lines.

"Looking ahead, would it be okay to share some ideas you can use to increase your chances of achieving your goals? You can take the ideas you like and use them in your own way."

Let's assume the person has said they would like you to share these ideas. If appropriate, you may say something along the following lines in your own way.

"Looking at the first goal you want to achieve, here are some possible ways forward. But again you would need to apply these in your own way."

"One possibility you may want to consider is to ..."

"For example to ..."

It is up to you how many of the person's goals you focus on and the number of practical ideas you share. The key is to make the session relevant and rewarding for the person.

There will come a point, however, where you recognise the person feels they have enough ideas. They may then want to move on to translating some of these into action.

There are then several options. Some people may prefer to take time to reflect before making an action plan. Some may want to do this on the spot.

Each person will have their own approach to making an action plan. The key, however, is for them to make a plan that they believe in. One approach is for them to do something like the following exercise.

My Action Plan

The specific results I want to achieve are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to do my best to achieve these results are:

*

*

*

There are many ways to help people to develop. One approach is to clarify the results they want to achieve. It is then to help them to build on their strengths and offer suggestions they can use to achieve success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites to complete the following sentences.

The Strengths And Suggestions Approach To Helping People To Achieve Success

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Focusing On The Future Rather Than Only Giving Feedback About The Past Approach

Many organisations aim to create an environment in which people can continue to develop. Different organisations aim to do this in different ways. Let's look at two of the main approaches.

The Feedback About The Past Approach

Some organisations tell their people to continually give feedback on ideas and performance. This approach has both pluses and minuses.

The Potential Pluses

These include the following. When done properly, it can help to provide a reality check. This may particularly be the case when focusing on how to improve products or relationships with customers.

The Potential Minuses

These can include the following. Many of these relate to people giving each other feedback.

The feedback that is given may say as much about the person giving it as the person they are giving it to. It may reflect their view of the world.

The feedback may be emotional and based individual feelings. It may not give a reality check that also gives specific examples.

The feedback may only be past focused and critical. It may not give a positive way forward that can help other people to improve.

Such an approach can work but there are pitfalls. This is especially the case when it comes to performance management sessions. People may not look forward to the sessions or find them rewarding. Such sessions can also be challenging if the manager:

Is telling people they must work well together to help each to succeed;

Is also told by their organisation that they must distribute people's performance across some imaginary Bell Curve.

The Bell Curve approach does not necessarily apply to great teams. It also gives people double messages. They are supposed to cooperate but will also be measured against each other.

The Focusing On The Future Approach

Some organisations take this approach. This involves encouraging their people:

To focus on the real results to achieve and the benefits of achieving the picture of success;

To focus on what they can keep doing – such as the things they do well – to do their best to achieve the picture of success;

To focus on what they can add or do differently to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success.

When appropriate, it is also possible for the person and their manager to assess their performance in terms of achieving the previously agreed goals. That process is described in a pack I have produced called The Performance Management Pack.

That pack can be sent to you on request. It provides practical tools that both the manager and team member can use to hold a rewarding performance management session.

Let's return to the focusing on the future approach. Imagine that you are a leader who is going to meet a person to agree on their action plan for achieving certain goals. One approach is to work through the following themes.

You Can Focus On The Picture Of Success

You may have already had a session where you and the person assessed how they had performed in relation to achieving their previously agreed goals. When appropriate, it can then be useful to say something along the following lines.

Let's move on to focusing on the future. As you know, the specific results the team needs to deliver by a certain date are the following:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Bearing in mind your strengths, what are the specific results you would like to deliver towards achieving the team's goals?

There may be other things we need to add later, but let's start with what you see as your best contribution to the team. We can then focus on the strategies you can follow to this picture of success.

Imagine that you have had a conversation with the person about their best contribution. This part of the session may conclude the person completing the following framework.

The Picture Of Success

The specific results I aim to deliver by ... are:

*

*

*

Let's assume you and the person have agreed on their goals. Bearing these in mind, it can then be useful to explore how they can do their best to achieve these aims.

There are many ways to take this step. One approach is to start by exploring the following theme.

You Can Focus On What The Person Can Keep Doing

Great workers build on what they are doing well. They keep following these principles and to consistently deliver 7+/10. They may then add other things to get them closer to 10/10.

How to take this step? One approach is to encourage the person to focus on what they can keep doing. They can then continue to follow these good habits to perform good work.

Some people may need help to build on these strengths. This may be because they – and perhaps others – immediately identify their shortcomings rather than what they can keep doing to create a platform for success.

Imagine you are helping a person to clarify what they are doing well. Much depends on their role, of course, but here are some of the things that they and you may describe.

Keep Doing - The Person Can Continue:

To keep focusing on the picture of success ... To keep providing good leadership for their own team ... To keep providing great service to their customers ... To keep delivering high quality work.

Let's assume the person has identified what they can keep doing. If appropriate, you can then move on to the next stage.

You Can Focus On What The Person Can Add Or Do Differently

Great workers focus on continuous improvement. One leader described how they encouraged people to do this in a positive way. They said:

"I begin by encouraging the team member to keep building on what they do well. This can build their confidence and create a platform for achieving success.

"Bearing in mind the results they aim to achieve, I then invite the person to take time to reflect and do the following exercise.

Adding Or Doing Differently

The specific things I can add or do differently to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success are:

*

*

*

This approach often results in a person adding several skills or fresh habits they can pursue to achieve their goals. But this also raises another question:

What happens if the person does not mention something they probably need to add or do differently to achieve the desired results?

Sometimes it is necessary to give a reality check. When doing so, you can follow certain principles to increase the possibility of a person taking the ideas on board. One approach can be to say something along the following lines.

Bearing in mind the goals to achieve, you have explored what you can add or do differently. Is it okay for me to share some ideas you may also want to consider to help you achieve the picture of success?

The person will probably say that it would be okay for you to share ideas. If so, you may say something along the following lines.

Looking at the goals you want to achieve, here are some possibilities you may wish to consider.

One idea would be to ... The benefits of doing this could be ...

Another idea would be ... The benefits of doing this could be ...

Take time to consider what you may want to add or do differently to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success. Then add any of these to your action plan.

This approach can increase the chances of a person applying the ideas. If appropriate, you can then provide the support they may need to implement them successfully.

The language used here is important. It invites a person a focus on what they want to add of do differently rather than change.

Some people will argue that is comes down to semantics. But people prefer to develop rather be told they need to change. The language used here can increase the chance of them continuing to develop.

There may come a point, of course, when a person needs to choose to behave in different ways in order to remain in the team. This calls for giving them clear messages. You can find some practical tools for taking this step in The Performance Management Pack.

Let's assume you have worked through some of the stages we have described. It may then be time to move on to the next stage.

You Can Focus On The Person's Action Plan For Achieving The Picture Of Success

When appropriate, you can invite the person to take time to reflect and make their action plan for achieving the desired results. They can then share this with you.

Different people make action plans in different ways. Whatever approach they use, however, it can be useful for them to describe:

The specific results they aim to deliver – the picture of success;

The specific strategies they will follow to deliver the results;

The specific support they would like to help them deliver the results;

The specific things they will do to proactively keep people informed about their progress towards delivering the results;

The specific things that will be happening that will show they have achieved the picture of success.

Imagine that the person has completed their agreed action plan. You can then have regular sessions with them where they can update you on their progress towards achieving the picture of success.

There are many ways to help a person to continue to do fine work and develop. This piece has described one approach that involves focusing on the future.

The following section provides a summary of the steps you can take when following this approach. You will obviously apply these in your own way when helping the person and your team to achieve success.

The Focusing On The Future Approach

The following pages provide a framework that a person can use to work towards achieving their agreed future goals.

The Picture Of Success

The specific results – the agreed goals – I aim to deliver by ... are:

*

*

*

Keep Doing

The specific things I can keep doing – such as the things I am doing well – to work towards achieving the picture of success are:

*

*

*

Add Or Do Differently

The specific things I can add or do differently to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success are:

*

*

*

My Specific Action Plan

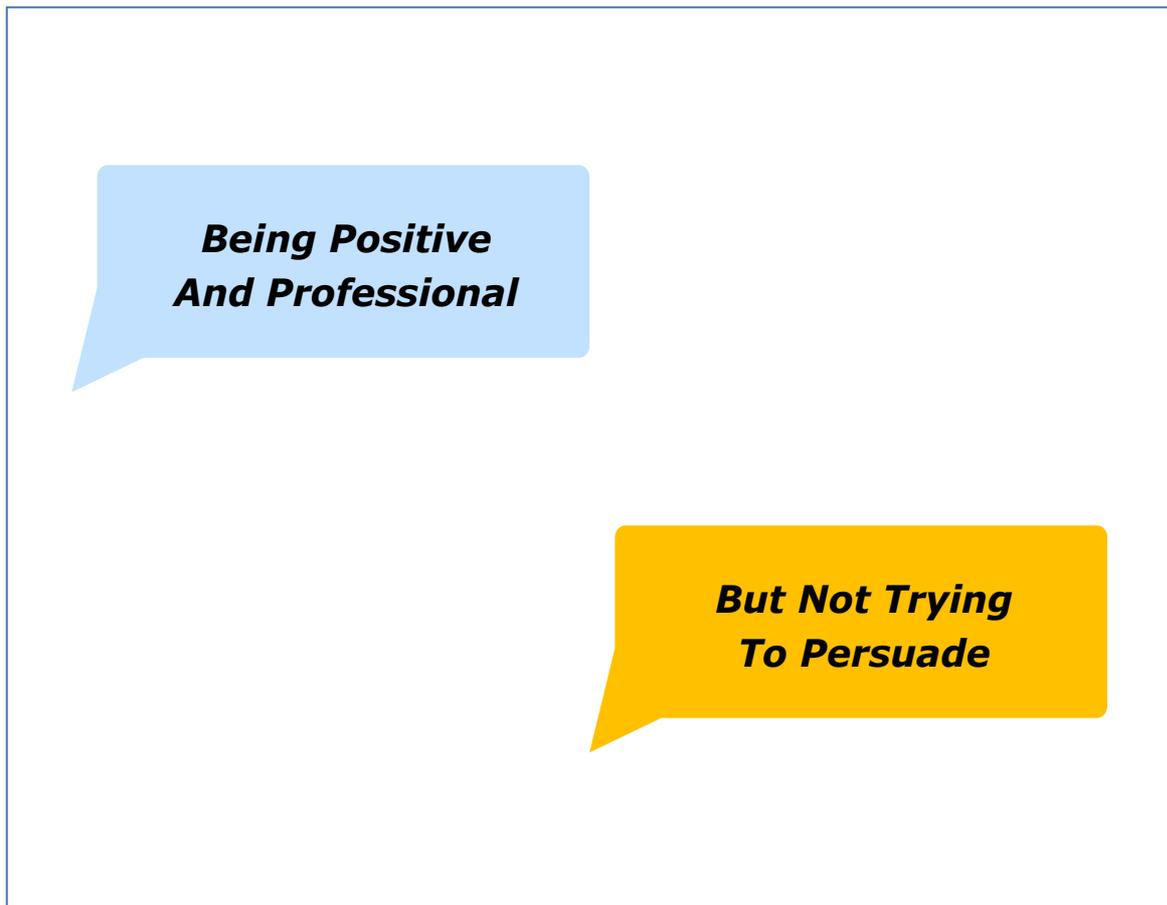

My action plan for working towards achieving the results - the picture of success - is:

*

*

*

The Being Positive And Professional But Not Trying To Persuade Approach

There are many ways to help people. This piece looks at one approach that I learned from some great psychotherapists. Many embodied the qualities demonstrated by superb educators.

They focused on inspiration, implementation and integration. They aimed to create an inspiring environment and provide implementation tools that worked. They then helped people to integrate the learning into their daily lives and work.

The psychotherapists each had their own approaches, but there were many similarities. They all aimed to study, simplify and share what worked. They also offered similar advice regarding working with clients. Here are the main themes they covered.

Be positive and professional, but don't try to persuade. You can go through the following stages with clients.

Clarity

Create an encouraging environment and make the person feel welcome. You can create a stimulating sanctuary. Move on to clarifying their goals. Ask them:

"What are your goals? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success?"

If appropriate, invite them to explore any additional things they want to achieve. Agree on their picture of success.

Make clear working contracts. Explain what you can and can't offer to help them achieve their goals.

Explain your responsibility and their responsibility in working towards achieving their goals. If you both want to work together, move on to the next stage.

Creativity

Help them to explore their possible options for achieving their goals. For example: Option A is: ... Option B is: ... Option C is: ...

Help them to explore the pluses and minuses of each option. Invite them to consider the attractiveness of each option.

Explore other creative solutions for achieving their goals. Share your knowledge in a way that helps them to make informed decisions.

Follow the organic approach to development. The person already has within them the seeds of development. They already have strengths and successful patterns. You can help them:

To build on their strengths and manage the consequences of their weakness;

To build on their successful patterns.

Everybody has a positive history. Help them to learn from when they have succeeded. They can follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – to succeed in the future.

Concrete Results

Create a time for reflection. Give the client time to reflect and settle on their chosen way forwards.

Move on to concrete results. If appropriate, help the client to create their action plan. Ensure they build in some early successes. These will create momentum and build confidence.

Encourage and enable them to reach their goals. Provide practical tools they can use to achieve their picture of success.

Finally, remember that it is vital to respect the client. They need to feel in charge of making the decisions regarding shaping their futures.

Looking back on your own work, when have you adopted elements of this approach? You may have been encouraging a person, working with a team, providing professional services or whatever.

What did you do then to be positive and professional rather than try to persuade? What were the principles you followed? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Translating The Approach Into Action

Looking back over the past 40 years, I have tried to follow elements of this approach. When I have done it properly, it has seemed to work.

On some occasions I failed. I fell into trying to persuade and the strain showed. The first place I tried the approach was in the therapeutic community I ran in the early 1970s.

There were many reasons why the young people who came to us had experienced problems. If they wanted to stay healthy, however, they needed to take responsibility for shaping their futures.

We explained the deal to the young people when they applied to the community. We outlined:

*The specific things we could offer to help them to achieve their goals;
The specific guidelines they would be expected to follow if they wanted to be in the community and work towards achieving their goals.*

It was then up to them whether or not they decided to join. We did not try to persuade.

Many young people came and followed the guidelines. Some joined, but then later chose to break the contract. They were choosing to leave.

We aimed to protect the culture that was geared to helping the young people who wanted to take responsibility. Many of these developed and went on to achieve their goals.

Since that time I have followed similar principles when working with people, teams and organisations. The approach has been to help them:

To clarify the real results they want to achieve - their picture of success;

To clarify the strategies they can follow towards achieving their picture of success;

To clarify whether they are serious and, if they are, to help them to follow the strategies and achieve their picture success.

Many people, teams and organisations have applied the approach in their own ways to achieve their goals.

The times when it has not worked have been for one of two reasons. I have made the mistake of trying to persuade or the client has not really been serious.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

*Being Positive And Professional
But Not Trying To Persuade*

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

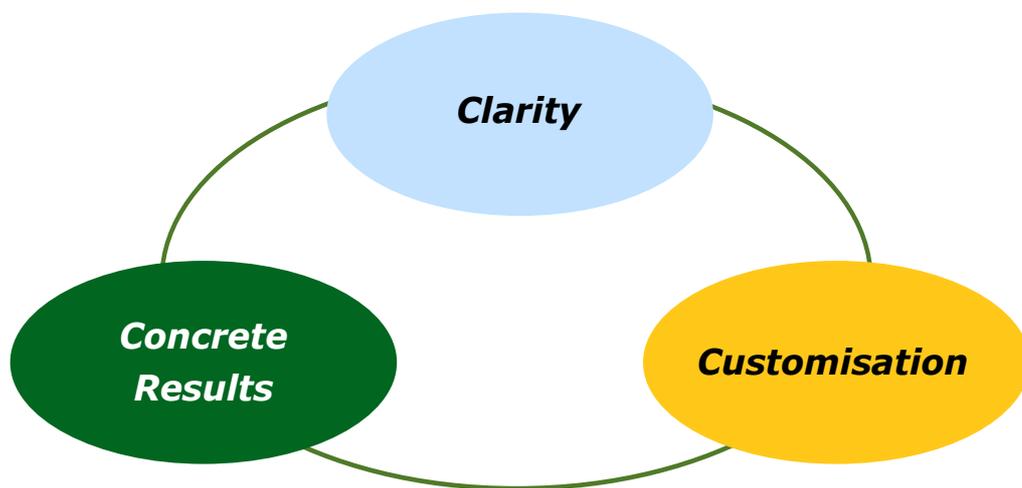

*The specific things that may happen
as a result of taking these steps may be:*

*

The Customised Career Coaching Approach

Customised Career Coaching

There are many models for career coaching. This is a customised approach that builds on the uniqueness of each person. It involves focusing on the following themes.

There are many models for helping people to shape their careers. This is an approach that focuses on the uniqueness of each person. It then involves working through the following themes.

Clarity – clarifying the person’s goals;

Customisation – providing customised support to help the person to achieve their goals;

Concrete Results – helping the person to achieve their goals.

Imagine that a person has asked for your help in shaping their career. If appropriate, you may start by focusing on the uniqueness of the person.

Some career coaches take this step by gathering information about the person before meeting them. Some do it during the session. Whichever route they take, they explore the following themes.

The Person's Uniqueness

Who is the person I am going to meet? What have they done during their lives? What may have been their experiences? What may they have achieved? What may be their strengths?

What may be happening in their world at the moment? What may be the topics they want to explore? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their personal or professional goals?

Imagine that you have gathered information about the person. It can then be time to focus on the following theme.

Clarity

Different individuals may want to explore different topics when focusing on their career development. Here are some of the topics they may want to explore.

How to take the next step in my career ... How to regain my zest for work ... How to build on my strengths and manage any weaknesses ... How to feel less stress in my work ... How to build my own business.

How to turnaround a challenging team ... How to manage my manager ... How to develop a Plan B for my career ... How to get the right blend between my work and wellbeing ... How to work towards my career goals.

Imagine that the person has described the topic they want to explore. The next step will be establish clarify the real results they want to achieve.

Sometimes it can be useful to look at the wider picture. For example, to explore how pursuing a particular route will help them to work towards achieving their life goals.

Bearing in mind the theme the person wants to explore, you may want to ask the following questions. It is important to do this in an encouraging way, however, rather than putting them on the spot.

"Looking at the topic you want to explore, what are the real results you want to achieve? What would be your picture of success? What would be happening that would show you have achieved the goals? What would be the benefits of achieving these results?"

One person I worked with began by saying they wanted to get promoted to the C Suite. They said:

"I want to have more influence on shaping the company's strategy. It would also look good on my CV. Plus the pay would be useful."

They may be able but have more influence in the C Suite, but this was not guaranteed. The CEO shaped the company's strategy and the leadership team meetings mostly consisted of progress reports.

Bearing this in mind, we focused on the real results the person wanted to achieve in their career. These were:

To build on their strengths and do pacesetting work that helped to shape a company's future strategy;

To keep developing in their career and, if possible, get recognition for the work they did in shaping company strategies;

To get a good salary and maintain their life balance – particularly as they and their partner were raising a young family.

You will have your own approach to establishing clarity – the real results a person wants to achieve. Bearing these in mind, it can be time to move on to the next stage.

Customisation

Good career coaches provide customised support to help the person to shape their career. It is important to pass on knowledge in a way that is:

Personal – it relates to the person’s situation and helps them to achieve their goals;

Practical – it provides practical tools that the person can use to achieve their goals;

Profitable – it is, in the widest sense, profitable and will help them to achieve their goals.

Imagine that you are want to provide this kind of customised support. If appropriate, you may ask yourself the following questions.

What are the real results the person wants to achieve? What is their picture of success? What are the possible options they can pursue to achieve these aims? What are the pluses and minuses of each option?

What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they build on their strengths when following these strategies?

Looking at my repertoire, what are the practical tools I can share that can help them to achieve their goals? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can use?

Let’s return to the person who wanted to reach the C Suite. We explored their various options together with the pluses and minuses of each option. The person also rated the attractiveness of each option.

Option A

They could stay in their present company, aim to get to the C Suite and work to shape the company’s strategy.

The pluses included: getting a good income, getting status and having a seat in the C suite.

The minuses included: putting in more hours, maybe not being able to influence the strategy.

Attractiveness: 7/10.

Option B

They could aim to get a role in the C Suite of another company and work to shape that company's strategy.

The pluses included: a fresh start, getting a rise in income and having more authority.

The minuses included: finding such a role, proving themselves in the company, may not being able to influence the strategy, working long hours which could affect the family.

Attractiveness: 6/10.

Option C

They could aim to do pacesetting work in their present company, build successful prototypes and, in this way, maybe help to shape that company's strategy.

The pluses included: knowing the company, knowing the areas where they could build such prototypes and getting some quick successes.

The minuses included: reorganising their schedule: a) to make sure their present responsibilities were covered; b) to lead the prototypes; still on the same pay; the successes they produced may or may not be adopted by the company.

Attractiveness: 7.5/10.

Bearing these options in mind, it was a close run thing between Options A and C. We began to look further ahead, however, in terms of the person's career aims. Pursuing Option C could lead to the work being noticed by other companies and possibly job offers.

Taking this route would involve organising their work priorities properly, however, which was something we could work on. Looking ahead, we explored how to translate this strategy into an action plan.

You will have your own approach to customising the support that you offer to a person. This may involve drawing on your repertoire and providing practical tools that help them to reach their goals. This can then lead to the next stage.

Concrete Results

Imagine that the person you are helping has settled on the strategy they want to follow. If appropriate, you can encourage and enable them to pursue their chosen route.

Different people choose different paths. Whatever strategy they choose to pursue, it can be worth considering the following questions.

What is the route the person wants to follow? How can they translate this into a clear action plan? How can they get some quick successes? How can they manage any potential challenges? How can I do my best to help them to achieve their goals?

You will have your own way of helping the person to achieve their goals. If possible, however, it can be useful to focus on how they can get some quick successes.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the career coaching approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Customised Career Coaching Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

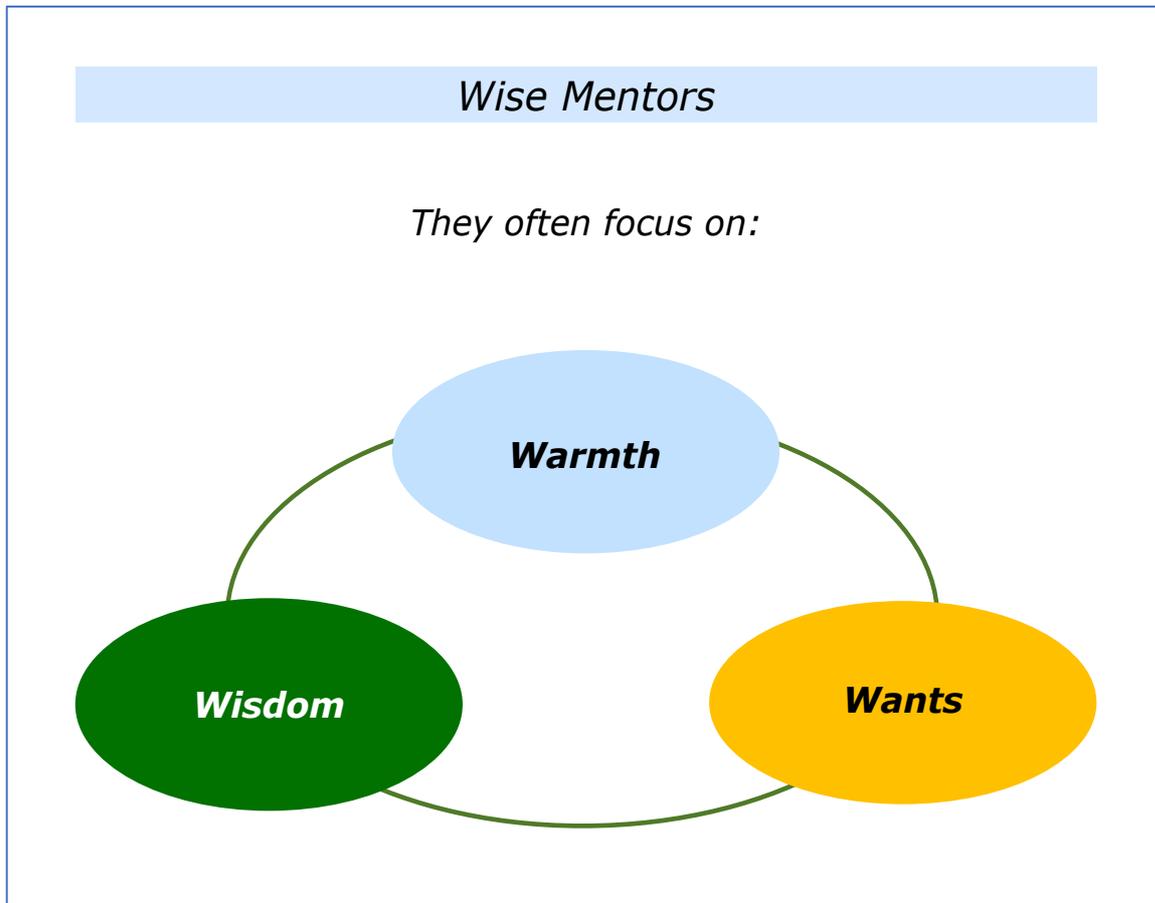

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Wise Mentor's Approach

There are ways to help people. One approach is to follow the steps taken by some wise mentors.

They create a warm atmosphere in which a person can feel at ease and able to explore. They clarify what the person wants to achieve. They then pass on wisdom that the person can use to achieve their goals.

Such people don't consider themselves to be wise. They see themselves as lifetime students who have a lot to learn. They recognise that they may have expertise in a certain area, however, that can help people to succeed..

Let's explore some of the steps taken by such mentors. You will, of course, follow these in your own way.

Warmth

Good mentors often create a stimulating sanctuary. They help people to feel valued and the centre of their world. They create an environment in which people feel able to talk about their hopes.

Good workshop facilitators, for example, also create an environment in which people feel at ease. The physical things – such as room, chairs and food - have to be right. They then open the workshop in an inspiring way.

Why? Creating a warm environment encourages the participants to explore and work hard to reach their goals. Warmth – rather than sternness – is more likely to deliver great results.

Good professionals in any field prepare properly and mentally rehearse the session. They focus on how to build on people's positive energy and help them to achieve success.

Imagine that a person has asked for your help. Here are some ideas that you can use to set up the session to succeed.

Warmth

Here are some ideas you may wish to consider for creating an encouraging environment and preparing properly for running a session.

- You can clarify how to create an encouraging atmosphere and also mentally rehearse how to run a successful session.
- You can clarify what is happening in the person's world - such as the challenges they may face and what they may want to achieve in their life or work.
- You can anticipate the topics they may want to explore - plus clarify the knowledge and practical tools you can pass on to help them to achieve their goals.
- You can clarify what you would like them to be saying, thinking and feeling at the end of the session – plus what you can do to increase the likelihood of them saying those things.
- You can then start the session, make the person feel welcome and, in your own way, maintain a positive and encouraging atmosphere.

Wants

Good mentors focus on what people want to explore. They recognise that individuals have specific challenges and goals. So it is important to clarify their agendas and help them to achieve their pictures of success.

This approach was reinforced for me during my early days in social work. At the time I wanted to learn from best practice in therapeutic communities and apply these lessons in my work.

Bearing this in mind, I wrote to some of the leading practitioners in psychology. Would it be possible to visit them and learn from their approaches?

Several said I would be welcome, providing I was prepared to make the long journey to their home or community. Generous with their time, they wanted to pass on knowledge and help others to succeed.

One practical thing they did early on, sometimes even before our meeting, was to clarify my aims. They asked questions such as:

"What are the topics you would like to explore? What for you would make it a successful session? What are the practical ideas and tools you would like to take away for the meeting?"

The people I met were able to quickly tune into people's agendas. They followed the old educational maxim that:

The learner learns what the learner wants to learn.

Professionals in many fields often take a similar approach. They each have their own sets of questions for uncovering: a) the specific things people want to explore in the session; b) the specific things people want to achieve in their lives or work.

Such professionals start by establishing clarity. Bearing in mind what the person can control in the situation, they ask questions like:

"Looking at the first topic you want to explore, what is your goal? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success?"

They then play back their understanding of the aim. Such professionals make sure people are crystal clear on the 'What' before moving on to the 'How'.

Imagine that a person has asked for your help. You will have your own questions for clarifying their aims. Here are some ideas, however, that you may wish to consider to clarify their aims.

Wants

Here are some questions for clarifying the topics a person may want to explore in the session and what they may want to achieve in their life and work.

- "What are the topics you would like to explore? What do you want to take away from the session?"

- "Let's move on to the first topic you want to explore. Can you tell me a bit more about the situation and what is actually happening? Can you give me some examples? What can you control in the situation?"

- "Let's focus on clarity. What are your goals? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success?"

- "What are the specific things that will be happening that will show you have achieved the goals? What will be the benefits of achieving the picture of success?"

- "So, as far as I understand it, the real results you want to achieve are: 1) To ... 2) To ... 3) To ... Is that right? Is that your picture of success?"

Wisdom

Good mentors are wise and trusted advisors. They pass on positive models and practical tools that work. They see which ideas resonate with people and then enable them to reach their goals.

There are many definitions of wisdom. The Oxford English Dictionary gives one definition as:

"Wisdom is capacity for judging rightly in matters relating to life and conduct; soundness of judgment in the choice of means and ends."

Some of the wise people I have met do not consider themselves wise. They instead talk about focusing on what works. They aimed to study, simplify and share what works. They then offer positive models and practical tools that people could use in their daily lives and work.

Good trusted advisors sometimes follow this path. They are warm, clarify what people want to explore and pass on knowledge that can help people to achieve their goals. People can then decide whether they want to use this information in their own ways.

Different mentors ask themselves different questions before sharing knowledge. Here are some they may ask.

"What are The person's goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?"

"What are the routes they have tried before to reach these goals? What have been the consequences of pursuing these routes?"

"What are their strengths and successful patterns? What are they doing well that can help them to reach their goals? How can they do more of these things in the future? What can they do better and how?"

"What are the positive models and practical tools I can share that can help them to reach their goals? How can I bring these to life by giving concrete examples? How can I share this knowledge in a way they can accept and use?

Good mentors have the ability to sit alongside people – their patients, clients or others – and show they understand their goals. When appropriate, they may say something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, the real results you want to achieve are:

"1) To ...

"2) To ...

"3) To ...

"Bearing these things in mind, is it okay if I share some ideas and practical tools? If so, here are some possible ways forwards.

"Option A is to ... The pluses are ... The minuses are ...

"Option B is to ... The pluses are ... The minuses are ...

"Option C is to ... The pluses are ... The minuses are ...

"Looking at these options, are there any that resonate with you? If so, we can explore how you can pursue these in your own way."

Different people have different ways of helping others. One approach is to be warm, create an encouraging environment and clarify what people want to explore. It is then to pass on wisdom in a way that people can use in their daily lives and work.

You will, of course, have your own approach to sharing what works. Here are some themes that it may be useful to consider, however, when helping people to reach their goals.

Wisdom

Here are some ideas for sharing knowledge and practical tools that people can use to achieve what they want in their lives or work.

- You can clarify the options that the person has already pursued to try to achieve their goals.
- You can ask if it is okay to share knowledge, positive models and practical tools they may wish to consider. If so, you can say the following things.
- "Some of the possible options for moving forwards are:
 - "Option A is to ... The potential pluses and minuses are ...*
 - "Option B is to ... The potential pluses and minuses are ...*
 - "Option C is to ... The potential pluses and minuses are ...*
- You can share these ideas in a way the person can accept and use. You can bring these to life with concrete examples.
- You can ask which of these ideas resonate with the person and then enable them to apply these in their own way.

The Positive, Percentage And Paralysis Approaches

People Can Choose To Follow The Positive, Percentage Or Paralysis Approaches

There are many ways to live life. This is a model that is used in sports but it can be applied in many other areas. People can choose to follow the positive, percentage or paralysis approaches in life.

The Positive Approach

A person can choose to be positive and proactive. They can aim to make things happen rather than wait for things to happen.

This is an approach I saw demonstrated when working with sports psychologists. Some coaches encouraged their players to start by clarifying their picture of success.

The key was to help the players to focus what they could control. They could aim to do their personal best but they could not control whether they always won. Going into their version of the arena, the player could be positive, follow their principles and work towards their picture of success.

As in life, sometimes it was okay for the players to take the percentage approach, but it was important to avoid falling into paralysis. The latter approach, such as continually looking at the clock when leading, was a recipe for disaster.

Looking back on your life, when have you taken the positive approach? You may have done this when recovering from an illness, setting up a business, tackling a challenge or doing another activity.

What did you do to take this approach? You may have chosen to have a positive attitude. You may then have set specific goals, clarified your strategy and translated this into a clear action plan.

You may have followed a discipline and, when appropriate, found solutions to challenges. You may then have done your personal best to achieve the picture of success.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to take the positive approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you build on the principles that have worked for you in the past? What are the other skills you may need to add? How can you anticipate and manage potential setbacks? How can you do your best to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Approach

The specific situation in the future where I may want to follow elements of the positive approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of the positive approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Percentage Approach

Sometimes it can make sense to take the percentage approach. You may take this approach to maintain stability, stay out of trouble or avoid making costly mistakes.

Playing safe is absolutely the right approach in some situations. It is particularly appropriate when managing your money, climbing a mountain or taking care of your health.

Sometimes the percentage approach is a way of getting back to basics. A golfer does this after hitting a poor shot. They aim to regain their rhythm and create a good foundation for the rest of the round.

A dieting person may choose to follow a sustainable diet. This is more reliable than going on crash diets that also lead to wild swings in their weight.

A football team that is closing in on victory may aim to keep doing the basics. These include keeping their shape, winning the ball and moving to give teammates passing options. This is more likely to be successful than remaining static and hoping to withstand pressure.

Pursuing the percentage approach may only enable you to reach 7/10. But it provides the platform for going on to be more positive and reaching 10/10.

One key point is worth underlining. The percentage approach can sometimes lapse into standing still and doing nothing. This can lead to falling into paralysis.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the percentage approach? How can you do this in your own way without lapsing into paralysis?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Percentage Approach

The specific situation in the future where I may want to follow elements of the percentage approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of the percentage approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Paralysis Approach

A person may sit back and wait for things to happen. They wait for outside forces to shape their destiny. This creates negative energy and they can fall into a negative cycle.

Some people fall into paralysis because they are frightened. One view is that authoritarian figures try to break the human spirit so that people feel powerless to do anything. They therefore cede power to the authority.

Some people are afraid of making mistakes and adopt negative self-talk. One sports psychologist explained this in the following way.

"Players who lose confidence often experience paralysis. Instead of using their strengths, they go into their shell. They may get into a negative spiral and feel everything is out of control."

"My first job is to establish whether a player wants to take responsibility for shaping their future. We spend a long time on that because some players look for excuses."

"We then move on to how they can control the controllables. I invite them: a) to describe the specific things they can do to take the percentage or positive approach; b) to describe the specific benefits of doing these things."

"The physical effects of this exercise can soon show. The players seem to walk taller, look you in the eye and volunteer for tasks. They begin to take more responsibility, both on and off the field."

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to avoid the paralysis approach? How can you switch into the percentage of positive approaches?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Paralysis Approach

The specific situation in the future where I may want to avoid falling into the paralysis approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to avoid falling into the paralysis approach and do my best to achieve positive results are:

*

*

*

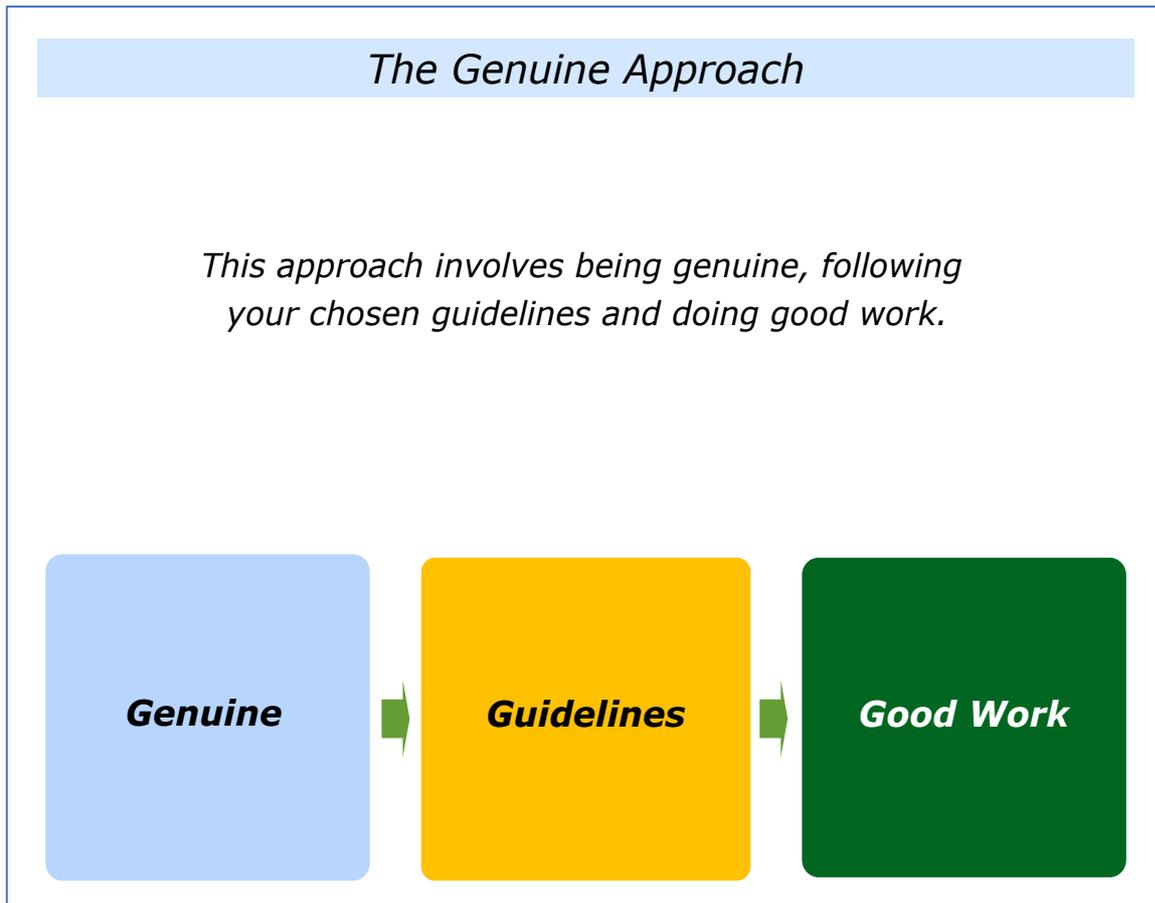

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Genuine Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to be genuine, follow your chosen guidelines and do good work. It is then to keep developing as a person and as a professional.

This approach is the opposite of what some people call the imposter syndrome. It involves people being real, doing rewarding work and getting positive results. It involves focusing on the following themes.

Genuine

Let's start by looking at your own work. When do you feel genuine? When are you doing what you believe in? When are you building on your strengths? When are you aiming to be the best you can be?

Different people give different answers to these questions. Here are some that people mention when exploring this theme.

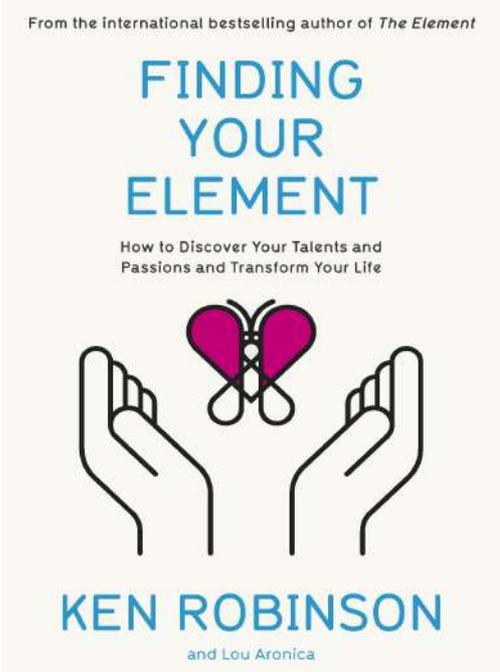

Genuine - I feel genuine when I am doing the following kinds of work:

Helping a troubled person in my work as a counsellor ... Caring for people in my role as a nurse ... Doing interior design for houses ... Singing certain kinds of songs as a performer.

Orchestrating teams to achieve a compelling goal ... Solving technical problems when helping clients ... Writing positive articles that may inspire people ... Passing on knowledge that helps people to succeed.

Some people feel genuine when they are in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. Sir Ken Robinson’s TED talk on creativity encouraged many people to focus on this theme. Ken explained:

"Being in your Element is doing something for which you have a natural feel. It is more than doing things you are good at. You have to love it, too."

"Knowing what your Element is will give you a much better sense of direction than certainly bouncing from one job to the next.

"If you know what your Element is, you are more likely to find ways to make a living at it.

"Finding your Element won't guarantee being in an unblocked state of pleasure in life.

"It will give you a deeper sense of who you really are and of the life you could and maybe should live."

People who follow this principle are more likely to feel alive and fulfilled, says Ken. Being in your element can bring great satisfaction. Let's look at one person who took this approach.

Sue – Being Genuine And Using Her Strengths To Help People To Succeed

Several years ago I worked with Sue who was a superb project manager. She loved implementing projects, working as a partner with clients and helping them to achieve success.

Sue had recently joined her present company but felt ill at ease in certain situations. She expressed this in the following way.

"Sometimes I am asked to lead sales pitches with potential clients, but this is not my strength. I am not somebody who waves their arms around and tries to sell things.

"Somebody told me to try to fake it until I make it. But I am not happy doing that, I feel like an imposter. Can we look at how to manage these sales pitches?"

We began by focusing on when Sue did her best work with her colleagues and clients. She had several qualities demonstrated by good implementors.

Sue liked to focus on a specific goal, make a plan and create a superb delivery team. She was also good at building relationships with similar people to herself – Doers - in the client organisation. She then worked alongside these people to deliver success.

Looking ahead, we explored how Sue could play to her strengths when managing sales pitches. This eventually led to her making the following plan.

She could continue to take responsibility for sales pitches. The first step would be to do lots of research ahead of the pitch regarding the client's challenges and goals.

She could clarify the pitch team's aims. These included being able: a) to show they understood the client's goals; b) to show how their company could help the client to achieve their goals; c) to deliver a positive pitch that increased the chances of achieving success.

She could create a team of complementary talents that made the pitch. For example, an inspiring key speaker, such as her CEO, plus herself as an implementer who would focus on the practical steps for helping the client to succeed.

She and the team could rehearse ahead of the pitch to make sure: a) they put the client at the centre; b) they gave many examples of how they could help the client to succeed; c) they provided answers to any challenging questions.

She could contact the client two days before the pitch to double check they would be covering everything the client wanted. She could also let the client know who would be attending and their different roles during the pitch.

This approach mirrored elements of the one Sue had followed at their previous company. She explained this in the following way.

"My role on the pitch team was to do all the research, make sure we hit the brief and manage the team. The founder or sales director led the actual pitch.

"My role in the presentation was to describe the actual process and answer any detailed questions. This approach played to our strengths and often worked well with the potential clients."

Looking ahead, we explored how Sue could set up this approach in their new company. This would require her to being able:

To show she would still take responsibility for managing the pitch process;

To show how this approach could utilise people's strengths and increase the chances of success;

To show how she could pilot it at the next pitch and help the team to its best to deliver success.

Sue presented this approach to their CEO, who gave it their backing. The approach played to people's strengths. It also proved successful and led to the company getting more business.

Sue liked the approach and also felt more genuine. She expressed this in the following way.

"I have always been happier as the stage manager rather than the lead person in the spotlight. I enjoy creating an environment that enables other people to shine and deliver success."

This highlights another theme demonstrated by people who aim to be real, do rewarding work and get the desired results.

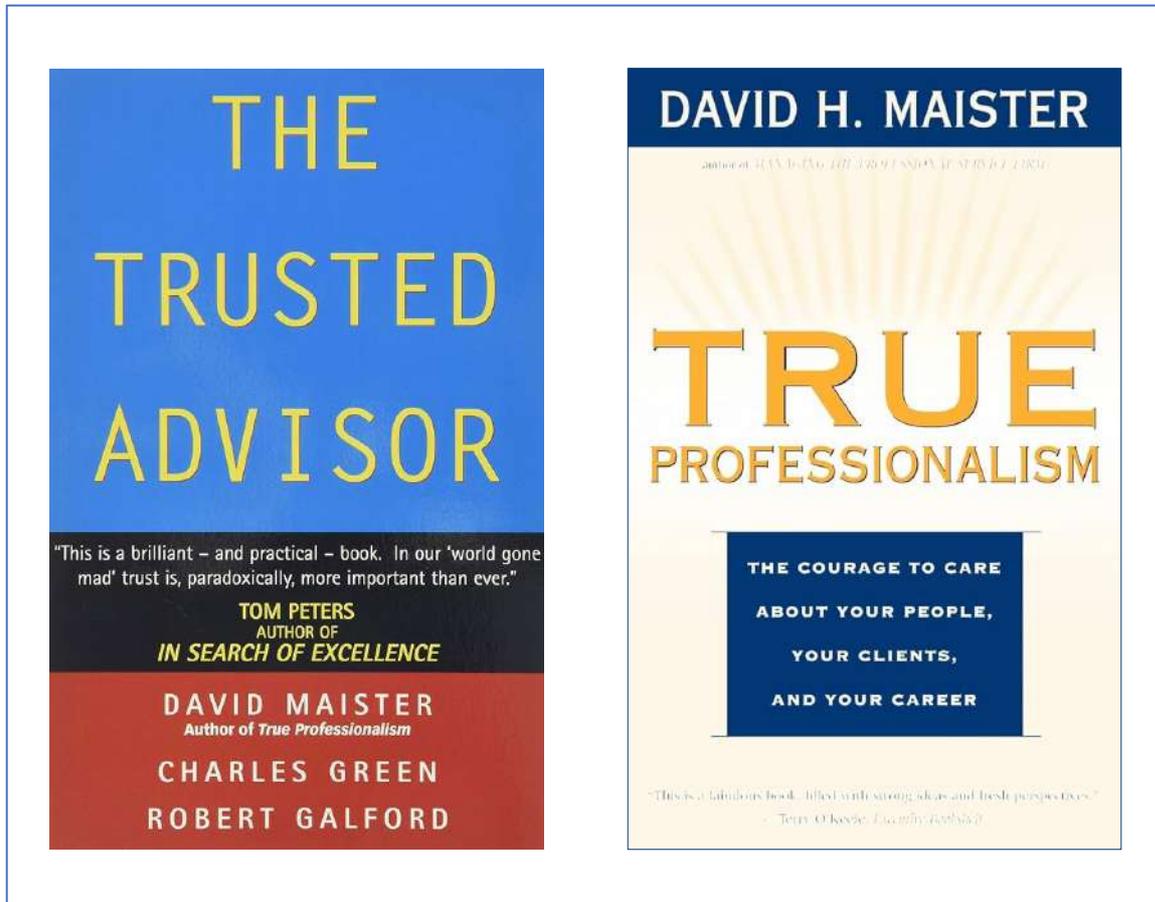

Guidelines

People who are genuine aim to follow certain guidelines in their work. They may call these their principles, values or professional standards.

People who do what they believe in often feel more at ease. They live in what the existentialists called good faith. They are true to themselves and aim to translate their beliefs into action.

Such people often gain strength from following their chosen guidelines. They keep returning to these when making decisions, doing good work or dealing with crises.

Some organisations also encourage their people to focus on certain guidelines in their daily work. David Maister highlighted this approach in books such as The Trusted Advisor, True Professionalism and Managing The Professional Firm.

David maintained that most companies have the same mission. This is: a) to provide profits for their shareholders; b) to provide great service for their customers; c) to provide a great workplace for their people.

Great service organisations mirror some of these guidelines. Different organisations may describe their purpose in different ways, but they often follow similar principles. They aim:

To use their strengths to do superb work that helps their stakeholders to achieve success.

Let's return to the principle of feeling genuine. What are the guidelines you believe in following in your work? How do you aim to translate these into action?

What may be the potential pluses of following these guidelines? What may be the potential minuses? How can you build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

Great workers often aim to be genuine and follow their chosen guidelines. This can then lead to the next theme.

Good Work

Many people aim to do good work. Everybody has strengths. Everybody has talents in certain activities. The gifts they have been given can be used to do good work that helps people or the planet.

Many people feel humble and alive when applying their gifts. They enjoy the opportunity to use these in their daily lives and work. As the musician Marcus Miller said:

"It's a great thing about being a musician: you don't stop until the day you die, you can improve. So it's a wonderful thing to do."

Many people love to build on their strengths and do superb work. Sometimes this comes easily, sometimes they need to follow rituals to channel this flow. They love to channel this spirit, however, and get a sense of satisfaction.

Such people may also feel grateful for the gifts they have been given. They echo similar sentiments to those expressed by the author Elizabeth Gilbert in one of her TED talks.

She described how our gifts do not belong to us – they are on loan to us. We cannot take credit for our gifts, but it is up to us how we use them. Some find this to be a remarkably freeing approach. Here are some of the relevant passages from her talk.

In ancient Greece and ancient Rome people did not happen to believe that creativity came from human beings back then.

People believed that creativity was this divine attendant spirit that came to human beings from some distant and unknowable source for distant and unknowable reasons.

The Greeks famously called these divine attendant spirits of creativity 'Daemons'. Socrates famously believed that he had a Daemon who spoke to him from afar.

The Romans had the same idea but they called that sort of disembodied spirit a 'Genius' ... which was great because the Romans did not actually think that a genius was a particularly clever individual.

They believed that a genius was this sort of magical divine entity who was believed to literally live in the walls of an artist's studio ... and who would come out and invisibly assist the artist with their work and who would shape the outcome of that work.

Maybe artistry doesn't have to be quite so full of anguish if you never happened to believe, in the first place, that the most extraordinary aspects of your being came from you.

But maybe if you just believed that they were on loan to you from some unimaginable source for some exquisite portion of your life to be passed along when you're finished. (This) starts to change everything.

There are many ways to build on your strengths. One approach is to be genuine and follow your chosen guidelines. It is then to do good work that helps people or the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the genuine approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Genuine Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Earning Trust Approach

Trust Is Something You Earn By Delivering On Your Promises

Trust is an outcome. It is something you may earn by taking responsibility and doing some of the following things.

- By agreeing with people about the goals to achieve;*
- By making clear contracts about people's responsibilities in working to achieve the goals;*
- By fulfilling your promises and doing what is required to achieve the goals.*

A pilot in an air force display team described an interesting view of trust. They explained this in the following way.

"When the team needs to turn right, I do not trust that everybody has turned right. I know that everybody has turned right."

Trust is something that we earn by keeping our promises. Sometimes can be done in the following ways.

By a person taking responsibility, keeping their promises and delivering the required results.

By a worker showing they understand what is required, making clear working contracts and performing superb work.

By a team showing they understand the employer's goals, proactively keeping their stakeholders informed and delivering the agreed picture of success.

Looking back on your life, can you think of somebody earned your trust? They may have been a friend, teacher, doctor, trusted advisor, leader or somebody providing a professional service.

They may have shown you respect, kept you informed and delivered the goods. As a result, you may have felt safer, more confident and reaped the fruits of success. If they provided a professional service, you may have recommended them to other people.

People like the feeling of predictability. They like to feel that if they make agreements, for example, then these will be met. This provides a greater sense of security in an unpredictable world.

People also like to feel that any professionals they hire are experts in their fields and will deliver success. This point was underlined in The Trusted Advisor, the book by David Maister, Charles Green and Robert Galford.

The authors say that a person needs to demonstrate three basic skills to become a trusted advisor to their clients. They need to earn trust, build relationships and give advice effectively.

Different people earn trust in different ways. Here are three themes that it can be useful to bear in mind when aiming to help people.

You can show you understand a person's picture of success

Credibility is crucial. There are various ways to build credibility. One approach is to create an encouraging environment and go through the following steps:

To show respect for the person;

To show you are interested in them and their goals;

To show you understand their picture of success.

Good professionals often demonstrate such skills. They recognise that the interaction is about the other person and their agenda – it is not about them.

You can show you understand what is required to reach the goals and make clear contracts about working to achieve the picture of success

Good professionals use their knowledge to help the person to achieve success. They listen to what they client wants to achieve. They then play back their understanding to make sure that everybody has the same picture.

Such professionals are also good at explaining what they can do to help the client. Using their own words, they may cover the following areas with the client.

As far as I understand it, the specific goals you want to achieve are:

- *
- *
- *

The specific things I can help you with regarding achieving the goals are:

- *
- *
- *

*The specific things you can expect to see happening
- and by when - on the road to achieving the goals are:*

- *
- *

*

If the person does want to go ahead, then the professional will make clear working contracts. Using their own words, they may cover the following areas with the client.

The specific things I see as my responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals are:

*

*

*

The specific things that are other people's responsibilities – including your own – in working towards achieving the goals are:

*

*

*

The other specific things that are worth mentioning are:

*

*

*

Good professionals do something to get a quick success. This reassures the client and buys them time to get on with doing the other necessary work. They recognise that clients often worry. They therefore proactively keep people informed about the progress towards achieving the goals.

You can fulfil the contract, do superb work and deliver the agreed picture of success

Good professionals meet their promises and deliver the goods. It is also important for all the parties to fulfil their parts of the contracts. This is especially important when working in teams.

Good leaders, for example, manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They make clear contracts with their team members about the outcomes that must be delivered and by when.

They then expect people to use their expertise to deliver the agreed picture of success. One leader explained this in the following way.

"I am interested in what people are delivering rather than what they are doing. This is why I employ motivated and self-managing people.

"People are expected make clear contracts about their contributions. They are then expected to proactively keep others informed about their progress and to deliver on their promises.

"People must follow the team's agreed principles but it is up to them how they use their talents to deliver the goods. This also includes encouraging other team members and helping them to achieve the goals."

Many people talk about the importance of trust. Certainly individuals must be given opportunities to stretch themselves and develop. At the same time, it is their responsibility to keep others informed and deliver the goods.

Trust is an outcome. The more times we deliver on our promises, the greater the increase in trust. People will then give us more opportunities. They will do so because we have earned their trust.

Looking to the future, can you think of a situation when you may want to earn trust? This could be in a personal or professional situation.

How can you show respect for the person? How can you show you understand their goals? How can you show you know what is required? How can you make clear contracts, do superb work and deliver success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Earning Trust

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the earning trust approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

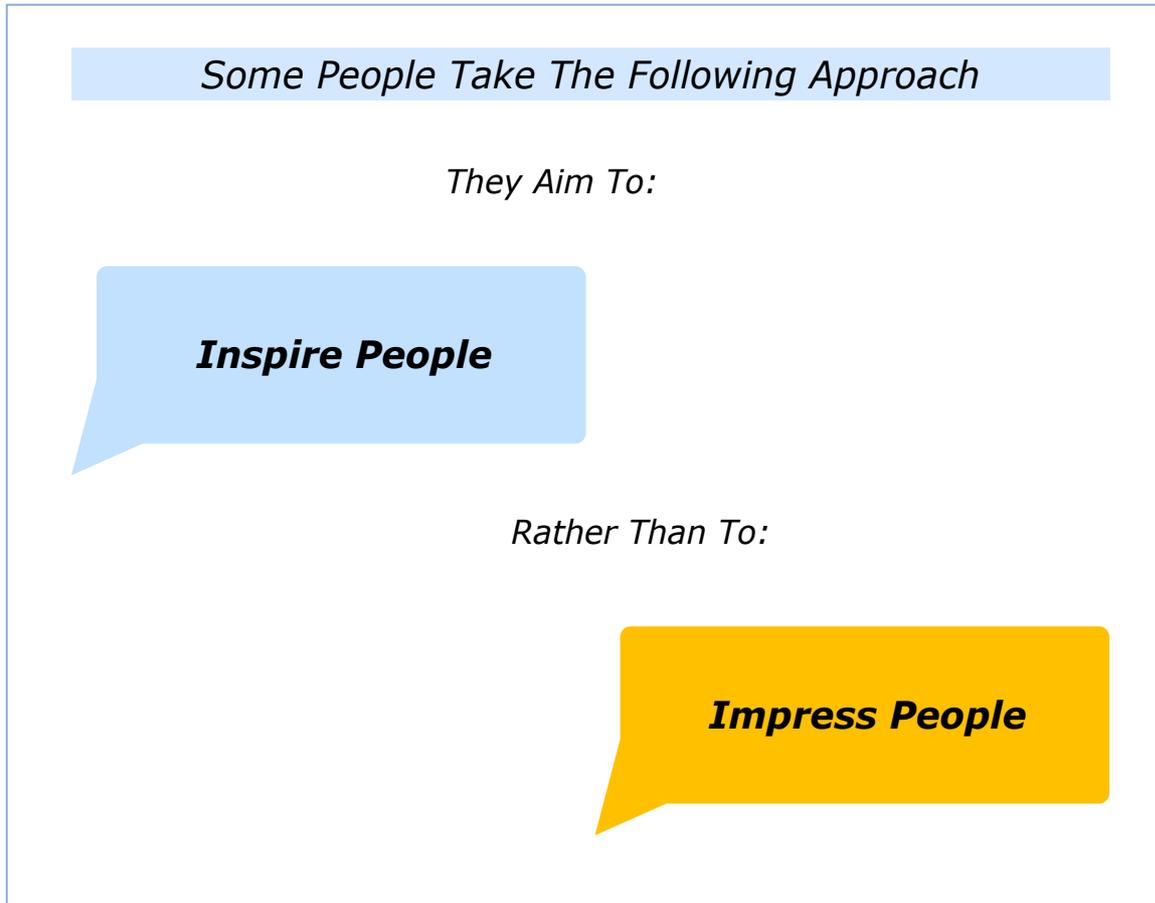

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Who Aim To Inspire People Rather Than Impress People Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to be humble and aim to inspire people rather than to impress people.

People who take this approach often aim to serve something greater than themselves. They may aim to follow a vocation, serve other people or pass on knowledge that can help other people to succeed.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. They may do it in their daily work or in specific situations. Let's look at some examples.

Going For An Interview

Person A was preparing to attend an interview for a role in a famous football club. He called me before the session and described their approach to the interview. He expressed this in the following way.

"I want to really impress them. As you know, I have a good CV and also post a lot on social media. I want to stand out from the other candidates."

This is a route taken by many people who apply for jobs. They focus on self-promotion and make the interview about them as an individual. The interviewers, however, are asking:

"What are you going to do for us? What are you going to help us to achieve success?"

After some discussion. Person A switched his approach and aimed to inspire the interviewers. He aimed:

To show he understood the club's DNA – the principles it wanted to follow – and its picture of success;

To show how he would use his strengths to help the club to achieve success;

To show how he would pass on knowledge that would enable people in the club to achieve sustainable success.

The interview went well. He described what happened during the session in the following way.

"The session was more like a conversation. I started by describing what I saw as the Club's DNA – its strengths and when it had performed at its best.

"I then described how I would like to help the club to follow these principles and deliver future success. This involved giving specific examples of how I would do this in practice.

"At this point the interviewers began asking questions. They wanted to know what I do would in specific situations. This was challenging but they seemed happy with the answers.

"This was when the interview turned into more of a conversation and I never got to finish my slide presentation. Two days later they called to say I had got the job."

Such an approach is not guaranteed to work, of course, because different interviewers may be looking for different things. On this occasion it did succeed and led the Person A joining the club.

Giving A Keynote Speech

Person B was due to give a keynote speech to conference. She described her approach to this in the following way.

"I sometimes get nervous speaking to audiences in live situations. Maybe it is because I am an introvert, but I actually prefer to give presentations over the web.

"Even though I am sure of my subject, I can get distracted by focusing on the audience reactions. Maybe it is my desire to not to disappoint people, but I can get thrown off-course by the body language of some people.

"Giving the session virtually means I can concentrate on the key messages I want to give. This is preferable to trying to impress people when I am on stage."

We explored how she could feel at ease when speaking to the conference audience. Bearing in mind her strengths, we aimed:

To clarify what was happening in the audience's world – such as their challenges and goals;

To clarify the knowledge that she could share that would help people to succeed;

To clarify how she could share this knowledge in a way in which she would feel at ease.

She could share knowledge in ways that played to her strengths. She could also bring the ideas to life by giving lots of examples. It was about helping people to succeed. It was not about self-promotion.

She did the presentation and reported that: a) she felt comfortable sharing the ideas in this way; b) several sought her out afterwards to explore the ideas and ask if they could stay in touch.

There are many ways to do fine work. As described here, one approach is to follow the principle that:

It is about aiming to inspire other people, it is not about trying to impress. It is about them, it is not about you.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to try to inspire people? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may want to do this when encouraging a person, writing an article, giving a presentation or in another situation. How can you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People Who Aim To Inspire People Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Apprentice, Achiever And Advisor Approach

The Apprentice, Achiever And Advisor

Some people go through the following stages.

- The Apprentice – They learn what works;
- The Achiever – They do what works;
- The Advisor – They share what works.

Some advisors also continue to see themselves as apprentices who continue to learn about what works.

There are many ways to continue to develop. Some people go through the stages of being an apprentice, achiever and advisor.

Imagine that you want to build on one of your strengths and go through these stages in your own way. Let's explore these themes.

The Apprentice Stage

There are many ways to be an apprentice. One approach is to go through the following steps.

You can identify one of your strengths that you want to develop

You may have the ability to do superb work when encouraging people, writing, playing a sport, fixing technical problems or doing another activity. Bearing this in mind, you may want to consider completing the following sentence.

The specific strength I would like to develop is:

*

The specific reasons why I would like to develop this strength are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits – for myself and for others - of developing this strength would be:

*

*

*

You can clarify how you can develop this strength by being an apprentice and learning what works

Imagine that you have focused on a specific strength. The next step is to learn how to develop and apply it to achieve success. Different people take this step in different ways.

One approach is to be a good apprentice. It is to be curious and to learn about what works.

It is also to follow your way of learning. You may learn best by focusing on the specific strength you want to develop and then:

By focusing on something you want to achieve and setting a specific goal;

By reading, studying positive models, learning from experts or doing other things on the way towards achieving the specific goal;

By learning about what works, applying the lessons and continuing to develop on the way towards achieving the specific goal.

One of the keys is to focus on what works in your chosen field. It is: a) to study what works; b) to apply what works; c) to develop your way of making things work.

You can follow this approach if you are learning to be a counsellor, mediator, leader or another role. Bearing in mind your strengths, the aim is to develop the skills required to achieve the specific goal.

Some people see themselves as lifetime apprentices, which is a theme we will return to later. For the moment, however, let's explore the next step you may take when building on your strengths.

The Achiever Stage

Imagine that you have been able to build on your strength and develop skills that you can use to achieve success. Great workers sometimes go through the following steps to make this happen.

Imagine that you want to follow this model in your own way. One approach is to go through the following steps.

You can build on your strengths and set specific goals

Great workers do what they do best and do their best. Bearing this in mind, you may focus on a specific activity where you can build on your strengths and do satisfying work.

You may want to do this when running a counselling session, writing an article, managing a crisis or doing another activity. Bearing in mind the results you want to achieve, you can translate this into a clear picture of success.

*You can follow strategies that work
and do your best to achieve success*

You will have clarified the real results to achieve. Bearing these in mind, you can follow the strategies most likely to achieve the goals. You can translate these into action, perform superb work and get some early wins.

You can commit yourself to continuous improvement. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, you can build on what is working and find solutions to challenges. You can then do your best to achieve the picture of success.

The Advisor Stage

Great workers often develop a track record of success. This sometimes leads to them being approached by people who would like them to pass on their knowledge.

Whilst they may be happy to take this step, it is be important to do this in a way that works. Bearing in mind their strengths, they may choose to share ideas through teaching, coaching, mentoring or acting as trusted advisors.

Whatever route they take, they often prefer to act as educators rather than giving direct advice. They like to give people an overview of the different options and then, when appropriate, offer practical ways forward.

They emphasise, however, that it will be up to the individuals to do what works for them. Bearing this in mind, they may aim:

To clarify what the learners want to learn and the specific goals they want to achieve;

To advise people that there may be many ways to move forwards and they will share ideas that people can use in their own ways;

To pass on knowledge, models and practical tools that people can use to achieve their specific goals.

Good advisors get a kick from passing on knowledge that helps others people to succeed. Such people always remember their roots, however, and love to continue learning. They see themselves as lifetime apprentices.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

What may be the strength you want to develop? How can you be a good apprentice and develop this ability? How can you then apply it to achieve specific goals? How can you then, if appropriate, act as an advisor who offers people knowledge in a way they can use to achieve success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Apprentice, Achiever And Advisor Approach

*The specific situation in the future
where I may want to follow elements of this approach in my own way may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to follow it in my own way are:

*

*

*

*The specific things that may happen
as a result of taking these steps may be:*

*

*

*

The Professional Success Approach

This is an approach that can help people to continue to grow in professional careers. It is particularly useful when a person's daily work is not necessarily helping them to develop.

The approach involves helping a person explore their long-term professional picture of success. These are the specific things they want to do or achieve in their professional life. Bearing this in mind, it involves focusing on:

The professional contribution they want to make to their present employer;

The professional development steps they want to take towards achieving their career goals.

The ideal would be for these themes to be intertwined, but this is not always possible. Sometimes they may need to be pursued in parallel on the way towards achieving the person's picture of success.

Let's look at how this works in practise. Imagine that you lead a team of motivated people. It will be important to encourage each of them:

To focus on the contribution they want to make towards delivering the team's goals;

To focus on their own professional development goals.

The following approach seems like a long process, but it works. It involves going through the following steps with a person in a professional way.

You can explain the present situation and that you are aiming to get positive results

Imagine that you are meeting a person who says they joined the organisation because it promised lots of development opportunities. Because of certain events, however, the organisation is at a stage where it has become primarily focused on its financial targets.

This may be understandable, but some employees may feel they are simply doing the day job. How to manage this kind of situation?

One approach is to go through the following steps. As mentioned earlier, however, it is important to do this in a professional way.

You can explain that the organisation is at a stage in its life where it is focusing on specific targets

Each of us may have different opinions about the organisation's possible ways forward, but this is the reality of the situation. The organisation has made its decision and is working towards certain goals.

You can explain that each of us can decide whether we want to contribute towards achieving these goals

You may wish to give some context about the modern world of work. This involves giving the big picture and, in some ways, explaining the facts of life. These include the following.

The world of work has changed. We are all self-employed now. We can aim to build on our strengths, do satisfying work and deliver success to our customers and employers.

There are few fixed jobs anymore, but there are many projects. Because things can change quickly, we are all on rolling contracts. It is important to give our best to a customer or employer, but also to focus on how to shape our future.

Bearing this in mind, we each make choices. We can choose to join an organisation, go freelance, run our own business or take other routes. Each route has pluses and minuses.

When we choose to join an organisation, there are many pluses. These include getting a regular wage, some satisfying work and other benefits. There may also be certain minuses. The other options are to join another organisation, be self-employed or run our own business. These also have pluses and minuses.

We can each make our own decisions about whether or not we want to contribute towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Every organisation has a Scorecard – the mandatory things that must be delivered. We can make our best contribution to delivering our part of these things. If possible, we can also aim to do stimulating projects.

Imagine that you have given the big picture a person in a professional way. You can then explain that you will, as far as possible, help them:

To build on their strengths and make their best contribution towards achieving the team's goals;

To have separate sessions with them to focus on their professional development goals.

You can explain that the second type of session will be confidential. It will be about the person and their aims. The information you get will not be used in any performance appraisal session. The aim will be to help the person to develop and work towards their professional picture of success.

You will have your own way of explaining the big picture. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can clarify the person's professional contribution towards achieving the team's goals

Imagine that everybody is clear on the team's goals. You can then agree on the outcomes that each person will deliver towards achieving these aims.

There are many models for helping a person to clarify their individual contribution. The following framework mirrors that which was described in the section of this book called The Positive Teams Approach.

The following pages offer material that you can send to the person before meeting to clarify their best contribution. You can then meet with them to agree on the specific things they will deliver towards achieving the team's goals.

My Professional Contribution

Introduction

Bearing in mind the team's goals and your strengths, this exercise invites you to describe the following things.

The specific results you aim to deliver towards achieving the team's goals.

These aims should be written in outcome terms - such as the specific results you will deliver - rather than as a list of activities.

The specific benefits - to the various stakeholders - of delivering these results.

The specific things you will do to proactively update people about your progress towards achieving the results.

The specific support you would like to help you to achieve the results.

The specific early successes you will aim to deliver.

Complete these exercises up to and including the page Specific Early Successes and send these to your manager. You can then agree on your goals for the year.

After the meeting you can then complete the section in which you write your agreed goals for the year.

Some Background

We aim to build a strengths based team and co-ordinate these strengths to reach the goal.

We must, however, deliver the Scorecard. These are the mandatory things the team must deliver. This will sometimes mean everybody getting involved in doing great work and helping to do the other tasks.

We want to encourage you to build on your strengths, because you are then more likely to do great work. At the same time, however, it is your responsibility to manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

We want to manage by outcomes, rather than by tasks. Once the outcomes are agreed, we ask you to be accountable for delivering the goods. How you achieve this - providing you follow the organisation's agreed principles - is up to you and your team.

My Specific Contribution

Bearing in mind the team's goals and my strengths, the specific results I want to deliver towards achieving the team's goals are:

1) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

2) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

3) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

The Specific Benefits

The specific benefits of making this contribution - for the team, customers, colleagues and other stakeholders - will be:

1) To

For example:

2) To

For example:

3) To

For example:

The Specific Updates

The specific things I will do to proactively keep people informed about the progress towards delivering the results will be:

1) To

For example:

2) To

For example:

3) To

For example:

The Specific Support

The specific support I would like to help me to achieve the goals, plus the support I will give to other people, is:

1) To

For example:

2) To

For example:

3) To

For example:

The Specific Early Successes

The specific early successes I will aim to deliver will be:

1) To

For example:

2) To

For example:

3) To

For example:

My Agreed Goals

Introduction

After clarifying your strengths you will then meet with your manager and agree on your goals.

When doing this, it is important to bear in mind the team's picture of success and your strengths. You will then agree with your manager on your contribution towards achieving this picture of success.

Try to write your goals in outcome terms. Describe the actual things you will deliver, rather than a set of activities.

You can then keep referring back to these goals when having ongoing meetings with your manager.

After meeting with my manager, the agreed specific results I will aim to deliver are:

1) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

2) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

3) To

For example:

- To

- To

- To

Imagine that the person has made clear contracts about the results they will deliver. You can continue to meet with them to ensure they make their best contribution towards achieving the team's goals. It can then be useful to move on to the next stage.

You can help the person to develop and work toward achieving their professional goals

There are many models for helping a person to shape their career. This approach involves helping a person:

To clarify the specific things they want to do and achieve in their professional career;

To clarify the specific things they want to do build on their strengths and develop in other ways to work towards their professional goals;

To clarify the specific things they see as their responsibility when working towards their professional goals;

To clarify the specific kinds of support and help they would like – if possible - when working toward their professional goals;

To clarify their specific development plan for working towards their professional goals;

To clarify the specific benefits – for themselves and for other people – of working towards their professional goals.

Imagine that you would like to offer this kind of session to a person. It will be important to underline that: a) the session is about their professional development – it is not an appraisal session; b) the topics you discuss will be confidential.

Bearing these things in mind, you will then do your best to help the person to work towards their professional goals. Here is the material you may want to send to the person before the session. You can then work through these with the person in your own way.

My Professional Development

Introduction

Dear ...

I am looking forward to meeting with you to explore how you want to continue to develop your career. There are many ways to explore professional development. This approach invites you:

To explore the specific things you want to do and achieve in your professional career;

To make a development plan that will help you to work towards achieving your professional goals.

The session is about your professional development. It is not an appraisal session. The topics we discuss will be confidential. I will then do my best to help you to work towards your professional goals.

Here are the exercises that I would like you to explore and maybe have a first go at before our session.

My Professional Goals

The specific things I want to have done or to have achieved when I look back on my professional career are these.

* I want to have ...

For example ...

* I want to have ...

For example ...

* I want to have ...

For example ...

My Professional Development

The specific things that I want to do to build on my strengths and develop in other ways to help me to work towards achieving my professional goals are these.

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

My Professional Responsibility

*The specific things that I see as my responsibility
- and that I want to do - to develop and work towards my professional goals are these.*

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

My Professional Support

The specific kinds of support or help that I would like – if possible – when developing and working towards my professional goals are these.

* I would like ...

For example ...

* I would like ...

For example ...

* I would like ...

For example ...

My Professional Development Plan

The specific things that I aim to do to develop and work towards my professional goals are these.

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

* I want to ...

For example ...

My Professional Development – The Benefits

The specific benefits – both for myself and for other people – of developing and working towards my professional goals will be these.

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Professional Development Programmes

Many organisations offer their people programmes on the themes of personal and professional development. These often depend on: a) the motivation of the participants; b) the quality of the people running the programme.

As mentioned earlier in the book, great educators make the learning personal, practical and – in its widest sense – profitable. They provide practical tools that enable people to achieve success.

Good leaders often want to help their people develop and to continue to make their best contributions to the organisation.

The following pages outline one approach to offering such programmes. This is a strengths based approach which helps both the individuals and organisations to achieve success.

The approach aims to deliver positive results. When appropriate, it can also act as a Trojan Horse for exploring many different themes that will help the person and organisation to achieve success.

Here is the introduction. You will, of course, have your own approach to providing such development programmes.

Professional Success

A strengths based programme for helping people to continue to develop

This approach enables people to continue to build on their strengths and tackle any areas for improvement.

It starts by clarifying the organisation's goals. It then provides practical tools that people can use to make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

The approach focuses on the following themes but these can be customised to help people to achieve ongoing success.

Strengths

We will focus on the person's strengths and any areas for development. We will help them to build on their successful style of working or leading and set specific goals. We will then move on to the next stage.

Strategies

We will focus on the strategies and skills they can add to their repertoire. We will focus on how they can apply these: a) to do superb work; b) to implement solutions to challenges; c) to help their stakeholders to achieve success.

Success

What will focus on how the person can continue to shape their career and deliver superb work. We will provide practical tools they can use to keep developing - as a person and as a professional - and continue to achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to develop. One approach is to try to weave together the person's professional contribution and their professional development plan.

Sometimes this may work. There may be other times, however, when the demands of delivering the daily work leave less time for professional development.

One model is to follow the parallel approach. It is to help a person to focus on both their professional contribution and their professional development.

This approach can bring benefits to both the person and organisation. The person delivers their agreed contribution and also keeps working towards their professional picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you may wish to follow elements of this approach in your own way. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Professional Success Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do to follow elements of this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Professional Partnerships Approach

Professional Partnerships

There are many ways to build professional partnerships. One approach involves focusing on the following themes.

- Clarifying The Potential Professional Partnership;
- Contracting About The Professional Partnership;
- Continuing To Deliver Success In The Professional Partnership.

There are many ways to build professional partnerships. This article explores one approach where you may aim to help an individual, team or organisation to achieve success.

Imagine that you are a potential supplier to a customer. You may provide services as a specialist, trusted advisor, consultant or another kind of professional.

The following sections describe how you may be able to build a partnership that delivers success. This involves going through the following steps.

Clarifying The Potential Professional Partnership

Imagine you that you may have the opportunity to provide services to a customer. There are many ways to focus on the possible ways you can help them. One approach is to go through the following steps.

You can clarify the potential customer's specific goals

The first step is to understand the potential customer's world and their goals. One approach is to do your research and use your imagination to explore the following questions.

Who is the potential customer? What is happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face? What may be their specific goals? What are their organisation's goals?

Imagine that you have explored these themes. You may then want to do the following exercise.

The Potential Customer

The specific goals they may want to achieve in their work may be:

To ...

To ...

To ...

You can add to this list as you get more information about the customer's challenges and goals. When appropriate, you can move on to the next stage.

You can clarify the professional skills you can offer to help them to achieve their goals

This step involves focusing on the following themes. You can aim: a) to clarify your own professional strengths and skills; b) to clarify how you can use these to help the customer to achieve success.

Bearing in mind the customer's goals, you may want to explore the following questions.

What are my professional strengths and skills? How can I use these to help the potential customer to achieve their goals? What are the specific results I can deliver for them? What will be the benefits of delivering these results – for the potential customer and their organisation?

Let's assume you have clarified how you may be able to help the potential customer. When appropriate, you can move on to the next stage.

You can meet with the potential customer and, if appropriate, agree on the potential professional partnership

Imagine that you are going to meet with the potential customer. It will then be important to follow a golden rule:

The meeting is about them. It is not about you.

You may aim to eventually get some business from the customer's organisation. Depending on your style, however, you may prefer to act as a trusted advisor rather than try to do a hard sell.

Let's assume you are going to meet with the potential customer. You may want to provisionally agree with them ahead of time on the possible agenda.

You will do this in your own way. One approach is to send them something like the following email.

Hello ...

Looking forward to meeting with you on ...

As far as understand it from our earlier conversations, some of the topics it may be good to explore would be:

Let me know if these topics are still appropriate or if there are any other that it would be valuable to explore.

We will, of course, finalise the agenda when we meet. We will then focus on how to help you and your organisation to continue to achieve success.

The next step will be to meet the potential customer. You will aim to create a positive environment and agree on the topics to explore. If appropriate, you may then aim:

To show you understand the person's world, the challenges they face and specific goals they want to achieve;

To, in your own way, share ideas, knowledge and tools they can use to achieve their goals;

To, if appropriate, explore the possible ways forward to build a potential professional partnership for helping them to achieve their goals.

Let's assume that you have clarified the specific goals the potential customer wants to achieve. You may then share knowledge that they and their organisation can use to achieve these goals.

Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to act as a trusted advisor. Bearing in mind your strengths and knowledge, it is:

To explain the possible options going forwards for achieving their goals;

To share knowledge and practical tools they can use to achieve their goals;

To do this in a way that resonates with the person and enables them to achieve their goals.

Imagine that you have taken these steps. Much then depends on the potential customer's reactions. These may include the following kinds of responses.

They may simply listen and process the ideas in their own way;

They may thank you for the ideas and say they may get back to you;

They may show an interest in the ideas and say something along the lines of: "How can we take this further?"

Let's assume they say they are interested in your help. They may ask you to send a specific proposal. Alternatively, they may immediately want to discuss the practical ways you can partner with them to help them achieve success.

If appropriate, you can focus on the possible ways forward. For example, they may want you either: a) to deliver a pilot project; b) to then, if it works, to deliver a big piece of work. Whatever route they take, it can then lead to the next stage.

Contracting About The Professional Partnership

Imagine the potential customer would like you to work with them. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to make clear contracts in the following areas.

The specific results to be delivered when doing the piece of work

You can agree on the outcomes to be delivered. These may, for example, focus on specific results you can help them to achieve in the areas of profits, product quality or people.

The specific strategies to be followed to achieve the desired results

You can agree on the key strategies to follow to give yourselves the greatest chance of success. You can then implement these by using your strengths to help the customer to achieve their goals.

The specific responsibilities in working to achieve the desired results

You can make clear contracts about these responsibilities. You can agree on both your and the organisation responsibilities in working to achieve the goals.

The specific support required when working to achieve the desired results

You can clarify the kinds of support that may be required to increase the chances of success. These can include both the practical and psychological support

The specific measures that will show you have delivered the desired results

You can describe the specific things that will have been achieved or that will be happening that will show the results have been delivered. You can then continually check the progress towards achieving these goals.

There are many ways to make such a contract when building professional partnerships. The following pages provide one framework that can be used to make clear contracts.

The Professional Partnership

The following pages provide a framework that people can use to clarify their professional partnership when working towards achieving certain goals.

The Specific Results

The specific results we aim to deliver when doing the piece of work are:

*

*

*

The Specific Strategies

The specific strategies we aim to follow when working to achieve the desired results are:

*

*

*

The Specific Responsibilities

The specific responsibilities of Party A in working to achieve the desired results are:

*

*

*

The specific responsibilities of Party B in working to achieve the desired results are:

*

*

*

The Specific Support

The specific kinds of support that is required in order to increase the chances of achieving the desired results are:

*

*

*

The Specific Measures

The specific things that will have been achieved or that will be happening that will show we have delivered the desired results are:

*

*

*

Continuing To Deliver Success In The Professional Partnership

Imagine that you have made clear contracts about doing a piece of work for the customer. Different people then follow different approaches to doing such work. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I imagine that I am on the rolling contract that has to be signed off every month. So I always do my best to help the customer to achieve success."

You will have your own approach. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, you may also focus on the following themes.

You can perform superb work and get some quick successes

You can follow the agreed strategies and perform superb work. You can also get some quick successes. These will reassure the key stakeholders and also buy time to get on with the work.

You can proactively keep people informed about the progress towards achieving the agreed goals

Your backers and other key stakeholders may sometimes worry. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to proactively keep them informed about the progress being made towards achieving the goals.

You can deliver the desired results and add that touch of class

You can keep performing superb work and find solutions to challenges. Entering the final straight, you can deliver the goods and add that touch of class. Sometimes this can lead to you being asked to do another piece of work for the customer.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may follow elements of the professional partnerships approach? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

The Professional Partnerships Approach

The specific situation where I may follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

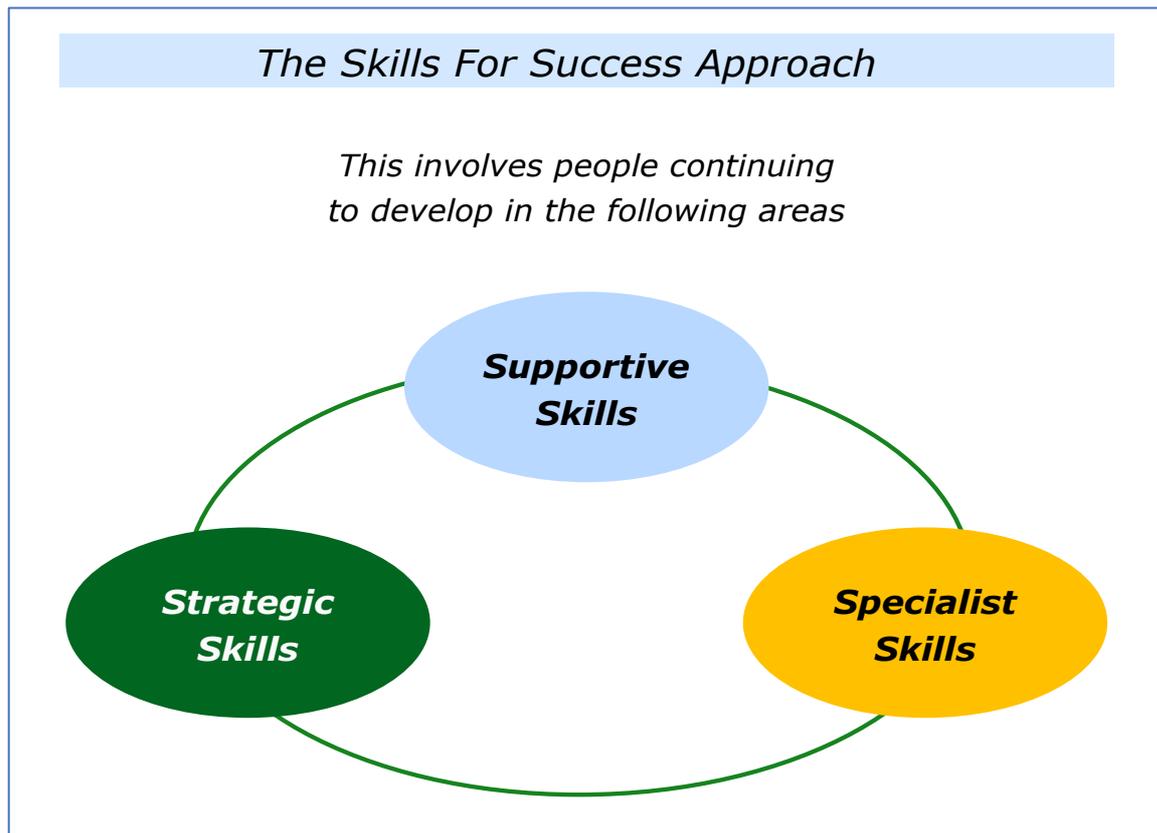

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Skills For Success Approach

There are many models for clarifying whether a person has the skills to deliver success. One approach is to clarify whether they have the required supportive, specialist and strategic skills.

Imagine that you are choosing a person for a specific role. Bearing in mind the qualities required to deliver success, it can be useful to go through the following steps:

To watch the person in action, see examples of their work and clarify whether they may have the skills required to deliver success;

To clarify how they rate in terms of demonstrating - or having the potential to demonstrate - the skills required to deliver success;

To make decisions and recommendations about whether they will be likely to perform the specific role and deliver success.

Imagine that you have seen the person in action or examples of their work. It can then be useful to focus on the following themes regarding whether they will be likely to deliver success.

The Supportive Skills

Bearing in mind the role, the person may need to encourage their colleagues and customers. The way they do this may, of course, depend on the specific role. Let's look at some examples.

A leader may need to create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They may need to act as a positive model, manage by outcomes and enable people to perform at their best.

A manager may need to support their key stakeholders by being good at managing upwards. They may also need to build positive teams in which motivated people deliver success.

A specialist team member may need to have a positive attitude and want to help other people. They may need to pass on their knowledge in a way that helps both their colleagues and customers to succeed.

A person joining a values driven organisation may need to embody the values and enrich the culture. They may need to use their strengths in ways that support the people and the organisation.

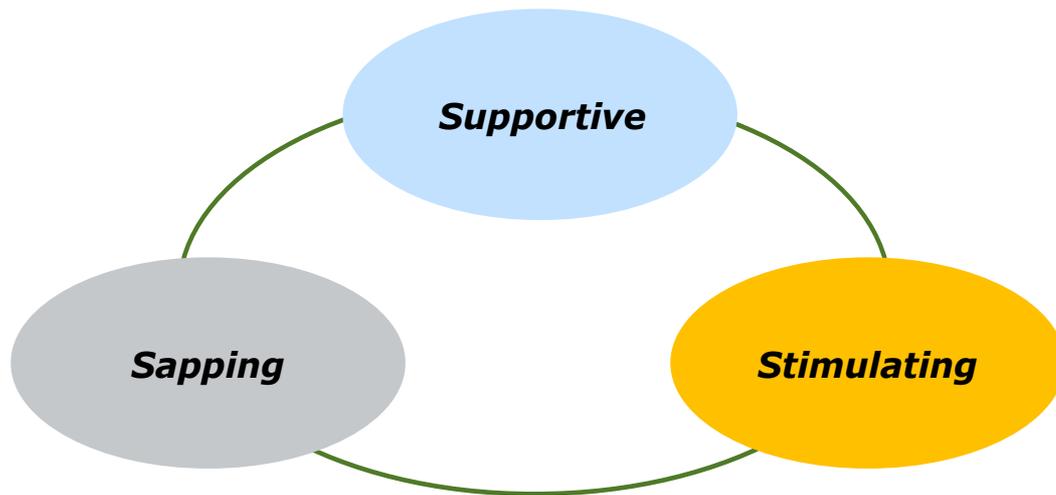

The final point involves focusing on: a) the person's attitude and whether they want to demonstrate the required skills; b) the person's ability to demonstrate the required skills.

Some people may have great ability but the behavioural style they demonstrate may cause problems. Their specialist contribution could be of value, but it will not be worth the resulting collateral damage.

Here is the piece on considering whether a person's style may have a positive or negative affect on other people.

People's Styles Can Be Supportive, Stimulating Or Sapping

Different people have different styles of interacting with others. They may demonstrate some of the following styles. They may be:

Every person has strengths and aims to achieve their picture of success. It is their style of operating – the way they interact with others – that may have consequences.

The way they behave may come across to others as supportive, stimulating or sapping. Some people are asked to leave organisations because their style of operating creates collateral damage.

Here are some of the most common styles that people demonstrate. Some people may also display elements of each style.

The Supportive Style

Such people behave in a way in a supportive way. They come across as encouraging, caring and helpful. They help to create an environment in which people feel able to be their real selves.

The Stimulating Style

Such people may be energetic or inspiring. Here are some of the ways they interact with other people.

Some people are stimulating. They come across as alive, positive and even sparkling. Some may also share stimulating ideas that inspire other people.

Some people are solutions-focused. They are good at reading reality and quickly move into solutions mode. They focus on clarity – the real results to achieve – and aim to find positive solutions to challenges.

Such people are sage-like. They are humble, kind and see themselves as lifetime students. They aim to pass on knowledge and practical tools that help other people to succeed.

The approaches mentioned so far are likely to encourage people. Sometimes we meet other styles that are not so helpful. These may fall under the following general heading.

The Sapping Style

Some people behave in ways that sap the energy from other people. Here are some of the styles they may demonstrate.

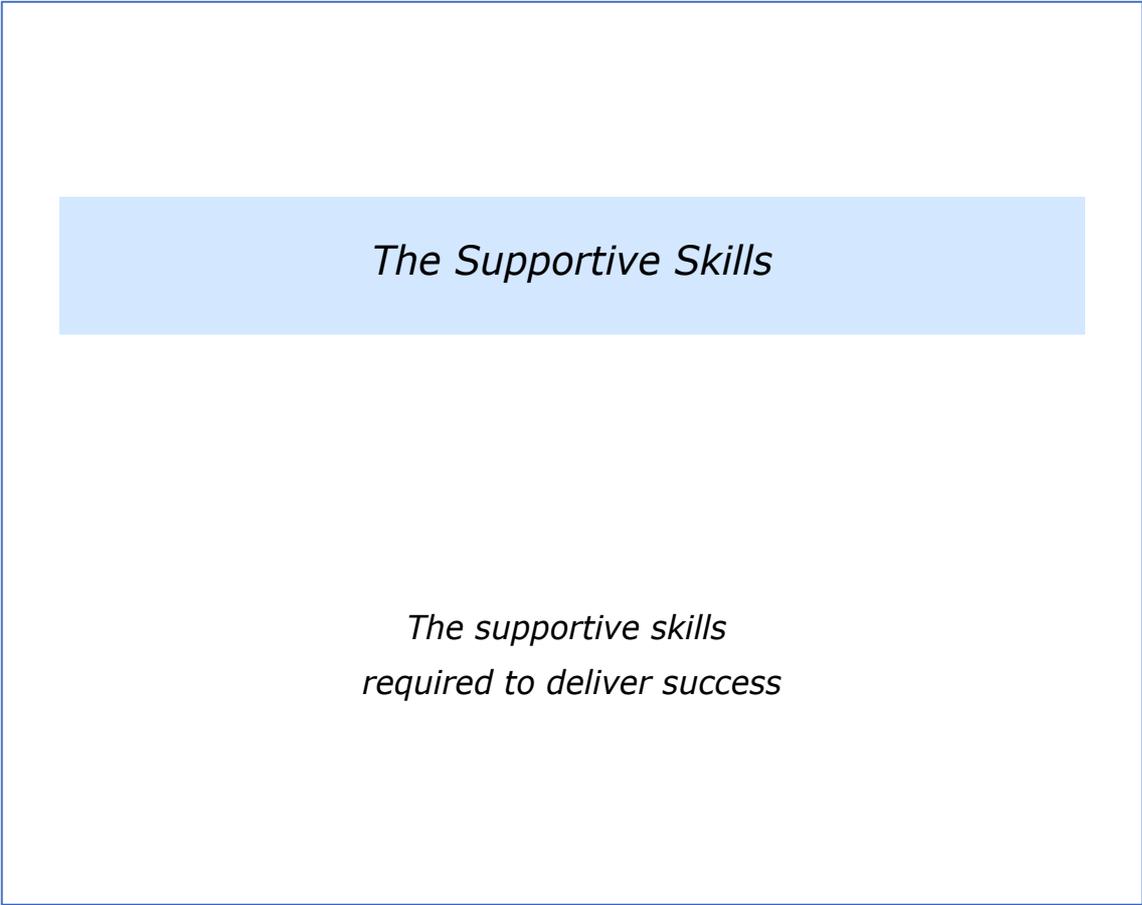

Some people behave in a superior way. They may see themselves as above other people. They may also want to control others and order them to behave in certain ways.

Some people are status-seeking. They often want to be seen as important and successful. They may aim to do this by seeking status, applause and admiration. They may even praise their own efforts in the expectation of getting adulation.

Some people look for scapegoats. They spread negative energy and look for people to blame. They focus on spreading discord or hate – which can have painful consequences of many people.

Some people's styles are sapping. They complain or behave in other ways that sap people's energy. They refuse to take responsibility, believe their feelings are the most important in the world and are not interested in finding solutions.

Imagine that you considering a person for a specific role. Bearing in mind the required supportive skills, you may want to work through the following steps. This can help to clarify the likelihood of them delivering success.

The Supportive Skills

*The supportive skills
required to deliver success*

The supportive skills the person may need to demonstrate to deliver success in the specific role are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The rating I would give the person regarding them demonstrating these supportive skills is:

___ / 10

The specific reasons for giving this rating - together with some examples - are:

The specific things the person can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

*

*

*

The Specialist Skills

The person may need to demonstrate specialist skills in their area of expertise. They may need to know how to build on their strengths and, when appropriate, work with people who have complementary skills.

Such an approach calls for being honest, knowing their strengths and being aware of potential weaknesses. It then calls for having the savvy to develop or add the abilities required to deliver success.

A leader may need specialist skills in organisational leadership, people leadership, market leadership or another area. They may also need to know how to build a great leadership team that can ensure the organisation achieves success.

A manager may need specialist skills related to their organisation's field of activity. They may also need specific skills for helping their colleagues and customers to achieve success.

A team member may need specialist skills that enable them to do good work in their area of expertise. They may also need to demonstrate the desire to keep developing as a person and as a professional.

A person who joins a values driven organisation may need to demonstrate their specialist skills to gain credibility. They may need to do this by performing superb work, helping others to succeed and getting respect from others in the organisation.

Imagine that you are considering a person for a specific role. Bearing in mind the required specialist skills, you may want to work through the following steps. This can help to clarify the likelihood of them delivering success.

The Specialist Skills

*The specialist skills
required to deliver success*

The specialist skills the person may need to demonstrate to deliver success in the specific role are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The rating I would give the person regarding them demonstrating these specialist skills is:

___ / 10

*The specific reasons for giving this rating
- together with some examples - are:*

*

*

*

The specific things the person can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

*

*

*

The Strategic Skills

The person may need to be able to see the big picture, clarify the real results to achieve and make good strategic decisions. The strategic ability they need to demonstrate will depend on their specific role.

Some people may need to do this when looking at the wider picture; some may need to do this within their own specialism.

A leader may need strategic ability when clarifying the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. They may also need it when making key decisions that can affect whether or not the organisation has a successful future.

A manager may need strategic ability when managing upwards and satisfying their key stakeholders. They may also need it to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way.

A team member may need strategic ability to see patterns and make good decisions within their specialist activity. They may also need it to ensure they are using their knowledge in a positive way to help both their colleagues and customers to achieve success.

A person may need strategic ability to do their due diligence before joining a values driven organisation. They may then need it ensure they continue to play to strengths and make their best contribution to the organisation.

Imagine that you considering a person for a specific role. Bearing in mind the required strategic skills, you may want to work through the following steps. This can help to clarify the likelihood of them delivering success.

The Strategic Skills

*The strategic skills
required to deliver success*

The strategic skills the person may need to demonstrate to deliver success in the specific role are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The rating I would give the person regarding them demonstrating these strategic skills is:

___ / 10

*The specific reasons for giving this rating
- together with some examples - are:*

*

*

*

The specific things the person can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

*

*

*

The Skills For Success Summary

Imagine that you need to decide whether the person applying for the specific role is likely to deliver success. Looking at the person and their performance, do you believe:

They demonstrate the required skills?

They have the potential – such as having the desired attitude and ability - to demonstrate the required skills?

They will be likely to consistently demonstrate the required skills and deliver success?

If so, you may want to recommend them for the role. You may also include some provisos, however, regarding the specific things they need to develop to deliver success.

If the person does not have the specific skills but has other abilities, you may consider whether they can contribute elsewhere in the organisation. If the person is not the right fit for the organisation, you can pass on this message in a professional way.

If you are going to recommend the person for the role, then it will be important to set up things to succeed. It can be useful to describe the specific things that can be done:

To make sure the person feels welcome to the organisation;

To make sure the person has a good induction, knows how to follow the agreed principles and can get some quick successes in the organisation;

To make sure the person knows how they can build on their strengths, encourage other people and make their best contribution to the organisation.

There are many ways to decide whether or not a person may deliver the goods in a specific role. One approach is to clarify whether they have the skills required to deliver success.

Bearing these things in mind, here is a framework you can use for making your recommendations. You can, of course, adapt this approach to suit the needs of your organisation.

Skills For Success

The name of the person is:

*

Summary

The ratings I have given the person in terms of them demonstrating the skills required to deliver success in the specific role are these:

Supportive Skills _____ / 10

Specialist Skills _____ / 10

Strategic Skills _____ / 10

Bearing in mind these ratings, here are the recommendations I would give regarding the next steps with the person:

*

*

*

The Managing Rome Approach

This is an approach that I have used many times when working with people in big organisations. It is important for people to learn how to manage Rome – the centre – otherwise Rome will manage them.

Senior managers sometimes complain about the difficulties of managing their bosses. They may express the following concerns.

"The people at HQ keep changing their minds and giving confusing messages. Sometimes we don't know what the centre wants."

"One leader gives one message whilst another leader gives another message. This can make life difficult. It is as if they are each on their own agendas rather than having a common goal."

"Some of the leaders are micromanagers. Much of our time is spent managing the centre rather than doing good work for customers."

If you join an organisation, then morally you must satisfy the centre. The organisation is paying your wages. Your job is to help it to succeed, but sometimes this can be challenging.

Imagine that you lead a team. It can be useful:

To show you understand the world from the centre's point of view;

To be proactive, clarify the specific results the key stakeholders want your team to deliver;

To make clear contracts about the agreed outcomes and explain how you will proactively keep them informed;

To get some quick successes to reassure the centre;

To proactively keep the stakeholders informed about the team's progress towards achieving the goals.

You then need to proactively keep managing Rome. The key stakeholders at the centre are your key customers and it is important to satisfy them.

Sometimes this can be challenging. Some of the stakeholders may be fighting each other, for example, and want different things from your team. If this is the case, it can be useful:

To meet each stakeholder to clarify what they want;

To clarify the desired outcomes that the stakeholders have in common;

To make clear contracts about the desired outcomes and then to deliver the goods.

Great workers recognise that much of their time can be taken up by managing upwards. This is fine - providing the key stakeholders give support and manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

Chaotic stakeholders cause problems by micromanaging or continually changing direction. Sometimes the process of managing them can become unsustainable and can lead to you choosing to move on.

Great workers also recognise the importance of managing Rome when doing a long-term project. A football manager, for example, may be hired to help a club to nurture its young players and achieve long-term success. That sounds great, but it is vital to produce short-term results – otherwise they may get fired.

Great workers deliver the agreed outcomes, but often do this in their own ways. They also heed the following advice.

"When you visit people at Rome, take them the trophies and the taxes, but don't talk too much about tactics.

"They may then explain what are doing it wrong and give you a 360 page manual to follow. They may also offer to come and supervise you to make sure that your team are doing things in the right way.

"Finally, even though it may hurt, sometimes allow Rome to take credit for the trophies."

Great workers recognise that Rome has many satellites. The people at the centre will focus on the satellites that have problems or those they want to supervise. So keep Rome at bay by delivering success.

Such workers recognise they have a moral responsibility to deliver the desired outcomes to the centre. Continuing to do this will enable them to retain their autonomy and get on with doing great work.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to manage Rome? How can you manage the centre and do good work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences. It is followed by an pieces on a related theme.

Managing Rome

*The specific situation in the future
when I may want to manage
Rome – the centre - may be:*

*

The specific things I can do then to do my best to manage Rome are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Cottage, Castle And Cathedral Approaches

People may choose to work in three places during their lives: the cottage, the castle or the cathedral. Some individuals try all three and may then return to the cottage. Let's explore these places to work.

The Cottage

Creative people often start by working from the cottage. Because they have little money, they use their imagination to reach the market, provide great service and satisfy their customers.

Such people feel in control of their growing business. Every decision counts and they see an immediate effect. Every day is an adventure and they must live off their wits.

Creative people attract attention, however, and one day they are visited by a messenger from the castle. This may be a larger organisation or the company headquarters. The messenger from the castle says something along the following lines to the creative person.

"Your energy is just what we need to inject life into our organisation. Imagine what we can achieve with your creativity and our resources.

"We can conquer the world. Can you come and help us to be successful?"

The creative person turns down the offer, saying they want to remain independent. Two months pass, then another messenger arrives.

Higher in the chain of command, they wave a big cheque. They urge the creative person to reconsider and by saying something along the following lines.

"We really need your creativity. Just think of the resources at your disposal."

Another refusal: but this is followed by another visit and a bigger cheque. Feeling it is worth giving it a go, the creative person finally accepts the offer to work in the castle.

(They may also create a back-up plan, however, which involves having an escape route.)

Looking back, can you think of a time when you worked in your equivalent of the cottage? You may have been working as a freelancer, in a small team, on a pioneering project or doing another activity. What did it feel like in that situation?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Cottage

The specific time when I worked in my equivalent of the cottage was:

*

The specific things I did when working there were:

*

*

*

The specific things I felt when working there were:

*

*

*

The Castle And The Cathedral

The creative person is welcomed to the castle with open arms. It feels great to be lauded as a potential saviour. Time passes. They begin to learn the ways of the castle but things go slowly.

Two months after their arrival, the creative person feels impatient. Planning to get the show on the road, they aim to present their first imaginative idea at the next departmental meeting.

Politeness decrees they test it out with the person who invited them into the castle, so they run it past him in a one-to-one session. The person responds in the following way.

"Great work, this is exactly why we brought you into the organisation. Before implementing the idea, however, there are some key players you need to get on-side. They are busy people, but you can get into their diaries within the next three months.

"Looking at your suggestion, I also believe a working party on the other side of the castle is studying something similar. You can get your voice heard by sitting on their committee. As I said at the beginning, though, this is just the sort of energy we want you to bring to the organisation."

After two years of following the rules of court, the person feels drained.

Some individuals stay on, hoping to one day reach the inner sanctum. Some join the castle's process police and enforce decrees from the centre. Some retire to their equivalent of the cathedral or Academia. They take time to study or write about their experiences.

Can you think of a time when you worked in your equivalent of the castle or the cathedral? What did it feel like in that situation?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Castle Or The Cathedral

The specific time when I worked in my equivalent of the castle or cathedral was:

*

The specific things I did when working there were:

*

*

*

The specific things I felt when working there were:

*

*

*

The Return To The Cottage

Creative people often return to the cottage. Oxygen is vital. They return to running their own business or finding a stimulating project where they can breathe.

Shapers by nature, they want to feel in charge of their lives. Revisiting customers fires their imagination and energises their brain. Regaining their zest, they help their customers to succeed.

Happy in their work, they get the right balance between innovation, implementation and impact. Life is good and they enjoy the air. Then one day a courier arrives from another castle. They say something along the following lines.

"The dynamic company you have built fits perfectly with our strategy for becoming the world's Number One. The problem is that we do not have your kind of creativity in our business. How much would it cost for you to join us in the castle?"

Some people accept the cheque. Some accept a deal in principle but find a way to retain their autonomy. They protect their culture by insisting on staying in the cottage and getting a cheque for producing great results.

Some feel at home in the cottage where they have the freedom to continue doing creative work. Bearing this in mind, they politely give the following answer.

"Thanks for your interest, but we are happy working in our company."

Looking back, can you think of a time when you returned to your equivalent of the cottage? What happened as a result?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. We will then look at another aspect of maintaining your personal and professional health.

The Return To The Cottage

The specific time when I returned to my equivalent of the cottage was:

*

The specific things I did when working there were:

*

*

*

The specific things I felt when working there were:

*

*

*

The Recognising Warning Signs Approach

Warning Signs

Many people love to throw themselves into their work. But it can also be important for them to recognise any potential warning signs. They can aim to:

Many people enjoy working hard but it is important for them to recognise any potential warning signs. They may get headaches, forget appointments, neglect their family, feel exhausted or have other symptoms.

Recognising the warning signs

Different people get different warning signs. One person explained their symptoms in the following way.

"Every Friday night I got a splitting headache in my left temple. Despite working hard during the week - and feeling tired - I only get the headache when driving home on Friday.

"Visiting an osteopath to deal with another problem, I asked about the headaches. She found a tight nerve in my right shoulder, which was where the pressure was located.

"She taught me how to massage the muscle, which eased the stress, but also taught me to recognise the symptoms earlier.

"I have always been duty driven. Sometimes it feels like I am responsible for taking care of my family, my team and my mother.

"Without getting into fluffy territory, I decided to take some time for myself and not carry the world on my shoulders.

"That meant saying 'Yes,' to some things and 'No' to others. Now I have been free from headaches for the past 2 years."

Do you ever get warning signs? These can take different forms. Here are some things that people have mentioned regarding such signs.

"I take on too much, feel tired and forget things. I once double-booked myself for appointments in Sheffield and Singapore on the same day."

"I lose my temper for no apparent reason. This can lead to me lashing out and hurting my loved ones."

"Sometimes I feel empty, lack purpose and begin to drift. This is unlike me, because I am usually extremely decisive."

Looking at your own life, what are the warning signs you may get? How do you try to take heed of the warning signs? What happens if you do not take heed of these signs?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Recognising The Warning Signs

The specific kinds of warning signs that I sometimes get in my life or work are:

*

*

*

The specific things I do to try to take heed of the warning signs are:

*

*

*

The specific things that can happen if I do not take heed of the warning signs are:

*

*

*

Understanding the reasons for the warning signs

What may be the reasons for any warning signs? You may feel out of control, have little time to rest, be in an unsatisfying job, be surrounded by negative people or need a new sense of purpose.

The reasons can be physical, psychological or a mixture of both. Sometimes the reasons may be deep seated, sometimes they can be more obvious. Let's look at one example of the latter.

A footballer had a good disciplinary record but then he got himself sent off twice in a month. Nobody could understand why. He was always the first to training, the last to leave and would do anything for the team.

The answer lay in front of our eyes. Over the past month he had been asked to play out of position and felt extremely uncomfortable. He explained this in the following way.

"My head is in a whirl because I strain to remember the manager's instructions. That isn't the case when I'm playing in my natural position, because then I don't have to think and I enjoy the game.

"Now I get confused trying to remember the instructions. This leads to me making mistakes, getting upset sometimes arguing with the referee. I'm counting the games to returning to my best position."

The player's problem was quite solvable. Learning a technique for managing his anger, he volunteered to play one more game out of position. Strangely, because he now recognised what upset him, he had a storming game. He was then grateful to return to his natural role on the field.

When do you get warning signs? What may be the reasons? How can you heed these warning signs? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Reasons For The Warning Signs

The specific times when I get warning signs are:

*

*

*

The potential reasons for the warning signs may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to take heed of the warning signs are:

*

*

*

Later we will return to what you can do about the warning signs. Before then, however, let's focus on the following theme.

There are many ways to take care of your health. One approach is to adapt the green, amber, red and blue zones exercise that was mentioned earlier in the book.

You can clarify how things are going regarding your health, relationships, work or other areas. Let's explore these steps.

The Green Zone

What is going well in your life at the moment? You may be taking care of your body, enjoying time with your children, developing new skills at work or whatever. One person said the following.

"My relationship with my wife is blossoming. So I aim to keep spending quality time with her."

"Two broken marriages have left their toll. I don't want it to happen again. We plan to stay together for the rest of our lives."

"I am also doing a stimulating project at work. I want to build on this and show my employers how we can turn it into a profitable service for our customers."

"Looking at other things, I have returned to singing in a band and writing songs. This is something I did in my youth, but have put aside for a while. I intend to create my own website where I can publish the songs."

Looking at your life, what are the things that are in the green zone? How can you build on these? What will be the benefits?

The Amber Zone

What are the activities where there are warning signs? You may detect these signals in your health, some relationships, financial matters or aspects of your work.

Are there things in the amber zone that it may be important to tackle? One person said the following.

"My health may be becoming issue. During the past year I have put on 2 kilos. Doesn't sound much, but in the old days I was able to lose weight easily."

"So it's time to start moving. Even though it is January, I am going to start running, rather than wait for the spring."

"There are also some warning signs at work. The team I lead is successful, but a couple of the team members have started to behave in negative ways that affect other people."

"I will clarify whether they want to follow the agreed professional principles. If not, that is okay. I will replace them with people who want to behave in a professional way and contribute towards achieving the goals."

How are things for you in work? Do you spend the majority of your time doing work that is satisfying? If not, what is the effect on your energy? What can you do to improve matters?"

Looking at your life, what are the things that are in the amber zone? How can you take action and improve some of these? What will be the benefits?

The Red Zone

Are there any things that are not going well? Are there any recurring problems that create collateral damage for yourself or other people?

Sometimes it can be important to identify the issues and then make a decision about the possible routes forwards. One person said the following.

"One day I realised that I simply had to take more control of my life and work. I had allowed myself to become overwhelmed at work and this affected my health.

"I always felt tired and I had high blood pressure. I tried to turn things around by working more hours, but this did not help.

"Matters came to a head when I tried to cram in a customer appointment on the way home, got caught in a traffic jam and missed my daughter's Christmas Play.

"This rude awakening taught me to take more control of my life. It also set me on the route to trying to repair my marriage."

The Blue Zone

You can also use your imagination to explore the blue zone. This involves taking time to reflect, look ahead and think of any ideas that you can use to shape your future.

Sometimes it can be good to do this by yourself. Sometimes you may want to explore the possibilities with the help of a friend, mentor or another person.

Different people consider different themes when exploring the blue zone. They may ask themselves some of the following question.

What do I want to do in my life? What are the possible routes I can take? What are my strengths? How can I use these in my life and work?

What are the things that give me positive energy? How can I do more of these things? What are the kinds of projects that I find satisfying? How can I do more of these?

What can I do to continue to develop or be creative? How can I pursue these themes? What are the many other things I can do in my life? What may be the benefits of doing some of these things?

If you wish, try tackling the exercises regarding the green, amber, red and blue zones. These invite you to complete the following sentences.

The Green Zone

The things that are going well in my life at the moment are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to build on some of these things are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Amber Zone

The things were there are warning signs are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to take action and improve some of these things are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Red Zone

The things that are not going well are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to make decisions and take action about these things are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Blue Zone

The many possible things that I can do in the rest of my life are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to pursue some of these things are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Learning from the warning signs and taking care of yourself in the future

Imagine that you have had warning signs. Sometimes these can be resolved by making relatively simple adjustments. These may involve eating healthier food, exercising or doing things that give you positive energy.

Sometimes these may call for bigger adjustments. These may involve spending time with positive people rather than negative people, finding a more satisfying job or developing a new sense of purpose.

Sometimes what you learn can lead to shifts in the way you live your life. One person explained this in the following way.

"My wake-up call came after getting prosecuted for speeding twice in five minutes. Suddenly I had six points on my driving licence.

"Now I see the prosecution as a blessing. Previously I had been addicted to speeding on the motorway. Fortunately I had never hurt myself or, worse still, maimed other people.

"The warning sign led to radically changing my working style. Previously I had got up at 5.00 every morning for the two hour drive and returned home at night.

"I decided to go freelance, do project work and mainly work from home. This was long before Covid forced this on many people and it worked. If I needed to be in an office, I travelled up by train the night before.

"This meant I had lots of energy, was on top of my game and did good work. It worked for myself, my customers and my family."

Sometimes we can learn from the warning signs. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Learning From The Warning Signs

The specific things I may be able to learn from any potential warning signs:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to take more care of myself in the future are:

*

*

*

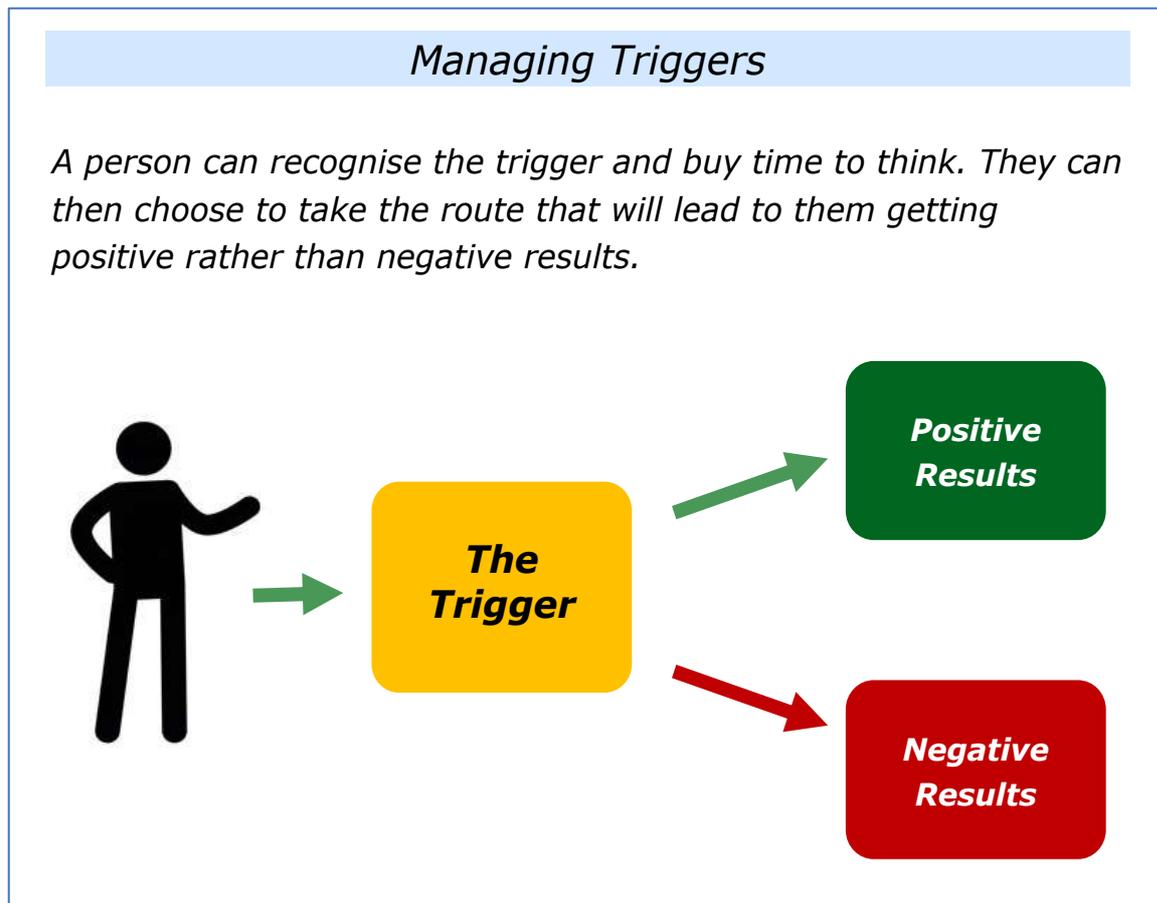

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Managing Triggers Approach

Different people have different triggers that can lead to them behaving in ways that cause difficulties. Sometimes they may manage such situations successfully. Sometimes they may fall into a downward spiral.

A recovering alcoholic may find it difficult to pass a crowded pub on a warm summer night. A person who frequently gets angry can be overcome by the rising red mist.

A footballer can make a mistake and punish themselves with negative self-talk. A normally positive person can fall into depression when hearing distressing news on the radio.

A drug user may respond to feeling anxious by searching for a quick fix. A couple may get into domestic arguments when one of them says something that hurts their partner.

Looking at your own life, are there any triggers that may produce difficulties? These may lead to you showing anger, getting depressed or behaving in ways you don't like.

If so, what are the specific triggers? What can happen as a result of not managing these successfully? What are the effects – both for you and other people?

Imagine you may want to manage trigger moments. The following sections provide a framework you can apply in your own way.

Recognising the triggers and avoiding putting yourself into those situations

Different people have different triggers. A gambler may feel bored and click onto a betting site. A footballer may rush to confront a referee after a poor decision. A sensitive person may feel a panic attack coming on in a certain situation.

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific trigger that you might want to manage successfully? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may have a trigger that leads to you wanting to smoke, overeat or having too much to drink. You may have one that leads to you getting angry, having a row with your partner, being depressed or behaving in another way you don't like.

How can you avoid putting yourself into such situations? How can you plan ahead and reduce the risk? How can you anticipate the potential warning signs? How can you mentally rehearse doing practical things to deal with the challenging situation?

Buying time to think if the triggers do happen

Imagine that, despite all your efforts, you are suddenly confronted by a situation in which you are exposed to one of your triggers.

There are many ways to manage such a situation. Here are some that you may wish to consider.

Staying calm and buying time to think

Some people do deep breathing. Some have a ritual they follow to relax, recentre and refocus.

A tennis player may have a physical action that they follow after each point. They follow this routine to clear their minds and focus on the present. They then rehearse what they are going to do next.

Some individuals have a phrase they say to remind themselves about what is really important in life. They make sure they don't do anything rash by saying something like:

"Stop. Plan. Act."

You will have your own way of buying time. Assuming you have taken this step, it is then time to move on to the next stage.

Considering the possible options for going forwards

Good decisions makers take time to reflect and consider the possible options for going forwards. They then make their decision based on the results they want to achieve.

Imagine that you are a divorced recovering alcoholic and you are passing a crowded bar on a sunny Friday evening. You look at the people smiling, talking and seeming to be having a good time.

Looking at the clock, you see it is 6.00 pm. You have nobody to go home to - just a television set and the promise of an empty weekend. You know that if you enter the bar it may result in you staggering home at 2.00 in the morning.

On the other hand, you know it makes sense to stay sober and take care of your health. This is the only way you will continue to have access to your children and, in the long run, keep your job.

What do you do? One choice is to walk in, get your first drink and relax. Another choice is to call your friend at Alcoholics Anonymous. Another is to walk past, go home and make yourself a meal. It is then to do positive things over the weekend.

Let's return to the potential trigger you may encounter. How can you buy time? How can you explore the options for going forwards? How can you consider the pluses and minuses of each option?

Pursuing the route that will get positive results

Imagine that you have bought time to consider the possible options for going forwards. There are many models for managing such situations. One approach is to use the STOP model. This invites you to take the following steps.

The STOP Model For Managing Trigger Situations

- Stop Recognise the warning signs and stop what you are doing.
- Think Breathe, buy time to think and see the big picture.
- Options Ask: "What are my possible options going forward? What are pluses and minuses of each option?"
- Positive Results Pursue the option most likely to get the desired positive results.

Imagine that you have chosen your way forwards. You can do something quickly to implement your action plan, get a quick success and build momentum.

The next stage will be to keep following good habits. How to make this happen? Some people take the following steps.

Refocusing

They start the day – or a piece of work – by following their chosen ritual and refocusing on their goals.

Routine

They follow their chosen routine – or rhythm – and keep doing the right things in the right way.

Results

They do what is necessary to get the desired results. They may then, when appropriate, give themselves a reward – though doing the right things may be a reward in itself.

This section has explored some of the tools that people can use in trigger situations. Let's explore another strategy for managing difficult challenges.

The Beating The Double Bind Approach

Beating The Double Bind

The Double Bind situation is one where it feels like ...

... whatever you do,
you are bound to lose

Have you ever been in a double bind? This is a situation in which – no matter what you do – you seem bound to lose.

Double binds cause great pain in the family and at work. Here are three suggestions for overcoming such situations.

Recognising The Double Bind

A child used as a pawn between rowing parents, for example, will feel they cannot win. Here is the worst case scenario in a divorce.

The mother says to the child:

"If you love me more than your father, come to me."

The father says:

"If you love me more than your mother, come to me."

The child has an impossible choice. Showing favour to one parent will incur the wrath of the other. Both options are painful. Retreating into their private world is often their only salvation.

The Priest who abuses a child puts their victim in a double bind. They may say something like the following.

"Nobody will believe you. They will believe me rather than you. Anyway, it was your fault. You led me on."

The abuser presents themselves as the victim. This is another way of trying to put the abused person in a double bind. They also try to get the victim to doubt their own experience.

The abused person feels bad but may find it difficult to explain this to anybody. When running group sessions for survivors of abuse, for example, it is common to hear a person listen to other people's stories and then say something like the following.

"That happened to me as well. I was told that it couldn't be true and I started doubting my own feelings. Sometimes I felt as if I was going mad."

Double binds can happen in our relationships at work. A strong signal that you are entering such territory is when you feel a knot in your stomach.

Something happened - either between you and a manager, in a meeting, or elsewhere - which makes you feel uneasy. Examining the situation in detail, you find that you have been placed in a position where, whatever you do, you are bound to lose.

Some people even put themselves in double binds. For example, they use 50% of their energy thinking of a positive way forward in their lives. They then employ the other 50% knocking it down by worrying about what can go wrong.

Confusing? Yes, but some people experience this inner dialogue. This becomes debilitating. They may then even start putting other people in double binds.

How to tackle this challenge? The first step is to recognise the double bind. Simply giving a name to it puts the situation outside yourself. You are not to blame and can move onto the next step.

Doing Your Best To Beat The Double Bind

Clear contracting is the best way to untangle the double bind. Start by making a contract with yourself. You can focus on the following themes.

The Controllables

Clarify the specific things you can and can't control in the situation.

The Dos And Don'ts

Clarify the specific things you do and don't want to do in the situation.

The Action Plan

Clarify the action plan you want to follow and make a contract with yourself to follow it in the situation.

Imagine that you have spent lots of time encouraging a person but they choose to continue blaming the world for their troubles. They start conversations by saying something like the following.

"Why do things always happen to me? I feel so depressed, but when I try to talk about my problems, people walk away. You are the only person who takes the time to listen to me."

This is a classic double bind. If you keep listening to the person you may feel depressed. You may also be enabling them to stay in their chosen role and keep saying "Yes, but."

If you don't listen to the person they may say that you, their final hope, does not care. This will confirm their view that the world is against them.

How to deal with such a situation? One approach may be to say something like the following.

"I am prepared to help, but only if you are prepared to look for solutions. You are intelligent and I am sure it is possible to find a way forwards."

"If you wish, take time to reflect. Then, when appropriate, get back to me when you are ready to focus on finding solutions. I will then do what I can to help."

Be prepared for the person to go into the victim role. They may say something like.

"See, this confirms nobody understands and everything is against me. You were the last person I thought would desert me."

Stand firm. Repeat that you would be happy to talk with them if they want to find solutions. This sound tough, but it is one way to move forward. The alternative is that you both end up feeling miserable.

If appropriate, you can try to make clear contracts with them about how you would like them to behave in the future. You can also outline the benefits both to themselves and other people.

Sometimes this approach works, but frequently it doesn't. The people causing the pain are not open to win-wins. They are stuck in win-lose or lose-lose.

It may not be possible to solve everything straight away. When in doubt, however, choose the route forward that will, in the long term, cause the least pain.

Recognising Potential Future Double Binds

Healthy people develop the radar to spot double binds when these appear on the horizon. They recognise that avoiding such pain can save lots of energy.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation that may be a possible double bind? This could be in your personal or professional life. What may be the factors that make it a double bind? For example:

If I do (a) the outcomes won't be good;

If I do (b) the outcome won't be good.

Bearing these things in mind, how can you do your best to beat the double bind? Again, it may be useful to explore the following steps.

Describe what you can and can't control in the situation.

Describe what you do and don't want to do in the situation.

Describe your action plan and follow it in the situation.

When in doubt, try to avoid putting yourself in situations that are potential double binds. If you are going into such a situation, however, it may be useful to tackle the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Beating The Double Bind

The specific situation where I may experience a double bind may be:

*

The specific factors that mean that, whatever I do, I am bound to lose are:

a) If I do ... the outcome will be ...

b) If I do ... the outcome will be ...

The specific things I can do to do my best to beat the double bind are:

*

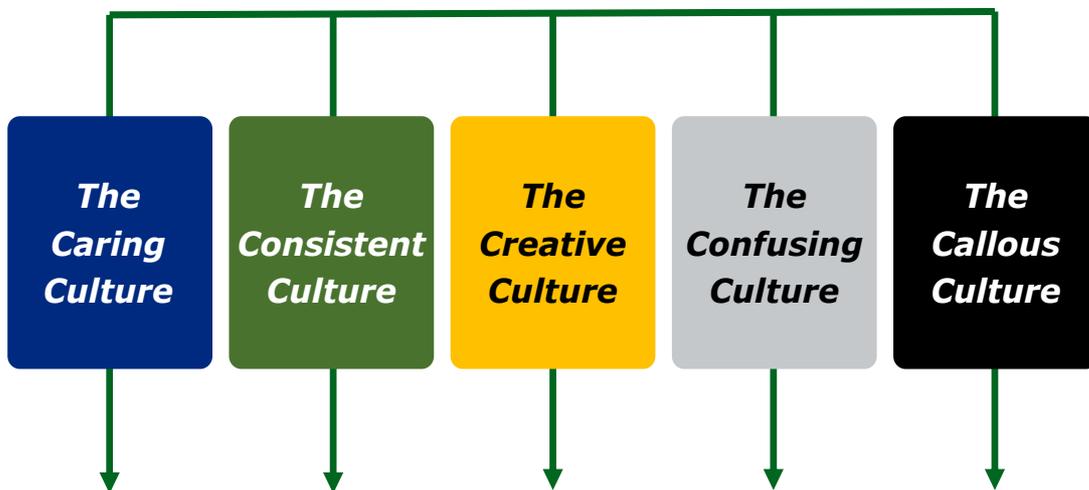

*

*

The Caring, Consistent, Creative, Confusing And Callous Culture Approaches

The Caring To Callous Culture Approaches

Marvin Bower defined culture as the way we do things around here. Different people build different kinds of cultures in their team, organisation or society. These can include the following:

Different people choose to build different kinds of cultures in teams, organisations and societies. Each kind of culture has consequences. Marvin Bower once described culture as:

The way we do things around here.

This piece describes cultures that range from being caring to callous. Some people combine elements of each approach. Let's explore these themes.

The Caring Culture

Different people build caring cultures in different ways. Some aim to translate caring into action and encourage people in their daily lives and work.

When have you experienced a caring culture? You may have had encouraging parents, educators or managers who created an environment in which people could grow.

During the early years of my career I met many leaders of therapeutic communities who created such places. They had high standards, however, and emphasised that everybody should have this caring ethic.

People who joined the communities needed to understand the ethos. They were expected to take responsibility and encourage others, rather than be irresponsible. The caring principles applied to everybody.

Caring cultures have pluses and some minuses. The pluses are that they create an ethos of kindness, encouragement and respect. This enables people to be themselves, help others and grow.

There are potential minuses. Some people may take advantage of the culture in ways that hurt others. They may then also expect people to excuse them.

Looking back, when have experienced a caring culture? What were the pluses? What were the minuses? What were the lessons you learned from the experience?

The Consistent Culture

Good leaders often build consistent cultures. They are positive, predictable and create an environment in which people can achieve peak performances. Poor leaders are sometimes negative and unpredictable.

Consistent organisations give people clear messages about the following things. They say things like:

The purpose of our organisation is ...

The principles we encourage people to follow that are an expression of this purpose – and the reasons for these – are ...

The positive results we are aiming to achieve - and the benefits of achieving this picture of success - are ...

Such organisations make the professional deal clear. They communicate the responsibilities of both the organisation and the employee. They then invite people to choose whether they want to contribute towards achieving the goals.

Consistent cultures keep sharing success stories and show people what good looks like. They also act decisively if people choose not to follow the required professional standards.

Such cultures have pluses and some minuses. The pluses are that people can feel they are in a predictable environment. They can also follow certain principles to contribute to achieving the picture of success.

There are potential minuses. Sometimes the culture can become a bit staid. People then need to be encouraged to use their creativity to shape the future and deliver ongoing success.

Looking back, when have experienced a consistent culture? What were the pluses? What were the minuses? What were the lessons you learned from the experience?

The Creative Culture

Creative cultures can be stimulating. People enjoy the buzz of working in such environments. They feel alive when using their talents and doing fulfilling work.

Such cultures can be exciting, but they can also unpredictable and disorganised. Sometimes people lapse into pursuing their personal agendas.

Good leaders recognise that people often work best when they align their efforts towards achieving a specific goal. This can be a challenge in creative cultures.

Such leaders therefore take a certain approach. They keep communicating the organisation's purpose. They then take the following steps to maintain a stimulating environment.

They position the culture as one that keeps running a series of projects that contribute towards achieving the purpose;

They encourage people to choose to opt into contributing to the various projects;

They then enable people to deliver successful projects that contribute towards achieving the purpose.

Such leaders encourage people to be creative but they are also prepared to make tough decisions. This decisiveness may be needed if certain people choose not to contribute to the organisation.

Creative cultures can have pluses and some minuses. The pluses are that people feel they are in a stimulating environment. They are then able to use their strengths to do creative work and deliver success.

There are potential minuses. Such cultures need people who deliver consistently high professional standards. Sometimes they attract people who want to do their own thing and do not contribute helping their colleagues or the organisation to achieve success.

Looking back, when have experienced a creative culture? What were the pluses? What were the minuses? What were the lessons you learned from the experience?

The Confusing Culture

Confusing cultures can exist in the family, workplace and society. They often have the following characteristics.

The leaders or other key people say one thing but do another;

The behaviour of such people causes confusion and others find it hard to get clear answers;

The guidelines and goal posts sometimes keep changing.

People can find such cultures to be frustrating. Why? People like clarity. They like to know the rules of the game. They can then decide whether they want to opt in and work towards achieving success.

Different people respond in different ways in such cultures. Some wait for clarity to appear. Some play safe and retreat into their own worlds. Some decide to move on and find a more predictable situation.

There are few pluses in such a culture but quite a few minuses. The leaders and other key people in the culture may have good intentions but their behaviour can cause confusion. This can create problems for people.

Can you think of a time when you experienced such a culture? What effect did it have on you? How did you try to maintain your health? What were your coping strategies? What did you learn from the experience?

The Callous Culture

Some leaders build callous cultures where they pursue their own agendas and are oblivious to the needs of others. They may aim to hit certain targets by aiming to exploit or control people.

Some may be cruel in the way they behave, treat people or implement policies. They may also get a kick from using their power in a way that hurts other people.

Some leaders enjoy being bullies. Believing they are superior to others, they scapegoat people who are different. Such people may also enjoy spreading fear and hate.

Some people may also be addicted to anger and conflict. They try to make themselves look big by belittling others. They make sure that they win and that other people lose.

There are few pluses to such an approach. Individuals may respond to threats by working harder in the short term but this is unsustainable in the long term. The minuses including spreading pain and creating other collateral damage.

Looking back, have you ever been in such a culture? How did the key people demonstrate their callousness? What effect did this have on you and other people?

How did you manage to deal with the culture? Was there a point when you decided to move on? If so, what was the trigger that led to you making this decision? What were the lessons you learned from the experience?

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a culture that you would like to help to build in a certain place? You may want to create this in a family, team, organisation or another place.

What is the kind of culture you would like to help to build? You may, for example, want to combine elements of the caring, consistent and creative approaches. If so, you may want to explore the following themes.

How can you create a caring environment? How can you maintain consistency by giving clear messages about the desired standards? How can you encourage people to channel their creativity towards achieving a compelling goal?

Imagine that you are clear about how to build such a culture. What may happen as a result of taking those steps? How can you build on the pluses and manage any potential minuses when helping to build such a culture?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Culture Approach

The specific kind of culture that I would like to help to build in a family, team, organisation or another place is:

*

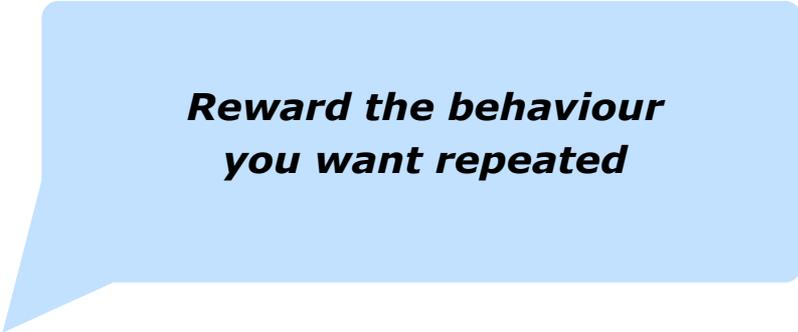

The specific things I can do to help to build this kind of culture in that place are:

*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and manage any minuses when building that culture are:

*

The Rewarding The Behaviour You Want Repeated Approach

Reward the behaviour
you want repeated

There are many ways to build successful cultures. One approach is to reward the behaviour you want repeated. This is a principle that applies when encouraging people in a team, organisation or the wider society.

Imagine that you have been given the mandate to lead an organisation that aims to shift its culture and achieve success.

You may want to communicate the guidelines that people can follow to reach the goals. These need to be specific rather than woolly statements. It is also useful to outline the reasons for following these guidelines.

Good leaders recognise that the carrot is mightier than the stick as a means of encouraging people to achieve peak performance.

Such leaders also act quickly, however, if some people choose not to opt in. So after communicating the guidelines:

They reward the behaviour the organisation wants repeated;

They act decisively regarding behaviour the organisation does not want repeated;

They do whatever is required to guide the organisation to success.

Imagine that you are aiming to encourage people to follow certain guidelines. You may want to consider taking some of the following steps.

You can communicate the behaviour people can demonstrate the help the the organisation to achieve success

Good leaders give clear messages about how they expect people to behave. They also give the reasons for these professional standards. Such leaders often start by taking the following steps:

They clarify the behaviour that people need to demonstrate to help the organisation to achieve success;

They clarify the reasons why it is important for people to follow these guidelines.

People are more likely to opt in if they see the reasons for behaving in certain ways. Some people may choose not to opt in, of course, but that will produce consequences.

Good leaders outline the guidelines – The Dos – that people can follow to reach the goal. For example, it may be important for people to do the following things:

To have a positive attitude and take responsibility;

To make clear working contracts about their contributions towards achieving the organisation's goals;

To perform superb work, find solutions to challenges and encourage other people;

To keep others up-to-date with how they are progressing towards achieving the goals;

To do whatever is required to ensure the organisation reaches its goals.

The Don'ts will probably be the reverse side of these behaviours.

Let's assume you are clear on the guidelines you would like people to follow. You can then aim to do three things.

To be a positive model – because people learn from what you do not what you say;

To communicate the guidelines that people can follow to help the organisation to achieve success;

To explain the reasons why it is important for people to follow these guidelines;

Imagine you are a leader who wants to set the tone in an organisation. Try completing the following exercises.

Building A Successful Organisation

The Dos – the guidelines – we want people follow to help the organisation to achieve success are these:

*

*

*

*

*

The reasons why we would like people to follow these guidelines are:

*

*

*

*

*

You can continue to reward the behaviour you want repeated

Different people encourage others in different ways. You may see somebody doing something well, for example, and have a special word with the person.

Be super specific about the behaviour – or the principles – you want them to repeat. The more specific you are, the more likely people are to repeat the behaviour.

One soccer manager spent time with one of his attackers at half time, for example, and described the specific things the player was doing well. He said:

"The way you beat their full back three times in the first half was excellent. You dummed to move inside, but then changed direction to go down the right wing and put in dangerous crosses.

"I want you to keep doing that in the second half. It's up to you how you beat the full back. But I want you to get to the by-line and put in as many crosses as possible."

The manager then checked with the player: a) if he had understood the message; b) if it was something he was happy to do. The manager then encouraged the player to keep doing their best.

You can keep sharing success stories

As mentioned elsewhere in this book, it is vital to keep showing people what good looks like. People can then aim to follow these principles to achieve success.

Different organisations use different frameworks for publicising such stories. Here is one approach.

Success Stories

Good leaders keep showing people what good looks like by sharing success stories. They describe:

- The specific situation where people in the organisation did good work and delivered success;
- The specific principles that people followed - and how they translated these into action – to deliver success;
- The specific principles that people in the organisation can continue to follow to deliver success.

You can deal with the behaviour you don't want repeated

How to act when somebody steps over the line? Here are some options.

You can give the person a positive alternative

One approach is to say, for example:

"In the future can you please do (x) rather than (y). The reason is because ..."

This gives the person a positive way forward in the future. It is then up to them which route they want to take.

You can act immediately and practice zero tolerance

Some leaders feel it is vital to do this if a person's behaviour contravenes a team's agreed rules. It is important to never walk past a quality problem, otherwise the leader has said that such behaviour is okay.

You can give the person a warning, outline the consequences of repeating the behaviour and be prepared to follow-through

Many leaders believe that it is moral to give the person another chance. The key is to make sure the person knows that the leader is serious.

Some behaviour can lead to instant dismissal. On other occasions it is more appropriate to outline the professional standards that are required.

Good leaders then follow through. If the person does not meet the professional standards, then they are choosing to move on.

"Reward the behaviour you want repeated," may sound an over-simple philosophy, but it works in many situations. People soon get the message about the desired culture and 'the way we will do things round here'.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Rewarding The Behaviour You Want Repeated Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Managing Your Development Approach

There are many models for shaping your personal and professional development. This section focuses on how you can continue to develop yourself, your relationships and your work.

Some people want to change everything in their lives at once but this seldom works. Taking steps in one area, however, can have a positive effect in other areas. Let's explore how you may want to take some of these steps.

Developing Myself

On a scale 0-10, how would you rate your health and wellbeing? How would you rate your development? How can you maintain or improve the rating?

Different things can trigger a person to focus on their development. One person expressed this in the following way.

"During the last few years I have concentrated on doing well in my work. This has been rewarding but I have neglected other parts of my life.

"My health is suffering and things are not great at home. I want to get my life back on track. I know it impossible to change everything overnight, but have you any suggestions?"

Exploring the options, he chose to improve his health. Like many people who develop positive habits, he started with the physical things. He chose:

To eat healthier food at breakfast and throughout the day ... To walk more than 7,000 steps a day and restart playing five-a-side football ... To relearn how to breathe deeply and feel more relaxed.

Different people focus on different things to develop themselves. They may choose to become fitter, learn a language, develop a new skill, embark on an adventure or do other activities.

Imagine that you may want to take steps to develop yourself. You can then move on to the next theme.

Developing My Relationships

On a scale 0-10, how would you rate the health of your key relationships? How can you continue to encourage people? How can you aim to find win-win solutions to differences?

The person mentioned earlier described his challenges in the following way.

"The most critical area of my life is my relationships. Returning home from work, I sometimes dive straight into my emails rather than take time to talk with the family.

"My son is not academic and is suffering problems at school, so I need to give him more encouragement. I would also like to rebuild relationships with some old friends."

Exploring what he wanted to improve in his relationships, he settled on the following actions:

To create time each evening to talk with his wife ... To encourage his son to focus on what he did best – sports, music and film making – and learn how to manage the more difficult issues at school ... To think before saying something that could be hurtful to another person.

You will have your own approach to developing your relationships. Imagine that you have clarified some of those steps. It may then be useful to focus on the next theme.

Developing My Work

On a scale 0-10, how would you rate the satisfaction you are getting in your work? How can you maintain or improve the rating? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

There are many ways to develop in your work. One approach is to focus on your career goals. This involves exploring the following themes.

You can clarify your career goals

Imagine that you are looking back at the end of your professional career. What would you like to have achieved by then? Here are some of the things that people mention when exploring this theme.

My Career Goals - Looking back at the end of my career, I would have liked:

To have done satisfying work ... To have used my strengths to help other people achieve success ... To have earned a salary that has helped us to have a good lifestyle.

To have been a good educator ... To have helped many students to develop their talents ... To have provided them with skills they can use to shape a positive future.

To have built several pioneering organisations that have shown people a better way ... To have created positive environments that have helped people to grow ... To have done work that helped people or the planet.

Imagine that you can clarify some of your own career goals. It may then be useful to explore the next step.

You can clarify the steps you can take towards your career goals

People like to feel in control. They also like to have a sense of purpose, follow their principles and work towards their picture of success. Bearing this in mind, you may want to continue to take the following steps:

To build on your strengths and do satisfying work;

To encourage yourself and other people in your work;

To do something each day towards your career goals.

If appropriate, you can clarify the steps you can take to follow these principles. One approach is to do something practical early each day that delivers a quick success. You may then feel more in charge of the day.

There are many models for development. This piece has focused on how you can continue to develop yourself, your relationships and your work.

Imagine that you may want to follow elements of this approach. How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on these themes. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing My Development

The specific things I may want to do to develop myself, my relationships or my work are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate some of these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

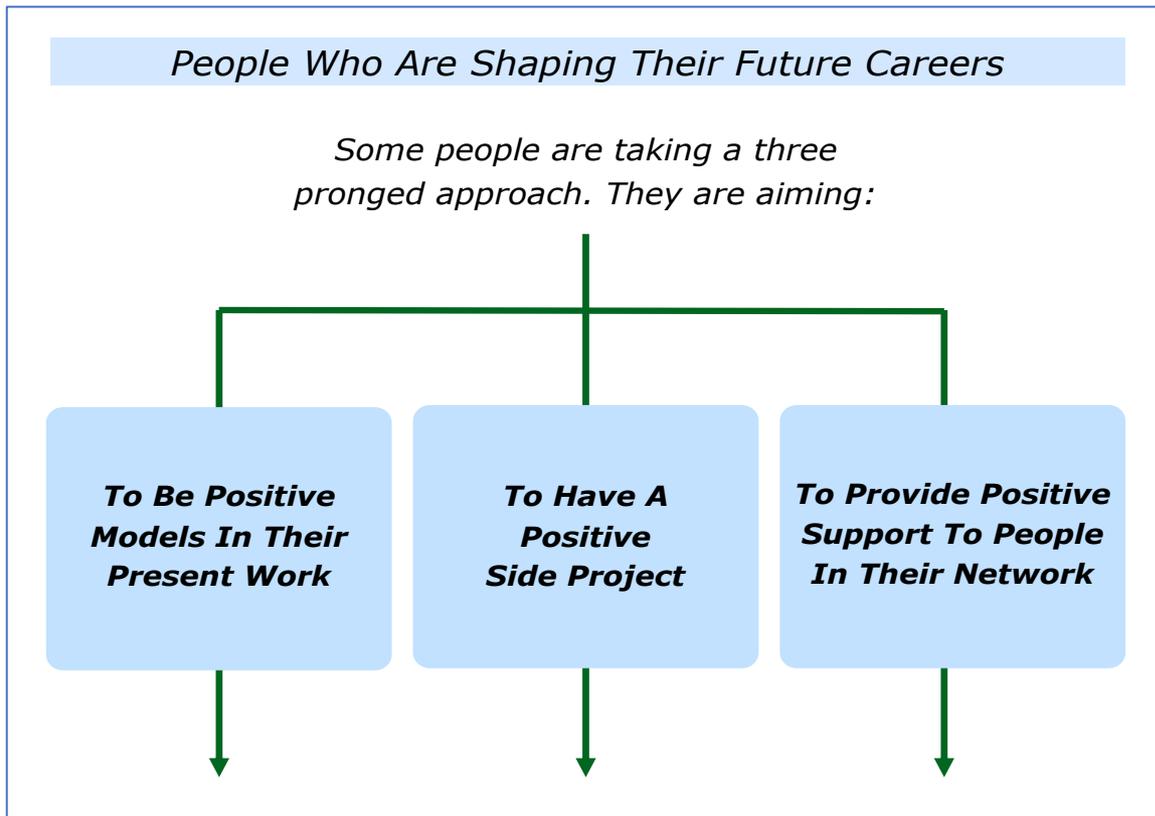

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Three Pronged Approach To Shaping Your Future Career

Different people shape their careers in different ways. This piece describes an approach that is being followed by some people who have relatively senior positions in companies.

Such people may have good jobs but they recognise the world of work is evolving. Their organisation could be affected by changes in the market, be taken over or encounter other challenges.

Bearing this in mind, they are taking a three pronged approach to shaping their futures. Let's explore these themes.

They are being positive models in their present work

Such people aim to continue be positive models in their present role. They believe this to be the moral approach because the company they are working for is paying their wages. They aim:

To be professional and continue to make their best contribution to helping their company to achieve success;

To perform superb work that provides wins for their company, wins for their customers and wins for their colleagues;

To create a positive environment that enables motivated people to perform at their best and shape their future careers.

Being good professionals, they do their best to help the organisation to achieve success. They realise that things can change quickly, however, so they are also exploring the next theme.

They are pursuing a positive side project

Such people may also be doing a positive side project. They may be developing an App, having their own web site, starting a side business or doing another activity. They make sure, however, that this does not clash with their present full-time role.

Some people see this side project as play pen that gives them positive energy. Some see it as a place where they can share knowledge. Some see it as a potential shop window. Some see it a potential source of income.

Sometimes this can lead to their work getting noticed and, in some cases, lead to them being hired or developing a new career. Several people I have worked with found this approach bore fruit.

One person wrote a regular blog that showed how people could use their company's technology in ways that simplified their lives. This led to them being asked to become the company's storyteller.

One young football coach produced articles that highlighted modern trends in football academies. This led to them getting a full-time role travelling the world passing on knowledge in this field.

One person started a side business pioneering new forms of marketing on the web. They then handed it over to a full-time managing director who built the business. This led to them getting a regular income.

One person created a website that focused on how to provide digital security in a fast changing world. This led to them getting hired by a government to provide specialist knowledge in this area.

People who develop a side project may start it as a place where they can focus on topics they find fascinating. Sometimes this can grow, however, and provide a platform for shaping their future career.

Some people also pursue the following theme. They see this as a way of helping other people.

They are providing positive support to people in their network

Such people enjoy giving to other people. They enjoy being generous, passing on knowledge and helping people to work towards their personal or professional goals.

They love to encourage people. Sometimes this stems from them being helped by people in their own lives. They often believe in the following approach to networking:

Real networking is about helping other people to succeed. It is not about self-promotion.

Such people are not necessarily looking for anything in return. But there may be times in the future, however, when the karma works and leads to potential possibilities.

Imagine you want to follow elements of the three pronged approach in your own way. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Shaping My Career

The specific ways in which I may want to follow elements of the three pronged approach to shaping my career may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Finishing Successfully Approach

Finishing

One approach is to take the following steps.

Focus: You can focus on something you want to finish.

Follow: You can follow your successful pattern for finishing.

Finish: You can do your best to finish successfully.

Finishing is a key skill in life. But sometimes we are not taught how to finish things successfully. This can apply to finishing tasks, projects and even relationships. There are, however, many ways to finish things.

One approach is to take the following steps. First, to focus on something you want to finish. Second, to follow your successful pattern for finishing. Third, to do your best to finish successfully. Let's explore how this can be translated into action.

Focus

The first step is to focus on doing something you want to finish. There are several things to bear in mind when taking this step.

Great workers often focus on the specific activities where they have a good track record of finishing. They may demonstrate this when doing certain things in their personal or professional life.

Such workers may then choose to put themselves into more of these situations. This can increase the likelihood of them maintaining their good track record of finishing. They may also sometimes aim to follow their successful pattern for finishing when doing other activities.

Such workers also consider certain factors before, for example, doing a piece of work. These include exploring the following steps.

They clarify whether they really want to finish the piece of work

Good finishers choose to be selective to be effective. They may start lots of things but only finish certain projects. It is impossible to complete everything in life. Sometimes they make a conscious decision and - providing they accept the consequences - it is okay for them to say:

"I don't want to finish it."

Good finishers focus on the things they want to complete. How they aim to do this depends on what they want to finish properly.

They clarify what they can control and the chances of finishing the work successfully

Such workers do a reality check. Bearing in mind the things they can control in the situation, they rate the chances of being able to finish the work successfully. They are looking for at least a 7+/10 rating. They then focus on the specific things they can do to increase the rating.

They clarify their strategy for doing their best to finish the work successfully Great workers aim to clarify: a) the real results to achieve; b) the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success; c) the support required along the way. They then focus on their action plan for doing the work.

Imagine that you have explored these themes. You have moved into action, followed your strategies and performed superb work. You may then be ready to finish the job. This can involve focusing on the next stage.

Following Your Successful Pattern For Finishing

How to take this step? One approach is to look back at some of the things you have finished successfully.

Some of these may be tangible things. You may have worked to pass an exam, get your driving licence, become healthier, complete a project, overcome a setback or tackle a challenge successfully.

Some of these may be less tangible but also significant. You may have given specific encouragement to a person, helped students to find work they enjoy, found win-win solutions to a conflict or ended a relationship in a relatively good way.

Looking back, what did you do right to finish some of these things successfully? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? What happened as a result?

What may be your successful pattern for finishing? What were the principles you followed for finishing some of the tangible things successfully? What were those you followed for managing the emotional things in, as far as possible, a positive way?

Looking ahead, what may be some of the principles you can follow in the future? You may need to add some other skills, of course, but following these principles may help you to finish things successfully.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Finishing Successfully

The First Example

The specific time when I finished something successfully was:

*

*The specific things I did right then
– the principles I followed -
to finish it successfully were:*

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Finishing Successfully

The Second Example

The specific time when I finished something successfully was:

*

*The specific things I did right then
– the principles I followed -
to finish it successfully were:*

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

My Successful Pattern For Finishing

Looking at these examples, some of the principles I follow to finish successfully are:

*

*

*

Finishing In The Future

The specific things I can do to follow these principles – plus add other skills – to finish things successfully in the future are:

*

*

*

Different people describe different themes regarding their successful pattern for finishing. Here are some that individuals mention when describing their approach.

My Successful Pattern For Finishing Is:

To decide if I really want to finish something ... To consider the pluses and minuses involved in doing the work ... To clarify the strategy I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success.

To set aside blocks of time to do the work ... To set myself achievable goals each session ... To follow good habits ... To get some successes along the way ... To reach my goal for the session.

To keep reminding myself of the benefits ... To encourage myself on the journey ... To find solutions to challenges ... To relax before the final push ... To do my best to finish properly.

Imagine you have are following your successful pattern. You will then aim to complete the next stage.

Finish

Great workers do their best to finish successfully. They do this whether they are running a counselling session, playing a sport, performing in a play, leading a team, vaccinating people against a virus or doing another activity.

Sometimes individuals, teams and organisations are tempted to declare victory too early. They become complacent, lose their sense of urgency or fall into bad habits. This can have negative consequences of themselves and other people.

Great workers bear this in mind and keep following good habits. They keep doing the basics and, when appropriate, add the brilliance. They never declare victory too early.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of something you want to finish? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you focus fully on the task? How can you clarify the strategies you want to pursue? How can you do superb work? How can you follow your successful pattern for finishing? How can you do your best to finish successfully?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Finishing Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

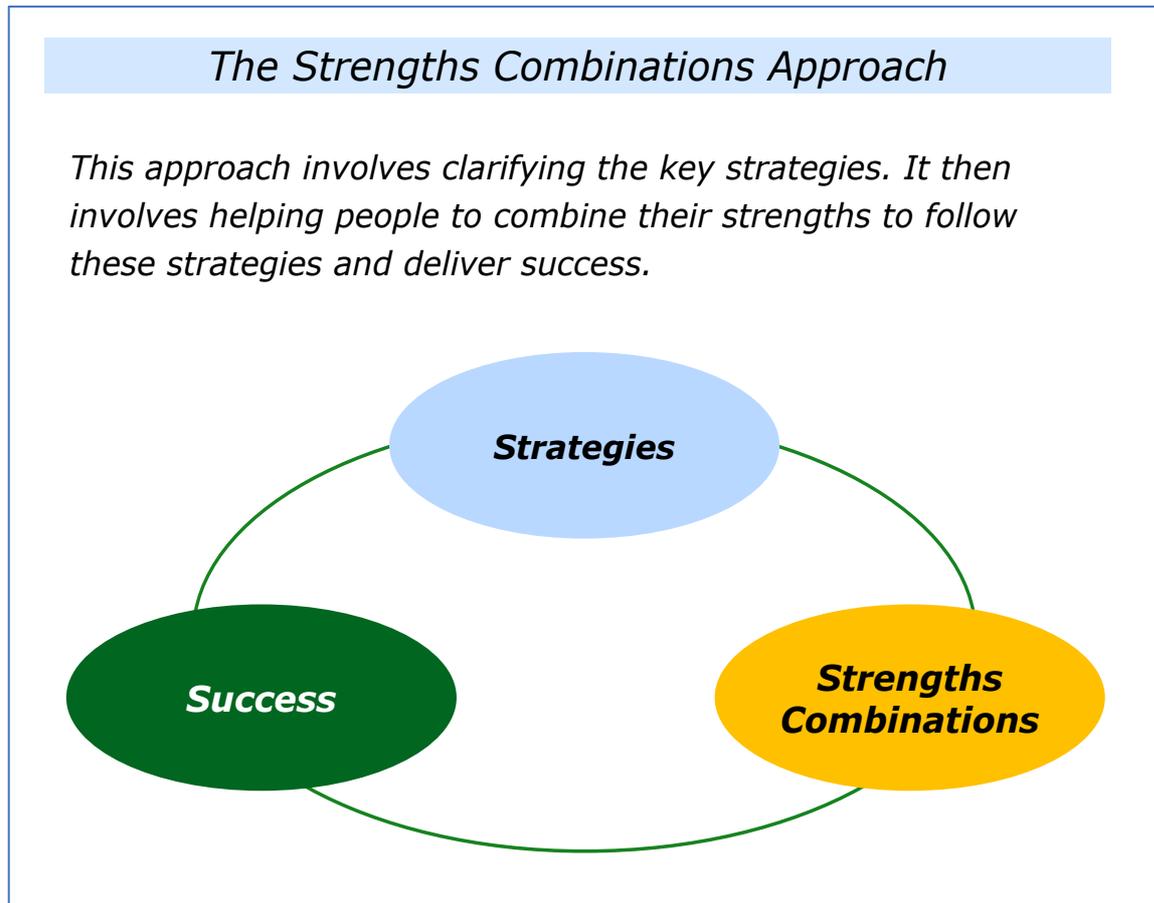

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Strengths Combinations Approach

Great teams clarify the strategies they want to follow. They then coordinate people's strengths to achieve their goals.

Such teams go beyond focusing on each person's contribution. They build combinations of people who do superb work to achieve the picture of success.

The strengths combinations approach can be used when working with pairs, trios, teams and larger groups. It can be applied in sports, music, creative projects and other fields.

Great teams bear several things in mind when taking this approach. They recognise that it is vital:

To have leaders and coordinators who know how to lead such teams;

To have a clear strategy for achieving a compelling picture of success;

To have people with the right spirit and strengths required to achieve the picture of success.

Different teams apply this approach in different ways. Let's explore how it can be translated into action.

Setting Up The Team To Succeed

Imagine that you aim to lead a team to achieve a certain goal. The first step will be to set-up things to succeed rather than fail.

Great teams take this step whether planning to climb a mountain, lead a team or do another project. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, they often take the following steps.

They clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

They clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

They get the right resources – such as the right people and the right support – required to achieve success.

Imagine that you are clear on: a) the results to achieve; b) the strategies that people can follow to achieve success. The next step will be make sure you have the right people.

Bearing this in mind, you may want to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the kinds of people we want in the team? What is the spirit – the attitude – they need to demonstrate? How can we make sure they demonstrate these characteristics?

What are the strengths we need to achieve the goal? What are the strengths we already have in the team? What are the strengths we need to add?

How can we find people who have these strengths? How can we check their track record of delivering certain results? How can we do our best to select such people?

How can we let them know about: a) the goal we want to achieve; b) the spirit they will need to demonstrate – such as helping others to succeed; c) the specific contribution they may want to make towards achieving the goal?

How can we give people the opportunity to present their potential contributions? When they make these presentations, what are we looking for in terms of: a) the potential personal contributions; b) the potential combinations of people who could make contributions?

Imagine that you have put together your team. Everybody knows the attitude they need to demonstrate. They also say that they want to combine their strengths to achieve the picture of success.

It can then be time to start on the actual work. You can do this by focusing on the following theme.

Strengths Combinations

Great teams clarify the strategies they can follow to achieve their aims. They then coordinate people's strengths to do superb work and achieve the picture of success.

They often start by communicating the picture of success. They then take the following steps.

They make clear contracts with people about how they can use their strengths to make their best contributions;

They sometimes put together combinations of people – pairs, trios or other groups – who can combine their complementary strengths to do superb work;

They clarify whether these people are prepared to combine their strengths to do such work and, if so, they make clear contracts with them about:

a) the specific outcomes to achieve; b) the specific things they can contribute – as individuals and in their units - towards achieving these aims; c) the specific support they need to achieve the outcomes.

Imagine that you are going to meeting with people to clarify their contributions. In this case you may be focusing on how people can combine their strengths to achieve success. Here are some themes to bear in mind when taking these steps.

Strengths Combinations

The following pages outline one approach to clarifying people's best contributions. This approach can be used with individuals, pairs, trios and other combinations of people.

Clarifying The Contributions

This starts by working through the following steps.

Results

You can clarify the real results to achieve - the picture of success

Responsibilities

You can work with people to clarify each person's strengths and, bearing these in mind, the responsibilities they want to take towards achieving the picture of success.

Roles

You can agree on the role that each person and each combination will play. You can then make clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Clear Contracting

Imagine that people have worked through the previous framework. They then complete the following steps.

They make make clear contracts about: a) each person's contribution; b) each combination's contribution.

They also agree on: a) the support people need to deliver the work; b) the specific things people will do to proactively keep others informed about their progress towards the goals.

*The Team's
Picture Of Success*

The real results we want to achieve are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Person A

The role they will play in working towards achieving the picture of success will be:

* To ...

The results they will aim to deliver will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The responsibilities they will aim to cover will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Person B

The role they will play in working towards achieving the picture of success will be:

 To ...*

The results they will aim to deliver will be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The responsibilities they will aim to cover will be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

People In Combination C

The role they will play in working towards achieving the picture of success will be:

 To ...*

The results they will aim to deliver will be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

The responsibilities they will aim to cover will be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

People In Combination D

The role they will play in working towards achieving the picture of success will be:

* To ...

The results they will aim to deliver will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The responsibilities they will aim to cover will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

People In Combination E

The role they will play in working towards achieving the picture of success will be:

* To ...

The results they will aim to deliver will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The responsibilities they will aim to cover will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Support

The specific kinds of support that people need to deliver their parts of the picture of success are:

*

*

*

Progress Reports

The specific things that people will do to proactively keep others informed about their progress towards achieving the goals are:

*

*

*

Great teams ensure that their people rehearse pursuing the agreed strategies. This is particularly vital when people are working in combinations.

Such teams translate the strategies into action plans. They clarify the specific things people can do: a) to follow the strategies; b) to manage any potential challenges.

People keep focusing on these plans until everybody is clear on what they will do in every situation. Sports teams for example, go out onto the practice field. They aim:

To rehearse following the strategies to achieve the picture of success;

To rehearse managing the challenges they may encounter on the road towards achieving the picture of success;

To again rehearse following the strategies to achieve the picture of success.

Great teams often create a stimulating and supportive culture. They aim: a) to provide people with the support they need to do the job; b) to encourage their people to support each other – especially when things get tough.

Such teams employ people who want to help to help their colleagues to achieve success. People who don't follow this approach are replaced by others who want to contribute to the stimulating and supportive culture.

Success

Great teams encourage their people to perform superb work. Such teams also keep doing reality check. They encourage their people:

To keep sharing their progress toward achieving the goals;

To keep focusing on what is working – such as by sharing success stories – and what they can improve in the future;

To keep encouraging themselves and others on the way towards achieving the goals.

Good leaders also spend time with the individuals and combinations of people. Such meetings may have different functions. Here are two examples.

The leader may normally focus on a person's or a combination of people's contribution and any help they need to deliver their part of the picture of success.

The leader may, on other occasions, focus on a person's development and any help they need to shape their future to achieve their professional picture of success.

Great teams build their strengths and manage the consequences of their weaknesses. They also encourage each person and each combination of people to follow this approach. They are then more likely to embody the ethic of continuous improvement.

Such teams go beyond the normal practice of focusing on individuals. They build combinations of people who perform superb work and contribute towards delivering the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation when you may want to use elements of the strengths combinations approach?

You may want to do this when managing a project, leading a team or orchestrating people's talents to achieve a compelling goal? How can you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Strengths Combinations In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Building Positive Leadership Teams Across The Organisation Approach

Good Organisations Build Positive Leadership Teams Across The Organisation

They build positive teams of people that aim: a) to continually follow the organisation's principles; b) to combine their complementary strengths; c) to coordinate their efforts to achieve the organisation's picture of success.

Good organisations encourage their people to focus on the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. Different organisations do this in different ways. Let's look at one approach.

Some organisations build positive leadership teams at senior level and across the organisation. These teams then aim to follow the principles and make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Such leadership teams act as positive models. They are often made up of people who are positive and deliver high professional standards. They also demonstrate the following characteristics:

They continually follow the organisation's principles;

They combine their complementary strengths;

They coordinate their efforts to achieve the organisation's picture of success.

Such teams create an environment in which motivated people can perform superb work. They then ensure the team follows the principles and makes its best contribution to achieving the organisation's goals.

Imagine that you are the CEO of an organisation. How can you ensure that people continually focus on the purpose and follow the organisation's principles?

One approach is to put together good leadership teams at every level of the organisation. They can act as positive models and align their team's work to achieve the picture of success.

Let's consider how to build such teams. When doing so, you can select people who are positive, professional and want to lead teams. They then need to demonstrate the following characteristics.

*People need to continually follow
the organisation's principles*

The team's leaders need to act as positive models. The way they behave will strongly influence the culture in their part of the organisation. Bearing this in mind, they need:

To embody the organisation's principles in their own professional behaviour;

To make decisions by basing these on the organisation's principles and how these can be translated into action in a specific situation;

To encourage their people to keep focusing on the organisation's principles and perform superb work.

Imagine that you are considering appointing a new leader or are focusing on the present leader. Bearing in mind the organisation's principles, you may wish to do the following exercise.

The Principles Theme

The principles the organisation wants people to follow when working to achieve the picture of success are:

*

*

*

The specific things the potential or present leader does to embody the principles in their work are:

*

*

*

The specific rating I would give the person – on a scale 0-10 – of embodying the principles would be:

___ / 10

Imagine that you believe the person you are focusing on embodies many of the principles. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

People need to combine their complementary strengths

Good teams are often made up of people who have complementary strengths. It is common, for example, to have one person who is a visionary and another who is a coordinator. They can then combine their talents to guide the team to success.

One person must be seen to be in charge, of course, and it is important they play to their strengths. They may need to have one or more people around them, however, who compensate for any weaknesses. Tom Rath, an expert on strengths, expressed this in the following way.

Great leaders are not well-rounded but great leadership teams are well-rounded.

Imagine that you are appointing the leader of a team or focusing on the present leader. When doing so, you can aim:

To clarify the specific strengths they have – such as their leadership or management skills – that they can apply when following the principles;

To clarify the complementary strengths they may need to add by getting people who have other leadership or management skills;

To clarify the specific people they may be able to work well with when taking this approach and following the organisation's principles.

It will, of course, be important to work with the potential or present leader when taking these steps. It is also to recognise that teams evolve and you may need to revisit this exercise at various times in the future. Here is an exercise on this theme.

The Complementary Professional Strengths Theme

Person A – The Potential Or Present Leader

The specific strengths they have – such as their leadership or management skills – that they can use when following the principles are

*

*

*

The specific complementary strengths they may need to add by getting people who have other leadership or management skills are:

*

*

*

The specific people they may be able work well with when taking this approach and following the organisation's principles are:

*

*

Imagine that you have put together a leadership team that embodies the principles and have complementary strengths. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

People need to coordinate their efforts to achieve the picture of success

Good organisations encourage each team to align their efforts towards achieving the organisation's goals. They therefore take the following steps. They meet with each leadership team and aim:

To make clear contracts about the team's contribution – the outcomes they will deliver - towards achieving the organisation's picture of success;

To make clear contracts about the support they need to achieve the agreed goals;

To make clear contracts about how the team will proactively keep their stakeholders informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

Imagine that you have made clear contracts with the leadership team about these things. They can then meet together and aim:

To focus on the specific outcomes they are to deliver and translate these into the team's picture of success;

To focus on how they can follow the organisation's principles and coordinate their team's strengths to achieve the picture of success;

To focus on how to communicate this information and make clear contracts about each person's contributions to achieving the picture of success.

Imagine that the leadership team has taken these steps and are ready to communicate their team. Different leaders will do this in different ways. One approach is for the leader to say something along the following lines when communicating with their people.

Welcome To Today's Session.

I am going to start by giving an overview of our organisation's aims. We will then move on to the part that our team and you and individuals can play in contributing to achieve these goals.

Let's start with the big picture. You will be aware of most of these things but it can be helpful to remind ourselves of what we are working towards.

The Organisation's Purpose

The purpose of our organisation is:

 To*

The Organisation's Principles

The key principles we aim to follow to pursue our purpose and perform superb work are:

 To*

 To*

 To*

The Organisation's Picture Of Success

The specific goals that the organisation aims to achieve in the next financial year that will be an expression of our purpose are:

 To*

 To*

 To*

I hope this helps to give the big picture. Bearing this in mind, I now want to focus on how we can align our team's contribution to achieving the organisation's goals.

There are certain things we need to deliver for the organisation and we will share these with you. We have also translated these into our team's picture of success. We can also add other things if you wish.

The Team's Picture Of Success

The specific goals we aim to deliver by the end of the financial year are:

 To*

 To*

 To*

The specific principles we aim to follow – include the strategies, support and actions plans – when working to achieve these goals are:

 To*

 To*

 To*

The specific benefits of achieving these goals – for our organisation, for our customers and for ourselves - will be:

 To*

 To*

 To*

We want you to take time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute. If so, we will then make clear contracts with you about the outcomes you want to deliver towards achieving the team's picture of success.

Imagine that the leaders have gone through these steps. They then make clear contracts with each person about their best contribution to achieving the team's picture of success.

The leadership team coordinates people's efforts to achieve the goals. One approach is:

To encourage people to keep focusing on the outcomes to achieve – the picture of success;

To ensure people proactively report their progress towards achieving their agreed contributions to the picture of success;

To produce success stories that highlight how people have followed the principles to do superb work on the way to the picture of success.

They also proactively keep in touch with their key stakeholders – such as the senior team. They keep them informed about the team's progress towards delivering its agreed goals.

The leadership team continues to focus on the outcomes to achieve. They then ensure the team performs superb work and makes its agreed contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Great organisations aim to build such positive leadership teams across the organisation. They then aim to coordinate these teams and channel their efforts to helping the organisation achieve its picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Building Positive Leadership Teams Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Managing Promotion Requests Approach

Promotion Requests

Imagine you are a manager. At some point you may have a team member who wants to know what they need to do to get promotion. If appropriate, you may aim:

- To describe the specific things that a person would need to do to be considered for such a role;*
- To invite the person to reflect and decide if they would like to work toward doing those things;*
- To underline those things are necessary to be considered for a role rather than guaranteeing they would get it.*

Imagine you are a manager and a team member is pressing you about their promotion prospects. The person may have certain strengths that mean they are a good candidate for a role. There may be other times when a person needs to up their game.

The 'In Order To Be Considered' Approach

When appropriate, one approach is to describe what a person needs to do in order to be considered for a particular role. This does not, of course, guarantee they will get the role.

One manager I worked with used this approach after feeling under pressure from a particularly challenging team member. They explained this in the following way.

"The person is ambitious and at time does good work. But they can also cause problems. They are not good at managing upwards and they sometimes upset their colleagues.

"They keep asking about when they can get promoted. Sometimes they refer to how their friends in the same age group are getting promoted in other companies.

"The company is going through challenging times and I can't guarantee that anybody will get promoted. In the past I have also been caught out by people thinking they will get promotion if they achieve certain things."

Bearing these things in mind, we focused on the kind of script the manager could use to in the situation. Whilst the manager adapted this in their own way, here are the main messages they gave to the person.

"It is good that you are ambitious. In order to be considered for such a position, however, a person would need to do the following things.

"First, they would be good at managing their key stakeholders in the company – such as their manager and other senior managers. These stakeholders would be saying some of the following things.

'The person demonstrates strategic thinking. They see things from the company's point of view rather than just their own. They also proactively keep us informed about their progress towards achieving their part of the company's goals.'

"Second, they would be good at helping their customers to achieve success. These customers would be saying some of the following things.

'The person acts as a true partner and understands our business goals. They provide great service and practical help that enables us to achieve success.'

"Third, they would be well regarded by their colleagues in the company. These colleagues would be saying some of the following things.

'The person is positive and encourages other people in the company. They are good at helping their colleagues and the whole team to achieve success.'

"Let me know if you would like to work towards demonstrating some of these things. This would increase the chances of at some point being considered for such a role."

This is an approach that aims to give a person clear messages about what they need to do to be considered for promotion. There can be several outcomes.

The person reflects and decides to work towards demonstrating these qualities.

If appropriate, the manager and others can help them to work towards achieving these aims. As mentioned, however, this does not guarantee they will get promotion.

The person may choose not to work towards demonstrating these qualities.

It may well be that they choose to make a good contribution in their present role. If they do not perform, however, then there may be the need for another type of conversation.

Another Use Of The 'In Order To Be Considered' Approach

One person applied elements of this approach in reverse. They did this when exploring what they would need to do to be considered for promotion.

At the time they were delivering great work and also doing elements of a more senior role. They wanted to explore the future possibilities.

At the same time, they did not want to back their boss into a corner. Bearing this in mind, they said something along the following lines.

"Looking ahead, I wonder if at some point we could have a chat about my future contribution to the company. As you know, I want to continue to contribute to help us to achieve success.

"Whilst you may not be able to answer, I would like to explore the specific things I need to do to be considered for a particular role in the future.

"Again, this may not be the opportune time. But, if possible, I would like to explore this sometime in the future."

Different people would obviously position such a conversation in different ways. If possible, however, the aim would be to get some indication of the desired behaviours but not to back the boss into a corner.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to use elements of the managing promotion requests approach?

What may be the specific situation? How can you follow this approach in your own way in the situation? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing Promotion Requests

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Giving Tough Messages To A Team Member Approach

The Outcomes Approach

Sometimes you may need to clarify whether a person has the attitude and ability required to deliver certain professional standards. You can then focus on the outcomes that a person in this role is required to deliver. You can aim:

- To clarify whether the person has the potential to deliver the desired outcomes;*
- To clarify whether the person wants to deliver the desired outcomes;*
- To then, if appropriate, clarify the steps the person can take to deliver the desired outcomes*

Imagine you have taken over the leadership role in a team. You are pleased with virtually everybody you have inherited. But one person is falling short of the mark. It is now decision time.

You may need to decide whether or not to persist with the person. If you want to continue working with the person, you will need to give them some clear messages.

You will also give them every opportunity to succeed. Let's explore one approach to taking these steps.

Step One: Clarify whether the person has the potential to deliver the desired outcomes

Start by clarifying what you believe somebody in this role should be delivering. Ask yourself:

What are the specific outcomes that we would like a person in this role to deliver?

These can be outcomes in terms of demonstrating certain professional standards. These may also include behaving in certain ways to customers, colleagues and stakeholders.

What are the actual words that the key stakeholders – such as the leaders, colleagues, customers and others - would be saying about a person who delivers outcomes?

The leaders in the organisation may be saying:

"The person is proactive, sees things from the organisation's point of view – rather than just their own – and keeps us informed."

Their colleagues may be saying:

"The person is positive, make a good contribution during meetings and helps us to succeed."

The customers may be saying:

"The person shows they understand our business, provides great service and takes ownership for solving any issues we have with their organisation."

Move on to clarifying the person's potential. Bearing in mind the outcomes to achieve, ask yourself:

To what extent is the person delivering these results today? How would I rate them on a scale 0 - 10?

What is their potential? Do they have the right attitude and ability to achieve the required results?

Given the right coaching, what rating do I think they can achieve? Can they go beyond 7/10?

Considering your answers, then ask yourself the following questions.

Do I believe the person has the potential – the right attitude and ability - to achieve the required rating?

Do I believe the person is actually more suited to another role - inside or outside the organisation - where they can deliver better performances?

You are looking for the person to achieve at least 7+/10. Otherwise it will be extremely difficult. Based on your answers, decide whether or not you want to help the person to master their particular role.

Morality is crucial. If you want the person to move on, it is vital that you have previously given them a clear message about improving their performance. Otherwise the bad news comes out of the blue, leaving them with little chance to bridge the gaps.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Person's Potential To Deliver The Desired Outcomes

The Person's Name Is:

*

The specific outcomes that we would like a person in this role to deliver are:

*

*

*

The actual words that we would like the key stakeholders to be saying about a person in this role are:

*

*

*

The likelihood of the person being able to deliver these outcomes is:

_____ / 10

The specific things they would need to do to achieve a rating of at least 7+/10 in terms of delivering these desired outcomes are:

*

*

*

Bearing these things in mind, the specific actions I want to take with the person are:

*

*

*

Let's imagine that you decide you want to work with the person on improving their performance. This takes us to the next step.

Step Two: Clarify whether the person wants to deliver the desired outcomes

You may wish to go through the following stages. It is important, of course, to do these in a professional and polite.

Set-up a meeting and position it properly.

Contact the person. Explain that you want to talk about how they can continue to improve their performance. Say it is a session about growing into a role - it is not a 'Goodbye' meeting.

Don't be afraid to say farewell to people, but there is a lot of work that can be done before such an exit.

Create a script that you want to follow – including the messages you want to give the person – and rehearse the meeting.

Before the meeting, be crystal clear on several things. These include the following.

The specific way you want to start the meeting and the atmosphere you want to create.

The specific key messages you want to give the person and how you can, if possible, put these in a positive way.

The specific things you can do to keep returning to the key messages if things get difficult.

You can then mentally rehearse the session. Make sure you are comfortable with knowing how to set the scene, conduct the meeting and, if appropriate, keep returning to the key messages you want to give the person.

Start the meeting by welcoming the person and explaining that you want to do a reality check.

Describe what you plan to cover in the session. Explain that you will explore what the person does well and what they can improve.

You will also share your picture of success regarding what a person in the role can aim to be delivering. You will then invite them to consider the possible options moving forward.

Explain that, while you are aiming for a positive outcome, the session won't always be easy. Some messages may be tough to take on board. Your overall goal is, however, to get wins for both them and the organisation.

Describe the outcomes you would like somebody in this role to be delivering.

Talk about the desired outcomes, because people must have something to aspire to in the future. Do not harangue them with details; otherwise it is easy to get into an argument. Give them clear messages about:

The specific outcomes that a person in this would be delivering would be:

*

*

*

The actual words that we would like the stakeholders – the leaders, colleagues and customers - to be saying about a person in this role would be:

*

*

*

Invite the person to evaluate their own performance in relation to the picture of success and, if appropriate, repeat the reality check.

Invite the person to reflect for a moment. Ask them:

"On a scale 0 - 10, how would you presently rate yourself in terms of delivering the required results?"

"What do you think you can do to maintain or improve the scores?"

Invite them to evaluate their own performance. Listen carefully. Ask for examples where appropriate. If it is helpful, give positive but honest feedback regarding their successes.

But there may be hard news to deliver, so communicate this by moving on to the next stage.

If appropriate, repeat again the outcomes that a person in this can aim to be delivering. If the person has rated their performance as 8/10 in a weak area, for example, you may want to say something like the following.

"Is it okay if I share some information? I am doing this in terms of a reality check. It may be a bit difficult to take on board, but that is up to you."

"I am sharing it because I want to help you to succeed. So is it okay if I share the information?"

Wait for the person to say it is okay. Why? You are making a psychological contract with them. If the person does not want to hear the tough news – or wants to argue – that is their choice. As the old saying goes:

'The person must have the will before they can learn the skill.'

Let's assume the person says that they are willing to listen to the reality check. You may then want to say something along the following lines.

"Looking at the big picture, I see that in this particular area ___ you give yourself 8/10. Now comes the tough message. Unfortunately this is an area where several key stakeholders have given you 4/10.

"The specific positive things you would need to do to get at least 7+/10 would be: a) To ... b) To ... c) To ...

"I would like you to take some time to consider if you want to do some of these things. If so, we can look at how to make them happen.

"I can give you more information about the specific things you would need to do to achieve the scores. But I am not getting into arguments.

"I am sharing this to give you the chance to look at how you can continue to develop as a professional in your work. It is up to you how you want to use the information."

If appropriate, consider taking a time out at this point. Before doing so, however, explain that they can choose their way forward.

Invite the person to take time to reflect on the possible ways forward. For example, you can meet in two days to explore the options. (You do not have to adjourn for such a long time. A short break for ten minutes might also do the trick.)

Why take a time out? If the tough news is unexpected, a person may get stuck in denial. Don't get locked in arguments about details. Give them time to lick their wounds.

The aim is for them to take ownership for deciding their future route. Explain that they do have choices and each one has consequences. For example:

They can ignore the reality check.

They can argue about details, say you are wrong and seek another opinion.

They can go through the motions of taking the ideas on board but continue as before.

They can create a plan for focusing on the role and achieving an agreed performance rating.

They can explore other options in the business. For example, there may be roles where they are more likely to achieve 8+/10.

Let's imagine the person returns saying:

"I want to try to deliver the required results."

Step Three: Clarify the steps the person can take to deliver the desired outcomes

One approach is to begin by inviting them to create a Coaching Contract. This described elsewhere in the book, but here are the themes. The person should describe:

The specific goals they want to achieve;

The specific things they see as their responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals;

The specific kinds of help they would like in working towards achieving the goals;

The specific action plan they want to follow to work towards achieving their goals.

You can then work with the person to encourage and enable them to reach the agreed goals. When doing this, it can be useful:

To make clear contracts with the person to make sure they really want to do their best to achieve the desired outcomes;

To meet regularly and for the person to describe: a) the specific things they are doing well; b) the specific things they can do better and how;

To continue to work with them to help them to achieve goals – but only if they are doing their best to deliver the desired outcomes.

What if the person does not fulfil their responsibilities? There is no point in haranguing them. If appropriate, you can have a session where you aim:

To ask if they still want to work towards achieving the desired outcomes;

To, if they want to, then invite them to again describe their responsibilities and the help they would like;

To invite them to describe the specific quick successes they aim to achieve on the way towards delivering the outcomes.

How often to have this kind of session? My own approach has been to do it a maximum of two times, but you will have your own view.

Finally - Some Things To Bear In Mind

Providing the person has the right attitude and ability, they may be able to deliver the required professional standards. But what if they are not successful? They may decide to leave or you may decide they will never achieve beyond 6/10.

If so, help the person to move onto other things, inside or outside the organisation. Looking back at your work together, however, you will have acted in a moral way and given them a good opportunity to succeed.

Good leaders keep such discussions in perspective. They know that their mission is to ensure the team achieves its picture of success. It is not to spend all their time trying to persuade people to change. They continue:

To communicate the team's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To invite people to make clear contracts about how they want to contribute towards achieving the picture of success.

To do whatever is required to ensure the team achieve the picture of success.

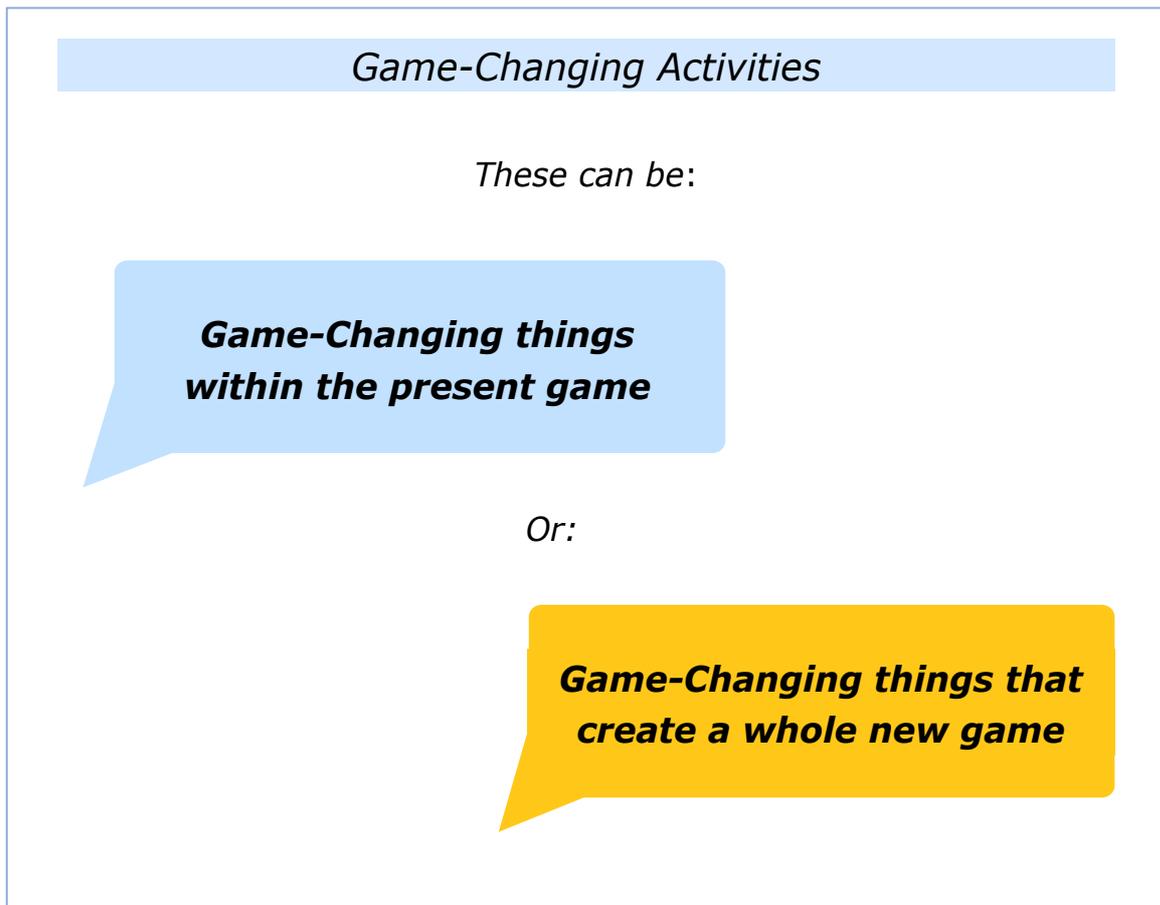

Leaders also have a limited amount of energy. Much of this should go on encouraging the positive people in the team. These are the people who will continue to play a huge part in helping the team to achieve its goals.

Bearing this in mind, how much time can you spend coaching the poorer performers in an intensive way?

Good leaders spend 90%+ of their time focusing on the people who want to be professional and deliver peak performance. But they also give others the chance to deliver the required professional standards.

They always have a back-up plan, however, and build a queue of people who want to join. This gives them the ability to make changes when they want to improve the team.

The Game-Changing Approach

Some individuals, teams and organisations do things or experience events that can be game-changing. These can have profound effects on aspects of their personal or professional lives.

There are several definitions for game-changing. These often refer to 'something that changes things in a big way'. Here are some definitions:

A person, idea, invention or process that has a profound effect on what is happening;

A new element or factor that changes an existing situation or activity in a significant way;

A paradigm that shows people a new way of looking at the world and can lead to positive results.

There are different kinds of game-changing activities. Some can have a more far-reaching effect than others. Let's explore these themes.

Game-Changing Activities Within The Present Game

The term game-changing is often used in the context of sport. It refers to a player who does something exceptional that changes the course of a game.

The term is now also used to describe a person, team or organisation that does certain kinds of work in a particular field. The work they do has a profound effect on the results that are achieved.

Some people do such work by following the normal rules of operating in a particular field. The work they do is exceptional, however, and enables them, their team or their organisation to deliver great results.

Some teams have people who do the following kinds of work. They may: a) do the groundwork; b) do good work; c) do game-changing work.

Such teams make sure everybody contributes to the groundwork and good work. They seldom employ people who just hang around to do the occasional game-changing work.

As mentioned earlier, such exceptional work often builds on the existing model. It moves the performance closer to 10/10 within the present approach to achieving results.

There may be some kinds of work or events, however, that move people into another dimension. Let's explore this approach.

Game-Changing Activities That Create A Whole New Game

Some people, teams or organisations may do exceptional work or experience events that follow fresh rules. These can create a whole new game.

This can happen on a personal front. A person may experience a life-changing event. This could be an illness, injury, divorce or other transition that can have a profound effect on their future.

This can happen on a professional front. A person, team or organisation may develop an invention, service or product that has a great effect. This can change people's way of operating or create a whole new game.

Some external events – such as pandemics, wars or climate change – can create new conditions. Some inventions – such as the internet – can create new rules for working in certain fields.

Some people, teams and organisations anticipate or respond well to such events. Some ignore what is happening and continue with their old ways of operating.

Some people help others to see or manage things that may be game-changing. Some educators, therapists or mentors, for example, may aim:

To offer people a new paradigm – a new way of looking at the world - and practical tools that enable them to achieve positive results.

Such an approach can offer people insights, knowledge and practical tools they can use in their lives and work. They can then, if they wish, apply these to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may apply some elements of the game-changing approach?

You may do this in your own life when dealing with a challenge or aiming to achieve success. You may do it when helping other people to deal with or maximise the challenges of a game-changing event.

What may be the specific situation? How could you apply elements of this approach in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

The Game-Changing Approach

The specific situation where I may apply elements of the game-changing approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to apply elements of the approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Game Plan Approach

Good leaders often focus on providing clarity. They recognise that their people like to know there is a positive and practical plan for achieving certain goals.

Such leaders sometimes use the game plan approach. They explain to their people: a) the goals to achieve; b) the guidelines to follow; c) the steps people can take to do great work.

They then invite people to decide if they want to follow this approach. If so, they make clear contracts with people about their contributions towards achieving the goals.

Good leaders may take this approach when focusing on how the team can achieve certain goals. They clarify the strategies the team can follow to give itself the greatest chance of success.

They then do their due diligence. They clarify how to translate the strategies into action and also stress test these to manage any potential challenges. They then translate the strategies into a clear action plan.

Good leaders communicate the game plan to their people. They make sure it is believable and bring it to life by giving concrete examples that resonate with people.

Different leaders communicate the game plan in different ways. Some adapt the following framework in their own way. They gather people together and describe the following themes.

The Game Plan

The specific things we can do to follow the guidelines and do great work to do our best to achieve the goals.

Goals

The specific goals we want to do our best to achieve are:

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

Guidelines

The specific guidelines we want to follow to achieve the goals are:

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

Great Work

The specific steps we want to take to do great work and do our best to achieve the goals are:

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

* To ...

For example: To ... To ... To ...

Good leaders aim to give people the big picture and show there is a practical plan for achieving positive results. They then make clear contracts with people about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Game Plan Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be

*

*

*

The Successful Prototypes Approach

Successful Prototypes

There are many ways to help people, organisations and societies to develop. One approach is:

To follow certain principles and build a successful prototype;

To share the principles by producing success stories;

To encourage people to follow these principles to scale the success.

There are many ways to help people, organisations and societies to develop. One approach is to remember that:

People buy success rather than the theory of success.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to demonstrate success. When appropriate, this can involve aiming:

To follow certain principles and build successful prototypes;

To share the principles by producing success stories;

To encourage people to follow the principles in order to scale the success.

This is an approach I was taught early in my career. At the time a lot of the work involved change programmes. The real aim, however, was:
To help people, teams or organisations to achieve their picture of success.

Bearing this in mind, we aimed: a) to study what worked; b) to show what worked; c) to share what worked. It was then up to people to decide whether they wanted:

To follow these principles in their own ways;

To work towards achieving their picture of success.

It was important to show people what worked and the benefits. They could then decide if they wanted to follow the principles.

When appropriate, we then worked alongside these people. The aim was to encourage, educate and enable them to achieve their picture of success.

Imagine that you want to follow the building prototypes approach in your own way. You may be aiming to show how it is possible for people:

*To have an inspiring education ... To provide great service to customers ...
To solve a specific problem ... To build a positive organisation ... To do certain projects that show how people in society to achieve success.*

Let's assume you have chosen to build a certain kind of prototype. It can then be time to move into action.

You can follow certain principles and build a successful prototype

People who build successful prototypes often follow certain rules. Here are some you may want to bear in mind when doing your chosen work.

You can clarify the principles you want to follow to build the successful prototype

People who build prototypes often want to demonstrate that it is possible to follow certain principles to deliver success. Here are some examples.

An educator may aim to show it is possible to follow certain principles to help students to learn.

A business person may aim to show it is possible to follow certain principles to create a new form of banking.

A leader may aim to show it is possible to follow certain principles to build a successful company.

Imagine that you have an idea about the kind of prototype you want to build. You can also begin to focus on:

The specific principles you want to follow when building the prototype;

The specific ways these can be translated into action to deliver success;

The specific benefits of building such a successful prototype.

Let's assume that you have done some initial work on these themes. It will then be time to focus on the next step.

You can clarify the picture of success

Imagine that you aim to build a prototype. You may aim to build a certain kind of school, shop, service, product or achieve another goal. Bearing in mind the principles you aim to follow, it can be useful:

To clarify the things you can control in the situation;

To clarify the real results you want to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the actual words that you would like the various stakeholders to be saying about the successful prototype.

These were the steps taken by Kate, a customer service director, that I worked with many years ago. Hired by a famous financial organisation, she was given a clear remit. This involved aiming:

To create the new kind of call centre on a green field site;

To employ people who had a good customer service ethic;

To create a positive environment in which they could do superb work;

To build a reputation for great customer service whilst also hitting its financial targets;

To create a model that could be followed by other parts of the business and enable the organisation to achieve ongoing success.

Imagine that you have clarified the results you want to achieve by building the successful prototype. It can then be useful to focus on the following step.

You can do your best to set things up to succeed

Sometimes this it is relatively easy to take this step. Looking at the work done by Kate, for example, she had the following advantages:

She was hired to create the call centre and was given the required backing;

She made clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the results to achieve – the picture of success;

She had the authority to do what was required to deliver success.

Sometimes this process can be more challenging. Bearing this in mind, let's look at another approach to setting things up to succeed.

Imagine that you want to build a prototype to demonstrate a new way of working. This may aim to provide wins for the company, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues. Let's explore how to make this happen.

You can start by getting backing from the key stakeholders. It will be important:

To show how the approach will benefit the company;

To make clear contracts about the agreed picture of success;

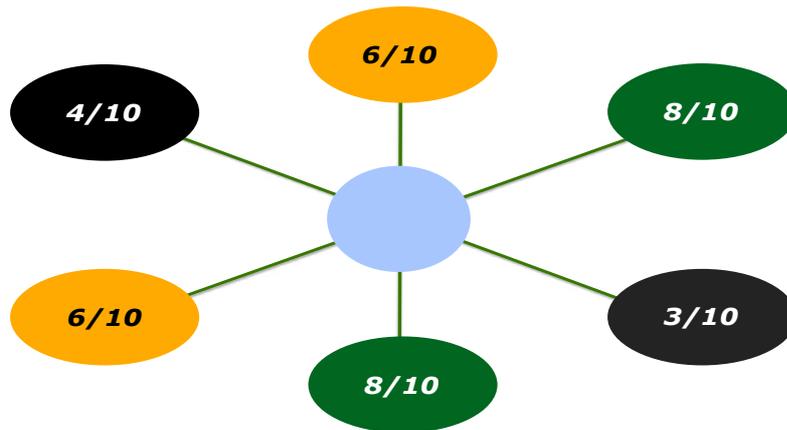

To set things up to increase the chances of delivering success.

This final point is crucial. Imagine you work for a global business. Looking around the organisation, identify where you would stand a good chance of building a successful prototype.

This could be a green field site, team, department or country where there is fertile ground. Make sure the rating is at least a 7+/10 chance of success. You can then focus on this particular area and do everything possible to set things up to succeed.

Building Successful Prototypes

Begin by looking at the various opportunities and rate the chances of success. Rate these on a scale 0 – 10. Build on where there is positive energy and then deliver success stories.

Let's assume that you have gone through these steps. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can build the successful prototype

You can do your best to build the successful prototype. Much will depend, of course, on the type of work you are doing. Looking at my own work, I have cooperated with people who have aimed:

To create a successful therapy programme ... To develop a wellbeing programme inside a company ... To build a superb call centre ... To build a pacesetting digital company ... To build many other kinds of prototypes.

You will build the prototype in your own way. Bearing this in mind, however, you may want to consider some of the following steps. You can aim:

To implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way;

To get some early wins, encourage people on the journey and do superb work;

To find solutions to challenges and do your best to deliver the desired picture of success.

Kate took these steps when creating the call centre. She communicated the call centre's purpose, principles and picture of success. She then recruited people who loved helping customers. They were positive, professional and problem solvers.

Kate made clear contracts with people about their best contributions towards achieving the goals. She then managed by outcomes rather than by tasks. She kept people informed about the progress being made.

Gathering the teams together every months, she encouraged them to focus on:

The Picture Of Success. The specific results we are aiming to deliver are:

*

*

*

Doing Well. The specific things that we are doing well – and how we can do more of these things – to deliver the results are:

*

*

*

Can Do Better. The specific things we can do better – and how – to deliver the results are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you have built a successful prototype. Some people finish at this point but others go further. Let's explore this next possible step.

You can share the principles by producing success stories

Great workers often pass on their knowledge to other people. They do this in education, medicine, science and many other fields. They aim to share what worked and what can be improved in the future.

Imagine that you want to do this in your own way. There are many ways to produce success stories. You may do this by writing an article, creating a video or using another media. Here is one approach.

Success Stories

You can produce a success story that highlights the principles that people followed to build the successful prototype. One approach is to describe:

- The specific situation where people built the successful prototype and the specific results that were delivered;*
- The specific principles that people followed - and how they translated these into action - to deliver success;*
- The specific things that went well and what could be improved to follow these principles and deliver success in the future.*

There are several points to bear in mind when producing such a story. But you can cover these in your own way.

First, it is important to set the scene and give the context. You may have been tackling a challenge, creating a product or do another activity that could help the organisation to shape a positive future.

Second, to focus on the principles that people followed to deliver success. This helps to increase the likelihood of others following these principles in their own ways.

Third, to be humble. This involves giving other people the credit for doing the work. It also involves focusing on what went well and what could be improved in the future.

Imagine that you have produced such a success story. If appropriate, you may want to move on to the next stage.

You can encourage people to follow these principles to scale success

Many leaders will support the idea of building successful prototypes. Some then ask the following question:

"How can you scale the approach? How can you get people to learn from the prototypes and apply the ideas to deliver ongoing success?"

Great organisations are often principles driven rather than personality driven. They may be founded by people who have strong personalities but this can be hard to scale.

Great organisations encourage their employees to follow certain principles. People can then use their personalities to translate the principles into action, scale the work and deliver success.

Different organisations take this steps in different ways. Some follow the three waves approach. This involves going through the following stages.

The First Wave

This is to follow certain principles to build successful prototypes and produce success stories.

The Second Wave

This is to encourage motivated people who want to follow the principles and to enable them to deliver success.

The Third Wave

This is to make the principles mandatory and provide people with the support they need to deliver ongoing success.

Different people build different kinds of prototypes. Sometimes the lessons they provide are followed by other people in an organisation. Sometimes the lessons are put aside and not used.

Sometimes the lessons are picked up by other people in other places. They follow the rule that sometimes it is better to go second. Such people then apply the learning in their own ways to deliver success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the building successful prototypes approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Successful Prototype Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The People Buy Success Rather Than Change Approach

People Buy Success Rather Than Change

This is an approach that enables people to achieve success. It is to show the benefits of achieving a goal rather than focus on change. You can aim:

- To show people the potential options for going forwards and the benefits of achieving a certain picture of success;*
- To show people the principles they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving the picture of success;*
- To invite people to decide if they want to follow these principles and, if so, to help them to achieve the picture of success.*

This is an approach that I have used many times with individuals, teams and organisations. It involves helping people to focus on the benefits of achieving a goal rather than saying they have to change.

So-called change programmes seldom work. They also run the risk of telling people: a) that what they have done so far in their lives has little value; b) that people will find it challenging to change.

Another approach is to encourage people to focus on the goals to achieve. The paradox is that, if people achieve their aims, sometimes others consider that people have changed.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. You may aim to do this when working with an individual, team or organisation. If appropriate, you can aim:

To show people the potential options for going forwards and the benefits of achieving a certain picture of success;

To show people the principles they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving the picture of success;

To invite people to decide if they want to follow these principles and, if so, to help them to achieve the picture of success.

The aim is to focus on the carrot – the benefits to achieve – rather than talk about the difficulty of change. People are then more likely to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How could you encourage a person, team or organisation to clarify the benefits of achieving a goal? How could you help them to focus on the principles they could follow? If appropriate, how could you help them to achieve the benefits of achieving success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People Buy Success Rather Than Change Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Alignment Approach

Great organisations encourage their people to align their efforts when applying themselves to achieve the agreed goals. Different organisations do this in different ways.

One approach is to encourage people to focus on the organisation's purpose and follow its principles. Applying themselves in this way will often achieve at least 8/10.

There may be times, however, when they will want people to be agile – within certain parameters. People may then do what is necessary and produce something special to achieve the picture of success. Let's explore these themes.

Alignment

Imagine that you lead an organisation and want to encourage people to align their contributions with the organisation's aims. Different organisations do this in different ways. Some are more effective than others. You will, of course, choose your own approach.

Some organisations try to order their people to be aligned

They issue orders from the top and expect their people to fall into line. This approach may work for a time but then some people may decide they want more autonomy and move on from the organisation.

Some organisations try to control and micromanage their people into being aligned

They order people to follow certain processes and do certain tasks. They micromanage their people to ensure they are doing things in a certain way. This can give the impression of alignment but it can also drive some people away from the organisation.

Some organisations try persuade their people to be aligned

They may aim to sell a vision to their people. Sometimes this can work when there is a compelling story and people buy into following the strategies. Some people may prefer to be the ones who persuade themselves, however, rather being sold something.

Some organisations try to communicate a purpose, principles and picture of success that can help to create alignment

They communicate these to their people. They then invite people to decide if they want to contribute. This approach can work providing the organisation shows it is serious and encourages people to use their strengths to achieve the picture of success.

Some organisations try to recruit people who want to follow certain principles and this helps to create alignment

They communicate their purpose, principles and picture of success. They then recruit people who want to follow these principles and achieve the goals. This ensures there is an ongoing stream of people who want to use their strengths to help the organisation to achieve success.

Imagine that you have pursued a particular approach to creating alignment. This may have included aiming:

To communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To communicate that you would like each team and each person to clarify their contributions to following their principles and achieving the picture of success;

To communicate that you will then create success stories that show how the teams and people are following the principles and contributing towards achieving the picture of success.

You will, of course, also give people the opportunity to decide if they do want to take these steps. If so, you will make clear contracts with them about the outcomes they will deliver towards achieving the goals.

One leader I mentored aimed to take this approach. This would also involve meeting with each of their leadership team members. Bearing this in mind, he asked the following questions.

"How can I make sure the individuals are really aligned? How can I make sure they really want to take a specific role in the leadership team? They may say they are aligned but their later actions may prove otherwise."

Bearing this in mind, we explored one approach to trying to increase the chances of individuals being aligned with the principles and picture of success.

Clarifying Whether A Person Wants To Align Their Efforts To Achieve The Goals

Imagine that you are going to meet a member of your leadership team. You may want them to make a specific contribution to helping towards achieving the team's goals. This will involve them delivering certain results in a particular role. How to take this step? You may want to explore the following themes before and then during the meeting.

Before The Meeting

It can be useful to work through the following theme before meeting the person. You can aim:

To clarify the specific results the person will need to deliver in a particular role – the picture of success;

To clarify whether you think the person is prepared to follow the organisation's principles and deliver the picture of success;

To clarify whether – bearing in mind their long-term career goals – the person will be prepared to make this particular contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

This final point is crucial. The person may be a good professional and do a good job. But it can be good to check their motivation level.

Imagine the person will be able to see how the role may fit in terms of working towards their long-term career goals. They will then be more likely to align their efforts towards achieving the organisation's aspirations.

During The Meeting

If appropriate, you can then have a conversation with the person around the following themes. This sounds rather formal but you can cover these in your own way.

The Picture Of Success

"I would like to talk with you about how you can build on your strengths and make your best contribution to the organisation. There is a particular role on offer but it would be good to explore whether this would fit for you. I would like us to try to find a win-win that would also help you to work towards your long-term career goals.

"Looking at the particular role, these are the results that a person in this role would need to deliver. They would need:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

The Principles

"As you know, the principles want to follow in organisation to achieve the results are these:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"Looking ahead, think about if you would be prepared to follow these principles to deliver the results.

"You will do this by using your strengths, of course, and doing this in your own way. We want characters not clones. But it is important that people across the organisation keep focusing on following the principles."

The Professional Contribution

"Bearing these things in mind, you may want to take time to reflect. Take time to think about if you would like to take the role and deliver these results.

"It is also good if you can see how taking this role may help you to work towards your long-term career goals.

"You have strengths in certain areas but not necessarily in others. Bearing this in mind, we will encourage you to build on these strengths.

"If appropriate, we can get somebody who has complementary strengths to work alongside you to cover the other areas.

"At the same time, you will of course still be accountable for ensuring the overall results are delivered.

"Take time to think and let me know if you would like to take the role. If not, we can look at other ways you may be able to contribute towards achieving the picture of success."

You will cover such areas in your own way. The keys will be to focus on the following themes:

To clarify the results to be delivered in a particular role and how these will contribute towards achieving the picture of success;

To clarify whether the person would like to deliver those results and contribute towards achieving the picture of success;

To then make clear contracts about the person's contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's assume that you have taken these steps. Each team and each individual has clarified the contribution they want to make towards achieving the organisation's picture of success. It will then be time to move onto the next stage.

Application

Imagine that you lead an organisation. People have made clear contracts about the contributions they want to make. How can you know if they are really aligned in working towards the goals?

The answer will be if they apply themselves to achieving the aims.

Different organisations choose different ways to clarify whether people are translating their commitments into action. The approaches they use can have both pluses and minuses.

Some organisations aim to police people's actions. They produce lists of tasks and then micromanage people into doing these tasks. This approach can work for a short while but it also has downsides.

Some organisations choose another way. They encourage their people to keep following the principles. This involves taking the following steps.

Application

There are many ways to encourage people to align their actions to achieving the organisation's aims. One approach is:

-  To keep reminding people of the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;
-  To keep encouraging people to focus on how they can follow the principles to do superb work and tackle challenges;
-  To keep producing success stories that show how people are following the principles and delivering success.

This involves continually showing people what good looks like. It rewards the behaviour you want repeated. Keep highlighting how people are following the principles and delivering success.

This approach often works. You can then keep encouraging people to follow the principles and achieve success.

Imagine, however, that positive majority of people are taking this approach but one person is causing problems. They are choosing to behave in ways that are unprofessional or causing collateral damage.

You can then meet with the person and clarify whether they want to follow the principles. One approach is to focus on the big picture and invite them to decide if they want to contribute.

You will do this in your own way. When having the conversation, however, you may want to cover the following points.

"Thank you for meeting. This may be a difficult conversation but I am sure that we can do our best to find a solution. Let's go back to the big picture about what we are trying to do in our work.

The purpose of our organisation is:

 To ...*

The principles we want to follow to achieve this purpose – together for the reasons for these – are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

"Bearing these things in mind, I would like you to take time to reflect and decide if you want to follow these principles and contribute towards achieving the goals.

"If so, then I would like you to come up with a plan of how you can do this and contribute towards achieving the goals. If not, then we can look at other options."

This may sound like a tough approach but you are the custodian of the culture. Your aim is to ensure that people are following the principles towards achieving the goals.

Imagine that you are going to have such a conversation with somebody. It can be useful to take the following approach:

To focus on alignment by inviting the person to decide if they want to follow the principles;

To not get into arguments – if the person wants to argue you don't fall into that trap;

To keep returning to explaining the principles and inviting the person to decide if they want to follow them.

Imagine the person says they do. You can invite them to produce an action plan about how they aim to the principles in the next month. They need to take this step rather than you write a plan or police them.

Imagine the person says they don't want to or, after saying they do, they break the agreements. You then replace them with people who do want to follow the principles.

Let's assume that many people are aiming to translate the principles into action. You will then move on to the next stage.

Achievement

Imagine that people are aligning their efforts. You will probably have some mechanism for clarifying the progress that they are making.

As mentioned elsewhere in the book, you may encourage people to keep others informed about their progress. Bearing in mind their agreed goals, they may give monthly updates on:

The specific things they have delivered in the past month;

The specific things they aim to deliver in the next month;

The challenges they face and any support they may need to tackle these challenges;

The other topics they may wish to discuss.

You may also want to ensure that people throughout the organisation keep focusing on the big picture. If appropriate, you can give them regular updates regarding how they are aligning their efforts towards achieving the organisation's aims.

Different leaders do this in different ways. One approach is to start by reminding people of the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. You can then focus on the following themes.

Achievements

You can describe the specific things that people have achieved during a certain time frame. You can bring these to life by describing specific examples, customer feedback or other achievements.

Aims For The Future

You can describe the specific aims for the future. These can include the plans: a) for building on what the organisation does well; b) for tackling areas for improvement; c) for working towards other specific goals.

Additional Things

You can describe any additional things. These may include stories about employees achieving things outside work, proposed wellbeing initiatives or any other topics that may be of interest.

You will, of course, do this in your own way. If appropriate, however, you may wish to use the following template.

*The Organisation's Purpose,
Principles And Picture Of Success*

Progress Report

Achievements

The specific things that people in the organisation have achieved in the past ... are

*

*

*

Aims For The Future

The specific things that we want to aim for and achieve in the next ... are

*

*

*

Additional Things

The additional things we would like to mention are:

*

*

*

Application Sometimes Also Needs Agility

Great organisations encourage people to align their efforts when working towards the agreed goals. As mentioned earlier, however, they also give them the following message:

We want you to keep following the principles. There may be times when you need to be agile in the way you express these, however, in order to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you want to do your best to create alignment when leading a project group, team or organisation. One approach is to take the following steps. You can aim:

To give people the big picture by communicating the purpose, principles and picture of success;

To build on the people who want to follow the principles and make clear contracts about their contributions to achieving the picture of success;

To enable people to follow the principles and do superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the alignment approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Alignment Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach in my own way may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow these in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

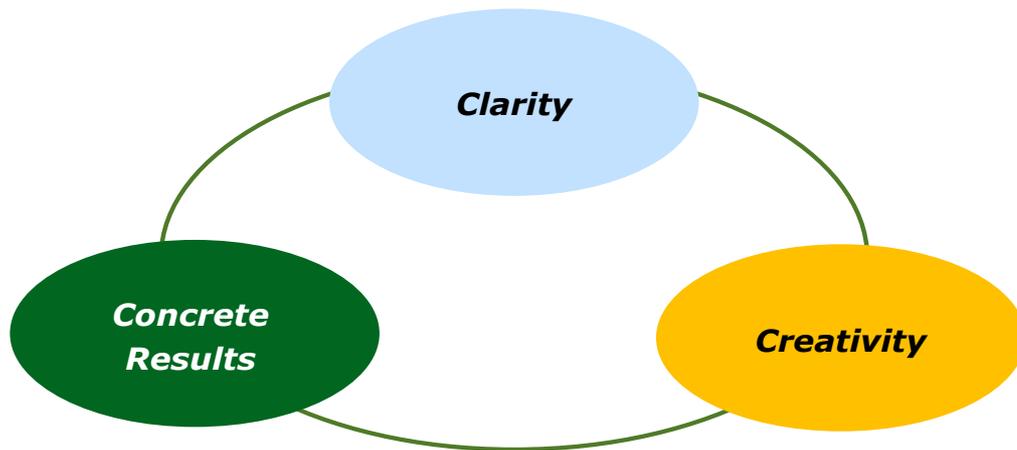

*

*

The Mentoring Approach

Mentoring - The Three C Model

The mentor creates a stimulating sanctuary in which the person can feel at ease. They then help the person to explore their chosen topic or challenge by focusing on clarity, creativity and concrete results.

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to act as a mentor and pass on knowledge that helps people to succeed.

Mentoring is a huge subject. So let's start by considering some of the frequently asked questions about mentoring and coaching.

What do mentors do?

Mentors are wise and trusted advisors. They share knowledge in a way that helps the mentee to achieve their personal or professional goals.

Many successful people use mentors. Why? They sometimes like to meet with a third party who helps them to get an overview of a situation. They can then explore their possible options, make decisions and chart their route forwards.

The word mentor comes from Homer's epic poem The Iliad. When Odysseus left to do battle in Troy, he asked a man called Mentor to take care of his son, Telemachus.

Rumour has it that Mentor was not always up to the task. The Goddess Athena therefore assumed his form and made him strong and wise.

Why do organisations use mentoring?

Mentoring plays a key role in nurturing talent. It provides benefits for the organisation, the mentees and the mentors.

The benefits for the organisation include creating an encouraging environment, passing on wisdom and helping people to make good quality decisions. It can also act as a good retention tool.

The benefits for the mentee include feeling encouraged, making good decisions and shaping their future career. They also expand their repertoire of knowledge and get practical tools they use to achieve success.

The benefits for the mentor are that they will clarify their knowledge, because the best way to learn is to teach. They will also learn more about what is happening in their organisation and may get energy from their mentees.

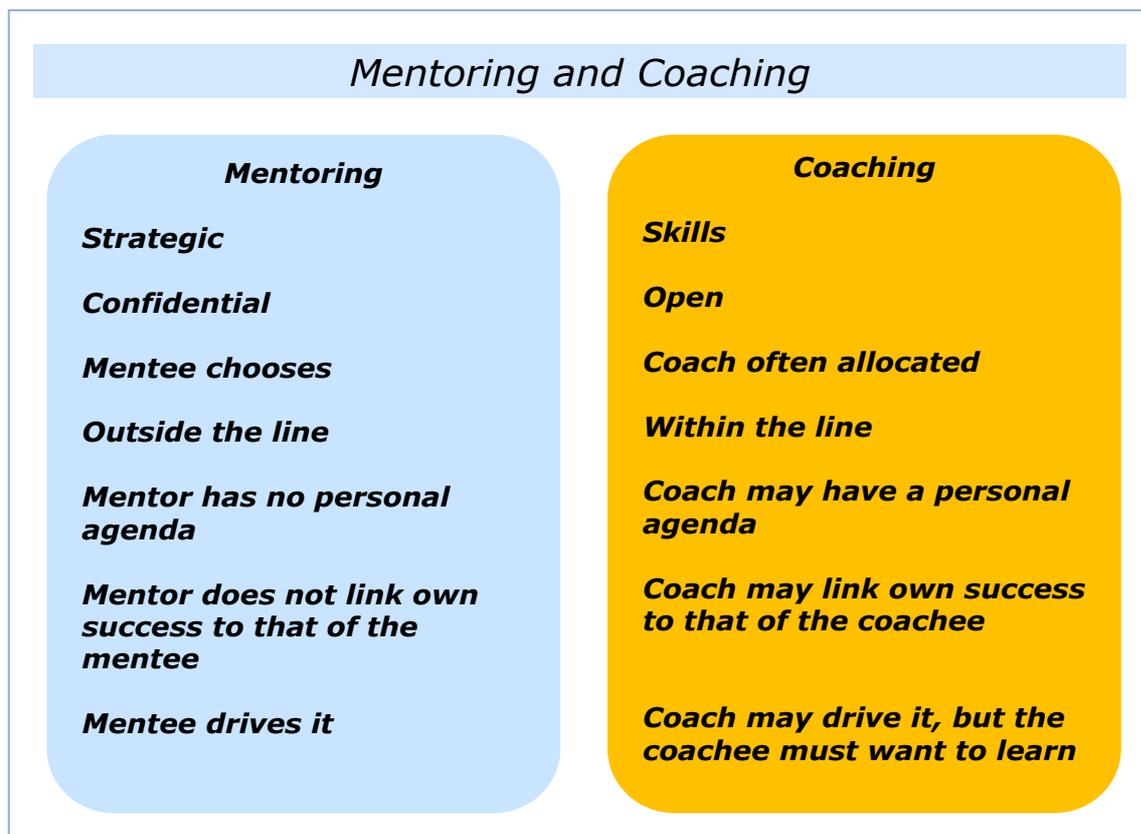

What is the difference between mentoring and coaching?

There are many views on the difference between mentoring and coaching. These views can also differ in different parts of the world and different cultures.

This brings us to the important point. When introducing mentoring into a culture, it is vital that people understand the organisation's definitions. This does not mean that one view is right and another is wrong.

People simply need to be clear about what mentoring is and what it isn't in their organisation. They then know what they can and cannot expect from a mentoring session.

This piece focuses on the definitions that one organisation gave regarding mentoring and coaching. (Some organisations actually reverse the columns described below.) Everybody was clear on the differences, however, and knew how to make the best use of the sessions.

One key point is worth mentioning. The two columns outlined above come with a caveat.

The mentor's role is to pass on knowledge and practical tools the mentee could use to achieve success. This means that sometimes the sessions help the person to add to their repertoire of skills for achieving their strategic goals. The two columns can, however, prove to be a useful guide for people.

What are the responsibilities of the mentor and the mentee?

The mentor's responsibility is, first and foremost, to make sure they really want to be a mentor. Mentoring is rewarding, but doing it properly can also be time consuming.

After familiarising themselves with the organisation's approach to mentoring, it is to facilitate the sessions and pass on their knowledge in a way that the mentee can use to achieve success.

The mentee's responsibility is to be proactive in setting-up the sessions, prepare properly and make the best use of their session with the mentor.

Building on these definitions, the organisation can include the following points in their mentoring charter. These make sure the mentees know what they can and cannot expect from the sessions.

The mentor's role is to focus on the mentee's agenda, to act as a confidential sounding board and to pass on tools the mentee can use to achieve their goals.

The mentor's role is not to act as a political door opener, to replace management or to communicate confidential information about people.

The charter can include both the mentor's and mentee's responsibilities. These can be outlined in the following ways.

The Mentor's Responsibility Is:

- To make sure they really want to be a mentor, because it is a big commitment.
- To build on their own strengths as a mentor.
- To complete a mentor profile and describe what they can and can't offer as a mentor.
- To familiarise themselves with our model for facilitating a mentoring session.
- To pass on knowledge and practical tools that help the person to achieve their picture of success.

The Mentee's Responsibility Is:

- To choose a mentor and drive the process.
- To familiarise themselves with the mentoring model and prepare properly for the mentoring session.
- To, at the start of the session, communicate the topics they would like to explore and what for them would make it a successful session.
- To explore each topic in turn and, when appropriate, be open to the relevant ideas and knowledge that the mentor may pass on to help them to achieve their goals.
- To take the ideas they can use and apply these in their own ways to achieve their picture of success.

What are the qualities demonstrated by good mentors?

Good mentors often demonstrate some common characteristics. How to identify these qualities? One approach is to look back at your own experience of being mentored.

When doing mentoring programmes, for example, I invite each person to do the following exercise.

Describe somebody who acted as a good mentor for you in your personal or professional life.

Describe the specific things they did right – the principles they followed – to be a good mentor for you.

Describe the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, follow some of these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to be a good mentor for other people.

Here are some of the common themes that emerge when people do this exercise.

Good Mentors

Here are some of the themes that emerge when people describe the qualities demonstrated by good mentors

- They were warm and welcoming. They made me feel the centre of their world.
- They listened to my story and showed that they understood what I wanted to achieve. They played back what they believed were my goals.
- They outlined the possible options for going forward together with the pluses and minuses of each option.
- They then asked if it was okay for them to share some ideas.
- They passed on their knowledge and provided practical tips that added to the possible options for going forwards.

- They shared their knowledge in a way that I could understand and use to achieve my goals.
- They underlined that it was ultimately my decision regarding the route I wanted to follow.
- They gave me time to reflect. They then, once I had made my decision, again explained the implications.
- They explained what I could expect to happen and the various roles - their role, my role and the roles of other people – as we moved forwards.
- They then used their compassion, knowledge and skills to provide support and do their best to help me to reach my goals.

Preparing Properly

Good mentors prepare properly for the session. They aim to find out what they can about the mentee, what is happening in their world and the possible themes the person may wish to explore.

Great educators follow the rule that: 'The learner learns what the learner wants to learn'. Bearing this in mind, good mentors spend a lot of time thinking about:

How to make the person feel welcome;

How to find and focus on the themes the person wants to explore;

How to pass on knowledge in a way that helps the person succeed.

The following pages describe some of the areas that the mentor may explore when thinking about the mentee. This is followed by an exercise they sometimes use to summarise their findings and how they can help the person to succeed.

Mentors

They prepare for the session by exploring the following themes

- Who is the person I am going to meet? What is happening in their world at the moment? What may be the challenges they face in their life and work? What may be their personal or professional goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What may be their picture of success?
- What is the reason they want to meet? What may be the topics they want to discuss? What for them would make it a successful session? What are the practical things they may want to take away from the session to help them to achieve their goals?
- What do I know about the person's interests outside work? Are they interested in sports, music, the arts, design or other activities? What are the things that may give the person positive energy? When may they feel most alive and creative? What else do I know about the person?
- What are the person's strengths? What are the activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? How can they build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses?

What do I know about the person's successful style of working? What for them may have been the most satisfying projects - in the broadest - sense of the word - that they have done in the past? What did they find satisfying about these projects? What were they principles they followed then? How can they follow these principles in the future?

When may they have tackled difficult challenges successfully? What may they have done right then? How can they follow these principles - plus maybe add other skills - to tackle similar challenges in the future?

- Looking ahead, how can I make the person feel welcome? How can I clarify the topics they want to explore? How can I show them I understand their hopes and aspirations? Looking the first theme they want to explore, how can I clarify the real results they want to achieve?

- What are the positive models and practical tools I can offer to help them to achieve these goals? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can accept and use? What else can I do to help them to achieve their picture of success?

Mentors

They then complete the following framework

The name of the person I am going to meet is:

*

The Person's World

The specific things that may be happening in the person's world at the moment, the challenges they may face and the goals they may want to achieve in their work are:

*

*

*

The Person's Agenda

The specific topics the person may want to explore in the meeting are:

* How to ...

* How to ...

* How to ...

The Specific Ways I Can Help The Person

The specific things I can do to help the person to tackle their challenges and achieve their goals are:

*

*

*

The actual words I would like the person to be saying after the session are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to do my best to ensure they are saying these kinds of things are:

*

*

*

Contacting The Person Before A First Session

Imagine that you have done your preparation. If appropriate, you may want to send an email before the first session.

This can help to set the scene for the person. It can also give them the chance to reflect and think about what they want to explore in the session.

Looking at my own work, here is an example of the kind of email I may send to a person before the first session. You will, of course, have your own approach.

Hello ...

Looking forward to our session on ... As you know, we can explore any topics you wish.

For example:

How to build on your strengths ... How to do satisfying work ... How to build superb teams ... How to manage various stakeholders ... How to find solutions to specific challenges ... How to keep developing as a person and as a professional ... How to achieve your picture of success.

We can, of course, explore any other topics. The aim will be to focus on what is most relevant for you. We can then look at some of the practical tools you can use to achieve your goals.

If you get chance before the session, let me know if there are any particular themes or challenges it would be good to explore. Otherwise we can settle on these at the start of the session.

We will focus on each of the topics in turn and clarify the real results you want to achieve. If appropriate, I will then share some positive models and practical tools that you can use in your own way to achieve your goals.

These tools will be based on what works. You can then decide which route you want to follow towards achieving your aims.

We will keep going in the session until you feel you have enough ideas you can use in your own way to achieve your goals.

Looking forward to our session together.

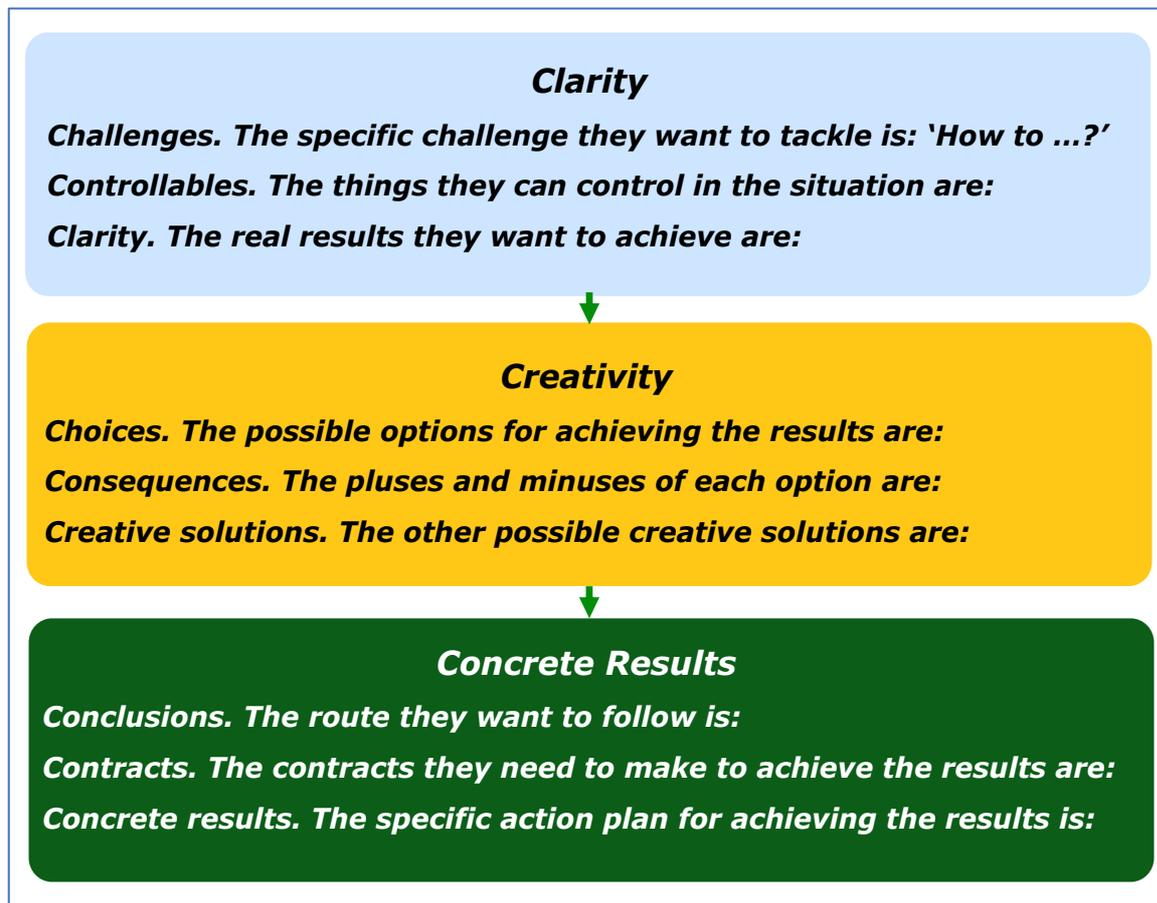

The Mentoring Session

There are many models for running a mentoring session. The section describes how you can use the Three C approach.

This helps people to tackle challenges or reach their goals by focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results. You will, of course, use the model that works for you and the mentee.

Mentoring - One Approach To Running A Session

*There are many models for running a mentoring session.
One approach is to use the Three C Model. It is to invite the person to focus on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results*

Setting The Scene

Imagine that you are running a mentoring session. You will start by creating a stimulating sanctuary in which the person feels at ease and able to explore their chosen themes.

Here are some of the things you may want to say when clarifying the person's challenges or aims. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

"Welcome to the session. As you know, we can focus on any topic that you would like to explore. We can look at how to tackle specific challenges or achieve your particular goals.

"Once we have settled on the first topic, I will probably ask you lots of questions to build up the picture. Then, if it is okay by you, I will share some ideas and practical tools that you can use in your own way.

"Let's begin by seeing things in context. What is happening in your world at the moment? Are there any particular challenges that you face? Are there any particular goals that you would like to work towards?"

Different people will focus on different themes. Here, for example, are some of the questions that people have wanted to explore in our mentoring sessions.

How can I take the next step in my career? How can I feel more in control of my life and work? How can I help my son to deal with school, even though his interests lie elsewhere?"

How can I get on better with my manager? How can I turnaround a difficult team? How can I set-up and run my own successful business? How can we build a values driven organisation?"

Imagine that the person has described several themes they want to explore. You can then make clear contracts about the areas to cover during the session.

Good mentors know their strengths and areas of expertise. So, after listening to the topics the person wants to explore, you may want to say something along the following lines.

"Looking at the various topics you have outlined, I can offer ideas and practical tools on the following themes:

 How to ...*

 How to ...*

 How to ...*

"Looking at another of the themes you have mentioned, whilst I can offer ideas, I think it may be advisable to explore those with another person or professional. Is that okay?"

"Bearing that in mind, which is the first topic you want to explore? As I mentioned earlier, I will ask you some questions about this topic. We will then focus on how to achieve your goals. Is that okay?"

The next step will be to focus on the first topic the person wants to explore. You can help them to do this by working through the following stages.

Clarity

Clarity is crucial. It is important to clarify the real results the person wants to achieve – the real What – before moving on to the How. Dare to spend a long time on this stage. You can do this by working through the following steps.

Challenges

Imagine that the person has described a challenge they want to explore. It is important to frame this in positive terms. For example:

"How can I stay healthy?" rather than "How can I stop smoking?"

It can also be useful to frame the challenge in terms of "How to ...?" or 'How can I ...?' This also encourages them to begin using their imagination to generate solutions. For example:

"How can I feel more in control?" rather than "How can I stop feeling stressed?"

If appropriate, you can then invite the person to give more background about the situation. This can help when focusing on their priorities. Bearing this in mind, invite them to focus on the following themes.

Challenges

The first challenge I want to explore is:

* How to ...

Here is some more background about the situation:

*

*

*

Controllables

Let's assume the person has clarified the challenge they want to tackle. Before going further, however, it can be good to do a reality check.

Peak performers aim to control the controllables. They can, for example, control their attitude, professionalism and other things. They can't necessarily control the outcome of their efforts. They can, however, do their best to influence it.

Such people build on what they can control and manage what they can't. The same rule applies to your client. Returning to the results they want to achieve, invite them to describe the things they can control in the situation.

Controllables

The specific things I can control in the situation are:

*

*

*

Clarity

You can then clarify the real What before moving on to the How. A person often starts by presenting their view of How they can tackle an issue. But it is useful to clarify their picture of success.

Bearing this in mind, start by looking at the first challenge the person wants to tackle. Ask them:

"What are the real results you want to achieve?"

Sometimes this process takes a little time, but it is a vital step in creative problem solving. Here are some examples of how a person's original topic can change during the process of exploring the real results they wanted to achieve.

Person A originally said: "How can I get promotion in my company?"

They settled on: "How can I build a satisfying career where I do stimulating work and get a good salary?"

Person B originally said: "How can I as a leader turn around difficult people in my organisation?"

They settled on: "How can I build a successful organisation?"

Person C originally said: "How can I deal with my manager who insists on micro-managing me every day?"

They settled on two things: "How can I deal with the present situation by behaving professionally towards my manager and delivering positive results? How can I find a rewarding role where I work with a manager whom I respect?"

Sometimes the person may want to achieve lots of things related to their chosen topic. If so, clarify all their goals and list these in order of priority. The person may, for example, have both short and long term aims. You can work to help them to achieve these goals.

Imagine you are helping a person to tackle a specific challenge. Invite them to do two things. First, to clarify the real results they want to achieve. If appropriate, brainstorm all these goals. Second, to list these results in order of priority.

Clarity

The real results I want to achieve - in order of priority - are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

So far the person has clarified the challenge, the controllables and the results to achieve. It's now time to move on to the possible creative solutions.

Creativity

Move on to encouraging the person to look at how to achieve their goals. This often involves going through the process of exploring the choices, consequences and creative solutions.

Choices

Bearing in mind the goals they want to achieve, invite the person to explore all the possible options they can pursue. These can range from the obvious options – such as maintaining the status quo and doing nothing – to the more outlandish ones.

It's important to list all the options - even the ones they are not going to pursue - to consider the whole picture. This provides the whole context for choosing their way forward. So invite them to outline the following choices. (There may, of course, be more than three options.)

Option A is: To ...

Option B is: To ...

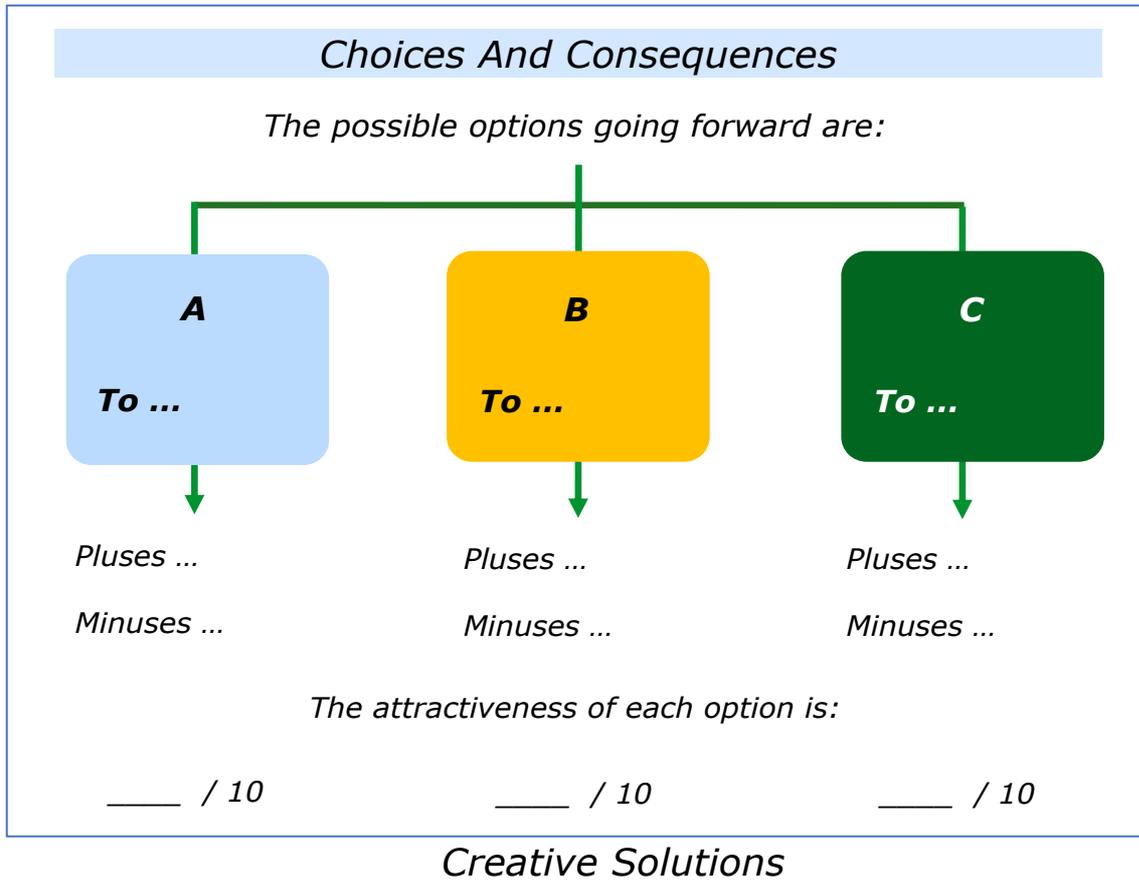

Option C is: To ...

Consequences

Looking at each option in turn, invite the person to consider what they see as the respective pluses and minuses of each route.

Great decision makers often base their decisions on the consequences of each option, rather than the options themselves. They then build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

Invite the person to outline the various options. They can then rate the attractiveness of each option on a scale 0–10.

Looking at the goals the person wants to achieve, are there any other possible options? This is where mentors earn their corn. They pass on their knowledge in a way the client can accept and use.

You may want to begin by recapping what has been covered so far in the session. When appropriate, however, you can ask the person: "Is it okay for me to share some ideas?" They will probably say: "Yes."

Let's assume the person would welcome your ideas. You can share these in a way that gives them the chance to take the best and leave the rest. Look for the ideas that resonate.

Good mentors 'sit alongside' the person and look together at the goals they want to achieve. They then share possible ways the person can achieve these aims. They do, when appropriate, also offer practical tools the person can use in their daily life or work.

Let's look at how this works in action. Imagine you are helping a person to explore their potential options. You will do this in your own way, but you may say something along the following lines.

"Let's start by re-establishing your goals. As far as I understand it, the real results you want to achieve are to ... Is that right?"

"Let's look at the different options you have outlined. Which of these is the most attractive option?"

"Looking at the various options, is it possible to take the best parts of each route and create a new road?"

"Sometimes it can be useful to learn from our own successes. Looking back, have you ever been in a similar situation before and managed it successfully? What did you do right then? Is it possible to follow any of these principles to achieve the goals?"

"Sometimes it can be useful to learn from how other people have succeeded. Are there any other people, teams or organisations that have tackled this kind of issue successfully? What did they do right then? How can you follow these principles in your own way?"

"Is it okay for me to share some ideas? If so, looking at the goals you want to achieve, here are some options you may wish to consider."

Creative Solutions

The other potential creative solutions are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

"Looking at all the options, which are the ones that make sense? Which of these would you like to explore further? Looking at your chosen option, let's consider how these might look in practise.

"Looking at all the things we have explored, let's summarise things before moving on to the next stage. Looking at the goals you want to achieve, let's consider the following question.

"What do you believe are the three things you can do to give yourself the greatest chance of success?"

Invite the client to keep going until they feel they have explored all the possible options. They can then move onto the final stage.

Concrete Results

It is then time to translate the ideas in action. The person can do this by going through the following stages.

Conclusions

Looking at the various ways forward, they can settle on the route they want to follow. Sometimes they will choose to pursue one main option; sometimes they will want to pursue multiple options. What will be the pluses and minuses involved? How can they build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

Looking at the results they want to achieve, invite them to complete the following sentence.

Conclusions
The route – or combination of routes – I want to follow to tackle the challenge and achieve the results is: * To ... * To ... * To ...

Contracting

Looking at the road ahead, invite the person to consider if they need to make any contracts with people.

Their main contract, of course, is with themselves. Looking at the whole package – the pluses and minuses involved – do they want to make the commitment to achieving the goals?

They may also need to make clear working contracts with other people who can help them to reach the goals. In appropriate, invite them to complete the following sentence.

Contracting

The specific contracts I need to make to ensure the results are delivered are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Concrete Results

Different mentors choose different ways to conclude each part of the session. Whichever route you take, it is important to take your cue from the person with whom you are working.

Sometimes the person may want to reflect before clarifying their next steps. Sometimes they may want to move straight to action planning. If the person wants to take the latter route, you can invite them to complete the following step.

Concrete Results

The specific action plan for achieving the results – including getting some early successes - is:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

How to finish the session? One approach is to ensure that you have covered the agreed themes. It is also to check that the person has got some practical tools they can use to achieve their goals.

Sometimes at the end of a session a person will say they want to reflect on the ideas. This may especially be so with introverts who prefer to let the ideas sink in. Sometimes, however, a person may have a clear action plan they want to follow.

One approach you can use - but only if it is appropriate - is to invite the person to clarify what they have learned, relearned or what they are taking away. This can help to finish the session in a positive way. Here is a framework they can use for clarifying their learning.

*My Take Aways
From The Session*

The specific things I have learned, relearned or am taking away from the session are:

*

*

*

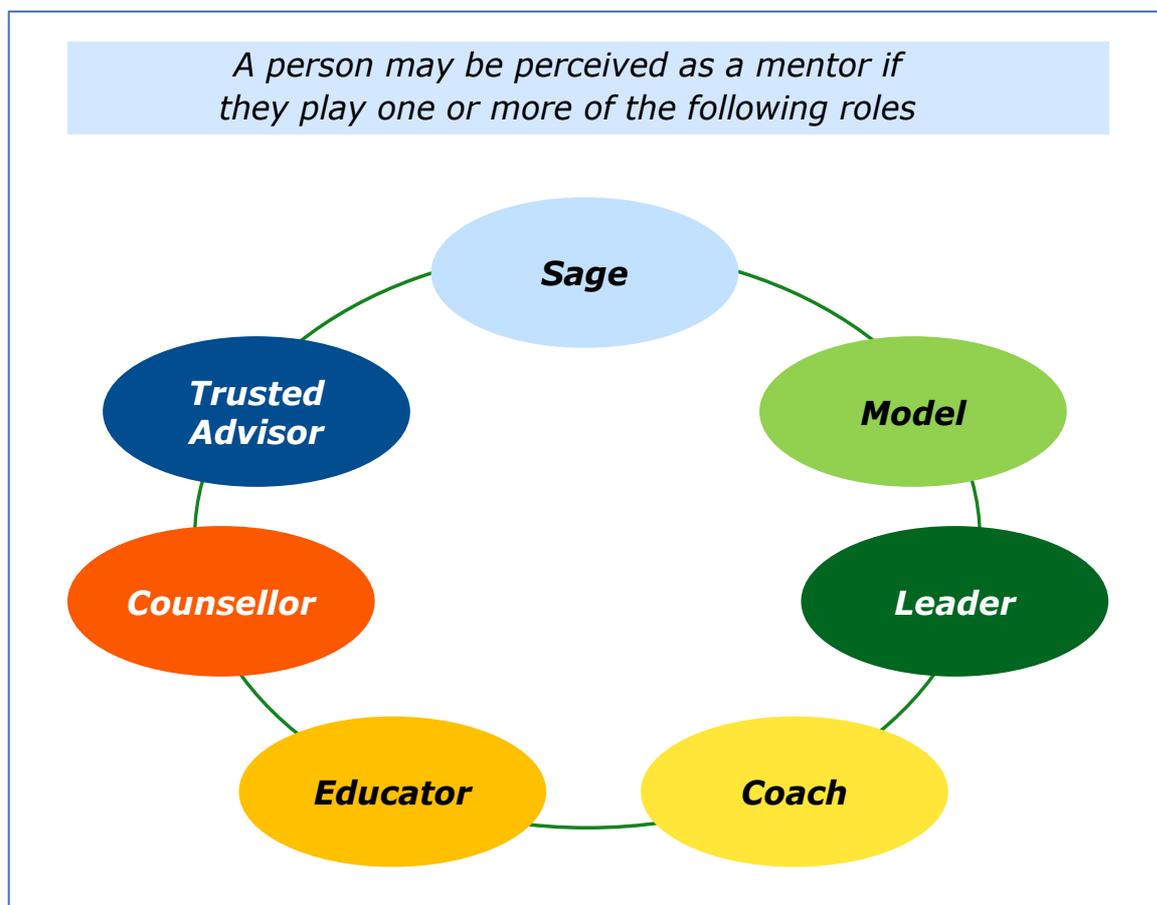

The Mentor's Many Roles – An Overview

This section has focused on the mentor playing a strategic role rather than doing nitty-gritty coaching, but mentors come in all shapes and sizes. You may, for example, hear somebody say about a person they have met in the past:

"They acted as a mentor for me."

Therefore it can be useful to recognise that different people may mean different things when they are talking about somebody being a mentor.

Bearing this in mind, the following pages outline some of the roles that a person may play when being seen as a mentor. They also explain the qualities that a person may demonstrate in each of these roles.

Sages

Sages are often generous people who act as wise and trusted advisors. They have credibility and are willing to pass on their knowledge. They see themselves as lifetime students, however, rather than being wise.

They help people to see the big picture and the possible roads towards achieving their goals. Moving from the concept to the concrete, they also pass on practical tools that people can use in their daily lives and work.

Models

Models are people that we admire. They provide examples that we may wish to copy and emulate. Sometimes we find ourselves talking, dressing or acting like our models in our own lives.

Positive models at work teach us about the culture. They demonstrate 'the way we do things around here.' They also share success stories to show what good looks like. We can then follow these principles in our own way to deliver success.

Leaders

Good leaders aim to build a positive culture in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They believe in giving people the big picture. They therefore keep communicating the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They then invite people to decide if they want to contribute. If so, they encourage people to build on their strengths and make clear contracts about their best contributions. They also give people the support they need to achieve success.

Good leaders manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They do, however, expect people to proactively keep them informed about their progress towards achieving the goals. They do their best to encourage, educate and enable people to achieve success.

They keep reminding people of the purpose and principles. They report the progress that is being made and highlight success stories. Good leaders are also prepared, however, to make the tough decisions that are required to achieve the picture of success.

Coaches

Good coaches help people to improve in a specific activity. They help a person to build on their strengths, tackle areas for improvement and achieve ongoing success.

They like to watch a person in action or see a piece of their work. They then ask the following questions before giving any feedback.

What is the person's goal? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?

What are the specific things the person is doing well? How can they do more of these things in the future to help them to reach their goal? What are the specific things they can do better in the future and how?

What are the key messages I therefore want to give the person? How can I put these messages in a way that the person can accept and use? Are there any other things I can do to help the person to achieve their picture of success?

Educators

Educators are often experts in their chosen field. They also want to encourage, educate and enable people to shape their future lives. They aim to make the learning personal, practical and profitable.

Personal: it must relate to the person and their goals.

Practical: it must provide tools that help the person to reach their goals.

Profitable: it must be, in the widest sense, profitable and help the person to achieve their goals.

Counsellors

Counsellors help people who want to solve a problem they are experiencing in their lives. The classic method is to create a warm climate, use listening skills and be non-directive.

Sometimes the counsellor simply listens. Sometimes they may use facilitation skills, however, to help the person to find their own answers.

One Key Point

Mentors may sometimes move between the various roles in a session. The most obvious is when they move from listening to passing on knowledge. As mentioned earlier, the mentor may then say:

"As far as I understand it, the results you want to achieve are:

1) ...

2) ...

3) ...

"Bearing this in mind, is it okay if I share some ideas?"

On some occasions the mentor may feel it could be useful to pass on some practical skills by going into coaching mode. If this is the case, they may say:

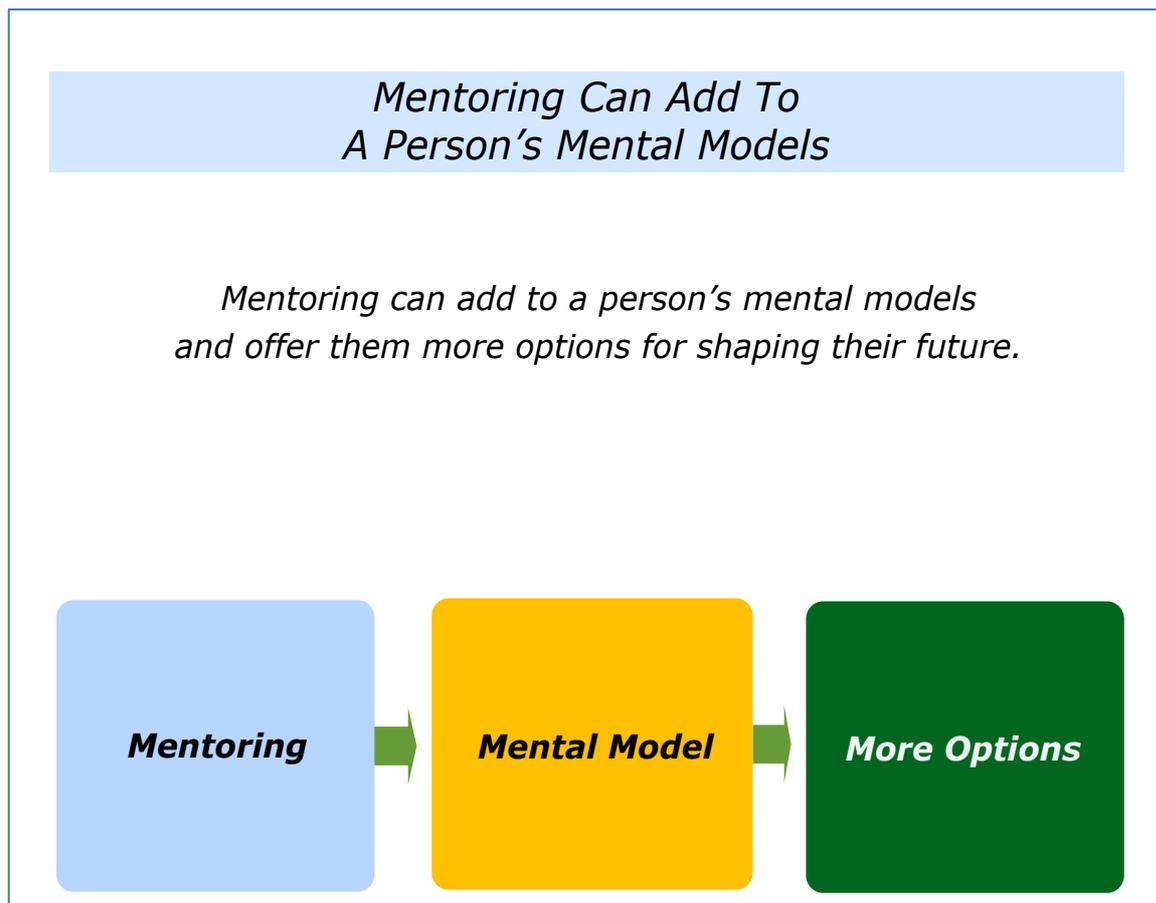

"Would it be okay if I put on my coaching hat? If so, there are a couple of practical skills that it may be useful to cover that may help you to reach your goals?"

Clear contracting is crucial. This is the case whether you are acting as a mentor, coach or in another role. People work best when they know the results to achieve and each person's role in working towards the goals.

"Would it be okay if I put on my coaching hat? If so, there are a couple of practical skills that it may be useful to cover that may help you to reach your goals?"

Clear contracting is crucial. This is the case whether you are acting as a mentor, coach or in another role. People work best when they know the results to achieve and each person's role in working towards the goals.

There are many views on the value of mentoring. One view is that it can help a person in the following way.

Every person has mental models. These models sometimes include: a) how they perceive the world; b) how they act to achieve their picture of success.

Here is an introduction to the concept of mental models. These are from the Farnam Street website.

What Are Mental Models?

Mental models are how we understand the world. Not only do they shape what we think and how we understand but they shape the connections and opportunities that we see.

Mental models are how we simplify complexity, why we consider some things more relevant than others, and how we reason.

A mental model is simply a representation of how something works.

We cannot keep all of the details of the world in our brains, so we use models to simplify the complex into understandable and organizable chunks.

Learning to Think Better

The quality of our thinking is proportional to the models in our head and their usefulness in the situation at hand.

The more models you have—the bigger your toolbox—the more likely you are to have the right models to see reality.

It turns out that when it comes to improving your ability to make decisions variety matters.

Mentoring can help a person to add to their mental models. It can offer them more options by passing on knowledge, models and practical tool. It is then up to the person whether they use to shape their future.

Measuring The Mentoring

Many organisations believe in offering mentoring to their people. At the same time, they like to know the value of the mentoring.

Sometimes it can be hard to measure this instantly. Many of us have had mentors in the past but maybe only realised their value later in life. Bearing this in mind, it can still be important for the organisation to clarify some benefits of the mentoring.

The following pages outline an approach that I have used in organisations. This invites the mentee to clarify the things they have learned, relearned and the benefits to the organisation.

Measuring The Mentoring

Introduction

It can be hard to instantly measure the effects of mentoring but there are some ways to clarify the benefits. One approach is to invite each of the mentees to do the following exercises.

The mentee is reassured that they do not need to share anything they do not wish to, but it can be helpful to get their responses. The exercises invite the person to describe the following things.

The specific things they got from the sessions – such as the things they learned, relearned or took away from the sessions.

The specific things – the knowledge, models or practical tools - that they were able to apply in their work.

The specific benefits that the mentoring approach can bring for the mentee or the organisation.

The Mentoring Sessions

The Mentee's Views

The following pages offer an opportunity for you as a mentee to give feedback about the mentoring programme.

This is voluntary and also only share your ideas to the extent to which you feel comfortable.

Introduction

As you know, we like to offer the opportunity of mentoring sessions to some people in our organisation.

Whilst the content of these sessions is confidential, we would like to get some feedback regarding the benefit of the sessions. This can help us to make a case for offering such sessions to other people in the future.

Bearing this in mind, we would like you to try completing the following exercises. Again, only do this to the extent that you feel comfortable with sharing your responses.

You do not have to do all the exercises, but any specific feedback you can give will be beneficial. The exercises invite you to write your ideas under the following headings.

The specific things that I have learned, relearned or have taken away from the sessions have been:

*

*

*

The specific things – the knowledge, models and practical tools – that I been able to apply in my work have been:

*

*

*

The specific benefits that I think the mentoring approach can bring for the mentee or the organisation are:

*

*

*

Continuing To Build A Positive Planet

Introduction

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to encourage people in our daily lives and work. It is to plant seeds of hope during our time on the planet.

Some people move through several stages in their lives. They move from being protesters to being problem solvers to being positive contributors. They aim to do their best to encourage both present and future generations

This can mirror the journey a person takes from their teenage years to maturity and then becoming an elder. Let's explore the steps that some people take.

Protesters

Some people protest about what is happening in the world. Some protest about what is happening in their own life. They may express these feelings in ways that are helpful or hurtful.

A person may feel angry, hurt or sad about what is happening in the world. They may express these feelings in responsible or irresponsible ways. The ways they do this can have positive or negative consequences.

A person may be feeling upset, depressed or hurt about what is happening in their own personal world. They may feel depressed, disrespected or helpless. They may express these feelings in ways that hurt themselves or other people.

Problem Solvers

Some people channel their energy into finding solutions. They want to improve life for people and the planet.

A person may become a problem solver in their professional life. They may find solutions to challenges when acting as an educator, health worker, technician, scientist or in another role.

A person may become a problem solver in their personal life. They may improve their ability to find solutions to personal challenges. They may also learn how to express their feelings in ways that help themselves or other people.

Positive Contributors

Some people aim to make a positive contribution during their time on the planet. Some make a conscious decision to take this approach. Some move onto it naturally as they grow older.

Some people encourage others by simply being kind. Some do work that helps people to improve the quality of their lives. Some pass on knowledge, models and practical tools that enable people to shape a positive future.

People Choose Different Ways To Help To Build A Better World

There are many views about how to help to build a better world. Here are some of these approaches.

People Who Work To Build A Better World

They may pursue some of the following approaches to making a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

The Positive Pollination Approach

The Positive Knowledge Approach

The Positive Paradigm Approach

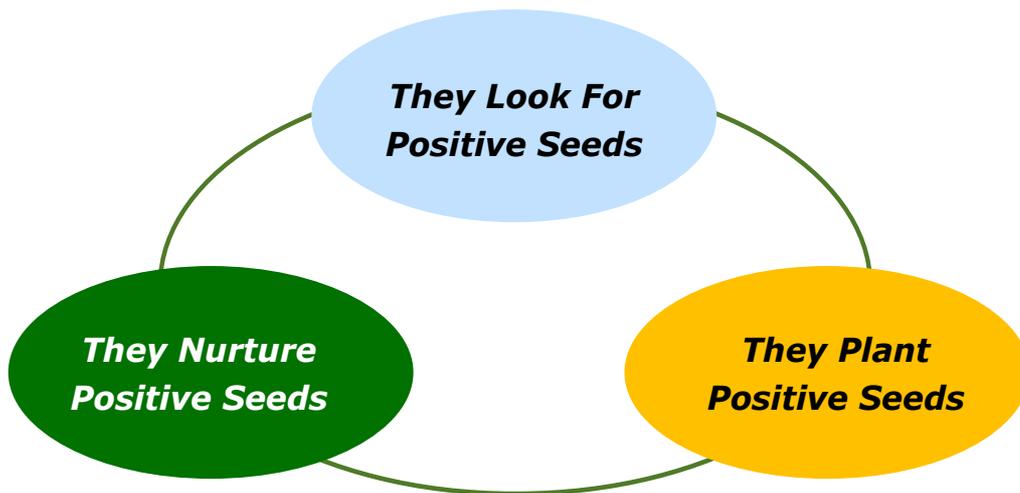

The Positive Pollination Approach

People who take this approach aim to plant seeds of hope and encourage other people. They share positive models and practical tools that people can use to get positive results. They believe these seeds may spread and, through the pollination process, help to build a positive planet.

The pluses of this approach are that it is organic and it provides positive models that work. People are then more likely to share these and help to build a positive planet. The minuses are that it takes a long time.

The Positive Seeds Approach

People who take this approach often pursue the following steps.

They Look For Positive Seeds

They look for when people come alive or do superb work. They see what people are doing right then and encourage them to follow these principles in the future.

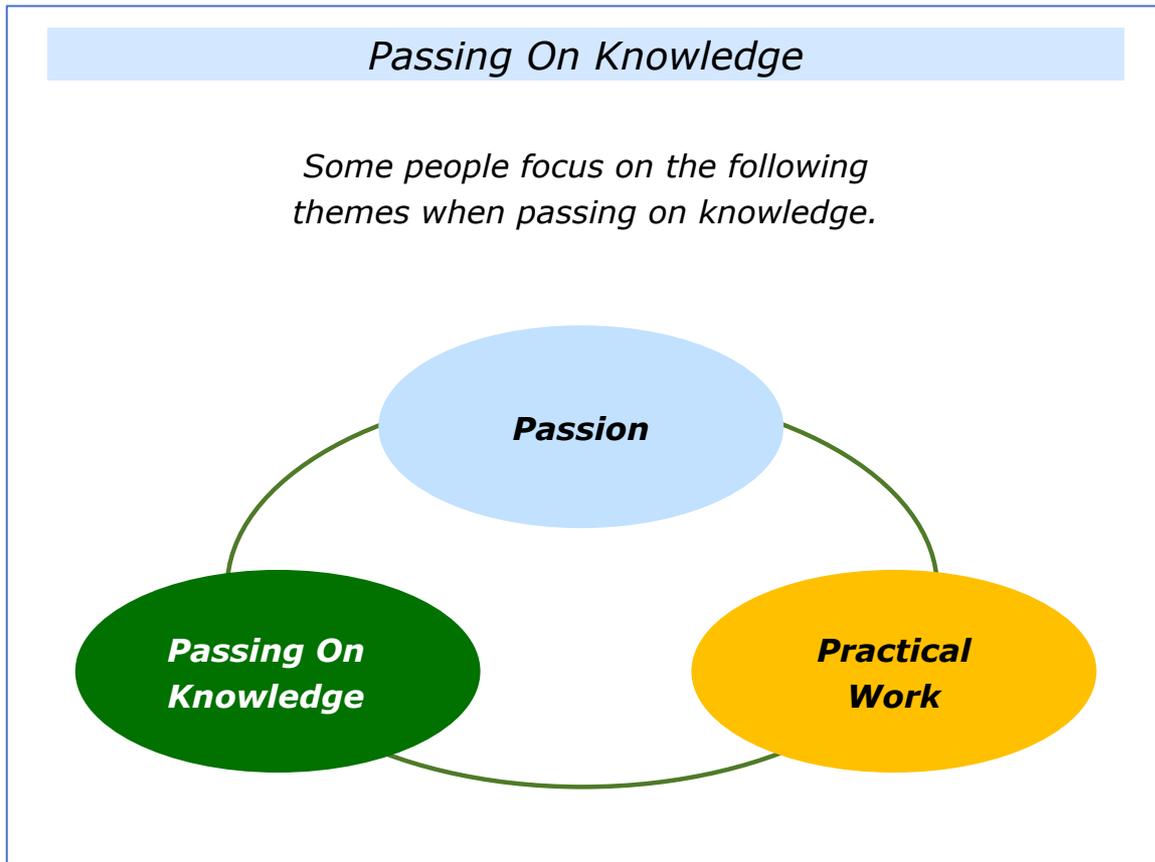

They Plant Positive Seeds

They aim to affirm people and encourage them to explore their aspirations. When appropriate, they pass on positive knowledge and practical tools that people can use to achieve their goals.

They Nurture Positive Seeds

They enable people to achieve their aims. When appropriate, they offer people strategies and support that can use to shape their futures and achieve ongoing success.

The Positive Knowledge Approach

People who follow this approach aim to pass on positive knowledge that other people can use to shape their futures. They may also aim to show how people can build sustainable systems that achieve ongoing success.

Such people may have specialist expertise, but they are also savvy. They aim to pass on practical models that will create wins for all the various stakeholders. They aim to show how taking these approaches will be profitable for both people and the planet.

The pluses of this approach are that it provides knowledge and practical tools that people can use to achieve success. The minuses include that there it is up to the receiver how they interpret and use the information.

Some people combine elements of all these approaches aim to plant positive seeds, share a positive paradigm and pass on positive knowledge. Let's look at this latter part.

Different people choose to pass on knowledge in different ways. Some people work through the following stages.

Passion

They focus on an activity they feel passionately about and do what works.

Practical Work

They throw themselves into doing practical work and do their best to deliver success.

Passing On Knowledge

They want to pass on knowledge about what works in this activity and help other people to succeed.

Imagine you want to pass on knowledge in your own way. One approach is to focus on the What, Who, Why, How and When.

Passing On Knowledge
● The What	The specific knowledge I would like to pass on to people is ...
● The Who	The specific people I would like to pass on this knowledge to are ...
● The Why	The specific reasons why I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...
● The How	The specific ways I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...
● The When	The specific situations when I would like to pass on this knowledge to people are ...

The What

What is the knowledge you want to pass on? You may have learned lessons from pursuing your vocation, doing projects, managing crises, leading teams, solving particular problems or whatever.

The Who

Who would you like to reach? Would they be young people, budding entrepreneurs, athletes, leaders, social entrepreneurs, therapists or other people? What would be the characteristics of these people?

The Why

Why would you like to pass on this knowledge? What would be the benefits for people? It can be useful to pass on what works. People gain strength when they see how they can succeed. They are then more likely to pursue these strategies to achieve success.

The How

How would you like to share your knowledge with people? You may prefer:

To act as a positive model ... To act as a mentor, coach or trusted advisor ... To run teaching sessions, seminars, workshops or other forms of education ... To write articles, create websites, write blogs, produce learning materials, make videos or whatever.

The When

When do you want to share the ideas with people? What would be the preferred setting or situation for passing on the knowledge? When do you want to start on the journey and get a quick success?

The Positive Paradigm Approach

The Positive Paradigm

A paradigm is a way of looking at the world. Imagine you are helping a person or group of people who want to develop. It can be important to recognise their paradigm and take the following steps.

- To show people a positive paradigm;*
- To show people how it may be profitable – in the widest sense – for them to follow that positive paradigm;*
- To show people how they can follow certain principles - and translate these into practice - to achieve success by following the positive paradigm.*

A paradigm is a way of looking at the world. The paradigm that we have often influences our daily actions.

Imagine that you are working with a person or a group of people who may want to develop. It can be important to recognise their present paradigm and then to take the following steps.

To show them a positive paradigm;

To show how it may be profitable – in the widest sense – for them to follow that positive paradigm;

To show how they can follow certain principles – and translate these into practice – to achieve success by following the positive paradigm.

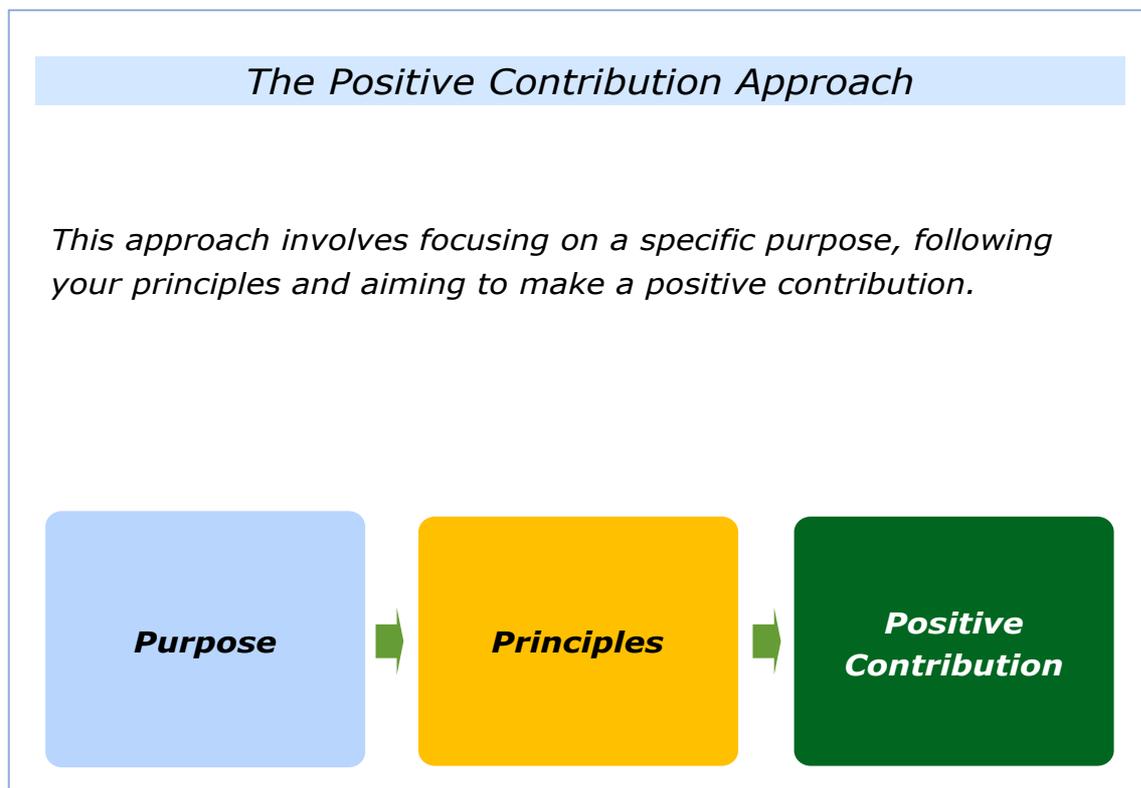

If appropriate, you can then encourage and enable people to follow this approach successfully. This may mean that people are happier, healthier, wealthier or leave a positive legacy.

The pluses of the paradigm approach are that it can show a way of living that produces benefits for people. The minuses are that it can come across as criticism or preaching. It can also be difficult to encourage people to shift their belief systems.

Different people choose different ways to help others. Some may pursue a compelling purpose. They may start by aiming to care for their loved ones. They may also follow a spiritual faith, a set of personal values or a sense of vocation.

Such people follow their principles. They may aim to be kind and encouraging. They may also aim to pass on knowledge and make a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

As mentioned earlier, many people want make a positive contribution during their time on the planet. Let's explore how it is possible to take some of these steps.

Different people choose different ways to make a positive contribution. Here are some of the routes they may follow.

The Purpose Approach

People love to have a sense of purpose. They love to do something they believe in and work towards a stimulating goal. This can provide a structure to their days and meaning to their lives.

Sometimes this can involve pursuing a short-term purpose, such as completing a satisfying task. Sometimes it can mean doing something each day towards achieving their life goals.

My Purpose

The specific things I want to do in my life are:

- * To ...

- * To ...

- * To ...

Some people seem to know their purpose at an early age whilst for others it is a lifetime quest. One view is that finding it can happen in a Eureka Moment. Another is that it can develop over time.

People can feel overawed when exploring the idea of a purpose. Here are some exercises you can use to begin clarifying your aims.

You will have your own life philosophy and express this in different ways. The following section explores how you may take this approach.

Clarifying Your Life Philosophy

My Life Philosophy

The philosophy I want to follow in my life is that I want:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Different people choose different ways to clarify their life philosophy. One approach is to clarify what you believe are the most important things in life. You may say, for example:

The things that I believe are important in life are:

To care for my loved ones ... To encourage other people ... To do work that helps to make the world a better place.

If appropriate, you may then want to clarify the specific things you can do to keep focusing on these important things in life.

The Important Things In Life

The specific things that I believe are important in life are:

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

* To ...

For example ...

Another approach is to simply brainstorm the philosophy you want to follow in life. You can then aim to follow these principles in your daily life.

This is a theme we will return to later in the book. If you wish, however, you may want to tackle the exercise on beginning to clarify your life philosophy. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Life Philosophy

The philosophy that I want to follow in my life is that I want:

* To ...

For example:

*

* To ...

For example:

*

* To ...

For example:

*

Clarifying The Positive Things You Want To Give To People

Here is an introduction to an exercise that we will return to later in the book. This invites you to consider the positive things you want to give to people during your time on the planet.

Here are some of the answers that people give when exploring this theme.

I want:

To give my family a loving home ... To give people encouragement ... To give my students hope ... To give people nourishing food ... To show people how they can take care of their health ... To show people how to make use of their talents.

To give people tools they can use to build great organisations ... To give people models they can use to build successful and sustainable systems ... To pass on knowledge that helps both present and future generations.

As mentioned above, we will return to this approach later when inviting you to clarify your positive contribution. Before then, here is another approach that some people take.

Some people experience a realisation when doing this exercise. They realise that what they want to give to other people may mirror the things they have been given in life.

Let's move on to another theme that you can explore when clarifying your best contribution.

Clarifying Your Lifetime Picture of Success

People often get a sense of purpose by focusing on their life goal. They then do something every day towards achieving their aims.

Everybody has different pictures of success. What is your picture? Looking back on your life when you are 80, what for you will mean you have had a successful life?

Many people say they want to have built a happy family and had a successful career. Some also recognise that success can mean having a sense of peace. It means looking back and feeling they have done their best during their time on the planet.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. People often cover three themes when doing this exercise.

Positive Relationships

People may describe how they want to be remembered as a parent, partner or friend. A person may say, for example:

I want my partner and I to have given our children the opportunity to enjoy a happy childhood.

For example, I want them to say things like:

"Our parents were always there for us. They encouraged us, helped us to develop our talents and learn how to make good decisions."

Positive Experiences

People often focus on how they want to enjoy life, pursue experiences and have no regrets. A person may say something like:

I want to have lived life fully.

For example, I want:

To have visited many countries ... To have completed the book I promised myself I would write ... To have made full use of my talents.

Positive Contribution

People often talk about wanting to make a positive contribution to the world. Sometimes this can lead to having a sense of peace.

This may involve them following their vocation or doing something that improves life for other people. So a person may write something like:

I want to have used my strengths to have done positive work that has helped other people.

For example, I want:

To have ...

To have ...

To have ...

You may prefer to clarify your life goals in another way. Whatever approach you take, clarifying these goals can act as a long-term compass.

You can bear in mind these aims when making key decisions. When given the opportunity to take a new job, for example, you can ask yourself:

Will taking this step help me to achieve my longer-term picture of success?

As mentioned earlier, it can be useful to do one thing early each day towards achieving your life goals. This helps to provide a sense of meaning to the day. It also means you are doing something towards achieving your long-term picture of success.

My Picture Of Success

Looking back in future years, I will feel my life has been successful if I have done the following things.

1) I have ...

For example:

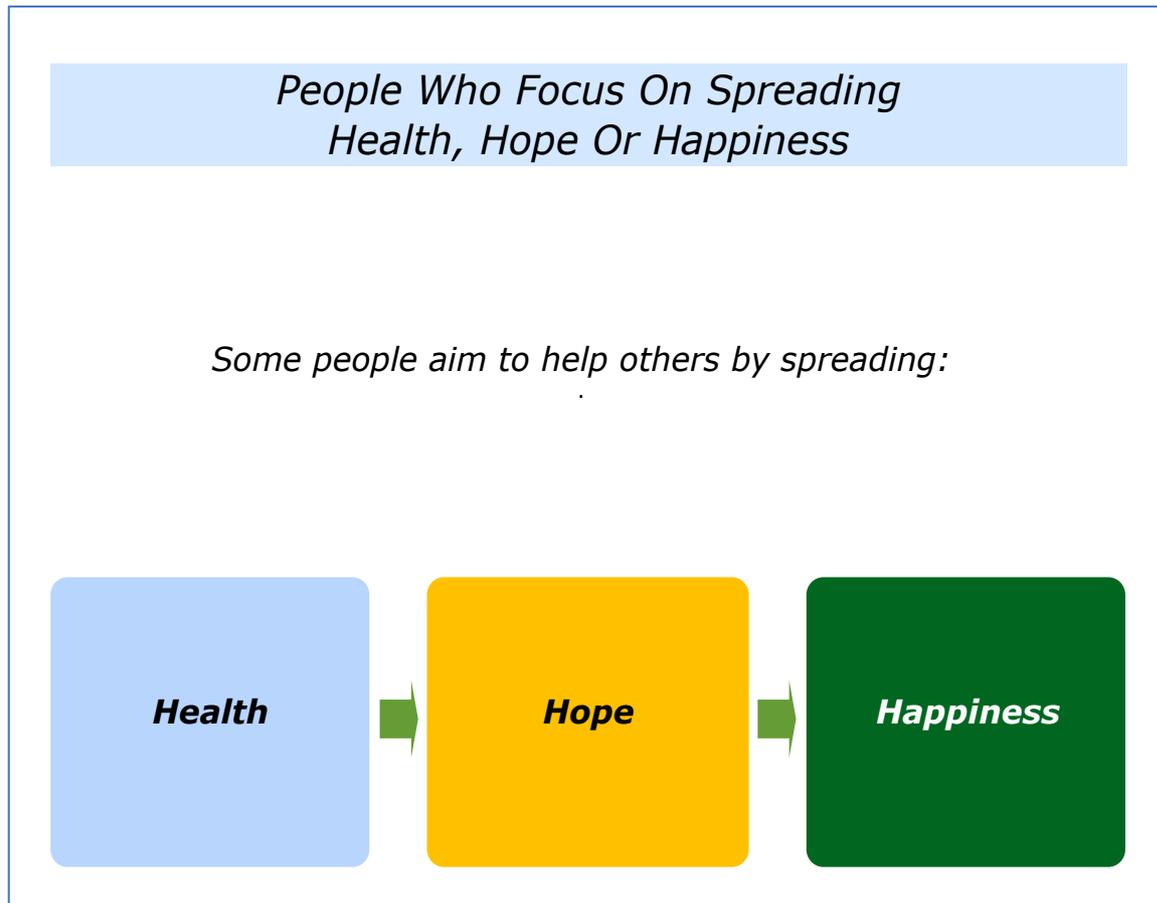

2) I have ...

For example:

3) I have ...

For example:

Different people have different motivations for pursuing a purpose. They also do this in different ways. The next sections looks at people who may do this by taking the following routes.

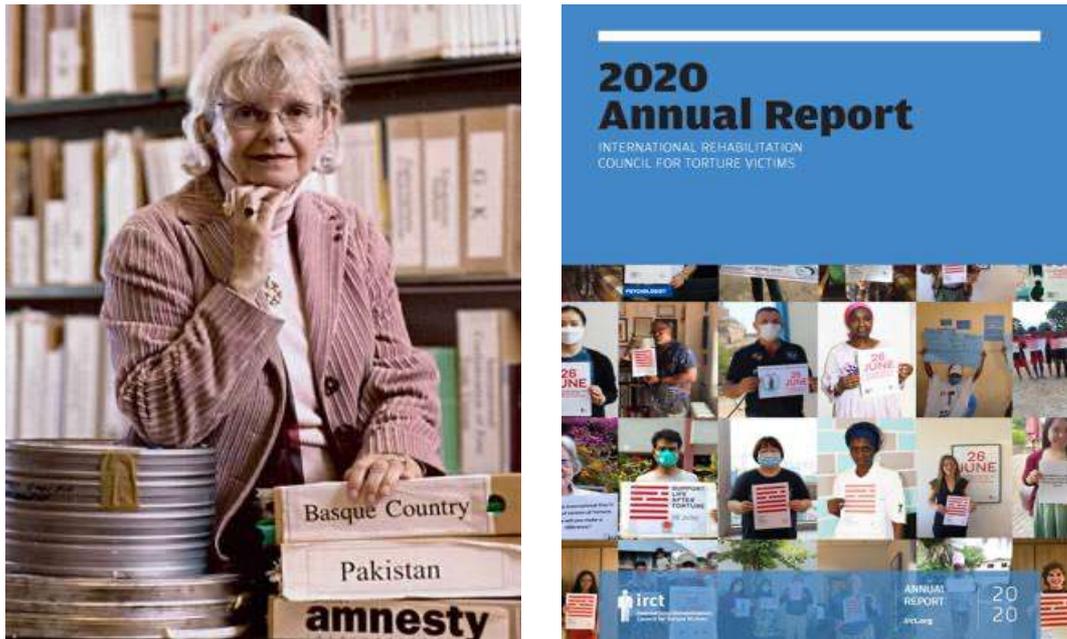

Many people aim to help others in their lives. Some aim to do this by using their strengths to focus on spreading health, hope or happiness. Let's explore these themes.

People Who Aim To Spread Health

They may provide people with food, shelter and an environment that improves their chances of staying healthy. They may work as a carer, medic or other kind of health professional. They may do work that helps people to take care of their physical or psychological health.

Different people aim to spread health in different ways. Let's look at one example.

Inge Genefke - Caring For The Victims Of Torture

Some people try to crush the human spirit. Others try to maintain or revive it.

Inge Genefke, a Danish doctor, founded the International Rehabilitation Council for Torture Victims in 1985. It aimed to do three things.

To rehabilitate people who have been tortured and to care for their families;

To educate people in the treatment of torture victims;

To contribute to the prevention of torture.

Since then the IRCT has grown and has groups all over the world. Here is the present mission that you can find on its web site.

The IRCT is a health-based umbrella organisation that supports the rehabilitation of torture victims and the prevention of torture worldwide. Our members comprise more than 140 independent organisations in over 70 countries. Our work is governed by these member organisations.

Today, we are the largest membership-based civil society organisation to work in the field of torture rehabilitation and

Here is some background on Inge and the work of the IRCT. You can find this on the web site and is based on Thomas Larsen's book: The Meeting with Evil - Inge Genefke's Fight Against Torture.

Dr Genefke became aware of the existence of torture while still a child during Germany's occupation of Denmark in World War II.

With a father who was active in the Danish resistance movement there was a very real risk that torture would have a direct impact on her life. Fortunately, that risk never materialised. But it had set a young girl on the path of remarkable journey.

In 1974, after training as a neurologist, Dr Genefke, together with three fellow doctors, responded to a call by Amnesty International (AI) to help diagnose torture victims and produce forensic evidence that could help hold torturers to account in a court of law.

Forming AI's first medical group focusing on the question of torture, the doctors began to see torture survivors who had fled the cruel regimes then in place in Latin America, notably Chile, Argentina and Uruguay, as well as in Greece.

"After examining just the first 15 victims, we concluded they suffered horrible psychological sequelae. Of course we found physical sequelae.

"But the worst sequelae were psychological: depression and anxiety, the inability to concentrate and the terrible guilt", says Dr Genefke, who has personally provided direct treatment to hundreds of torture survivors.

In 1982 she founded one of the world's first clinics specialised in torture rehabilitation, the Rehabilitation Centre for Torture Victims (now the Rehabilitation and Research Centre for Torture Victims).

Three years later, she founded the International Rehabilitation Council for Torture Victims (IRCT).

Ever since she has worked incessantly and with fierce energy to garner support for the fight against torture, countless times addressing politicians and loudly criticising those in power in a wide-range of countries- democracies as well as dictatorships.

Commenting on the so-called "War on Terror" she has time and again refuted the notion that torture can be a safeguard against terrorism:

"Torture is not about extracting vital information to make the world a safer place, but rather to break the spirit of dissidents.

"It does not prevent terror; it creates terrorists. When you torture, you create violent hatred.

"If my father had been tortured by the Germans during their occupation I'm sure I would have become violent" says Dr Genefke.

The key to her remarkable achievements and dedication lies in her insistence that indifference and ignorance are the greatest foes of a world without torture:

"Often I am asked how I can stand being involved in this field. I also find it painful hearing about torture, but rather than be left in ignorance. With knowledge, I can fight it."

The knowledge and attention that her work has helped create plays no small role in the fact that across the world there is an ever-growing number of citizens who refuse to turn their backs on the mention of torture, let alone on its victims and those working against torture.

The IRCT continues with its necessary work around the world.

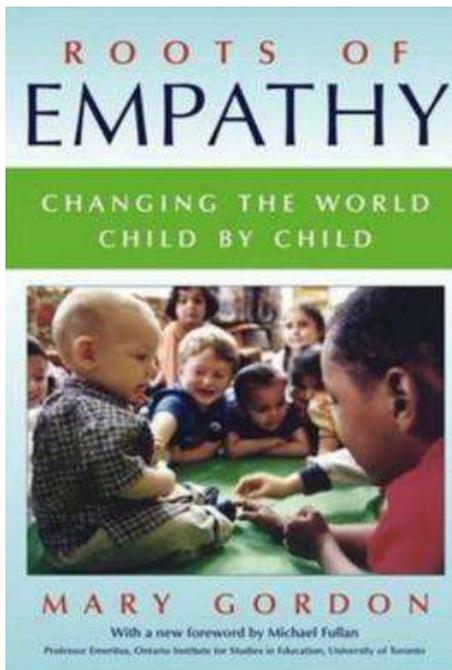

It keeps the human spirit alive and has drawn the following response from the Dalai Lama:

"Your organisation is actually compassion implemented."

Mary Gordon and The Roots Of Empathy

Mary Gordon chose to help people to build positive relationships. She founded the organisation and programme called Roots of Empathy.

This aims to build caring, peaceful and civil societies through the development of empathy in children and adults. Here are excerpts from the organisation's website.

The Roots Of Empathy programme involves bringing a local baby into the classroom.

Children then learn how to understand and care for the needs of another human being.

The programme has spread across many countries and produced remarkable results.

Children become more caring, peaceful and able to solve problems.

In the programme a parent and baby (who is two to four months old at the start of the program) from the community visit a classroom nine times over the course of a school year.

A trained Roots of Empathy instructor visits with the family to guide children as they observe the relationship between the baby and its parent.

The instructor also visits before and after each family visit to reinforce teachings. There are 27 classroom visits in total in a Roots of Empathy program.

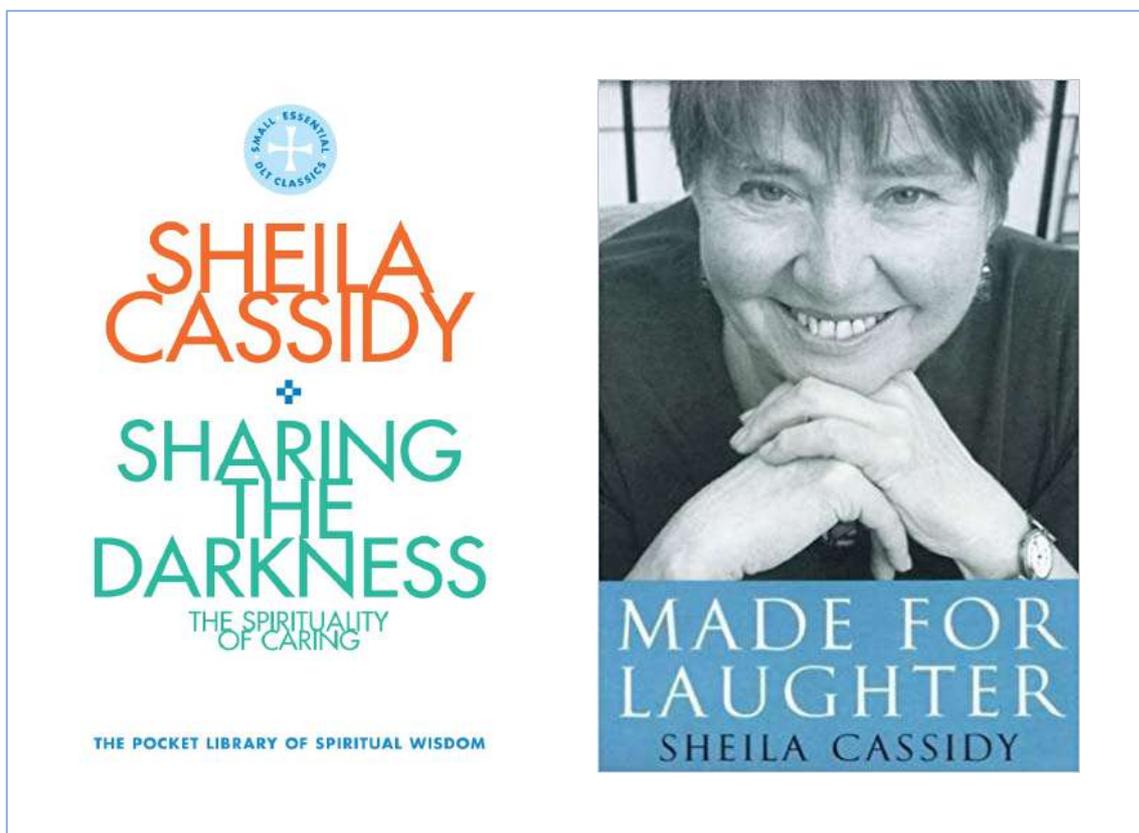

In the program, the baby is the "Teacher." With each family visit, the instructor leads the children in noticing how the baby is growing and changing over the course of his or her first year of life.

The children also watch the loving relationship between the parent and baby and see how the parent responds to the baby's emotions and meets the baby's needs. The attachment relationship between a baby and a parent is an ideal model of empathy.

Children learn to understand the perspective of the baby and label the baby's feelings. They are then guided in extending this learning outwards so they have a better understanding of their own feelings and the feelings of others.

Mary chose this path to pursue a compelling purpose. This has helped many young people to develop skills they can use to build positive relationships in their future lives.

Sheila Cassidy - Caring In Action

Sheila has dedicated much of her life to serving the principle of caring for people. Trained as a doctor, she was arrested and tortured after treating an opponent of the Pinochet regime in Chile.

Subjected to electric shocks, Sheila had a towel stuffed in her mouth to prevent her screaming. Later she would describe in graphic detail the pain of being tortured.

Torture victims often experience three kinds of pain. The memory of past pain, the experience of the present pain and the anticipation of future pain.

Sheila was in prison for almost two months before being released and returning to Britain. Looking back in later years, she explained that naivety led to her arrest in Chile.

The daft thing is, I was never politically active: all I had done was to accede to a priest's request to treat a wounded man.

I also thought that no one would harm the daughter of a British Air Vice-Marshal. Surely, if I were caught, I would simply be deported.

Sheila continued her career in medicine and became Medical Director of St. Luke's Hospice in Plymouth. Writing in Sharing The Darkness, she describes her first meeting with a patient.

Once alone with a new patient I introduce myself, explain that I have come at the request of their doctor, and ask them to tell me their story. It is in the telling of the story that I meet my patient and in my listening to him that he meets me.

Everything depends on the quality of my listening: the patient must understand clearly from my verbal and non-verbal cues that I am interested in him as a person as well as his physical problems.

Sheila talks of Frank, a Manchester builder, who suddenly became paralysed from the waist down. The cancer in his kidney reached his spine and the staff helped him to wrestle with his sense of loss. He would never walk again.

Driving around Plymouth, Sheila reflects on her own personality, her strengths and limits. She writes:

I found myself saying again and again, 'You wash the feet that will not walk tomorrow', and realised that this was my job, my calling.

I, who have little patience with the demented and no love for tiny babies, have a special gift of warmth and understanding for those whose time is running out.

I, who hate parties and find it nigh impossible to make small talk know instinctively what to say and do for a gentle Manchester builder who is facing the humiliation of incontinence and the fear of death

Hospices have much to teach our society, says Sheila. They value the vulnerable, the brain-damaged, the sick and the old. They do this in a world that values competition and economic success.

Sheila is not talking about building more hospices. She is talking about expanding the hospice philosophy across society.

All people are precious; all people need love; all people want to find peace in their lives. She felt humble in the presence of others who wanted to give. Sheila gives the following example.

I recall the young Catholic woman dying of cancer who asked me one day, 'How can I use my suffering for others?'

Sheila considers herself creative but messy. This is highlighted in the following description of her autobiography.

In Made for Laughter, she writes with stark honesty of her struggle to overcome depression and insomnia, and her courageous but unsuccessful attempt to establish a new kind of religious order for women.

She returned to medicine, worked with the terminally ill and developed new approaches to the care of young cancer patients, before training as a psychotherapist.

Made for Laughter is a story of grace under pressure, and an inspirational guide for everyone who has ever grappled with the puzzle of finding our true purpose in life.*

Impetuous and irrepressible, Sheila Cassidy has discovered that, in the words of Desmond Tutu: "We are made for compassion, for caring, and for sharing - but also for laughter."

People Who Aim To Spread Hope

Different people spread hope in different ways. Some offer people practical encouragement. Some show how to find solutions to challenge. Some offer positive models and practical tools that people can use to shape their futures.

Some show it is possible to create hope in even the most difficult circumstances. Let's look at some examples.

Johann Olav Koss – Giving Children The Right To Play

WE PLAY FOR CHANGE

Right To Play is harnessing one of the most powerful and fundamental forces in every child's life, the power of play. Our programs protect, educate, and empower children to heal from the harsh realities of war and abuse, to change their behavior and protect themselves from disease, to go to school, graduate and create a better future.

PROTECT. EDUCATE. EMPOWER.

It's what we do for over 2.3 million children each year.

Johann was a speed skater who won three Gold Medals at the 1994 Winter Olympic Games. This opened the gate to many possibilities for his future career. But Johann had already committed himself to another path.

A few months earlier he had visited Eritrea. This led to him creating the Right To Play movement. Here is the organisation's Mission.

Right To Play's mission is to use sport and play to educate and empower children and youth to overcome the effects of poverty, conflict and disease in disadvantaged communities.

For more than 20 years, Right To Play has worked in some of the most difficult and dangerous places on earth to help children to stay in school and graduate, resist exploitation and overcome prejudice, keep themselves safe from disease, and heal from the harsh realities of war and abuse.

It began with a boy in a long-sleeve t-shirt. He allowed his shirt to be rolled into a ball that could be used to play football.

In 1994, Norwegian speed skater Johann Olav Koss led a humanitarian trip to Eritrea. There he came face-to-face with the realities of life in a country emerging from decades of war – and with the power of play.

Amid burned-out tanks, children played together, kicking the boy's shirt – which had been rolled into making a shirt ball - back and forth. The children's incredible resilience in the face of hopelessness inspired Koss to found Right To Play.

Since then Right To Play has grown to reach more than 2 million children in 15 countries in Africa, Asia, the Middle East and Canada. We create positive and safe environments where children can learn and succeed.

HOW WE PLAY

Different types of play give children the opportunity to learn different things. Inside the classroom, games help children to actively engage in their lessons, enhancing their learning. Outside of the classroom, they play through performance, music or dance to gain critical life skills.

Our work focuses on four types of play:

GAMES  Ignite a passion for learning by providing resources that make learning and life-skills development active, engaging and fun.	SPORT  Transcends boundaries, inspires, instills positive values, and develops healthy behavior.	CREATIVE PLAY  Enables self-expression and creates a space for dialogue through art, drama, role-playing and performance.	FREE PLAY  Unlocks the benefits of child-led, self-directed play by providing access to safe, child-friendly play spaces.
--	--	--	---

Sheikh Abu Turay - Liberation Chocolate

Sheikh Abu Turay is somebody who focused on a clear purpose. He rehabilitated child soldiers and enabled them to do good work in Liberation Chocolate. Let's begin with his own story.

Sheikh was ten years-old when he fled the war in Liberia. He spent the next 14 years in a refugee camp before returning home.

The war had killed more than 250,000 people. It had also put guns in the hands of 150,000 people, many of them children. Sheik takes up the story.

Get around the right people, don't get defeated in times of adversity.

People will get excited about your idea and that will help you scale your impact.

When I returned to Liberia, I found a completely failed and devastated country with cocoa farms overgrown as far as the eyes can see.

I also witnessed former combatants turning in their guns in order to receive USD150 but these guys had no livelihood once the USD150 ran out. They were still vulnerable to fall back into crime and even get re-recruited by militants. I decided to tackle these problems by creating employment opportunities for these former child soldiers and the unemployed."

Cocoa farming, once an economic engine and critical source of employment in this impoverished West African country, had virtually collapsed.

Sheikh began to guide and coach the young people to become socially and economically responsible citizens and skilled, passionate cocoa farmers.

Here is a summary of the organisation's work which is taken from the Social Entrepreneurship Forum website.

Liberation Chocolate is an organisation that harvests cocoa from formerly abandoned cocoa farms. It employs former child soldiers as farmers paying them fair wages in an aim to rehabilitate and reintegrate them into society.

The business serves five key areas:

The farmers who are liberated from poverty through the provision of income generated from non-commercial farms;

The employees who are elevated and engaged in society;

The customers who are committed to quality products and Liberation Chocolate's mission;

The end product consumers and social investors who are eager to enable Liberation Chocolates social mission and for-profit mode.

The company aims to employ more than 1,500 former child soldiers across 80-plus reconditioned farms in Liberia. It has already produced positive results on both a human and economic level.

People Who Aim To Spread Happiness

Different people spread happiness in different ways. Some aim to create encouraging environments that offer people positive experiences. Some aims to lift people's spirits. Let's look at some examples.

Cindy Chang – Before I Die

Candy is an artist who is passionate about exploring how our public spaces can help us make sense of our lives. She became well-known through her participatory public artwork called Before I Die.

She made the original piece on land in New Orleans. Since then the approach has been replicated in more than 5000 cities across the world. Here are excerpts from how Cindy describes the project.

came to be.

Before I Die reimagines how the walls of our cities can help us grapple with mortality and meaning as a community today - and I never expected it to go beyond my neighborhood.

I created the first Before I Die wall in New Orleans after the death of someone I loved. Joan was like a mother to me for fifteen years and there were still so many things she wanted to do: learn to play the piano, live in France, see the Pacific Ocean.

The shock of her death sent me into a long period of grief and depression. My inner world didn't feel like it belonged outside at all, and I noticed how much we avoid talking about death.

With time I felt gratitude for the time we had together and I found clarity in my life by contemplating death so much, but I struggled to maintain this perspective. It's easy to get caught up in the day-to-day and forget what really matters to you.

I lived a block away from an abandoned house that had been collecting dust and graffiti for years. I wondered if I could make it a nicer space for my neighborhood and make a tribute to Joan by creating a space to restore perspective. I made a homemade stencil that said:

"Before I die I want to ..."

With help from old and new friends, I painted the side of this crumbling house with chalkboard paint and stencilled it with this prompt so that anyone walking by could pick up a piece of chalk, reflect on death and life, and share their personal aspirations in public.

By the next day, the wall was entirely filled and it kept growing: Before I die I want to ...

"Sing for millions ... Abandon all insecurities ... Get my wife back. Eat all the carbs I want ... Hold her one more time ... Be completely myself."

The gamut of humanity was on full display, and the wall became an honest mess of the longing, fear, insecurity, gratitude, humor, pain, and grace you find in every community.

Seeing some private corner of your psyche reflected in someone else's handwriting on a public wall can be incredibly reassuring on an individual level, and it's a step towards seeing ourselves in one another.

I received hundreds of messages from people around the world who wanted to make walls with their communities. I made resources and a step-by-step guide, and today, thanks to passionate people around the world, over 5,000 Before I Die walls have been created in over 75 countries and over 35 languages.

It has been one of the greatest experiences of my life to see this little experiment grow into a global project. I am continuously inspired by everyone's walls, which have revealed just how much we are the same.

Photograph by Terrence McCarthy

My advice for people is to love the world they are in, in whatever way makes sense to them. It may be a devotional practice, it may be song or poetry, it may be by gardening, it may be as an activist, scientist, or community leader.

What I see everywhere in the world are ordinary people willing to confront despair, power, and incalculable odds in order to restore some semblance of grace, justice, and beauty to this world.

There is invisible writing on the back of the diploma you will receive, and in case you didn't bring lemon juice to decode it, I can tell you what it says: You are Brilliant, and the Earth is Hiring.

The earth couldn't afford to send recruiters or limos to your school. It sent you rain, sunsets, ripe cherries, night blooming jasmine, and that unbelievably cute person you are dating. Take the hint.

When asked if I am pessimistic or optimistic about the future, my answer is always the same: If you look at the science about what is happening on earth and aren't pessimistic, you don't understand the data.

But if you meet the people who are working to restore this earth and the lives of the poor, and you aren't optimistic, you haven't got a pulse.

You join a multitude of caring people. No one knows how many groups and organizations are working on the most salient issues of our day: climate change, poverty, deforestation, peace, water, hunger, conservation, human rights, and more.

We have done great things and we have gone way off course in terms of honoring creation. You are graduating to the most amazing, stupefying challenge ever bequested to any generation.

Nature beckons you to be on her side. You couldn't ask for a better boss.

The most unrealistic person in the world is the cynic, not the dreamer.

*Hope only makes sense when it doesn't make sense to be hopeful.
This is your century. Take it and run as if your life depends on it.*

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to spread health, hope or happiness. Sometimes they combine all three elements when aiming to encourage people on the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Health, Hope Or Happiness Approach

The specific activity where I may want to focus on spreading health, hope or happiness may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a results of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Clarifying Your Purpose

As we have seen, there are many ways to pursue a purpose. Many people's primary purpose is simply to get access to the basics of life. They focus on how to get food and be healthy.

Many other people have access to these basics. Some then simply want to accumulate money, but some want to go further. They want to give to others and pursue a satisfying purpose.

Viktor Frankl, the author of Man's Search For Meaning, spent much of his life helping people to find their meaning in life. He explained this in the following way.

Everyone has his own specific vocation or mission in life; everyone must carry out a concrete assignment that demands fulfilment.

As mentioned earlier, there are several ways that people begin clarifying their purpose. These include the following.

Purpose

There are many ways for a person to develop a sense of purpose. Here are some of the most common approaches.

- They focus on the positive things they want to give to people during their time on the planet.
- They focus on how they can use their strengths to do satisfying work that helps other people to succeed.
- They focus on something they want to serve that is greater than themselves - such as a spiritual faith, a sense of vocation or a specific mission.
- They focus on their inner compass – such as their personal values, the things they care about or their life goals – and aim to follow this compass every day.
- They focus on doing their personal best in life and aim to leave a positive legacy.

Some people may have a number of overlapping themes. That is fine. They can then choose one they want to focus on in the future.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to pursue a specific purpose. This could be a relatively simple aim, such as aiming to encourage people. Alternatively, it could be focusing on something bigger, such as following a compelling theme.

Here is the exercise called My Purpose. This invites you to describe something you really want to do in your life. You can begin by completing the following words.

My Purpose

The specific thing I really want to do is:

I want to ...

If appropriate, start by brainstorming lots of things and then settle on one theme. Don't worry about getting it perfect. It may take a lifetime to get the wording right.

The one-liner you settle on, however, can give a pointer to your purpose. Here are some examples of phrases that people have written on this theme.

The specific thing I really want to do is:

I want to encourage people ... I want to promote justice ... I want to help people to take care of their health ... I want to create enriching environments in which people grow ... I want to increase the amount of happiness in the world

I want to help people to recover from cancer ... I want to create beautiful things that give people positive memories for life ... I want to educate people to appreciate different cultures ... I want to help people to find peaceful solutions to conflicts.

Here is the exercise on defining a purpose. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Purpose

*The specific thing
I really want to do is:*

*

The specific things I can do to translate this purpose into action are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing these things may be:

*

*

*

The Pursuing Your Purpose Approach

Pursuing My Purpose

My Purpose Is:

* To ...

The specific things I want to do to pursue my purpose today are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Imagine that you have clarified your purpose and how to translate this into action. The next step will be to keep pursuing your purpose. How to make this happen?

One approach is to translate your purpose into achieving certain long-term goals. You may aim: a) to achieve specific things in your personal or professional life; b) to pass on a positive legacy; c) to achieve a picture of success.

Another approach is to pursue your purpose each day. Depending on their long-term aims, different people will do this in different ways. They can then translate their aims into daily actions.

Looking at my own life, for example, I aim to be a positive encourager. The work I do as a mentor makes it relatively simple to translate this into daily action. It provides the opportunity to encourage the mentees I work with around the world.

There are other situations where it can be important to focus on how to be a positive encourager. Looking at one example, there are times when I have medical treatment. This means that the whole day is occupied with travel, being in the medical centre and getting superb treatment.

Looking ahead, I think about how to encourage people during this day. Sometimes this can involve aiming:

To encourage people close to me before setting out for the day;

To use the train travel time to write an encouraging piece on social media;

To encourage the medical workers and other people I meet during the day.

While these are obvious things to do, they help to provide a sense of purpose and joy during the day. Then, when returning home, I aim to follow my purpose in other ways in my personal and professional life.

You will have your own way of pursuing your purpose. When appropriate, however, it can be useful to look ahead and focus on how you can translate this into action each day. This can help to provide meaning to the day.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Pursuing My Purpose

My Purpose Is:

*

The specific things I can do to pursue my purpose today are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Principles Approach

My Principles

The principles I want to follow in my life are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Imagine that you have begun to clarify your purpose. You may want to help other people, create beauty, do satisfying work, pass on a positive legacy or pursue another activity. You may then aim to pursue your purpose by following certain principles.

Different people follow different principles. Some aim to keep giving to people on the way towards doing good work. They love to do work that helps present and future generations.

Some individuals may do this in their role as a parent, educator, nurse, knowledge worker, trusted advisor or another role. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I have been given so much by other people. My parents encouraged me to follow my interests even though I had difficulties at school.

"Later I had a dance teacher and a sports coach who encouraged me to do what I do best. This eventually led to me studying to be an osteopath and, with some help, learning how to pass exams.

"Now I want to help people to feel healthy. It is time to pass on the care I have been given and to help other people."

Givers follow their chosen guidelines – principles – on the way towards doing good work. Many of them embody the positive traits that are admired across many civilisations.

Martin Seligman and Christopher Peterson explored such principles in their book Character Strengths and Virtues. Working with a team of researchers, they studied examples of positive traits and moral excellence that are admired across different philosophies, religions and cultures.

The researchers interviewed over 15,000 people in different cultures. After extensive research, the team settled on six key virtues – admired ways of behaving - though these are obviously interlinked. Martin explains their approach in the following way.

When we look we see that there are six virtues, which we find endorsed across cultures, and these break down into 24 strengths.

The six virtues that we find are non-arbitrary - first, a wisdom and knowledge cluster; second, a courage cluster; third, virtues like love and humanity; fourth, a justice cluster; fifth a temperance, moderation cluster; and sixth a spirituality, transcendence cluster.

We sent people up to northern Greenland, and down to the Masai, and are involved in a 70-nation study in which we look at the ubiquity of these.

Indeed, we're beginning to have the view that those six virtues are just as much a part of human nature as walking on two feet are.

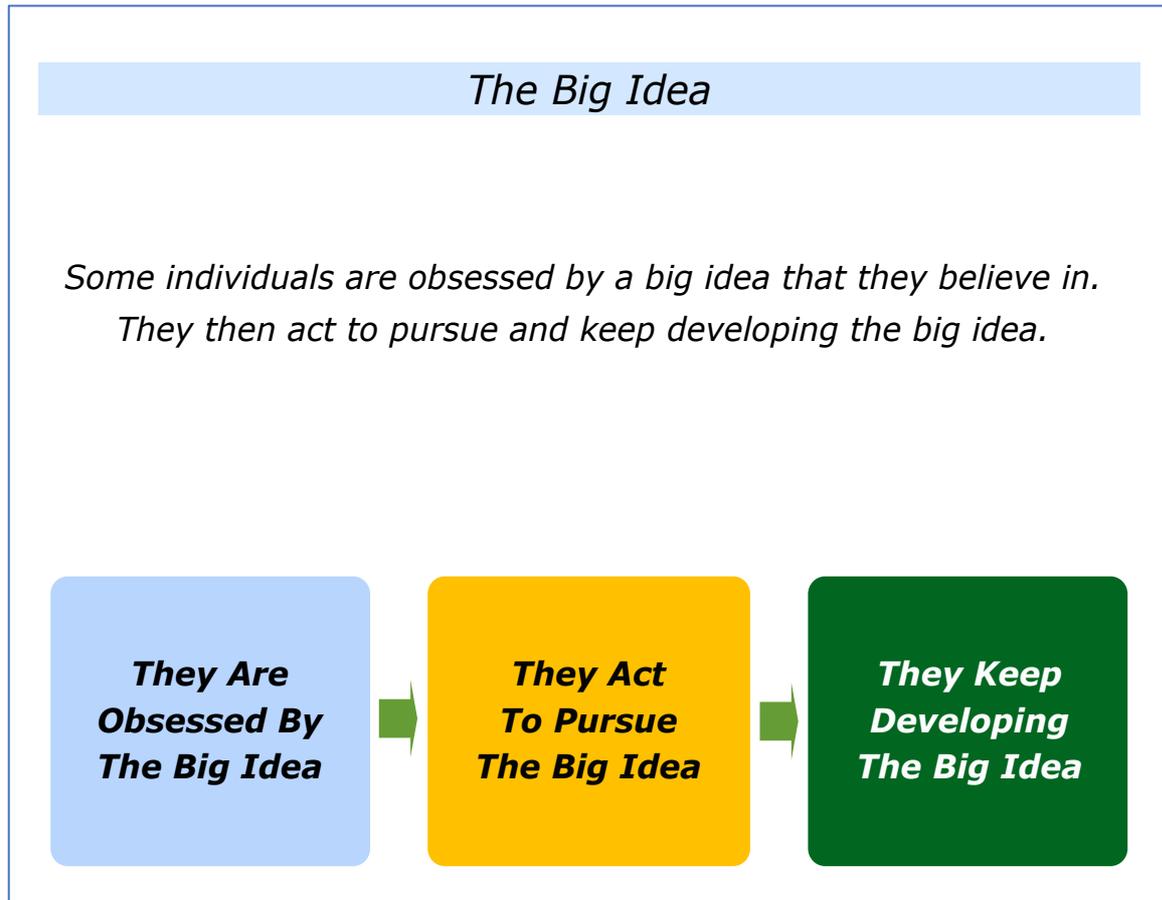

Positive Traits

The six human virtues and the 24 character strengths that are admired across cultures

- Wisdom and Knowledge Creativity, curiosity, judgment, love of learning, perspective.
- Courage Bravery, persistence, honesty, zest.
- Humanity Love, kindness, social intelligence.
- Justice Teamwork (citizenship, loyalty, social responsibility), fairness, leadership.
- Temperance Forgiveness, humility, prudence, self-regulation.
- Transcendence Appreciation of beauty and excellence, gratitude, hope, humour, spirituality.

Different people choose different ways to embody the positive traits. Let's explore some of these approaches.

The Big Idea Approach

Some people follow elements of this approach in their lives and work. Some do this by focusing on the following themes.

They Are Obsessed By The Big Idea

Some individuals are obsessed by a big idea. They are single-minded and cut out the other things happening around them. They may aim to follow a certain philosophy, pursue certain principles or do a certain project.

Some translate this into aiming to achieve a specific goal. They may aim to write a book, take political action, find a medical cure, invent a product, win an Olympic Gold Medal or achieve another aim.

Some people manage their obsession in positive ways. They may be able to balance caring for their loved ones with exploring their big idea. Whilst encouraging other people, they may also encourage themselves by setting aside blocks of time to pursue their compelling passion.

Different people are obsessed by different ideas. Here are some of the ideas they may mention.

The Big Idea That I Am Obsessed With Is:

How to encourage people ... How to help people to take care of their health ... How to make music that inspires people ... How to help people with a certain kind of cancer.

How to find solutions to conflicts ... How to produce software that simplifies people's lives ... How to do sustainable farming ... How to inspire people to take care of the planet.

Some individuals go further than being obsessed by an idea. They move on to the next stage.

They Act To Pursue The Big Idea

Some individuals want to translate their big idea into action. Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

Penny Brohn wanted to help women to have more options for taking care of themselves when being diagnosed with cancer. This led to her setting up the Bristol Cancer Help Centre.

Susan Cain wanted to help introverts. This led to her writing Quiet: The power of introverts in a world that can't stop talking. Her work has helped many people to channel their introversion in a positive way.

Wangari Maathai believed in helping to heal the Earth. She chose to focus on planting trees and starting the Green Belt Movement. This has led to people planting many millions of trees in Kenya.

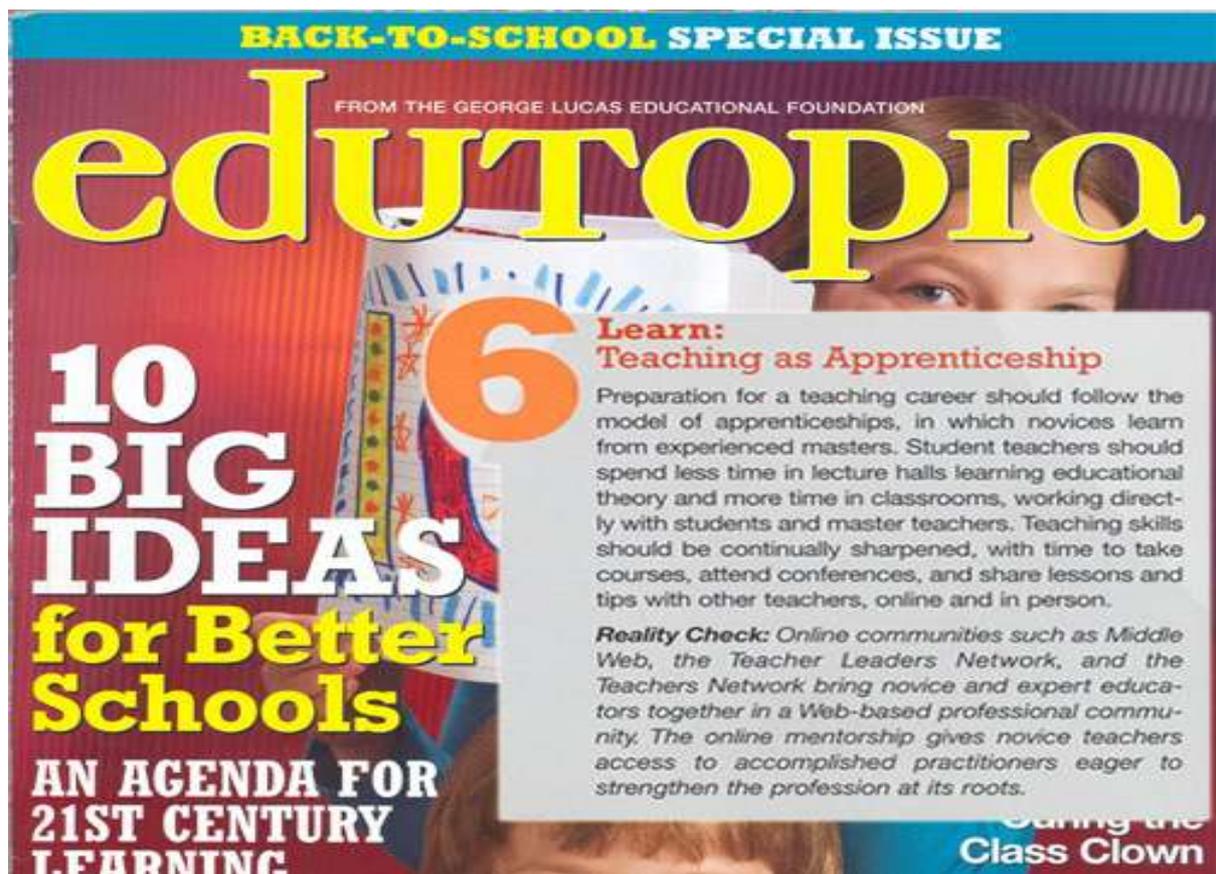

Different people pursue their obsession in different ways. This can then lead to the next stage.

They Keep Developing The Big Idea

Some individuals love to keep returning to their big idea. They love to find ways to polish and improve it. Sometimes this can become a lifetime obsession. They find different ways to express and develop the big idea.

Some do it through writing articles, publishing books and teaching seminars. Some do it through refining the service, product, medicine, invention or other things they offer. Some do it by adding to the knowledge they aim to pass on to people.

George Lucas is somebody who took the latter approach. Best known for his films, he also wanted to provide educators with ideas and tools they could use to inspire their students. He founded the website Edutopia – What Works In Education. Here is an introduction.

OUR VISION

We believe that improving education is the key to the survival of the human race.

We envision a new world of learning, one where students become lifelong learners and develop 21st-century skills. It's a world where innovation is the rule, not the exception. It's a world where schools provide rigorous project-based learning, social and emotional learning, and access to new technology. It's a world where students and parents, teachers and administrators, policymakers, and the people they serve are all empowered with a shared vision to change education for the better.

We call this place Edutopia, and we provide not just the vision for this new world of learning but the information, the evidence, and the community connections to make it a reality.

In particular, in the 21st century, we believe three skills are fundamental

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on a big idea. Some people find such an idea, some people may find that the idea finds them. They may then pursue and keep developing their obsession.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a big idea you would like to pursue? If you wish, try brainstorming under the following heading.

The Big Idea That I Would Like To Pursue Is:

How to ...

Looking ahead, how can you pursue this idea in your own way? How can you then keep developing the big idea? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Big Idea Approach

The big idea that I would like to pursue is:

*

The specific things I can do to pursue and keep developing this idea in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Experiences Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to offer people experiences that can create positive memories for life.

Different people do this in different ways. They may do it when encouraging people as parents, educators, carers, performing artists, event organisers, hospitality workers, leaders or in other roles.

There are many ways to take these steps. One approach is to offer experiences that may include elements of being enjoyable, encouraging, exciting, educational or enlightening.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you aimed to offer a positive experience to a person or a group of people? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Experiences In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I aimed to offer a positive experience to a person or a group of people was:

*

The specific things I did then to aim to offer the positive experience to them were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

There are many ways to offer positive experiences. Let's look at some of the possibilities.

Enjoyable Experiences

Some people take this step by encouraging people to do what they enjoy. This can help others to feel alive, energetic and even inspired. It can enable them to gain strength to tackle challenges they may face in the future.

Some people use their strengths to provide enjoyable experiences. They may do this when working as a chef, hotelier, sports coach, entertainer, performing artist or when doing another activity. These can give people positive memories for life.

Encouraging Experiences

Some people encourage others in their daily life and work. They aim to do this when acting as a parent, teacher, counsellor, mentor or in another role.

Ian Wright, the former Arsenal and England footballer, often talks about how he received such help from one of his teachers, Sydney Pigden. Many years later they met when Ian was making a television programme.

The producers invited Sydney along to pay a surprise visit. Ian later recounted what he had gained from his teacher. Here is a summary of what he said.

"Mr Pigden had a massive impact on me. For me he will remain the greatest man in the world. He was a guiding light all the way through my career, as people saw in the video when I was reunited with him.

"I dedicated my book to him and I think that was the least I could do for somebody that literally turned my life around, in respect to teaching me how to be a decent human being.

"I met him when I was seven, so we're talking about 50 years ago, and it was because I wasn't being particularly good in class.

"I wasn't able to learn as quickly as the rest of the kids were. So he gave me responsibilities, like a registered a milk monitor, you know, things like that. Then when I started playing football, he really backed me.

"I don't know why he chose me. I'm glad that he did. Once he come in, everything was so much better.

"I used to collect the registers from the teachers. Then they made me milk monitor. I really liked that. It was really good. I just felt important.

Exciting Experiences

Some individuals use their talents to offer exciting experiences to people. They may do this in their role as an artist, entertainer, film maker, educator or when doing other work.

Some organise or lead experiences that people may find exciting. They may do this by offering volunteers or customers the chance to take part in exercise, mountaineering, yachting or other adrenaline activities.

Educational Experiences

Many teachers, coaches, mentors and other individuals aim to provide people with great educational experiences. Such people sometimes aim:

To clarify the person's goals – the specific things they want to learn;

To provide an experience that enables the person to develop the skills required to achieve their goals;

To encourage the person to clarify what they have learned and to apply these lessons to achieve their present and future goals.

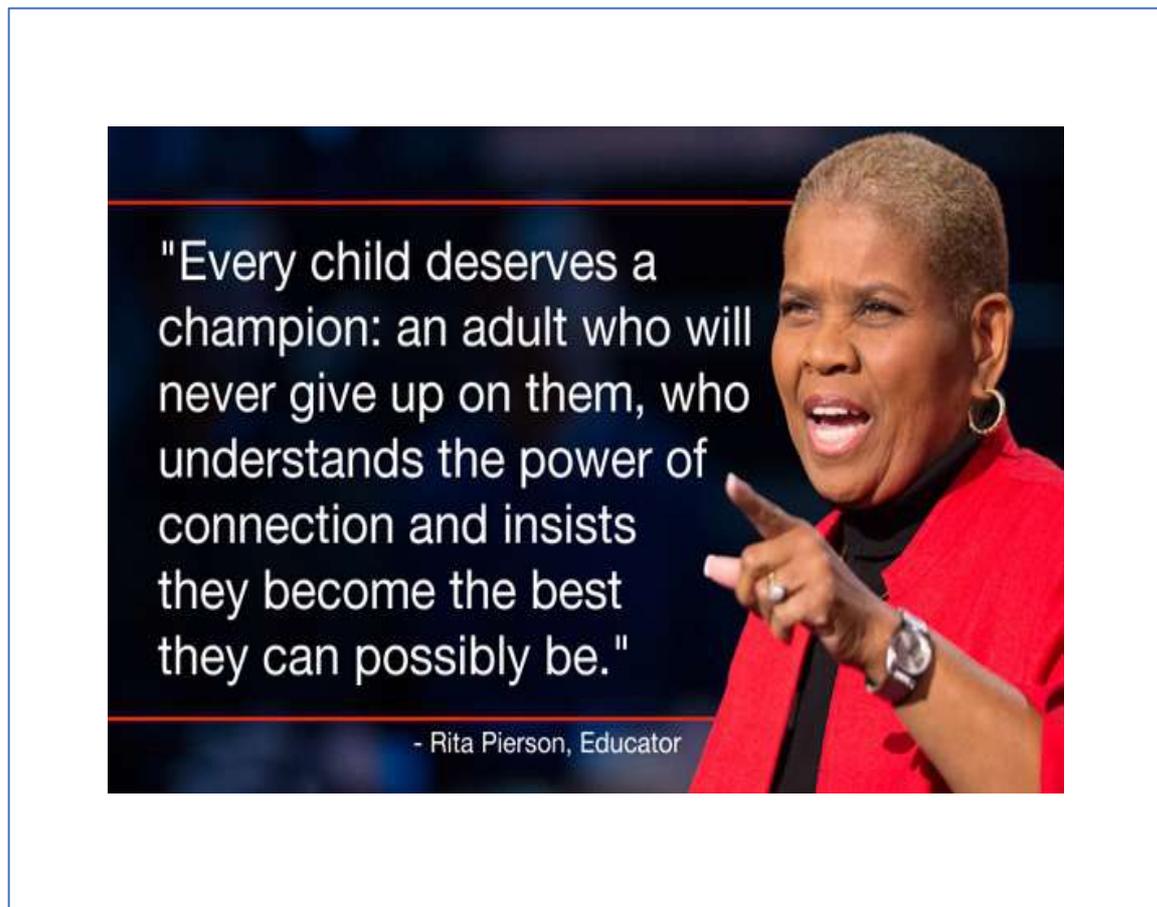

Some people do this in a school, college or other formal setting. Some do it in a workshop, on the training ground or during the working day. Some do it in more informal settings.

Educators aim to do this all the time. They also recognise the importance of building a good relationship with each of their students. This can create the environment in which people can grow.

Rita Pierson, who gave a famous TED Talk called Every Kid Needs A Champion, was one such teacher. The following section provides excerpts from how Rita described her work.

Teachers don't make a lot of money and their major accomplishments are shared only with colleagues and family members and not the media. The celebration is often cut short by some catastrophe the next day.

Yet, in spite of the highs and lows, I cannot think of another profession that brings both joy and challenge on a daily basis.

In the spring of my career, I found myself questioning the choice of my life's work. I am now in year 40. And while I am no longer in the classroom or at the schoolhouse, I remain an educator.

It finally dawned on me that there was no other profession that would let me change children's minds and have an impact on their future, long after the school day and school year were over.

For every student that finally "got it," for every rookie teacher that said, "you inspired me to stay," I get the raise that never quite made it to my pay check.

We must address what we teach and when we teach it, but we must not forget to include how we deliver those lessons. Unless there is a connection between teacher, student and lesson, learning becomes tiresome to all involved. Veteran educator, James Comer, states that:

"No significant learning occurs without a significant relationship."

Strong relationships encourage learner exploration, dialogue, confidence, and mutual respect. I made it my business to know everything I could about my students.

Where they lived and with whom, how often they changed schools, how many siblings they had, whether or not they lived in a house or an apartment, whether there was trauma or drama in the household.

I went on home visits and shopped in the neighborhood stores so I could be certain to run into my students and the folk they lived with. (Some of my best parent conferences were held on the produce aisle at the grocery store).

The more you know about a person, the easier it is to develop an alliance (if that is your intention). Positive, healthy relationships rely on clear communication. Without it, misunderstandings occur and intentions are misinterpreted.

I want to look into your eyes when the answer finally dawns on you. I want to hear that inflection in your voice when you are angry with me. I want to see the smile on your face when you forgive me. I want to share in the joy when we both realize that we make a good team.

Enlightening Experiences

Some individuals provide opportunities for people to have enlightening experiences. Sometimes these may involve a person attending a retreat, spiritual practice, development workshop or similar gathering.

Some artists, writers and educators may also create experiences that some people find enlightening. David Attenborough and Jacques Cousteau, for example, created television programmes that enabled people to learn from the beauty of the planet.

Some sages also help people to make breakthroughs. The ones who do this are often generous and put themselves in the background. They do not try to sell themselves or some kind of programme.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to offer a positive experience to a person or a group of people?

You may want to help them to have an enjoyable, encouraging or exciting experience. Sometimes you may want to offer them an educational or even enlightening experience.

How can you do this in your own way? How can you help people to enjoy the experience? How can you help them to have a positive memory for life?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Experiences In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may aim to offer a positive experience to a person or a group of people may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to offer the positive experience to them are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Deviance Approach

Positive deviants behave in ways that are different from others in their community. They experience similar circumstances but the strategies they follow provide solutions to challenges. If appropriate, others can follow these strategies to achieve successful results.

The following section provides an introduction to this approach. It is based on excerpts from the Positive Deviance Collaborative website. Here is the piece.

Positive Deviance (PD) is based on the observation that in every community there are certain individuals or groups whose uncommon behaviors and strategies enable them to find better solutions to problems than their peers, while having access to the same resources and facing similar or worse challenges.

The Positive Deviance approach is an asset-based, problem-solving, and community-driven approach that enables the community to discover these successful behaviors and strategies and develop a plan of action to promote their adoption by all concerned.

The PD approach does not treat such people as heroes. Instead it focuses on the strategies they use to achieve success. The Positive Deviance website explains one of the first examples of this approach.

The term "Positive Deviance" initially appeared in the nutrition research literature in the 1960s.

*The concept of Positive Deviance (PD) in nutrition was further refined in the book Positive Deviance in Child Nutrition by Tufts University professor, Marian Zeitlin, her colleagues Hossein Ghassemi and Mohamed Mansour, published by the United Nations University Press in 1990.*

Based on solid research, the book documented the existence of healthy children or "Positive Deviant" children in very poor families living in communities with high level of childhood malnutrition.

Zeitlin and her colleagues advocated the use of this concept to address childhood malnutrition issues at the community level by identifying what was going right in the community in order to amplify it, as opposed to focusing on what was going wrong in the community and fixing it.

In the early 1990's in Vietnam, Jerry Sternin and his wife, Monique Sternin, working for the US NGO Save the Children, supported by Save the Children Health Advisor Dr. Gretchen Berggren, experimented with Zeitlin's PD concept and operationalized it to eradicate childhood malnutrition in a sustainable way as mandated by the Vietnamese government.

Thanks to the dedicated work of the local organizations working together for the first time (Women's Union, People's Committee and Health Services), the community based and owned pilot project was successful in rehabilitating 93% of children and was subsequently scaled up to reach 5 million families in Vietnam.

The PDs who helped raised healthier children tended to do things that broke with tradition. These included the following:

They fed their children even when they had diarrhoea;

They gave them multiple smaller meals rather than two big ones;

They added 'leftover' sweet potato greens to meals. Though loaded with micronutrients, they were traditionally thought unsuitable for young children and thrown away;

They collected small shrimp and crabs found in the paddy fields – rich in protein and minerals – and including them in their family's diet;

They avoided food waste by actively feeding their children rather than setting the food down in front of them.

Jeremy Sutton described this and other examples in an article called Positive Deviance: 5 Examples Of The Power. He introduced the approach in the following way.

Like positive psychology, positive deviance focuses on what is right rather than what is wrong.

If we are to address humanity's greatest threats – overpopulation, famine, poverty, climate change, loss of jobs due to automation, pandemics, and mental health problems – we need to search for those pockets of people, the positive deviants, who are doing things right.

We must understand them, learn what they do well, and share their knowledge beyond their community.

The PD approach has since been used to tackle many issues regarding health, wellbeing, work and business. Jeremy provides a framework that can be used to apply it in different fields. Here is an introduction to the steps he suggests.

The Steps Of Positive Deviance

Positive deviance is perhaps better thought of as a positive mindset rather than a model or theory.

Its strengths are its simplicity, widespread applicability, and brevity.

The approach is ideal for facing an intractable problem requiring a solution that includes social and behavioral change.

The four Ds – define, determine, discover, and design – are central to delivering a positive deviance outcome (Pascale et al., 2010).

Step 1 – Define the problem and the necessary outcome

The community itself (rather than a set of outsiders) defines, refines, and reframes the issue.

Actions:

Engage with the community to understand the data that measures the problem.

*Create a view of how an improved or ideal future would look.
Explore the issues and barriers associated with the problem.*

Identify the stakeholders.

Be open, and share the findings in community forums.

Step 2 – Determine common practices

The community is most qualified to determine commonplace practices and behaviors.

Actions:

Set up meetings to include different groups across the community.

Involve the community in identifying activities, learnings, and prioritization.

Step 3 – Discover uncommon, successful behaviors

The community identifies positive deviants.

Actions:

Identify who in the community faces the same challenges, with the same resources, yet tackles the problem successfully.

Interview individuals displaying deviant behavior.

Identify the uncommon practices that lead to improved outcomes. Share the lessons learned with the community.

Step 4 – Design an initiative using the learnings

The community comes up with the design and the activities to expand the reach of the solution.

Actions:

Apply the learned positive deviance behaviors. Begin small, then expand the roll-out.

Connect people who were not previously connected. Create opportunities for learning to take place.

The community itself will monitor the overall effectiveness of the initiative. If successful, document the insights gained and suggested behavior, and share beyond the original community to others facing similar challenges.

During the past fifty years many people have applied the PD approach in different fields. One of the keys is to focus on positive deviants within a community.

This shows how it is possible for people who experience similar circumstances to follow successful strategies. This shows that:

'It is possible here,' rather than, 'It is not possible here.'

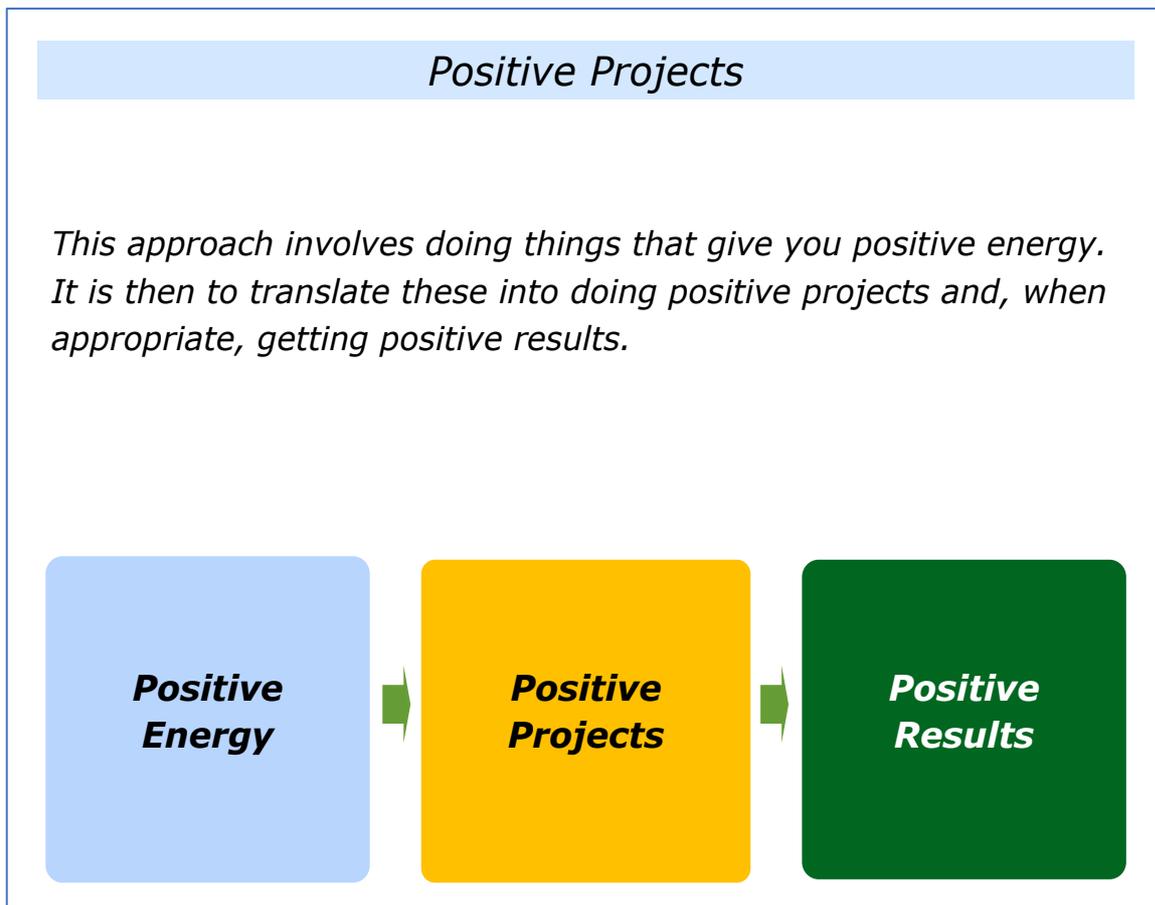

William Seidman and Michael McCauley, for example, studied how it could be used in the commercial sector. Here is a summary of what they discovered. You will, of course, apply these ideas in your own way.

The Power Of Positive Deviants

William Seidman and Michael McCauley focused on how the positive deviant approach could be applied in different fields. Their work provided ideas that could be used:

- To quickly identify the positive deviants;*
- To efficiently gather and organise the positive deviant knowledge;*
- To motivate a willingness in others to adopt the positive deviant approaches*
- To sustain the change by others by integrating it into their pre-existing emotional and cognitive functions;*
- To scale the positive deviant knowledge to large numbers of people simultaneously.*

The Positive Projects Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to do things that you positive energy. It is then to translate these into doing positive projects and, when appropriate, getting positive results.

This is an approach that people can follow in both their personal and professional lives. It is one that can have benefits for both themselves and other people.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. It involves focusing on the following themes.

Positive Energy

Energy is life. So what gives you positive energy? How can you do more of the things that give you positive energy? Let's explore some steps to making this happen.

One approach is to start by clarifying the things that give you positive energy in your personal and professional life. This is an exercise that I gave people when running workshops. Here are some of the things they wrote.

Personal Life

The things that give me positive energy in my personal life are:

Being with our children ... Gardening ... Listening to the sound of our waterfall ... Singing in the choir ... Taking walks by myself ... Playing the guitar ... Cooking for our family ... Caring for our horse.

Professional Life

The things that give me positive energy in my professional life are:

Encouraging people in my work ... Playing to my strengths ... Doing satisfying projects ... Solving technical problems ... Leading pioneering teams ... Caring for animals ... Acting as a trusted advisor.

People who are givers sometimes find it hard to take care of themselves. It can be important to encourage themselves, however, and they may then have more energy to give to others.

Sheila Cassidy is such a giver. During the 1970s she was imprisoned in Chile for providing medical care to opponents of the Pinochet regime. Returning to the UK after being tortured, she went on to become Medical Director of St Luke's Hospice in Plymouth.

Sheila gave to others but sometimes starved herself of pleasures. Hard work took its toll, however, and she began taking more care of herself. Writing in her book Sharing The Darkness, Sheila explains what happened.

"Perhaps the final fall from my self-styled perch of grace came at the beginning of the winter season when Brideshead Revisited was serialised for television.

"Until then I had stalwartly refused to have more than a transistor radio and tape recorder, but now I could bear it no longer and rushed into town to buy myself a TV."

Sheila found that, far from corrupting her contribution, she gave even more to people.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the things that give you positive energy.

Positive Energy

The things that give me positive energy in my personal and professional life.

Personal Life

The things that give me positive energy in my personal life are:

*

*

*

*

*

Professional Life

The things that give me positive energy in my professional life are:

*

*

*

*

*

Positive Projects

Imagine that you have clarified the thing that give you positive energy. If you wish, you can then translate one or more of these into doing a positive project.

People love doing projects. They enjoy going on a trip, designing a garden, writing an article, renovating a classic car, organising a charity or working to achieve a compelling goal.

People who take this approach often follow their passions. They may then go through the stages of planning, performing the work and getting positive results.

This is an approach taken by many pioneers and peak performers. It is also taken by people who may think differently or be considered to be different.

Such individuals may have a different way of operating that is not always recognised by traditional systems. They may be dyslexic, for example, or be wired in other ways.

These people may sometimes encounter difficulties but, if they get the right support, they can do superb work. They may also develop their self-esteem by building on their strengths rather than looking for rewards from the system.

Imagine that you have focused on the things that give you positive energy. If appropriate, you may want to explore the following themes.

What is the specific activity I want to focus on that gives me positive energy? Bearing this in mind, what is the kind of project I could do that would also give me positive energy?

What would be the goals of the project? What would be the real results I would aim to achieve? What would be the picture of success? What would be the benefits of doing such a project?

What are the key strategies I could follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How could I follow these strategies? How could I encourage myself on the journey?

What would be the pluses involved in doing the project? What would be the potential minuses? How could I build on the pluses and manage the consequences of the minuses.

Bearing these things in mind, on a scale 0-10 how would I rate my motivation to do the project? What could I do to maintain or improve the rating?

Imagine that you have worked through some of these themes. You also feel motivated and ready to embark on a project. If you wish, try tackling the following exercise. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Projects

The specific project I would like to do that builds on what gives me positive energy.

Positive Projects

Bearing in mind what gives me positive energy, the specific project I would like to do would be:

*

The specific benefits of doing this project would be:

*

*

*

Positive Results

Imagine that you have embarked on doing the project. If appropriate, you may aim to achieve certain positive results. The results you aim to achieve will depend on your chosen project. You may, for example, be aiming to do something that focuses on people, products or the planet.

People

You may aiming to help people to be healthy, hopeful and happy. You may be aiming to help them to learn a skill, add to their repertoires or more able to shape their futures. You may be focusing on yourself and aiming to achieve peak performance.

Products

You may aim to do work that falls under the general category of improving or developing products. You may be aiming to build or renovate a machine, a house or a building. You may be aiming to design a product or service that improves life for yourself or other people.

Planet

You may be aiming to care for a garden, grow food or clear up a polluted site. You may be aiming to care for the land, animals or other parts of the eco-system. You may be aiming to show how to build sustainable systems that provide wins for people and wins the planet.

Different people follow their preferred styles of operating when doing a project. Some take the following approach.

They play to their strengths, follow their chosen strategies and aim to do superb work;

They embody the ethic of continuous improvement by building on what is working and tackling areas for improvement;

They do their best to deliver the desired results and add that touch of class to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to the project that you may already be working on. Looking at the aims you want to achieve, how can you do your best to achieve the desired positive results? Reaching this goal can lead to a feeling of satisfaction and even a sense of peace.

There may come a time, however, when you want to refocus on doing things that give you positive energy. You may then translate these into doing another positive project.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on your chosen project. This invites you to focus on how you can do your best to achieve positive results. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Results

The specific things I can do to, if appropriate, do my best to get positive results when doing the project.

Positive Results

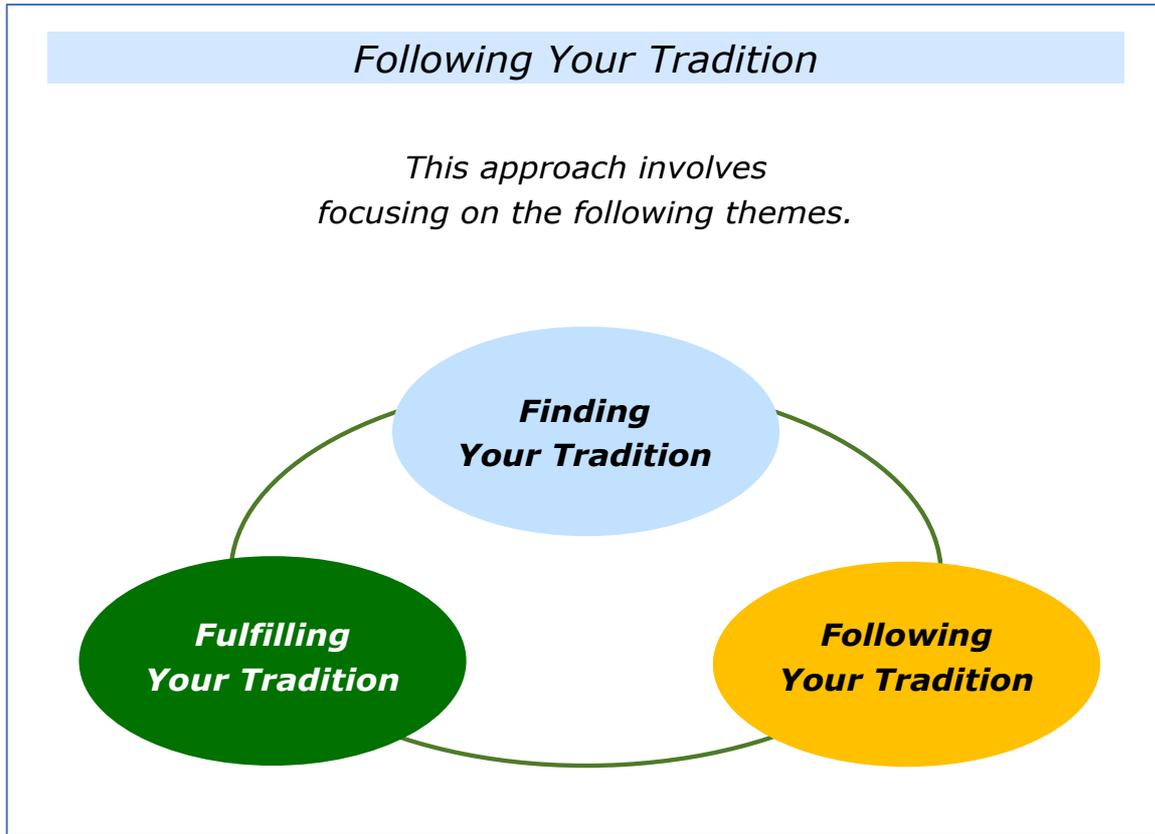

The specific things I can do to, if appropriate, do my best to get positive results when doing the project are:

*

*

*

The Following Your Tradition Approach

There are many models for translating your principles into action. One approach is to focus on finding, following and fulfilling your tradition. This involves asking:

*Who are the people I admire who have made a positive contribution?
What were the principles they followed? How can I follow this tradition and do my best to make a positive contribution?*

People who recognise their tradition feel they are part of something greater than themselves. Others have taken this route before and many will follow it in the future.

People who find their tradition often feel humbler yet stronger. Let's explore how you can follow these steps in your own way.

Finding Your Tradition

Start by writing the names of the people you admire whose path you would like to follow in your own way. For example, my own models have been people such as Abraham Maslow, Virginia Satir and Viktor Frankl.

Why? They each wrote books that gave a positive view of people's possibilities. Whilst not having the same talent as these people, I want to build on their work in my own way.

What is your tradition? If you are caring for people in a hospice, you may be following the path taken by Dame Cicely Saunders, Sheila Cassidy and Elisabeth Kubler-Ross.

If you are aiming to encourage people in education, you may be following the path taken by Maria Montessori, John Dewey and other great teachers.

If you are doing pioneering work on the web, you may be following the path taken by Tim Berners-Lee. Alternatively, you may be pursuing a path taken by other people.

If you want to build a positive business, you may be following some of the principles demonstrated by Anita Roddick, Paul Hawken and other people.

Looking at the people you admire, what do you believe they did well? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into doing work you admire?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Finding My Tradition

The names of the people I admire whose path I would like to follow in my way are:

*

*

*

The specific principles they followed to do things I admire were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of some of them following these principles were:

*

*

*

Following Your Tradition

How can you follow this path in your own way? How can you add to the tradition? How can you use your strengths to perform superb work?

Bernard Haldane and Richard Bolles, for example, helped many people to shape their future careers. They pioneered a path that has been followed by many others who help people to follow their vocation.

Barrie Hopson and Mike Scally did similar work in the UK and published their book Build Your Own Rainbow. Today there are many people who dedicate themselves to helping people do fulfilling work.

John Wooden followed the tradition of helping individuals to become the best they could be. The vehicle he chose was basketball. David Hemery and many others have followed this path in different sports.

Let's return to your own life and work. What do you think may be your tradition? Try to think of a name for what you do. This may not be a perfect summary of what you do but it may point you in a certain direction.

You may follow in the tradition of being an encourager, educator, healer, coach or mentor. You may be a pioneer, problem solver, social entrepreneur, leader, orchestrator or play another role.

How can you follow your tradition? The key is to follow your principles each day. You will then honour the past and keep the road open for others to follow in the future.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Following My Tradition

The specific kind of tradition I want to follow is:

*

The specific principles I want to follow when pursuing this tradition are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate these principles into action are:

*

*

*

Fulfilling Your Part Of Your Tradition

How can you contribute to your tradition? One approach is to focus on the following themes.

You can start by identifying your tradition.

You may be working as an encourager, counsellor, healer, artist, athlete, scientist, leader or in another role. If appropriate, you can focus on how you can continue to develop in this role.

You can do positive work by following the principles associated with the tradition.

This is a path taken by many people who serve something greater than themselves. They aim keep translating their principles into action and do positive work each day.

You can add to the knowledge base of the tradition.

You may can do this by building on your strengths and making a contribution. You may do this by performing pioneering work, producing a book, building prototypes or passing on knowledge.

You will, of course, find your own way of contributing to your tradition. Taking these steps can sometimes lead to a sense of fulfilment.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Fulfilling My Tradition

The specific kind of tradition I want to follow is:

*

The specific things I can do to contribute to this tradition and maybe get a sense of fulfilment are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of doing these things may be:

*

*

*

The Last Lecture Approach

The Last Lecture

The title of this last lecture is:

*

The key messages I would like to pass on to people if I was invited to give a last lecture would be:

1) ...

For example: ...

2) ...

For example: ...

3) ...

For example: ...

Let's look at another approach to clarifying your principles. This is based on the academic tradition of giving a Last Lecture.

This is a long-standing academic tradition. Many places of learning ask a key figure to give their version of a Last Lecture. The person is invited to pass on knowledge or wisdom they may have learned in their life.

Sometimes the students nominate such a person. On other occasions an institution will simply invite an outside speaker. Sometimes this may also take the form of an address to students who are beginning their studies or leaving the place of learning.

The nominated person chooses the topic they wish to cover in the lecture. Some focus on their field of expertise. Some pass on knowledge. Some give messages about the things they have learned in their lives.

Randy Pausch gave a famous Last Lectures that went viral. He began by describe what he wasn't going to talk about – such as his journey with cancer or his loved ones.

Randy said that the Last Lecture format was maybe appropriate for him because he did not necessarily have long to live. He then described what he wanted to talk about.

"All right, so what is today's talk about then? It's about my childhood dreams and how I have achieved them.

"I've been very fortunate that way. How I believe I've been able to enable the dreams of others, and to some degree, lessons learned.

"I'm a professor, there should be some lessons learned and how you can use the stuff you hear today to achieve your dreams or enable the dreams of others.

"And as you get older, you may find that "enabling the dreams of others" thing is even more fun."

Randy's talk is well worth watching. It can also be useful to watch many of the other videos of various people delivering their versions of the Last Lecture.

Sometimes I have used an adaption of this format when running workshops. On some occasions individuals have wanted to clarify their life philosophy and what they believe is important in life.

There are many exercises on these themes. This approach invites individuals to prepare and then present a ten-minute version of their Last Lecture. This is a challenging task.

Many people have found it rewarding to share their ideas, however, and also listen to others give their presentations. The exercise invites individuals to do the following things.

To think of a title for their Last Lecture;

To outline the key messages they would like to give to people if they were invited to give their version of a Last Lecture;

To bring each of these messages to life by giving examples of how they can be translated into action.

The final point is important. This encourages people to go beyond simply saying, for example:

"Be true to yourself."

Such headlines might provide good advice. But showing how these can be translated into daily life can have a much greater effect.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Last Lecture

The title of the lecture would be:

*

The key messages I would like to give to people if I was invited to give a last lecture would be the following.

1) ...

For example ...

2) ...

For example ...

3) ...

For example ...

The Passing Things On Before Passing On Approach

The Passing On Approach

The positive things that I want to pass on to people before I pass on are:

*

*

*

This is a similar approach to The Last Lecture exercise. We all pass on. We move on from this life with many memories and maybe lessons we have learned. Looking at your own life, you may want to explore the following themes.

What are the positive messages I want to pass on? What is the positive knowledge I want to pass on? What are the other positive things I want to pass on to people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Passing On Approach

The positive things that I want to pass on to people before I pass on are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to pass on these things to people are:

*

*

*

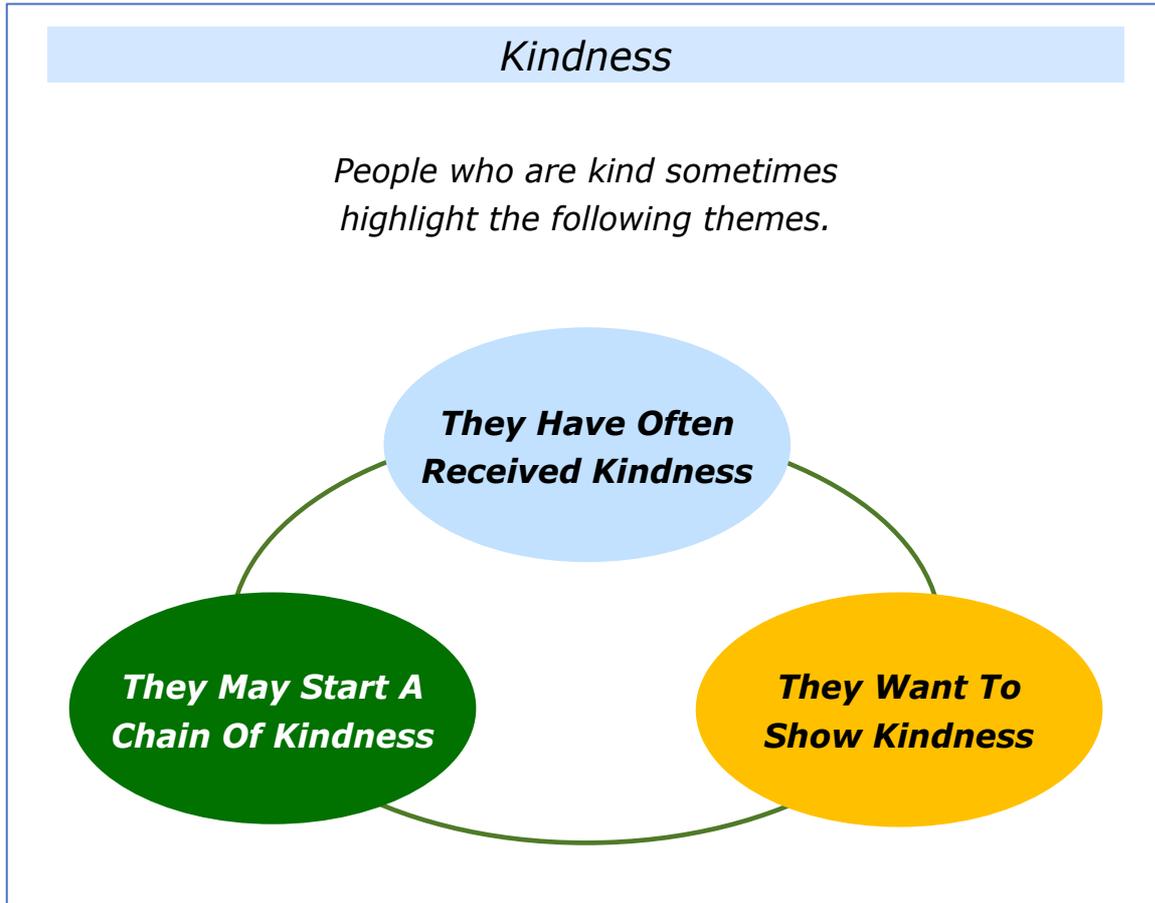

The specific things that may happen as a result of passing on these things may be:

*

*

*

The Kindness Approach

There are many ways to help people. One of the simplest is to show kindness. There are different views on how people learn to be kind.

One view is that human beings are naturally kind. They love to care for others and help people to grow. Being kind can also lead to them experiencing the helper's high.

Another view is that people who are kind may be part of a chain of kindness. Let's explore this approach.

People Who Are Kind

They have often received kindness. They may have had parents or other people in their lives who showed them kindness. They remember this feeling and how it has helped them to grow.

They want to show kindness. They believe that being kind can help people to feel safe and appreciated. They also believe that kindness can help to build a better world.

They may help to start a chain of kindness. By passing on kindness, they make it more likely that those receiving it will show kindness to others. This is not guaranteed, but it is a good start.

Looking at your own life, who have been the people who have shown kindness to you? How did they show this kindness? Different people give different answers to these questions, but they often mention common themes. Here is one example.

People Who Showed Me Kindness

My Parents

They provided me with love, a safe home and encouragement. They helped me to believe in myself. They recognised I was good at sports but not very academic.

A Teacher At One School

They focused on the things I was good at - such as being the captain of the girl's football team. They told me that I had fighting spirit and could inspire people. I still remember that message.

A Football Coach

They built on my strengths – which were to be a good leader and organiser of the defence. They also suggested that I begin taking coaching badges. This led to my present role as coach for a women's team.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe one person who showed you kindness. Try complete the following sentences.

Kindness In The Past

The name of the person who showed me kindness was:

*

The specific things they did to show me kindness were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of them showing me kindness were:

*

*

*

Many people go on personal journeys where they explore different philosophies and ways of life. Sometimes they have Eureka moments when they make remarkable breakthroughs. Sometimes they return to the simple things in life.

Aldous Huxley was such a person. During his life he experimented with many methods of developing human potential. These included drugs, meditation, bodywork, Zen and other activities. Towards the end of his life, Huxley said in a lecture:

"People often ask me what is the most effective technique for transforming their life. It is a little embarrassing that after years and years of research and experimentation, I have to say that the best answer is – just be a little bit kinder."

Kindness and cruelty create their own circles. People who are given kindness early in life are more likely to pass on kindness to others. People who experience cruelty may find it harder to be kind.

Today there are many psychometric tests and other methods that can be used to explore the personality of an individual, leader, politician or someone in another role.

These may be helpful, but there still remains one of the most interesting questions. This is:

"Are they kind?"

Later in the book we will explore how people express kindness through compassion and other activities. Before then, however, let's return to your own life and work.

Looking ahead, what are the specific ways that you would like to continue to be kind? How can you translate these ideas into action? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Kindness In The Future

The specific ways that I would like to be kind in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

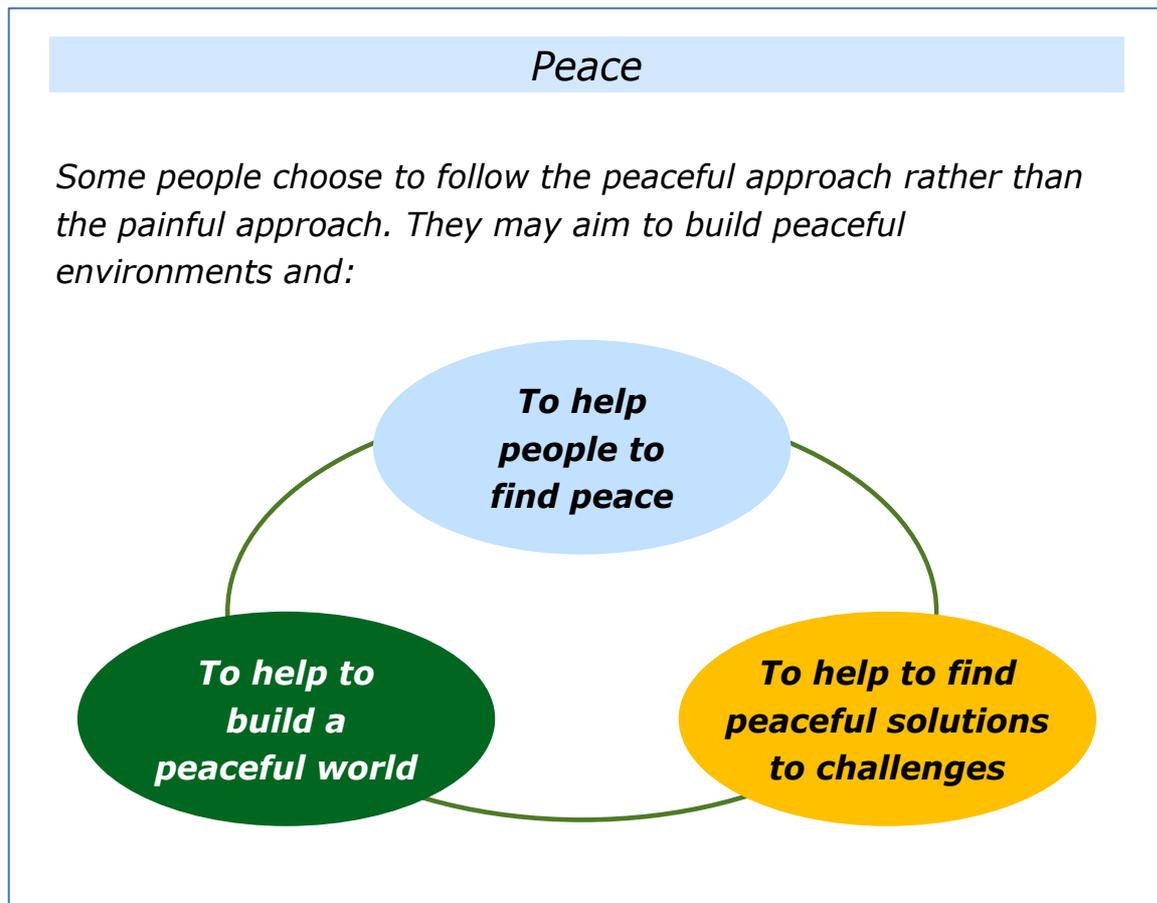

The specific benefits of doing these things may be:

*

*

*

The Peaceful Approach Rather Than The Painful Approach

Some people aim to follow the peaceful approach rather than the painful approach. They see the first step as them behaving in peaceful way. They may then aim to help people to find peace, help to find peaceful solutions to challenges and help to build a peaceful world.

There are many views about what constitutes peace in different situations. These can relate:

To personal peace – such as having sense of calm and contentment;

To peace between people – such as having a sense of harmony and helping each other to develop;

To peace between groups of people or nations – such as having friendly relations and helping each other to succeed..

Different people follow different paths towards focusing on peace. Here are some of the reasons why people arrive at this point.

Some people may have been influenced by peaceful models

Adam Curle, who chaired the department of peace studies at Bradford University, was influenced in this way. Writing Adam's obituary for the Guardian, Tom Woodhouse described what happened in the following way.

His mother planted the seed that led to his pacifism and his decision to become a Quaker. As Adam recalled:

"She hated war, to which she had lost three of her beloved brothers, and was determined that she would instil her loathing of it in me as well."

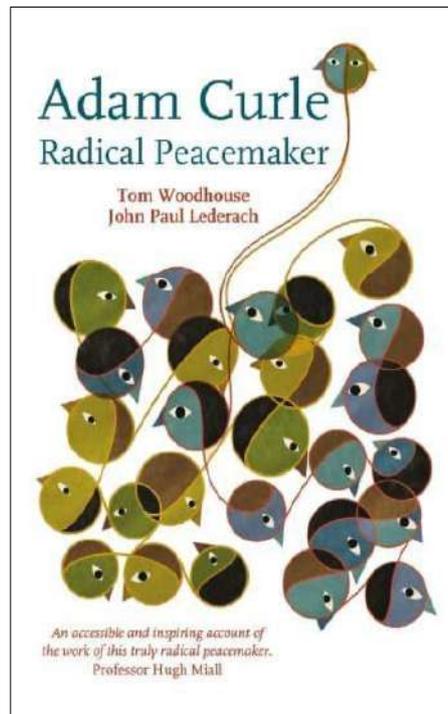

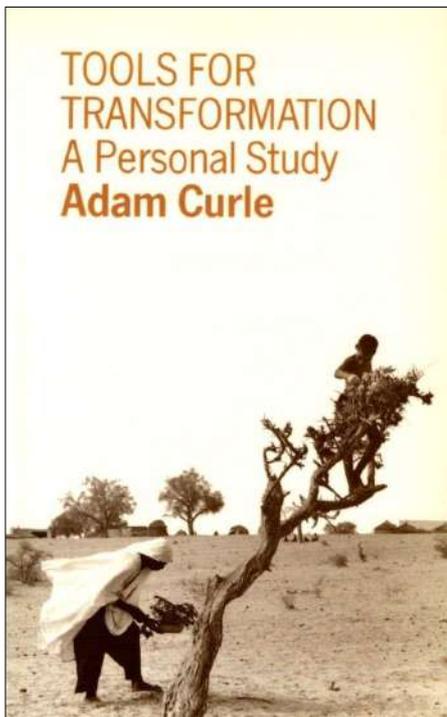

Problems of conflict and violence featured in his work, particularly because of his direct experience as a mediator during the Nigerian civil war (1967-70) and the 1971 Indo-Pakistan war.

Adam retired from Bradford in 1978 but worked on as a peacemaker, often under Quaker auspices, putting into practice the idea that education was concerned with emancipation.

The techniques of peacemaking (whether mediation, problem solving, negotiation, policy analysis, advocacy, or non-violent activism) are what he called "tools for transformation".

He worked to bring people together in conflict-torn areas, including India, Pakistan, Nigeria, Zimbabwe, South Africa, Northern Ireland, Sri Lanka and the Balkans.

In Croatia, when in his late 70s, he was the inspiration behind the Osijek Peace Centre, which symbolised resistance to the war and inspired a prolific peace network. He was awarded the Gandhi peace prize in 2000 in recognition of his long commitment to peace work.

Some people may have been through painful experiences

Adam's mother committed to peace after losing loved ones during war. Other people have other painful experiences that motivate them to try to find more peaceful solutions.

Some may have been abused or seen their loved ones abused. Going beyond their anger and pain, they aim to create sanctuaries where people can heal. They then help people to reshape their lives.

Some may have lost a child. Whilst they may never get over the feeling of emptiness, they may learn how to manage these emotions. They may then pass on this knowledge to others who go through similar experiences.

Some may have experienced a life-changing illness or injury. After a period of reflection, they may decide to build on what they still have and see every day as a bonus. This can lead to them having a sense of peace.

Some people may have a philosophy that encourages them to behave in a peaceful way and help to build a peaceful world

They may have a philosophy that encourages them work towards creating harmony. They may aim to do this in their personal life and professional lives. They may also aim to create harmony between living things on the planet.

Some people aim to create peaceful environments in which people can feel at ease and grow. They may do this in the family, school, work place or other situations.

Some people encourage others to find peace. They do this an appropriate way, however, rather than trying to impose it on people. They may have a professional role, for example, where they help people to work towards their goals and perhaps find peace.

They may be providing end of life care in a hospice. They may be helping somebody to recover from an addiction. They may be helping a person to develop a new purpose and work towards enjoying a sense of peace.

Some people commit themselves to helping to build a more peaceful world. Let's look at some examples.

The Peacebuilding Approach

There are many approaches to peacebuilding. This section explores one approach that is taken by people who help others to find solutions and work towards achieving peace.

Brigadier Michael Harbottle had a distinguished military career which evolved into him focusing on peacebuilding. He co-wrote The Thin Blue Line: International Peacekeeping and Its Future. He also founded Generals For Peace.

Michael and his wife Eirwen contributed to the organisation Peace Child International. Below are excerpts from a piece they wrote called The Peace Building Role of United Nations' Operations.

Peace

There are often three dimensions to the peaceful settlement of disputes:

Peacemaking is the diplomatic resolution of the politics of conflict.

Peacekeeping is the military intervention and peaceful resolution of violence in a conflict, by non-enforcement means.

Peacebuilding is a set of physical, social and structural initiatives which can help to prevent and resolve the consequences of conflict, and provide post-hostility structural reconstruction and rehabilitation.

Peacebuilding Has To Be Paramount

Peacemaking and peacekeeping can only be transitory measures. They have no long-term or lasting effect as long as the peacebuilding factor is missing.

Peacebuilding is the healing agent which ensures that the structural roots to a conflict are removed.

Unless this happens, the conflict is not resolved. It will only repeat itself and the peacemakers and peacekeepers will be required to return.

We need to understand clearly that conflict resolution is not just the successful defeat of the enemy and an end to the fighting (e.g., the Falkland Islands and the Gulf Wars). It needs more.

Peacebuilding Calls For:

The restoration of law and order, social and economic stability;

The guarantee of peoples' human rights;

The rehabilitation of the structures of society and government,

The reestablishment of peaceful relations (interstate, intrastate, inter-ethnic) and the ending of the structural violence which prefaced the manifest violence.

Peacebuilding indeed!

Above all, it is good to remind ourselves that the essence of all conflict resolution is peacebuilding.

There are many definitions for peacebuilding. Here is one view from the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies.

What Is Strategic Peacebuilding?

Peacebuilding can include conflict prevention; conflict management; conflict resolution and transformation, and post-conflict reconciliation.

Peacebuilding becomes strategic when it works over the long run and at all levels of society to establish and sustain relationships among people locally and globally.

It aims not only to resolve conflicts, but to build societies, institutions, policies, and relationships that are better able to sustain peace and justice.

While it engages immediate crises, strategic peacebuilding recognizes that peacemaking is a long-term vocation that requires the building of cross-group networks and alliances that will survive intermittent conflicts and create a platform for sustainable human development and security.

Peacebuilding In Action

There are many approaches to peacebuilding. The following sections describe steps that people take to help others to achieve ongoing peace.

Peacebuilding

*There are many approaches to peacebuilding.
One approach is to go through the following steps.*

- To clarify whether all the parties are prepared to work towards achieving peace;
- To clarify what each party wants and build on what they have in common;
- To clarify and work towards some agreed common goals;
- To get successes and find solutions on the way towards achieving the common goals;
- To clarify and put in place the conditions most likely to achieve ongoing peace.

They clarify whether all the parties are prepared to work towards achieving peace

Different peacebuilders take different approaches at this stage. Some believe that certain conditions must be in place for there to be a chance of success. They believe that:

People must be at a point where they want to solve the issues and work towards achieving peace;

People must be prepared to work to find, as far as possible, win-win solutions on the way towards achieving peace.

Some peacebuilders take a more flexible approach. They are prepared to spend time connecting with the various parties and building good relationships.

They aim to listen to people, see the world from their points of view and clarify what they want. They may also, at some point, begin to explore what might be people's pictures of success.

Some peacebuilders take a more proactive approach. They believe people may be open to development if they see how achieving peace will help them. Bearing this in mind, they begin to share scenarios that show people how they may benefit.

Peacebuilders focus on creating the conditions that are most likely to produce success. They do this when helping individuals, families, groups or countries to build a better future.

There comes a point, however, where they need to take stock and reflect on the chances of success. Bearing in mind what they know about the situation, they may ask themselves the following questions.

Are people ready to work together?

Do they really want to solve the problem? Some people get tired of the negative energy. They are then more willing to sit down and find positive solutions.

This is not always the case. Some people may be addicted to conflict so they may not want to solve the problem. They want to use their power and create win-lose situations.

*Are people prepared to co-operate to find,
as far as possible, a win-win solution?*

How high is their motivation to do this on a scale 0 - 10? People need to score at least a 7+ to have a chance of producing success.

This calls for people being prepared to focus on finding positive solutions rather than scoring points. Those who are prepared to take this approach are more likely to build relationships and get positive results.

Are people ready to focus on how things can be better in the future?

This is crucial. Some people want to simply argue about the past and allocate blame. Whilst it may be vital to admit mistakes, the key is to focus on how to create a positive future.

Bearing these things in mind, it can be useful to explore the following questions. Providing people want to solve the problem, it may then be possible to move on to the next step.

Peacebuilding – Some Questions To Ask When Embarking On The Process

- What is the present situation? Are people ready to work together? Are they prepared to focus on how things can be better in the future?
- What may be possible? Are people prepared to work towards finding, as far as possible, win-win solutions? Are they able to see the benefits of taking this approach?
- What are the present chances of success? Rate this on a scale 0-10. What needs to happen – or what can we do – to improve the chances of success?

They clarify what each party wants and build on what they have in common

Peacebuilders may spend a lot of time on doing what some call shuttle diplomacy. They devote time to meeting each party and aim:

To show respect and build good working relationships;

To clarify the challenges people face and their goals for the future;

To clarify what for them may be a possible solution and the potential benefits.

Peacebuilders see this as a listening exercise aim and clarify what each party really wants. They do this without judgement and do not yet begin to come up with suggestions.

They aim find what each party wants: a) on a practical level; b) on a psychological level. People may want, for example, to feel valued, respected and able to shape their futures.

There are many ways to clarify such aims. As mentioned earlier, however, whilst people may have resentments about the past it is important to clarify what they want in the future.

Bearing this in mind, it is then possible to produce something like the following picture. This illustration involves just two parties. It can be more challenging when there are more parties involved, but it can still be worth doing a similar exercise.

Clarifying What Each Party Wants

This approach involves encouraging each party to focus on what they want in the future.

Party A

The specific things they want in the future are:

- *
*
*

The specific benefits of having these things in the future will be:

- *
*
*

Party B

The specific things they want in the future are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of having these things in the future will be:

*

*

*

People are more likely to find solutions when they focus on what they have in common rather than their differences. Peacebuilders therefore sometimes take the following steps before going back to people. They aim:

To clarify what each party wants;

To clarify what may be some potential achievable common goals;

To clarify the benefits of achieving those common goals.

Different peacebuilders clarify these things in different ways. One approach is for them to focus on the following themes. This can then lead to the next step.

Clarifying The Common Goals

This involves focusing on what each party wants and building on common ground. It then involves clarifying and agreeing on certain specific common goals.

Common Goals

Bearing in mind what each party wants, the specific common goals it may be possible for people to work towards are these:

- **
- **
- **

The specific benefits of achieving these goals will be:

- **
- **
- **

They clarify and work towards some agreed common goals

This can be a delicate but important step. The aim is to encourage people to build on what they have in common rather than focus on the differences.

Different peacebuilders use different styles and skills when taking this step. One approach is for them:

To meet with the different parties - either individually or together – and focus on some of the things they have in common;

To help them to clarify and work towards some specific achievable common goals;

To help them to create an action plan and keep focusing on the benefits of achieving the common goals.

The goals that people agree on will differ depending on the situation. The key is to set some achievable goals that will bring benefits to the various parties.

Divorcing parents may agree on how they want to behave towards their children. Groups that are normally antagonists may put aside their differences to cooperate when tackling a specific crisis. Warring factions may agree on a ceasefire and the exchanging of prisoners.

Peacebuilders spend a lot of time exploring such potential common goals. They then work with the various parties to make sure: a) they want to achieve the goals; b) they see the benefits; c) they can follow an action plan that leads to success. Peacebuilders then move on to the next step.

They help people to get successes and find solutions on the way towards achieving the common goals

Peacebuilders often work alongside the various parties to help them take the following steps:

To set achievable goals, get successes and build confidence;

To move on to the next set of specific common goals and get successes;

To find solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving the common goals.

This final point is crucial. Peacebuilders play a vital part in helping to calm things down and buy time to find solutions to potential challenges. One such person expressed this in the following way.

"I encourage people to work towards common goals. There are times, however, when they may get into conflict about how to deal with certain situations or manage differences.

"I then aim to encourage people to deescalate the situation and buy time to think. I aim:

To clarify what each party wants;

To clarify the potential options going forward together with the consequences of each option;

To clarify the potential ways forward that are most likely to provide win-win solutions.

"My role is then to do two things. First, to clarify with the parties if they would like me to continue working with them. If so, it is then to help them to pursue solutions that provide the best chance of achieving success."

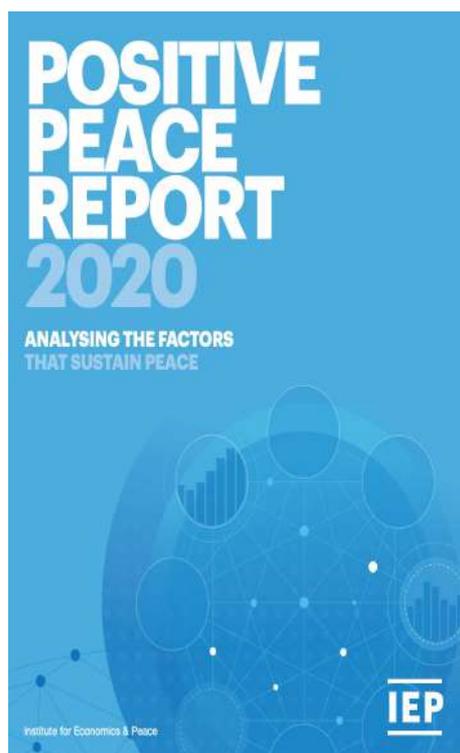

Peacebuilders are often skilled at managing such challenges. They aim to deescalate the situation and buy time. They do their best to find solutions and help people to work towards their long-term picture of success. This sometimes involves moving on to the next step.

They clarify and put in place the conditions most likely to achieve ongoing peace

The majority of people want to live in peace. They want to build on what they have in common and find creative solutions to challenges. They want to encourage both present and future generations on the planet.

Bearing this in mind, many organisations focus on the concept of creating positive peace. They believe it is vital to put in place the conditions that enable individuals, communities and societies to flourish.

There are many definitions of such peace. Here is one that was published by the Institute for Economics & Peace in 2020.

Positive Peace is defined as the attitudes, institutions and structures that create and sustain peaceful societies.

The same factors that create lasting peace also lead to many other positive outcomes that societies aspire to, including:

Thriving economies ... Better performance on ecological measures ... High levels of resilience and adaptability to change.

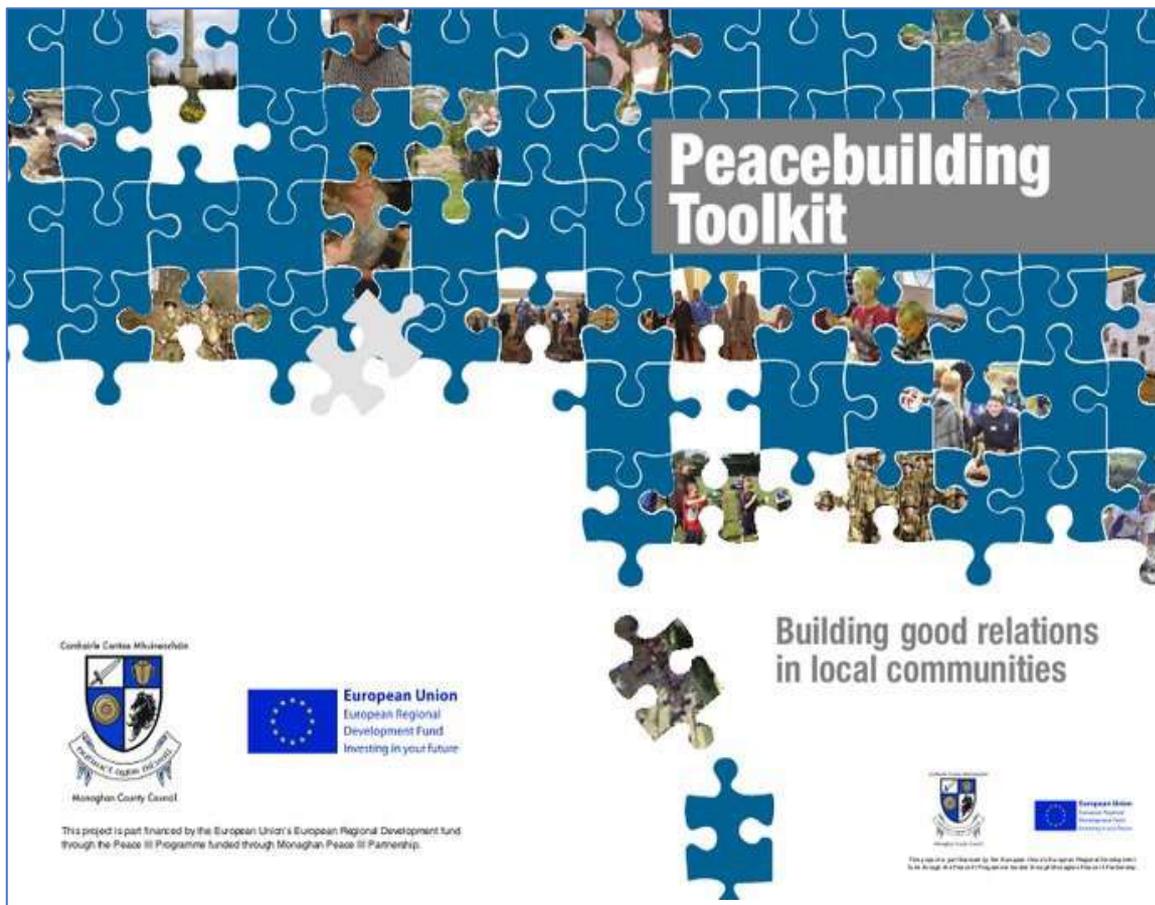

Other factors that improve with Positive Peace are measures of inclusiveness, wellbeing and happiness.

Therefore, Positive Peace can be described as creating an optimal environment for human potential to flourish.

There are also many organisations that work to make this happen. Some support peacebuilders and others who want to help their communities to thrive. The European Union, for example, therefore invited specialists to produce a toolkit that could be used by communities.

The kit provided people with models and tools they could use in their own ways to build on what they have in common and manage differences.

Here is an introduction that defined the aims of the kit on peacebuilding.

Definition

Peacebuilding is a term used to describe the processes and activities involved in resolving violent conflict and establishing a sustainable peace.

It is an overarching concept that includes conflict transformation, restorative justice, trauma healing, reconciliation, development and leadership.

It is similar in meaning to conflict resolution but highlights the difficult reality that the end of a conflict does not automatically lead to peaceful, stable, social economic development.

The goal of peacebuilding is for people to accept each other and be reconciled to living together peacefully.

Different people choose to follow the peaceful approach in different ways. Some see the first step as them behaving in peaceful way. They may then aim to help people to find peace, help to find peaceful solutions to challenges and help to build a peaceful world.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the peaceful approach? How can do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Peaceful Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Encouraging The Encouragers Approach

Encouraging The Encouragers

This approach involves aiming to do:

- Work to encourage the encouragers;
- Who then continue to encourage other people;
- Which is more likely to spread encouragement across the planet.

This is an approach that I began following during the early 1970s. Up until then most of the work involved helping people who were troubled. This was vital but something else seemed to be needed.

Many encouragers were helping others and needed support. Sometimes these individuals were given the following message:

"You are so strong that you do not need encouragement."

Bearing this in mind, I began running courses for such people. The aim was to help them to continue:

To encourage other people ... To build encouraging teams and organisations ... To find ways to encourage themselves so that they could continue to do good work and encourage other people.

The courses provided people with practical tools they could use to build on their own and other people's strengths. We also focused on solving some of the challenges they faced.

The sessions seemed to reenergise people. They also added to their repertoire of tools for building positive teams and organisations. This had the effect of helping more people in their daily lives and work.

Later we took a similar approach to working with organisations. Sometimes a leader would make the following request.

"We need to run a change programme but some of our people are resistant to change. Can you help us to run such a programme?"

Some organisations thought the key was to concentrate on the people who were resistant to change. But there was another way. This was:

To focus on the motivated people who were professional and who wanted to help the organisation to shape a successful future;

To help these people to deliver pilot projects that embodied the principles that the organisation could follow to shape a successful future;

To encourage other motivated people to follow these principles and do work that helped the organisation to shape a successful future.

The key, however, was to deliver success. The organisation could then continue to build on the people and the principles that would enable it to shape a successful future.

Who are the encouragers you know in your personal or professional life? How can you continue to encourage these people? What do you think may happen as a result? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Encouraging The Encouragers

The encouragers I know in my personal and professional life are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to encourage some of these encouragers are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

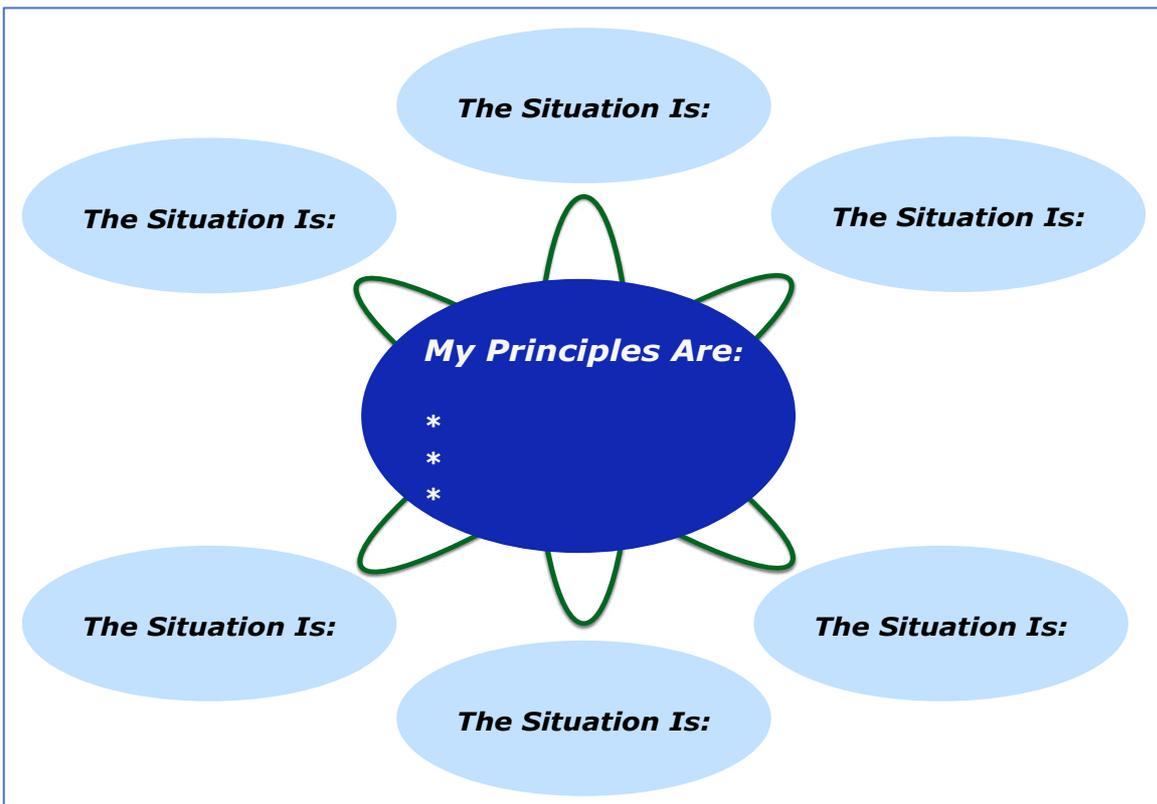

*

The Clarifying Your Principles Approach

The Principles Approach

This approach starts by clarifying the principles you want to follow in your life and work. You can then follow these principles in particular situations.

When appropriate, you can return to your centre to remind yourself of your principles. You can then focus on how to follow these in the next situation.

You can start by clarifying your principles

Imagine that you have begun to clarify your purpose. How can you translate this into action? One approach is to focus on the principles you want to follow in your life. The Dalai Lama says, for example:

"My religion is kindness."

He therefore tries to express kindness in his daily life when communicating with people, giving television interviews and doing other activities. He keeps focusing on the core drivers in his life.

How to clarify your principles? You can start by brainstorming and then settling on, for example, the three principles you want to follow in your life.

Different people will obviously focus on different principles. Here are some of the things that people write when exploring these themes.

"I want to encourage people in my life and work ... I want to continue to have a sense of gratitude ... I want to care for my loved ones ... I want to create enriching environments in which people grow."

"I want to use my strengths to help people to succeed ... I want to build pioneering things that show people a better way ... I want to pass on knowledge that people can use to shape a positive future."

"I want to make full use of the talents I have been given ... I want to do my best during my time on the planet ... I want to give people positive memories for life ... I want to die feeling at peace."

You will, of course, have your own set of principles. Here is the exercise on this theme.

My Principles

The specific principles I want to follow in my life are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

You can clarify how to follow your principles in particular situations

Imagine you have settled on the principle you want to follow. You may then aim to pursue these in various situations.

These are like different boxes you go into during your daily life. You may go into a situation such as encouraging a person, meeting a customer or doing other things.

Looking ahead, you can clarify the positive results to achieve in the specific situation. You can aim to clarify:

The positive results you want to achieve in the situation;

The positive results the other parties – the person or the group of people – want to achieve in the situation;

The specific things you can do to follow your principles and do your best to achieve the desired positive results in the situation.

One key point can be worth bearing in mind. It can be useful to clarify your expectations about the possible things that can happen in the situation.

Sometimes you can expect positive things and responses from people. Other times the people, organisation or customers may give other responses.

Whilst you may always aim to do your best, there will be some situations where you can expect certain responses. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to explore:

The specific things you can expect to happen in the situation;

The specific things you can't expect to happen in the situation.

Imagine you are looking ahead to a specific situation. It can be useful to explore the following themes before moving into action.

What are the real results I want to achieve in the situation? What may be the results that other people want to achieve? What is the desired picture of success?

How can I follow my principles in the situation? What are the things I can and cannot expect in the situation? How can I do my best to achieve the desired positive results?

Imagine that you have rehearsed what you want to do. You can go into the situation, click into action and be fully present. You can then aim to follow your principles and do your best to achieve the desired positive results.

Sometimes things will work well but other times you may get thrown off-course. If so, buy time to think. You can then ask yourself some of the following questions.

What is happening in the situation? What do I want to happen? What are the real results to achieve? How can I do my best to achieve these results?

Imagine that you have settled on the strategy you want to pursue. It can be useful to rehearse what you are going to do. You can then move into action and do your best to achieve the desired picture of success.

The next step will be return to your centre. You can relax, recentre and refocus on your principles. When appropriate, you can then look ahead and rehearse how you can follow your principles in the next situation.

A person who takes this approach is more likely to be centred. They keep returning to their inner compass. They then focus on how they can follow their chosen principles in the different situations they encounter in life.

People who follow their principles are more likely to live in what the existentialists call good faith. They are also more likely to, over the long run, feel a sense of peace.

There are, of course, both pluses and minuses to following principles. These include the following.

The Pluses Are:

You may find the principles provide an internal compass you can refer to when making decisions.

You may feel at ease by doing what you believe in and following principles that serve you well in many situations.

You may find following the principles produces tangible benefits – such as feeling you have done your best and delivering success.

The Potential Minuses Are:

You may find following the principles can mean making tough decisions and sometimes losing out on short-term gains.

You may find other people criticise you or reject your efforts for following these principles.

You may sometimes fail to follow your principles and feel you have been untrue to yourself.

You can follow your principles in a particular situation

The previous pages have invited you to clarify the principles you want to follow. Imagine that you want to translate these into action in a specific situation.

This could be a personal or professional situation. You may be meeting your manager, helping a customer, talking with your parents, encouraging a person or doing another activity.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a particular situation you may go into in the future.

Describe the specific things you can do to follow your principles and do your best to get positive results in the situation.

Describe the possible things you probably can and can't expect to happen in the situation.

This is an approach that you can apply in many situations. It calls for continually returning to your centre. You can then aim to follow your principles in certain situations and do your best to get positive results. Here is the exercise on this theme.

The Particular Situation

The specific situation I am going to go into is:

*

The Principles

The specific things I can do to follow my principles and do my best to get positive results in the situation are:

*

*

*

The Possible Results

The specific things I can and can't expect to happen in the situation are:

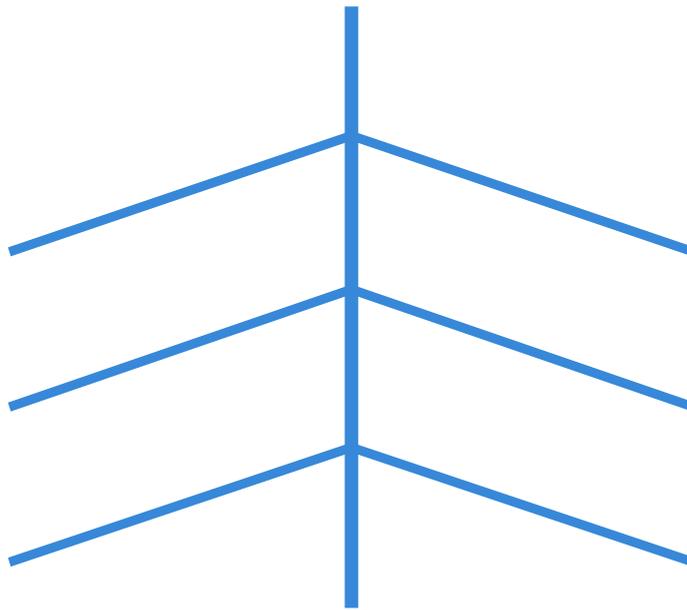

*

*

*

The Strong Spine Approach

Great Workers And Teams Often Have A Strong Spine

This approach mirrors some of the themes described in the previous section. Great workers often have a strong spine. This may be a philosophical, psychological or, in some cases, a physical spine that provides the backbone for their work.

Let's start by focusing on individuals. Sometimes it is said about a person that:

"They have spine."

There are many ways that a person may demonstrate this quality. One way may be that: a) they have a certain philosophy; b) they follow certain principles; c) they translate these into practice.

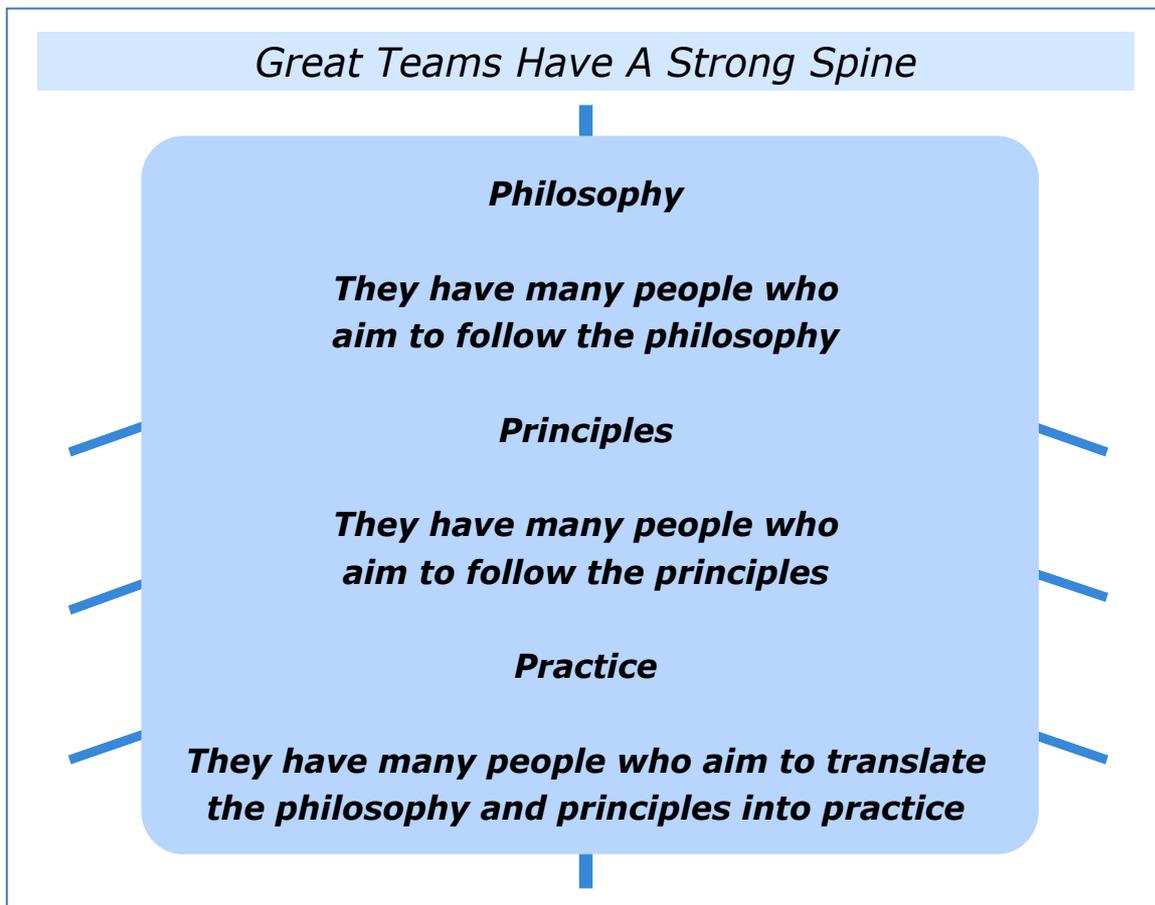

Such individuals have backbone. They show strength in both the positive and not-so positive times.

Great teams often have a strong spine. They have many people who embody the team's philosophy and act as custodians of the culture.

Such people act as the backbone of the team. They make sure that the team keeps focusing on its philosophy and guiding principles. They do this when the team is successful and also when it may be going through tough times.

Great teams aim to recruit, promote and retain such people. These individuals ensure the team follows its compass and maintains consistently high standards. This provides the platform for achieving ongoing success.

Let's return your own life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Start by describing the philosophy that you want to follow in your life. You may, of course, want to follow several philosophical themes that are bound together. If appropriate, settle on one of themes.

Bearing in mind the philosophy you have settled on, brainstorm some of the principles you want to follow to pursue this approach. Settle on three of these.

Move on to the next part. Describe the specific things you want to do to translate these principles into practice. The final step, of course, is to actually do these things.

Here is the exercise. It can be useful to do this every few months to see how your ideas evolve.

My Philosophical Spine

*Philosophy. The philosophy
I want to follow in my life is:*

*

Principles. The principles I want to follow to pursue this philosophy are:

*

*

*

Practice. The specific things I want to do to translate these principles into practice are:

*

*

*

The Progress Approach

There are many views about what people see as progress. Here are some of the most common views.

Some see it as gaining money, recognition, promotion or other definitions of success. They may also compare themselves to others in terms of achieving certain kinds of prizes or status.

Some see it following their vocation, expressing this through various vehicles and aiming to do valuable work. They may aim to build on their strengths, do superb work and achieve their picture of success.

Some see it as: a) to keep following their principles; b) to keep improving and progressing in the way they translate these into practice; c) to keep doing their best to achieve positive results.

The following section explores how to follow this latter approach. This is a route followed by people in many different fields.

A spiritual person may aim to follow the principles embodied in pursuing a certain path - such as being grateful, being kind and serving their faith during their life.

A recovering addict may aim to follow the principles embodied in a recovery programme – such as taking responsibility, helping others and staying healthy one day at a time.

An athlete may aim to follow the principles embodied in being competitive when it matters – such as preparing properly, doing their best and achieving peak performance.

Imagine you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore how you can focus on the principles, practice and positive results.

Principles

The first step is to clarify the principles you want to follow in your life or work. Different people will aim to follow different principles. They may aim, for example:

To be grateful ... To be kind ... To encourage people ... To enjoy life ... To work for social justice ... To create beauty ... To do work that inspires people ... To pass on knowledge ... To help people to succeed ... To care for the planet.

Imagine that you have clarified some of the principles you want to follow. Bearing these in mind, it can be useful:

To focus on one of the principles that you want to follow;

To clarify how you want to translate this principle into practice in a specific situation;

To clarify how you can improve the way you translate this principle into practice and continue to progress.

Imagine that you have chosen a specific situation where you want to follow one of your principles. You can then move on to the next step.

Progress

People like to feel they are progressing in their lives and work. As mentioned earlier, different people have different views about what constitutes progress.

Some see it as improving the way they translate their personal principles into practice.

Some see it as improving the way they follow their professional principles and perform superb work.

Some see it as improving their personal status, public recognition or achievements in terms of gaining prizes.

Teresa Amabile and Steven Kramer described how many knowledge workers saw progress in their book The Progress Principle. They researched over 12,000 people to explore what individuals found motivating in their daily work.

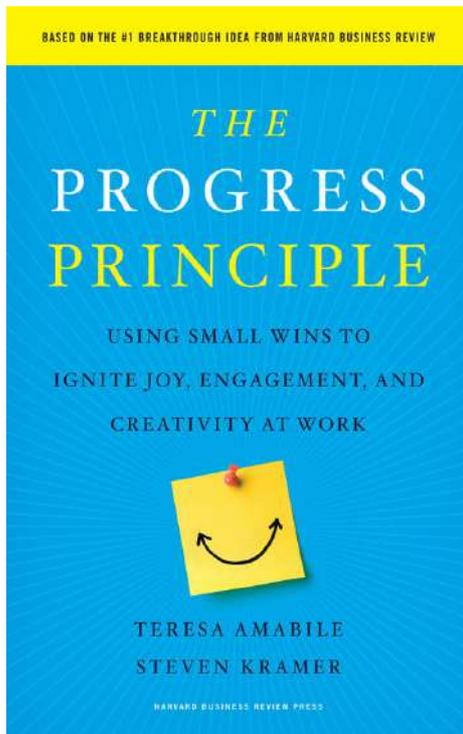

Below is an excerpt from a piece they wrote for the Harvard Business Review.

Early on, we realized that a central driver of creative, productive performance was the quality of a person's inner work life - the mix of emotions, motivations, and perceptions over the course of a workday.

How happy workers feel; how motivated they are by an intrinsic interest in the work; how positively they view their organization, their management, their team, their work, and themselves - all these combine either to push them to higher levels of achievement or to drag them down.

Through exhaustive analysis of diaries kept by knowledge workers, we discovered the progress principle.

Of all the things that can boost emotions, motivation, and perceptions during a workday, the single most important is making progress in meaningful work. And the more frequently people experience that sense of progress, the more likely they are to be creatively productive in the long run.

People want to feel they are making progress. They are more likely to feel this when:

They are working towards meaningful goals;

They work in an environment that is based on encouragement, practical support and respect;

They have a sense of autonomy and can use their talents to achieve daily wins on the way towards achieving the meaningful goals.

Whether they are trying to solve a major scientific mystery or simply produce a high-quality product or service, everyday progress - even a small win - can make= the difference in how they feel and perform.

A person's inner work life on a given day fuels his or her performance for the day and can even affect performance the next day.

Imagine that you have clarified the principle you want to follow. It can be useful to explore the following questions.

What is the specific situation where I want to translate this principle in practice? What are the positive results I want to achieve in the situation? What will be the benefits of achieving these results?

How can I translate the principle into practice? How can I perform superbly? How can I keep improving when translating this principle into practice?

Great workers rehearse properly before going into a situation. You will do this in your own way. Moving into action, you will then aim to be fully present, follow your principles and perform superb work.

You may also aim to embody Kaizen – the concept of continuous improvement. Bearing this in mind, it will be important to keep reading reality and aiming:

To keep focusing on the results to achieve;

To keep building on what is working;

To keep tackling areas for improvement.

People who take these steps are more likely to make progress. Sometimes this involves them making small improvements. Sometimes it involves making bigger transformational improvements.

Imagine that you have taking some of these steps. These may then lead to the next stage.

Positive Results

Different people produce different kinds of positive results. Here is a summary of what two individuals said when describing what they saw as progress.

Person A

"I have been sober now for 365 days. It was a year ago that I stopped drinking. Since then I have been able to rebuild a good relationship with my former partner.

"This has resulted in being able to spend more time with my eight-year-old daughter. I am finding life more rewarding – though sometimes I need help to deal with some of the struggles."

Person B

"I gave up my job in the C-Suite and took another role in my present organisation. This meant going back to the kind of work I love - helping customers to solve problems and achieve success.

"I now spend 80% of my time doing stimulating work with customers. Previously I was told to spend that amount of time on internal matters. I now feel more alive and have also returned to playing music in a band."

Imagine that you are translating one of your principles into practice and aiming to make progress. You will have your own definition of what constitutes positive results.

You may aim to enjoy life, be better at your craft, write articles that inspire people, raise money for charity or overcome certain challenges. You may aim to improve the way you help people, complete a creative project, achieve certain personal goals or enjoy a sense of peace.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you may want to follow the principles approach in your way.

Looking ahead, what may be the principle you want to follow in your life or work? How can you translate this into practice and continue to progress? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

Here is the exercise on this theme. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Progress Approach

The specific principle I want to follow in my life or work is:

*

The specific things I can do to translate this principle into practice and continue to progress are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Contribution Approach

My Positive Contribution

The positive things I want to give people during my time on the planet are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Many people want to make a positive contribution during their time on the planet. They may want to encourage their loved ones and help others to be happy. They may also want to pass on knowledge that helps future generations.

They may do this in the family, school, workplace or society. They want to give people positive memories for life. Some people use their strengths to do superb work that helps people and the planet.

Such people often have a wholistic view of life. They also see the world as a living system in which things are connected across the planet. Many subscribe to the views outlined by Buckminster Fuller. He explained this in the following way.

We are blessed with technology that would be indescribable to our forefathers.

We have the wherewithal, the know-it-all to feed everybody, clothe everybody, and give every human on Earth a chance.

We know now what we could never have known before - that we now have the option for all humanity to make it successfully on this planet in this lifetime.

Whether it is to be Utopia or Oblivion will be a touch-and-go relay race right up to the final moment.

We are not going to be able to operate our Spaceship Earth successfully nor for much longer unless we see it as a whole spaceship and our fate as common. It has to be everybody or nobody.

How to clarify your contribution? Some people explore questions similar to those asked by Buckminster Fuller at a challenging time in his life. He then went on to produce books such as Operating Manual For Spaceship Earth.

Positive Legacy

Some people explore the questions that Buckminster Fuller asked himself at a challenging time in his life.

"What is my job on the planet?"

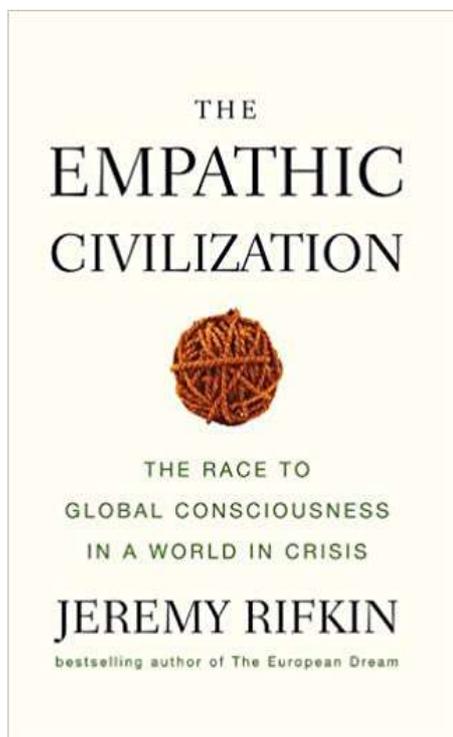

"What is it that needs doing, that I know something about, that probably won't happen unless I take responsibility for it?"

Such people then aim to pursue this purpose, follow their principles and pass on a positive legacy.

People who want to make a positive contribution often see how things are connected. They believe that what you put into a system – be it a relationship, organisation or planet – affects the future of the system. They therefore aim to act with compassion rather than cruelty.

Jeremy Rifkin outlines a similar approach in his book The Empathic Civilization. He believes it is vital to recognise that our actions have consequences on the whole system.

This calls for extending our empathy to the entire human family and the biosphere. Taking this step will increase our chances of surviving as a species.

The Earth is a connected whole system. The actions we take can affect all living things. The consequences can then come back and affect us.

"The most important question facing humanity is this:

"Can we reach global empathy in time to avoid the collapse of civilization and save the Earth?"

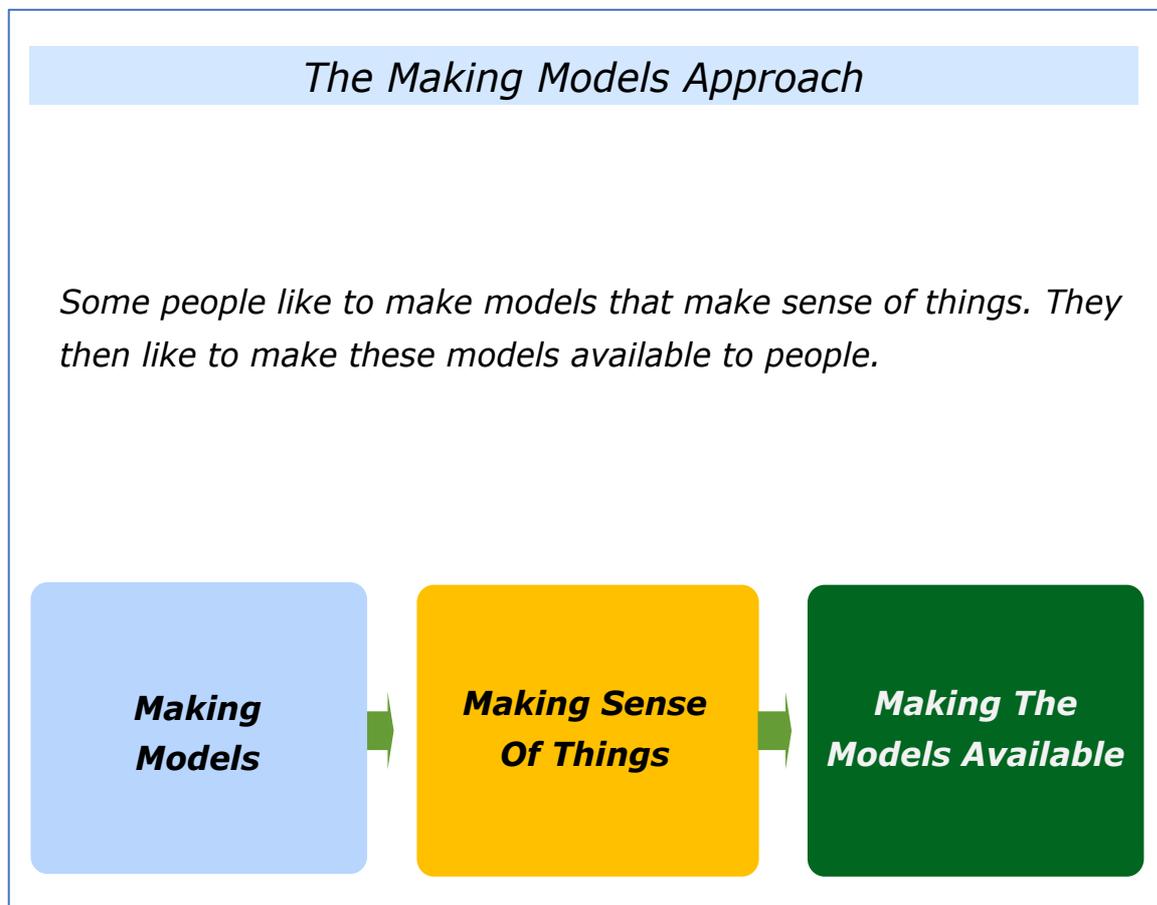

Jeremy describes how we can widen our circle of empathy. We can go beyond feeling empathy for our loved ones and other people. We can also develop empathy for all living things and for the planet.

Many people develop this ability as they get older. Jeremy also sees this in younger people. He describes this in the following way.

A younger generation is fast extending its empathic embrace beyond religious affiliations and national identification to include the whole of humanity and the vast project of life that envelops the Earth.

Let's explore some of the themes that people may consider when clarifying their contribution to building a better world.

The Making Models Approach

This is an approach sometimes adopted by people who want to pass on knowledge to people. A person may start by focusing on a topic they find fascinating.

You will have your own areas of interest. Looking at my own work, for example, it has involved studying how people, teams and organisations achieve success.

Gathering information, the person may begin looking for patterns. When studying success, for example, this involves identifying the principles that people follow to make things work.

This is an approach sometimes adopted by people who want to pass on knowledge to people. A person may start by focusing on a topic they find fascinating.

Gathering information, the person may begin looking for patterns. When studying success, for example, this involves identifying the principles that people follow to make things work.

The next step involves translating the principles into a positive model and then, when appropriate, testing the model to see that it works. When helping people to achieve their aims, for example, it is important to create a model that makes sense to them.

One Approach To Making Models

There are many ways to make models. One approach is to gather information. It is then to look for patterns, focus on principles and clarify what works.

The next step is to translate this information into a positive model that works. It is also to add practical tools that people can use in their own ways to achieve their goals.

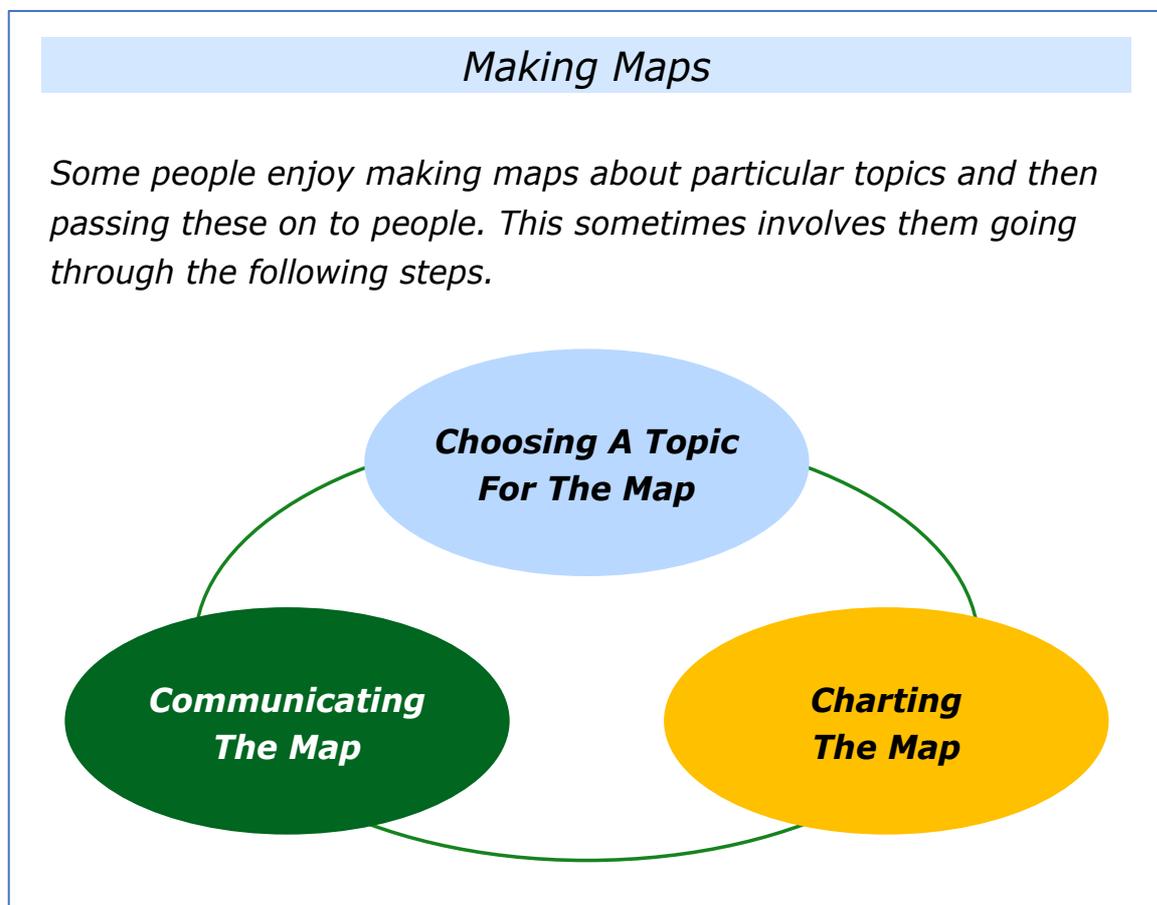

People often want more than models, so it can be useful to move onto providing practical tools that work. They can then apply these in their own lives and work.

The final step can be to make the knowledge available to people. This can be done through writing, teaching, mentoring or using other media.

Let's explore a similar approach to passing on knowledge – one that has stood the test of time.

The Making Maps Approach

People sometimes like to make maps about certain topics and pass these on to people. They like to provide information that people can use to pursue their chosen journeys successfully.

Some people make maps of physical things. These may include towns, countries and planets. They may chart journeys across land, sea or space. Some may create diagrams of the body, brain or other physical objects.

Some people make maps of practical things. They may provide guidebooks, instruction manuals or designs that enable people to use tools, run projects or do practical tasks successfully.

Some people make maps about professional things. They may describe principles, guidelines or other approaches that people can follow to perform excellent work in their chosen profession.

Some people make maps of psychological things. They may provide models that help people to make sense of human emotions, behaviour and challenges.

Some people make maps of philosophical theories. They may use diagrams, models or other methods to highlight the key concepts. They may also show how this information can be applied in life.

People Make Maps About Different Things

They may make maps about:

Physical Things

Practical Things

Professional Things

Psychological Things

Philosophical Things

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you followed some elements of the map making approach? You may have done this when aiming to pass on knowledge as a teacher, coach, mentor, project leader or in another role.

What did you do to create and pass on a map that people could use to navigate the topic successfully? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Making Maps In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I followed some elements of the making maps approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow some elements of this approach were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Imagine that you want to follow some elements of this approach in the future. If appropriate, you may take the following steps. You will, of course, follow these in your own way.

Choosing A Topic For The Map

You may start by choosing the topic for the map. This could involve exploring a subject that you find fascinating or want to understand. It may also involve passing on this knowledge to other people.

You may want to help people to pursue a particular kind of journey. The aim would be to help them to understand the territory and reach their chosen destination successfully.

Imagine that you have chosen to focus on a certain topic. It can be useful to clarify the real results you want to achieve and your plan for making the map.

Different people do this in different ways. One approach involves exploring similar questions to those asked by an author before they do a piece of work. These include the following.

What is the purpose of the piece of work? What are the reasons why I want to produce it? What are the real results I want to achieve by doing the piece of work?

Who is the audience? What is happening in their world? What are the challenges they may face? What are their goals? What can I pass on that will help them to achieve their goals?

What are the key messages I want to get across to people? What is the knowledge I want to share? How can I do this in a way that resonates with people? How can I make the work attractive and accessible?

How can I use my strengths to produce the piece of work? How can I compensate for any weaknesses? How can I encourage myself on the journey when doing the work?

Let's return to the desired results. What are the things I want people to be saying, thinking and feeling after they have experienced the work? How can I do my best to achieve these results?

Imagine that you have clarified your plan for making the map. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Charting The Map

This part often involves three stages. First, collecting information for the map. Second, charting the map. Third, checking the map to ensure it is accurate.

You may start by collecting information in your own way. Much will depend on the kind of map you are making.

Cartographers often visited the actual landscape. They used surveying tools and other methods to produce accurate representations of the territory. Since then photography and other technology has led to producing highly detailed maps.

Writers, educators and people who create maps of knowledge use their own methods for gathering information. Studying their chosen topic, they may build on the existing thinking and also add their own observations. They continue until they are ready to move to the next stage.

You may then begin charting the map. Sometimes this involves providing an accurate description of the data. This will be the case if you are conveying a factual map – such as drawing a physical landscape.

Sometimes it may involve summarising the key headlines plus showing people how they can get more information. This may be the case if you are helping people to understand a particular theory or concept.

Different people use different approaches when, for example, charting a professional, psychological or philosophical theory. The key is to provide people with a map they can use to understand and apply the information.

You will then go on to checking the map. Cartographers continually test their map. They do this in order: a) to check the information is accurate and reliable; b) to check the latest developments as they recognise the map will keep evolving.

Good educators continually test the information they are passing on to people. They also keep checking that the map works. They want to ensure that it is reliable, resilient and will help people to achieve their desired results.

Imagine that you have taken these steps. You may then want to move on to the next stage.

Communicating The Map

Different people choose to communicate the map in different ways. They may convey the information through an atlas, models, books and other media.

You will do this in your own way. When doing so, it can be useful to return to some of the questions we explored earlier. These include the following.

Who is the audience? What are their goals? How can I communicate the map in a way that helps them to reach their goals? How can I provide practical tools that they can use to achieve their picture of success?

Imagine that you want to follow some elements of the map making approach in the future. What may be the situation where you can use this approach? How can you apply it in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps.?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Making Maps In The Future

The specific situation in the future when I may want to follow some elements of the making maps approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow some elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Sense Of Perspective Approach

People Who Have A Sense Of Perspective

They see themselves as small in the great sweep of history;

They do not see themselves as important;

They recognise that their actions have consequences, however, both for themselves and for other people.

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to encourage others and do their best during their time on the planet. Such people also develop a sense of perspective.

They see themselves as small in the great sweep of history. They also recognise, however, that their actions have consequences. Different people develop a sense of perspective in different ways.

They may have been through experiences that have taught them what is important in life – such as being grateful, kind and encouraging people during their time on the planet.

They may have focused on what human beings have in common - such as wanting to be healthy, hopeful and happy - and how people can work together to achieve these common goals.

They may have studied humanity at its best and seen the principles that people, organisations and societies can follow to coordinate their strengths and perform brilliantly.

Different people use their life experiences in different ways. Some choose to be positive, follow their principles and maintain a sense of perspective. Let's look at the steps they may follow.

They Aim To Positive

Such people aim to have a positive attitude. They are grateful and generous. They aim to encourage both themselves and other people in their daily lives and work.

They recognise that they make choices every day and each choice has consequences. Bearing this in mind, such people may take the following steps.

- They aim to take responsibility rather than avoid responsibility, to be creators rather than complainers and to focus on what they can control rather than what they can't control.

- They aim to build on their strengths rather than their shortcomings, to build on their assets rather than worry about their angst and to channel their personality in a positive way.

- They aim to be caring rather than callous, to help people rather than hurt people and to encourage both present and future generations during their time on the planet.

Such people are often generous. They are also savvy, however, and recognise warning signs. They choose not to give in to dirty fighters or to become victims.

They Aim To Follow Their Principles

Somebody who has a sense of perspective may have learned lessons from certain challenging experiences. They may have had setbacks, a serious illness or a life-changing event.

Feeling vulnerable helped them to reflect on what is really important in life. They may have done this by exploring the following themes.

Their Purpose

They may have clarified their purpose – what they want to do during their time on the planet - and clarified their life goals.

Their Principles

They may have clarified the principles they want to follow to work towards achieving towards their life goals

Their Picture Of Success

They may have clarified the specific things they can do to pursue their purpose, follow their principles and do their best to achieve their life goals.

Different people pursue this approach in different ways. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I sometimes focus on my purpose but often find it simpler to follow my life principles. I then aim to translate these into action every day."

People who take this approach may also aim to do something early each day towards achieving their picture of success. They then feel more in charge of the day. They may also focus on the next theme.

They Have A Sense Of Perspective

Different people reach this stage in different ways. Some of these were described earlier. Some people may also have taken the following steps to develop a sense of perspective.

They may have chosen to serve something greater than themselves – such as a spiritual faith, purpose or sense of vocation – during their time on the planet.

They may have studied the human qualities that are most admired across many cultures – such as kindness and wisdom – and try to follow these principles in their own life.

They may have a personal philosophy that enables them to see events - such as successes or setbacks - in context and continue pursuing their chosen principles in life.

They may have experienced a sense of wonder and gained profound insights when being fully present in nature, witnessing beauty or seeing people perform brilliantly.

They may have developed the ability to make good decisions by seeing the big picture, the many possible ways forward and the consequences of each option.

They may have experienced many different cultures which has helped them to respect there are many ways to live life – they therefore aim to build on what people have in common and find positive solutions to challenges.

They may have learned that there are virtually always solutions to challenges – providing people are prepared to do what is required to achieve the picture of success.

They may have learned to empathise with many living things – people, animals and various species – which leads to them wanting to encourage future generations and care for life on the planet.

They may be strategic thinkers - seeing patterns and connections – and aim to build sustainable systems that achieve ongoing success for people and the planet.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to continue to have a sense of perspective. How can you do this in your own way? How can you translate these ideas into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Sense Of Perspective Approach

The specific ways I can continue to have a sense of perspective are:

*

The specific things I can do to translate these ideas into action are:

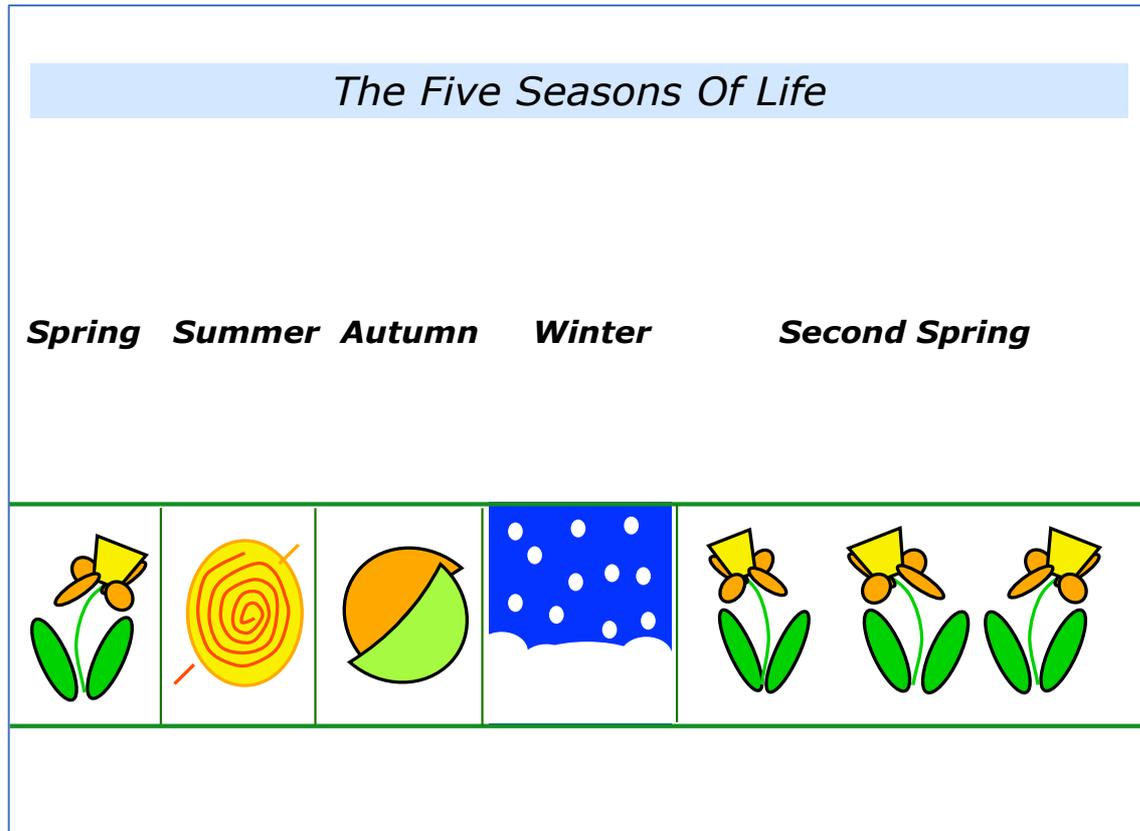

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Five Seasons Of Life Approach

There are many models regarding the stages that people go through in life and how they develop perspective. Here is one approach that is based on the Five Seasons.

Spring And Summer

Childhood is your first spring. The fields are green, the sky is blue and you can wander forever. Providing you are given encouragement, every day is an adventure. You can explore the world, discover your talents and follow your dreams.

Summer is a time for travelling, sitting in cafes and discussing how to change the world. Teenage years throb with idealism. Providing you receive guidance, you may be able to discover your vocation and what you can give to the world.

Looking back, what do you recall of these times? What were the positive things? What were the challenges? One woman said:

"I had a wonderful childhood. This was despite having an illness that meant I had difficulty walking for several years. Even when I was in a wheelchair, my parents focused on what I could do.

"When I began walking again it was hard for me to do sports. So my parents spent time and money on us learning to sail together. This helped me to grow in confidence.

"My teenage years were a bit more difficult, because some people tried to bully me. But I found several close friends with whom I spent time.

"This was when I became interested in how technology could help people. I started by creating a chat room, which turned into a support network.

"The experience helped me later when creating my social media company. Nowadays we work with big companies and social enterprises. We help people to share knowledge and do good."

Autumn And Winter

Autumn is the time when a person may begin worrying about security. Perhaps idealism doesn't work after all; perhaps they had better get a proper job. Some people look for a life-partner, forget their life-passion and begin saving for a life-pension.

They get a mortgage, work hard and try to establish security. Providing they hit the company targets, they gain promotion and climb the corporate ladder.

At the same time, however, some people may gather more debts. Winter arrives. Sitting in a traffic jam one day, the person may say:

"I am successful, but I am not happy. What can I do about it?"

Failing to see an immediate answer, they may numb themselves and work to gain another promotion. One day another wake-up call arrives. They hear about a school friend who has died. Reflecting, they embark on the existential journey travelled by many people over the years. They ask:

"What do I want to do with the rest of my life? How can I follow this path? When do I want to begin?"

A savvy person may stay in their job but also begin pursuing a parallel strategy. They explore how they can build on their strengths, do satisfying work and get a reasonable salary.

They learn how to channel their personality rather than change their personality. People develop, they don't change. A rose can become a better rose, it cannot become a daffodil. The message is:

"Be who you are, only more so."

The person says 'Yes,' to spending time with positive people and 'No,' to negative people. They do more of the things they love. Winter is tough, but it can also be beautiful. Here comes the sun.

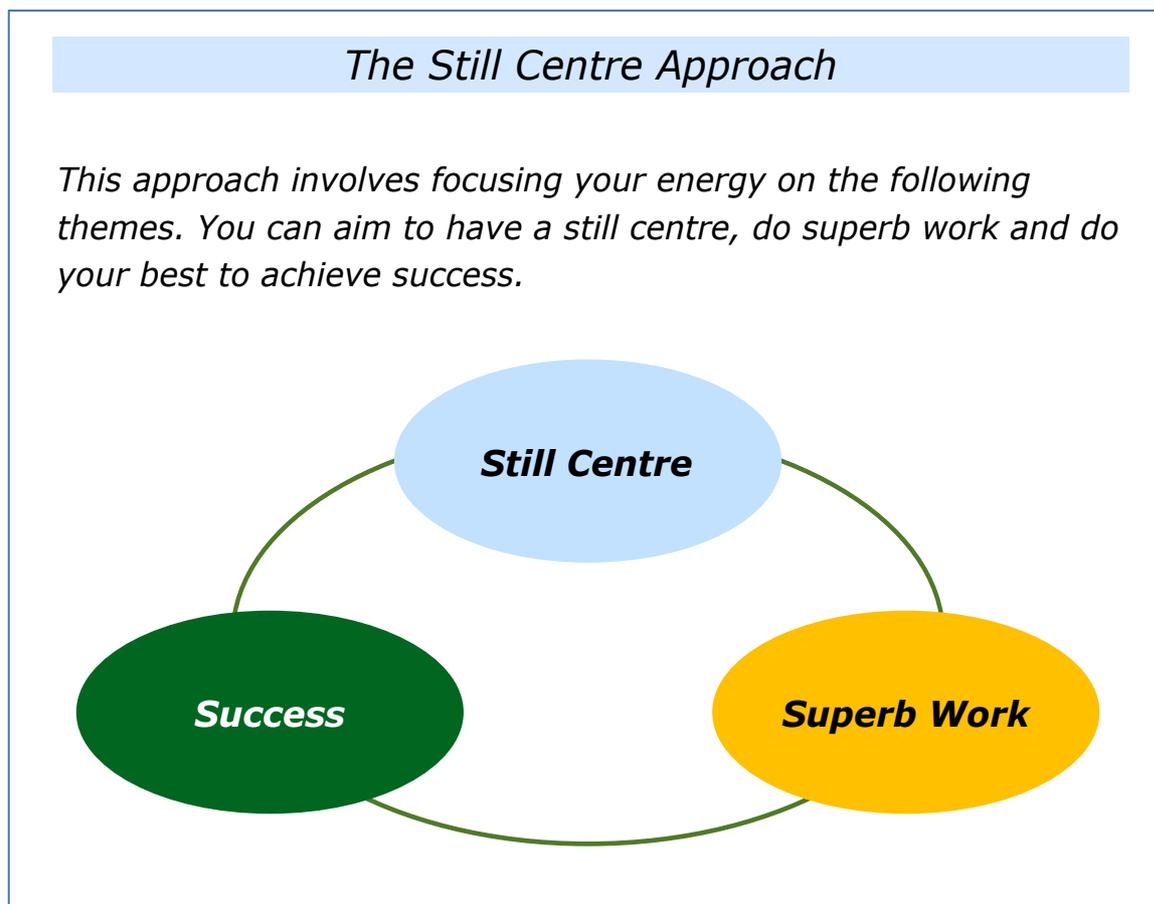

Second Spring

Choosing to live life, a person may decide to make the most of their Second Spring. They recapture their zest and feel alive. They do what they want, dress the way they want and spend time with the people they want. Life is for living and they enjoy every day. That doesn't mean everything is rosy.

The person has stronger control needs but accepts there are some things they can't control. They do good work in their chosen garden - the things they can influence - whilst contributing toward building a better world.

The Second Spring is a time to plant seeds that encourage present and future generations. A person may not see these blossom, but that doesn't matter. Their flowers may grow tomorrow.

The Still Centre Approach

This is an approach that is used by people in many situations. They may aim to serve something great than themselves, show caring for other people or deliver peak performances.

The approach begins by them aiming to slow down, be still and focusing on what they want to do. They then aim to move into action, do superb work and achieve their definition of success.

Different people follow these steps in their own way. A nurse may follow them when caring for a patient. A teacher may follow them when passing on knowledge. An athlete may follow them when doing their best in an Olympic Final.

Looking back, can you think of when followed some of these steps? What did you do to try to have a still centre? How did you then aim to do superb work and achieve your definition of success?

The Still Centre Approach In The Past

The specific situation when I followed some elements of the still centre approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow some elements of the still centre approach were:

*

*

*

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

*

*

*

Different people choose to take this approach for different reasons. Some may want to find what T.S. Eliot described in his poem Four Quartets - the still point of a turning world.

The Shmoop website described this in the following way.

The "still point of the turning world" is a place of neither body nor spirit, "flesh nor fleshless."

It doesn't move from anything or toward anything. It isn't goal-oriented.

It's a place where our souls can find a sense of stillness and peace, even as the world continues to change.

The world indeed is ever turning. The art in life is to discover the still point of the turning world. This is not empty or a void. There the dance is.

Bruce Gatward-Cook expanded on theme on The School Of Philosophy website. Here is an excerpt from what he wrote.

In stillness the power of thought is clear, well-ordered and intelligent.

Likewise in stillness the power of decision is reasonable, true and certain. To help this it is possible to cultivate tranquillity of mind.

The world indeed is ever turning. The art in life is to discover the still point of the turning world. This is not empty or a void. There the dance is.

In the same work there is also the following passage:

*We shall not cease from exploration.
And the end of all our exploring
Will be to arrive where we started
And know the place for the first time.
When the mind does become completely still it is like coming back to ourselves, and knowing ourselves for the first time.*

Some people may want to refocus on their spiritual beliefs. Some may want to maintain a sense of perspective. Some may want to stay calm and plan ahead before embarking on a task.

Different people choose different ways to take these steps. The following sections give an introduction to some of these, several of which are explained in more detail elsewhere in the book.

Slowing Down

Some people aim to slow down. They may rest, breathe deeply or take time to reflect. The key is to do what works for you.

The Psych Central Newsletter provided many practical tips on this topic. Here are some excerpts from the following article.

The Power In Being Still And How To Practice Stillness

The key is to create an intention of stillness - to have some intentionality about how we're carrying ourselves in a given moment - and to focus on what is within our control, she said.

For instance, you might physically slow down by sitting, slowly walking or even lying down, she said. You might reduce external stimuli in your environment by lowering the lights and turning down the music.

The article goes on to quote Karin Lawson, a Doctor of Psychology and formerly the clinical director of Embrace, a binge eating recovery programme. Here is a summary of some of her suggestions.

Breathe. Taking slow, deep breaths induces the parasympathetic system and slows your heart rate.

Practice when you need it. Lawson practices stillness anywhere, "when the moment hits me regardless of where I am."

Schedule stillness. If you aren't creating stillness spontaneously, schedule it and keep this time sacred.

Find a favourite spot. Again, you can experience stillness anywhere. But it can help to start at a favourite place. This might be outdoors, such as a park or bench, or at home, in complete silence, she said.

Listen to soft music. Sometimes, people are afraid of being alone with their thoughts, Lawson said. This is when creating more structure is helpful. One way is by listening to soft, slow music. Music also is great when silence becomes deafening.

Repeat calming phrases. This also gives your stillness structure. Lawson shared these examples: "I am calm and still," or "I can create stillness."

Different people choose different ways to slow down. Sometimes this also involves them taking the next step.

Seeing Things In Perspective

Some people use the stillness to maintain perspective in challenging situations. This takes different forms in different situations.

A person who loves life may also see themselves as small in the great scheme of things. They recognise that what they do may be important but there may be many more important things in life.

A person who deals with crises may develop a different kind of perspective. A medical worker in Accident & Emergency, for example, must make decisions about the order in which injured patients can be treated.

A person who experiences a setback may begin to see this in perspective. Maintaining a sense of gratitude, they may focus on their assets rather than any angst. They may then make plans for taking the next step in their life or work.

Saying Their Chosen Mantra

This is an approach used by people who want to follow their principles in certain situations. Such people often take the following steps.

They clarify the principles they want to follow in their life and rehearse how they can follow these in certain situations.

They translate these principles into a positive mantra they can say to themselves in certain situations.

They keep saying this mantra to themselves to translate their principles into action in certain situations.

Every person is different, so it is vital they create a mantra that works for them. An athlete may prepare properly for a competition, for example, and then keep saying something like:

"Be calm and do your best."

Settling On Their Chosen Way Forward

Stillness can bring many benefits. These include calmness, clarify and sometimes being a well-spring for creativity.

Some people use it as a springboard for planning ahead. They clarify and rehearse their strategies for doing superb work. They then settle on their plan for doing their best to achieve their definition of success.

Mental rehearsal and visualisation is now common practice. It is done by actors, athletes, Formula 1 drivers and other people who aim to achieve peak performance.

Let's return to your life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to follow elements of the still centre approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you achieve a still centre? How can you settle on your chosen strategy? How can you move into action and do superb work? How can you do your best to achieve your definition of success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Still Centre Approach In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to follow some elements of the still centre approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow some elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

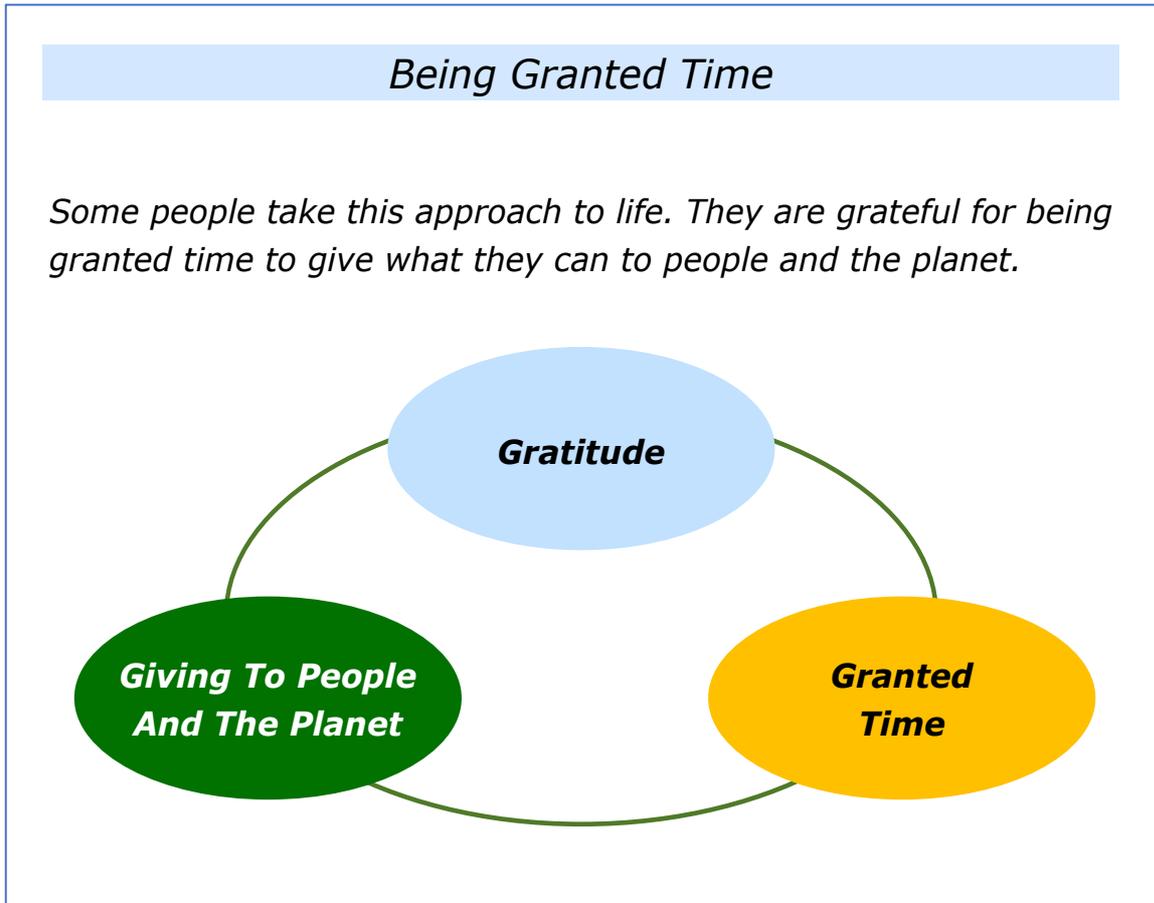

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Being Grateful For Being Granted Time Approach

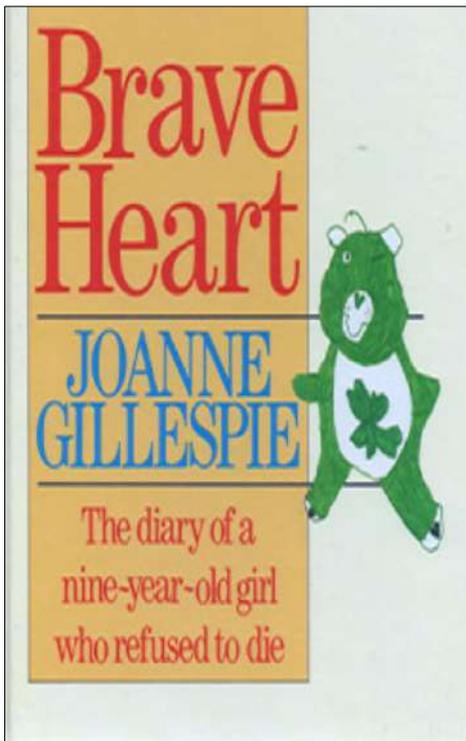

Some people appreciate life and see every day as an opportunity to help others. Many people embrace this approach as they get older. Some learn it much earlier in life.

Such people are grateful for being granted time to give what they can to others. They feel want to encourage people, pass on knowledge and plant seeds of hope during their remaining time on the planet.

Joanne Gillespie embodied this approach when appearing on Terry Wogan's television programme in 1988. She was ten at the time and had just finished writing a book about her experience of cancer. She expressed this in the following way

I have only one life and I am going to live it as long as I am here. You have got to face the fact that you have got a tumour or cancer, but it is not just you who have it. There are thousands of other people like us who have it.

I decided to write this book because when I was frightened and not sure of myself in hospital there was nothing for me to read.

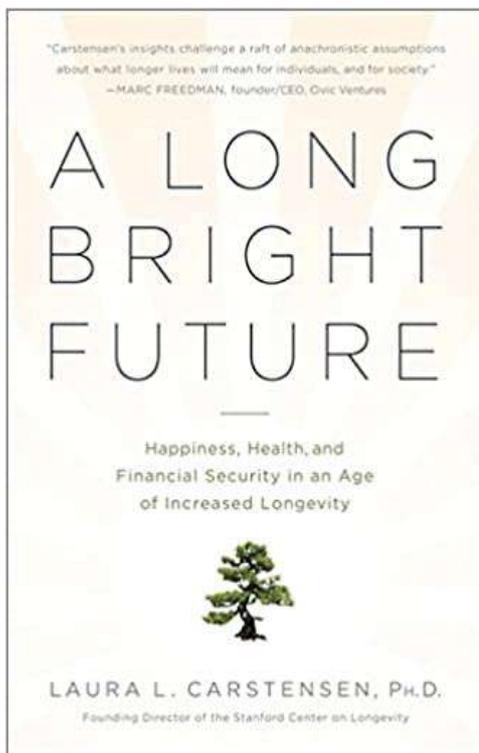

There were books for grown-ups but there were none for children.

So, I decided to write this book for children who are like me feeling frightened and ill.

And I hope it will help them to feel a bit more sure of themselves.

Joanne lived for another five years. She and her family created a fund that raised more than £150,000. This was used to buy medical equipment that helped children around the world.

Many elders focus on what they believe is important in life. This often involves giving to others as well as enjoying the moment. Laura Carstensen, an expert on longevity, explains the reasons for this in her book A Long Bright Future.

When we recognize that we don't have all the time in the world, we see our priorities most clearly.

We take less notice of trivial matters; we savour her life.

We're more appreciative; we're open to reconciliation.

We invest in more emotionally important parts of life, and life gets better.

Laura has given many interviews about the characteristics demonstrated by people as they get older. The following section includes some of her quotes on this theme.

The paradox of aging is that recognising that we won't live forever changes our perspective on life in positive ways. When people recognize the fragility of life and they don't have all the time in the world. People see what's good about life.

Older people count their blessings because they've had enough life experience to recognize them. They direct their cognitive resources, like attention and memory, to positive information more than negative.

Mentally sharp older adults show this positivity the most. Under conditions where it really matters, older people process negative information just as well as the positive information.

Increasing positivity with age can be explained by the idea that people's time horizons grow shorter as they approach their later years. Young adults in their 20s tend to see their futures as limitless, whereas older adults perceive more constraints on time.

This shortened sense of time makes people focus on goals that can be realized in the here and now. These tend to be about emotion, or what feels good, rather than engaging in activities that may pay off much later.

Now it's really too simplistic to say that older people are "happy." In our study, they are more positive. But they're also more likely than younger people to experience mixed emotions - sadness at the same time you experience happiness; you know, that tear in the eye when you're smiling at a friend.

And other research has shown that older people seem to engage with sadness more comfortably. They're more accepting of sadness than younger people are.

We suspect that this may help to explain why older people are better than younger people at solving hotly charged emotional conflicts and debates. Older people can view injustice with compassion, but not despair.

As we age, our time horizons grow shorter and our goals change. When we recognize that we don't have all the time in the world, we see our priorities most clearly. We invest in more emotionally important parts of life, and life gets better, so we're happier day-to-day.

Different people choose to take this approach at different ages. Joanne was young when she chose to be grateful and help children. Other people choose to be grateful and give to others later in life.

Let's return to your own life. If you wish, how can you continue to follow elements of this approach? Looking ahead, what do you want to give to people during the time you are granted on the planet?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Being Grateful For Being Granted Time

The specific things I want to do during the time I have been granted to give to people and the planet are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits – both for myself and for other people – of doing these things may be:

*

*

*

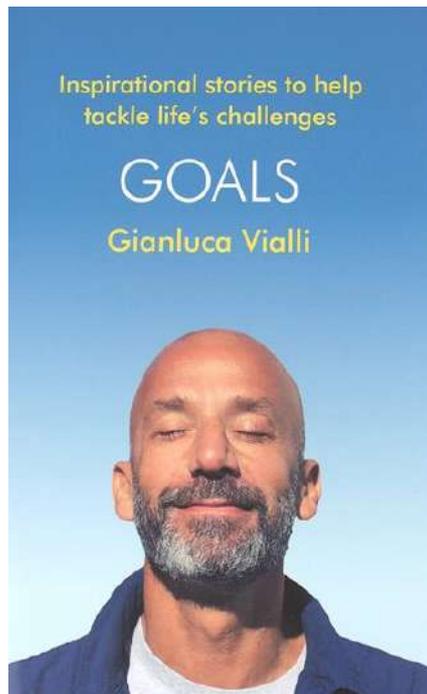

The Companions On The Creative Journey Approach

There are many ways to view our experiences. One approach is to see successes, setbacks and specific challenges as companions on our creative journey in life.

This approach is different from seeing events as bringing ups and downs, triumphs and tragedies. It is to see our strengths and experiences as things we can use in a positive way.

Different people apply this approach in different ways. Let's look at one example.

Gianluca Vialli:

"I tell people that I don't see cancer as a fight because the enemy is too powerful to beat.

"I see it as a journey with an unwanted travel companion, one that I will eventually outlast.

"This is my approach, people may not think the same way but I feel strong about it."

Gianluca Vialli has known many successes in his footballing life. Since then he has also passed on the lessons he learned during his journey with pancreatic cancer.

This led to him publishing Goals: Inspirational stories to help tackle life's challenges. The following sections provides excerpts from an interview he gave to Donald McRae for the Guardian newspaper.

Vialli is remarkably comfortable in this interview, even when reflecting on the closeness of death and revealing that he now faces tests every three months to check whether he is still clear of the disease.

"I found out that pancreatic cancer is one of the worst cancers. So I was shocked, confused, helpless, hopeless. But it helped that I'd been an athlete. For me it was about setting goals. I also know that nothing is permanent and it will all pass."

Vialli would learn another brutal truth. Remission can be temporary. His cancer came back in March 2019.

"We thought everything was going OK. And then, all of a sudden, you get a temperature. You go for a blood test and they say: 'Let's make sure there's nothing sinister.' I found out then. It was back."

"We in sport portray ourselves as tough guys that could deal with anything without showing any weakness. But I now realise the power of vulnerability and that, actually, it can be a powerful tool to get inside people's hearts.

"It creates empathy – and empathy is everything. I'm not ashamed of saying we all cry – sometimes because we are scared.

"In my case I was crying because I was scared of the unknown. I did not know whether I was going to be fine or not. It's different than if you cry because you've lost a match."

"I've learned that gratitude is a very powerful emotion. And I'm very grateful to many wonderful people – my wife and family and all the people who have looked after me. They're not just competent and knowledgeable.

"They really feel what you're going through and there's a great deal of empathy. I'm looked after at the Royal Marsden in Chelsea. It's an amazing hospital."

"Life is 10 per cent what happens to you, 90 per cent is the way we react. I connected that mantra with a friend of mine, Alex Zanardi, a former formula one driver.

"He had an accident, both legs were amputated but he didn't disappear off the map. He planned to become a very successful Paralympian, winning several gold medals. It shows you can turn something negative into something positive, get on with life and be happy.

"My friends, people who eventually knew about my condition, said: 'Come on, you're going to win this fight. You can beat cancer.' I always felt I didn't want to fight cancer, because it would be too big and powerful an enemy.

"I felt this is a journey. It's about the right therapies and the right doctors. It's about travelling with an unwanted travel companion until hopefully it gets bored and dies before me.

"This is my approach, people may not think the same way but I feel strong about it."

"I am positive personally. I am also positive about the world. The Covid crisis will pass. What I'd like to see next is that we do not forget these lessons.

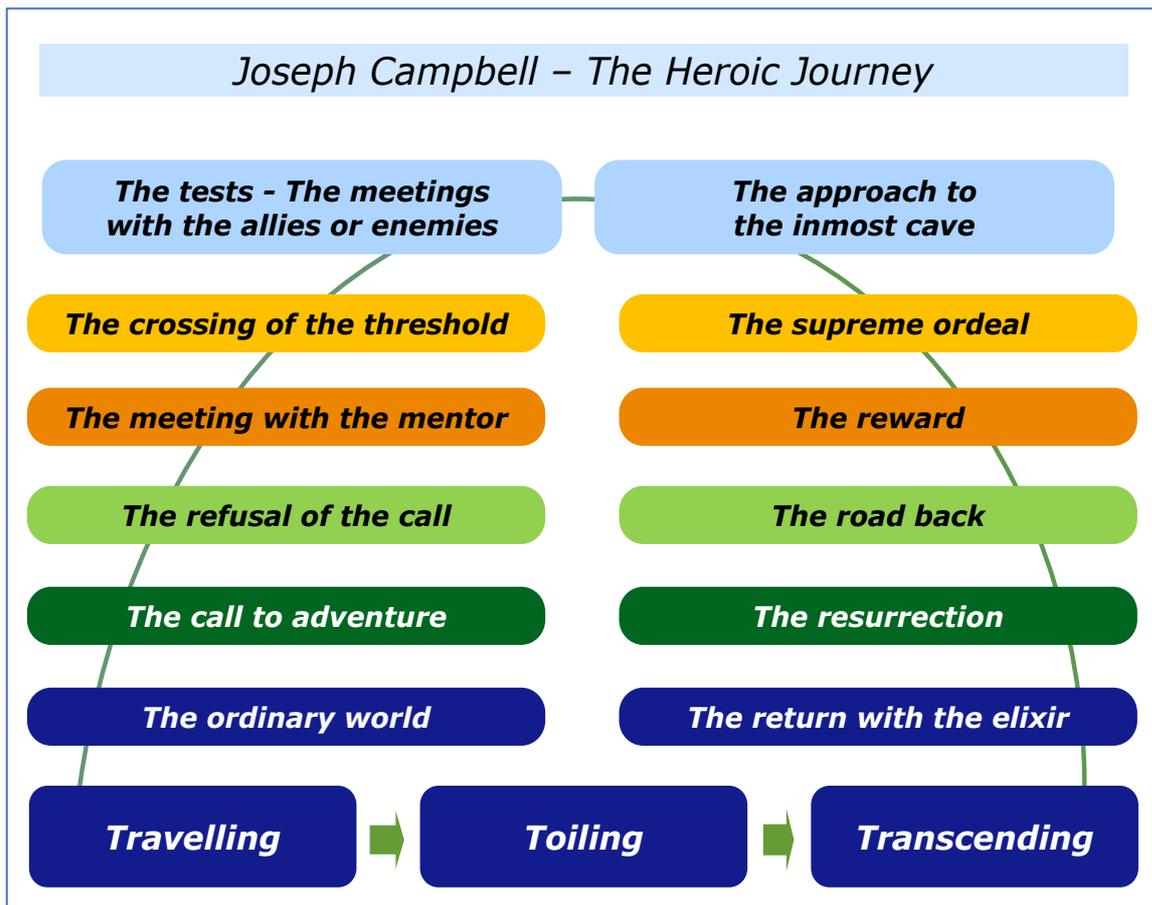

"If you look at climate change we have a chance to do something about it. We are now saying health is the most important thing.

"Why, once the virus is gone, would we go back to living in a place where the air is so polluted? Why don't we prevent people getting sick and dying from pollution?

"Surely we should be prepared to give up a little bit of our wealth, our so-called quality of life, for a safer and healthier planet? I feel very strongly about this kind of future."

Every person has companions on their journey in life. They have strengths they can use, support from people and successes along the way. They also have creativity they can use to manage the challenges they face.

Every person has many experiences. It is up to them how they use these events and the emotions they encounter. They can choose to use these in a positive or negative way. Let's look at a well-known example of this approach.

Many people now know about Joseph Campbell's work on the heroic journey. It is still worth revisiting, however, because it describes some of the companions we may meet when pursuing our chosen journeys.

People have always wanted to follow their dreams. Sometimes the odyssey involves an outer journey, sometimes an inner journey, sometimes a combination of both. Reaching the goal produces a sense of peace. They rest for a while - then embark on another journey.

Pursuing such journeys often involves building on your strengths and being tested on your weaknesses. There are many psychological models for understanding this journey. But insights can be also gained from Joseph's work.

Studying myths and legends from many civilisations, he found they often followed a similar structure. He described this in his book The Hero with a Thousand Faces.

His writings were popularised by Christopher Vogler in his book The Writer's Journey. This became a set text for budding writers across the world. George Lucas brought Campbell's work to an even wider audience, however, when paying homage to it as the director of Star Wars.

The heroic journey involves many stages. But let's explore three overall steps that people take when pursuing their chosen journey.

Travelling – setting-out on the journey towards the Grail

You may be content in your world, but then comes the call to pursue an adventure or tackle a challenge. For example, you may lose your job, get an illness, see an injustice or catch a glimpse of the Holy Grail.

At first you refuse the call but, after repeated asking, you embark on the journey. Now you are in a different world and do not know the rules, so you gather information and search for a compass.

Looking for guidance, you will meet helpers: but are they friends or enemies? Nevertheless, you continue on your chosen path.

Toiling – working hard on the journey towards the Grail

You encounter tests on the journey: toils, trials and tribulations. There are highs, lows, breakthroughs and setbacks, but you try to keep your eyes on the Grail.

Christopher Vogler's book shows how film plots often follow the structure that Joseph Campbell found in myths and legends. He writes:

"A hero leaves her comfortable, ordinary surroundings to venture into a challenging, unfamiliar world.

"It may be an outward journey to an actual place: a labyrinth, forest or cave, a strange city or country, a new locale that becomes the arena for her conflict with antagonistic, challenging forces..."

"But there are many stories that take the hero on an inward journey, one of the mind, the heart, the spirit.

"In any good story the hero grows and changes, making a journey from one way of being to the next: from despair to hope, weakness to strength, folly to wisdom, love to hate, and back again.

"It's these emotional journeys that hook an audience and make a story worth watching."

(The Heroine's Journey is similar to The Hero's Journey, but with one difference. Women gather knowledge and wisdom from the tribe earlier, whilst some men may only ask for help at the last moment.)

Overcoming challenges, you finally stand on the edge of victory. You venture into what Campbell calls the inmost cave and face the supreme ordeal. How will you behave in this moment of truth? For example, will you be generous or will you submit to greed? Will you fight, flee or flow?

Transcending – lifting the Grail and gathering wisdom from the journey

You can only do your best, so you do the right thing. Sometimes you will lift the prize; sometimes you will simply gather wisdom for a future journey. You may enjoy a moment of transcendence - an epiphany - and see the world as if for the first time.

The Hero/Heroine sometimes returns with the prize, but first there is the journey home. This is the return to the ordinary world. How can you make sense of what you have learned? Will people be able to understand? That is when the wisdom begins to seep into your bones and you are changed forever.

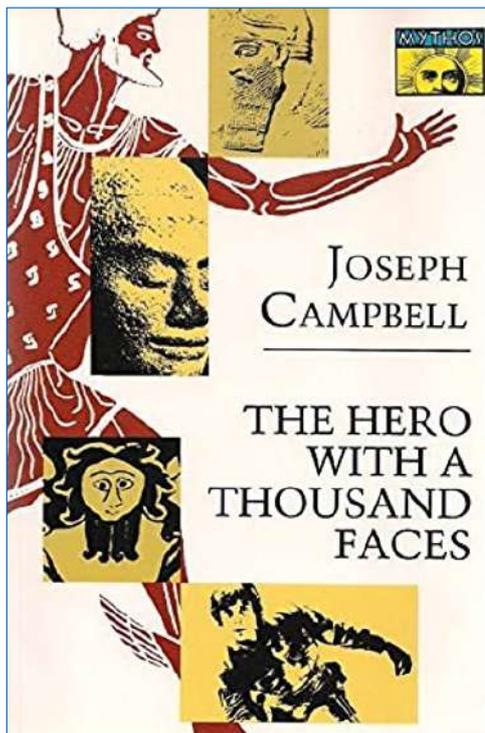

Joseph Campbell says people take one of three routes after returning to the world.

They may share their vision, but the world does not want to know, so they retreat back to the woods, with a dog and a pipe.

They may meet resistance, become disheartened, and revert to the world's way.

They may make a living by becoming, in the broadest sense, a teacher and pass-on their message to people who are receptive.

Days, weeks and months pass. You rest for a while, but then you become restless. There is another mountain to climb, another adventure to pursue. So you embark on your next chosen journey. Or does the journey choose you?

Let's return to you own life and work. What may be the different kinds of companions you have on your creative journey? How can you, as far as possible, use these in a positive way? Try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences

The Companions On The Creative Journey

The companions I may have on the creative journey I take through life may be:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to – as far possible, use these in a positive way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking this approach may be:

*

*

*

The Generosity Approach Rather Than The Greed Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the generosity approach. Some aim to follow the greed approach. As Mahatma Gandhi is often quoted as saying:

"The world has enough for everyone's need, but not enough for everyone's greed."

Different people follow these approaches for different reasons. Let's explore these themes.

The Generosity Approach

People who are generous are often grateful for what they have been given. They remember the love, encouragement and chances they have been given by other people. Experiencing a sense of gratitude, they want to pass on similar experiences to other people.

Such people love to give to others. They enjoy encouraging people and helping them to have positive experiences. They also like to enable other people to achieve success.

They like to build on what people have in common and enjoy finding positive solutions to challenges. When appropriate, they also aim to, as far as possible, find win-win solutions to difficulties.

People who follow the generous approach like to plant seeds of hope. They sometimes ask: "How is this going to help people or the planet?" They then do their best to help both present and future generations.

The Greed Approach

People who follow this approach may be rich or powerful but they may not appear to be grateful. They aim to exploit people rather than encourage them. They want to grab more from other people and fulfil their own agendas.

Such people sometimes bully or blame others. They sometimes seem addicted to anger. They start conflicts and use war-like language. They then aim to make sure that they win and that other people lose.

People who follow this approach sometimes behave in ways that hurts people or the planet. They are not interested in the collateral damage they create. People who follow the greed approach simply want more. But for them, more will never be enough.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow elements of the generous approach. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Generosity Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this in my own way may be:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Giving Every Day Approach

Giving Every Day

Some people take the following approach.

- They make a decision that they want to give to people;
- They start each day by clarifying what they want to give to people;
- They do their best to make a positive contribution and continue to give to people.

Some people seem to be natural givers. Some decide to be givers as a certain point of their lives – such as when having children. Some take this approach as they grow older. They aim to give to people every day.

Different people choose different ways to translate this into action. Some ask themselves the following questions.

What are the things I can give to people? What do I want to give to them today? How can I do my best to make positive contribution? How can I continue to give to people?

You will have your own approach to making this happen. If you wish, however, try tackling the following exercise.

Giving Every Day

The specific things that I want to give to people today are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to give these things to people are:

*

*

*

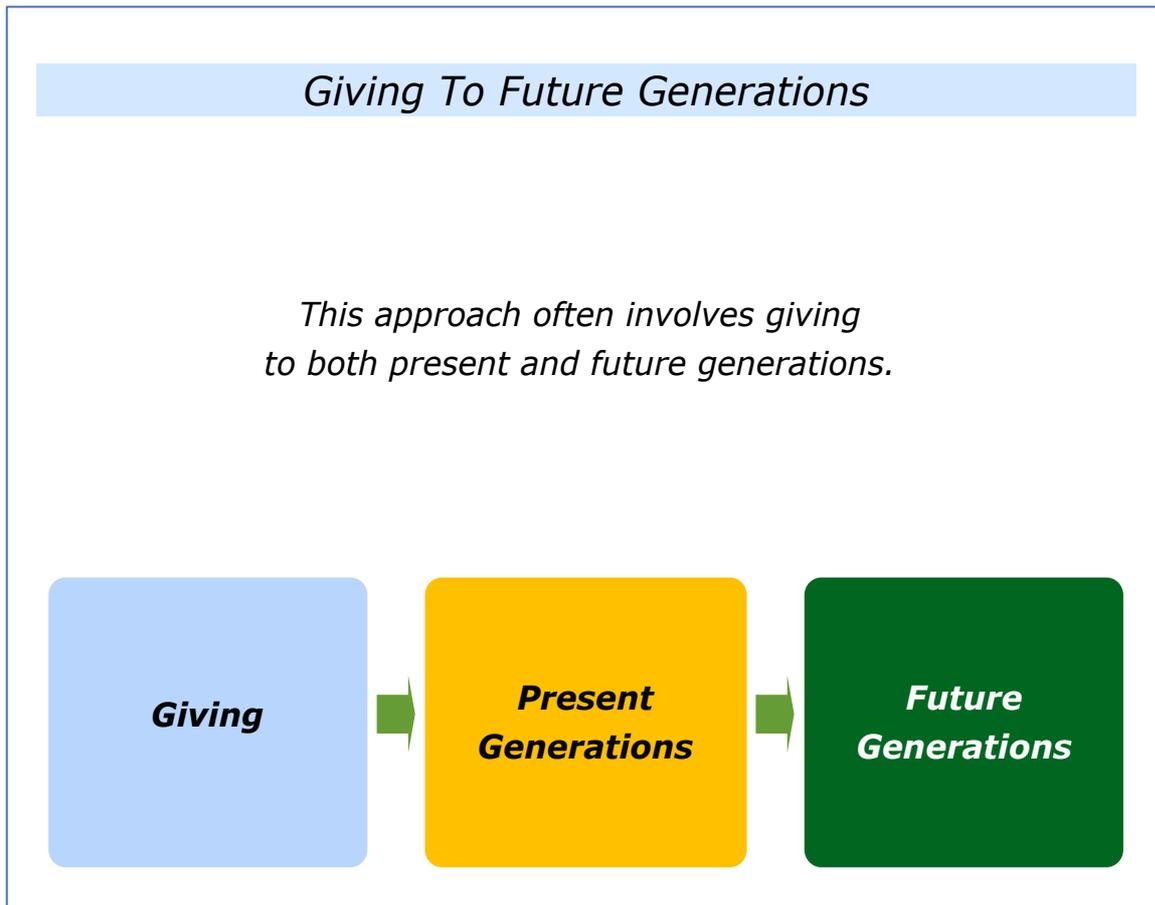

The specific things that may happen as a result of giving these things to people may be:

*

*

*

The Giving To Future Generations Approach

Many people want to give to future generations. Different people do this in different ways.

Some encourage their children to live fulfilling lives. Some pass on knowledge that enables people to shape a positive future. Some do practical work that helps people or the planet.

There are now many organisations that help people to encourage both present and future generations. The following pages describe one such organisation.

The Centre For Effective Altruism

Toby Ord and William MacAskill co-founded the Centre in 2011. It built on the work done by two movements. These were:

Giving What You Can – a community of effective givers founded in Oxford, UK.

80,000 hours – an organisation that enables people to pursue high-impact careers that help people and the planet.

Here is an introduction to the Centre's work. We explore some aspects of this in the following pages.

CENTRE FOR EFFECTIVE ALTRUISM

What is effective altruism?

Effective altruism is about using evidence and reason to figure out how to benefit others as much as possible, and taking action on that basis.

What is the effective altruism community?

The effective altruism community is a global community of people who care deeply about the world, make helping others a significant part of their lives, and use evidence and reason to figure out how best to do so.

The Guiding Principles Of Effective Altruism

Commitment to Others

We take the well-being of others very seriously, and are willing to take significant personal action in order to benefit others.

What this entails can vary from person to person, and it's ultimately up to individuals to figure out what significant personal action looks like for them.

In each case, however, the most essential commitment of effective altruism is to actively try to make the world a better place.

Scientific Mindset

We strive to base our actions on the best available evidence and reasoning about how the world works.

We recognize how difficult it is to know how to do the most good, and therefore try to avoid overconfidence, to seek out informed critiques of our own views, to be open to unusual ideas, and to take alternative points of view seriously.

Openness

We are a community united by our commitment to these principles, not to a specific cause.

Our goal is to do as much good as we can, and we evaluate ways to do that without committing ourselves at the outset to any particular cause.

We are open to focusing our efforts on any group of beneficiaries, and to using any reasonable methods to help them.

If good arguments or evidence show that our current plans are not the best way of helping, we will change our beliefs and actions.

Integrity

Because we believe that trust, cooperation, and accurate information are essential to doing good, we strive to be honest and trustworthy.

More broadly, we strive to follow those rules of good conduct that allow communities (and the people within them) to thrive.

We also value the reputation of effective altruism, and recognize that our actions reflect on it.

Collaborative Spirit

We affirm a commitment to building a friendly, open, and welcoming environment in which many different approaches can flourish, and in which a wide range of perspectives can be evaluated on their merits.

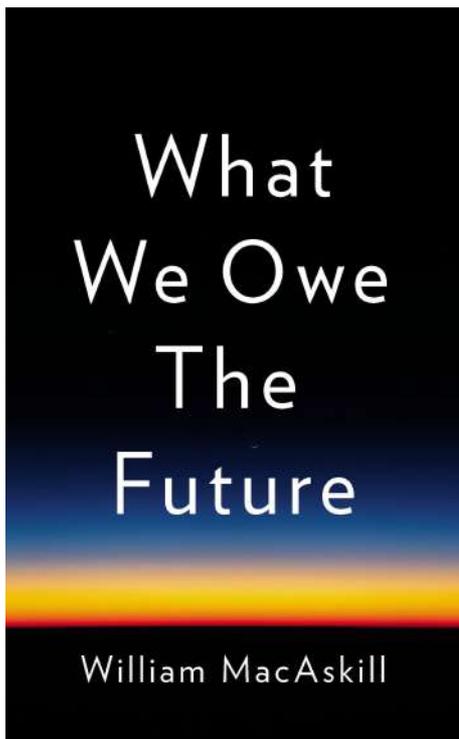

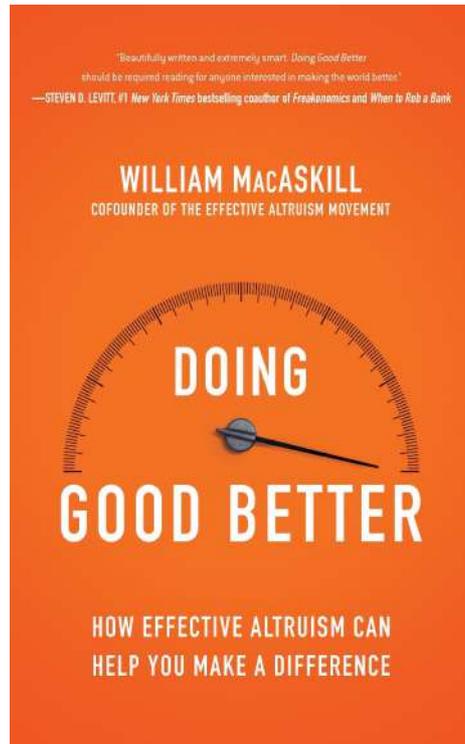

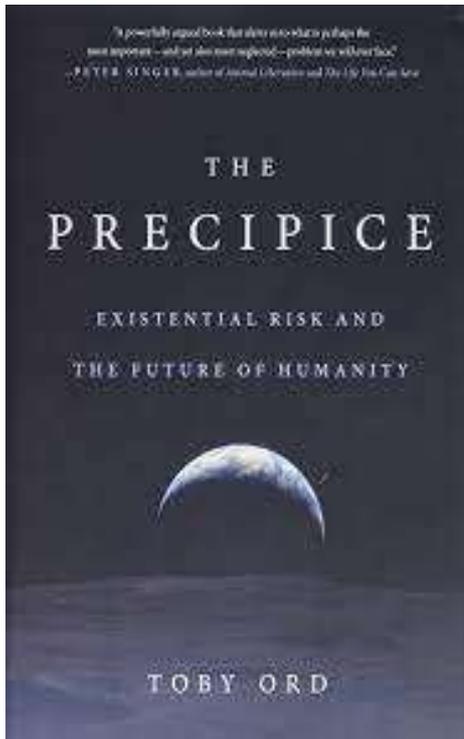

In order to encourage cooperation and collaboration between people with widely varying circumstances and ways of thinking, we resolve to treat people of different worldviews, values, backgrounds, and identities kindly and respectfully.

CEA's overall aim is to do the most we can to solve pressing global problems and prepare to face the challenges of tomorrow.

The EA community is a place where people can learn about and discuss which ways of doing good are most effective, based on impartially altruistic, truth-seeking principles.

Toby and William have published books on the how people can contribute to tackling some of the existential challenges facing humanity. These include The Precipice, Doing Good Better and What We Owe The Future.

The Centre also provides practical tools that people can use to pursue careers that help people and the planet. Many of these are described in Benjamin Todd's book 80,000 hours. The following pages provide excerpts from the book.

80,000 Hours – Find A Fulfilling Career That Does Good

For most of us, a significant amount of our productive waking life - over 80,000 hours on average - is spent working. This is an enormous resource that can be used to make the world better.

80,000 Hours - named after the time you spend in your career - is a non-profit organization dedicated to helping people figure out in which careers they can do the most good.

First, you need to consider which problem you should focus on. 80,000 Hours has many suggestions for problems where one person can make a substantial impact.

Next, you need to consider the most effective way to address the problem. At this point, it is useful to consider multiple approaches. Here is one approach.

Personal Fit

Why being good at your job is even more important than people think

"Find work you're good at" is a truism, but we think many people still don't take it seriously enough.

Finding the option where you have the best chance of excelling over the course of your career - where you have your greatest 'personal fit' - is one of the key determinants of your career's impact.

In fact, after initially identifying some promising paths, we think it's often the most important factor.

Being good at your job is also one of the main ingredients of a satisfying job, which helps you stay motivated in addition to being important in itself.

It could easily be more satisfying to be in the top 20% of a profession, even if it's perhaps lower paid or less glamorous than an alternative where you'd be average.

This means that we often advise people to first identify some high-impact paths, and then choose between them based on their degree of fit with them - especially focusing on those where they might excel.

It also means that it can be worth taking a job that you think is, say, in your second tier for impact, but is a better fit for you.

Making Predictions

Here are some questions you can use to make some initial assessments of your fit from several different angles:

 What do you think are your chances of success?*

To do this, look at your track record in similar work and try to project it forward.

 What drives performance in the field, and how do you stack up?*

The first step gives you a starting point, but you can try to improve your estimates by asking yourself what most drives success in the field, and whether you have those traits, as well as looking for other predictors of performance.

* What do experts say?

If you can, ask people experienced in the field for their assessment of your prospects.

Just be careful not to put too much weight on a single person's view.

Aim to ask people who have had experience selecting people for that job in question, and are likely to be honest with you.

* Does it match your strengths?

One way to gauge this is to look for activities that don't feel like work to you, but do for most people.

* Do you feel excited to pursue it?

Gut-level motivation isn't a reliable predictor of success, but if you don't feel motivated, it'll be challenging to exert yourself at the level required for high performance in most jobs.

So a lack of excitement should give you pause.

* Will you enjoy it?

To stick with it long term, the path would ideally be reasonably enjoyable.

It should fit with the rest of your life (e.g. if you want a family, you may want a job without extreme working hours).

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of ways you may wish to give to both present and future generations?

How can you continue to encourage other people? How can you build on your strengths and do positive work? How can you do plant seeds of hope? How can you do things that help people or the planet?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Giving To Future Generations

The specific things I would like to give to present and future generations are:

*

*

*

The specific steps I can take to give these things to present and future generations are:

*

*

*

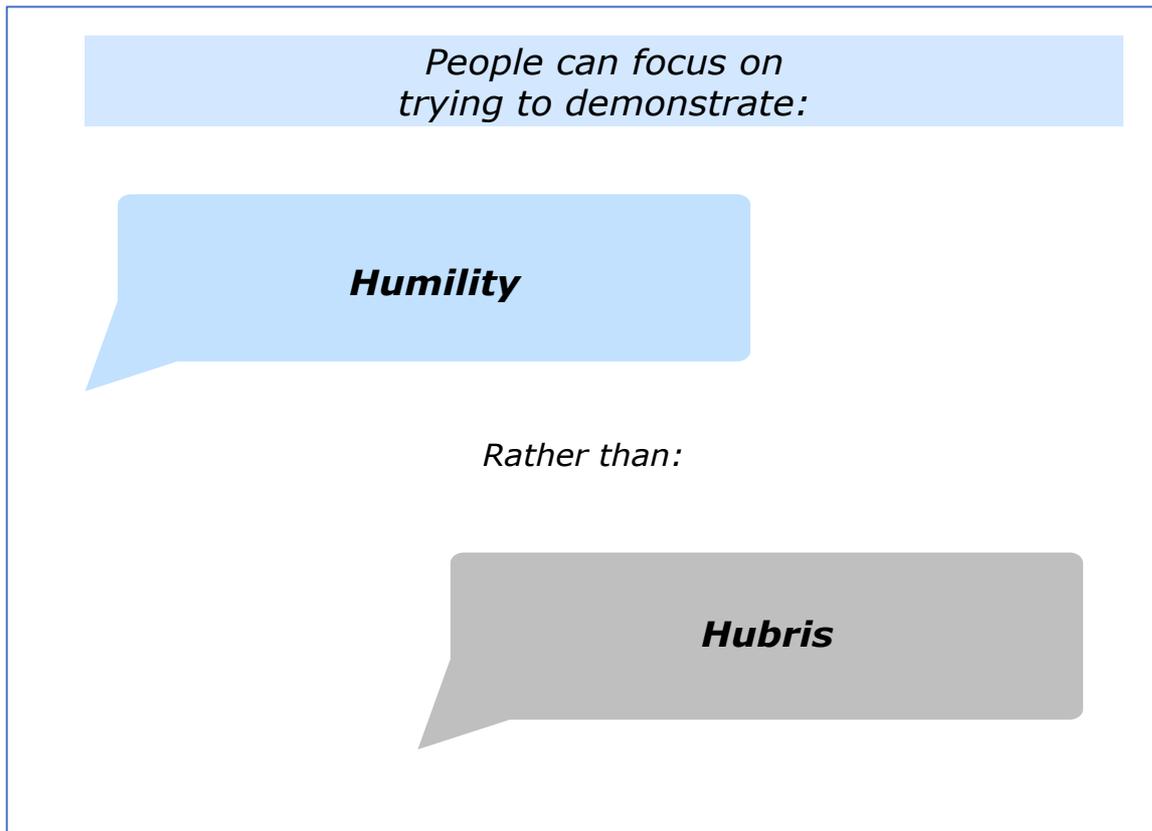

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Humility Rather Than Hubris Approach

People make choices every minute. One of the choices they make is to demonstrate humility rather than hubris. Humility is a lifelong quest. Like wisdom, as soon as you think you have got it, you haven't.

Humble people want to serve others and serve life. They want to help others to succeed. On the other hand, some people present themselves with hubris. They aim to be superior, saying they are market leaders or inflating their efforts.

Anthony Sher, the actor, describes an example of serving something greater than himself. He was doing a one-man show called Promo based on Primo Levi's book about Auschwitz.

Before the performance Anthony was concerned about his own contribution and how it may be received. Bearing in mind the profoundness of the book, however, he saw his own feelings in perspective. He explained this in the following way.

"There was something about the material that was so sacred and that had to be delivered with care and properly that so much bigger than my own ego.

"That whenever I got frightened on the journey all I would have to think of was Primo Levi himself and there was no space for my petty feelings."

Looking back, can you think of a situation where you aimed to be humble? You may have aimed to serve others or serve life.

Maybe you were humble or maybe there were things you could do better next time. Overall, however, you tried to contribute in a humble way. Humble people often subscribe to the following view.

Life Is Something Beautiful

Before you were born, you were part of the universe.

After you die, you will be part of the universe.

Life is something beautiful, that happens in-between.

Looking ahead, how do you think you can demonstrate humility? How can you try to avoid hubris? Here are some themes that individuals explore when answering these questions.

Humility. The things I can do to try to demonstrate humility are:

To be kind ... To be grateful for life each day ... To serve something greater than myself ... To use my strengths to help other people ... To maintain a sense of humour and not take myself seriously – even though the work I do may be serious.

Hubris. The things I can do to try to avoid hubris are:

To not take credit for the things I do ... To learn from my mistakes ... To credit other people for the work they do ... To recognise that I am small in the great scheme of things ... To balance the paradox of accepting myself but also keep improving.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Humility Rather Than Hubris Approach

Humility. The specific things I can do try to demonstrate humility in the future are:

*

*

*

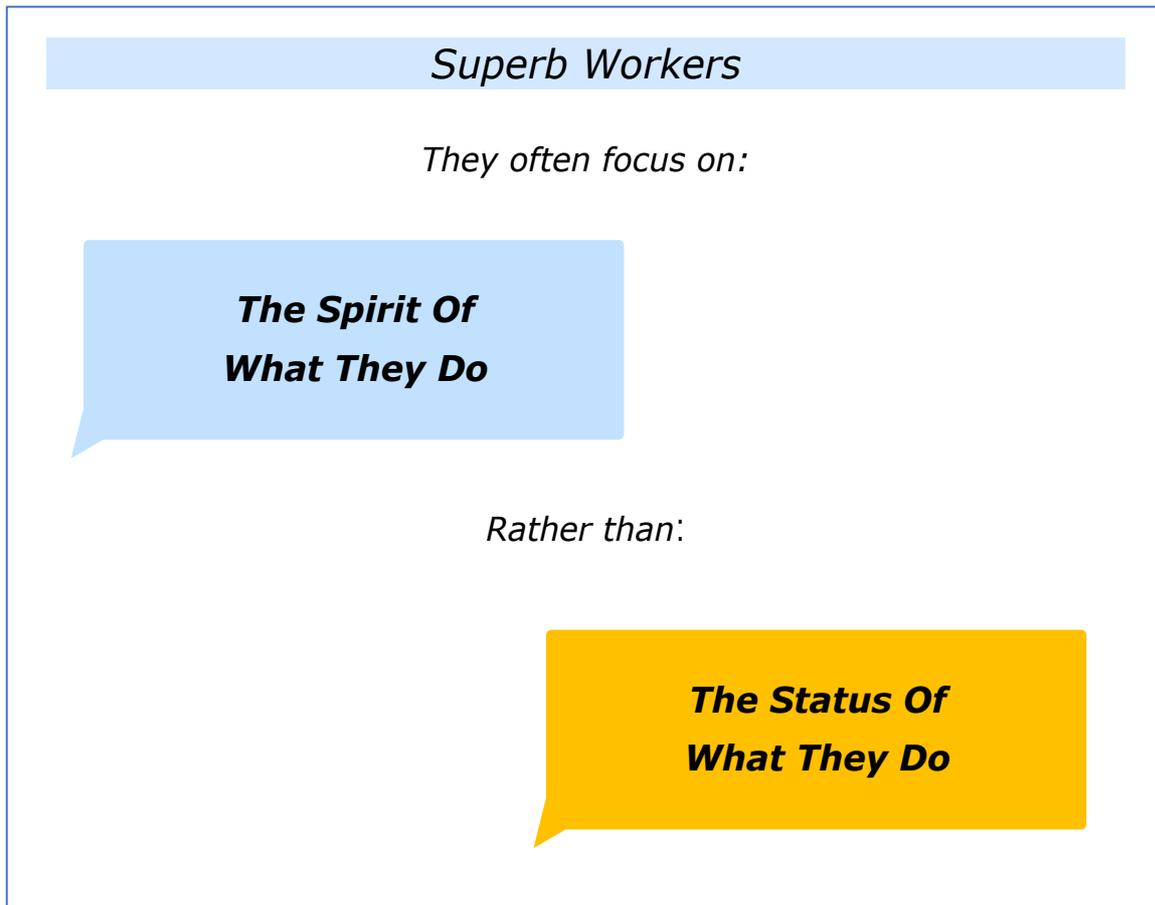

Hubris. The specific things I can do try to avoid hubris in the future are:

*

*

*

The Spirit Approach Rather Than The Status Approach

This is an approach demonstrated by many superb workers. They get satisfaction by serving the spirit of what they do rather the status of what they do. Let's look at some examples.

Caroline Moore and Mark Emberton are two wonderful surgeons who treated me for prostate cancer. Both have received high honours. They always demonstrate kindness and humanity when working with hundreds of patients from all walks of life.

Henry Pluckrose was a pioneering headteacher whose work at Prior Weston school was lauded. The thousands of visitors included famous people from around the world. Henry gave as much attention to a five-year-old from the inner city as to a visiting dignitary.

Such people embody the spirit I was taught regarding mentoring people. The key messages were:

It is about the spirit not the status

Your role is to help people to succeed.

You need to prepare properly and always do your best.

You need to do this whether you are working with a young person, a professional or a peak performer.

Many workers love the spirit of what they do. They love the journey as well as reaching the goal. They believe in doing their best whether they are working at the village hall or the Carnegie Hall.

The medical worker loves to care for people. The educator loves to pass on knowledge. The craft worker loves to pursue their craft. The football coach loves to help players to perform at their best. The mentor loves to help people to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. When do you care about the spirit of what you do rather than the status? It is always good to get positive feedback and sometimes to even get recognition. But the key may be to serve something greater than yourself.

What is the spirit you want to follow? What may be your vocation? When do you aim to build on your strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve specific goals?

Looking ahead, how can you follow this spirit in the future? How can you aim to do superb work? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Spirit Approach

The spirit I would like to follow in the future is:

*

The specific things I can do to follow this spirit and aim to do superb work are:

*

*

*

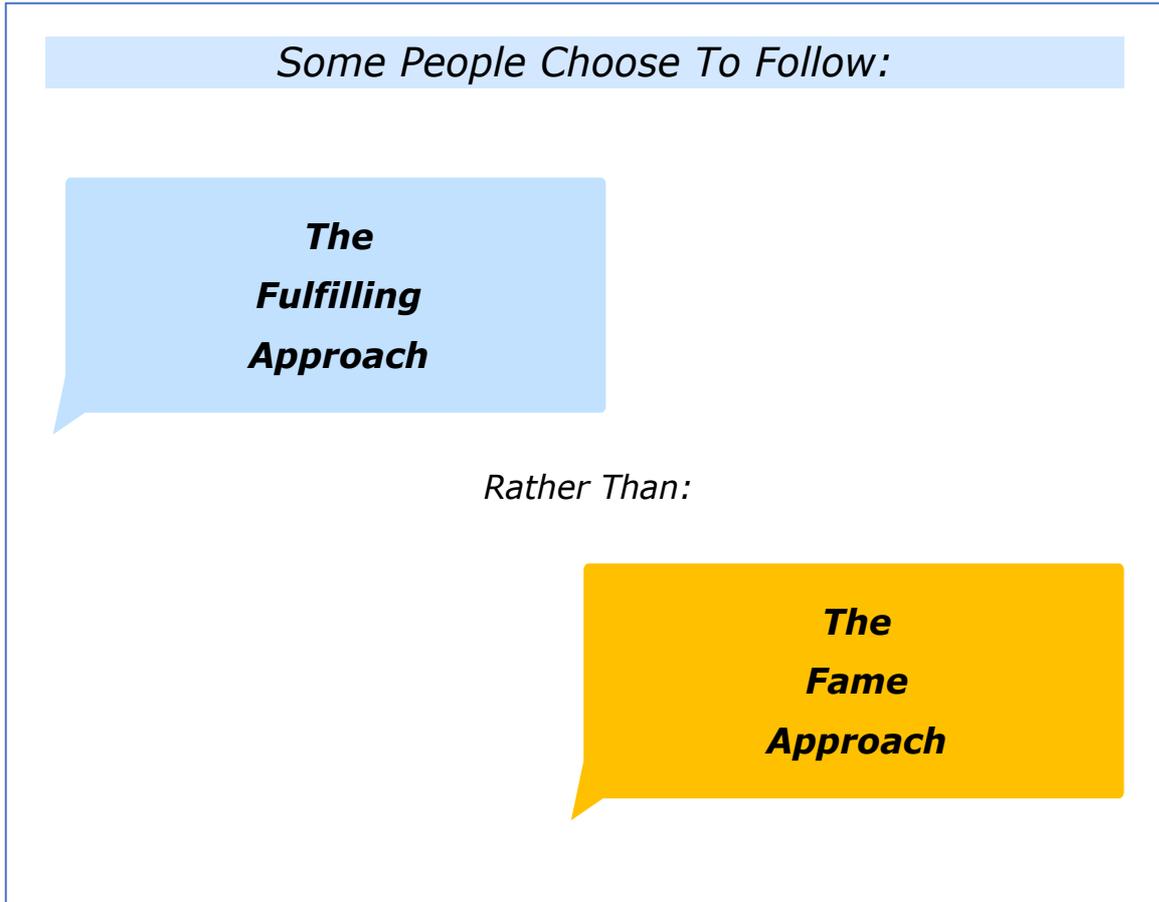

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Fulfilling Approach Rather Than The Fame Approach

Some people follow the fulfilling approach in their lives and work. Some people aim to achieve fame. Some people may find that taking the fulfilling approach can sometimes lead to fame.

Some individuals may start by doing work they love but, at a certain point, become addicted to applause or winning prizes. Some may then return to doing fulfilling work. They may say things like:

"It is the work that is important. I am not important."

Let's explore how individuals may pursue these different routes. This also involves them learning how to build on the pluses and manage the minuses of their chosen route.

The Fulfilling Approach

Some individuals aim to do fine work but stay out of the limelight. They love to do work where they can flow, focus, finish and, as a by-product, find fulfilment.

Such individuals may serve something greater than themselves. They may use their strengths to serve a philosophy, a vocation or a craft. They aim to serve this fully in their lives or work.

Some also develop the ability to make a living doing work they love. They build on their strengths, do superb work and help their employers or customers to achieve success.

Sometimes their work may gain recognition. Such individuals see this as a recognition of the value of the work, however, rather than as a personal plaudit. They have simply done their best to bring the work to fruition.

People who follow the fulfilling approach sometimes recognise it involves both pluses and minuses. They may also learn how to enjoy the upsides and manage the potential downsides.

The pluses may include the following. They are true to themselves, build on their strengths, have a sense of purpose, follow their principles, continue to develop and feel fulfilled.

The minuses may include the following. They may feel alone, find it hard to get funding, find their work is not valued, may need to take less fulfilling work to pay the bills and wonder if they can keep developing.

The Fame Approach

Some people aim to become well-known or famous. Some do it to spread their work. Some do it to get noticed or feel important. Some do it to gain status or win prizes.

Some people focus on self-promotion in their professional careers. They believe in personal branding or similar activities. They aim to climb the corporate ladder, get more money or reach the C-Suite.

People who strive to be famous may or may not feel fulfilled. They may also experience the potential pluses and minuses of taking this route.

The potential pluses may include the following. They may gain fame, make money, get affirmation, be seen as successful and get other fringe benefits.

The potential minuses may include the following. They may pay a heavy price, strive to stay in the limelight, fear it will all go away, give up their privacy and feel a failure if they no longer get affirmation.

The Fulfilling And Fame Approach

Some people follow the fulfilling approach and, as a by-product, gain fame. Such people may feel humble, however, and grateful for what they have been given.

Some of the sages I have met found their careers took this route. These have included educators, therapists, medical consultants and people in other fields.

Success was a key factor. The work they did became well-known through books – written by themselves or others – radio, television or other media.

Such an approach can have both upsides and downside. One singer I worked with expressed this in the following way.

"I spent five years living with friends when I was writing songs and also doing grunt work in the music industry. Then two things happened.

"First, one of my songs was recorded by a top artist and sold millions. Second, I recorded a song and it also became a huge hit. It took a while for the money to come in, but then I was a multi-millionaire.

"This was great for a while. I did the usual things, buying a house for my parents, getting cars and being the centre of attention at musical events. But then things went downhill.

"I did not get into drugs or things like that, but I no longer felt a sense of purpose. My aim had been to make hit records. Whilst I could still do that, I wanted to do something more.

"Even though I seem outgoing on stage, I actually go into role. I am really an introvert and find it difficult with people expecting me to live up to my image.

"Eventually I found a new mission, donating a percentage of my new record sales to feeding the homeless in my home city. This also spurs me to write new songs.

"I now spend a lot of time writing and recording songs in my studio. I am almost back to what I was doing ten years ago, but now I have the money to do it in my own way."

Some individuals have an ambivalent feeling towards doing fulfilling work and gaining fame. It calls for managing both the pluses and minuses.

The pluses may include the following. The work may become well-known, reach many people, provide more work opportunities and lead to more funding.

The minuses may include the following. The person may find themselves in the limelight - which was not always a comfortable position – and the work may sometimes be unfairly criticised by others.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the fulfilling approach. How can you do this in your own way? How can you build on the pluses and manage any minuses?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Fulfilling Approach

The specific things I can do to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The potential pluses and minuses of follow this approach may be:

*

*

*

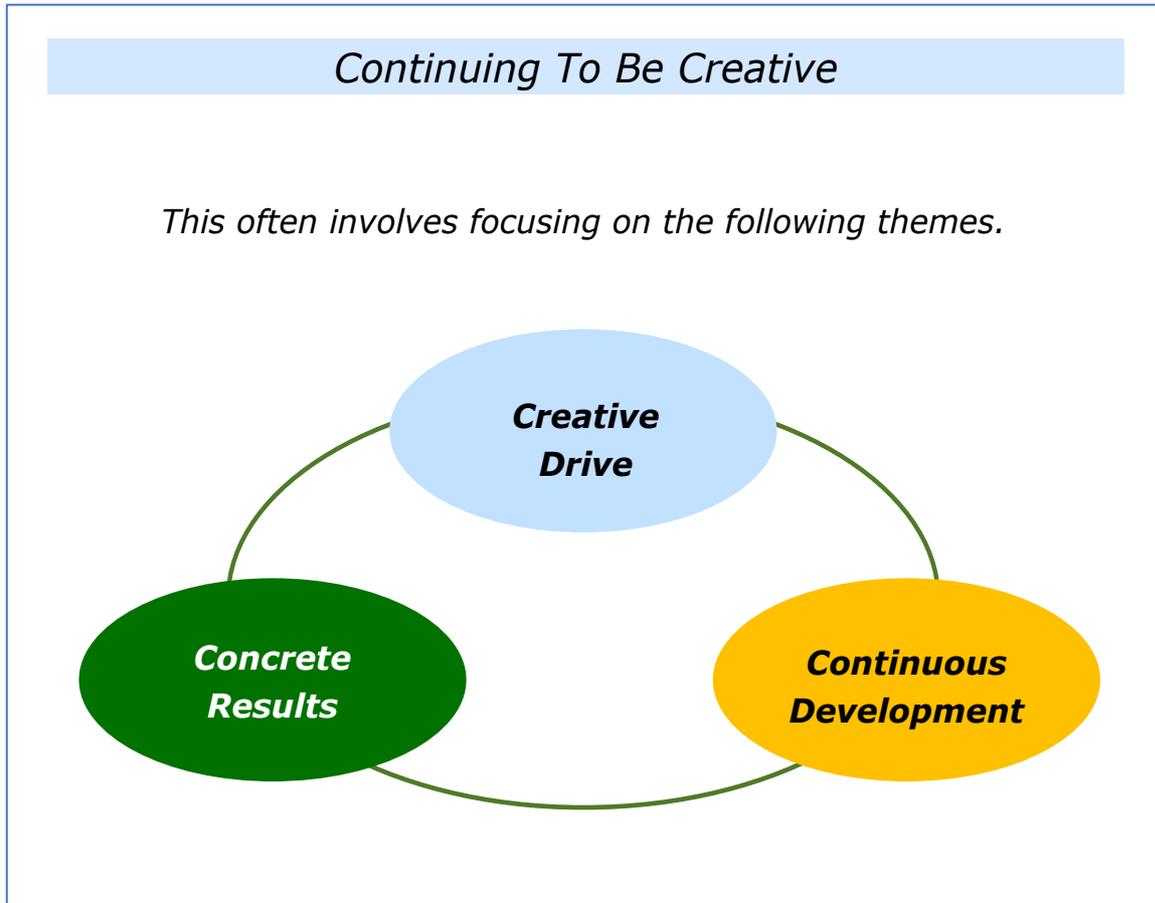

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and manage the minuses are:

*

*

*

The Continuing To Be Creative Approach

How can you continue to be creative? One approach is to pursue the creative drive you love to follow. You may love to encourage people, cook, nurture your garden, write stories or do other activities.

Some people seem are very creative in their Second Spring. Maggie Kuhn, for example, created the Gray Panther. The National Women's Hall Of Fame describe her work in the following way.

In 1970, forced to retire from her career with the Presbyterian Church at age 65, Kuhn and a group of her friends in similar circumstances organized and founded an organization which became the Gray Panthers.

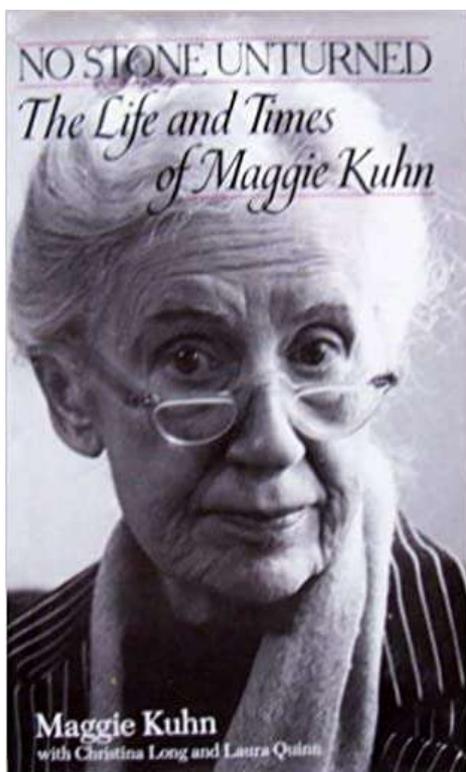

The organization was created to work on issues of concern to the elderly, such as pension rights and age discrimination, but also to concern itself with larger public issues, such as the Vietnam War and other social concerns.

Kuhn's candor, charisma and lively approach to the needs and problems of the old drew major media attention, and the group was successfully launched, coming to represent in the public mind that power and energy that the elderly can represent.

She is considered by many to have started nothing less than a contemporary cultural revolution, both in terms of redefining the meaning of age and through her insistence on 'young and old together.'

Maggie continued to be outspoken. some of her best-known quotes.

I'm an old woman. I have gray hair, many wrinkles, and arthritis in both hands.

And I celebrate my freedom from bureaucratic restraints that once held me.

Stand before the people you fear and speak your mind - even if your voice shakes.

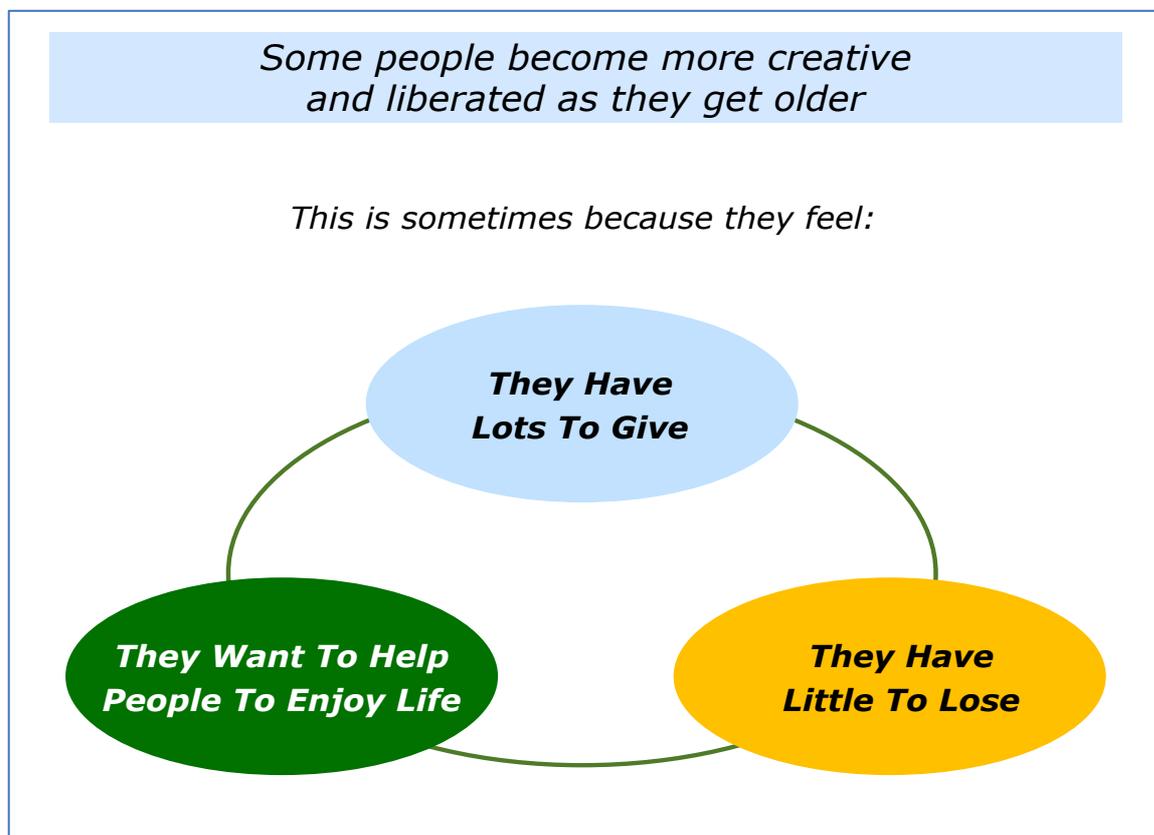

There must be a goal at every stage of life! There must be a goal!

"Old age is not a disease - it is strength and survivorship, triumph over all kinds of vicissitudes and disappointments, trials and illnesses.

"What I dream of and yearn for is that the Gray Panthers will continue to be on the cutting edge of social change, and that the young and old together will continue to work for a just, humane and peaceful world.

"What I want on my tombstone: 'Here lies Maggie Kuhn under the only stone she left unturned.'"

Some people seem to become more liberated as they get older. They feel they have a lot to give and little to lose. They also want to pass on knowledge and help people to enjoy life.

Looking ahead, what is the creative drive you want to follow? How can you continue to develop this drive? How do you want to deliver concrete results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Continuing To Be Creative In The Future

The creative drive I want to follow in the future is:

*

The specific things I want to do to follow and develop this creative drive are:

*

*

*

The specific concrete results I would like to deliver when following this creative drive are:

*

*

*

The Refirement Rather Than Retirement Approach

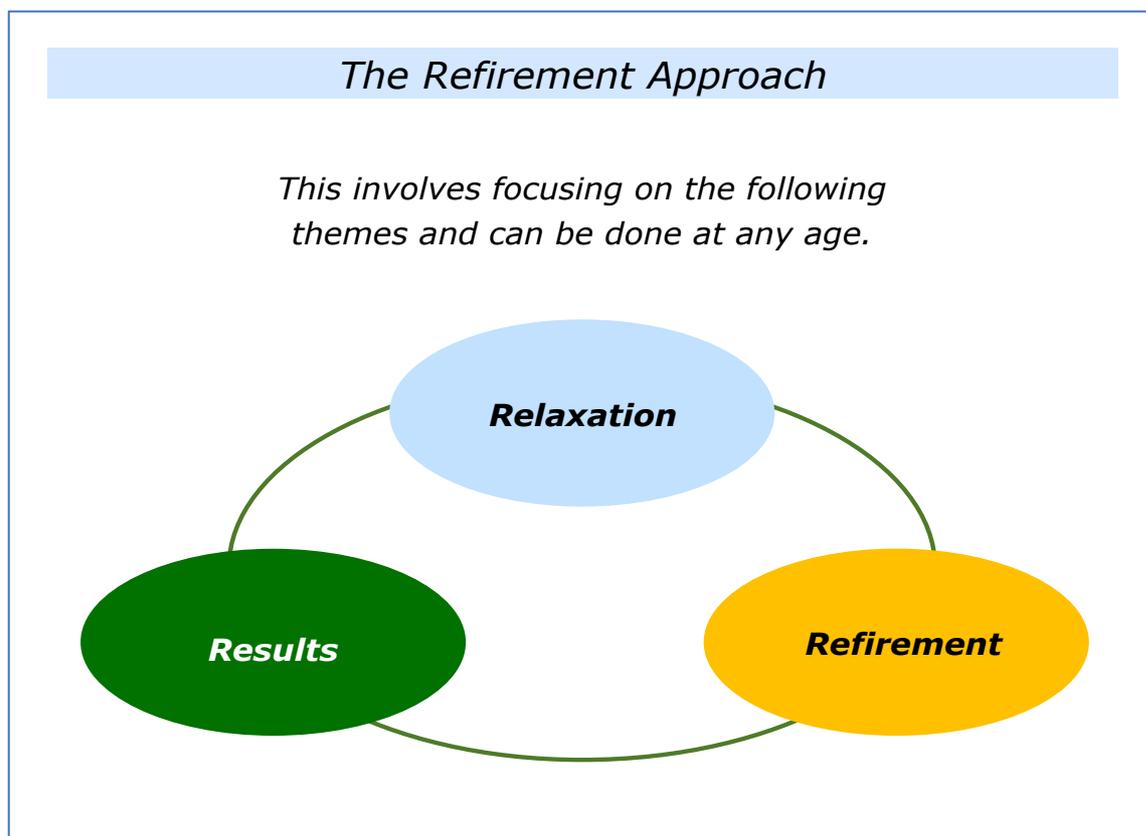

This is an approach that can be used by people at any age. It has gained popularity by focusing on seniors, but I have seen it applied by people at other stages of their lives. Here are some examples.

The person who has just retired and wants to maintain a sense of purpose in their life.

The person who has reached a stage in their career where they feel disillusioned by working in certain kinds of organisations.

The person who feels tired, has given their all and is unsure about how they can shape their future life.

Different people refire their lives in different ways. One approach is for them to focus on the following themes.

Relaxation

A person who has been going at full pelt may find it hard to relax. They may have been doing a regular commute and long hours spent working for an institution. Sometimes they may even need to give themselves permission to rest and reflect.

One person I worked with was released by his company one December and given enough money to last a year. Despite having a good financial runway, he found it hard to slow down. He said:

"For the past thirty years I have always had a sales target to it. This will be the first Christmas when I have not been doing the sales plan for the year."

People like to feel in control. This calls for being clear on their plan and then translating it into action. Those who have been going helter-skelter, however, may confuse activity with results.

A person may need to tackle some things urgently, of course, particularly if they must manage immediate challenges. At a certain point, however, it can be useful for them slow down, breathe deeply and recentre. They can then focus on their longer-term goals.

Refirement

Different people choose different ways to revitalise themselves. One person may potter around and let their mind drift. This can lead to them exploring random thoughts and, paradoxically, discovering an idea that leads to them developing a new sense of purpose.

Another person may do things that give them positive energy. They may find these get their creative juices going and result in them choosing to pursue a certain project.

Another person do something they feel passionately about and aim to achieve a specific goal. They may then apply their professional skills to perform superb work and achieve peak performance.

Results

Different people aim for different results. One person may want to regain their zest for life, develop a sense of gratitude and enjoy a sense of peace.

Another person may aim to do a project that helps people in their personal or professional lives. They may choose to follow a certain routine and keep going until they have achieved the desired results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to focus on the themes of relaxation, refirement and results? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Refirement In The Future

The specific situation when I may want to focus on relaxation, refirement and results may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to focus on these themes are:

*

*

*

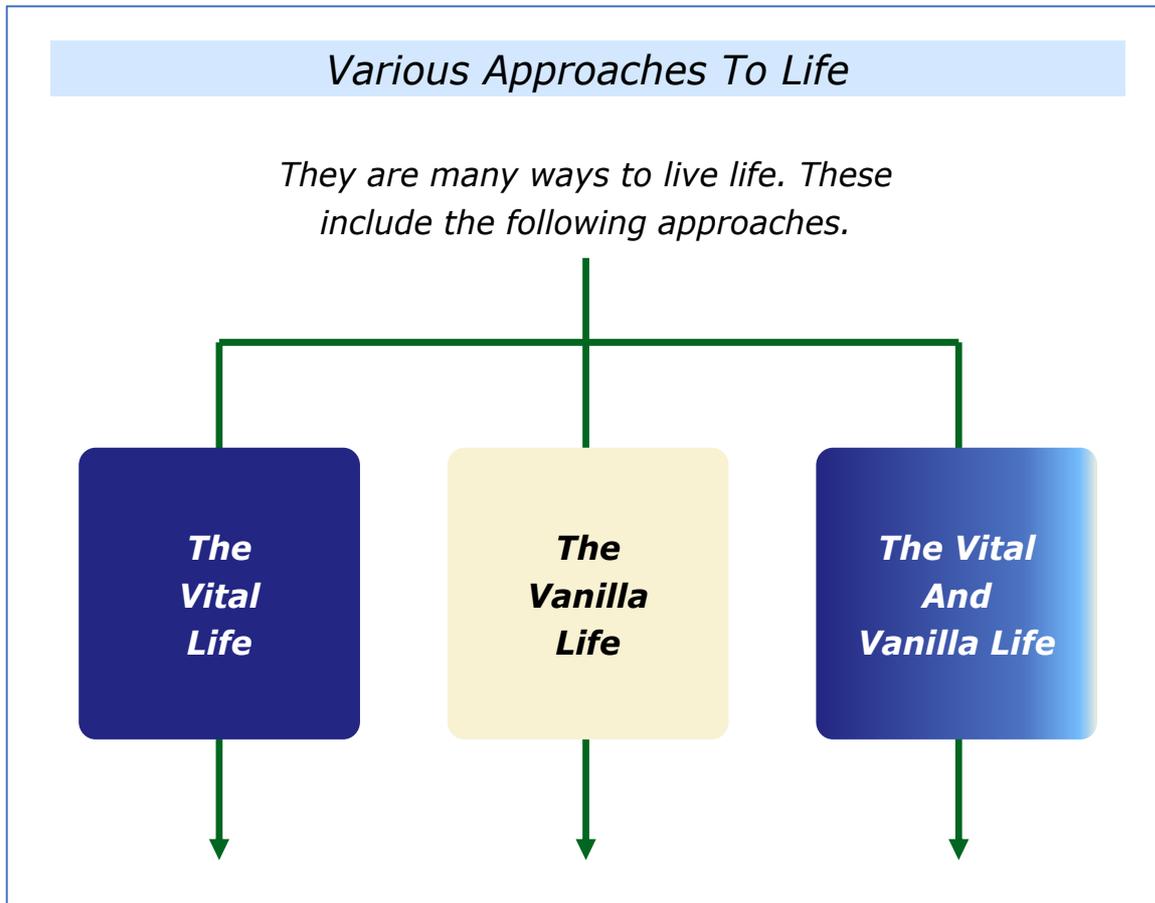

The specific things that may happen as a result may be:

*

*

*

The Vital Life Rather Than The Vanilla Life Approach

There are many ways to live life. Let's explore some of these approaches.

The Vital Life

Some people love the vital life. They love to do things where they feel alive and creative. It is not possible to do this all the time, but it is an approach they try to follow. What is the vital life for you? Here are some things that people mention when exploring this theme.

The vital life for me is:

Helping other people ... Being with my family ... Being curious and learning ... Being creative ... Listening to music ... Working in my garden ... Getting enough sleep ... Doing satisfying work.

Some people find the vital life involves doing simple things each day. They enjoy caring for others, cooking food, being with their dogs, walking in their garden or doing other activities.

Some people find the vital life involves doing special things. They feel alive when travelling, mountain biking, performing on stage, playing sports or doing other exciting activities.

The Vanilla Life

Different people have different versions of this life. Sometimes living the vanilla life can be beneficial. Sometimes it can be boring or disheartening.

Some people like to follow a predictable pattern and then, when appropriate, do something special. Some people who like excitement, however, can find such a life to be debilitating.

What is the vanilla life for you? Here are some of the things that people mention when exploring this theme. (These were described before the pandemic.)

The vanilla life for me is:

Sitting in boring meetings ... Staying in soulless hotels ... Eating tasteless hotel food ... Spending more than three nights a week away from home ... Listening to negative people ... Flying on business trips ... Spending a day without music.

Sometimes vanilla is just fine. We all need stability and predictability in our lives. This call for getting the right blend between the vital life and the vanilla life.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Vital Life

The specific things I can do to continue to live the vital life are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to, when appropriate, add aspects of the vanilla life are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Paradise Approach

There are several definitions for the word paradise. The one we are going to focus on here is the following.

Paradise - a state of happiness or bliss

People love to create their own versions of paradise. They may aim to do this by creating a garden, room, book, relationship, community, work environment or another place.

Different people also have different time frames regarding paradise. These include the following.

Some see it as a place they experienced in the past – such having a wonderful childhood.

Some see it as the things they are able to do and experience in the present – such as the activities that give them positive energy.

Some see it as a place they aim to reach in the future – such as a promised land or a specific picture of success.

This section explores the second approach. Looking at the present, what are the activities when you experience a feeling of bliss? When do you get positive energy or a feeling of paradise?

Different people give different answers when exploring this theme. Here are some they mention.

Paradise for me is being able:

To feel in charge of my day ... To spend time with our children ... To encourage people ... To do satisfying work ... To design beautiful things ... To do things I believe in ... To pass on knowledge to people.

There are many views on how to appreciate life and help others. Sometimes such ideas are misunderstood or become cliches.

Joseph Campbell shared such an idea that has helped many people but also been misunderstood by others. He was often approached by individuals who wanted to feel more alive. He sometimes suggested that aim to:

Follow Your Bliss

Here is an excerpt from the Joseph Campbell Foundation website that explains this idea.

Joseph Campbell was a life-long student and teacher of the human spirit and mythology - not just the mythology of cultures long dead, but of living myth, as it made itself known in the work of modern artists and philosophers - individuals who searched within themselves and their societies to identify the need about which they were passionate.

He called this burning need that they sought to fulfill their bliss.

When Campbell died, just months after recording the interviews with Bill Moyers that were to become the PBS series The Power of Myth, he had no idea how these interviews, and, in particular, this idea of following one's bliss would resonate with the public.

Within months of airing on PBS in the United States, the phrase "Follow Your Bliss" had become a catchphrase.

In 1990, the Joseph Campbell Foundation was created by Campbell's colleagues and his widow, choreographer Jean Erdman.

Its mission was (and is) to keep Campbell's work moving forward, helping people learn about myth, and its relationship to religion, art and psychology, and trying to help them follow their bliss.

Yet it is important to note that following one's bliss, as Campbell saw it, isn't merely a matter of doing whatever you like, and certainly not doing simply as you are told.

It is a matter of identifying that pursuit which you are truly passionate about and attempting to give yourself absolutely to it.

In so doing, you will find your fullest potential and serve your community to the greatest possible extent. Joseph explained this in the following way.

"If you follow your bliss, you put yourself on a kind of track that has been there all the while, waiting for you, and the life that you ought to be living is the one you are living.

"Wherever you are - if you are following your bliss, you are enjoying that refreshment, that life within you, all the time."

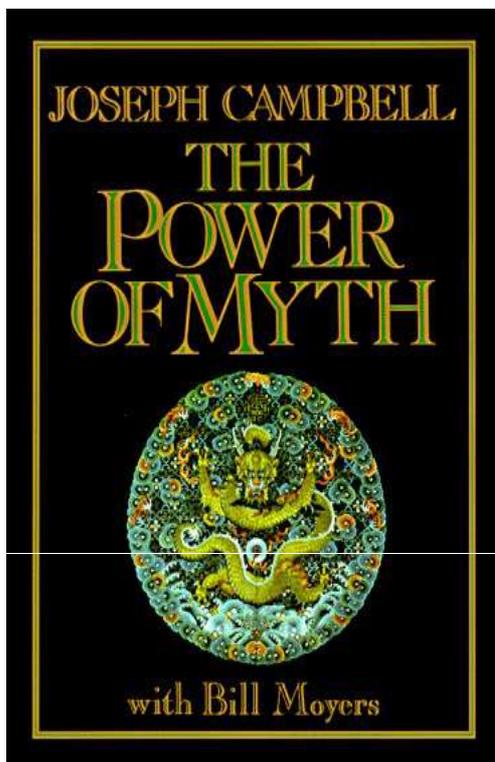

Maria Popova adds to this theme on her website The Marginalian. Here are excerpts from her piece on the topic.

How To Find Your Bliss: Joseph Campbell On What It Takes To Have A Fulfilling Life

Discerning one's bliss, Campbell argues, requires what he calls 'sacred space' - a space for uninterrupted reflection and unrushed creative work.

Far from a mystical idea, this is something that many artists and writers have put into practice by way of their peculiar work rituals as well as something cognitive science has illuminated in exploring the psychology of the perfect daily routine.

But Campbell sees past the practical rituals of creativity and into the deeper psychic and spiritual drivers - that profound need for a 'bliss station' into which to root ourselves.

"Sacred space is an absolute necessity for anybody today.

"This is a place where you can simply experience and bring forth what you are and what you might be. This is the place of creative incubation.

"At first you may find that nothing happens there. But if you have a sacred place and use it, something eventually will happen."

Looking back on how he arrived at this notion of finding one's bliss, Campbell touches on the crucial difference between religious faith and secular spirituality:

"The religious people tell us we really won't experience bliss until we die and go to heaven. But I believe in having as much as you can of this experience while you are still alive.

"There's something inside you that knows when you're in the center, that knows when you're on the beam or off the beam.

"And if you get off the beam to earn money, you've lost your life. And if you stay in the center and don't get any money, you still have your bliss."

Some people interpreted Campbell's words as giving them permission to do whatever they wanted, whatever the cost. But another view of his message was:

Follow your bliss in a way that helps people and the planet.

Let's return to your own life and a question we explored earlier. Looking at your present life, what are the activities where you may experience a sense of paradise?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to build on the sentence:

Paradise for me is when I am able to ...

How can you continue and maybe even add to these things in future? What may happen as a result of taking these steps? What may be the pluses and minuses – for you and for other people? How can you build on the pluses and minimise any minuses? Here is the exercise.

The Paradise Approach

Paradise for me is when I am able:

*

*

*

The specific steps I can take to continue and maybe add to these things are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Play, Principle And Positive Results Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. This is an approach that, when appropriate, some people follow in certain situations but not in others.

Some people then focus on their equivalent of play. They follow their principles, translate these into specific projects and achieve positive results.

Such people often have a sense of joy in their work. They play to their strengths, find solutions to challenges and perform superb work. They follow the principle that, in some cases:

There is nothing more serious than play.

Some people follow this approach early in their careers. They may enjoy encouraging people, performing certain kinds of work, leading teams or doing other things. They focus on the specific activities where they demonstrate the following qualities:

They find the activity fascinating – they keep returning to it time and again;

They have feeling for the activity – they are good at it;

They have a track record of finishing – they are good at finishing things when doing this activity.

Some people return to this approach later in their careers. They do satisfying work that delivers success. They go to work with a spring in their step after maybe spending years feeling stodgy or looking stern.

Some innovative organisations follow this approach. They create new products and organisations by working with customers in a process they call serious play. This is a topic we will explore later in this piece.

Imagine you want to follow some elements of this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

Play

People often feel positive when they are doing things where they enjoy a sense of play. They may be pursuing their hobbies, painting, playing music, dancing, rebuilding cars or doing other activities.

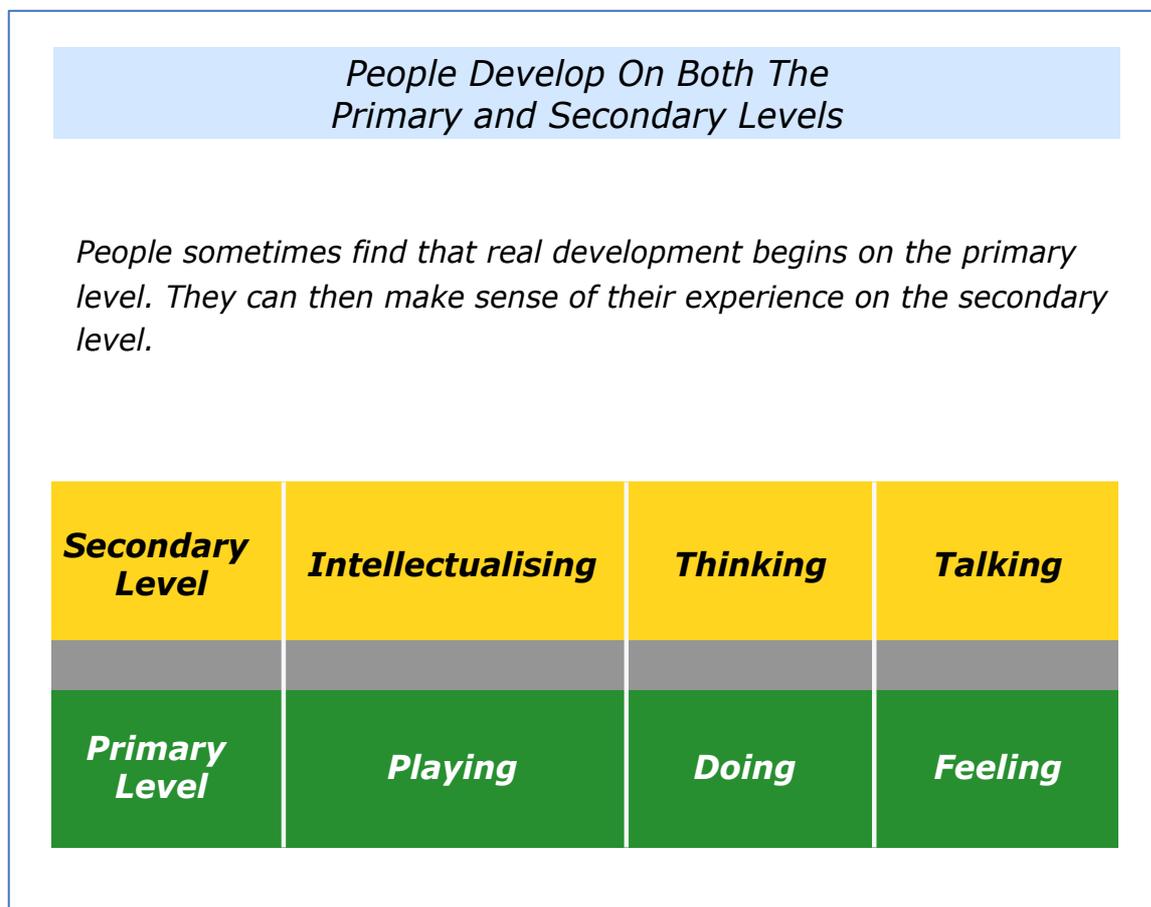

Play powers our imagination and help us to move forwards. Creative people retain this quality throughout their lives. As George Bernard Shaw wrote:

"We don't stop playing because we grow old; we grow old because we stop playing."

Barbara Brannen encourages people to relearn to play in her book The Gift Of Play. She describes the importance of what she calls heart play. These are the activities that make our heart sing.

Play can help us to experience joy, wonderment and curiosity. They enable us to feel relaxed and able to use our imagination. This can help to nourish our souls and shape a positive future.

Play can sometimes help us to develop on both a primary level and a secondary level. Let's explore this approach.

The Primary Level

The primary level is that of playing, doing and feeling. When we are children we often learn on the primary level. Creative people often retain this sense of play. They frequently do so by going through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement.

Some of our successful and self-defeating patterns are set on the primary level. Such patterns can affect the way we behave. We revert back to them time and again.

Living on the primary level can be exciting. We learn with our heart and our hands, but it is also vital to make sense of experience. So it is important learn with our head.

The Secondary Level

This is the level of intellectualising, thinking and talking. Looking for patterns, we begin to build models. Testing these in reality, we see what works and what can be improved. Developing models enables us to feel more in control of our lives.

So far, so good. But some people hit a problem. They may spend too much of their lives on the secondary level.

Instead of doing, they think about doing. Instead of playing - taking initiatives - they replace it with intellectualising. Instead of feeling, they talk about feelings.

Between the two levels they then put a series of blocks. Some people can find they get cut off from their feelings.

Real growth, however, often involves doing things on the primary level. People who retake control of their lives after a setback, for example, often do so by acting on this level.

They start exercising rather than just talk about exercising. They do activities in which they feel creative rather than sit complaining.

Sometimes it can be useful to do something on a primary level and then clarify the learning on a secondary level. This can be more effective than simply intellectualising about a topic. It can also sometimes led to creative breakthroughs.

This is an approach that I sometimes used on creativity workshops. The aims were to help people to recapture the joy of exploring, learning and developing. Sometimes this also led to the next theme.

Principles

Great workers sometimes translate their sense of play into doing a specific project. They may then aim to following certain principles when doing the work.

Some people start by clarifying their picture of success. They then aim: a) to be professional; b) to find solutions to problems; c) to deliver peak performances.

Some individuals may also find it liberating to rekindle such feelings of joy. They may can have got to the stage where they forgot why they began to pursue a passion, play a sport or go into a certain profession. They may have pursued a particular activity because:

It felt like play ... It gave them a sense of joy and pleasure ... It gave them positive energy.

During the past fifty years I have worked with many people who wanted to recapture that feeling. At the same time, they wanted to perform at their best. We therefore focused on the practical steps they could take:

To recapture a sense of play ... To follow their principles ... To achieve peak performance.

This is an approach that was followed when working with a senior leader in a famous high tech company. They expressed their situation in the following way.

"I went into this business because I loved helping people to use technology to simplify their lives and do superb work. I particularly liked working with entrepreneurs who were building pioneering businesses.

"The time I enjoyed best was leading a part of company that was devoted to helping such leaders. This helped me to stay at the leading edge of businesses and help them succeed. It also ensured I kept up with thought leadership.

"During the past five years I have been a member of the C-Suite in the European arm of our company. The pay is great but, paradoxically, I seem to have less freedom than I did before.

"Our C-Suite seems to act as a go-between that is asked to implement the orders from our headquarters. This can be frustrating and time-consuming.

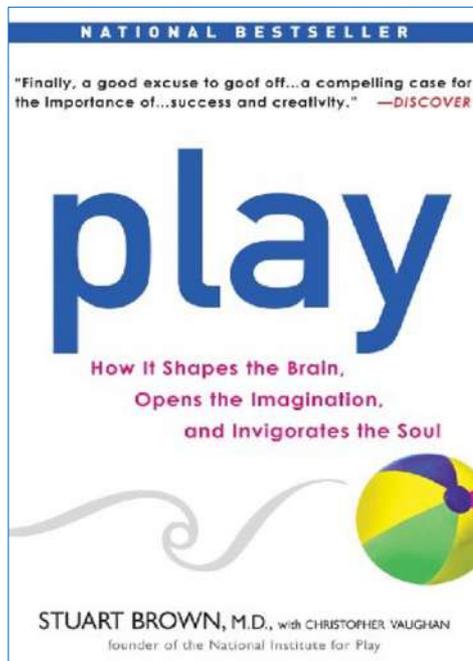

"We seem to be acting as a supplier to our company and have only limited freedom to shape things on our own patch. Bearing this in mind, I am thinking of doing several things.

"First, to return to my previous role leading the department that focuses on helping pioneering businesses. Second, to mentor budding entrepreneurs in our local incubator. Third, to refocus on my passion for song writing and playing music."

The senior leader took these steps. This resulted in them feeling happier, healthier and more alive. Some of their colleagues said they wished they had the courage to do the same but they did not want to give up their perks.

Positive Results

Many people recognise the link between play, creativity and getting positive results. Stuart Brown and Christopher Vaughan underlined this point in their book Play: How it shapes the brain, opens the imagination and invigorates the soul. They express this in the following way.

Serious play is not an oxymoron. It is the essence of innovation.

The opposite of play is not work. It is depression.

Play helps to revitalise our soul. It helps us to explore, discover new things and develop.

Here are some steps the authors recommend to keep this flame alive and sometimes get involved in deep play.

Be active

Move. This is one of the keys to play. Translate this to your work by going for a walk, moving around, holding seminars in places that delight the senses. You will find that more ideas emerge.

Nourish your mode of play and be with people who nourish it, too

Find the play that feeds your soul. Build an environment where you do stimulating work and keep developing. Keep making it a priority to stay play nourished.

Fun is your North Star, but you don't always have to head North

The aim is to have fun but you may find there will be many deviations along the way. It is good to pursue those paths because that is where play can take you. Sometimes you are discovering things that you did not know existed.

Michael Schrage shows the importance of play in the work done at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology's Media Lab. This is described in his book Serious Play: How the world's best companies simulate to innovate.

He and his colleagues often worked with companies on building prototypes. This involved people focusing on specific challenges and playing with ideas. Such an approach sometimes leads to breakthroughs and innovations.

Michael describes the process in the preface to his book. He explains this in the following way.

One constant is the role of prototypes and play.

The Lab's unofficial credo Demo or Die! captures the prevailing belief that it is not enough to have brilliant ideas; you have to be able to demonstrate them.

You have to get people to want to play with them.

Great organisations often began by people pursuing their passion, translating it into serious play and then becoming profitable. As they grow middle-aged, however, some just become serious and forget what made them great. They become grim and overweight.

They can revisit their passion by doing some serious play – probably through prototyping - and helping their customers to succeed. This can rejuvenate their people and their business.

Scott Eberle is an intellectual historian of play and a Vice President at the Strong National Museum of Play in Rochester, New York. He believes it is vital to encourage people of all ages to play. He describes this in the following way.

Once we were all experts at play; as children it was our preoccupation and our main mode of learning. Play was the way we built our muscles, and it was through play that we knitted our friendships.

Through play we learned to navigate the social world. We learned the rules. And play helped us imagine our future. Even if we did not grow up to be Jedi knights, or beautiful princesses we learned to envision adult power and responsibility.

But imaginative play and rough and tumble play, because they are the work of children, tend to slip beneath our notice as adults.

Play can help us to experience joy, wonderment and curiosity. It enables us to feel relaxed and able to use our imagination. This can help to nourish our souls and shape a positive future.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to maintain a sense of play, follow your passions and achieve positive results. Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach.

How could you do this in your own way? How could you focus on a specific activity? How could you translate this into a specific project? How could you then do your best to achieve positive results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Play, Principles And Positive Results Approach

The specific activity where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow elements of this approach are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Sense Of Wonder Approach

A Sense Of Wonder

Sometimes a person experiences a sense of wonder. These moments can lead to them choosing to do certain things in life. It can therefore be useful to explore the following themes.

- When do you experience a sense of wonder?

- What do you learn or relearn during those moments of a sense of wonder?

- How can you pass on what you learn in those moments of a sense of wonder?

During the early 1970s I visited some of the sages well-known for their work in helping young people. These included people such as George Lyward, David Wills and Henry Pluckrose. During the sessions we explored the following themes.

How can we help young people to experience a sense of wonder? How can we help them to clarify what they learn during such times? How can we help them to apply these lessons in their future lives?

Some people retain the ability to enjoy a sense of wonder. Some seem to regain it as they get older. Such people appreciate life and aim to enjoy each day.

There are many views about what constitutes wonder. Neel Burton provides some excellent insights in an essay he wrote for his website and Psychology Today. Here are excerpts from the piece.

The Psychology and Philosophy of Wonder

Wonder is the feeling of a philosopher, and philosophy beings in wonder. Plato

Wonder is a complex emotion involving elements of surprise, curiosity, contemplation, and joy.

It is perhaps best defined as a heightened state of consciousness and emotion brought about by something singularly beautiful, rare, or unexpected - that is, by a marvel.

Aquinas speaks of philosophers and poets as one because both are moved by marvels, with the purpose of poetry being, broadly, to record and in some sense recreate marvels, to inspire wonder.

Wonder is most similar to awe. But awe is more explicitly directed at something that is much greater or stronger than ourselves. Wonder involves important elements of surprise and curiosity, both of which are forms of interest.

Wonder can be excited by grand vistas, natural phenomena, human intellectual and physical achievement, and extraordinary facts and figures, among others.

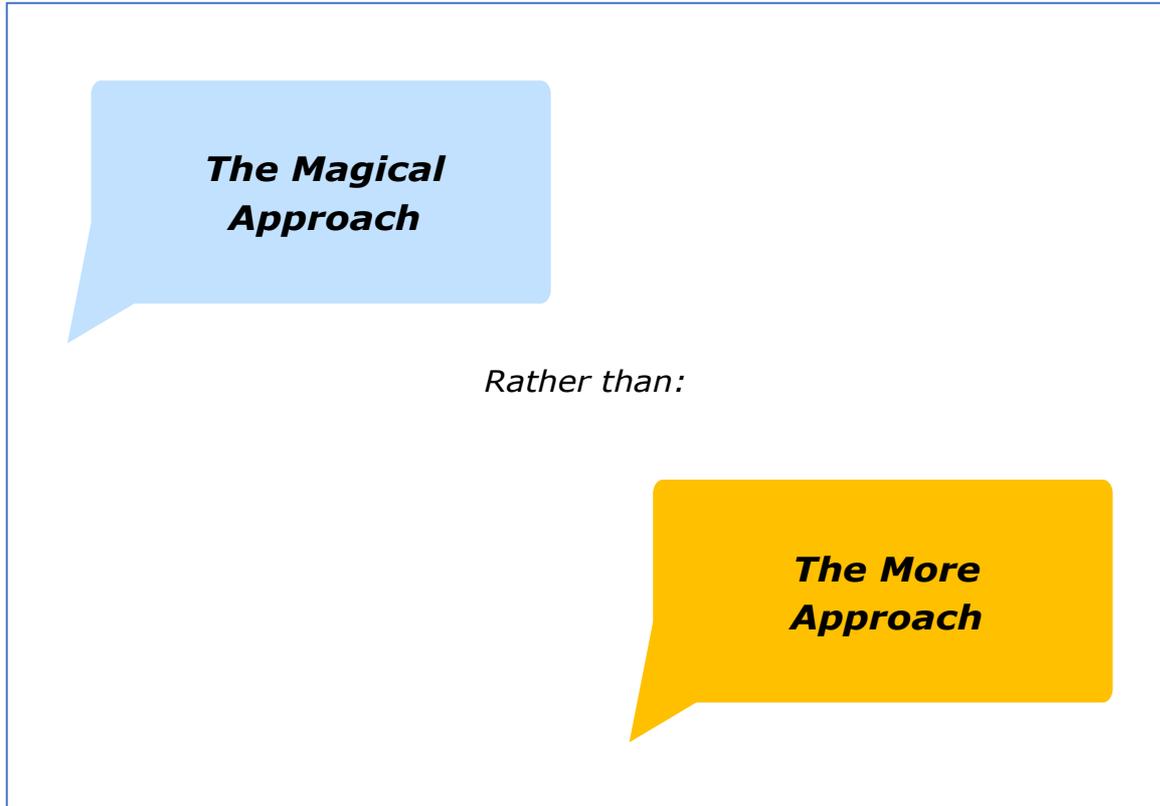

By drawing us out of ourselves, wonder reconnects us with something much greater than our daily grind. It is the ultimate homecoming, returning us to the world that we came from and were in danger of taking for granted.

Neel describes the value of retaining a sense of wonder and the capacity to marvel throughout our lives. Some people retain this ability or regain it at certain points of life. This can lead to continuing to seeing life as magical.

Some individuals get to a point where they take stock. They may then ask themselves the following questions.

"What do I want to do with the rest of my life? Why do I want to do these things? How can I use my life experience to help other people? How can I pass on a positive legacy?"

They take the magical approach rather than the more approach. They forgo the addiction to getting more of everything.

They enjoy life and want to encourage both present and future generations. They believe it important to care for people and the planet. They encourage people to appreciate and protect what can be a magical life.

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a time when you experienced a sense of wonder? What did you learn or relearn from the experience? How have you tried – or continue to try – to follow some of those lessons in your life?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

A Sense Of Wonder

The specific time in my life when I experienced a sense of wonder was:

*

The specific things I learned or relearned from the experience were:

*

*

*

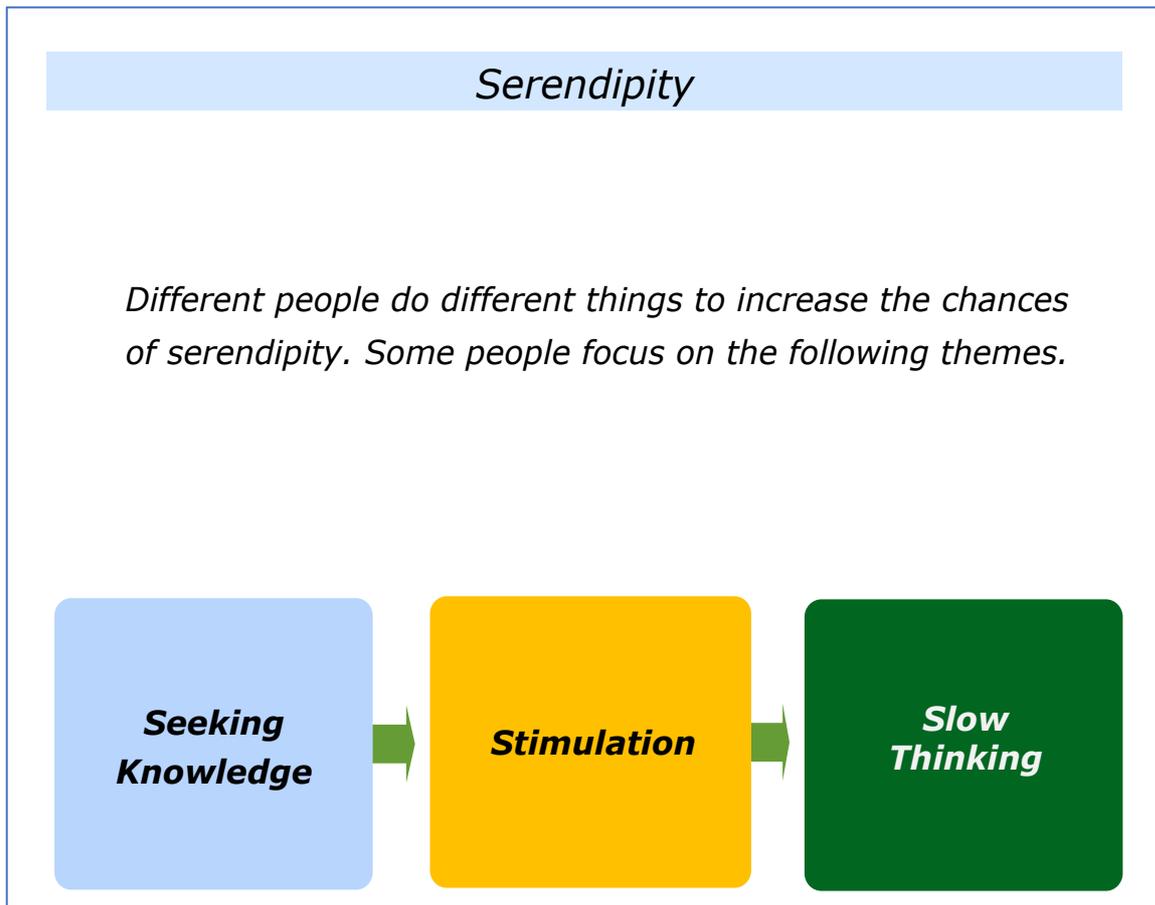

The specific things I have tried – or continue to try - to follow some of those lessons in my life are:

*

*

*

The Serendipity Approach

The definitions for serendipity include making desirable discoveries by accident or finding interesting or valuable things by chance.

There are many examples of serendipity. These describe a chance meeting, words remembered from a conversation, a flash of inspiration, a failed experiment or other event.

Some people aim to create the Holy Grail of serendipity but it can remain elusive. There are some things that people can do, however, to increase the chances of creating such moments.

Seeking Knowledge

This involves continuing to seek knowledge. It is to adopt a beginner's mind, be curious and explore various fields. Sometimes serendipity happens when you make connections and see a possible way forwards.

Stimulation

This involves doing things you find stimulating. These include playing, exercising, listening to music, problem solving or doing things that give you positive energy. These can activate your senses and lead to making discoveries.

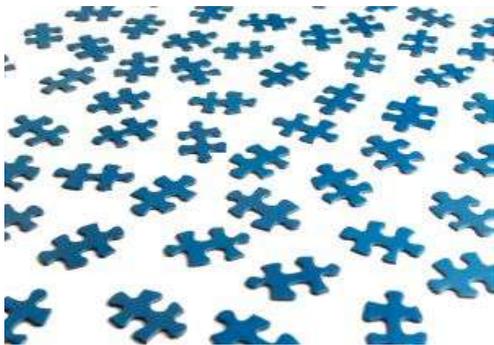

Slow Thinking

This involves taking time to slow down. Carl Honoré explained that fast thinking often generates the pieces of the jigsaw. Sometimes slow thinking may be needed to make sense of the whole picture.

Taking these steps is no guarantee of creating breakthroughs, but they can increase the chances of serendipity. The next step is to translate the insight into action.

Fast Thinking

is sometimes needed to generate the pieces of the jigsaw

Slow Thinking

is sometimes needed to make sense of the whole picture

The Good Fortune Approach

Good Fortune

Some people take the following approach with their good fortune.

- They are grateful for their good fortune;
- They make good use of their good fortune;
- They are generous with their good fortune.

Different people are born into different circumstances and have different experiences in life. Some recognise they may be fortunate to have certain opportunities. They may then aim to be generous with their good fortune.

Warren Buffet, the financial sage, says he was fortunate in the ovarian lottery. He was born into a society where it was an advantage to be white, male and have access to education. He explained this in the following way.

I am lucky. I had the advantage of a home where people talked about interesting things. I had intelligent parents and went to decent schools. I don't think I could have been raised by a better pair of parents.

That was enormously important. I didn't get money from my parents and I really didn't want it. But I was born at the right time and place. I won the ovarian lottery.

Warren also says he was lucky to be near-sighted, bookish and had a brain that was wired in a certain way. These gifts helped him to do well in school and in a financial market that rewarded his expertise.

He believed that other people may have done more worthy work but they may not have been well rewarded financially. Whilst Warren had made use of his talents, he felt lucky. He therefore made this pledge.

More than 99% of my wealth will go to philanthropy during my lifetime or at death. Measured by dollars, this commitment is large. In a comparative sense, though, many individuals give more to others every day.

Different people may use their good fortune in different ways. Let's explore how they may take these steps.

They Are Grateful For Their Good Fortune

Some financially rich people appreciate the advantages they have been given. They may have been born into a relatively fair society, had supportive parents and access to good health care. Whilst they have applied themselves, they also have a sense of gratitude.

Some other people who are born into wealth may not appreciate the start they were given. Instead of being grateful, they may be grumpy or resentful. Despite their riches, they may not seem happy.

Looking at your own life, what are the things that you are grateful for having been given? You may have had loving parents, a happy childhood and lived in different cultures.

You may also have been given certain abilities. Perhaps you experienced setbacks but, through your fighting spirit, you turned these into opportunities.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the good fortune you have had in your life. Try completing the following sentence.

Gratitude

The good fortune I have had in my life has been:

*

*

*

*

*

They Make Good Use Of Their Good Fortune

Some people make good use of their good fortune. They build on what they have rather than worry about what they don't have. They may then use these assets to help other people or to do superb work.

Different people do this in different ways. Here are some ways that people may use their life-experiences, strengths or knowledge.

A person who found school challenging may help dyslexic children to build on their strengths ... A recovering addict may help others to stay clean ... An inventor may create products that help people to improve the quality of their lives.

A footballer may use their fame to raise money for people who are hungry or homeless ... A journalist may use their storytelling skills to describe practical solutions to pressing problems across the world ... A singer-songwriter may use their talents to produce songs that inspire people.

Let's return to your life and work. How can you continue to make good use of your good fortune? How can you use the experiences and abilities you have been given? How can you help other people to succeed?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

Good Use

The specific things I can do to make good use of the good fortune I have been given are:

*

*

*

They Are Generous With Their Good Fortune

Different people are generous in different ways. Sometimes this depends on what they have been given. They may have had financial, emotional or other kinds of good fortune.

Some people are generous with their money. They may give financial support to good causes, budding entrepreneurs or fund other ways to build a fairer world.

Some people are generous with their spirit. Given encouragement in their own lives, they love to help people. They may do this as parents, educators, mentors or in other roles.

Some people are generous with their knowledge. They love to pass on ideas, models and practical tools. Grateful for what they have been given, they see this as natural. They want to help people to succeed.

Many people recognise that, whilst they worked hard, they have also enjoyed good fortune in their lives. Building on these assets, they want to encourage both present and future generations.

Let's return to your own life. How can you continue to be generous? How can you share your experiences? How can you build on your strengths? How can you do satisfying work and help other people to succeed?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Generosity

The specific things I can do to be generous with the good fortune I have been given are:

*

*

*

The Sense Of Peace Approach

Peace

The times when I experience a sense of peace are:

● When I ...

● When I ...

● When I ...

Many people want similar things in life. They want to be loved, happy and successful. Many also want to do their best in life and experience a sense of peace.

What are the things you do that sometimes lead to you having a sense of peace? Here are some answers that people give when exploring this theme.

Peace. The times in my life when I experience a sense of peace are:

When I am giving to people ... When I am gardening ... When I am walking ... When I breathe deeply ... When I am doing something I believe in ... When I am passing on knowledge to people ... When I experience a sense of wonder ... When I feel I have done my best.

There are many views about what constitutes peace. Thich Nhat Hanh, the Zen philosopher, described how it can sometimes be about simple things. Here is what he wrote:

If in our daily life we can smile, if we can be peaceful and happy, not only we, but everyone will profit from it. This is the most basic kind of peace work.

Different people find peace in different ways. Some may experience it when they pause, follow their principles or get positive results. They may also do so when maintaining a sense of perspective. Let's explore these themes.

Pausing

Some people experience peace when they take time to pause. They may sleep, breathe deeply, go for a walk or do other things. Some aim to relax, recentre and refocus.

Looking at your own life, when do you pause? What do feel calm, collect your thoughts or simply let your mind wander? What may be the benefits of taking such an approach?

Principles

Some people feel at peace when they are following the principles they believe in. They may do this when encouraging people, pursuing a craft, tackling a challenge or working towards a specific goal.

Some people gain strength from following their principles. They may also find that following these enables them to flow, focus and find fulfilment. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I enjoy the journey as much as reaching the goal. Every day that I get the chance to follow the principles feels like a win. It is a joy to be able to do what I believe in and work towards a compelling goal."

What are the principles you want to follow in your life? How can you continue to follow these in your own way? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

Positive Results

Some people experience peace when they do big or small things that lead to positive results. They may make a nourishing meal, tend their garden or do other things that give pleasure to themselves or other people.

Sometimes a person may feel at peace when doing the activity. Sometimes they may experience this feeling as a result of doing satisfying work, creating something beautiful or achieving success.

Some people experience a sense of peace when they achieve positive results but also see things perspective. This can happen in different ways.

A person may see themselves a small in the great sweep of history and the vastness of the universe. This can create a feeling of awe, wonder and, sometimes, even a sense of peace.

A person may gain perspective by making sense of experience. They may gain knowledge that helps them to understand a situation and shape their future life. This can help them to feel more at peace.

Some people sees things in perspective by focusing on their lifetime picture of success. Here is one of the most common exercises on this theme.

They start by imagining they are looking back at the end of their life. What are the specific things they want to have done by then that will mean they are more likely to feel at peace?

Here are some of the themes that people mention when doing this exercise.

My Lifetime Picture Of Success

Looking back on my life, I want:

To have been kind ... To have raised a happy family ... To have been a good friend ... To have made the most of my talents ... To have done practical things to build a better world ... To have passed on a positive legacy.

The next step is for them to focus on doing something towards these goals each day. Taking these steps can sometimes lead to having a sense of peace.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, what are the things you can do to increase the likelihood of experiencing a sense of peace? How can you follow these steps in your own way? What may happen as a result?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

A Sense Of Peace

The specific things I can do in my life to increase the likelihood of experiencing a sense of peace are:

*

*

*

The specific steps I can take to translate these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

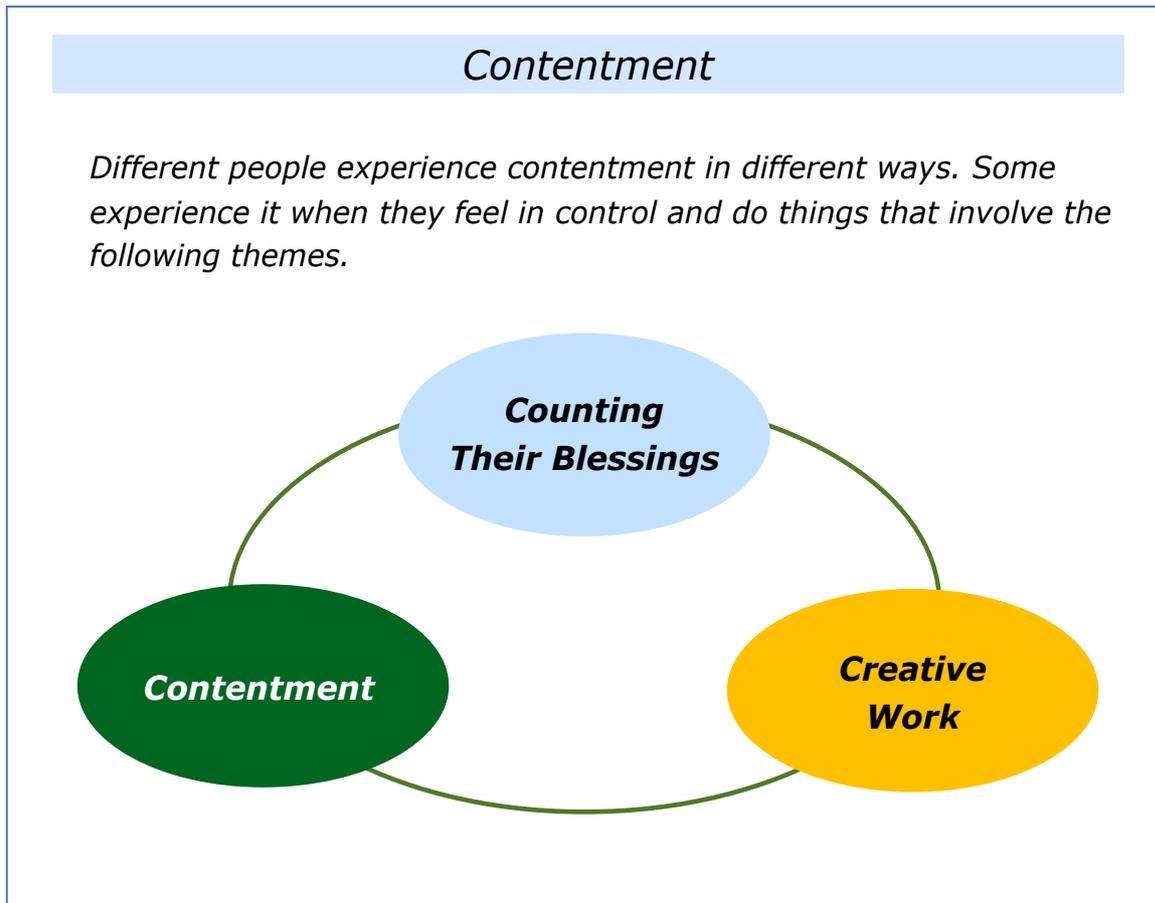

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Contentment Approach

When do you experience a feeling of contentment? Different people give different answers to this question. They may say some of the following things.

I experience a feeling of contentment:

When I am feeling grateful for what I have been given in life ... When I am walking ... When I am appreciating the simple things in life ... When I have completed a piece of creative work... When I am seeing things in perspective.

Contentment, like happiness, is sometimes the by-product of doing certain things. There are also several definitions of contentment. These include the following.

A feeling of quiet happiness ... A feeling of deep satisfaction ... A feeling of having done your best ... A peaceful ease of mind.

People are more likely to feel contentment when they feel in control of events. Or when, as the saying goes, they aim to control the controllables. They may then focus on the following themes.

Counting Their Blessings

Some people experience contentment as a by-product of counting their blessings. Different people do this in different ways. Some people mention the following things.

Counting My Blessings - The blessings I have had in my life have included the following:

To have been adopted by loving parents ... To have been given a happy childhood ... To have been encouraged to build on my abilities rather than things I was not good at.

To have learned lessons from several years working in a tough job ... To have been helped to find satisfying work ... To have had great mentors ... To have been fortunate to find an encouraging partner.

When do you sometimes count your blessings? What are the feelings you get when taking these steps? How do you then aim to build on these feelings?

Creative Work

Some people experience contentment as a by-product of completing a piece of creative work. They may do this by focusing on a specific activity that gives them positive energy.

They may be aiming to encourage a person, write an article, paint a picture, sing in a choir or do a creative project. They may be aiming to solve a problem, tackle a challenge, lead a team, shift a culture or do another activity.

Different people then follow their own approaches to achieving a feeling of contentment. Bearing in mind what they can control in the situation, some focus on the following steps.

Clarity

They clarify the real results they want to achieve and translate this into a clear picture of success.

Creativity

They follow their preferred way of working and find creative solutions on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Concrete Results

They keep working until they get the desired results and have a feeling of satisfaction from achieving the picture of success.

What are the kinds of creative work you do that sometimes lead to a feeling of contentment? What are the steps you take to do such work? How can you follow these in future? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Contentment

Imagine that you want to do things that increase the likelihood of experiencing contentment. One approach is to learn from your positive history. It is to do the following exercise.

Contentment

The specific times in the past when I have experienced a feeling of contentment have been:

* When I ...

* When I ...

* When I ...

The specific things I did right in some of these situations – the principles I followed – that led to a feeling of contentment were:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to follow some of these principles – plus maybe add other things – to maybe experience contentment in the future are:

*

*

*

Imagine that you may also want to learn from how other people get a feeling of contentment. Some people describe focusing on the following themes. Taking these steps can increase the likelihood of the experiencing contentment.

Positive Things – They Aim:

To be their positive self ... To do things that give them positive energy ... To spend time in their garden ... To go for a walk ... To cook nourishing food for people ... To help another person ... To experience the helper's high.

Positive People – They Aim:

To learn from positive people ... To clarify the principles that such people follow in their life and work ... To follow these principles in their own way ... To spend time with positive people ... To work with positive colleagues and customers.

Positive Contribution – They Aim:

To build on their strengths ... To do satisfying work ... To follow strategies that work ... To keep improving ... To achieve their picture of success ... To have a feeling of positive exhaustion ... To give positive things to people during their time on the planet.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to increase the chances of experiencing a feeling of contentment. This could be in your personal or professional life.

What can you do to increase the chances of feeling contentment? How can you translate some of these ideas into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Contentment

The specific things I can do to increase the chances of experiencing contentment are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate some of these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Encouragement, Education, Enablement And Enforcement Approach

Encouragers sometimes act as both the creators and custodians of a culture. They are caring but that does not mean they are a soft touch.

Such people often combine elements that, at first sight, may seem contradictory. They balance encouragement, education, enablement and enforcement.

Encouragers are like good gardeners. They like to create an environment that enables people to grow. They do this when acting as parents, teachers, coaches, leaders or in another role

They focus on encouragement first but, when appropriate, they are prepared to enforce certain agreed standards. They do this if people do not respect the environment or hurt other people.

Encouragers then act as custodians of a culture. Let's explore one model they follow when, for example, leading an organisation.

Explaining The Approach

Good leaders start by explaining the culture to people before they join. They outline the following themes.

They explain the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They explain the reasons for the principles and also the benefits – to all the various stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success.

They explain how people can follow the principles – together with examples to bring these to life – and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

The person is invited to reflect and decide if they want to opt into contributing to the culture. If so, they then make clear contracts about their best contribution towards achieving the goals.

Encouragers often pursue the following guidelines for creating and maintaining a positive environment.

Encouragement

They provide encouragement. They also aim to create a stimulating and supportive environment in which people can grow.

Education

They provide – in its widest sense – education. This includes providing knowledge, wisdom and models that people can use to achieve positive results.

Enablement

They make clear contracts with people about their contributions towards achieving the goals. They manage outcomes rather than tasks and enable people to deliver the goods.

Enforcement

They are custodians of the culture and protect the environment from those who want to spoil it for others. When acting as custodians, they meet with a person who is causing difficulties. They may then say something along the following lines.

"Let's go back to the original contract regarding the standards that are required to deliver success.

"The organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success is ... The reasons for the principles are ...

"Let me know if you would like to follow these principles and make a positive contribution to achieving the picture of success."

Good leaders make it clear about the required standards. It is then up to the person to decide if they want to contribute. If not, that is their choice and there are consequences.

Imagine you lead a team. How would you rate yourself in areas of being an encourager, educator, enabler and enforcer?

Being An Encourager

How good are you at creating a positive environment? How good are you at helping people to build on their strengths?

How good are you at coordinating people's strengths to do superb work and deliver success? You may have a coordinator who makes this happen, but you are still accountable for ensuring it does.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Being An Encourager

The rating I would give myself for being an encourager for my team is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *
- *
- *

Being An Educator

Different leaders educate people in different ways. They may act as good models, coaches or trusted advisors. What is your preferred way of educating the people in your team?

How good are you at explaining the team's purpose, principles and picture of success? How good are you at sharing success stories that show how people are following the principles?

How good are you at encouraging people to focus on their self-development? How good are you at ensuring they keep focusing on: a) what they are doing well; b) what they can do better and how? How good are you at passing on practical tools that they can use to keep developing?

Being An Educator

The rating I would give myself for being an educator for the people in my team is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *
- *
- *

Being An Enabler

Good leaders enable people to make their best contributions. One approach is to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. This sometimes involves the leader taking the following steps.

They explain the big picture, the piece of work to be done and the specific outcomes to achieve.

They make clear contracts with the person about the outcomes they will deliver and the support they need.

They then give the person freedom – within parameters – regarding how they deliver the outcomes.

If you wish, try completing the following sentences.

Being An Enabler

The rating I would give myself for being an enabler for the people in my team is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *
- *
- *

Being An Enforcer

This can be the tricky part. Some leaders are happy to encourage and educate others, but they may find it hard to deal with people who step over the line. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I score highly in the other areas, probably around 8/10 on each of these. But I have difficulty with the enforcement part, where I score 6/10."

Good leaders see themselves as custodians of the culture rather than as bad cops. As mentioned earlier, they continually explain the purpose, principles and picture of success.

They are prepared to act to safeguard the environment, however, if some people want to spoil it for others. One leader said they actually welcomes such situations. They explained this in the following way.

"My job is to maintain high standards in the organisation. Sometimes this involves sharing success stories to show those we want to uphold. Sometimes it involves taking action to make sure the standards do not slip. This is something I am happy to do."

"My approach is to explain the professional standards we want people to follow to achieve the goals. It is also to explain the reasons for these standards."

"It is then up to the person whether they want to follow these standards. If not, then I find people who are prepared to contribute towards achieving the goals."

There are many ways to help people. Sometimes this involves balancing encouraging, educating, enabling and, when appropriate, enforcing certain standards.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. How would you rate yourself as an enforcer in terms of protecting the culture in your team? Rate yourself on a scale 0-10.

Being An Enforcer

The rating I would give myself for, when appropriate, being an enforcer who protects the culture in the team is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *
- *
- *

The Sage's Approach

Some sages seem to be skipping with joy and yet can also be serious

Sages are often seen as wise but they do not see themselves this way. They see themselves as lifetime students. They learn from eternal wisdom and also study humanity at its best.

Such people see the big picture yet are also practical. They are soul-wise and savvy. They move from the concept to the concrete and give examples that bring things to life.

Some sages seem to be skipping with joy and yet can also be serious. They can sometimes be a bit mischievous and have a generous sense of humour.

Sages often have a sense of perspective. There have been billions of people before them and there will be billions after them. All they can do is try to contribute to life during their time on the planet.

Such people often balance characteristics that appear to be opposites. They balance serenity with steel. They can be calm yet also display massive commitment.

Maya Angelou demonstrated many of these qualities - wisdom, charm and mischievousness. Here are some things she said.

"I've learned that people will forget what you said, people will forget what you did, but people will never forget how you made them feel."

"Life is pure adventure, and the sooner we realize that, the quicker we will be able to treat life as art."

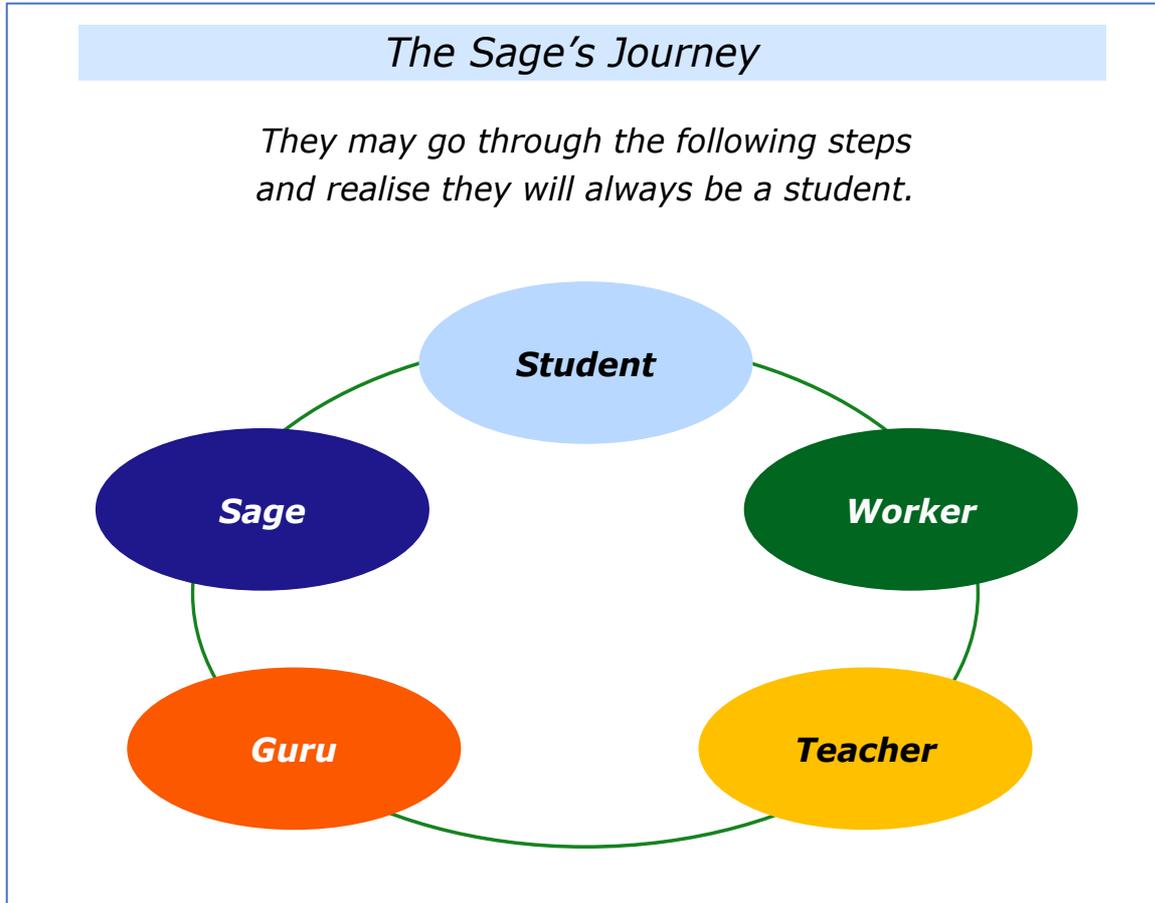

"Love recognizes no barriers. It jumps hurdles, leaps fences, penetrates walls to arrive at its destination full of hope."

"You may not control all the events that happen to you, but you can decide not to be reduced by them."

"My mission in life is not merely to survive, but to thrive; and to do so with some passion, some compassion, some humor, and some style."

"Hate, it has caused a lot of problems in the world, but has not solved one yet."

Different people take different journeys towards becoming sage-like. Some go through some of the following stages.

They start off by being a student and then a worker. Aiming to pass on knowledge, they may become a teacher. Then comes the most dangerous phase. They may want to become a guru. Sometimes they move on, however, and become a sage. Some people go through these stages, some skip from one to another, some take a different route. Let's explore these steps.

Student

Sages often start as students. They focus on something they want to learn and become fascinated by the subject. They may want to learn about people, spiritual faiths, science, art or another topic.

Such people throw themselves into the learning process. Gathering as much information as possible, they look for patterns and begin to make sense of what they are learning. They may also begin to develop their own models for understanding experience.

A person may try many different kinds of work, visit various cultures or test themselves by tackling specific challenges. They learn from the experiences and begin to settle on specific activity.

Worker

A person may then concentrate on an activity that gives them positive energy. They may still want to explore many fields, but they decide to focus on a deeply satisfying activity.

They may do many jobs in their chosen activity but then develop their specialism. They may become a subject matter expert, project director, coordinator, leader, prototype builder or develop another role. This can lead to them aiming to make a specific contribution.

Teacher

Some people move into the role of being an educator, teacher, coach or mentor. Some take this step in a proactive way. Some find themselves being asked to share their knowledge with other people. Different people choose different ways to take this step. Some choose to build on their strengths and aim:

To clarify the specific knowledge they want to pass on to people;

To clarify the kinds of people who might be open to such knowledge;

To clarify the best ways for them to pass on this knowledge.

They share the knowledge in a way that plays to their strengths. This may involve working face-to-face with people, writing, making films or using another media. Some people remain humble when taking this route. Some choose to take another role.

Guru

A person may be seen as a guru, but this can be a dangerous phase. They may think they have mastered something. Some talk about what they see as their personal brand rather than on serving others. Some people choose to follow another route.

Sage

Gurus want followers but a sage wants to give things away. They have wisdom in their bones and make complicated things simple. As mentioned earlier, the sage's journey is full of paradoxes.

Once somebody thinks they are wise, they automatically aren't. Once they think they are a sage, they are in dangerous territory. It is vital to remind themselves that they will always be a student of life.

Sages are sometimes approached by people who want to explore certain themes. When appropriate, sages then share knowledge in a way that helps people to achieve success. Here is an introduction to one approach that sages take in such situations.

The Sage's Approach To Helping People To Achieve Success

They create a stimulating sanctuary in which a person feels at ease and able to clarify their goals. They then provide support and share knowledge in a way that helps the person to achieve their picture of success.

Sages start by creating a stimulating sanctuary in which a person feels at ease. They make the person feel welcome and clarify what they want to explore.

Focusing on the first theme the person wants to explore, they clarify the real results the person wants to achieve. They clarify the person's picture of success.

They aim to support the person. Different sages do this in different ways. Then, at some point, they will ask if it is okay for them to share some ideas.

Sages then share knowledge, positive models and practical tools that the person can use in their own way. They bring the ideas to life by giving practical examples that resonate with the person.

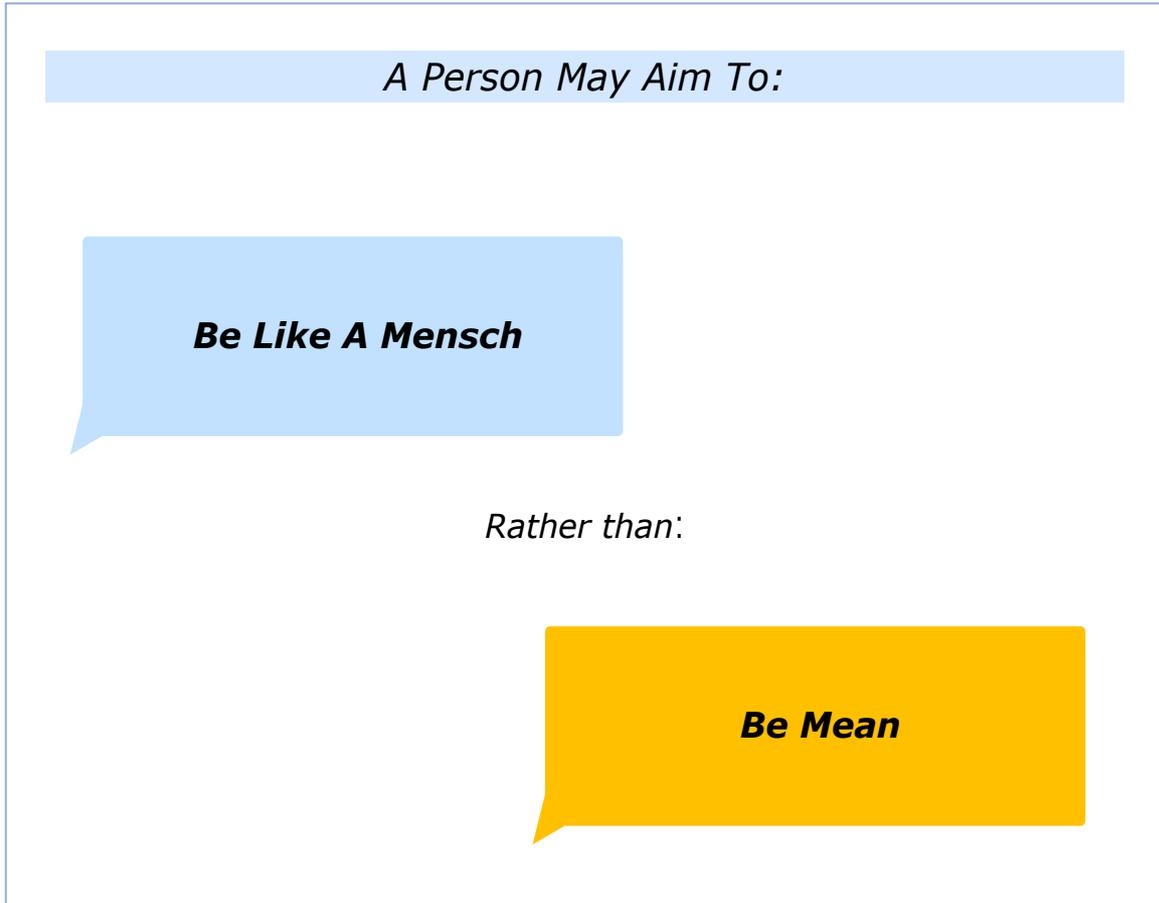

Checking which ideas resonate with the person, they explore these further. If appropriate, they move on to how the person wants to apply these to achieve their picture of success.

Sages return to the person's agenda and the next theme the person wants to explore. They repeat the process and share knowledge that the person can use in their own way.

They may conclude the session by giving the person chance to reflect on what they have learned or relearned. When appropriate, sages continue to provide support and help the person to achieve their picture of success.

Sages love to help people and share knowledge. They do this because they believe that the caring for others approach is not a copyrighted approach. They want to pass on knowledge that can help both present and future generations.

The Mensch Approach

Some people aim to be like a mensch rather than to be mean. They aim to be warm and generous. Some also aim to work towards becoming wise.

There are now many articles on how to be a mensch. Here is a summary of some themes they mention.

Mensch is a Yiddish word meaning a person of integrity and honour. It can apply to both men and women.

A mensch is considerate to others. They are guided by generosity, kindness and honesty and passing on and They aim to do the right thing towards family, friends, strangers and society.

A mensch treats everybody with respect. They may act as peacemakers and aim to find solutions to problems. They know that actions have consequences. They have a respect for resources and recognised our responsibility towards posterity.

Simon Roker highlighted these qualities in an article for the Jewish Chronicle called What Is A Mensch? Here are excerpts from the piece.

There are few higher Jewish compliments to pay someone than to call them a mensch, though, of course, a true mensch would be too modest to want to be complimented.

It sounds like a male term, but it comes from the German word for 'human being'.

A mensch is a person who can be relied on to act with honour and integrity. But the Yiddish term means more than that: it also suggests someone who is kind and considerate.

Rabbi Neil Kurshan, author of the book Raising Your Child to be a Mensch, characterises it as:

"Responsibility fused with compassion, a sense that one's own personal needs and desires are limited by the needs and desires of other people. A mensch acts with self-restraint and humility, always sensitive to the feelings and thoughts of others".

A mensch is driven by an innate decency, motivated perhaps by a sense of values to live up to but not out of regard for recognition. They will act as a mensch at times when it may be hard to be one.

Mensches may be people who have achieved high office, but they are just as likely to be largely unsung heroes or heroines, admired within the small circle who know them well.

Mensches are people we look up to, but they are never too good to be true.

The Second Simplicity Approach

Wise people sometimes pass on a legacy that embodies the second simplicity. They get to the heart of the matter and explain things in a way that is simple yet profound. Oliver Wendell Holmes summed this up when he said:

"I would not give a fig for the simplicity this side of complexity, but I would give my life for the simplicity on the other side of complexity."

Let's explore how people who get to this stage go through the years of simplicity, complexity and then the profound simplicity.

Simplicity

One person explained the route they took in life. This began with them recalling the first simplicity.

"Life appeared simple when I was young. As a teenager I believed in love, peace, beauty and building a better world.

"Powered by idealism, I threw myself into voluntary work, protested against racism and studied the great philosophies.

"Many thinkers reinforced my beliefs. There seemed obvious answers to solving the world's problems. My ideals kept me going into my early twenties."

Complexity

Some people then encounter complexity. They go to work, enter university and graduate into the professions. They become experts, speak in strange languages and write in long sentences.

They join big companies and get lost in matrix organisations. They get married, incur debts, suffer setbacks, make compromises and bury their dreams. They say:

"Life is not that simple."

At some stage, however, life can bring wake up calls. Those who are faced by life threatening illnesses, for example, quickly reassess their priorities. They rise above the daily habits and focus on what is really important in life.

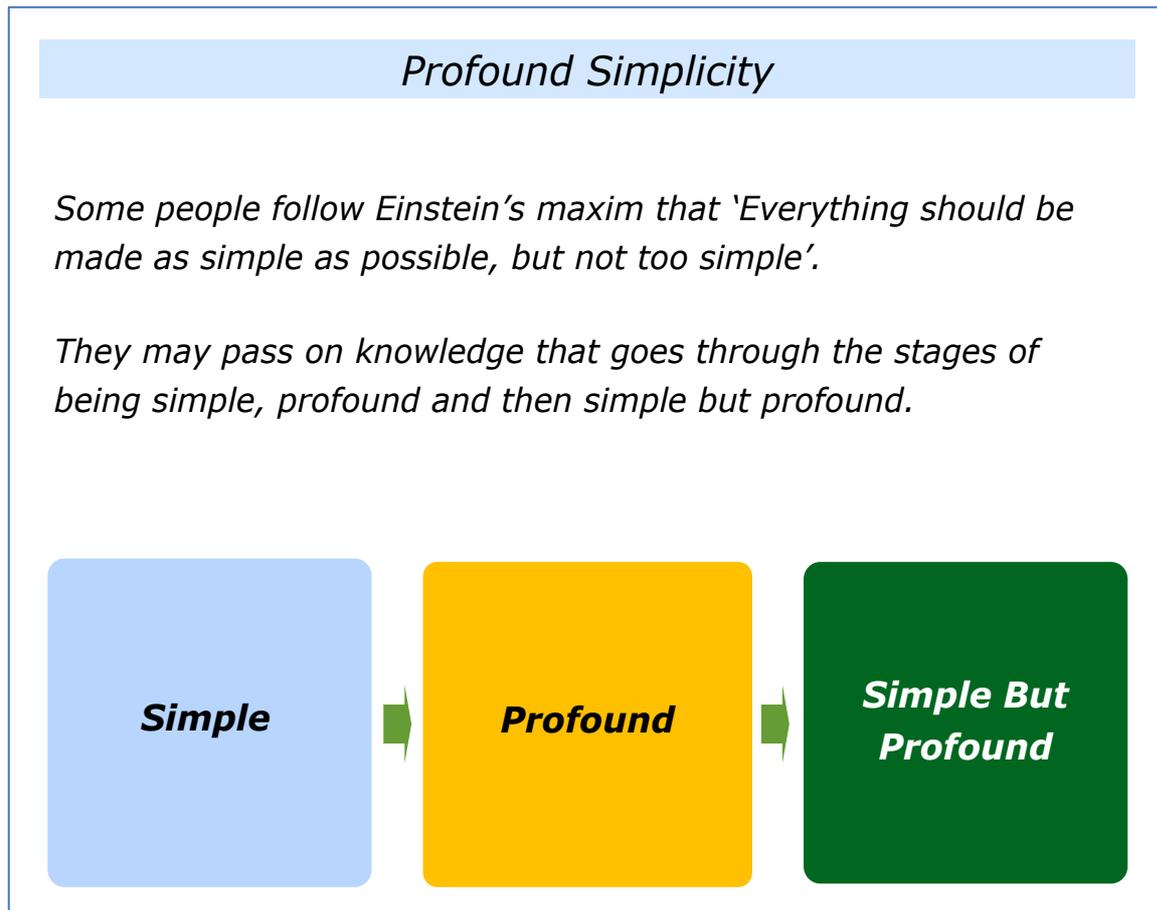

Second Simplicity

The second simplicity is a profound simplicity. A person may return to their original philosophy, but now experience brings wisdom.

The pains and pleasures of life bring an extra timbre to their voice. Speaking from the depths of their being, their words resonate more deeply.

They have wisdom in their bones. Demonstrating humility rather than hubris, they make sense experience and make complicated things simple.

Such people focus on the eternal themes and pass on knowledge that people can use in their own ways. They share lessons from the second simplicity. Some call this profound simplicity.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of an activity where you follow elements of the second simplicity approach?

You may do this when pursuing a craft, doing a certain piece of work, leading a team or doing another activity. What are the principles you follow when doing this activity? How do you translate these into action?

Imagine that you were asked to explain these principles to people. How could you pass on this knowledge in a way that people can use? How could you do this in a simple yet profound way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Second Simplicity

The specific activity where I may follow elements of the second simplicity approach is:

*

The specific principles I follow when doing this activity are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to pass on this knowledge in a way that is simple yet profound are:

*

*

*

The Making Complicated Things Simple Approach

Making Complicated Things Simple

- Step 1 is ...
- Step 2 is ...
- Step 3 is ...

Some people make complicated things appear simple. Going into the situation in which they excel, they see patterns quickly. They then pursue the right strategies and deliver success.

Great educators share their knowledge in a way that is simple yet profound. Great athletes demonstrate grace under pressure. Great inventors produce breakthroughs that afterwards appear obvious.

Such people often demonstrate what appear to be paradoxes. They see the big picture and the small details. They do things slowly yet also swiftly. They appear to do things easily yet also effectively.

How do high performers make things appear so natural? The answer is:

"Because they work at it."

This is true, but they are also using their top talents. They are in their element – at ease yet able to excel. Some people overlook their strengths because they find some things easy to do. It can be years before realising they have a gift.

Betty Edwards, for example, has helped millions of people to learn how to draw with her book Drawing on the Right Side of the Brain. As a child she got praised for her special gift of being able to draw.

At first she found it hard to understand her talent. She described this feeling in the following way.

"But in the back of my mind, I felt that the praise was misplaced. I knew that drawing was easy and that all anyone had to do was to look at things in that certain way."

Looking at your own life, what is the specific activity where you make complicated things simple? How do you take these steps?

You may put yourself into situations where you feel calm, clear and able to get concrete results. You may gather information, see patterns and clarify the real results to achieve.

You may choose the strategy most likely to succeed. You may reach into your repertoire, apply the appropriate tools and keep doing what works. You then do whatever is required to achieve success.

How can you pass on knowledge about the activity in which you make complicated things simple? This may be a challenge - because what you do may seem natural - but have a go.

What would be the best vehicle for making this happen? You may prefer to run coaching sessions, lead workshops, give presentations, write articles, create a website, publish a blog or whatever.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Making Complicated Things Simple

The specific activity where I have the ability to make complicated things simple is:

*

The specific things I do to make complicated things simple are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to pass on knowledge about the activity in which I make complicated things simple are:

*

*

*

The Looking Forward To Each Day In Older Age Approach

Carl Jung On Living As We Get Older

Life behaves as if it were going on, and so I think it is better for an old person to live on, to look forward to the next day, as if he had to spend centuries, and then he lives properly.

But when he is afraid, he gets stiff and he dies before his time. But when he's living and looking forward to the great adventure that is ahead, then he lives, and that is about what the unconscious is intending to do.

There are many views on how people can behave as they move towards the end of their lives. Carl Jung gave an insight into one approach when interviewed in 1959 by John Freeman for the BBC programme Face-To-Face.

Carl believed that a person could make the most of life by looking forward to each day. Here is a longer excerpt from answer he gave when asked about how people could live with the awareness of death.

I have treated many old people and it's quite interesting to watch what the unconscious is doing with the fact that it is apparently threatened with a complete end. It disregards it.

Life behaves as if it were going on, and so I think it is better for an old person to live on, to look forward to the next day, as if he had to spend centuries, and then he lives properly.

But when he is afraid, he gets stiff and he dies before his time. But when he's living and looking forward to the great adventure that is ahead, then he lives, and that is about what the unconscious is intending to do.

Of course, it's quite obvious that we're all going to die, and this is the sad finale of everything; but nevertheless, there is something in us that doesn't believe it apparently. It is simply so.

And so when you think in a certain way you may feel considerably better, and I think if you think along the lines of nature you can think properly.

Different people demonstrate this love of life in different ways as they get older. Maya Angelou expressed it in the following way.

Photograph by Elon University

I love living. I love that I'm alive to love my age.

There are many people who went to bed just as I did yesterday evening and didn't wake this morning.

I love and feel very blessed that I did.

I love, too, that I know a little more today than I did yesterday, or I simply know it more profoundly.

Some people experience an interesting feeling in their later years. This involves them blending the following qualities.

They feel at ease with themselves as individuals and also part of something greater than themselves.

Bertrand Russell described elements of this approach in his short essay he wrote at the age of eighty-one called How To Grow Old. Here are excerpts from the essay.

How To Grow Old

Some old people are oppressed by the fear of death. In the young there is a justification for this feeling.

But in an old man who has known human joys and sorrows, and has achieved whatever work it was in him to do, the fear of death is somewhat abject and ignoble.

The best way to overcome it - so at least it seems to me - is to make your interests gradually wider and more impersonal, until bit by bit the walls of the ego recede, and your life becomes increasingly merged in the universal life.

An individual human existence should be like a river: small at first, narrowly contained within its banks, and rushing passionately past rocks and over waterfalls.

Gradually the river grows wider, the banks recede, the waters flow more quietly, and in the end, without any visible break, they become merged in the sea, and painlessly lose their individual being.

The man who, in old age, can see his life in this way, will not suffer from the fear of death, since the things he cares for will continue.

And if, with the decay of vitality, weariness increases, the thought of rest will not be unwelcome.

I should wish to die while still at work, knowing that others will carry on what I can no longer do and content in the thought that what was possible has been done.

Different people focus on different things during their later years. Their top priority is often to have the basic materials for life and to care for their health.

Some then choose to look forward to each day. They may focus on some of the following themes.

They may aim to encourage their loved ones and other people.

They may aim to appreciate and enjoy every day.

They may aim to create and add to their portfolio work or their equivalent of a magnum opus.

They may aim to pass on knowledge that can help both present and future generations.

They may aim to pass on another form of positive legacy.

Imagine that you want to look forward to each day as you get older. What are the specific things you can do to take this approach? How can you translate these ideas into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Looking Forward To Each Day Approach

The specific things I can do to look forward to each day as I get older are:

*

*

*

The specific things I can do to translate these ideas into action are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

The Positive Later Years Approach

The Positive Later Years

There are many ways to approach our later years. One approach is to take the following steps.

To have a positive attitude

To build on the positives and manage the negatives

To pass on a positive legacy

There are many ways to approach our later years. Today there are many books that provides tools that people can use:

To have a positive attitude ... To build on the positive things and manage the potential negative things ... To pass on a positive legacy.

Some books describe how people may get happier as they get older. Such people feel more able to be themselves. They follow their principles, focus on what they can control and appreciate each day. Some also relearn to play.

Some books describe the concept of encores – how people develop second careers in their later years. They offer practical tips that individuals can use to follow their passions, do positive work and pass on knowledge as mentors. Here are some of these books.

Many people aim to continue to enjoy life as they get older. Some follow the themes described by Jenny Joseph in her much-quoted poem Warning. Here are some of the well-known lines.

*When I am an old woman I shall wear purple
With a red hat which doesn't go, and doesn't suit me.
And I shall spend my pension on brandy and summer gloves ...*

*I shall sit down on the pavement when I'm tired
And gobble up samples in shops and press alarm bells
And run my stick along the public railings
And make up for the sobriety of my youth.*

*But maybe I ought to practise a little now?
So people who know me are not too shocked and surprised
When suddenly I am old, and start to wear purple.*

Jenny described the poem as embodying a woman who has a twinkle in her eye but her words also resonated with many people. Below is an excerpt from an article she wrote about the poem in The Lancet.

Although older people do enjoy the poem, perhaps because an older person is portrayed as an interesting and likeable individual, not as a member of a separate species.

Children like it "because it's funny and the woman in it reminds me of my Gran", it is the ones in the middle – not so old yet, but ... who have felt the poem speak especially to them. They have all said that what they liked was the spirit and happiness of the old woman.

All sorts of people have laughed, been enlivened, brightened up, "been moved by" the poem, have felt a real live encounter with something zestful and comforting, and occupied it in their own way.

Many women live zestful lives as they get older. Many men take a similar approach, but some find it harder. This can sometimes be the case if they have spent much of their lives working for an organisation.

George Vaillant has studied the paths that men take in their lives. A psychiatrist and professor at the Harvard Medical School, he is also known for writing Triumphs of Experiences. Here is an excerpt from the official description of the book.

Begun in 1938, the Grant Study of Adult Development charted the physical and emotional health of over 200 men, starting with their undergraduate days.

The now-classic Adaptation to Life reported on the men's lives up to age 55 and helped us understand adult maturation.

Now George Vaillant follows the men into their nineties, documenting for the first time what it is like to flourish far beyond conventional retirement.

Reporting on all aspects of male life, including relationships, politics and religion, coping strategies, and alcohol use Triumphs of Experience shares a number of surprising findings.

For example, the people who do well in old age did not necessarily do so well in midlife, and vice versa.

While the study confirms that recovery from a lousy childhood is possible, memories of a happy childhood are a lifelong source of strength.

Marriages bring much more contentment after age 70, and physical aging after 80 is determined less by heredity than by habits formed prior to age 50. The credit for growing old with grace and vitality, it seems, goes more to ourselves than to our stellar genetic makeup.

George has studied health and happiness in both women and men. So what advice can we give young people about shaping their futures?

Here are some of the common factors that people who are happy seem to demonstrate.

*A good marriage before age 50 ...
Ingenuity to cope with difficult situations ... Altruistic behavior.*

Stop smoking ... Do not use alcohol to the point where your behavior shames you or your family.

Stay physically active ... Walk, run, mow your own grass, play tennis or golf ... Keep your weight down.

Pursue education as far as your intelligence permits ... After retirement, stay creative, do new things, learn how to play again.

The Art Of Aging

There are many books written on the art of aging. The following section looks at two of these.

Sherwin Nuland, a professor at Yale University's Medical School, wrote The Art of Aging: A Doctor's Prescription for Well-Being. He believes it is important to focus on three things for healthy aging.

These are to work on your physical fitness, to hold onto close relationships and to use your creativity. Here are some ideas from his book.

Aging can be the gift that establishes the boundaries of our lives, which previously knew far fewer confines and brooked far fewer restrictions.

Everything within those boundaries becomes thus more precious than it was before: love, learning, family, work, health, and even the lessened time itself.

We cherish them more, as the urgency increases to use them well.

Many are the uses of the newly recognized limits. Among their advantages is that our welcoming acceptance of them adds to the value, adds to our appreciation, adds to our ability to savor - adds to every pleasure that falls within them.

The good is easier now to see; it is closer to the touch and the taking, if we are only willing to look truthfully at it there and gather it up from amid the cares that may surround it.

There is much to savor during this time, magnified and given more meaning and intensity by the very finitude within which it is granted to us.

Aging has the power to concentrate not only our minds but our energies, too, because it tells us that all is no longer possible, and the richness must be more fully extracted from the lessened but nevertheless still-abundant store that remains.

From here on, we must play only to our strengths. Some of the more meaningful of those strengths may be not at all less than they once were.

Even as age licks our joints and lessens our acuities, it brings with it the promise that there can in fact be something more, something good, if we are but willing to reach out and take hold of it.

It is in the willingness and the will that the secret lies, not the secret to lengthening a life but to rewarding it for having been well used. For aging is an art.

The years between its first intimations and the time of the ultimate letting go of all earthly things can—if the readiness and resolve are there—be the real harvest of our lives.

We do this at every stage of life without noticing the new pattern to which we are becoming attuned, whether it be in adolescence, the twenties, or middle age.

Though the changes may be more obvious as we approach our sixties and seventies, they are, in fact, only a continuation of everything that has come before.

For becoming what is known as elderly is simply entering another developmental phase of life. Like all others, it has its bodily changes, its deep concerns, and its good reasons for hope and optimism.

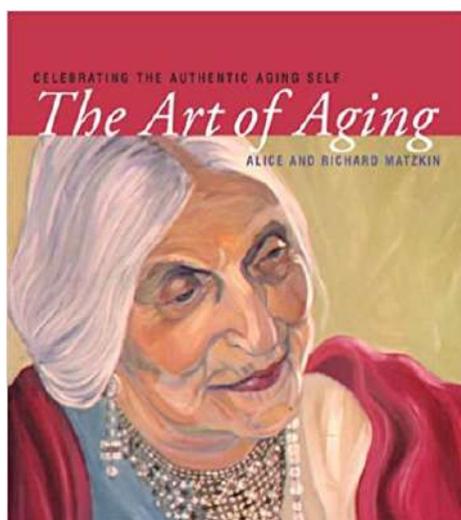

Alice and Richard Matzki are both artists and wrote The Art Of Aging: Celebrating The Authentic Aging Self. In it they explore physical changes, sensuality and relationships, aging parents, spirituality and death.

Drawing on their personal experiences and the wisdom of older mentors, they conclude that their elder years can be a time of ripening and harvest rather than stagnation and despair. Here is their mission statement.

As part of our personal growth and our responsibility as elders, our intention is to share what we have learned about growing older.

By exhibiting our art, speaking and writing, we intend to spread the important message that aging is not the end of life, but can be a positive new beginning and the crowning culmination of a lifetime.

Alice and Richard produced a guide for groups who want to discuss the themes in the book. Here are some topics they invite people to explore.

The whole of life is your work of art.

The point is to utilize your gifts and transform your disabilities to make it the most beautiful artwork you possibly can.

Creating a good old age is work that takes a lifetime.

What are characteristics of a good old age? What kind of work would it take to achieve it?

Elders who are living fruitful, creative lives can serve as inspiring models that help us envision a positive old age. What elder or elders that you know personally, or know through the media do you admire? What qualities they exhibit do you find admirable?

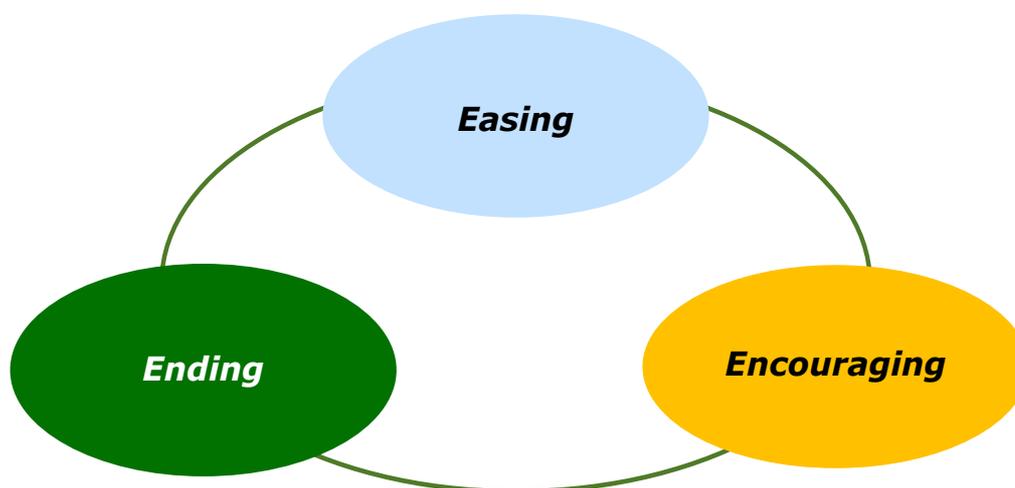

A passionate sense of purpose, generosity of spirit, present focus and physical appeal are qualities we found in the vital women we interviewed. Do you have a passion that would provide you with a sense of purpose that you can carry through old age? How can generosity of spirit play a role in living a full life?

Elders often feel the need and desire to give back to the world in some way in gratitude for what they have received. What would you like your life's legacy to be? What are the things in your life you are thankful for?

The Easing Towards The End Of Life Approach

Moving Towards The End Of Life

This approach sometimes involves the following stages as we move towards the end of life.

Today it is more common for people to talk about dying. There are, of course, many views about how to move on from this life.

One factor that all people agree on is the need to manage pain. Doing this can help a person to deal with the physical and psychological aspects of dying.

People do not necessarily choose when they die, but sometimes they have time to choose how they approach the end of life. The following section looks at the steps that some people take and how they may be supported during this time.

Easing

Some people seem to ease their way towards dying. They say things like:

"I am ready to move on ... I have had a wonderful life ... I am grateful for what I have been given ... I want to go to sleep."

Such an approach calls for taking care of any physical pain. Providing this is done, a person may feel more at ease with moving towards the end of their life.

Encouraging

Some people want to encourage others at this time. They say things like:

"I love you ... Thank you for what you have given me ... Please get on with your lives ... You have so much to give ... Always recognise what is really important in life."

As we know, some people talk about regrets they have had in life, but many want to encourage both present and future generations. They urge others to focus on what is important. They encourage them to be kind and to live life fully.

Ending

Many books describe the last words that people say before they die. Some people say the names of their loved ones. Some say phrases that are metaphors for journeys.

Some recognise that the end of their life can also mark new beginnings for other people. They therefore want to leave others with words and memories that will give them strength in the future.

People like to feel in control. This is especially so when they are approaching death. Sometimes this is not possible, but there are other times when they can be helped as they reach this stage.

Charles Garfield spent many years working with people who were approaching the final stages of their lives. This has led him to explore how to help people during this time.

He put together some of his findings in an article he wrote for The Greater Good website. Here are some excerpts from the article. Whilst some people may find the title of it challenging, he goes on to explain how we can help people in the later stages of their lives.

Seven Keys To A Good Death

I've worked with hundreds of dying people and founded Shanti.

This is a peer counselling program that provides compassionate, trained listeners to help patients and their families through serious illness and the transition of dying.

Shanti volunteers have supported many people facing death to do so with grace through their presence and compassion.

What I've learned through my experience is that what people most need on their deathbed is to be heard - to have their wishes considered and, whenever possible, fulfilled.

But even with Shanti's success, and the proliferation of palliative care programs and hospices around the nation, there are still many dying Americans who don't get that chance.

Here are seven ways to help create the conditions for a good death.

Charles Garfield

Here is a summary of the themes he outlines in his article How To Die Well

- Experience as little pain as possible

When I talk of being pain-free, I mean physically, psycho-socially, and spiritually pain-free.

There are medications that can manage most people's physical pain and make them far more comfortable, and these should not be denied to any patient. Spiritual pain can occur, too. Spiritual issues are common at the end of life, and they need attention.

- Recognize and resolve interpersonal conflicts

*We must also recognize psycho-social pain, the residue of life's unresolved conflicts with other people. Ira Byock wrote in his book, The Four Things That Matter Most, that there are four basic messages a person needs to communicate at the end of life:*

"I love you. Thank you. I forgive you. Please forgive me."

A good death creates a space for people to say those words.

- Satisfy any remaining wishes that are consistent with their present condition

Some people want to live long enough to go to a grandson's graduation, to see a book published, to see a cousin they were close to who lives 3000 miles away.

But, be careful that these are the wishes of the patient and not just the patient's significant others.

- Review their life to find meaning

There are two main ways that people on their deathbeds find meaning: in the recognition of all of the people they have loved and who have loved them, and in the work that they've done that has contributed to the greater good.

Helping the dying to articulate what brought meaning to their lives will help them feel more at peace with their death.

- Hand over control to a trusted person, someone committed to helping them have the kind of death they desire

The whole issue of deathbed conversations—asking a person what he needs or wants—is very important. What does the dying person want? How can they get that? Is it reasonable?

- Be protected from needless procedures that serve to only dehumanize and demean without much or any benefit

One has to be very persistent and clear to avoid procedures that are unwanted - to insist on palliative or hospice care, instead.

It can help to have an advanced directive or a "physician-orders for life sustaining treatment" in writing and communicated to loved ones; but often a person also needs a vocal advocate—a family member, friend, or volunteer caregiver.

- Decide how social and how alert they want to be

Sometimes a dying person wants solitude; sometimes he or she wants friends and family around. Whatever the case, the dying person should decide.

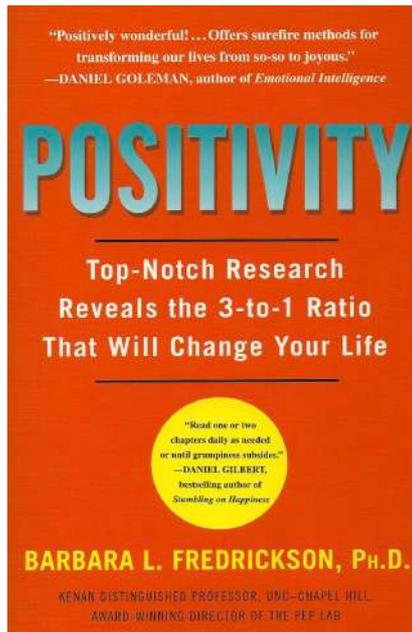

And, though trickier, dying people should be allowed to decide how much consciousness they want. Some people want to sleep all of the time; others want to be alert as much as possible. Once these wishes are known, an advocate can help make that happen.

If we know the conditions for a good death, we are more apt to prepare ourselves and the ones we love to die with dignity and the sense of a life well-lived, rather than treating death as a calamity requiring a trip to the hospital.

- A good death is no oxymoron. It's within everyone's realm of possibility. We need only realize its potential and prepare ourselves to meet it mindfully, with compassion and courage.

Barbara Fredrickson's Work On Positivity

Positive Emotions

Individuals, marriages and business teams that flourish have positivity ratios above 3 to 1.

We need a ratio of 3 to 1 to lift us, develop and increase our resilience.

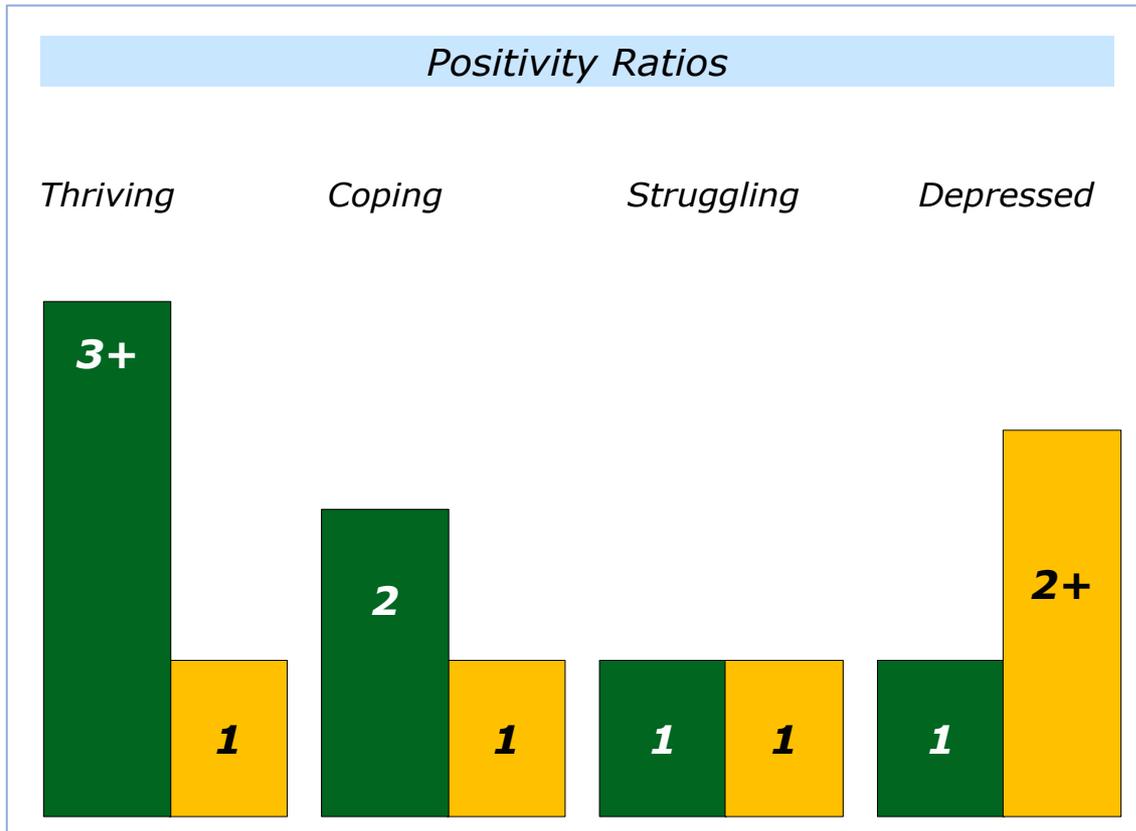

Individuals who don't overcome their depression, couples who fail in their marriages, and business teams that are unpopular and unprofitable each have ratios in the gutter, below 1 to 1.

Barbara Fredrickson did pioneering work that demonstrated how positive emotions can improve our lives. Twenty years of research into emotions culminated in her book Positivity.

The book was based on solid research but it also captured the imagination. Why? Interviewers and readers focused on a key theme that provided a signpost to the future.

People who have positive emotions in a ratio of 3:1 in relation to negative emotions are more likely to flourish.

Barbara saw this pattern repeated in marriages and teams that thrived. People who experienced more negativity were more likely to have difficulties.

Barbara explains that positivity is more than simply being happy. It certainly isn't putting on a smiling face to grin and bear things.

Positivity is based on being true to ourselves. It embodies gratitude, love, playfulness, curiosity and adventure. These emotions trigger each other and create an upward spiral. They 'broaden and build', helping us to make breakthroughs and bring new things into being.

Such emotions provide the basis for creativity, problem solving and even evolution. They enable us to open our hearts and minds. Negativity, on the other hand, closes down our ability to think, create and grow. Barbara explains this in the following way.

Positivity consists of the whole range of positive emotions – from appreciation to love, from amusement to joy, from hope to gratitude, and then some.

The term is purposely broad. It includes the positive meanings and optimistic attitudes that trigger positive emotions as well as the open minds, tender hearts, relaxed limbs, and soft faces they usher in.

*It even includes the long-term impact that positive emotions have on your character, relationships, communities and environments.
And the new scientific discoveries about the importance of positivity are stunning.*

Barbara discovered that people could improve their wellbeing by improving their positivity ratio. She likened this to changing their diet to eat healthier food. They needed maintain this positive diet, however, rather than keep exposing themselves to negativity.

She listed ten forms of positivity that can nourish the soul. People can do both simple and big things that generate the following emotions in themselves and other people.

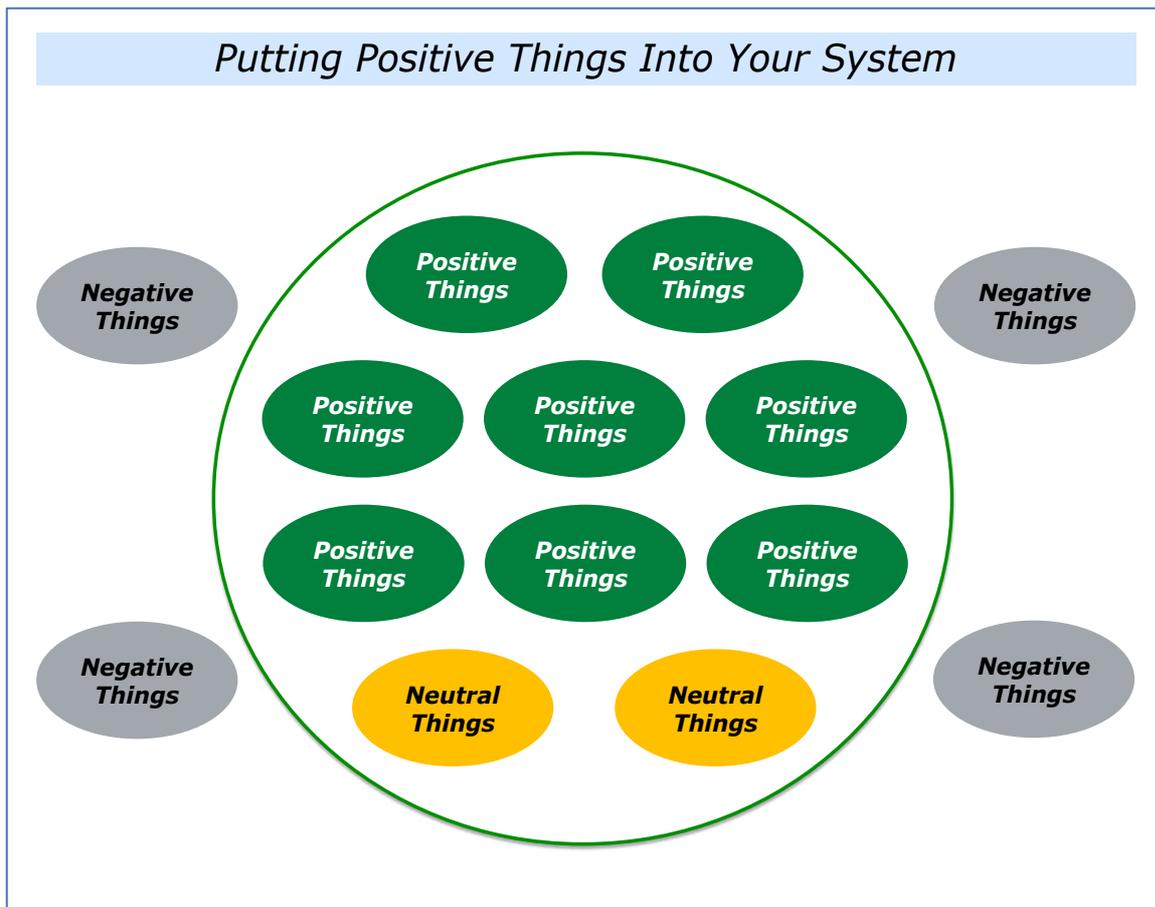

*Gratitude ... Joy ... Love ... Hope ... Inspiration ... Amusement ... Awe ...
Interest ... Pride ... Serenity.*

People who maintain these habits will create an upward spiral that takes them beyond the tipping point. They are then more likely to increase the wellbeing of both themselves and other people.

Barbara's work highlights the importance of putting positive things – rather than poisonous things – into a system. This may be their bodies, their relationships or their planet.

The following pages provide several exercises on this theme. You can, of course, adapt these in your own way.

The Putting Positive Things Into Your System Approach

Imagine that your being is a system. The things you put into your system can affect how you feel and what you do. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

Positive Things

What are the positive things you put into your system? You may eat nourishing food, spend time with encouraging people, do satisfying work or do activities that support your system.

You may seek experiences that stimulate your system. These may include being in nature, exercising, listening to music, studying success or other activities. How can you continue to put positive things into your system?

Neutral Things

Sometimes you may put in or allow neutral things into your system. These may include everyday activities in your life and work. These may help to maintain the status quo and enable you to stay in control of your life.

What may be these activities for you? You may use some energy to make sure the daily practical tasks get done. You do these as a matter of routine and they do not cause any harm.

Negative Things

How do you spot the potential negative things and stop them getting into your system? These may include meeting people who keep complaining or create conflicts. You may also experience situations where you get depressed or hurt.

How can you stop putting yourself into situations? What may be the warning signs that your system is being affected by such events? If appropriate, how can you protect yourself and avoid poison getting into your system?

Looking ahead, how can you put positive things into your system? How can you prevent negative things getting into your system? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences. We will then explore several ways to encourage people.

Putting Things Into My System

*Positive Things. The specific steps
I can take to continue putting positive things into my system are:*

*

*

*

*Negative Things. The specific steps
I can take to prevent putting negative things into my system are:*

*

*

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps will be:

*

*

*

The Passing On Positive Things To People Approach

Passing On Positive Things

There are many ways to help people. One approach is help them to enjoy positive experiences. It can also be to pass on positive knowledge and practical tools they can use to get positive results.

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to pass on positive things that can encourage people or help them to achieve their personal or professional goals.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. You may aim to doing this by helping people to enjoy positive experiences. You may also pass on positive knowledge or practical tools that they can use to get positive results. Let's explore these themes.

Positive Experiences

People are more likely to thrive in caring environments that help them to grow. Bearing this in mind, you may aim to offer people love, support or encouragement.

There are many ways to take this approach. You may aim to be kind, give them nurturing food, play inspiring music, create beauty or do other things that give people pleasure. Such positive experiences can help people to enjoy life and grow.

Positive Knowledge

People like to know what works. Bearing this in mind, you may aim to study what works. You can then pass on this positive knowledge by offering positive models and practical tools that people use to achieve their aims.

Different people do this in different ways. Some do it in their work as counsellors, educators, craft workers, writers, film makers, leaders, mentors or in other roles. It can be useful to find a way that works for you and other people.

Positive Results

People often want more than theory. They want practical tools they can use in their daily lives. You can aim to pass on tools, techniques or other things that people can use to get positive results.

People can then apply these in their own ways to achieve their aims. They may aim to stay healthy, do satisfying work, build superb teams or achieve their picture of success.

Imagine that you want to pass on positive things to a person. Sometimes this may simply mean being kind or providing encouraging experience. Sometimes it may involve helping a person to achieve their aims.

Imagine that you are going to take the latter approach in a professional situation. This will involve making the person feel welcome and clarifying what they want to explore. When appropriate, it may then involve passing on positive things they can use to achieve their goals.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Passing On Positive Things

The name of the person is:

*

The person's personal or professional goals may be:

*

*

*

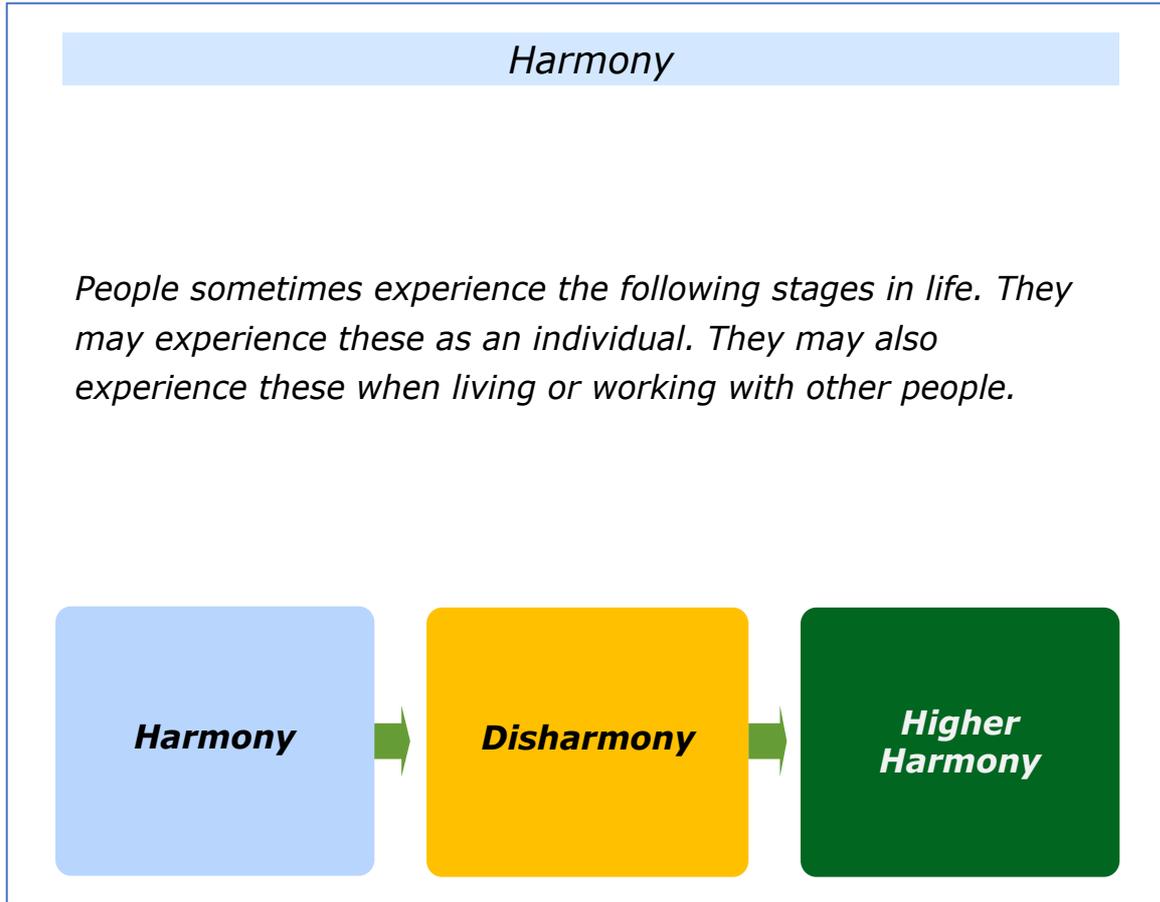

The positive things I can pass on that they may be able to use to achieve their desired positive results are:

*

*

*

The Harmony, Disharmony And Higher Harmony Approaches

People sometimes experience the following stages in life - harmony, disharmony and a higher harmony. They may experience these as an individual or when living or working with other people.

There are several definitions of the word harmony. Many of these refer to music. Here are some other definitions.

The alignment of feelings, ideas or actions ... The alignment of people's efforts to achieve something special ... The alignment of different parts to get positive results.

People who take this approach may feel in harmony with their own values. They may aim to help other people or follow a higher purpose. They may some work with others, for example, to achieve a positive goal.

As mentioned earlier, people may also experience disharmony. This can lead to hurting each other. It can also lead to despair and destruction.

Some people learn from this situations, however, and emerge feeling they want to do something better. Sometimes this can lead to them doing things that lead to a higher harmony. Let's explore these themes.

Harmony

Looking back, when have you been in harmony with yourself? When have you been in harmony with other people? When you have been in harmony with the work you are doing – either by yourself or other people?

Here are some of the themes that people may mention when they exploring these questions. You will, of course, have your own approach to creating such experiences.

A person may feel in harmony with themselves when:

They are doing what they love ... They have a sense of purpose ... They are following their principles ... They are positively engaged ... They are working towards achieving positive results.

A person may feel in harmony with other people when:

They are able to be themselves ... They are accepted ... They are encouraged ... They are with kindred spirits ... They are not judged ... They are sharing common activities ... They are creating positive memories.

A person may feel in harmony with their work – either by themselves or with other people - when:

They are following their vocation ... They are building on their strengths ... They are following strategies that work ... They are cooperating with others by focusing on clarity, creativity and compelling goals.

Let's return to your own life and work. When you have had some of these experiences? What were you doing right then? How can you follow similar principles in the future? What may be the benefits?

Some people feel a sense of harmony early in their lives. Feeling loved, they are given the space to grow. They may have parents who encourage them to follow their passions, explore and develop.

They may then go on to do work they love. They may pursue the work that gives them positive energy and gets positive results. That way they win every day.

Feeling alive, they do satisfying work. This can provide a sense of affirmation and encourages them to keep developing. They feel a sense of harmony and want to do their best during their time on the planet.

Some people may experience these feelings. There may come a time, however, when they encounter a certain kind of difficult challenge.

Disharmony

Looking back, when have you felt a sense of disharmony? This could have led to a feeling of distress or dislocation. It could also have affected parts of your being.

A person may experience disharmony within themselves, with others or in their work when:

They are feeling out of control ... They are not following their values ... They are in painful relationships ... They are doing things that give them negative energy ... They are not able to manage the triggers that send them into a downward spiral.

They are focusing on what they can't control ... They are working in a toxic culture ... They are seeking affirmation from others when it will not be forthcoming ... They are not able to see a way forward to improve their health, hope or happiness.

Some people do not feel in harmony with themselves. They ignore their strengths and focus on their shortcomings. They neglect their assets and focus on their angst.

They may find it hard to follow their principles. They may instead aim for status by gaining certain kinds of prizes. They may reach their goals but then feel empty in their centre.

Such people may have negative conversations with themselves. This may include focusing on some of the following themes.

"Why can't I be content? What do I want to change in my life? Why do I keep criticising myself? How can I get myself out of negative cycles? What can I do to feel more at peace?"

Some people in relationships, teams and organisations may begin their journey together by focusing on common goals. They may also coordinate their strengths to achieve success.

They may reach a stage where they find it difficult to align their efforts, however, and fall into disharmony. They may blame each other or fall into negative cycles.

Some people stay this way forever. Some find it tiring but do not know how to get into a more virtuous circle. Some move on to the following stage.

Higher Harmony

Some people reach a stage in their lives when they move into a state of higher harmony. They may focus on pursuing this path within themselves, with other people or in relation to the life forces on the planet. Different people do this in different ways.

Some emerge from exhausting experiences. They then start to feel that there must be a better way of living or working.

Some embark on various kinds of inner or outer journeys. These can take them into territories that bring enlightening experiences.

Some explore and add to their educational experiences. These may show ways they can follow during the rest of their time on the planet.

A person may apply these lessons to live more in harmony with themselves. They have a sense of gratitude and accept who they are. They aim to become the best kind of person or professional they can be.

Such person may begin to feel more at peace. This can come from having a sense of perspective. They recognise they are small in the great sweep of history. They also realise, however, that it is be important to be kind to others and plant seeds of hope during their time on the planet.

They may aim to do work where they feel in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. They may focus on using their strengths and aim to do superb work that helps others to achieve success.

They may find ways to manage differences and solve conflict. They aim to go beyond blame and focus on common ground. They may then develop the skills to – as far as possible – find win-win solutions.

Such a person may aim to serve something greater than themselves. They may do this when working by themselves or with others. They may then coordinate their talents to do creative work that involves a higher harmony.

An individual or a team may do this by going into a state of flow. They then aim to focus, do fine work and finish. Some go into their equivalent of the zone. Some combine their strengths and capitalise on their synergy to deliver success.

A person may become more at ease as they get older. They may find themselves merging with the forces that bring life to the planet. They enjoy life and see every day as a bonus.

Such a person may count their blessings and consider how they have tried to help people to be happy. They may reflect on how, for much of their life, they tried to do their best. This may bring a sense of peace and perhaps a higher sense of harmony.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the harmony approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may aim to live more in harmony with yourself or other people. You may aim to experience a higher harmony in your work or with the planet. How can you follow this approach in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Harmony Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of the harmony or higher harmony approach may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

*

*

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

*

*

Let's move on to the theme leaving a positive legacy. Some take this approach early in their life, some come to it at a later stage. The following pages describe people who pursue this approach in their own ways.

Ellen MacArthur's Work On The Circular Economy

Ellen became famous as a yachtswoman at the age of 28 when she made the fastest ever single-handed circumnavigation around the globe. The journey was thrilling, frightening and illuminating. It also planted the seed of what she could do for the planet.

Ellen later described how being on the yacht called for living on finite resources. She then extrapolated this approach to living on the Earth. Thriving on the planet called for developing a circular economy.

There are fundamental differences between a circular economy and a linear economy. Ellen explained these in an interview she gave to Marcus Fairs for the design website called dezeen.

The linear economy is a straight line, no matter how efficient you make it.

If you make a car with less material, if you make a car using less energy, you're still using stuff. You're still consuming materials.

Whereas within a circular model, from the outset you design in a way whereby that product comes back into the system.

The components are recovered, the materials are recovered, the item itself is perhaps distributed in a different way, via providing mobility, rather than selling a car.

She did a massive amount of research before setting up the Ellen MacArthur Foundation. This now works with businesses, cities and other organisations that aim to apply the principles of a circular economy.

The Foundation's mission is:

To accelerate the transition to a circular economy.

Ellen recognises that people are more likely to make changes when they see that these will be beneficial. During her interview with Marcus Fairs she described some of the economic benefits of the circular economy.

In the early stages, we were looking at the economic value of a circular economy. The first report came out in January 2012.

We took five products: cotton, a light commercial vehicle, a washing machine, a mobile phone and a smartphone.

We didn't know whether it would be economically viable for any of those to be circular. But in all five cases we found it was better economically to be circular than linear.

The figure was $630 billion [in savings] per year - and that was only based on recycling less than 25 per cent of the components, materials and products. So actually, there's a huge economic value in shifting from linear to circular.

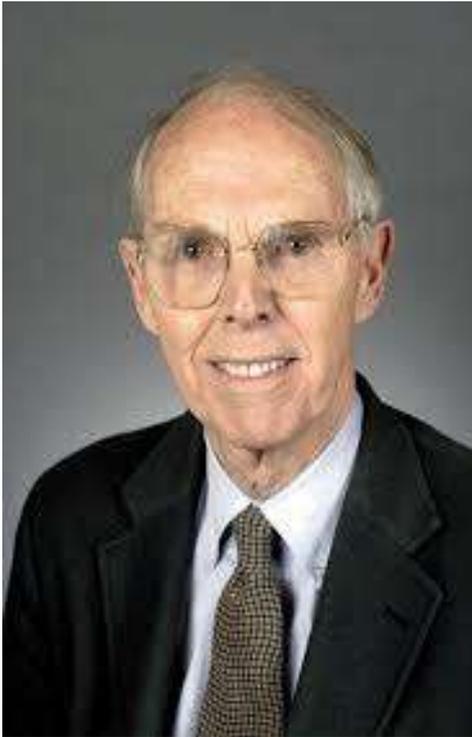

Then we did a second one on fast-moving consumer goods, which was 700 billion US dollars [of savings], and a third one looking at global supply chains, which was over a trillion US dollars.

We really began to prove that circular is an economic benefit.

Sailing around the world called for courage, strategic thinking and detailed planning. It also called for resilience on the way towards delivering the goods. The Ellen MacArthur Foundation embodies these qualities as it aims to speed up the transition to a circular economy.

Roger Fisher's Work On Helping People To Find Solutions

Roger Fisher - It is vital to focus on basic human needs

The most powerful interests are basic human needs. In searching for the basic interests behind a declared position, look particularly for those bedrock concerns that motivate all people.

Basic human needs include: security, economic well-being, a sense of belonging, recognition and control over one's life.

If you can take care of such basic needs, you increase the chance both of reaching agreement and, if an agreement is reached, of the other side's keeping to it.

Roger Fisher made a great contribution to peace. Known for his books on negotiation such as Getting To Yes, his obituary in the Economist described him as a lawyer, teacher and peacemaker.

His approach was different from that of many lawyers. Roger focused on creating alignment, rather than seeing negotiation as an adversarial process. He believed the keys were for people:

To sit down together side-by-side;

To show respect, listen and understand each other's needs;

To focus on the job to do - which was to find a solution;

To work together to solve the problem;

To build the foundations for ongoing peace.

Roger was invited to help people resolve differences in many parts of the world. He often began by helping people to get to know each other and build rapport.

This involved doing simple things such as eating together, listening actively and focusing on common interests. When appropriate, he would then say:

"We have a shared concern here. Let's work together. How do you see it?"

Roger served in the Second World War as a weather reconnaissance officer. But he was strongly affected by the loss of his roommate and many friends.

During his service he also flew morning flights over Japan. This was before the bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. According to people who knew him, the memory of these flights – and the unnecessary deaths of many people in war – weighed on him.

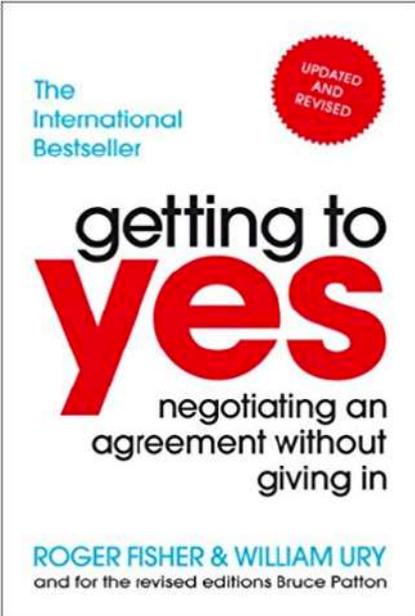

Although building a great reputation in Academia, he threw himself into applying the ideas in practise. This involved him working in Europe on the Marshall Plan.

Later he contributed to seeking peace in the Middle East. This involved working on President Sadat's trip to Jerusalem and the subsequent summit at Camp David.

Roger played a significant part in helping to release the United States citizens taken hostage in Iran in 1981. He helped to resolve the war between Ecuador and Peru. He also spent considerable time in South Africa, helping to bring together people to end Apartheid.

His work became widely known as a result of the book he co-wrote with William Ury, Getting To Yes. Since its publication in 1981 it has sold many millions of copies. This described how people could follow five principles to find solutions.

It is important:

- To separate the people from the problem;*
- To focus on interest, not positions;*
- To invent options for mutual gain;*
- To insist on using objective criteria;*
- To know your BATNA (Best Alternative To Negotiated Agreement).*

Roger believed it was important for people to build on what they had in common. He taught law students to focus on alignment. This was uncommon in law, where people often took adversarial positions.

He also believed it was vital for the parties involved to show respect to each other as human beings. Wherever possible, it was important to separate the problem from the people. Providing you looked at what each of the people wanted, it was then often possible to solve the problem.

Roger used his warmth, compassion and skill to help many people find solutions to challenges. He summarised his approach in the following way.

"Any method of negotiation may be fairly judged by three criteria: It should produce a wise agreement if agreement is possible. It should be efficient. And it should improve or at least not damage the relationship between the parties."

The Ashoka Organization's Work Supporting Social Entrepreneurs

The first most obvious test of a true social entrepreneur is:

"Are they really possessed by an idea?"

The idea is something they are married to in the full sense of the word.

What differentiates them from mere idealists is that an idea can bring satisfaction only when it is realised.

Ashoka is a pioneering organisation that supports social entrepreneurs across the world. These entrepreneurs aim to improve the quality of people's lives.

They may focus on education, medical care, agriculture, housing, broadcasting or any field of human need. Such people have the passion and practical skills to translate their vision into reality.

Bill Drayton, the organisation's founder, explained this in the following way.

"What differentiates Ashoka Fellows from mere idealists is that, for these rare men and women, an idea can bring satisfaction only when it is realised.

"Possessing the same unstoppable drive of a Steve Jobs, they define new issues and create new approaches. Their innovations then set new yardsticks of performance for helping society."

Ashoka's Fellows have the ability to make ideas stick. Based on research, the organisation's web site explains the results.

"By the end of their 5-year fellowship, between fifty and sixty per cent of the Fellows have changed national policy in the countries where they have been working, and ninety percent have seen independent institutions copy their innovations."

Why the name Ashoka?

Bill Drayton started the organisation in 1980. He chose the name in recognition of Ashoka, a great leader who transformed the Indian sub-continent in the 3rd Century BC. (Sometimes his name is also spelt 'Asoka'.)

Emperor Ashoka initially threw himself into waging war against his neighbours but became horrified by the carnage. Converting to Buddhism, he dedicated himself to improving people's lives.

Deeply committed to his own beliefs, Ashoka nevertheless spread religious tolerance. Historians are split over the value of his legacy, but all agree that his reign produced great prosperity. H.G. Wells wrote in his book Short History of the World:

Amidst the tens of thousands of names of monarchs that crowd the columns of history the name of Ashoka shines, and shines almost alone, a star.

His reign for eight-and-twenty years was one of the brightest interludes in the troubled history of mankind.

He organised a great digging of wells in India and the planting of trees for shade. He founded hospitals and public gardens and gardens for the growing of medicinal herbs.

He created a ministry for the care of the aborigines and subject races of India. He made provision for the education of women.

"Such was Ashoka, the greatest of kings. He was far in advance of his age."

Bill Drayton and Social Entrepreneurship

Bill was born in New York City in 1943. He came from a family of practical idealists who, amongst other causes, fought for the abolition of slavery and for women's rights. Speaking to Good Magazine, he explained this in the following way.

"Both my parents showed extraordinary (most would say madly unrealistic!) freedom of spirit at 19. Public service and respect for ideas is a recurrent theme in both the American and Australian sides of my family.

"The fact that the Grimke sisters (anti-slavery and women's equality) and Wendell Phillips (abolitionist) lie on different branches of the America family suggest another element of deep-seated cultural values that drew these people to one another and, without a word being said, was another wonderful gift from my family."

Looking back at his life, Bill recalls his own first encounters with entrepreneurship. Starting a one-page newspaper when at primary school, he soon built it into a large publication supported by adverts. He explained this in the following way.

"I can't tell you how excited I was to get this mimeograph machine. It's amazing how supportive my parents were.

"There were 64 piles of mimeographed paper that had to be collated and stapled, and it never occurred to me this might be inconvenient to my family."

Moving through schools, he became increasingly conscious of social entrepreneurs. These included people such as:

Susan Anthony – who fought for Women’s Rights.

Mahatma Gandhi – whose spiritual leadership helped to guide India to independence.

Florence Nightingale – whose work in the Crimean War helped to found modern nursing.

Bill went on to study at Harvard, Oxford and Yale Law School. It was during a summer break at Harvard that he became gripped by the power of social change.

Vinoba Bhave, a disciple of Gandhi, was walking across India, persuading individuals and whole villages to legally ‘gift’ their land to him. He then redistributed the land more equitably to support untouchables and other landless people.

Bill was 20 years old at the time and on vacation in Munich. Hearing about Bhave’s work, however, he drove a Volkswagen van from Munich to India to join him.

Returning to the USA, Bill organised Civil Rights sit-ins – an event he later described as one of the more formative experiences of his life.

Pursuing his professional career, he worked at McKinsey, the consulting firm, and as an administrator at the White House during the Carter years. One of his key legacies was the carbon emission trading scheme.

Whilst having a strong academic background himself, Bill believes it is now vital to help young people to develop other skills. These include empathy, problem solving and teamwork. Here he describes some of these qualities.

Building Ashoka

Inspired by social entrepreneurs from the past, Bill decided to found Ashoka. It started with an annual budget of $50,000. This was seeded by the MacArthur Fellowship he was awarded.

The budget has now grown to more than $30 million. The first Fellow was elected in India in 1981. Today it supports over 2000 Fellows in more than 60 countries across the world.

It is funded by individuals, foundations and business entrepreneurs. It does not accept funding from government institutions. Ashoka explains its philosophy as founded on the premise that:

The most effective way to promote positive social change is to invest in social entrepreneurs with innovative solutions that are sustainable and replicable, both nationally and globally.

Bill disagrees strongly with the notion that 'today there is less leadership in the world.' He believes people are retaking charge of their lives – particularly in the citizen sector. Why? Older institutions no longer serve the emerging needs.

Learning from business entrepreneurs who have dominated the past 30 years, many caring people are becoming what Bill calls changemakers. Speaking to US News and World Report, he explained this in the following way.

"(The social sector) has been generating jobs at 2.5 to three times as fast as the rest of society. The U.S. more than doubled the number of IRS-recognized charities in a decade.

"Brazil grew from somewhere between 500 and 3,600 citizen groups in 1980 to an estimated more than 1 million by the year 2000. There are similar statistics from every continent."

Talent is flocking to the sector, says Bill, because people believe it is where they can make a positive difference.

Certainly there is a place for pressuring old institutions to change, but it can be quicker to build successful prototypes. Let's explore one of the ways that Ashoka helps to make this happen.

Ashoka supports social entrepreneurs

Social entrepreneurs are the engines of social change and role models for the citizen sector, says Ashoka. It provides such people with a living stipend, often for three years.

This allows them to work full-time on implementing their idea. Additionally it provides them with 'entrepreneur-to-entrepreneur' support and access to expert advice.

Ashoka spends a considerable amount of time selecting its Fellows. It looks for five qualities in such people. Let's explore these themes.

Social Entrepreneurs

Ashoka looks for five characteristics in social entrepreneurs. These are:

- The Knockout Test – A New Idea
- Creativity
- Entrepreneurial Quality
- Social Impact of The Idea
- Ethical Fiber

*They must have a new idea
– this is The Knockout Test*

The person must be possessed by a new idea. It must be a new approach to a social problem that will make a breakthrough in a particular field.

Joaquín Felipe Leguía Orezzoli, for example, is creating 'Children's Forests' in Peru. The grandson of a former President of Peru, he involves children in managing the community forests. The Ashoka site explains his story.

As a child, Joaquín's garden was a refuge from the world and a space to explore his imagination.

After his mother married a Swedish businessman who worked in the Amazon, Joaquín spent his summer vacations in the jungle, which further inspired his creativity.

There, he also became friends with a young Shipibo indigenous boy who shared adventures with him and inspired his early interest in the role of children in the environment.

After a failed attempt to please his parents by studying business, the political situation in Peru led Joaquín to finish his studies in the United States, where he earned his bachelor's degree from Cornell University in natural sciences.

After returning to Peru and working in a variety of public, private, and non-profit jobs, Joaquín attended Yale University and earned his master's degree in environmental management.

He travelled to Bolivia to study the role of indigenous children in community development for his thesis project, an experience that affirmed his conviction to work in youth environmental conservation.

Returning to Peru in 1995 he and a friend founded the Association for Children and the Conservation of Their Environment.

Joaquín's idea passed The Knockout Test. The organisation he leads aims to increase children's appreciation of nature and equip them with practical skills to sustain their environment in the future. Many of these areas go on to be actually managed by the young people.

They must have creativity

Creativity is crucial. Ashoka asks some of the following questions regarding candidates.

Does this candidate have a vision to meet some human need better than it has been met before? Do they have a history of creating other new visions?

Creativity obviously comes in different forms. Ashoka is looking for people who can move beyond their original idea and find creative solutions on the road to success.

They must have entrepreneurial quality

Great entrepreneurs get the right balance between innovation, implementation and impact. They start by having an innovative idea, but this is only the start.

They want to implement the idea and make a positive impact. Ashoka's entrepreneurs are possessed by their vision and want to translate it into reality. They are dreamers who do and deliver.

They must have an idea that has social impact

Ashoka focuses on the candidate's idea - not just the candidate. The idea must be able to live beyond the person's involvement.

Marie Haisova, for example, has involved women in reducing pollution in major Czech cities. The Ashoka site describes some of her achievements.

Marie's program encourages mothers to spearhead the development of a beautiful and healthy urban environment of new parks and green spaces.

Her program provides training and leadership-building seminars for women so they can effectively launch their own neighborhood campaigns.

By providing women with the opportunity to change the area in which they live, Marie is both improving the poor condition of city environments and empowering women to become active community leaders.

They must have ethical fiber

Social entrepreneurs must have an internal moral compass. This is called into action on many occasions.

First, when they face setbacks. Can they revisit their inner values and make decisions based on this compass?

Second, when they invite other people to adopt a fresh approach towards tackling a problem. Ashoka says that people will ask: "Do we trust this person absolutely?"

Third, when they experience pressure or personal attacks. The candidate must then be seen to behave ethically in every way.

Ashoka envisions a world where 'Everyone is a Changemaker'. This is a world that responds quickly and effectively to social challenges. It is one where each individual has the freedom, confidence and societal support to address any social problem and drive change.

This is the organisation's vision – so what is the reality? Between 50% and 60% of the Fellows change national policy in their respective countries. Ninety percent see independent institutions copy their ideas. This is a remarkable bottom-line in any language.

Bill Drayton is optimistic about the future. Outlining his view of the part Ashoka can play in history, he gave the following view to the US News and World Report.

I have never doubted that we are serving the most powerful and most hopeful historical force of our era. Or that we are positioned to play a truly important role. We are, after all, a community of most of the world's leading social entrepreneurs.

How could any entrepreneur, confronted by such amazing opportunities to help transform the world and to do so with such extraordinary colleagues, be tempted to lose focus?

In the world ten years from now, it will not be possible to be a citizen without being a change-maker. Anyone who is not will feel themselves to be enormously vulnerable.

More important, they will not be able to participate in the giving and receiving of love and respect, the heart of human existence, at its most important level - causing change for the good.

Richard St. Barbe Baker - Planting Trees As A Legacy

This generation may either be the last to exist in any semblance of a civilised world or that it will be the first to have the vision, the bearing and the greatness to say:

"I will have nothing to do with this destruction of life, I will play no part in this devastation of the land, I am determined to live and work for peaceful construction for I am morally responsible for the world of today and the generations of tomorrow."

Richard St. Barbe Baker dedicated his life to showing people the value of planting trees. This epiphany came about at a young age.

Writing in his book My Life My Trees, he describes how in 1894, at the age of five, he had an unforgettable experience that charted his future path. After much coaxing, his nurse allowed him to explore the woods by himself. He described what happened in the following way.

No explorer of space probing the secrets of other planets could have felt more exultation that I did at that moment.

Soon I was completely isolated in the luxuriant, tangled growth of ferns which were well above my head. In my infant mind I seemed to have entered a fairyland of my dreams.

I wandered on as in a dream, all sense of time and space lost. I became intoxicated with the beauty all around me, immersed in the joyousness and exultation of feeling part of it all.

I had entered the temple of the wood. I sank to the ground in a state of ecstasy; everything was intensely vivid – the call of a distant cuckoo seemed just for me. The overpowering beauty of it all entered my very being.

At that moment my heart brimmed over with a sense of unspeakable thankfulness which has followed me through the years since that woodland re-birth. I was in love with life: I was indeed born again, although I could not have explained what had happened to me then.

Richard was a changed person. Returning from his walk in the woods, he found the commonplace things in life had a new beauty.

The bread he ate tasted crustier and more delicious. The grumpy old gardener looked like a favourite uncle.

His parents gave him even more affection than they had done the previous day. At least, that was how it seemed. Twenty-six years later he translated this passion into his life's work.

He visited Kenya in 1920. Enlisting the backing of chiefs and elders, he started a programme that led to planting over one million trees. He then co-founded The Men of Trees and was invited to speak around the world.

After helping President Roosevelt to establish the Civil Conservation Corp, he instigated the Save The Redwoods campaign in California.

When seeing the trees for the first time in 1931, he wrote:

It was here that I came upon superb trees representing the supreme achievement of tree growth in the world today. Here it seemed that my search for the beautiful had ended.

This, I decided must be known as the 'Grove of Understanding'. It was here that I visualised international plays and youth gatherings. What better setting could there be in which to plan the better world of tomorrow?

Richard then set three goals that he worked towards during the rest of his life. These were the following.

To save the trees for posterity ... To provide a magnificent backdrop where young people could meet and marvel at the beauty of the Redwoods and the planet ... To inspire young people to work together to hand over this legacy to future generations.

He kept pursuing this sense of purpose and made a positive contribution. Richard personally planted more than a million trees and inspired many people to care for the planet.

Clarifying Your Positive Contribution

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the positive things you want to give to people during your time on the planet?

How can you build on your strengths? How can you do satisfying work? How can you help people to achieve success?

How can you maintain a sense of purpose? How can you keep following your principles? How can you plant seeds of hope?

How can you continue to be a giver? How can you encourage both present and future generations? How can you pass on knowledge that helps other people? How can you make a positive contribution?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Positive Contribution

The positive things I want to give to people during my time on the planet are:

*

*

*

The specific benefits of giving these positive things to people will be:

*

*

*

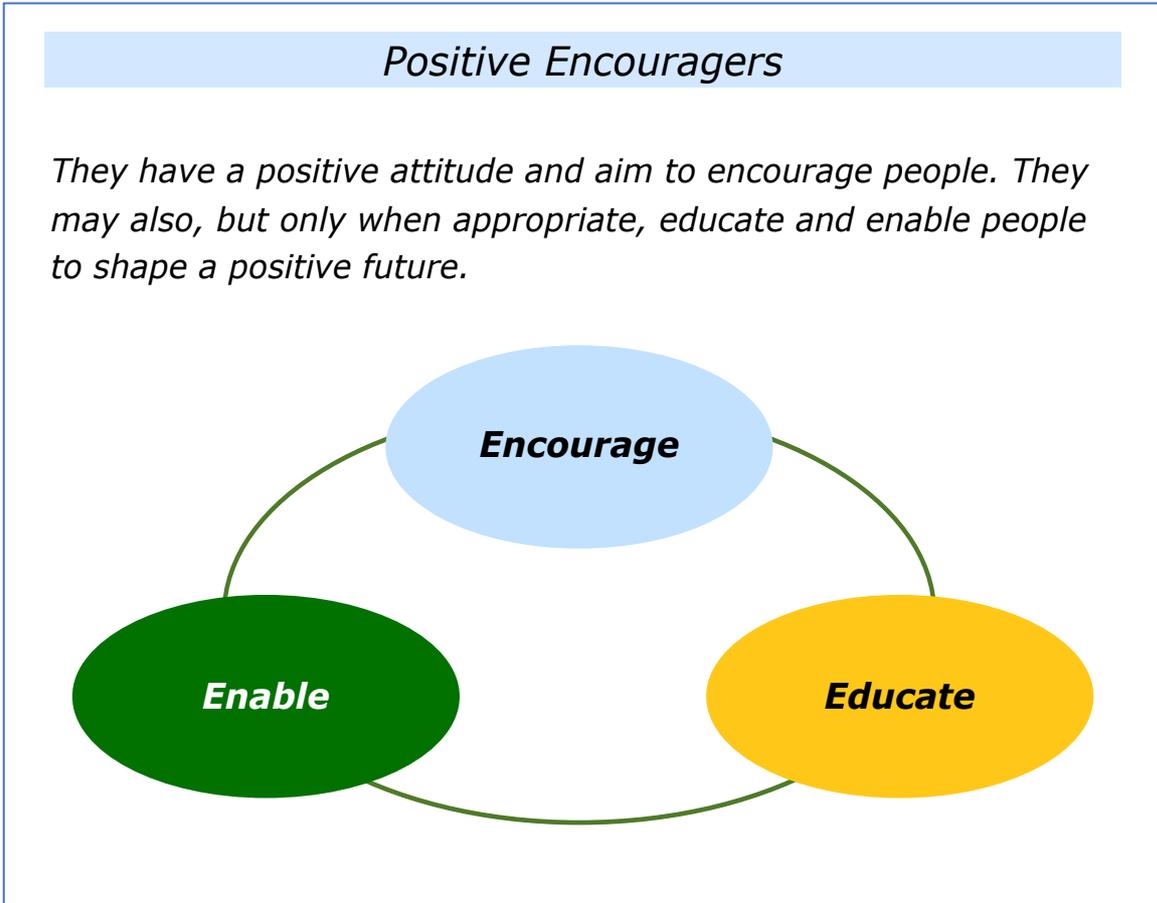

The specific steps I can take to give these positive things to people are:

*

*

*

Conclusion

Encouragers aim to help people in their daily lives and work. Different people do this in different ways. Here is a summary of some of the principles they aim to follow.

Such people are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They love to help people to succeed. They sometimes take the following approach.

They Encourage People

Some do this by aiming to provide people with the basic materials for life. They may also help people to develop skills they can use to shape their futures.

Encouragers often have positive eyes. They look for when a person comes alive, overcomes challenges or does superb work. They look for what a person does right then and, if appropriate, encourages them to follow similar principles in the future.

They aim to empower people. Some do this by helping people to build on their strengths and follow successful strategies. They then help the people to work towards achieving their picture of success.

Encouragers may help people to increase both their will power and way power. They may do this by helping people to add to their repertoire of options. People then have more choices and hence more freedom to shape their futures.

They Educate People

They sometimes follow the paths taken by good educators. They only do this when appropriate, however, and when helping people who want to develop.

Encouragers follow the maxim that the learner learns what the learner wants to learn. Bearing this in mind, they sometimes take the following steps:

They make sure that the person wants to develop and work towards achieving their goals;

They clarify the real results the person wants to achieve - their picture of success;

They make clear contracts that it is okay to share ideas that the person can use in their own way to achieve their goals.

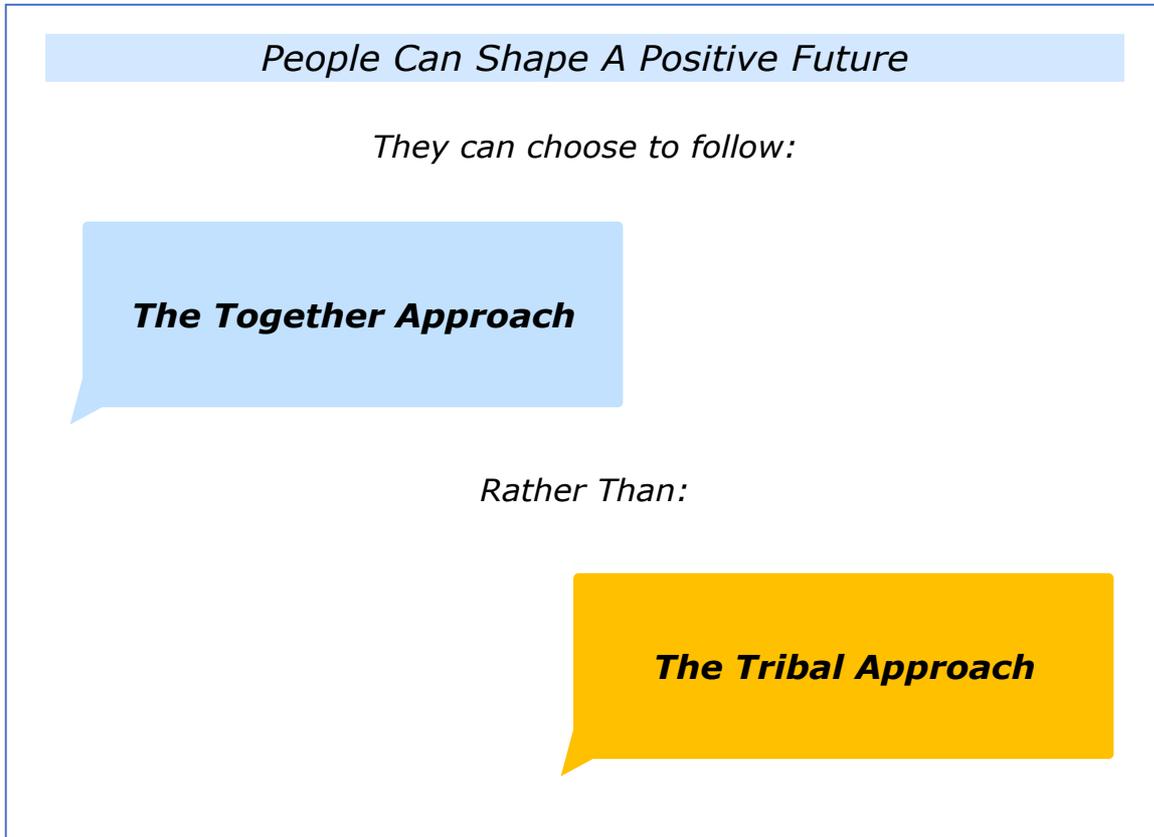

Encouragers then aim to pass on knowledge, models and practical tools that work. The person can take the ideas they like and use these in their own way.

They Enable People

Encouragers aim to enable people to shape their futures. They sometimes do this by following the educational model of inspiration, implementation and integration.

They start by aiming to create an inspiring environment. They clarify people's goals and provide implementation tools that work. They then enable people to integrate the learning in their daily lives and work.

Encouragers help people to take control of their lives. They aim to pass on knowledge and practical tools that work. People can then use these ideas in their own ways to shape a positive future.

There are many ways to live life. This book has focused on how to plant seeds of encouragement in our lives and work. Each person will do this in their own way.

Encouragers often aim to shape a positive future. They take the together view of life rather than the tribal view of life.

*The Together Approach
Rather Than The Tribal Approach*

People who take the together view believe that most people want similar things in life. They aim to build a world where everybody has the opportunity to be healthy, hopeful and happy.

They believe in building on what people have in common – rather than continually seeking conflicts - to achieve concrete results.

They believe that people can combine their strengths to tackle the challenges we face across the world.

They believe that people can work together to create sustainable systems that deliver ongoing success for people and the planet.

They want to encourage others to live fulfilling lives, providing they don't hurt other people. Faced by challenges that may cause difficulties, they build on what people have in common. They then try to, as far as possible, find win-win solutions.

People who take the tribal view identify only with those who appear to be in the same tribe. They have little respect for those who are different and see this as a call to arms. They then try to make sure that they win and other people lose.

Robert Muller, the former Assistant General Secretary of the United Nations, believed we can apply the together view to care for the planet. He wrote in his book A Planet Of Hope:

This is a good planet for humans: it provides endless room for human curiosity and for participation in the process of continued creation and evolution.

The greatest task confronting us is to determine what the right future should be. This planet must be managed so that each individual life can be a work of art.

Encouragers see the big picture and how things are connected. Some see the world as a whole system. They recognise that the actions we take in one part of the world can affect the living system in another part of the world.

Kevin Kelly's book The Home Planet mirrors this view. He collected the views of astronauts who had seen the Earth from afar. Here is one quote from Sultan bin Salman Al Saud.

"The first day or so we all pointed to our countries. The third or fourth day we were pointing to our continents. By the fifth day we were aware of only one Earth."

The positive planet is a beautiful place. It is one where we can encourage both present and future generations. It is one where we can create win-wins for people and the planet. It is one where we can continue to build a positive planet.

The Positive Encourager's Book

How we can encourage people during our time on the planet

This free eBook is packed with knowledge and practical tools.
Based on what works, it shares practical ideas that people can use:

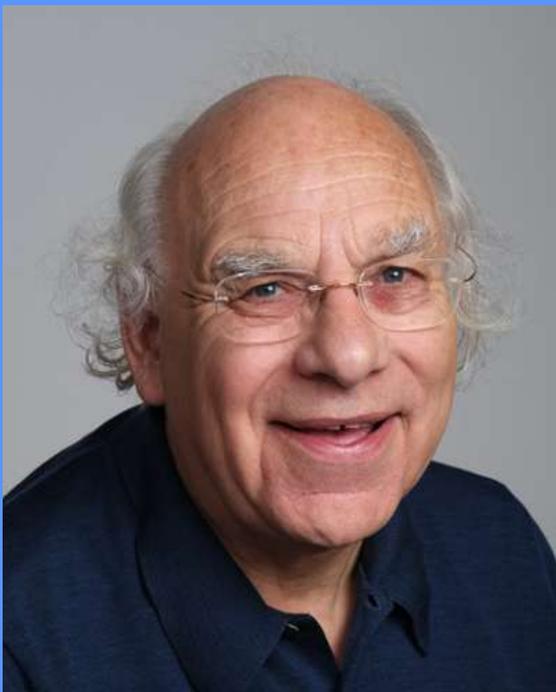

To encourage people in their personal and professional lives;

To build on their strengths and do satisfying work;

To build positive teams that deliver peak performances;

To focus on their purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success;

To make a positive contribution during their time on the planet.

Mike has been working with people for more than fifty years. He has focused on helping individuals, teams and organisations to build on their strengths and achieve their pictures of success.

His many books include The Art of Mentoring and The Art of Strengths Coaching. You can reach him at: mikepegg@me.com