Introduction

There are many ways to live life. This book explores the positive encourager's way. It looks at how we can encourage people during our time on the planet.

Different people encourage others in different ways. Some do it by being kind. Some do it by acting as positive models. Some do it by helping others as parents, friends, educators, mentors, leaders or in other professional roles.

Some do it by providing practical tools that people can use to shape their futures. Some do it by helping people to increase the quality of their lives. Some do it by helping people to build on their strengths and achieve their picture of success.

Some do it planting seeds of hope that encourage both present and future generations. Some do it by creating encouraging teams, organisations and societies. Some do it by passing on knowledge that people can use to build a positive planet.

People make choices every minute. They can choose to be positive or negative, to be creators or complainers, to take responsibility or avoid responsibility. Each choice has consequences for both themselves and other people.

Most people want similar things in life. They want to be loved, happy and successful. The differences are how they try to achieve these aims. Many people also want to do their personal best in life and enjoy a sense of peace.

There are many ways to help people. This book describes the positive encourager's approach to working with individuals, teams and organisations. Here are some of the themes that we will try to bring to life in the book.

The Positive Encourager's Approach

The approach starts by clarifying what people want to achieve. It then helps them to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success.

The approach builds on what works. It provides practical tools that people can use to focus on their purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success.

The encouragement approach has had a strong influence on my own work. During the 1960s I was given the opportunity to work in therapeutic communities. At the time I had little training, so it was important to study what worked.

Bearing this in mind, I approached many people to learn about pioneering programmes in therapy, education and other fields. As well as doing a five-year programme in psychotherapy, I went to courses led by leaders in humanistic and existential psychology.

Many people were generous with their time and shared lessons they had learned in their lives. The main question I asked people was:

"What has helped you to grow most in your life?"

Different people answered this question in different ways. Here is a summary of some things they said.

"I had somebody who encouraged me. They made me feel the centre of their world. They encouraged me to build on my strengths and manage the consequences of my weaknesses. They taught me to do my personal best rather than compare myself to others."

"I learned from a key person who was supportive but tough. They encouraged me to take responsibility and said we are here to serve. I could use my experiences and feelings to help other people or hurt other people. It was my choice, but there were consequences."

"I met people who were different. They had experienced setbacks, were dyslexic, sensitive or different in other ways. They said it was possible to be myself and thrive. They also underlined that: If you are going to be a deviant, you always have to over-deliver."

"I studied people, team and societies that performed brilliantly. When studying leaders of superb teams, for example, I found that many were positive and predictable. They had then used their strengths to enable motivated people to achieve peak performance."

"My teachers were systems thinkers. They showed how to see the big picture and how things were connected. Putting positive things into a system was more likely to get positive results. They showed how to build sustainable systems that delivered ongoing success."

Looking back on your own life, can you think of a person who has encouraged you? This may have been a parent, teacher, coach, manager or another person. What did they do to encourage you?

They may have made you feel welcome, listened and provided words of support. They may have offered practical suggestions or opened doors to new possibilities.

My Positive Encourager

The name of the person who encouraged me was:

The specific things they did to encourage me were:

The specific things that happened as a result of them encouraging me were:

At this point it can be reasonable to ask about the difference between positive and negative encouragement. Here is one view of the differences.

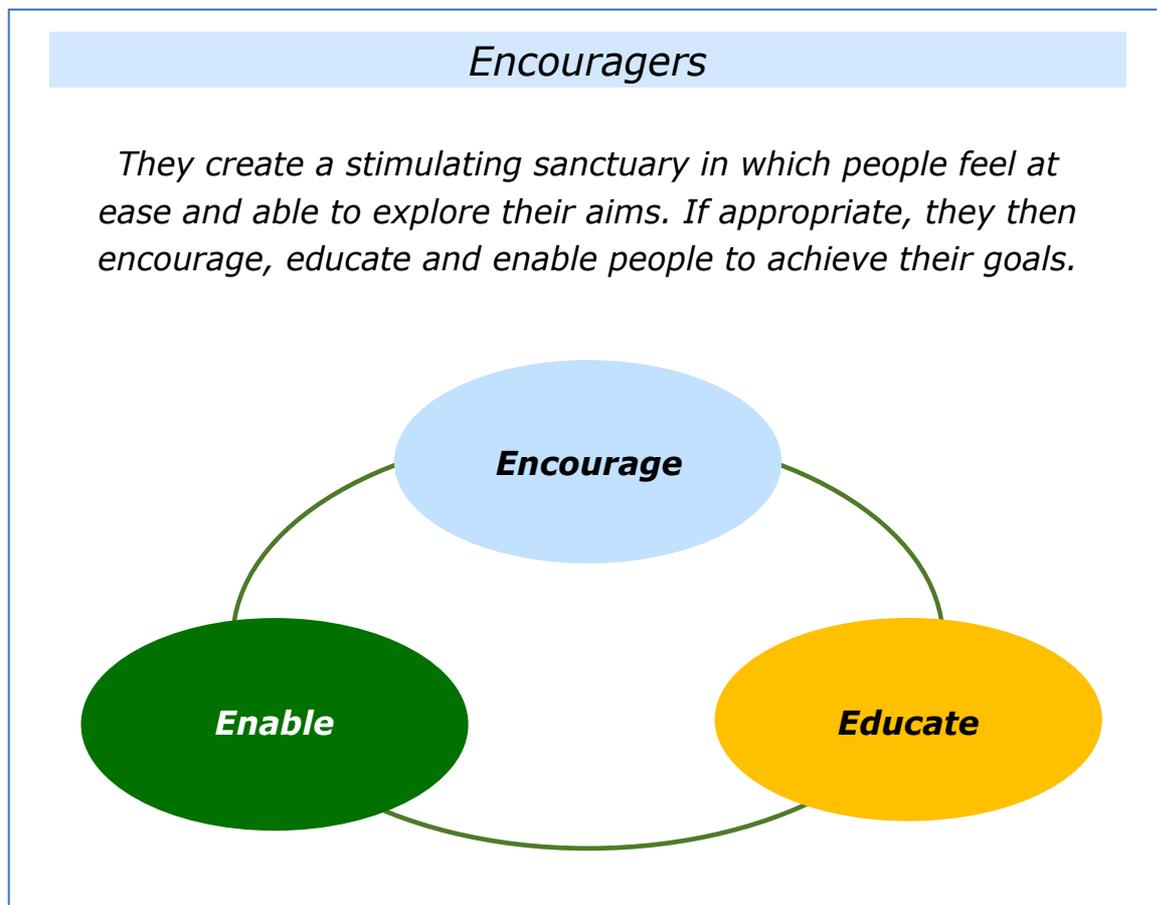

Positive Encouragement

This is when a person behaves in a positive way when aiming to encourage others. This often results in people feeling positive afterwards.

Negative Encouragement

This is when a person behaves in a negative way when aiming to encourage others. This often results in people feeling negative afterwards.

Good encouragers create a stimulating sanctuary in which people can feel at ease and able to talk about their goals. When appropriate, they aim to encourage, educate and enable people to achieve their aims.

The Strengths Approach

There are many ways to help people. This book describes how you can use the strengths approach to help individuals, teams and organisations.

The approach starts by clarifying their picture of success. It then offers practical tools that they can use to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success.

The following pages offer many tools that you can use to help people. You can then apply these in your own way.

Some encouragers demonstrate the qualities shown by good educators. They follow the old mantra that the learner learns what the learner wants to learn. They therefore aim to pass on knowledge that is personal, practical and profitable.

Good Educators

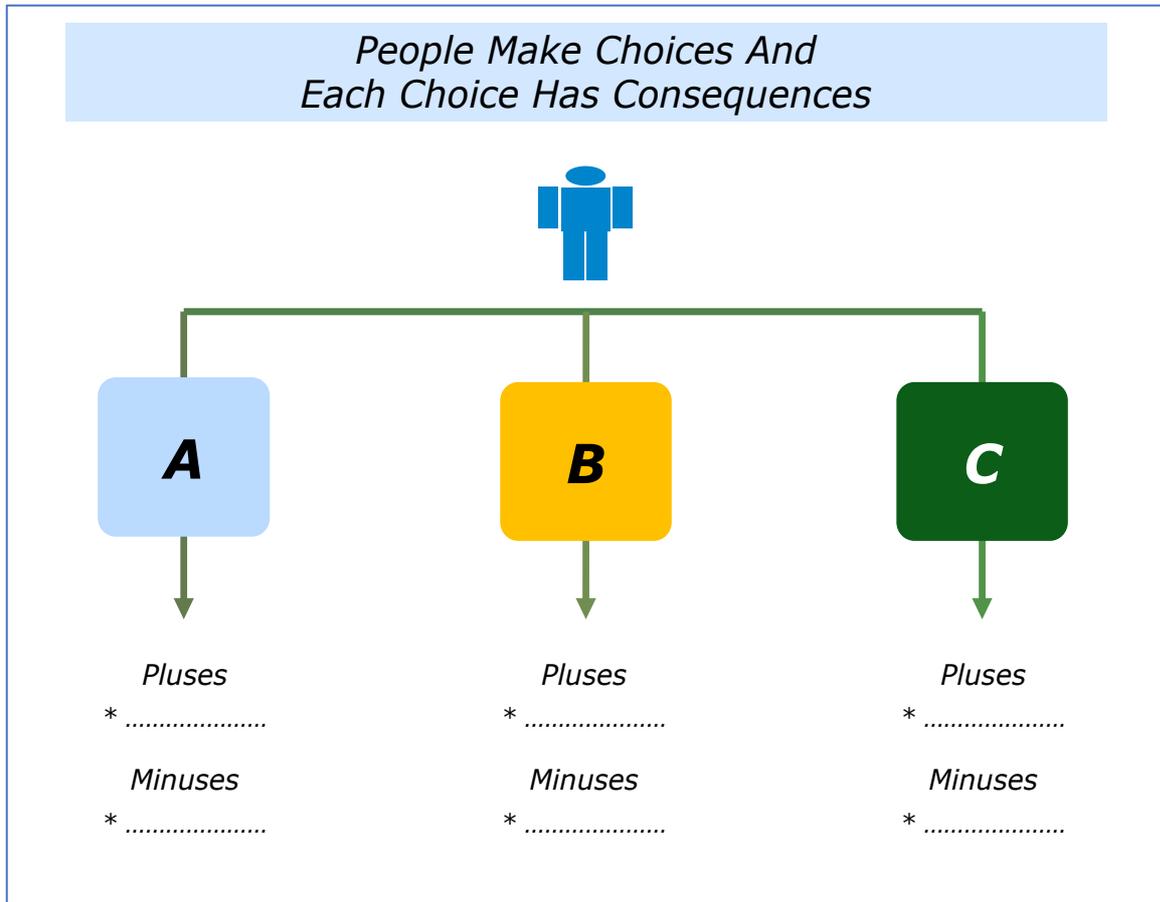

They start by clarifying what the person wants to learn. They then aim to make the learning personal, practical and profitable.

- Personal – It relates to the person’s agenda and goals.
- Practical – It provides practical tools that the person can use to achieve their goals.
- Profitable – It aims to be, in the widest sense, profitable and helps the person to achieve their goals.

Choices And Consequences

People make choices all the time. They can choose to help people or to hurt people, to be grateful or to be grumpy, to give to other people or grab from other people.

Each choice has consequences. This book explores how you can encourage both present and future generations.

Many encouragers are caring but they can also be tough. They aim to build on the positive majority of people and not to pander to the psychopathic minority.

The positive majority of people want to live in peace. They want to build on what they have in common and find creative solutions to challenges.

People can sometimes be affected, however, by the psychopathic minority who want to poison the atmosphere. This can lead to collateral damage in which innocent people suffer.

Encouragers often take the together view of life rather than the tribal view of life. The together approach believes that we can combine our strengths and shape a positive future. We can also aim to find win-win solutions.

People who take the tribal view identify only with those who appear to be in the same tribe. They have little respect for those who are different. They try to make sure they win and other people lose.

Some people go through certain stages in their lives. They move from being protestors to being problem solvers to being positive contributors.

Some people contribute by caring for others in their work as nurses, counsellors, key workers, mediators, designers, scientists or in other roles. Some aim to serve something greater than themselves.

Some aim to serve something greater than themselves. They may choose:

To serve a spiritual faith, a set of values or a philosophy ... To serve a purpose, a mission or a cause ... To serve a vocation, a creative drive or a project.

The following pages provide many practical tools that you can use in your own way. Here are some points about the writing style in this book.

Some sections can be read and used in a standalone way. This means there is some repetition in parts of the book. Skip these if you feel the aspects have been covered elsewhere.

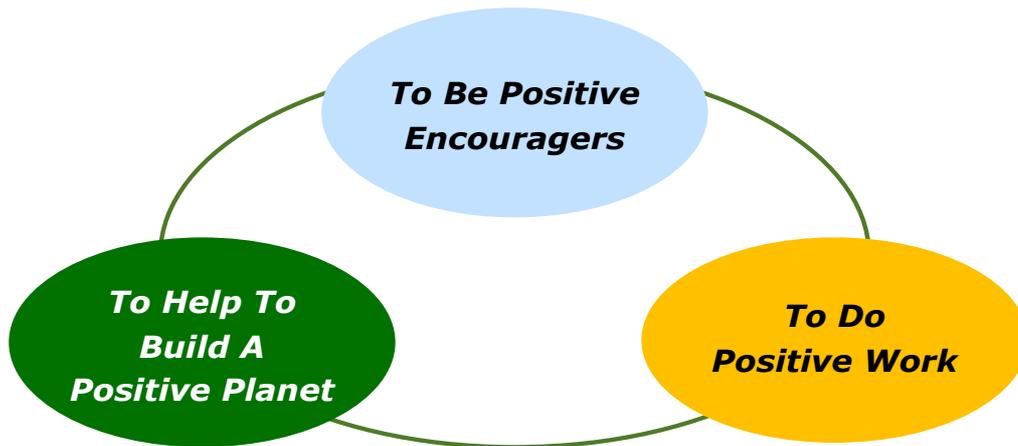

Parts of the book are laid out in short sections to make it easier for the reader to copy and use. Take the ideas you like and use these in your own way to encourage people.

There is also lots of alliteration in the book. This approach has both pluses and minuses. The pluses are that it makes the concepts easy to remember. The minuses are that it can be dismissed as facile. Hopefully the following pages show there is some depth behind the ideas.

There are many ways to help people. The following chapters explore how we can continue to be positive encouragers, do positive work and help to build a positive planet.

The Positive Encourager's Approach

They are many ways to live life. One approach is to encourage people during our time on the planet. It is:

Continuing To Be A Positive Encourager

Introduction

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you encouraged a person? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

What did you do right then to encourage the person? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these principles into action? What happened as a result of you taking these steps?

Being An Encourager

The specific situation when I encouraged a person was:

The specific things I did then to encourage them were:

Encouragers are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They see what is actually happening and want to shape a positive future.

They want to encourage and enable people to achieve success. Here is an introduction to the encouragement approach.

Most people want similar things in life. They want to be healthy, hopeful and happy. Many people love to have a sense of purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success. They may also want to find a sense of peace.

The encouragement approach is based on what works. It studies what works, simplifies what works – but in a profound way – and shares what works. It aims to enable people to achieve success.

The Encouragement Approach

The approach starts by creating a positive environment and clarifying a person's picture of success. It then provides practical tools that they can use:

- To build on their strengths, follow successful strategies and achieve success;
- To find solutions to challenges by focusing on clarity, creativity and concrete results;
- To maintain a sense of purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success.

There are many ways to encourage people. You can offer them practical, personal or professional encouragement.

Practical Encouragement

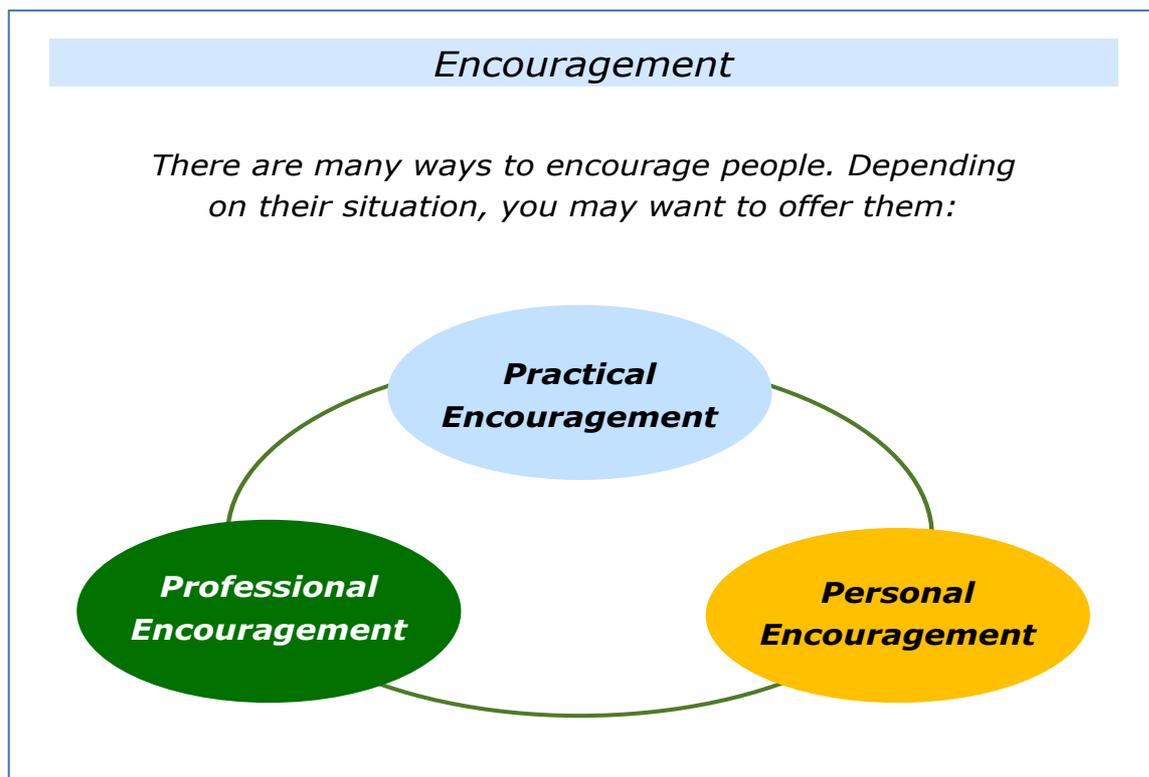

This can involve providing people with the basic materials for life. It can mean making sure they have the food, shelter and other resources needed to maintain their health, hope and happiness.

Personal Encouragement

This can involve giving people the love and support they need to develop. It can mean helping a person to follow their principles and work towards achieving their picture of success.

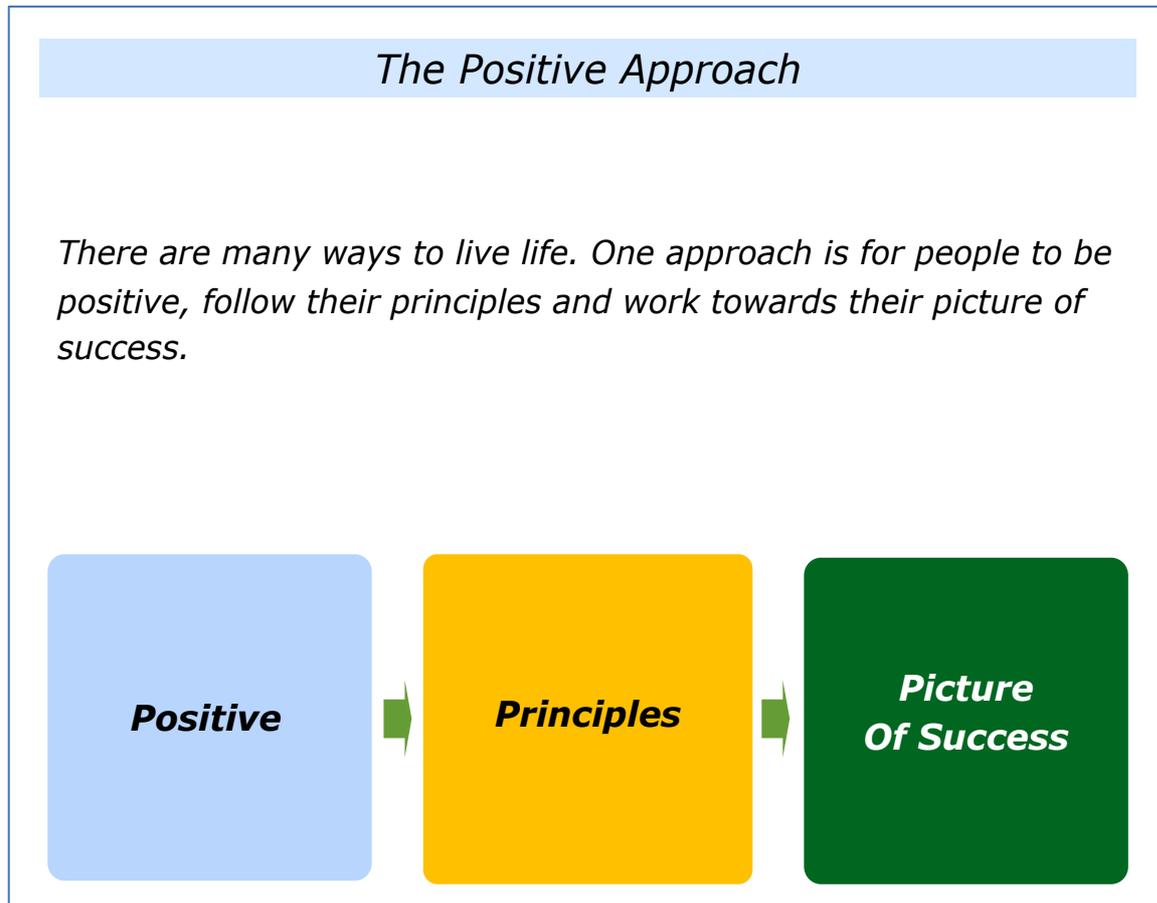

Professional Encouragement

This can involve helping people to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and achieve specific goals. It can also mean helping them to pass on their knowledge and leave a positive legacy.

Different people encourage others in different ways. Some do it by giving them practical help, some by acting as good models, some by spreading hope. Let's consider the steps that this may involve.

The Positive Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is for people to be positive, follow their principles and work towards their picture of success. This is an approach followed by many people, teams and organisations.

Different people follow these themes in different ways. Let's explore how some people translate these into action.

Positive

People who take this approach are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. Bearing this in mind, they often choose:

To be positive rather than negative ... To be creators rather than complainers ... To take responsibility rather than avoid responsibility ... To help people rather than hurt people.

They aim to build on their strengths rather than their shortcomings. They focus on what they can control rather than what they can't control. They aim to do their best during their time on the planet.

They are good at seeing patterns in the areas where they excel. They then aim: a) to build on the successful patterns; b) to stop the unsuccessful patterns; c) to follow the strategies most likely to achieve success.

Positive realists are good at seeing possibilities. They have a history of studying success and clarifying what works in certain situations. Bearing this in mind, they often enjoy finding creative solutions to problems.

Such people are good at positive reframing. They reframe situations to focus on: a) the positive possibilities; b) the possible ways forward; c) the practical things they can do to achieve their picture of success.

Some people take this approach even when facing daunting challenges. Let's look at two people who took these steps.

Alice Herz-Sommer – Choosing To Have A Positive Attitude

Alice Herz-Sommer was somebody who chose to have a positive attitude to life. A pianist and survivor of Nazi concentration camps, she continued to be optimistic well past the age of 100.

Her view of life reached a wider audience after an interview she gave to the BBC became popular on the web. "Life is beautiful," said Alice, and explained this in the following way.

"I have lived through many wars and have lost everything many times – including my husband, my mother and my beloved son."

"Yet, life is beautiful, and I have so much to learn and enjoy. I have no space nor time for pessimism and hate.

"And life is beautiful, love is beautiful, nature and music are beautiful.

"Everything we experience is a gift, a present we should cherish and pass on to those we love."

Life brings pain and beauty, said Alice, but she believed the secret of happiness was to focus on what is really important. She focused on gratitude, kindness, nature, music and the joyful things in life.

Caroline Stoessinger gave an insight to Alice's approach in her book A Century of Wisdom: Lessons from the Life of Alice Herz-Sommer. She provided a series of quotes in which Alice explained her philosophy. These included the following.

"Gratitude is essential for happiness ... Only when we are old do we realise the beauty of life ... Music is a dream ... It takes you to paradise ... I am richer than the world's richest people, because I am a musician ... Music saved my life ... Music is God.

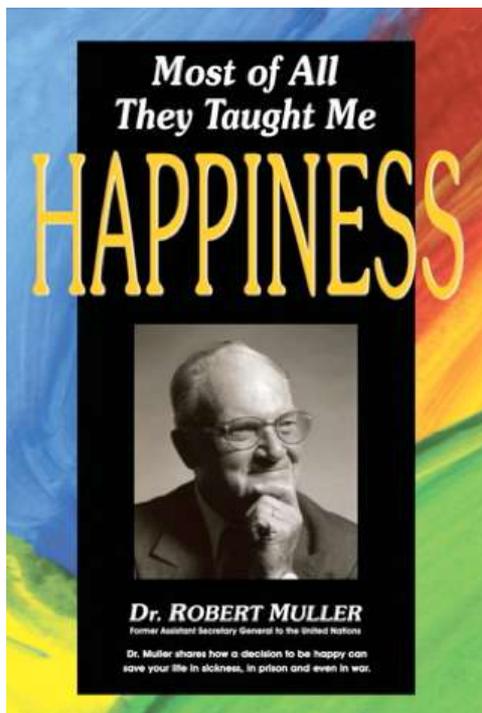

"Every day is a miracle. No matter how bad my circumstances, I have the freedom to choose my attitude to life, even to find joy. Evil is not new. It is up to us how we deal with both good and bad. No one can take this power away from us.

"My optimism has helped me through my darkest days. It helps me now ... The more I read, think and speak with people, the more I realise just how happy I am ... When I die I can have a good feeling ... I have done my best ... I believe I lived my life the right way."

People who take this approach do what they enjoy because this gives them strength to give to others. Alice did this through playing music and reflecting on the beautiful things in life.

Robert Muller – Reframing Challenging Situations

Robert Muller, an Assistant General Secretary of the United Nations, was somebody who took these steps. He reframed challenging situations as a chance to find creative solutions. Here is a summary of his approach.

Robert Muller faced many challenges when working at the United Nations. He chose to believe it was possible to build on what people had in common and find solutions.

Sometimes this could take time, but he remembered what his parents and grandparents taught him. He focused on helping others rather than being concerned about himself. He said:

"Today, whenever despair menaces me, I hasten to count my blessings, I concentrate on one of them, and almost forthwith my worry vanishes or takes on a more reasonable proportion."

Robert focused on the opportunities in many challenging situations. He adopted this approach as a student when he was hunted by the Nazis during the Second World War.

One day he found himself trapped in an attic on the top floor of an hotel that also served as an office building. Several Nazis entered the reception area and asked people where they could find Robert. How could he escape the hunters?

Drawing on his positive attitude to life, Robert began thinking of creative solutions. He explained his approach in the following way.

"I was a great fan of Hollywood films, so I decided to see the situation as taking part in a film. I was being hunted, so how could I find a way to escape?"

David Gillies takes up the story in his biography about Robert called The Hatmaker's Son. Here are excerpts from David's book.

Robert took several deep breaths.

"I must overcome my fear and think rationally," he decided. This was the moment of moments to be creative.

"What an opportunity, what a tremendous adventure – a 20-year- old student trapped by Nazis in a fancy hotel. Won't it be great if I slip through their fingers?"

Robert took a few minutes to consider his options. The Nazis had some idea what he looked like but they probably had an old photo. How could he take on a different persona?

The hunters were also expecting to find a cowering student trying to hide in the milling crowds on each floor of the building. How could he be ingenious and do what the Nazis least expected?

Robert settled on his plan and began translating it into action. This involved making his way down four floors from the attic and walking out onto the street.

Putting a thick file under his arm, he exuded an air of authority as he made his way from floor to floor. Nonchalantly smoking a cigarette, he passed various groups of people.

Reaching the ground floor he approached a group of Nazis who were quizzing the receptionist. She chose not to recognise him, even though she was being threatened.

Robert went up to the Nazis and asked what was happening. They replied they were looking for Louis Parizot (the name by which Robert was known in the building).

He responded by saying he had seen Parizot on the top floor. Just like in a film, the Nazis rushed up the stairs. Robert then made his way out onto the street and rode away on a bike.

Robert faced many challenges in life, but he tried to see things in perspective. During a time spent in prison he focused on how he could appreciate life and give to others.

Strongly influenced by his parents and grandparents, he aimed to help others and build a better world. He continued to apply this approach throughout his life.

Thankful for the love he had been given, Robert kept returning to this positive philosophy. Even in the darkest hours, he had a sense of gratitude. He then applied his skills to help people to build on what they had in common and find positive solutions.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to continue to have a positive attitude in the future. How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try completing the following sentence.

Positive Attitude

The specific things I can do to continue to have a positive attitude in my life are:

Principles

People who take the positive approach often follow their chosen principles and aim to translate these into action. Doing what they believe in gives them strength.

Such a person may follow certain moral principles, a spiritual faith or another belief system. They keep referring to this inner compass when making decisions in their daily lives.

What are the principles that you aim to follow in your life or work? Different people give different answers to this question. Here are some of the themes they mention.

*My Principles – The principles
I try to follow in my life are:*

*To be grateful ... To encourage people ... To see every day as a bonus ...
To care for nature ... To create beauty ... To use my talents to help people ... To do quality work ... To give people positive memories for life.*

Different people aim to follow their principles in different ways. Martin Seligman and Christopher Peterson focused on a related theme in their book Character Strengths and Virtues. Here is one definition of virtues:

Virtues are behaviours showing high moral standards. They are how we practice and demonstrate character. They are how we translate our values or principles into action.

Working with a team of researchers, they studied examples of positive traits and moral excellence that are admired across different philosophies, religions and cultures.

The researchers interviewed over 15,000 people in different cultures. After extensive research, the team settled on six key virtues – admired ways of behaving - though these are obviously interlinked. Martin explains their approach in the following way.

When we look we see that there are six virtues, which we find endorsed across cultures, and these break down into 24 strengths.

The six virtues that we find are non-arbitrary - first, a wisdom and knowledge cluster; second, a courage cluster; third, virtues like love and humanity; fourth, a justice cluster; fifth a temperance, moderation cluster; and sixth a spirituality, transcendence cluster.

We sent people up to northern Greenland, and down to the Masai, and are involved in a 70-nation study in which we look at the ubiquity of these.

Indeed, we're beginning to have the view that those six virtues are just as much a part of human nature as walking on two feet are.

Positive Traits

The six human virtues and the 24 character strengths that are admired across cultures

- Wisdom and Knowledge Creativity, curiosity, judgment, love of learning, perspective.
- Courage Bravery, persistence, honesty, zest.
- Humanity Love, kindness, social intelligence.
- Justice Teamwork (citizenship, loyalty, social responsibility), fairness, leadership.
- Temperance Forgiveness, humility, prudence, self-regulation.
- Transcendence Appreciation of beauty and excellence, gratitude, hope, humour, spirituality.

Let's return to the question we asked earlier. What are the principles you want to follow in your life? How do you try to translate these into action? What are the reasons why you want to follow these principles? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Principles
The principles I want to follow in my life are:   *

Picture Of Success

People who have a positive attitude often aim to follow their principles and express these by working towards a certain picture of success. Let's look at some examples.

They may aim to encourage people in their daily lives. They may aim to build a happy family, help people to do satisfying work, provide medical care or do another activity that enables people to achieve their goals.

They may aim to build on their strengths and do superb work. They may aim to create an inspiring school, run a sports academy, lead a pioneering team or create a culture in which people can thrive.

They may aim to find solutions to challenges. They may aim to work as mediator, use technology to improve people's lives or pass on knowledge that helps people to shape a positive future.

People who take this approach start by clarifying the real results they want to achieve. They then aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

The Picture Of Success

The specific thing I want to work towards achieving is:

Different people follow elements of this approach in their own ways. Here is one example.

Jo Berry, Patrick Magee and Building Bridges For Peace

Jo Berry is dedicated to helping people to build on their common humanity. She created the organisation called Building Bridges For Peace. Later we will look at Patrick's contribution to this remarkable work, but first here are Jo's words.

On October 12th 1984 my father, Sir Anthony Berry and four others were killed in the bombing of the Grand Hotel, Brighton as they attended the Conservative Party Conference.

Two months later I randomly shared a taxi with a young Irish man whose brother had been in the IRA and had been killed by a British soldier.

We should have been enemies but instead we talked about a world where peace was possible and where there were no enemies. As I left the taxi, I had a flash of inspiration, this was one way I could make a difference, I could build a bridge across the divide.

I made a personal decision just two days later, to bring something positive out of this emotionally shattering trauma and to try and understand those who had killed him.

I chose to give up blame and revenge, instead taking responsibility for my pain and feelings, transforming them into passion for peace.

The journey of healing began with my intention and I trusted that life would then bring me the opportunities to heal and grow.

The hardest bridge to build was with Patrick Magee, who was sentenced for his part in planting the Brighton bomb and released as part of the Good Friday Peace Agreement in 1999.

I made enquiries from mutual friends and finally met Pat for the first time in November 2000 at a friend's house in Dublin.

My intention was to hear his story so that I could experience him as a human being rather than a faceless enemy. I was scared and had doubts, but the strongest part of me needed to see him and speak to him.

I asked him many questions and shared a little about my Dad. At first he began to express his political perspective, which though I was familiar with was hard to hear but I could see he was a sensitive and intelligent person.

Then something changed. He stopped talking and said he didn't know who he was any more, he wanted to hear my anger, my pain and what could he do to help.

It was as if he had taken off his political hat and had now opened up and became vulnerable. The conversation was very different after that and a new journey started, one which we are still on.

He now had a need to meet me and rediscover his lost humanity. When he planted the bomb he was not seeing human beings in the hotel, they were just a means to an end.

During our meetings, he began to develop the awareness that he had killed a human being with a soul, someone he could have sat down and had a cup of tea with.

He would later say that he was disarmed by the empathy I gave him, that he would have found it easier if I had met him shouting, blaming and defending my position. I wasn't there to argue my point; I was there to listen and experience his humanity.

After three hours I could not talk anymore and ended our meeting by thanking him for his willingness to engage with me so honestly and he said he was sorry he had killed my Dad.

Patrick brings courage and humility to the process of building bridges for peace. Here is an extract from his story.

I was released from prison in 1999, having served 14 years under the terms of the Good Friday Agreement. Whilst in prison I completed a PhD examining the representation of Irish Republicans in 'Troubles' fiction.

It was important for me as part of the peace process in North of Ireland to recognise that now we should engage with former enemies and political opponents, addressing the needs and grievances of victims, helping to break down differences by explaining ourselves to the other.

For 27 years I was a committed member of the IRA, whether on active service, on the run or in prison. I spent a total of 17 years either interned or sentenced because of my involvement.

A crucial part of that legacy is the need to look back over the conflict and to understand it in terms of the many conflicting perspectives. That will entail ensuring that many voices previously excluded or misrepresented must now be heard, including the voices of the victims.

In that light, as an individual, I agreed to meet Jo. Her father, Sir Anthony Berry had been killed, along with four others, in the IRA's attack on the Grand Hotel. I had planted the bomb.

So, on the day, I was there to explain, in essence to justify, the armed struggle; and specifically 'Why Brighton'. I was wearing a political hat. We talked for three hours. But something happened during that first encounter.

Jo's openness, calmness; her apparent lack of hostility – in fact her willingness to listen and to try to understand, disarmed me. Had Jo instead shown anger, however justifiable, it would for me have been easier to cope with.

The political hat would have remained firmly attached. But in the presence of such composure and decency, as I said, I felt disarmed. It was a cathartic moment.

It didn't matter that as a former member of the IRA I could politically justify my past actions in terms of the legitimacy of the struggle.

As an individual I carried the heavy weight of knowing I had caused profound hurt to this woman. I expressed a need to really hear what she had to say and to help her come to terms with her loss, if that were possible:

'I want to hear your anger, to hear your pain.'

A political obligation henceforth became a personal obligation. I now realised more fully that I was guilty of something I had attributed to the other: that our enemies demonised, dehumanised, marginalised, reduced us.

In agreeing to meet me that first occasion and in continuing to meet me she has demonstrated a truly admirable, strength and purpose in her endeavour to try to make sense of her loss and her preparedness to listen to my perspective.

No matter what we can achieve as two human beings meeting after a terrible event, the loss remains. Neither forgiveness nor understanding can fully embrace that loss.

The hope lies in the fact we continue to meet in order to further this mutual process towards understanding.

Let's return again to Jo's story and her words. Here is how she summarises some key themes in the work of Building Bridges For Peace.

I passionately believe that there is humanity in everyone, and every time we demonise the "other" we are delaying the onset of peace in this world.

Once we find our own humanity, and we see the humanity in the other, then we are going to want them to have their human rights, their good housing, food, medicine, education and freedom to be themselves, to be safe and secure.

We will want for them all what we want for ourselves. Peace happens when we treasure everyone, all creatures, our land, our planet, and work together to find solutions in which everyone wins.

Choosing To Work Towards A Picture Of Success

There are many ways to live life. This piece has looked at how some people aim to be positive, follow their principles and work towards a picture of success.

Different people do this in different ways. Some people take the following steps.

They choose to have a positive attitude, focus on what they can control and clarify the real results they want to achieve. They translate these into a clear picture of success.

They clarify the principles they want to follow in the situation. They then clarify strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving the picture of success.

They clarify their action plan, prepare properly and rehearse what they are going to do. They then aim to perform superb work, keep improving and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you continue to have a positive attitude? How can you follow your principles? How can you then do your best to achieve your picture of success? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Gratitude Approach

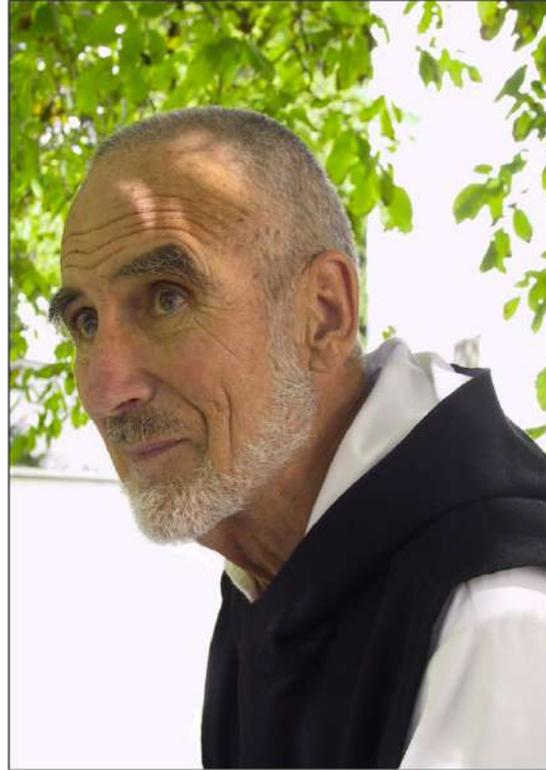

"The root of joy is gratefulness.

"It is not joy that makes us grateful; it is gratitude that makes us joyful.

"Count your blessings and you will find them to be countless, even in the midst of adversity and tragic circumstances.

"What we really want is joy. We don't want things."

Brother David

People who encourage others often count their blessings rather than their burdens. Bearing this in mind, they often want to be generous and give to other people.

The starting point is feeling grateful for what they have been given in life. They then want to express this feeling and help others during their time on the planet.

Grateful people appreciate their assets. They focus on what they do have rather than worry about what they don't have. Brother David Steindl-Rast described this philosophy in the following way.

"Gratefulness is the key to a happy life that we hold in our hands, because if we are not grateful, then no matter how much we have we will not be happy - because we will always want to have something else or something more."

There is a joy in gratitude, says Brother David. The more grateful we are, the more reasons we see to be grateful and this develops our inner strength.

We get more ability to give to others and this can become a virtuous circle. We sow seeds that can spread joy in the world.

What are the things you are grateful for being given in your life? We will explore these theme in more depth later in this chapter.

In the meantime, however, you may wish to tackle the following exercise. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Assets Approach

How to cultivate a sense of gratitude? One approach is to focus on your assets. Let's explore this approach.

Everybody experiences difficulties. Sometimes it can be useful to offer them tools they can use to deal with challenges. Certainly this is the case when helping people to recover from deep traumas.

Some individuals can become obsessed with their angst, however, and go around in circles. They keep talking about what is wrong with their lives. People can be helped to deal with real challenges but they may also need to shift their attention.

Building On Your Assets When Tackling Adversity

Several ago I had a session with Dave. He had become depressed in his job and fallen into a negative spiral. Bearing this in mind, I invited him to do the exercise called My Personal And Professional Assets. This invited him to clarify and build on these assets.

Within 30 minutes Dave had turned himself around. He aimed to tackle the challenges at work but also appreciate his true wealth. He explained this in the following way.

"I have good health, a fantastic wife and two lovely children. We have good friends, a home, a garden and a bit of money in the bank.

"I also have a lot of drive, energy and skills that can help companies to improve. I need to get out and give to people in my network, because this could lead to other opportunities.

"I must tackle the issue at work but it is solvable, even if it means moving to a new job. Sometimes I have the occasional sulk, but I can limit that to ten minutes. I can then get my act together and try to succeed.

"Today it has been good to take stock of my assets. Maybe it would also be good for me to sit down with my wife and do a similar exercise. We can build on what we have and plan our next move forward."

What are your personal assets? You may have a positive attitude, a strong drive and good imagination. You may have reasonable health, a caring family and encouraging friends. You may be resilient, focused and able to find creative solutions to challenges.

What are your professional assets? You may have particular strengths and the ability to do strategic thinking. You may be good at helping certain kinds of people to succeed. You may also have a wide professional network of people of friends, customers and potential employers.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe your personal and professional assets.

The Building On What You Have Approach

Building On What You Have

People can choose to take the following routes. They can choose either:

- To build on what they have;
- To add to what they have;
- To worry about what they don't have.

Different people choose different approaches to using their assets. The approach they take can colour how they feel about their lives and work. Let's explore some of these approaches.

Some people build on what they have Great workers take this approach to their assets. They aim to apply their specific talents as gardeners, athletes, crafts workers or doing other activities. They then translate these into stimulating projects.

Some individuals who have accidents take a similar approach. They wave aside sympathy, saying that other people face much greater challenges. Such a person may say things like:

"I still have my sight, hearing and have great support in my life. I am going to focus on what I can do rather than what I can't do."

Great teams take a similar approach. They aim to build on their strengths and their successful patterns – the strategies they find work for them. They then do their best to achieve success.

Some people develop and sometimes, when appropriate, add to what they have Great workers continue to develop their specific talents. They also, when appropriate, aim to add certain skills. Sometimes they find this is possible. Sometimes they work with people who are better at using the desired skills.

Some individuals focus on becoming brilliant at a specific activity. They then add people or resources that can take care of the basics. This releases them to do what they do best and do their best.

Great teams aim to enable their team members to develop their talents. They may also get to the stage where they add people or resources that can help them to achieve peak performance.

Some people worry about what they don't have

Some individuals spend lots of time worrying about the things they don't have. Sometimes this is understandable – such as when they do not have the basic materials for life. They then need support to be able to shape their future.

Some people become addicted to focusing on what they don't have. They may become depressed, resentful or jealous of others. This approach does not necessarily help them or other people.

Let's return to your own life and work. How can you continue to build on and apply what you have? How can you develop and, when appropriate, add to what you have? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Generous Approach

There are many models for encouraging people. One approach is to be generous, to give to people and to help them grow. Let's explore these themes.

Generosity

Generous people are often grateful for what they have been given. They remember the love, encouragement and chances they have been given by other people. Experiencing a sense of gratitude, they want to pass on similar experiences to other people.

Different people learn about generosity in different ways. Some learn it from spiritual or religious traditions. Some spiritual faiths, for example, encourage people:

To be grateful for what they have been given – whether this be life, food, love or other experiences;

To pass on gratitude by sharing food, being hospitable to strangers or showing compassion in their daily lives.

Some people learn from friends, teachers, leaders and others who embody the spirit of generosity. Some describe experiencing a certain culture – a school, team or workplace – that encouraged people to give to others.

Some people talk about critical points in their lives when they chose to be generous rather than greedy. They found that being caring led to both themselves and others feeling better.

Some people who had difficult childhoods talk about the importance of an encouraging grandparent, teacher, coach or other significant person. They had somebody who helped them to believe in themselves during difficult times.

This highlights the importance of what the psychoanalyst Harry Stack Sullivan called Significant Others. He coined this term in the 1950s before it was used to indicate a spouse or partner.

The Significant Other theme is also present in many stories, books and films about people making transitions in life. Virtually every rite of passage story has such a character who helps the protagonist on their journey.

The question is: Why do such people take the time to encourage certain people? When asked, the significant other may say things like:

"I saw something in the person ... Everybody deserves the chance to be listened to ... It didn't cost anything and hopefully it helped ... I was encouraged by somebody when I was younger."

Many generous people like to give to others but they are not gullible. They err on the side of giving people opportunities but they do not choose to become victims.

The University of Notre Dame website provides a summary regarding how the word generosity has developed over the ages. The present English word derived from Latin and originally meant of Noble Birth.

During the Middle Ages this evolved into meaning a nobility of spirit thought to be associated with high birth. The University's site adds:

In this way generosity increasingly came in the 17th Century to signify a variety of traits of character and action historically associated (whether accurately or not) with the ideals of actual nobility: gallantry, courage, strength, richness, gentleness, and fairness.

Since then the word has become increasingly associated with people who demonstrate generosity of spirit.

Let's return to your own life. Looking back, who have been the people who have been generous to you? You may have had parents, teachers, friends, coaches, managers, mentors or other people who encouraged you.

What did they do to be generous? They may have given you time, encouragement, practical help, knowledge or other things that helped you to grow. What happened as a result of them being generous to you?

Giving

Generous people like to give to others. Such people often believe in the circle of life. They believe that being kind to others, for example, can increase the chances of kindness being spread around the world.

One approach is to be a giver rather than a taker. Adam Grant described how some people take this approach in his book Give and Take. Below is an excerpt from the Brain Pickings website that provided a summary of the book.

Adam Grant's Work On Givers, Matchers And Takers

Givers

They aim to give to other people and help them to succeed. They often experience the helper's high.

Matchers

They aim to match other people in terms of giving and taking on a relatively equal basis.

Takers

They aim to take from other people in ways that benefit themselves.

Givers prefer to give more than they get. Takers tend to be self-focused, evaluating what other people can offer them. Givers are other-focused and pay attention to what other people need from them.

If you're a giver at work, you simply strive to be generous in sharing your time, energy, knowledge, skills, ideas, and connections with other people who can benefit from them.

In the workplace, however, few of us are purely givers or takers - rather, what dominates is a third style. We become matchers, striving to preserve an equal balance of giving and getting.

Matchers operate on the principle of fairness: when they help others, they protect themselves by seeking reciprocity. If you're a matcher, you believe in tit for tat, and your relationships are governed by even exchanges of favours.

Giving, taking and matching are three fundamental styles of social interaction, but the lines between them aren't hard and fast. You might find that you shift from one reciprocity style to another as you travel across different work roles and relationships.

Givers, takers and matchers all can - and do - achieve success. But there's something distinctive that happens when givers succeed: it spreads and cascades.

Givers succeed in a way that creates a ripple effect, enhancing the success of people around them.

The main reason for being a giver is to help other people but there may be other by-products. People often feel good after helping others.

They can experience a rush, followed by a sense of calm. It is as if they have served something much greater than themselves. Sometimes they experience what is called the helper's high.

Allan Luks and Peggy Payne underlined these themes in their book The Healing Power of Doing Good. They found that people who helped others also received benefits themselves.

Kamran Mofid described the work done by Allan and Peggy in an article called Build a Better World: The Healing Power of Doing Good. Here are excerpts from the article.

Based on national research that Allan did 20 years ago, he introduced the term 'Helper's High' - the powerful physical feelings people experience when directly helping others - to explain the real benefits to volunteers' physical and emotional health.

People have known for ages that helping others is good for the soul. But the study that Allan Luks conducted of over 3000 male and female volunteers has proven it is good for the body and mental health too.

His research concluded that regular helpers are 10 times more likely to be in good health than people who don't volunteer.

And that there's an actual biochemical explanation: volunteering reduces the body's stress and also releases endorphins, the brain's natural painkillers.

Giving To Other People

- It can contribute the maintenance of good health and diminish the effect of minor and serious psychological and physical diseases and disorders.
- It can lead to feelings of joyfulness, emotional resilience, and vigour and can reduce the unhealthy sense of isolation. It can reverse feelings of depression.
- It can lead to a sense of self-worth, greater happiness and optimism is increased and feelings of helplessness and depression decrease.
- It can lead to an affiliative connection with someone (a friendship, relationship, love, or some sort of positive bonding) and emotions that can strengthen the immune system.

Some people get their highs by helping people in their daily lives. The positive majority of people take this route. They love to encourage other people when acting as parents, educators, coaches, leaders, trusted advisors or playing other roles.

Some individuals help others directly – such as when working as a nurse, teacher, hospitality worker or in the caring professions. Some may do so more indirectly – such as when working as a software developer, scientist, researcher, architect or another profession.

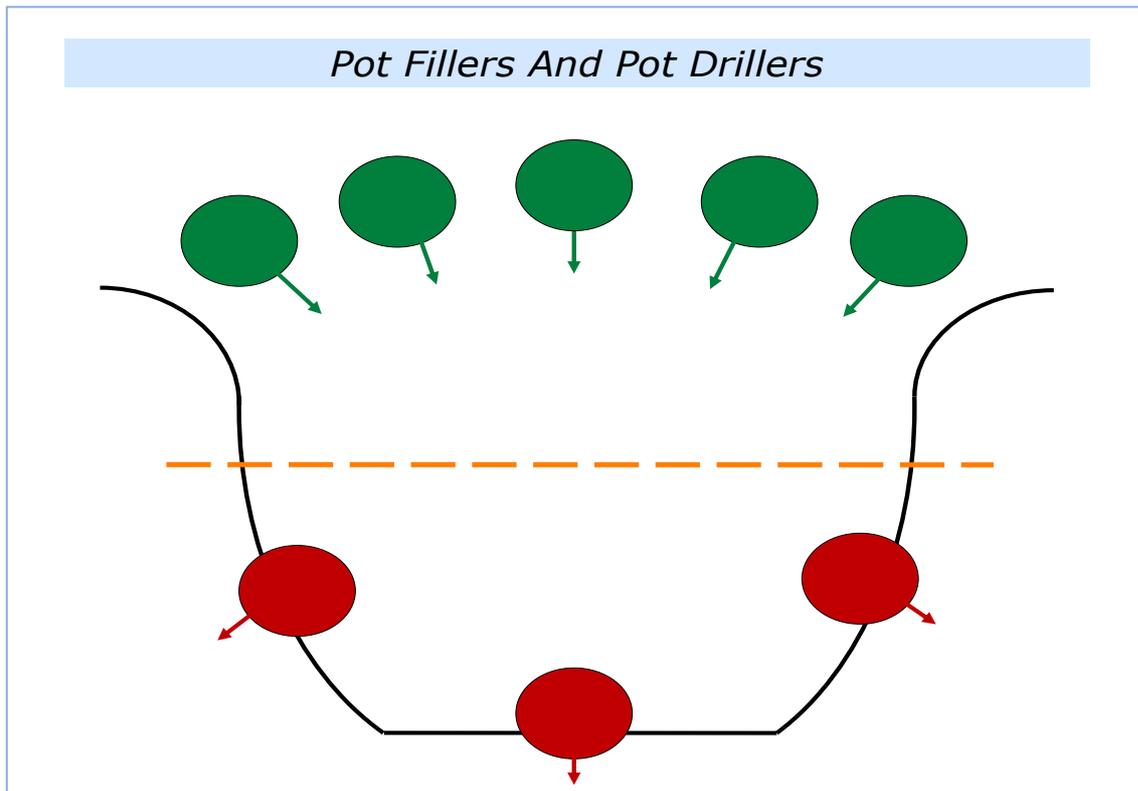

Different people give to others in different ways. Some keep asking themselves the following questions.

What Can I Give Today?

- What is happening in people's lives? What are the challenges they face? What may be their pictures of success?
- What can I give to help people to tackle these challenges? How can I give these things in a way that helps them to succeed?
- How can I keep encouraging both present and future generations? What else can I do to help people to achieve their pictures of success?

Different people focus on different things when giving to others. Some people focus on the following theme.

The Pot Filler Rather Than Pot Driller Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. One way is to be a pot filler rather than a pot driller. This approach is based on the work of Virginia Satir, a great family therapist.

Virginia introduced this idea in the 1960s. It was later adapted by many other people, but it is worth revisiting her work. She invited people to see their self-confidence as a pot.

Sometimes they would have lots of confidence in the pot, other times they would have little. Sometimes this was related to whether they were surrounded by pot fillers or pot drillers. She outlined this concept in her books, such as Peoplemaking.

If you wish, it can be worthwhile doing this exercise yourself. You can then focus on how to be a pot filler and, if appropriate, invite other people to do the exercise. They can focus on how to spend more time with fillers rather than drillers.

Clarifying your own level of self-confidence

Imagine you are looking at your own level of confidence. Try tackling the following exercise. Start by drawing an imaginary pot.

Looking at the pot, draw a line that corresponds with how high you feel your self-confidence is today.

If you have high confidence, draw it high up the pot. If your confidence is low, draw it at a lower point in the pot. The next step explores why it may be at this level.

Clarifying your pot fillers and pot drillers

Write the names of your pot fillers. These are the people who give you encouragement and energy. You look forward to seeing them and feel more alive after meeting them.

Describe the things you do to give yourself energy. You may enjoy listening to music, gardening, being with animals, designing beautiful things or doing other activities.

If you have lots of things that give you positive energy, then your pot will be overflowing. You will then be more able to pass on encouragement to other people.

Pot Fillers

The people who encourage me and fill my pot are:

The specific things I do to encourage myself and fill my own pot are:

Write the names of the pot drillers. These are people who sap energy. They leave you feeling drained and discouraged. The more significant they are in your life, the nearer they will be to the base.

Pot Drillers

The people who I allow to drill my pot are:

The specific things I do to drill my own pot are:

You may also do things to drill holes in your own pot. One athlete continually criticised himself with negative self-talk after competitions. Reviewing performances is vital, but he devoted 90% of his energy to focusing on his failures, rather than his successes.

He finally managed to change his script by adopting a different approach. After each performance he focused on: a) the specific things I did well and how I can do more of these things in the future; b) the specific things I can do better next time and how.

Some people may be both pot fillers and pot drillers. They may have a pleasing–hurting pattern. Sometimes they do things to please people and then, without warning, they lash out. Clarify the specific things these people do to encourage or drain you.

Clarifying how to raise your level of self-confidence

How can you continue to raise your confidence and also encourage other people? Below are some suggestions you may wish to consider.

You may want to spend more time with the people who give you energy. If possible, work with colleagues you find stimulating. People often find that, as they get older, they spend more time with personal and professional soul mates.

Do more of the things you love. You may enjoy listening to music, skiing, visiting the theatre or doing other things. Pursuing these activities will put more energy into your pot.

Spend less time - or no time - with the people who drain energy. Radical changes are difficult to make overnight but, unless the holes are filled, encouragement will simply flow out of the bottom. Energy is life. You need pure energy, rather than poisonous energy.

Faced by a person who is difficult, one approach is to make positive suggestions regarding how you would like them to behave in the future.

You can also describe the benefits – both for themselves and others – of them behaving in that way.

Don't expect the person to respond immediately, but don't argue or fall into the blame game. What if the person refuses to respond? Make the decision whether you want to continue to see them.

Being an encourager and a pot filler for other people

You can do your best to encourage people. Keep giving but don't become a victim. Do not stay around to have your pot drilled by people who choose to be miserable or who are observer critics. When in doubt, ask yourself:

"Does this activity give me positive energy?"

If not, switch to spending time with the people and doing things that provide stimulation. You are then more likely to be a pot filler for other people.

Energy is life. So what gives you positive energy? How can you do more of these things in the future? Doing these can help to recharge your batteries. They can also give you more strength to give to other people. Let's explore this approach.

You Can Do The Things That Give You Positive Energy

What are the things that give you positive energy? Here are some answers that people give when exploring these themes.

Personal Life

The specific things that give me positive energy in my personal life are:

Being with our children ... Writing ... Looking after our garden ... Listening to the sound of falling water ... Singing in the choir ... Taking walks by myself ... Spending time with my partner ... Being with positive people ... Feeling I have a sense of purpose ... Following my principles.

Professional Life

The specific things that give me positive energy in my professional life are:

Encouraging people ... Caring for animals ... Designing things ... Playing to my strengths ... Doing stimulating projects ... Working with certain kinds of customers ... Being a trusted advisor ... Building successful prototypes ... Leading pioneering teams ... Helping people to achieve success.

This is an exercise that I used on workshops for individuals and groups. Each person wrote their lists on flip charts. They then formed pairs and shared what they had written. This set a positive tone for the sessions.

The exercise provided valuable information about the kinds of work that individuals found satisfying. Sometimes we were able to translate these into doing work that helped their colleagues or clients to achieve success.

Later we will look at an exercise regarding how you can do more of the things that give you positive energy. Before then, it can also be useful to explore the following theme.

You Can Encourage Other People To Do Things That Give Them Positive Energy

If appropriate, you can use this approach in your personal or professional life. You can use it with individuals, teams and even with organisations.

One approach is to encourage individuals to do things that give them positive energy. This could be your child, partner, friend, work colleague or another person. Again, only use it if you feel it may be appropriate.

Some people use the approach in their professional life. They may be working as a counsellor, teacher, therapist, coach, mentor, trusted advisor or in another professional role. They may be helping either:

*A young person who has difficulty at school ... A person who feels depressed ... A person who wants to regain a sense of purpose.
A person who wants to build on their strengths ... A person who wants to do satisfying work ... A person who want to make a positive contribution during their time on the planet.*

A team that wants to build on its strengths, do superb work and help its stakeholders to achieve success ... An organisation that wants to build successful prototypes that help to shape a positive future.

This approach may seem simple but it often works. It helps people to feel more alive and improve their wellbeing. It can also help them to maintain a positive attitude, do positive work and get positive results.

Let's return to your own life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

First, to describe the things that give you positive energy in your personal and professional life. Second, to describe how you can do more of these things in the future. Third, to describe the benefits of doing these things.

The What You Focus On You Become Approach

What we focus on we may become. If we focus on positive things, we may become more positive. If we focus on negative things, we may become more negative. This can affect both ourselves and other people.

Imagine you want to follow this principle in your own way. One approach is to start by focusing on the positive things in life. You may aim to develop a sense of gratitude, study success or do things that lift your spirit.

If appropriate, you can also encourage other people to focus on what gives them positive energy. This can sometimes help people to feel alive and creative. It can also help them to shape their future lives.

Another approach is to focus on possible solutions to challenges. You may do this by exploring the potential ways forwards and then, if appropriate, taking steps to achieve success.

Some people focus on negative things without exploring solutions. They may then become paralysed by taking poison into their system. This does not help anyone.

People should not ignore reality, of course, but it helps if they also study solutions. Let's explore how you can focus on what you want to become.

Positive Things

What are the positive things you focus on now? You may focus on encouraging your loved ones, appreciating your assets and doing things that give you energy.

Looking ahead, what are the positive things you want to focus on the future? You may want to appreciate life, play inspiring music, pass on knowledge, help others to succeed or do other things that lift your spirits.

What will be the benefits of taking these steps? What are you more likely to feel? What may be the feelings that you transmit to other people? What are you more likely to become?

Possible Solutions

How do you use your energy to find possible solutions to challenges? What are some of the challenges you may face? How do you buy time to reflect, explore the potential options and then take steps to tackle these issues successfully?

Do you spend time learning about how other people find solutions in various fields? You may do this when exploring the topics you find interesting.

You may be interested in wellbeing, education, personal development, sport, business, conflict resolution, climate change or other activities.

What do you do to explore how people find solutions to challenges in these areas?

Looking ahead, what do you want to do to focus on possible solutions in the future? What will be the benefits of taking these approach – both for yourself and for other people?

Negative Things

What are some of the negative things you focus on now? How does this affect you? What do you do to try to manage some of the feelings that you may experience?

Some societies assail their people with negative messages. The media reports bad news, whilst the powers-that-be spend their time arguing.

Even the most caring people can become disillusioned. Unfortunately this can also affect people around them. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Ten years ago I changed dramatically. Being a parent, I wanted my children to grow up happily. But then one day I got a shock.

"My son asked me: 'Is the world going to end?'

"My answer was, 'Of course not,' but I wanted to know why he asked the question.

"He had been looking at my doom and gloom environmental magazines. This was also embodied in the mood of despair I sometimes expressed when friends came round for dinner.

"Suddenly I took notice. I wanted to build a happier world, but I was poisoning my own home.

"Now I take magazines that show practical ways we can improve the world, rather than those that fill people with despair.

"It was a tough lesson."

Looking ahead, how do you want to deal with some of the potential negative things you notice? Different people do this in different ways. Here are some possibilities you may want to consider.

You can, when appropriate, avoid exposing yourself to negative things. There is little point listening to complainers who do not want to talk about solutions.

Much of the news media is still addicted to the old notion that 'if it bleeds it leads'. Some outlets now specialise in solutions journalism. This goes beyond describing the problem and provides solutions that have achieved success.

You may also want to learn how to manage triggers that lead to you feeling depressed or behaving in ways that depresses others. It can be important:

To recognise that the potential triggers that could lead to you going into negative spiral;

To avoid exposing yourself to such triggers;

To learn how to manage the triggers if, despite your best efforts, they do happen.

Let's return to your own life. Imagine that you want to continue to have a positive focus. How can you focus on the positive things and possible solutions? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

The Will Power And Way Power Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to help them to increase their way power. This involves adding to their repertoire of options for reaching their goals.

Rick Snyder described this approach in his book The Psychology Of Hope. Here is one of the key messages he gave in the book.

People feel more able to shape their futures when they score highly on both will power and way power.

Let's explore what which means in practice. Imagine that a person is facing a difficult challenge. They will have a strong sense of hope if, for example:

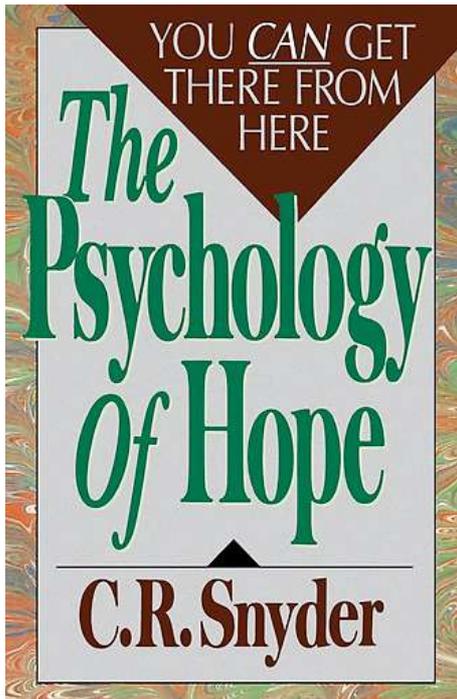

They score 8+/10 in terms of their will to solve the challenge;

They score 8+/10 in terms of seeing a way to solve the challenge.

The person will then feel confident about how to achieve their picture of success. This is because they score highly on both will power and way power.

This model also explains why a normally positive person can be confused if they feel depressed when facing a particular challenge. Their will power to solve the problem is 9+/10 but their present ability to see a way to solve it is perhaps 3/10.

Once the person sees a way to solve the problem, however, the cloud evaporates. Their way power goes up to 8+/10. Their sense of hope returns and they feel reinvigorated to tackle the challenge. Here are some of the key messages in The Psychology Of Hope.

People are more likely to have a sense of hope when they score highly on both will power and way power.

We can offer people positive models and practical tools that they can add to their repertoires.

People will then have more options they can use to shape their futures. This can help to increase their way power.

Helping People To Increase Their Way Power

Many people use this approach to encourage, educate and enable people in their daily lives and work. They pass on knowledge that helps others to increase their way power.

Good educators, for example, believe that education is the ultimate democratic activity. It offers people more choices – and therefore more freedom – to shape their future lives.

We are often told that: “Where there’s a will, there’s a way.”

But this phrase can be turned around to say: “Where there’s a way, there’s a will.”

If a person sees a way forward, they are more likely to develop the will to make it happen.

Let’s return to your own life and work. Imagine that person has asked for your help in reaching a goal. The person has the will to succeed. But they may need to add to their repertoire of options for working towards the goal.

What may be the situation where the person may ask for help? What may be the person’s goal? What may be the real results they want to achieve? What may be their picture of success?

What may be the person’s options for tackling the challenge? What may be the pluses and minuses of each option? What may be the other potential creative solutions?

Looking back, when has the person tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action?

When have other people tackled similar challenges successfully? What were the principles they followed? How can the person follow some of these principles in their own way?

What can you do to increase the person's way power? What are the positive models and practical tools you can pass on that may help them to tackle the challenge? How can you share this knowledge in a way the person can receive and use?

Let's move on to the person's action plan. What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they translate these into action? What else can they do to increase the likelihood of achieving success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe a situation where you may be able to increase a person's way power. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Adding To A Person's Repertoire Approach

Adding To A Person's Repertoire

This approach start by clarifying the results a person wants to achieve. It then involves helping them to build on their resources, add to their repertoire and achieve the desired results.

There are many ways to help people to develop. One approach is to build on their resources and help them to add to their repertoires for achieving the desired results.

This approach can be more effective than telling a person they have to change. It is an adding approach rather than a subtracting approach. Let's explore how it can work in action.

Results

Imagine that a person has asked you to help them to develop. The first step will be to create a positive environment in which they feel able to explore.

You can then invite the person to describe the specific activities in which they would like to develop. They may say, for example, that they would like to be better at being able:

To focus on their priorities ... To stay calm in certain situations ... To build on their strengths ... To lead a team ... To improve their skills in a certain activity ... To do satisfying work that also earns a good salary ... Or other topics.

Imagine the person has describe several activities in which they want to develop. The next step is to invite them to choose which of these they would like to focus on first. You can then invite them:

To clarify a specific situation where they want to do this activity – this could be a personal or professional situation;

To clarify the real results they want to achieve in the specific situation;

To clarify the benefits of achieving these results in the specific situation.

Imagine that the person is clear on the results they want to a specific situation. You can then move on to the next step.

Resources

This step involves focusing on the resources a person already has that they use to achieve their goals. One approach is to explore the following themes.

What are the person's strengths? What is their successful style of working? What are their assets? What are the personal and professional resources they have? How can they use these to help them to achieve their goals?

Imagine that you have explored these themes with the person. You have helped them: a) to clarify their resources; b) to clarify how they can use some of these to work towards achieving the desired results.

The person can build on their resources but there may be skills they can add that will help them achieve success. This leads to the next theme.

Repertoire

This step involves focusing on what the person can add to their repertoire to achieve their goals. For example, you may be able to offer them certain strategies, skills and practical tools. The key is to position these in a way the person can accept and use.

Let's look at one example of translating this approach into action. A newly arrived football coach was about to run his first session with the players at Manchester United. One session was with the young and often brilliant Cristiano Ronaldo. The coach asked himself:

"How do you help Ronaldo to develop? There are parts of his game he can improve, but how to encourage him to be open and listen?"

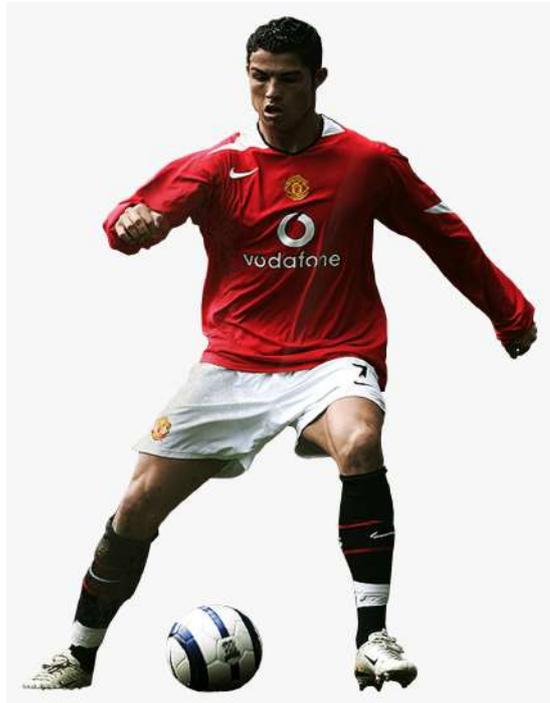

Bearing this in mind, he prepared what he would say on their first meeting. This was long the following lines.

"Cristiano, as we know, you are doing many things brilliantly.

"We can focus on how you can keep building on these skills.

"If you are interested, I can also share some ideas you may want to add to your game.

"These could add to your repertoire of skills. Let me know if you are interested."

The approach worked. Ronaldo said he wanted to add to his skills and be even more successful.

Imagine that you are helping a person to work towards achieving their goals. How can help them to add to their repertoire? How can you position what you offer in a way the person can accept and use?

There are many ways to add to a person's repertoire. One approach is to watch them in action or see an example of their work. It is to then ask yourself some of the questions described below.

Adding To A Person's Repertoire

One approach is to watch the person in action or see an example of their work. It is then to explore the following questions.

- What are the person's goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?*

- What are the specific things they are doing well? How can they keep following these principles in the future? What are the specific things they can do better and how?*

- What are the skills, models and practical tools that I can pass on to help them to achieve their goals? How can I share this knowledge in a way they can receive?*

You can aim to pass on the knowledge in a way they can receive. Before doing so, however, it can be important to ask the person:

"Is it okay for me to share some ideas you may be able to use to achieve your goals?"

The person will say 'Yes,' but it can be good to get their psychological permission. You can then pass on the knowledge in a way that resonates with them. How to tell if this is happening?

One approach is to watch their body language to see which ideas may resonate. Alternatively, and particularly with people who are introvert, you may simply want to create a break and ask the person:

"Looking at these ideas, are there any that resonate with you? If so, we can explore these in more depth."

Imagine the person has focused on how they can build on their resources to achieve their aims. They may also have taken on board some of the ideas you have shared. It is then time to move on to the next step.

Results

Bearing in mind the results the person wants to achieve, they can make an action plan they believe in. If appropriate, however, you can invite them to focus on the following themes.

"What are the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success? How can you translate these into action? How can you get some quick successes?"

"How can you follow good habits? How can you manage any challenges? How can you build on what is working? How can you tackle areas for improvement? How can you do everything possible to reach your goals?"

The person can then move into action. If appropriate, you can continue to help them on the journey. You can keep helping them to add to their repertoire on the way towards achieving the desired results.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the adding to people's repertoire approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Approach To Encouraging People

There are many ways to encourage people. This book explores how to build on the positive aspects of people, teams and organisations. It explores how to find practical solutions to challenges.

Most people have a positive self and a not-so positive self. When appropriate, the aim is to help them to build on the former and manage the latter.

Good encouragers are positive but realistic. They help people to build on their successful patterns and manage the consequences of any unsuccessful patterns. They then help them to achieve their picture of success.

Such encouragers often begin by focusing on people's possibilities. This calls for having positive eyes rather than negative eyes. One mentor expressed this in the following way.

"When looking at a person, it is important to focus on their positive spirit. It is to see when they come alive and generate positive energy.

"This may sound vague but it is something you can see if you look for it carefully. You can then help them to build on this spirit, do satisfying work and achieve success."

One approach is to build on their successful style of working. When have they done satisfying projects in the past? What made these satisfying? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow these principles in the future?

Here is an introduction to the themes it can be useful to explore when working with individuals, teams or organisations. We will be returning to many of these throughout the book.

The Positive Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. This approach involves focusing on the positive aspects of a person, team or organisation.

It involves watching people in action or seeing an example of their work. It is then to focus on their strengths and the strategies they can follow to achieve success.

Strengths

What is the person's positive spirit? When do they come alive?

- What are the principles they are following then? What gives them positive energy? How can they do more of these things?

What are the deeply satisfying activities in which they deliver As

- rather than Bs or Cs? When are they in their element - at ease and yet able to excel? When do they flow, focus and finish?

When do they see the destination quickly? When do they go 'A, B

- ... and then leap to ... Z'? What are the activities where they see patterns quickly? When do they make complicated things simple?

What are the specific activities where they enjoy the journey as - well as reaching the goal? When do they have a sense of purpose, follow certain principles and achieve their picture of success?

Strategies

- What is their positive history? When have they done superb work or overcome challenges in the past? What did they do right then? How can they follow these principles in the future?
- What is their successful style of working? When have they done satisfying projects? What made these satisfying? How can they follow these principles in the future?
- What are the vocational themes they pursue? Do they translate these into doing good work as encouragers, designers, builders, problem solvers, orchestrators or another role? How can they follow this vocation, find the right vehicle and do valuable work?
- When has the team or organisation performed brilliantly? What did they do right then? How can they follow these principles to perform brilliantly in the future?

Success

- What are their aims? What do they want to do in their life or work? What are their possibilities? What do they have the potential to achieve? How can I help them to clarify their picture of success?
- How can they build on their strengths and follow their successful strategies when working towards achieving their goals? What can they add to their repertoire to increase the chances of success?
- How can they do superb work? How can they get some early successes? How can they anticipate and manage potential challenges? How can I help them on the journey?
- How can they keep doing the basics and then add the brilliance? How can they keep improving? How can they do everything possible to achieve their picture of success?

Some Approaches For Helping People To Achieve Success

This section provides an introduction to some approaches to helping people. We will explore these and many others in greater depth later in the book. One key point, however, worth underlining.

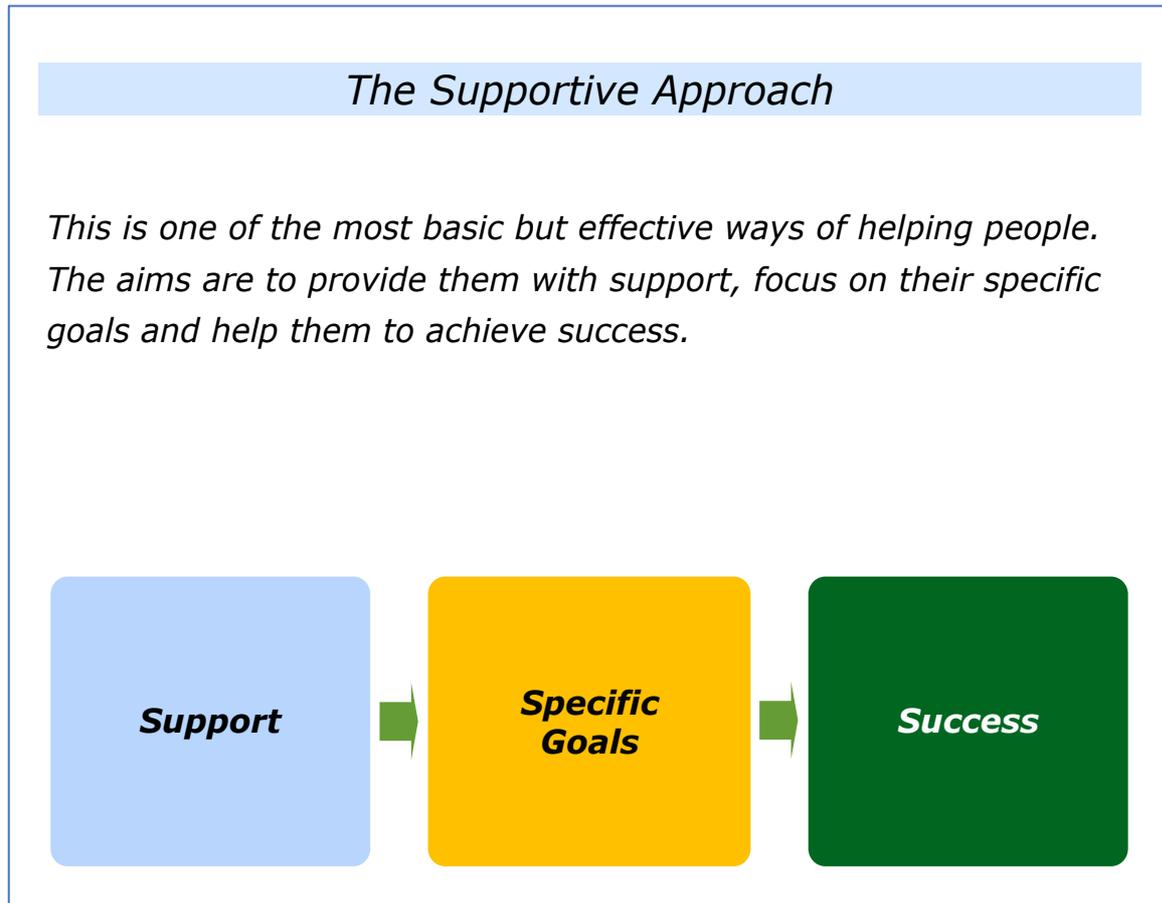

Whatever approach they take, encouraging educators, therapists, leaders show individuals that they are important. They then help them to shape their futures and achieve their picture of success.

Some Approaches For Helping People To Achieve Success

These include the following:

- The Supportive Approach
- The Strengths Approach
- The Strategic Approach
- The Solutions Approach
- The Sharing Knowledge Approach

The Supportive Approach

This is one of the most basic models for helping people but it can also be one of the most effective. This involves taking following steps when working with a person or a group of people. The aims are:

To provide people with support ... To focus on people's specific goals ... To help people to achieve success.

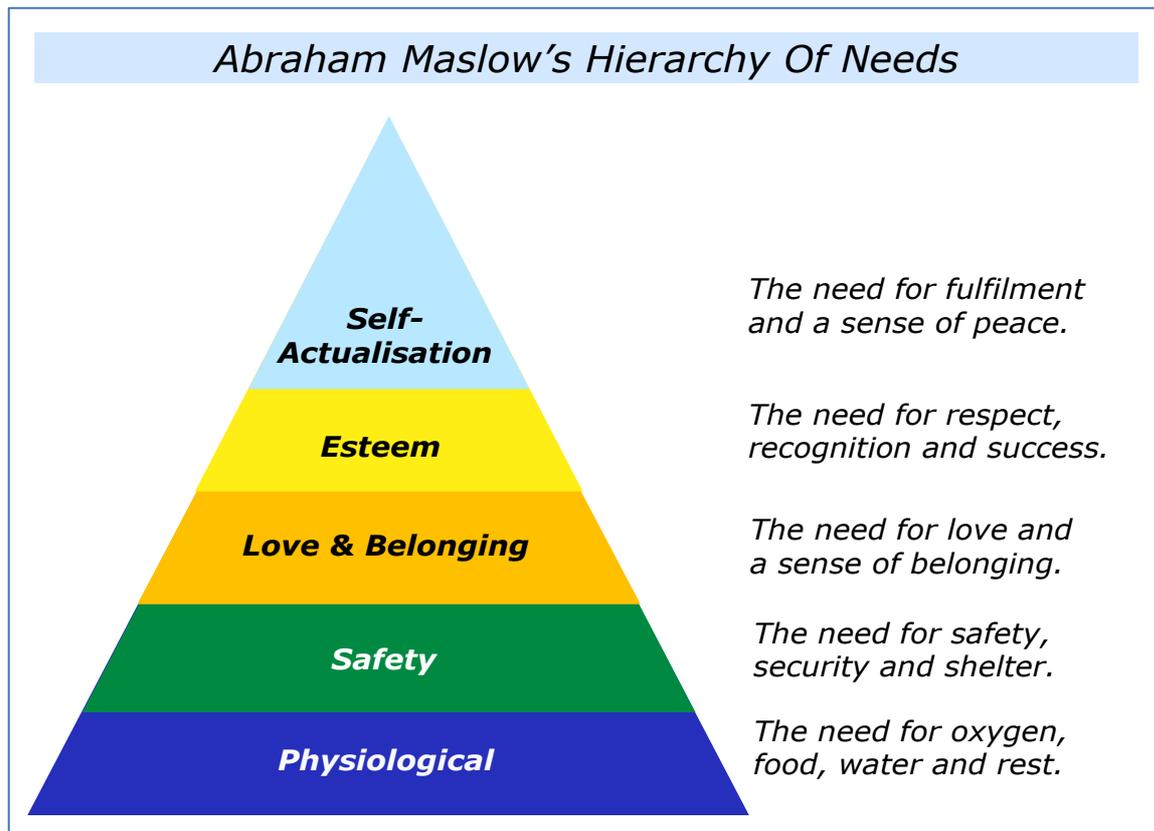

Imagine you want to follow this approach to help a person or a group of people. If appropriate, you can focus on the following steps.

You can provide people with support

Different people provide others with support in different ways. Sometimes this involves providing them with the basic materials for life. These include food, safety, shelter and encouragement. It is also to offer them practical tools they can use to be healthy, hopeful and happy.

The supportive approach is taken by many caring people in their daily life and work. They may then do practical things to help people climb the hierarchy of needs that were described by Abraham Maslow.

People have an ascending set of needs, said Maslow. Once they are satisfied on one level, they are more likely to move onto the next level. These drives start with the physiological needs and climb towards self-actualisation.

People are more likely to fulfil their potential in environments that enable them to fulfil their needs, said Maslow. Many people have since expanded on his theory and translated it into action.

People in the caring professions often follow this approach. They provide an encouraging environment in which people can feel safe. They also encourage people: a) to support themselves; b) to support other people.

The supportive approach can be used over the long-term but sometimes there is also the need for immediate action. This can be the case when helping people who are in deep distress.

Such people may be fleeing persecution, be in pain or be suffering in other ways. It can then be important to ask the question:

"What are your top priorities right now?"

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach when helping a person or a group of people. You can then do your best to provide the support they need. This can sometimes lead to the next step.

You can clarify people's specific goals

This involves focusing on people's short, medium or long-term goals. These can differ depending on what is happening their lives. A person may say, for example:

I want ...

To feel more in control of my life ... To feel happier ... To encourage my children ... To manage my anger ... To do satisfying work ... To deal with my micromanaging boss ... To turnaround a failing team ... To lead the company through challenging times.

You will have your own approach to helping a person to clarify their specific goal. If appropriate, you may also begin to explore the strategies they can follow to achieve their aims. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to explore some of the following themes.

What is the person's goal? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goal?

What are the things they can control in the situation? What are the things they can't control? How can they build on what they can control and manage what they can't?

What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they follow these strategies in their own way? How can they get some quick successes?

Imagine that you have helped a person to clarify their specific goal. You may also have begun to clarify some of the strategies they can follow to achieve their aims. It will then be time to move on to the next step.

You can help people to achieve success

There are many ways to help people to reach their goals. Depending on what they person wants to achieve, one approach is to pursue the following guidelines

You can help the person to set achievable goals

Bearing in mind what they can control, you can help them to work towards goals that they have a good chance of achieving. You can also encourage them to get some early successes.

You can help the person to follow strategies that work

One approach is to revisit the person's positive history. When have they tackled similar challenges successfully in the past. What did they do right then? How can they follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – to tackle the present challenge successfully?

Another approach is to learn from other people who have tackled similar challenges successfully. What did those people do right? How can the person follow some of these principles in their own way?

The key is to focus on what works. It is then to help the person to follow the strategies that will give them the greatest chance of success. They must, of course, follow these in their own way.

You can help the person to follow a structure that works

People like to follow a structure towards achieving their specific goal. A person who wants to feel happy rather than depressed, for example, may need to follow positive habits.

These can include getting up at the same time each day, eating healthy food, exercising, listening to their favourite music, getting an early success and doing satisfying work. They can also do things that give them positive energy and spend time with positive people.

One key point to bear in mind: It is important for a person to create their own structure. They are then more likely to follow this discipline rather than trying to follow one that is imposed on them.

Caring professionals encourage individuals to follow positive habits. They help them to follow a daily structure that encourages both themselves and other people.

You can help the person to achieve success

You can encourage the person to do their best to achieve their goals and achieve success. This can help to build confidence. Some therapists, for example, also invite individuals to keep a Success Diary. They invite them to write down:

The specific successes they have had that day;

The specific things they did right to create the successes;

The specific things they can do to follow these principles – plus the things they can improve - to get successes the next day.

This is an approach that I have seen work with people in many walks of life. The aim is to help people: a) to build on their positive habits; b) to, when appropriate, focus on what they can improve. They can then do their best to achieve their picture of success.

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to follow the support, specific goals and success approach. This is an approach that we will be expanding up throughout the book.

Let's look at another model for helping people take charge of shaping their futures.

The Strengths Approach

The Strengths Approach

There are many ways to help people. This is an approach that can be used with individuals, teams and organisations.

The approach starts by clarifying their picture of success. It then offers practical tools that they can use to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to achieve their goals. The strengths approach is one that can be used to help individuals, teams and organisations to achieve their picture of success.

The approach starts by clarifying the real results people want to achieve. It then involves helping them to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and do their best to achieve success.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. The following section looks at how you can use it to help a person to achieve their goals. You can also adapt this approach when helping teams or organisations to achieve their aims

Clarifying The Picture Of Success

Imagine that you are running a session with a person who has asked for your help. The first step is to create an encouraging environment in which they feel welcome and at ease.

You can then invite them to describe the specific topics they would like to explore. Some people may aim to regain a sense of control, overcome setbacks and refocus on their life goals. Some may aim to encourage other people.

Some may aim to find creative solutions to challenges. Some may aim to do satisfying work that pays a salary. Some may aim to achieve peak performance. Some may aim to leave a positive legacy.

Bearing in mind what the person wants to explore, explain what you can and can't offer. You can then make clear contracts about the topics to cover in the session.

Moving on to the first topic the person wants to explore, you can clarify what the person wants to achieve. Bearing in mind what the person can control in the situation, one approach is to explore the following themes.

What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving their goals? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their picture of success?

Imagine that you have explored this step. Before moving forwards, it can be useful to check that you are clear on what the person wants to achieve. You may want to say something along the following lines.

As far as I understand, the real results you want to achieve in this situation are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Is that right?

Sometimes you may immediately help a person to focus on finding solutions to a challenge or taking steps to reach a goal. You may also be able to offer some practical tools they can use to get some early successes.

On other occasions it can be useful to go through the following stages. You can help the person:

To build on their strengths ... To follow strategies that work ... To achieve their picture of success.

Let's explore how you can go focus on these themes. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

Strengths

Every person has strengths. Bearing this in mind, you can clarify how the person can use these to achieve their goal. Here are some themes it can be useful to explore.

What are the person's strengths? When do they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What are the things that give them positive energy? When are they in their element - at ease and able to excel? When do they flow, focus and finish?

When do they see the destination quickly? When do they go A, B ... and then leap to Z? Where do they have the ability to recognise patterns? Where do they have good radar and seem to know what will happen before it happens?

When do they make complicated things simple? What are the specific activities where they enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal? When do they have a sense of purpose, follow certain principles and achieve their picture of success?

Imagine you have clarified some of the person's strengths. It is then time to move on to the next stage.

Strategies That Work

The next step to help the person to follow strategies that work. This can involve helping them to learn from both their own and other people's successes.

Every person has a positive history. They have overcome challenges and worked to achieve specific goals. Bearing in mind what the person wants to achieve, you may want to explore the following themes.

Looking back, when has the person tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow some of these principles in the future?

When have other people tackled similar challenges successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can the person follow some of these principles in their own way?

Every person may also benefit by adding certain skills to their repertoire. Bearing this in mind, you may want to explore some of the following themes.

What is the person's goal? What are the strategies that work in these situations? Are there any other positive models and practical tools that can help them to achieve their goals? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way they can use?

Bearing these things in mind, what are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they translate these into a clear action plan?

Imagine that you have explored these themes. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Success

You can help the person to do their best to achieve their picture of success. If appropriate, look ahead and help the person to translate their strategies into a clear action plan. Here are some themes it can be useful to explore with the person.

How can they keep building on their strengths and following their successful style? How can they follow strategies that work? How can they get some early successes?

How can they do superb work? How can they encourage themselves on the journey? How can they anticipate and manage potential challenges? How can they do their best to achieve the picture of success?

There are many ways to help people to reach their goals. The strengths approach helps a person to build on their assets and add to their repertoire. It then enables them to do their best to achieve success.

The Strategic Approach

The Strategic Approach

Some practitioners take a strategic approach towards helping people to achieve their goals. They make the person feel welcome and then use their expertise and knowledge:

- To clarify the real results the person wants to achieve – the picture of success;
- To clarify the key strategies the person can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of achieving success;
- To help the person to follow their chosen strategies and achieve the picture of success.

Trusted advisors may take this approach. Whilst they may be experts in their field, but they take time to make their client feel the centre of their world.

Such people clarify what the person wants to achieve. They then explain the big picture and the possible options for going forwards. They can also outline the pluses and minuses of each option.

They are often both caring and clear-headed. They help a person to consider the possible options for going forwards. When appropriate, they also pass on their knowledge.

Such professionals respect the person's right to choose their own ways forward. When appropriate, however, they will also use their knowledge to help the person to achieve their picture of success. This is an approach we will explore in greater depth throughout the book.

The Solutions Approach

Professionals sometimes help people to get both short and long-term solutions to challenges. They may do this when working as a nurse, doctor, counsellor, technical specialist or in another role.

Many approaches they use are based on the Three C model for creative problem solving. This involves focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

Good leaders also focus on finding solutions. During the early part of the Coronavirus crisis, for example, many took the following steps to help their people.

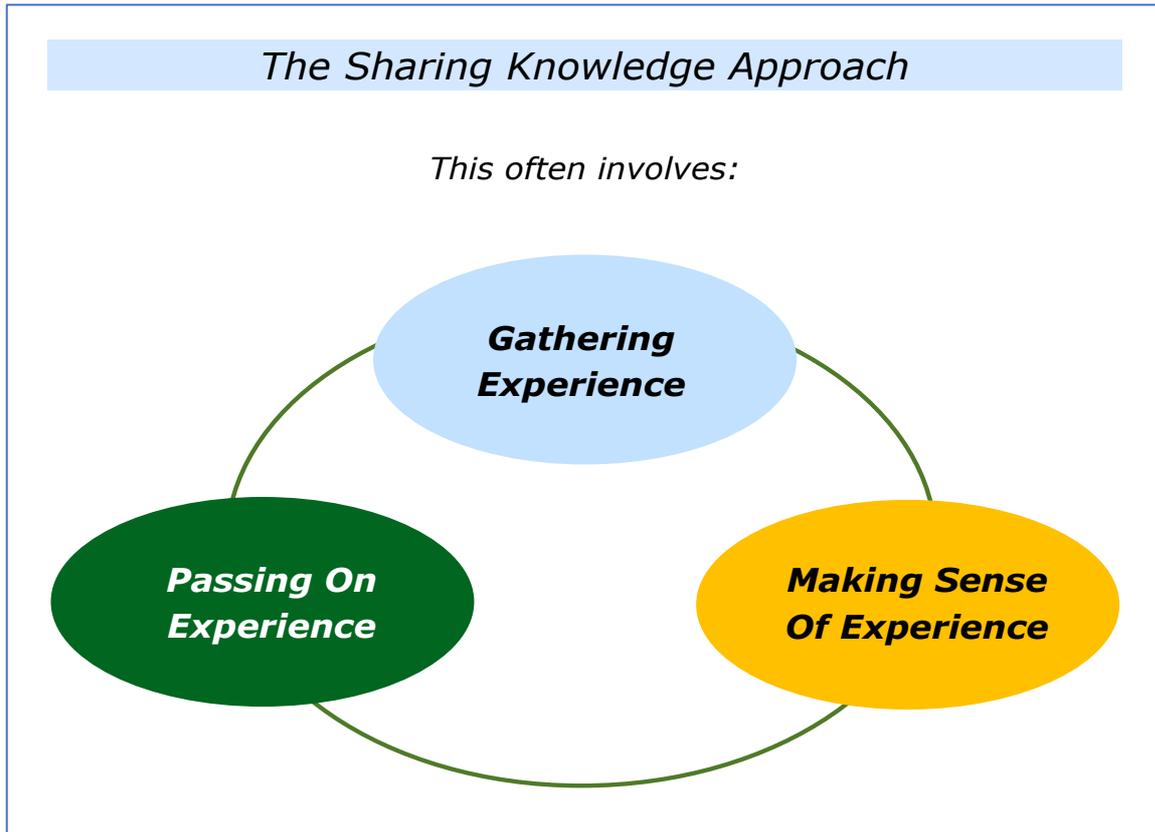

Good Leaders

Some leaders focused on finding positive solutions during the Covid crisis. They aimed:

- To care for their people – such as taking care of their wellbeing and wealth;
- To manage the present situation – such as dealing with any haemorrhaging and pressing challenges for their colleagues and customers;
- To shape a positive future – such as focusing on the specific things they could do to build a successful future.

Leaders recognised that people want to feel in control. It was therefore important to offer them practical tools they could use to navigate the situation. We will be exploring the solutions approach in depth later in the book.

The Sharing Knowledge Approach

This is an approach often used by educators, coaches, trusted advisors and other professionals. They believe in sharing knowledge that helps other people to succeed.

Imagine you want to follow this approach in your own way. What is the knowledge you can pass on? You may have expertise in gardening, counselling, building houses, managing crises, coding, leading teams, first aid, solving particular problems or whatever.

Sometimes it can be useful to brainstorm all the topics you may be able to teach about. You can then settle on, for example, three themes and describe these in 'How to ...' terms.

The knowledge I want to pass on to people is:

How to ...

How to ...

How to ...

How can you share this in a way people can use to achieve their goals? You may want to do this by writing, creating a website, running seminars or doing another activity.

Good coaches, for example, sometimes pass on knowledge after watching a person in action or seeing an example of their work. They aim to do this in a positive way. Here is an overview of this approach.

Sharing Knowledge

This sometimes involves watching a person in action or seeing a piece of their work. It then involves exploring the following themes.

● What is the person doing? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their goals?

● What is the person doing right that will help them to achieve their goals? How can they do more of these things in the future? What can they do better and how?

● What are the key messages I want to give the person? What are the positive models and practical tools I can share that can help them? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way the person can use to achieve their goals?

You will, of course, pass on knowledge in your own way. The aim may be to offer positive models and practical tools that people can use to achieve their goals.

The Successful Style Approach

Successful Style

There are many ways to help a person to build on their strengths. This approach explores how they translate their strengths into action. It enables them:

- To find their successful style;
- To follow their successful style;
- To focus on how they can develop their successful style.

This approach goes beyond helping a person to find their strengths. It focuses on their successful style for translating their strengths into action. They can then be helped to build on these to shape a positive future.

Imagine that a person has asked for your help in shaping their future. One approach is to work through the following steps.

You can help a person to find their successful style

Everybody has a positive history. They have performed great work, tackled challenges and overcome crises. They also have a successful style of working. Clarifying this style is often the clue to their real strengths.

You can invite them to do the exercise called My Successful Style. Here is one way you may wish to introduce this to the person.

My Successful Style

Looking back on your life, describe what for you have been two satisfying projects. Here we are using the term project in the broadest sense.

You may have got great satisfaction from designing a website, launching a product, organising a charity fun run, leading a team, helping somebody to master a skill or whatever.

Exploring each project in turn, describe the specific things that made each one satisfying.

The person may describe when they studied for a degree, wrote a book, gave a keynote speech, revitalised a team or whatever. Sometimes the person may describe projects they have done in their personal life. This can also be okay.

Here are the exercises on this theme. You can encourage them to complete the following sentences.

My Successful Style

The first satisfying project was:

* When I

The things that made it satisfying were:

The second satisfying project was:

* When I

The things that made it satisfying were:

Imagine that the person has described their satisfying projects. When appropriate, you can move on to the next stage.

You can clarify the principles the person followed to pursue their successful style

The next step is to clarify the principles and practical steps they took to achieve success. How to uncover this information? One approach is to explore each project in detail. You may want to ask some of the following questions.

Let's start with your motivation. How did the project come about? Did you set the goal yourself or did somebody else offer you the opportunity?

Was it something you felt passionately about or something that matched your values? What was the trigger that made you really want to do the project?

Let's move on to the actual goal. How early did you clarify the 'What' - the picture of success? Did it come straight away or later? If other people were involved, how much input did you have in setting the goal? What were the real results you wanted to achieve?

How did you settle on the 'How' – the key strategies for achieving success? Did you have freedom, within parameters, regarding how you achieved the goal? How did you map out the journey towards achieving the goal?

Let's move on to how you performed the work. Did you mainly work by yourself? Or did you work with other people? If you worked with others, what were the characteristics of these people?

Did you work for a manager? If so, what were the qualities the manager demonstrated? What went well when working with the colleagues or the manager?

Looking at the work, how did you organise your time? Did you follow a certain daily rhythm? What did you actually do to perform superb work? Did you get some early successes?

How did you check what was working and what could be improved? How did you get support? How did you encourage yourself on the journey? How did you find creative solutions to challenges? How did you keep your manager informed?

Let's move on to the actual result. How did you keep working hard to reach the goal? Was there a specific deliverable you had to achieve? Was there a deadline or some element of performance? How did you know when you had achieved the picture of success?

What was the satisfaction you got from reaching the goal? Looking at the project, what were the most fulfilling things? What did you do well on the project? What could you do better in the future if you were to tackle this kind of project again? Are there any other things you would like to say about the project?

You can go through each project in turn and then explore the following themes with the person

Looking back on each of these examples, can you see any recurring patterns? Bearing these in mind, describe what you believe to be the principles you follow when pursuing your preferred way of working?

You may, of course, have several different successful styles. For example, one when working alone; another when working with other people. If appropriate, we can explore each approach.

This kind of exercise takes some time but it is often worthwhile. You may also need to help the person to clarify the specific things that made the projects satisfying.

Imagine that you explored these themes. You can then invite the person to complete the following exercise.

My Successful Style

Looking at the patterns that have emerged, I believe my successful style – my preferred way of working – is:

- * To ...

Different people will describe different principles they like to follow when doing satisfying work. One person explained their approach in the following way.

"My pattern is clear. I love building prototypes, but several characteristics stand out. First, I must believe the project will improve people's lives. Second, I want to have lots of input into clarifying the 'What' – the goal to achieve.

"Third, I like to have lots of autonomy. Fourth, I prefer to be aiming for a specific deadline. Finally, I love to see the prototype having a positive impact on people's lives."

Each person will have their own approach to doing satisfying work. When appropriate, you can move on to the next stage.

You can help a person to follow their successful style

Imagine that you have helped the person to find the principles they like to follow when pursuing their successful style of working. You can then help them to follow this style in the future.

Why take this approach? People develop, they seldom change. A person's successful style seems to get more pronounced as they get older. Let's look at one example.

Alison, a chief executive, is somebody who expresses a recurring theme in her life. Looking at the work she finds most satisfying:

She loves to create stimulating environments in which people can achieve peak performance.

That sounds a common theme but different people will use their strengths to translate this into action in different ways. Alison expresses her successful style by doing certain kinds of projects.

During her life she has run arts festivals, led marketing campaigns and built great teams. She is a superb orchestrator. This often involves her taking the following steps.

She finds something she feels passionately about and sets a stimulating goal

Alison's projects must score at least 8/10 on the passion rating. She also likes to do activities which have a clear deadline and a stimulating goal.

She does a reality check before embarking on the project

Alison does her due diligence to check if it is possible to achieve the goal. She has a set of trusted people with whom she bounces ideas about the project. Sometimes this can result in her actually creating a bigger goal. Alternatively, she might say 'No,' to the project.

She takes time to plan and make a clear road map towards achieving the goal

Alison make an initial project plan, complete with milestones, plus ensures she will get the resources required to achieve the goal. Alison then double-checks that the project is stretching and stimulating. If so, she commits to reaching the goal.

She gathers talented people who want to embark on the adventure

Alison often draws on her network to recruit people who want to contribute. Sometimes she also builds on the positive people already in the organisation. She gives these a sense of ownership and makes clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the goal.

She creates an environment that encourages people to do fine work that contributes towards achieving the goal

Alison provides a stimulating atmosphere with lots of inspiration and encouragement. If she inherits an existing team, she gives any reluctant people several chances but then draws a line. People leave if they don't deliver the required professional standards.

She encourages people to stay on track and do exceptional work

Alison is good at reminding people of the goal, updating them on progress and encouraging them to raise their game. She encourages people to keep focusing on the issues that are in the Green, Amber and Red Zones and the actions they need to take.

She delivers the goods and achieves the goal

Alison's projects often have a sense of performance - something brilliant that must be delivered by a certain deadline. Whilst calm on the surface, she is adrenaline-driven. The difference between her and some others is that she is happy for her people to get the glory.

Alison's follows this path when pursuing her vocation. As mentioned earlier, the red thread in many of her projects is:

To create stimulating environments in which people can achieve peak performance.

Whilst she sometimes loves doing creative work alone – such as photography – she gets a greater kick from enabling people to produce something special. She continues to follow this theme in her work.

Imagine you have helped the person to clarify their successful style. How to help them to follow this in the future? One approach is to start by inviting them to brainstorm ideas on the following theme. We will then focus on one particular approach they may want to take.

My Successful Style - Following It In The Future

The things I can do to follow these principles in the future are:

- * To ...

Imagine that the person has generated some ideas regarding how they can follow their successful style. They may, for example, have explored how to do this in their present role, moving another role of starting their own business.

If appropriate, however, you may want to help them to explore another option. Let's focus on this approach.

You can explore how the person may be able to follow their successful style by finding or creating their perfect project

We are all freelancers now. There are no jobs for life but there are many potential projects. You can explore how the person may do satisfying work by pursuing this path. If appropriate, you may say something along the following lines.

Let's explore how you can express your successful style in the future. One way to do this is by finding or creating stimulating projects. We can do this by focusing on the following themes.

Project

What would be the kind of project you would find stimulating? Are there any potential projects in the pipeline that might fit your pattern? If so, what are these projects?

If not, would it be possible to mould another project to fit your style whilst, at the same time, satisfying the key stakeholders? If there are none on the horizon, how could you find or create such a project?

People

Who are the kinds of people you find stimulating? What are the characteristics of your ideal manager or colleagues? How can you find such characters or build a team of such people?

Place

What is the kind of place – culture or environment - you find stimulating? What are the characteristics of your preferred culture? What is your preferred environment?

What is your preferred working style? Do you prefer to spend all week in the office, on the road or some time working from home? What else would be important regarding the culture and environment?

Crafting Your Perfect Project – Making It Happen

Bearing in mind what you have written, what would be your perfect project? What are the specific results you could deliver to a potential employer or customer by doing this kind of project?

What would be the specific benefits to the employer or customer? How can you find or create your perfect project? What are the specific things you can do to make it happen?

Imagine that you have taken some of these steps with the person. If appropriate, you can invite them to explore the following exercise.

My Perfect Project

My perfect project would be one where I am able:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The specific things I can do to find or create such a project are:

* To ...

* To ...

Imagine that you have helped the person to work through some of these exercises. You can help them to summarise what they have learned so far and how they want to translate this into action.

If appropriate, they can then clarify the specific steps they want to take to follow their successful style in the future. Here is the exercise on this theme.

My Successful Style – My Action Plan

The specific things I want to do to follow my successful style in the future are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Let's assume that the person has worked through these exercises. They may well have done enough thinking and planning for the moment. If appropriate, however, at some point you may want to help them to explore the following theme.

You can help the person to develop their successful style in the future

Imagine that the person knows how they want to follow their successful style in the future. Bearing this in mind, you can help them to explore how they can aim:

To continue to build on the strengths of their style and manage the consequences of any weaknesses;

To continue to add to their repertoire of strategies, skills and tools that they can use to follow their successful style and do superb work;

To continue to find or create satisfying projects where they help their employers, customers or other stakeholders to achieve success.

There are many ways to help people to build on their strengths. One approach is to help them to find and follow their successful style. If you wish, you can invite the person to do the final exercise on this theme.

The Positive Models Approach

Positive Models

People like:

- To learn from positive models;
- To learn from positive ways that work;
- To learn how to follow these themes in the own ways and get positive results.

People learn from two sorts of positive models. The first are individuals they learn from in the family, education, work and society. Such models show positive ways of behaving in our daily lives and work.

The second are positive models – such as philosophies and frameworks - that help people to make sense of life. Such frameworks also provide tools that help them to achieve their goals.

Looking back, can you think a positive person or framework that you learned from in the past? What did you learn from the person or framework? How did you apply these lessons in your life or work? Let's explore these themes.

Learning From People Who Act As Positive Models

Some individuals learn from people who act as good models. Here are some ways that people describe what they learned.

Person A

"I had a teacher who believed in me. They were encouraging but tough. They explained that, even though I came from a troubled family, it was up to me to take responsibility for my life.

"They helped me to save me from myself. I learned to stay out of trouble and now have my own business. I also work as an informal mentor for young people who come from a similar background."

Person B

"My sports coach taught me about more than sports. They showed respect to everybody they met - the cleaners, the players, the opponents, the umpires and the owners.

"They taught me to be professional and prepare for everything – such as a meeting, a game or another event. My coach passed on lessons that I have be able to apply in my career and life."

Learning From Positive Models That Make Sense Of Things

Individuals sometimes learn from positive models - philosophies or frameworks - that help them to understand and navigate life. They may learn these from teachers, writers, scientists or other people. A person may say such frameworks help them to learn:

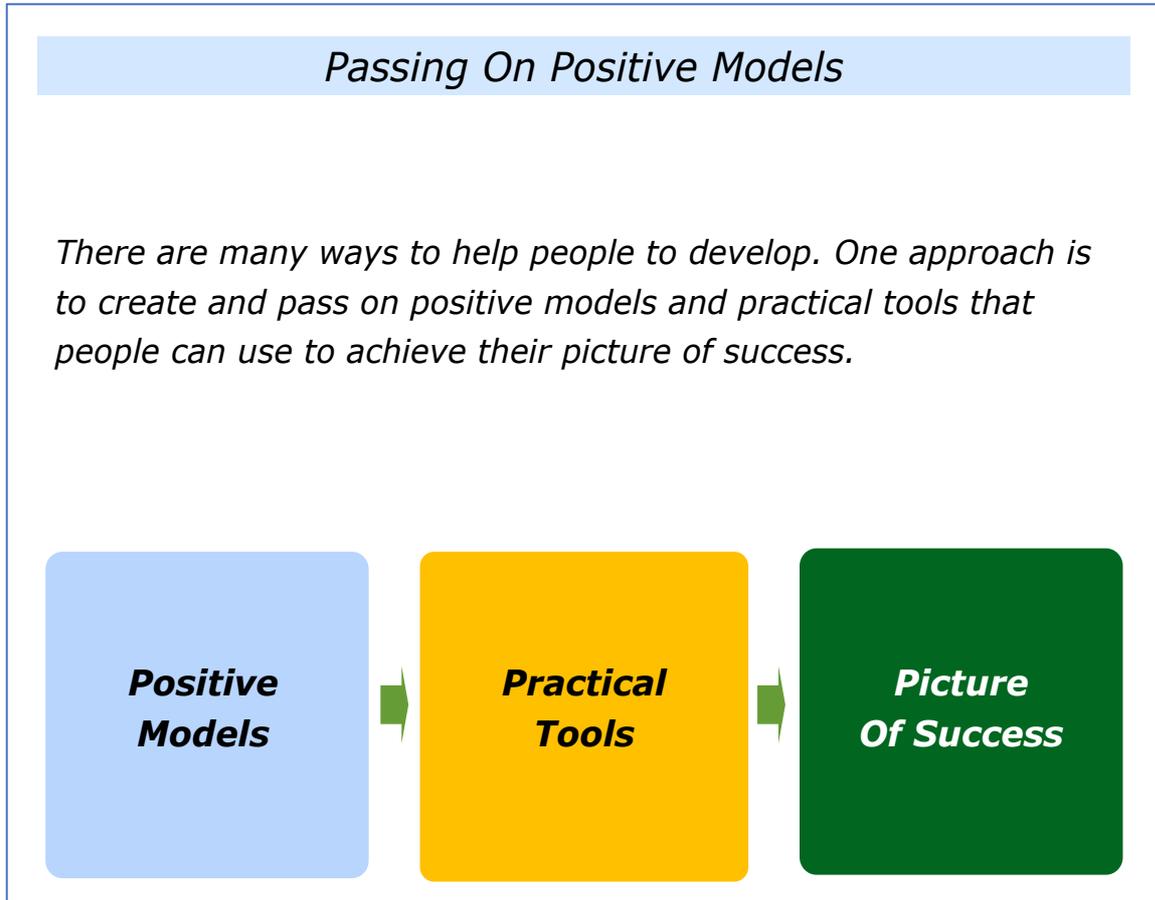

How to make sense of things ... How to manage emotions ... How to understand certain kinds of people ... How to do satisfying work ... How to work towards achieving their life goals ... How to develop as a person.

Good educators often create and pass on positive models that can help people to succeed. Such people often go through the following steps.

They focus on a specific theme that they believe people may want to pursue to achieve success;

They study what works in this area and then translate this into positive models and practical tools that people can use to achieve success;

They then aim to pass on this knowledge in ways that people can use to achieve their pictures of success.

Looking ahead, can you think a situation where you may aim to act as a positive model or pass on a positive model. How can you do this in your own way? What may be the benefits?

The My Ideal Life Approach

*My Ideal Life
Would Be:*

- To ...

- To ...

- To ...

This is an exercise that I used to give people during workshops where they focused on how to shape their futures. Here are the instructions that were given to people. You can, of course, adapt this in your own way.

This exercise takes an hour. It focuses on how you can take steps towards living your ideal life.

Take a big flip chart, lots of coloured pens and find a space where you can do the exercise. Take around half an hour to do the following things.

Start by brainstorming your ideal life. For example:

My Ideal Life Would Be:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Describe what your ideal life would look like. This can describe both personal and professional aspects of your ideal life. Don't worry about how you can achieve that at the moment.

When you are ready, do the following things on the flip chart.

Describe your ideal life.

Draw a picture of you in your ideal life.

Then move on to the next stage. Find a partner from the group. Put your flip chart on the wall and describe your ideal life.

The partner's role is to listen and, when appropriate, ask questions where you can give more detail or examples.

After fifteen minutes change role and repeat the process.

Finally, if you wish, describe some of the steps you may want to take towards living your ideal life.

We will see you all back here in an hour. Over to you.

Many people found this exercise useful. Some kept their flip charts for years and, on occasions, showed these to other people.

Here is the exercise. You will, of course, have your own approach to focusing on your ideal life.

*My Ideal Life
Would Be:*

The Perfect Days Approach

“Near death experiences focus the mind,” we are told. One outcome can be that they encourage us to focus on what is important in life.

This section describes exercises inspired by Eugene O’Kelly, who wrote Chasing Daylight. Diagnosed with a terminal illness, he and his loved ones aimed to create perfect moments, hours and days.

Clarifying your perfect personal day

Imagine you could craft your perfect personal day. Maybe you would like to spend time with special people, create things or simply enjoy the moments. What would you like to feel at the end of the day?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Start by brainstorming and then clarifying your day. You aim:

To have a leisurely breakfast ... To go for a run ... To spend time with your children ... To work in the garden ... To listen to music, paint, write or do some other creative activity ... To enjoy a siesta ... To go for a walk ... To visit the theatre.

You may also wish to sketch out different kinds of perfect personal days. If you wish, try completing the following exercise.

My Perfect Personal Day

My perfect personal day would be:

Clarifying your perfect professional day

Imagine you could craft your perfect professional day. What would you like to do during such a day? What would you like to feel at the end of the day?

People often like to follow their own rhythm during the day rather than be thrown off-course. How could you try, as far as possible, to feel in control of shaping your day?

How could you set up the day to succeed? How could you make good use of your prime times, the times of the day when you have most energy?

How could you spend time on stimulating projects? How could you set aside time to gather your thoughts during the day? How could you gain a sense of accomplishment from the day?

Different people will obviously have different days. For example, you may aim:

To get to work early ... To spend time with a coffee rehearsing the day ahead ... To spend most of the day doing what you do best ... To spend time with stimulating customers.

To eat something healthy and nourishing every 2 hours ... To set aside time for yourself halfway through the day ... To rehearse the rest of the day ... To help others to succeed ... To do things that enable you to feel fulfilled at the end of the day.

Again, you may have several different kinds of perfect professional days. If you wish, try completing the following exercise.

My Perfect Professional Day

My perfect professional day would be:

Clarifying your perfect personal and professional day

Imagine that you want to combine elements of your perfect personal and professional day. This is something that many people tried to do during Covid. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to map out such a day.

My Perfect Personal And Professional Day

My perfect personal and professional day would be:

Creating elements of your perfect days

Life is for living: everything is temporary and nothing is permanent, we are told. Perfection may not be attainable and things may not always work out. But each day may be perfect with its imperfections.

Looking ahead, how would you like to introduce parts of your perfect days into your personal and professional life? How can you make this happen?

Some people go for a radical solution. They wipe the slate clean and start building their life around the things that are satisfying. Some people choose a different approach. They begin introducing elements of their perfect days into their actual days.

Such people begin with a few things. They may start the day by listening to their favourite music, spending more time with their favourite customers, building in times for reflection or whatever.

They then begin adding more elements, joining these together like a row of pearls. They develop the habit of doing more things that constitute their perfect days.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific things you can do to take steps towards creating your perfect days.

Describe the specific benefits of doing these things – both for you and for other people.

The Health, Hope And Happiness Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to help them to focus on the following themes in their lives and work.

Health – to do things that help themselves and other people to be healthy;

Hope – to do things that help themselves and other people to be hopeful;

Happiness – to do things that help themselves and other people to be happy.

This is a circular approach. Helping a person in one area can have a beneficial effect in the other areas. Imagine you are facilitating a session where a person wants to explore these areas. Let's consider these themes.

Being Healthy

People want to feel physically and psychologically healthy. Unless you are medically qualified, it may not be advisable to focus on a person's physical health. If wish, however, you can invite them to tackle the following exercise.

This invites them to explore their own view of their health. Bearing in mind the person's age and time in life, the exercise invites them to rate their physical health on a scale 0-10. They can then describe the specific things they can do to maintain or improve this rating.

Being Healthy

The rating I would give myself regarding being physically healthy for my age and time of life is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

If the person wants to explore this topic further, you can ask some of the following questions. (Again, it is vital to explain that you are not offering any medical advice or opinions.)

"What are your goals regarding your energy and physical health? When have you felt most healthy? What were you doing right then?"

"What was the amount of sleep you were getting? What was the food you were eating? What was the exercise you were doing?"

"What do you want to do regarding your physical health? How can you get some early successes? What will be the benefits of doing these things?"

Being Hopeful

People want to feel hopeful. They want to feel in control and able to shape their futures. This calls for having a positive attitude but also controlling the controllables. It is to focus on what they can control rather than become paralysed about what they can't control.

This has implications regarding having sense of hope. A person may feel hopeful about shaping their own future, for example, but concerned about the future of the planet. Being positive, however, they will focus on how they can help their loved ones and future generations.

If appropriate, you can then use some of the following questions regarding their sense of hope.

"When have you felt most hopeful in your life? What were you doing right then? How can you follow these principles again in the future?"

"Let's focus on controlling the controllables. What are the things you can control in your life and work? What are the things you can't control?"

"How can you build on what you can control and manage what you can't? What are your long-term goals in life?"

"Imagine you are 80 years old and looking back on your life. What is your picture of success? What are the things you want to have done by then that for you will mean you have had a successful life? How can you work towards these aims?"

Ricky Snyder, who wrote The Psychology Of Hope, helped people to increase their sense of hope by expanding their way power. This is their ability to see ways to shape their futures.

You can pass on knowledge and practical tools that a person can use to take this step. Bearing this in mind, you can invite them to tackle the following exercise.

Being Hopeful

The rating I would give myself for being hopeful – being able to shape my future in a positive way - is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- *

Imagine that you have clarified the extent to which a person feels hopeful. If appropriate, you can encourage them by following elements of the practical hope approach. This involves focusing on the following steps.

Personal Goals

This involves create an encouraging environment in which the person or a group of people feel at ease. It is then to help them to clarify their goals - their picture of success.

Practical Hope

This involves encouraging people to study success – such as what works in the area they want to explore. It is then to offer strategies and practical tools that people can use to do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Positive Results

This involves providing ongoing support and finding solutions to challenges. It also involves doing your best to encourage, educate and enable people to achieve their picture of success.

Being Happy

When you ask parents what they want for their children, they often say: “We want them to be happy.” So the question is: How do people achieve happiness?

During the past 40 years the Positive Psychology approach has researched the topic of happiness. This involved asking the following kinds of questions.

What kinds of people are happy? What are the principles such people follow to be happy? Is it possible for other people to follow these principles in their own ways to maintain or improve their happiness?

Here is an overview of some principles that have emerged.

People Who Are Happy

They often follow certain eternal principles and, as a by-product, they sometimes experience happiness.

They Have A Positive Attitude

- They are grateful, generous and encourage other people to succeed.
- They are positive realists and focus on what they can control.
- They do things that give them positive energy and spend time with positive people.

They Follow Positive Principles

- They develop a sense of purpose, follow their life principles and sometimes serve something greater than themselves.
- They aim to be the best they can be rather than compare themselves with others.
- They learn from their life experiences and develop skills for finding solutions to challenges.

They Make A Positive Contribution

- They build on their strengths, do satisfying work and help people to succeed.
- They pass on knowledge that encourages both present and future generations.
- They want to give positive things to people during their time on the planet and they sometimes enjoy a sense of peace.

Let's return to the person you may be helping. If appropriate, you can ask them the following questions.

"What is your picture of happiness? What will be kinds of things you are feeling, thinking and doing? What are some of the things you can do to increase the chances of feeling happy?"

"Looking back, when have been the times you have felt happy? What were you doing right then? How can you follow these principles again in the future? What will be the benefits?"

Invite them to rate their sense of happiness and the specific things they can do to maintain or improve the rating. If appropriate, you can then pass on practical tools they can use in their own ways.

Being Happy

The rating I would give myself regarding being happy is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

The Encouragement Approach Rather Than The Ego Approach

Different people learn to follow the encouragement approach at different stages of their lives. They then aim to use their strengths to encourage and enable people to achieve success.

They may take this approach when working as an educator, therapist, performing artist or in another professional role. Some people find this to be liberating. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I used to get nervous before making a presentation or going on television because I was scared of being judged.

"But then I was told that it was about encouraging other people. It was about them, it was not about me."

Some people get stuck because they follow the ego approach. They have an internal script that may say some the following things.

"How can I promote myself? How do I compare to others? How can I keep being seen as a success? How can I always Number One?"

This approach can be exhausting. A person may continually strive to be the best or may need constant praise. Any failure or slight on their character causes problems.

They may feel that they will never be good enough. Alternatively, they may react by blaming others or saying the world is wrong.

Good encouragers often embrace what sounds like a paradox. They want to give their best to people but do not want to become victims. They sometimes takes the following route.

They start by clarifying their strengths and how they can use these to help people to achieve success.

They clarify the specific kinds of people with whom they work best and the challenges such people face on the way to achieving success.

They clarify how they can put themselves in the background and use their strengths to enable these people to achieve success.

Great workers in other fields sometimes focus on encouragement rather than their ego. The following idea may sound odd but I have seen it embodied by many fine workers.

They want to encourage other things – be these organisms, machines or processes – to perform at their best. They get satisfaction from helping these things to work superbly rather than worrying about their own self-image.

Some people go into a state of flow when serving something greater than themselves. Singers aim to serve the song. Actors aim to absorb themselves in the role. Scientists throw themselves into solving the problem and finding a solution.

What is your pattern for following the encouragement approach rather than the ego approach? Looking back, can you think of a time when followed elements of this approach?

What did you do then to use your strengths to encourage a person or a group of people? How did you translate this into action? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Many people take this approach as they get older. Some give in an encouraging way, some in an educational way, some in an economic way. Some combine different elements of giving.

Erik Erickson, the psychologist, said that people often reach what he called the Generative Age. He described this as:

A concern for establishing and guiding the next generation.

Different people express this in different forms. The most common way is parenthood. But it can also be expressed through passing on knowledge or leaving a positive legacy.

People often want to leave a legacy. They often want to encourage their loved ones and help other people to be happy. They also want to pass on the fruits of their labours and provide wisdom that helps future generations.

Erickson said that for much of our lives we define ourselves in relation to other people. These include our parents, siblings, friends, teachers, peers and authority figures. The Generative Age brings a new awareness and we may then define ourselves in relation to humanity.

He believed that individuals face certain choices or conflicts at different stages of their lives. During adulthood, for example, they may experience the following feelings.

Erik Erikson – The Adult Stages Of Life

- Early Adulthood

Intimacy v Isolation

- Middle Adulthood

Generativity v Self-Absorption

- Later Adulthood

Integrity v Despair

People can move towards the generative stage during their middle life. They are then more likely to develop a feeling integrity – such as feeling they have lived a fulfilling life – rather than despair. He wrote:

Adults need to create or nurture things that will outlast them, often by having children or creating a positive change that benefits other people.

Success leads to feelings of usefulness and accomplishment, while failure results in shallow involvement in the world.

Older adults need to look back on life and feel a sense of fulfilment. Success at this stage leads to feelings of wisdom, while failure results in regret, bitterness, and despair.

Human beings are often at their best when they choose to be generous. As the Buddha said:

"A generous heart, kind speech and a life of service and compassion are the things which renew humanity."

People can show such qualities at any age, but many display these more as they get older. Many do this as individuals, whilst some join together to encourage future generations. Here is one such group of people.

The Elders

The Elders continue to evolve. They build on the work of the founders with new people being added to the group.

The Elders is an independent group of global leaders. Founded by Nelson Mandela, they work who work together for peace and human rights. Here is an excerpt from the group's website.

Elders no longer hold public office; they are independent of any national government or other vested interest. They should have earned international trust, demonstrated integrity and built a reputation for inclusive, progressive leadership.

The Elders share a common commitment to peace and universal human rights, but they also bring with them a wealth of diverse expertise and experience.

The peace makers with decades of experience mediating and resolving conflicts around the world. The peace builders who have helped post-conflict societies to heal wounds and rebuild.

The social revolutionaries who transformed their own countries - whether by reducing poverty, improving the status of women, or championing nonviolent struggle. The pioneering women who have governed their countries, led international institutions and spearheaded movements to empower women.

An Elder is also a changemaker - someone who can lead by example, creating positive social change and inspiring others to do the same. The Elders represent an independent voice, not bound by the interests of any nation, government or institution.

They are committed to promoting the shared interests of humanity, and the universal human rights we all share. They believe that in any conflict, it is important to listen to everyone - no matter how unpalatable or unpopular this may be.

They aim to act boldly, speaking difficult truths and tackling taboos. They don't claim to have all the answers, and stress that every individual can make a difference and create positive change in their society.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow the encouragement approach rather than the ego approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

The Encouragement Approach Rather Than The Ego Approach

The specific situation when I may want to follow the encouragement approach may be:

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

The Passions Approach

There are many ways that people can feel alive and gain a sense of fulfilment. One approach involves focusing on their passions, following principles that work and getting positive results.

A person may follow this approach when encouraging other people, pursuing a hobby, doing creative work or tackling a challenge. They may aim to do their best and achieve their picture of success.

Looking back, can you think of situation when you followed elements of this approach? What did you do to pursue your chosen activity? How did follow principles that worked? What happened as a result of taking these steps? Let's explore these themes.

Passions

Great workers often follow their passions or do things they feel passionately about. If you explore the internet, however you will find conflicting advice about this approach.

Some people say it is vital to follow your passions but others say this is not good advice. The latter group may urge people to focus on an activity where they can do good work.

Many people combine each of these elements. They do things they feel passionately about where they have the ability to deliver positive results. Such people then aim to flow, focus and finish. Sometimes they gain a sense of fulfilment.

Principles

Great workers follow principles that work and translate these into action. Some aim to build on their strengths, follow successful strategies and do their best to achieve success.

Each person is different, however, so some people may follow other strategies. The key is to do what works. It is:

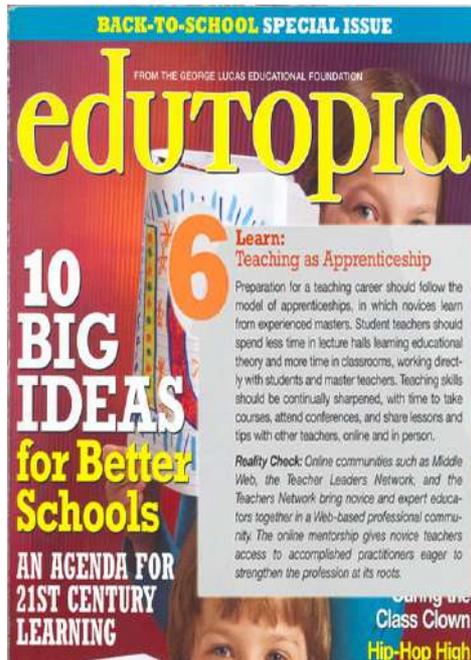

To follow principles that work:

To translate these into practice;

To do their best to get positive results.

Different people do this in different ways. George Lucas and Steve Arnold founded Edutopia in 1991. This is a website that focuses on what works in education.

It provides a massive resource of positive models and practical tools that educators can use in their daily work. Below is an excerpt from the website that describes the organisation's vision.

OUR VISION

Our vision is of a new world of learning based on the compelling truth that improving education is the key to the survival of the human race. It's a world of creativity, inspiration, and ambition informed by evidence and experience.

It's a world where students become lifelong learners and develop 21st-century skills. It's a world where innovation is the rule, not the exception. It's a world where schools provide rigorous project-based learning, social and emotional learning, and access to new technology. It's a world where students and parents, teachers and administrators, policy makers and the people they serve are all empowered with a shared vision to change education for the better.

We call this place Edutopia, and we provide not just the vision for this new world of learning but the information and community connections to make it a reality.

In particular, in the 21st century, we believe three skills are fundamental George Lucas is passionate about education. Below are excerpts from an interview he gave many years ago about the role that teachers and education can play in a person's life.

Education: The Single Most Important Job

I didn't feel like the school system was designed for my learning style. It wasn't until college where I could pursue my passion, making films, that I found my way.

Recently we published observations from eighth graders about what they believe creates an engaging learning experience. Their answers were straight-forward and definitive: project-based learning, technology, and an enthusiastic teacher. I couldn't agree more.

Today, with the power of the Internet, we are experiencing a force that is revolutionizing education and offering opportunities to reach and engage diverse learners like me.

When technology is deployed effectively, it can free up teachers from standing in front of the class and presenting information. We can flip the classroom with lectures occurring at home via the Internet and rigorous project-based learning taking place in cooperative groups at school.

In this environment, teachers can be guides and coaches to the students. What is more powerful in education than a student who is guided by an adult who truly cares - someone who knows your name, who encourages you, and is committed to your success in life?

By learning about and replicating strategies that work in education, we have the potential to transform our schools.

By creating strong cultures of creativity and curiosity, we can engage students as active participants in their own education, rather than passive recipients of facts and formulas.

In a world where information is at our fingertips, our greatest challenge is help students learn how to find information, assess its accuracy and apply it to solve problems.

All around our country and the world, there are teachers and schools succeeding at the task, many featured in Edutopia.

There is no other job more important than education. It is the foundation of our democracy. By seizing on what's working, and recreating those successes from one classroom to the next, we can make it better for everyone.

Edutopia uses the power of technology to encourage people, but everybody is different. You will have your own approach to passing on what works.

Positive Results

Great workers do their best to deliver the goods. They may aim: a) to follow successful strategies; b) to focus on continuous improvement; c) to add that touch of class to get positive results. Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's look at one example.

Sparknews And Positive Stories

Christian de Boisredon founded Sparknews. This is a community of like-minded journalists, social entrepreneurs and individuals motivated by the common desire to illuminate solution-based stories.

The following pages give excerpts from the movement's website. This tells the story of its inception and its work to share positive solutions across the planet.

At the age of 24, Christian de Boisredon and two friends set off around the world to discover positive initiatives, against the backdrop of the depressing information he found in the media.

Together, they gather their discoveries in a future best-seller: Hope Around the World (Pocket). Thus was born Christian's inner conviction: the media can reach their audience by being more constructive.

In 2012, he decides to explore new ways to convince editorial offices around the world to focus on solutions and funds Sparknews. The social enterprise organises collaborative editorial operations that highlight positive initiatives.

In 2016, the Sparknews team decided to use their expertise to help those who want to bring new narratives to the core of their business.

The Positive Innovation Club was created, and has by now brought together more than 3,000 managers and executives who want to help move their companies in a more sustainable direction.

In 2020, we launched la Fabrique des Récits! La Fabrique des Récits, is a collective that aims to raise awareness among artists and creators from all walks of life about the challenges of transition. Their creativity thus becomes a vector of messages to the general public.

So many sparks ignited, new narratives emerged and positive action encouraged.

Let's return to your own life. How you focus on a specific passion? How can you follow principles that work? How can you aim to deliver positive results? What may happen as a result of taking this steps?

The Feeling At Home Approach

This approach involves finding the place where you feel at home. This could be a certain kind of activity, project, environment or other situation. It involves doing fulfilling work in the place where you feel at home. Let's explore these themes.

Finding Your Home

Different people take different routes on the way towards finding where they feel at home. Here is how one person summarised his journey.

John – Helping Military Veterans To Transition To Civilian Work

I come from an army family but I was always more attracted to the medical and support sides of the military. These were topics I chose to specialise in at Sandhurst.

Maybe this was because, whilst believing in the importance of the military, I saw the effects of combat on people I came into contact with when growing up.

After Sandhurst I went into the Medical Support Service. This was both rewarding and challenging. During this time I also studied for counselling and HR qualifications, which proved useful later in my career.

After leaving the military I worked in a couple of big organisations but missed the camaraderie. I also wanted a greater sense of purpose in my work. It was then that I got lucky.

My wife is American and we were visiting her parents. My father-in-law said there were several US organisations that helped veterans to find rewarding work. He wondered if there was something similar in the UK.

Returning home I found an entrepreneur who had set-up such a social enterprise. It was mainly staffed by volunteers, but they wanted somebody to lead the organisation on a full-time basis.

The pay was not great but, after talking with my wife, I applied for the role of CEO. The other two main candidates were older than me but I got the role. The co-founder said that it was my hunger to do the role, plus my HR background, that were key factors.

That was three years ago. Since then we have managed to find roles for hundreds of veterans. Many of these have been in large projects that benefit the nation. Such roles suit military veterans who have transferable skills. They like to have a clear goal and apply their skills to deliver a mission that serves the nation.

I love my job. It matches my desire to serve and also to help others do satisfying work. Who knows what the future will bring, but for the moment I feel really happy in this role.

Looking at your own life, what are the activities you have explored to find the place where you can do fulfilling work? What did you learn from these experiences? At a certain point you may have taken the next step.

Feeling At Home

What are the places where you feel at home? What are the activities, projects or situations where you feel you were meant to be? Here are some of the things that people describe.

I feel at home when:

I am working in Accident & Emergency ... I am singing on stage ... I am facilitating a counselling session ... I am playing in my favourite position on the football pitch ... I am sailing on the high seas.

I am working in my garden ... I am teaching a class at University ... I am making a pitch for business ... I am doing live TV news reports ... I am helping leaders to clarify their future strategy.

How do you know when you may feel at home? Here are some of the characteristics.

You look forward to what you will be doing that day ... You feel in your element - at ease and yet able to excel ... You breathe more easily ... You helicopter above the situation whilst also being hands-on.

You feel in control and able to shape the situation ... You can see patterns quickly and predict what will happen ... You feel things are going slowly even though they may be going swiftly.

Imagine that you feel at home when doing a specific activity. You may then sometimes experience the next step.

Fulfilling Work Where You Feel At Home

Looking back, when have you done fulfilling work in a place where you felt at home? You may have done this when encouraging a person, teaching a class, refurbishing a house, leading a team or doing another activity.

What was the purpose of the work? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? What happened as a result? What did you learn by doing the fulfilling work?

Different people learn different things when exploring these questions. One senior leader in a company I worked with gave the following explanation.

"Looking back, I learned that I feel most at home when leading pioneering projects in a business. I love leading a team of people who are passionate about doing something that will improve life for their colleagues or customers."

"Bearing this in mind, I decided to step down from the leadership team in our business. I was fed up with the ongoing meetings and managing stakeholders who had conflicting agendas."

"I chose to lead a project on the tablet side of our business. The aim was to make the equipment more user friendly. Suddenly I felt more at ease."

"I was in a place where, within certain limits, we could invent the rules. The project proved successful and our tablet became the go-to choice for one of our national sports teams."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a place – an activity, project or situation – where you will feel at home? How can you apply yourself in that situation and do fulfilling work?

The Helicopter And Hands-On Approach

Helicopter And Hands-On

Great workers sometimes focus on the specific activities where they are simultaneously able: a) to helicopter above the situation; b) to be hands-on; c) to shape what happens.

There are many ways to build on your strengths. One approach is to focus on the specific activities where you are simultaneously able:

To helicopter above the situation;

To be hands-on;

To then, when appropriate, shape what happens.

Great workers sometimes follow this path. They put themselves into situations where they see what is happening from above and, at the same time, they are fully engaged in the moment. They then focus on how to shape the situation to achieve success.

Different people explain this approach in different ways. Here is how one therapist described what happened for them.

"The first time I experienced this sensation was when I was running a family therapy session. This sounds odd: but suddenly it felt as if I was hovering above people in the room.

"Looking from above, I could clearly see the family communication patterns. At the same time I was still completely involved in the face-to-face communication with each person.

"Now I have a similar experience when teaching large groups. Whilst speaking from the front, I see the smallest movement made by each person. This helps me to see patterns and, if necessary, change strategy to get results."

Exceptions sports players report similar experiences. Seeming to hover above the situation, they take pictures of what is happening and see patterns. They then apply their skills to follow their chosen strategies and achieve success.

Where does something similar happen for you? You may do this when counselling a person, playing a sport or doing another activity. You may do it when solving a technical problem, managing a specific type of crisis or tackling a particular challenge.

Looking ahead, how can you put yourself into more of these situations in the future? How can you then use your skills to make certain things happen and achieve success? What will be the benefits of taking these step?

The Absorption, Adventure And Achievement Approach

There are many ways to develop. One approach is to go through the stages of absorption, adventure and achievement.

You may take this approach when writing, gardening, painting, running or doing another activity. You may do so when encouraging a person, doing a project, running a workshop, leading a team or reframing a challenge.

People often feel alive when taking these steps. They enjoy the process of exploring, learning and creating. They may then reach their aim and enjoy a sense of achievement.

One key point is worth bearing in mind. Different people have different definitions of achievement. This can be useful to remember when encouraging other people to develop.

For some people achievement means enjoying an experience, helping others to grow or creating positive memories. For some it means gaining a badge, winning a prize or reaching a target. Let's explore how you can explore some of these steps in your own way.

Absorption

Imagine that you want to absorb yourself in a specific activity. You may simply want to do it for pleasure or to experience joy. This can be good for the soul. It can you give you positive energy and be fulfilling.

You may want to translate your chosen activity into achieving a specific goal. This could be writing an article, renovating a house, developing a skill, solving a problem, tackling a challenge or your definition of success.

How can you absorb yourself in the activity? How can you move into action? How can you be fully engaged? How can you see it as a positive adventure?

Adventure

Maria Montessori, the educator, said that children often become absorbed in an activity. They apply themselves, learn and enjoy the adventure of being creative. Finally they reach their goal and experience a sense of achievement.

Imagine that you want to pursue a particular activity or project. You may set aside time to write, cook, sing or do mountain biking. You may aim to do a creative project, tackle a challenge or do another stimulating activity.

How can you use your abilities on the adventure? How can you build on your strengths? How can you improve your skills and add to your repertoire? How can you continue to develop?

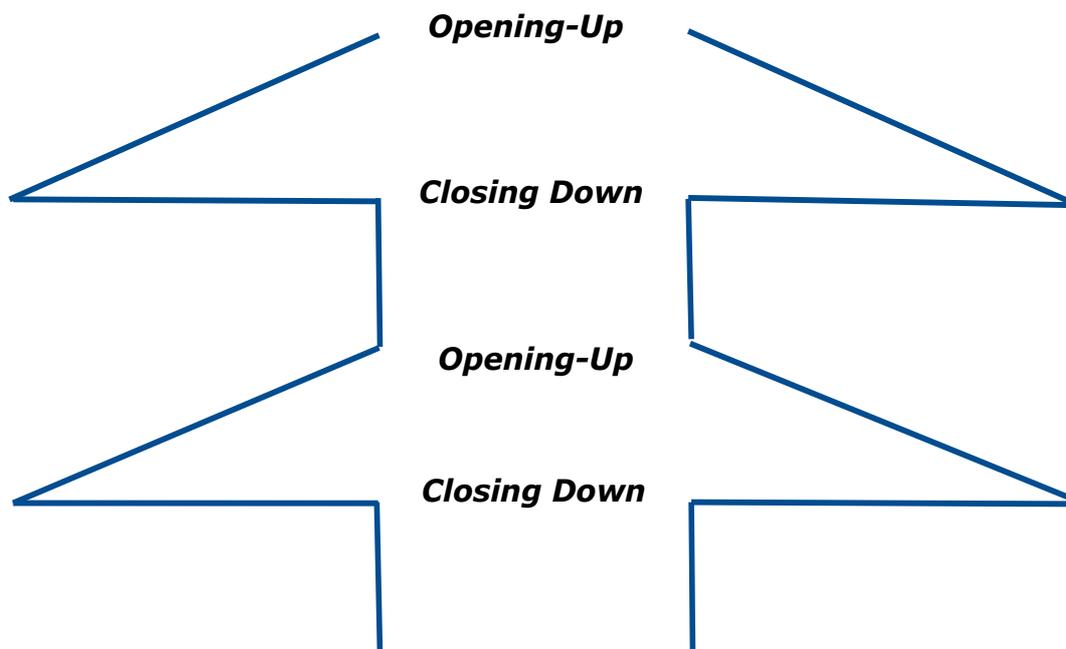

Many people love to explore, learn and adventure. Sometimes this can involve pursuing the following aspects of the creative process.

The Creative Process Of Opening-Up And Closing Down

This sometimes involves going through the following steps.

- You choose a theme you want to explore and open-up to gather information.
- You close down to sort the information and clarify what you have learned.
- You go deeper into a topic that has emerged and repeat the process of opening-up and closing down.

You choose a theme you want to explore and go through the following stages:

Imagine that you are following this approach. You may start by choosing to focus on a particular theme you want to explore.

This will involve opening-up and gathering lots of information. After a while you will want to summarise what you have learned. This will lead to closing down and clarifying what you have learned.

The information you have gathered may reveal topics you want to explore in more depth. You may again go through the process of opening-up and closing down until you feel ready to move into action.

Clicking into action, you will build on your strengths and add what you have learned. Applying your skills, you will continue until you feel satisfied with the piece of creative work.

There are several points to bear in mind when following this approach. The first is knowing when to open-up and when to close down.

The second is knowing when to move into action. You will have gathered lots of knowledge but it will be important to apply this to shape the future. This can only be done by moving into action.

Sometimes you may not feel ready but decide to start the work. Believing that some answers may emerge on the journey, you say:

"Let's crack on and do version 1.0"

Achievement

Imagine that you are pursuing an activity or doing a project. You will absorb yourself in the task and continue to develop. You may also work towards achieving a specific aim.

Sometimes the aim may be emotional. It may be to enjoy an experience or help others to take away positive memories. Sometimes the aim may be more tangible. It may be to see a finished product, achieve a target or lift a prize.

As mentioned earlier, people have different definitions of achievement. This is governed by what they set out to do. Bearing in mind what they can control, here are some things that people have said regarding what they want to achieve.

The specific things I want to achieve by doing the activity or project are:

To regain my zest for life ... To create nourishing meals that give people enjoyment ... To provide a framework in which people can find fulfilment ... To share knowledge that enables people to shape their futures.

To make music that some people find inspiring ... To give people positive memories ... To achieve a personal best in a triathlon ... To lead a yachting team around the world and back home safely.

To produce three players every year who move from the Academy to the First Team ... To make television films that encourage people to care for animals ... To create a successful social enterprise ... To build and sell a pioneering company.

How to take these steps? You will organise your time in your own way, but one model is similar to designing your perfect day. Let's explore this approach.

My Development Day

Imagine you want to design a day when you set aside time to develop. What would it look like? Let's consider some of the themes it can be useful to explore when designing such a day.

When do you feel most creative? What are your prime times – the times of the day when you have most creative energy? How can you organise your day around these times?

What is the physical place where you feel most creative? This could be a certain part of the house or another place. How can you continue putting yourself in these places?

What are things that can trigger your creativity? You may get ideas when walking, exercising, listening to music or other situations. How can you continue doing some of these things?

You will have your own approach to making use of such a day but here are some suggestions. You may wish:

To follow your chosen way to start the day – such as when to get up and do any practical tasks – and also focus on what you want to achieve that day;

To make good use of your prime times – the times of the day when you have most creative energy – and organise blocks of time when you can work during those times;

To follow your ritual for starting the work, follow your chosen rhythm and achieve small goals on the road to achieving the bigger goal;

To, when appropriate, rest and recharge your batteries – such as by going for a walk or doing other things - and then focus on what you want to do next;

To follow your successful pattern for finishing – such as one you have followed before to finish properly – then to flow, focus, finish and find fulfilment.

There are many ways to develop. One approach is to go through the stages of absorption, adventure and achievement. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach?

The Dream, Do And Deliver Approach

Many people have dreams and some translate these into reality. Such people go through the stages of aiming to dream, do and deliver.

Looking back on your life, when have you focused on achieving a deliverable dream? You may have been aiming to climb a mountain, get a job, publish a book, complete a project or do another activity.

What research did you do before starting the journey? What did you do to increase the chances of success? How did you do your best to achieve the goal? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

People have dreams all the time. They may dream of winning the lottery, being happy, doing rewarding work, being famous or reaching a goal.

Some people explore many options and then focus on achieving a deliverable dream. Let's explore this theme.

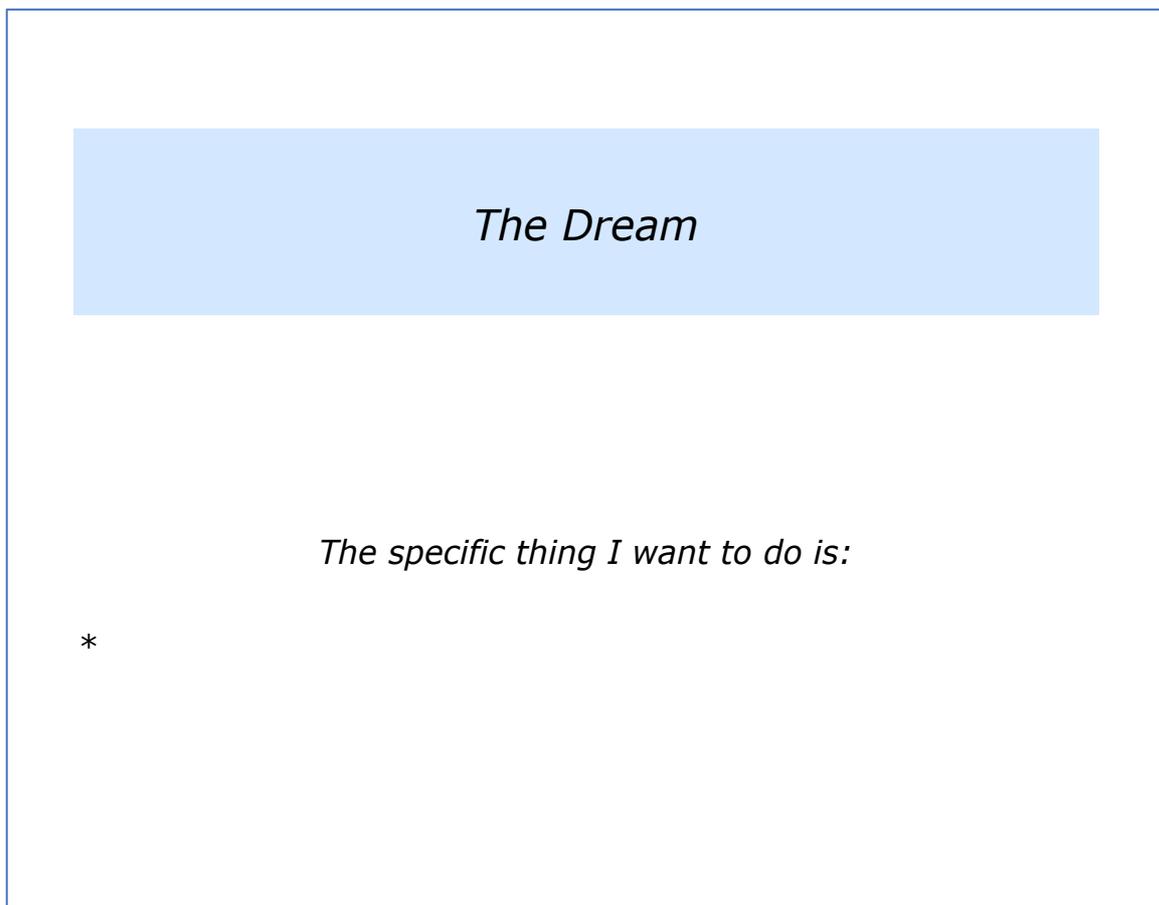

Dream

Imagine that there are several goals you want to achieve. You may want to be a caring parent, improve your wellbeing, pursue a stimulating project or do another activity.

Considering all the things you want to do, you may want to focus on one specific goal. Bearing in mind what you can control, you may then aim to take the following steps:

To clarify the real results you want to achieve – this is the dream ... To rate the chance of success and how you can improve these chances ... To clarify how you can do your best to achieve the dream.

Different people do such due diligence in different ways. Some use the following framework.

The Dream

The real results I want to achieve are:

The Success Rating

Bearing in mind the things I can control and the potential challenges, the rating I would give regarding the chances of achieving success is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to increase the chances of success are:

The Deliverable Dream

The specific results I believe it is possible to achieve are:

The specific strategies I can follow to do my best to deliver these results are:

Do

Imagine that you have done all your planning. You will then swing into action. When doing this it can be useful:

To keep following your chosen strategies and get some early successes – this helps to build confidence and momentum;

To keep maintaining high standards – this involves following good habits and doing the right things in the right way every day;

To keep reading reality and seeing what is happening – this involves building on what is working and focusing on areas for improvement.

You can aim to keep doing your best each day and encourage yourself on the journey. Different people do this in different ways. One approach is:

To clarify the successes you have achieved that day;

To clarify the specific things you want to do the next day and the successes you want to achieve;

To clarify how doing these will contribute towards achieving the long-term picture of success.

Different people work towards different goals. They may aim to help themselves, help other people or do both. They may do this as individuals or when working with other people. Let's look at one example.

The Action For Happiness movement aims to increase the amount of happiness in the world. Here is an introduction to its work.

Action For Happiness

Action For Happiness is a movement of people committed to building a happier and more caring society.

Many of our members form local groups to take action together. We have no religious, political or commercial affiliations and welcome people of all faiths (or none) and all parts of society.

We were founded in 2010 by Richard Layard, Geoff Mulgan and Anthony Seldon. Our patron is the Dalai Lama

We want to see a fundamentally different way of life - where people care less about what they can get just for themselves and more about the happiness of others.

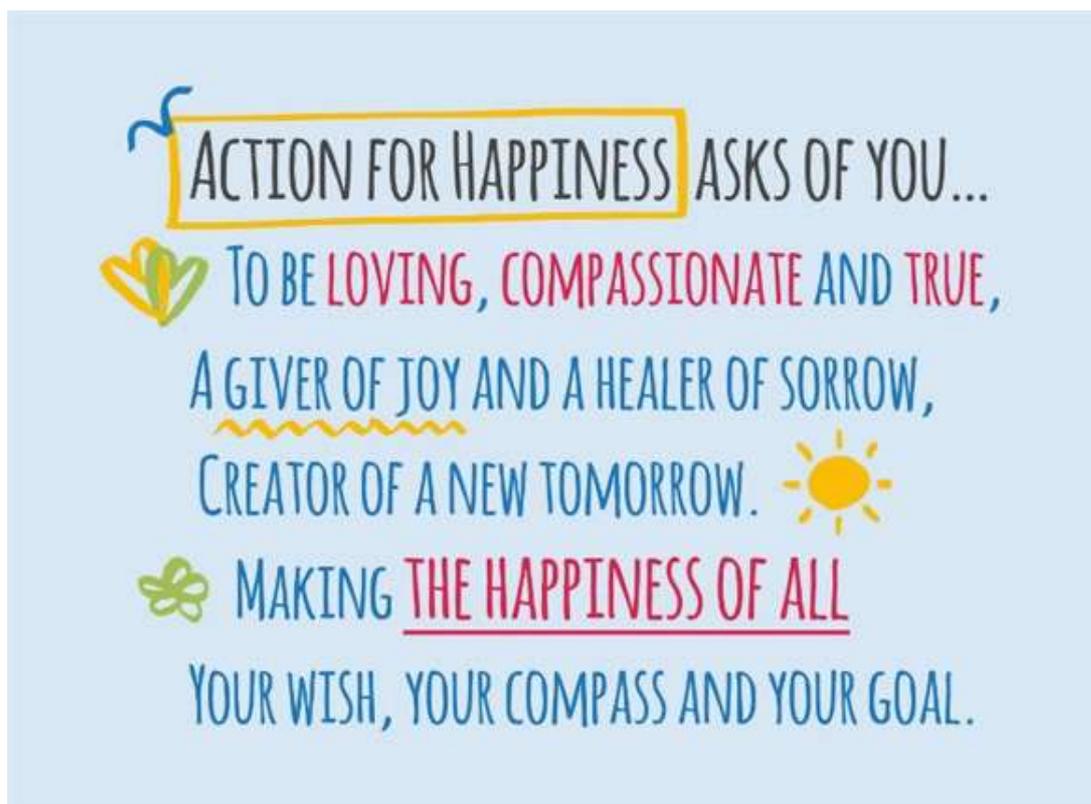

We bring together like-minded people from all walks of life and help them take practical action, drawing on the latest scientific research.

We are backed by leading experts from diverse fields including psychology, education, economics and social innovation.

Members of the movement make a simple pledge: to try to create more happiness in the world around them.

We provide ideas and resources to enable people to take action at home, at work or in their community.

Many of our members form local groups to take action together.

Deliver

Imagine that you are working towards your chosen goal. Bearing in mind what you can control, you can keep doing your best. You can maintain perspective and aim:

To recognise your achievements so far and then focus on the next steps towards achieving the goal;

To, when facing certain issues, buy time to think, explore your options and find solutions to challenges;

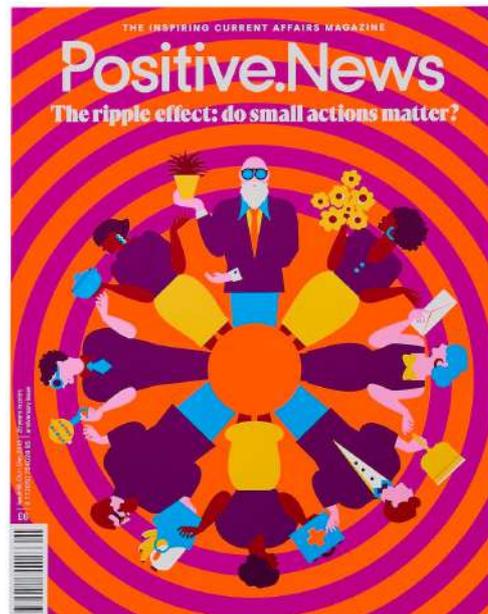

To follow your successful pattern for finishing and do your best to achieve the deliverable dream.

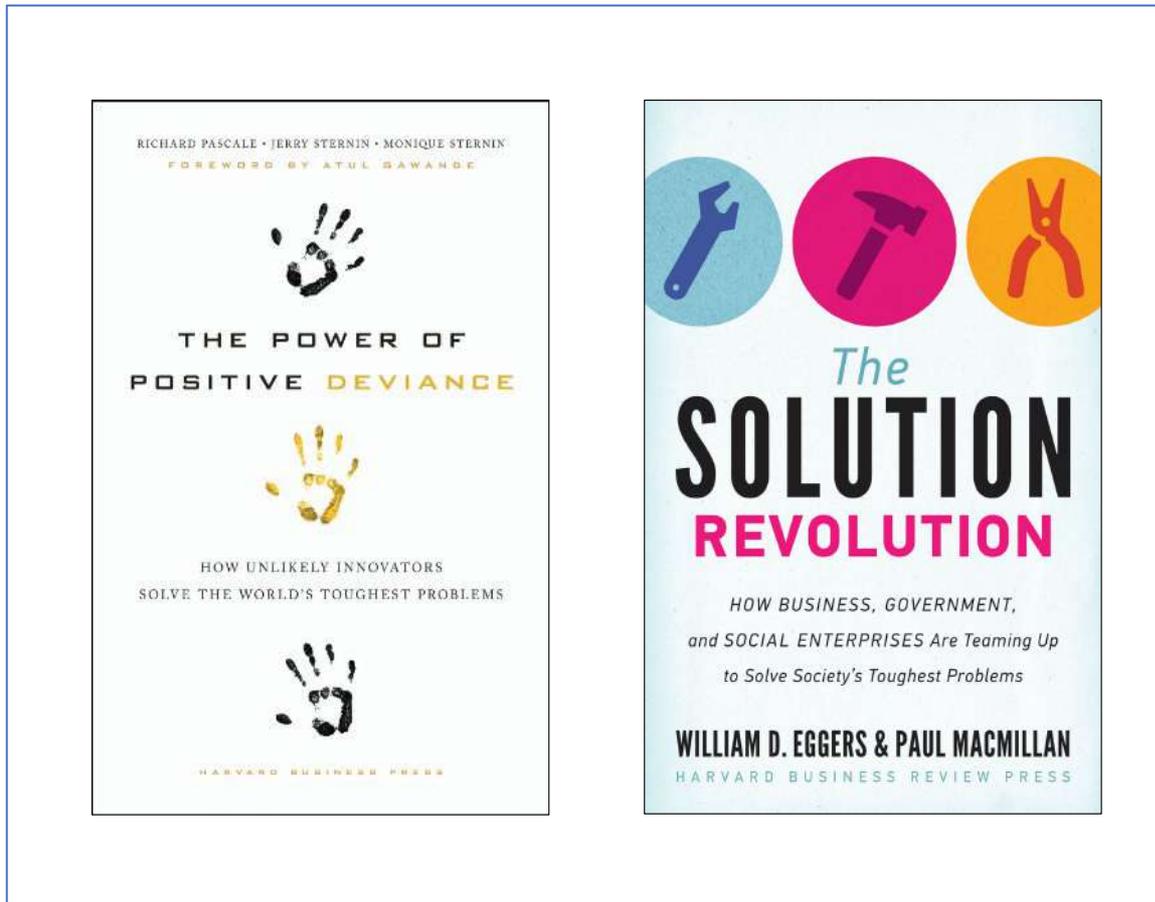

Different people work towards achieving different dreams. Today there are many websites, articles and books that describe the specific steps that people have taken to deliver certain dreams. Here is a selection of such resources.

The Strategic Questions Approach

Strategic Questions

There are many ways a person can clarify their strategy when tackling a challenge or aiming to achieve a goal. One approach is for them explore the following themes.

This approach can be adapted by individuals, teams and organisations. It involves focusing on the:

This is an approach you can use in your own life or when helping other people. It can be useful to clarify the strategies that can be followed to provide the greatest chance of success.

One approach is to focus on the themes of What, Why, How, Who and When. The following pages provide questions that a person can ask when using this approach. These can also be adapted by teams who want to clarify their strategy.

People can focus on what they can control in situations. They can then build on what they can control and manage what they can't.

This approach also involves a different way of exploring the Why question. It focuses on clarifying the benefits of achieving a goal. People sometimes find it easier to answer this question. Here are the themes.

What

What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What are the actual words I want the various people to be saying after I have done the work? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the results?

Why

Why do I want to reach the goal? What will be the benefits for the various stakeholders? What will be the pluses? What may be any potential minuses? How can I build on the pluses and manage the consequences of any minuses?

How

How can I do my best to achieve the results? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I perform superb work? What is the kind of support that I and other people need to achieve the results?

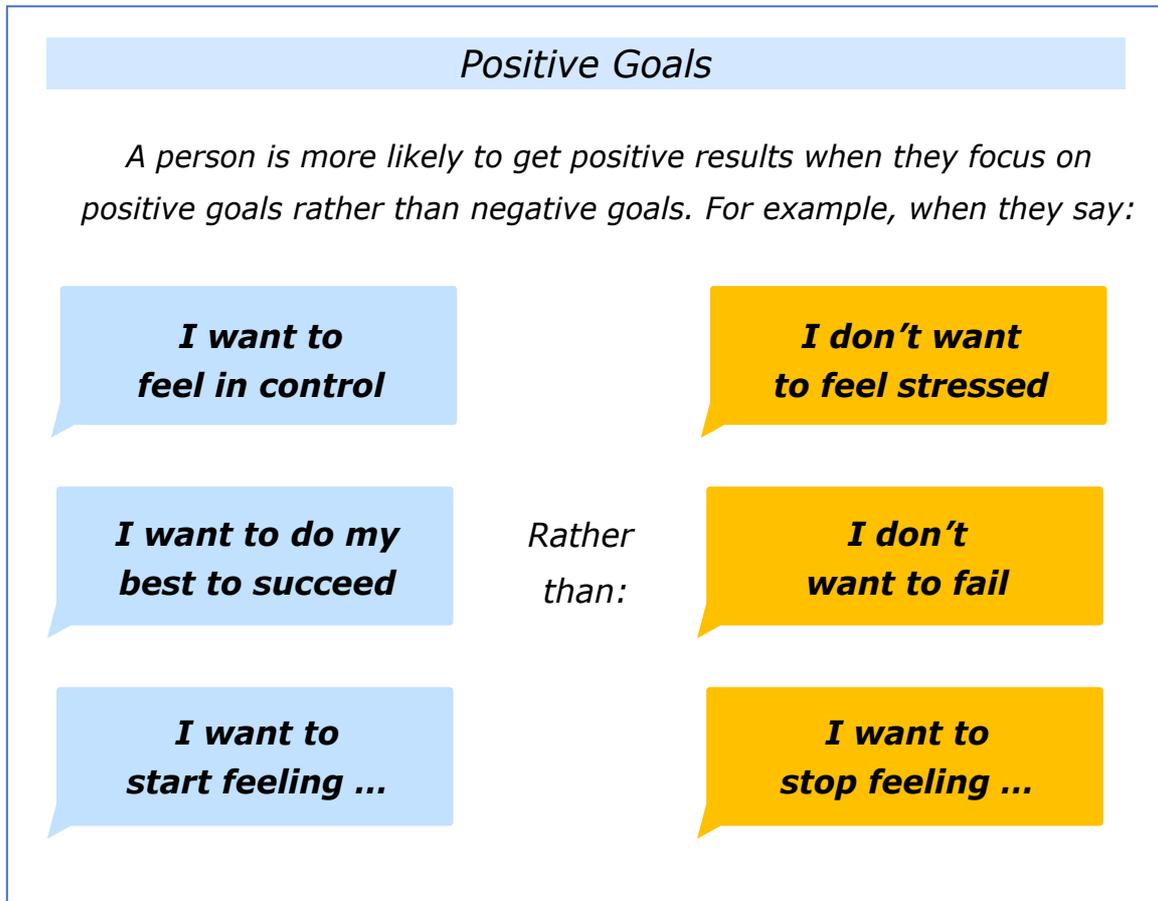

Who

What is my role in working to achieve the goals? If appropriate, who are the people I want to help me? What are the attitudes and abilities I want them to demonstrate? How can I encourage them to build on their strengths and make clear contracts about their best contributions?

When

How can I translate the strategies into a clear action plan? What is the road map with the milestones along the way? How can I get some quick successes? How can I keep doing reality checks about what is working and what can be improved? How can I reach the goals and then add that touch of class?

The Positive Goals Approach Rather Than The Negative Goals Approach

This an approach that can be used to help a person to take more control of shaping their future. It is based on the principle that:

A person is more likely to achieve positive results when they focus on positive goals rather than negative goals.

Some people spend much of their lives worrying about what they want to stop doing. Sometimes it can be useful to help them to focus on what they want to start doing instead. They can then translate this into a positive goal. They can aim:

To be the best they can be rather than worry about being the best ... To take control rather than be stressed ... To focus on their assets rather than their angst ... To follow positive addictions rather than negative addictions ... To make magic rather than worry about making mistakes.

There are many ways to help a person to take these steps. Let's have a look at one approach

Clarify the person's positive goal

A person may say that they want to stop having a particular feeling or doing certain things. They may say something along the following lines.

"I want to stop feeling stressed, angry, frustrated or behaving in a particular way."

The person may find it easier to reach a positive goal rather than a negative goal. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to ask them something along the following lines.

"What do you want to start feeling or start doing instead? What would be the benefits of taking those steps?"

This process can take time. The person may want to talk about why they feel a certain way or the difficulties they face. At a certain point, however, it is important to encourage the person to focus on what they can control in the situation. It is then to help them:

To clarify what they do want to feel or what they do want to do ... To clarify and set a positive goal ... To clarify the benefits of achieving the goal.

Clarify the person's strengths and the strategies they can follow to achieve the positive goal

There are many ways to help a person to work towards their goal. One approach involves helping them to learn from their positive history. Much depends on the goal they want to achieve, of course, but it can mean exploring some of the following themes.

"Looking back, when have you taken control in a difficult situation? When have you stayed calm? When have you bought time before making a decision?"

"When have you done things that gave you positive energy, helped you to feel happier or gave you a sense of peace? When have you behaved in a way that helped you or other people?"

"When have you chosen to follow a positive addiction – such as exercising, yoga or helping other people – rather than a negative addiction?"

Imagine that you are helping a person. Bearing in mind the goal they want to achieve, you may then want to say something along the following lines.

"You already have a successful pattern. What did you do right then – even for just a short time – to achieve your aim? What were the principles you followed?"

"Let's move on to the future. How can you follow some of these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to work towards the goal you want to achieve."

This approach helps to affirm the person. If appropriate, however, you can also use element of the adding approach. Bearing in mind what the person wants to achieve, you may say something along the following lines.

"If you are interested, I can offer some ideas and strategies that people use to get the kinds of results you want to achieve. Would you like me to share some of these?"

You can then pass on strategies that work and practical tools the person can use to achieve their goal. It is important to share these in a way the person can accept and use in their life or work.

Clarify the person's action plan for achieving the positive goal

People need to believe in their chosen way forward, which is why it is useful to build on their successful patterns. The next steps are to help the person:

To clarify their action plan for working towards the positive goal;

To rehearse following these strategies and how they will deal with any challenges along the way;

To get a quick success, maintain the momentum and do their best to achieve the positive goal.

The key point is worth underlining again. It is to encourage a person to focus on a positive goal rather than a negative goal. They are then more likely to achieve success.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Positive Vision To Fill A Vacuum Approach

This is an approach that I learned from some of sages I visited. Many aimed to help people in therapy, education, organisations and society. Here is a summary of how they explained this approach.

"People can sometimes grow by helping them to focus on a positive vision. This is the case whether working with an individual, team, organisation or aspects of a society.

"People can get into difficulty when experiencing a vacuum. This can create angst for a person, team or organisation. Opportunists try to fill a vacuum in society by filling it with negativity and looking for scapegoats.

"When appropriate, you can aim to help people to find or create a positive vision. It is vital, however, that people can believe in the goals. You can then help them to translate the ideas into action and achieve their vision."

Different people help others to take these steps in different ways. Some of the people I learned from aimed to help people:

To focus on their values and translate these into a positive vision;

To do things that enabled them to develop their vitality – their energy – and translate their values into positive action;

To deliver visible results and achieve their positive vision.

As mentioned earlier, people can fall into difficulties because they experience a vacuum. This can happen for various reasons. For example:

They may want to recover their zest for life ... They may want to feel decisive rather than feel they are drifting ... They may want to have a new sense of purpose in their personal or professional life.

The approach I learned was to try to focus on a person's positive energy and help them to see a positive vision. It is vital that they believe in the aims and, with encouragement, feel they can achieve the vision.

The aim has to be to do this as early as possible in a session. People need to experience something that gives them practical hope. The next steps are to focus on strategies that can help them to achieve positive results.

Imagine that a person who is experiencing a vacuum has asked for your help. They could be recovering from a setback, wanting to find a sense of purpose or tackling another challenge.

How can you help them in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Clarifying Your Moral Compass For Helping People To Achieve Their Goals Approach

My Moral Compass

Can Do

The things that I can do to help people to achieve their goals are:

Can't Do

The things that I can't do to help people to achieve their goals are:

Many people want to help others in their lives and work. One approach is for them to start by clarifying their moral compass about what they can and can't do to help people to achieve their goals. This can help them:

To make a clear contract with themselves about what they can and can't do to help people to achieve their goals;

To make clear contracts with other people about what they can and can't do to help them to achieve their goals;

To make clear contracts about their responsibilities and the other person's responsibilities in working to help the person to achieve their goals.

People who take this approach need to be morally comfortable with their answers. They also need to anticipate how they can translate these into action in challenging scenarios.

They can rehearse how they can do their best in specific situations. For example, how they can help individuals who want to shape their careers, manage a crisis or deal with a difficult problem.

Some people care so much that they start taking over what are actually the other person's responsibilities. They do not know where they end and the other person begins. This does not always help.

Imagine that somebody has asked for your help in working to achieve a goal. Much will depend on the specific situation, of course, but it can be useful to clarify what you can and can't offer them.

Different people identify different things when exploring these themes. Looking at my own work, for example, here are some things that I can do and can't do. You will, of course, have your own list that covers these areas.

Can Do

The specific things I can do to help a person to achieve their goals

I Can Aim:

- To prepare properly before meeting the person ... To find out what I can about the person and their situation ... To clarify what may be happening in their world - such as the challenges they may be facing and the goals they may want to achieve.

- To, when meeting them, create an encouraging environment in which they feel at ease ... To clarify the topics they want to explore ... To invite them to focus on one of these topics ... To clarify the real results they want to achieve.

- To clarify what they can control in the situation ... To clarify the possible options for going forwards ... To clarify the consequences - the pluses and minuses - of each option ... To clarify the attractiveness of each option.

- To clarify their strengths ... To clarify their successful pattern for tackling similar challenges in the past ... To clarify how they could build on their strengths and follow their successful pattern to tackle this challenge ... To explore any other creative options.

- To ask if it is okay to share some ideas ... To pass on knowledge, strategies and practical tools that work in these kinds of situations ... To see which of these ideas resonate and that they want to explore further.

- To then, if appropriate, invite them to decide which option - or combination of options - they want to follow to work towards achieving their goals ... To enable them to make an action plan they believe in ... To go onto the next topic they want to explore.

Can't Do

The specific things I probably can't do to help a person to achieve their goals

I Can't:

- I can't motivate them if they are not prepared to motivate themselves. I can provide encouragement and practical tools that work. But it will be up to them to keep motivating themselves.*
- I can't do the actual work for them. I can help them to explore their options and the consequences. But it will be up to them to take responsibility for taking their chosen route and doing the work.*
- I can't control things that are beyond their control. I can help them to build on what they can control and manage what they can't. I can enable them to do their best and increase the chances of achieving success.*

Clear Contracting Can Be Important

Clear contracting is crucial in many areas of life. This is especially so in certain kinds of helping relationships.

Good therapists, for example, recognise what they can and can't do for a client. They also make clear contracts about their responsibilities and the client's responsibilities in working towards the client's goals.

This is an approach that I learned early on when working with people. After explaining the ways I could help the person, it was important to make clear contracts about the respective responsibilities in the professional relationship.

My Responsibilities Were:

To prepare properly for the sessions ... To be encouraging ... To clarify the person's goals ... To build on their strengths and provide strategies that work ... To always behave in a professional way ... To do my best to help them to achieve their picture of success.

The Person's Responsibilities Were:

To choose to have a positive attitude towards the sessions ... To take responsibility for shaping their future ... To clarify their goals ... To take the ideas they liked and apply these in their own ways ... To do their best to work towards achieving their picture of success.

This was an approach I continued to use when working with individuals, teams and organisations in many walks of life. The aim was:

To show that I understood their picture of success .. To explain the practical ways I could try to help them to achieve their picture of success ... To make clear contracts about my role and their role in working towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your moral compass. Imagine that a person has asked for your help or professional expertise in helping them to achieve their goals. Bearing in mind the goals they want to achieve, try exploring the following themes.

What are the things you can do to help the person? What are the things you can't do? What do you see as your and their responsibilities? How can you make clear contracts about the respective responsibilities? How can you then do your best to help them to achieve their goals?

The Serving Something Greater Than Yourself Approach

Rabindranath Tagore said that discovering the way you want to serve can lead to joy.

He expressed this in the following way.

"I slept and dreamt that life was joy.

"I awoke and saw that life was service.

"I acted and behold, service was joy."

When do you feel that you are serving something greater than yourself? How do you submerge yourself in the activity? How do you aim to serve others or work for a particular cause? What may happen as a result?

You may be caring for your loved ones, pursuing a creative drive or helping other people to succeed. You may be following a spiritual faith, pursuing your vocation or working for a mission that you believe in.

Sometimes it can be useful to remember the phrase: "You are most yourself when you forget yourself." The paradox is that – like in a flow experience – sometimes your sense of self emerges stronger. When does this happen for you?

Many people who work in the service business follow this approach. They aim to use their strengths to do superb work and help other people to achieve success. This is an ethic I was taught during my early work with people. My mentors gave the following message.

"It is always about the other person, it is not about you. It is about helping them to feel safe and explore their options for going forwards. It is then about helping them to achieve their picture of success."

Let's return to your own life and work. What is the specific situation where you feel you are serving something greater than yourself?

What are the specific things you do then? What are the principles you follow? How do you translate these into action? How can you follow these principles in the future? What will be the benefits – both for other people and for yourself?

The Encouragement In Exceptional Circumstances Approach

"I had the choice to stay silent and be killed or to speak up and be killed.

"Let us pick up our books and our pens, they are the most powerful weapons.

"One child, one teacher, one book, one pen can change the world.

"The extremists are afraid of books and pens, the power of education frightens them."

Malala Yousafzai is somebody who encouraged other people in exceptional circumstances. Ordered to be executed by the Taliban because she believed everybody had the right to an education.

She went on to be awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. Here are some things she has said along the way.

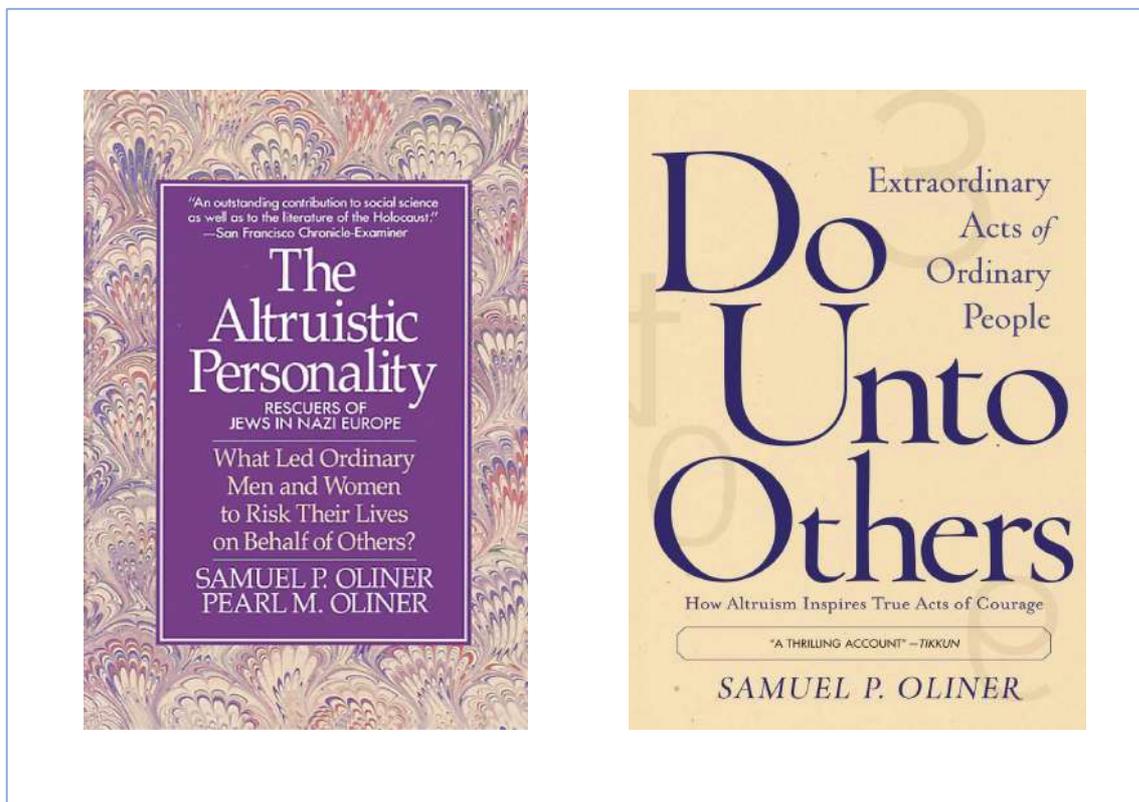

"I don't want to be thought of as the 'girl who was shot by the Taliban' but the 'girl who fought for education.' This is the cause to which I want to devote my life."

"The terrorists thought they would change my aims and stop my ambitions, but nothing changed in my life except this: weakness, fear and hopelessness died. Strength, power and courage were born.

"If you hit a Talib with your shoe, then there would be no difference between you and the Talib. You must not treat others with cruelty and that much harshly, you must fight others but through peace and through dialogue and through education."

Malala accepted the Nobel Peace Prize on 10 December 2014, with Indian children's rights and education advocate Kailash Satyarthi. She contributed her entire prize money of more than $500,000 to financing the creation of a secondary school for girls in Pakistan.

Samuel and Pearl Oliner have devoted much of their lives to studying humanity at its best. Their books include The Altruistic Personality and Do Unto Others.

The Altruistic Personality chronicles the activities of people who protected Jews during the Holocaust. Up to 500,000 non-Jews risked their own lives to rescue the victims of Nazi persecution.

These were ordinary people, say Pearl and Samuel. They were farmers, teachers, entrepreneurs, factory workers, rich and poor, parents and single people, Protestants and Catholics.

Different people helped the Jews in different ways. Some offered them shelter, some helped them escape from prison and some smuggled them out of the country.

The rescuers committed themselves to helping Jews, knowing that capture would mean death for their families. Why? Many said, "It was the right thing to do." Individuals also said things like:

"I was always filled with love for everyone, for every creature, for things. I am fused into every object. For me everything is alive."

"I sensed I had in front of me human beings that were hunted down like wild animals. This aroused a feeling of brotherhood and a desire to help."

"We had to help these people in order to save them, not because they were Jews, but because they were persecuted human beings who needed help."

Let's return to the genesis of The Altruistic Personality. Samuel illustrates the moral of the book by describing his own experiences.

As a 12-year-old Jewish boy in Poland, he fled the Nazis after his parents were captured. Knocking on the door of a family he hardly knew, he was taken in by the mother, Balwina.

Protecting him from the Nazis, she gave her instructions. Change his name to Jusek; go to church every Sunday; learn the Catholic Catechism; get a job and ensure nobody saw him undressed.

Balwina protected him for a while, but then the situation became too dangerous. He trekked across the country with other refugees and finally found safety.

Samuel wrote another book on the theme of helping other people called Do Unto Others. In it he focuses on heroic, moral and philanthropic individuals who translated these values into action.

In addition to well-known names, he describes the activities of hidden heroines and heroes in many countries. Here is the introduction from the page on Amazon.

A passing motorist stops to help the passengers of a car that has crashed into an embankment. A hospice volunteer begins her shift in hospital ward caring for people with AIDS.

A Vietnam chopper pilot stops the brutal execution of innocent civilians at Mylai by American soldiers. A firefighter responds to a routine call.

All of these people are considered heroes, but what motivates such brave and altruistic acts, whether by trained professionals or just ordinary people?

In Do Unto Others, Holocaust survivor and sociologist Samuel Oliner explores what gives an individual a sense of social responsibility, what leads to the development of care and compassion, and what it means to put the welfare of others ahead of one's own.

Weaving together moving personal testimony and years of observation, Oliner makes sense of the factors that elicit altruistic behavior - exceptional acts by ordinary people in ordinary times.

Samuel discovered that many such people had learned optimism and concern for others from their parents, teachers, peer groups and communities. They then chose to translate this moral code into action in challenging circumstances.

The Oliners have shown what we can learn from humanity at its best. We can choose to follow these principles in our own ways to show kindness and help other people.

The Positive Encourager's Approach

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to be a positive encourager. This section has explored some of the ways it is possible to take this approach.

Looking at your own life, how would you rate yourself in terms of being a positive encourager? How would you rate yourself on scale 0-10? What can you do to maintain or improve the rating?

Different people focus on different themes when encouraging other people. These often depend on the situation where they are aiming to help them.

The following pages describe some of the questions that a professional may explore before meeting a person. You will, of course, have your own approach.

The Positive Encourager's Approach

Do Positive Work*

Introduction

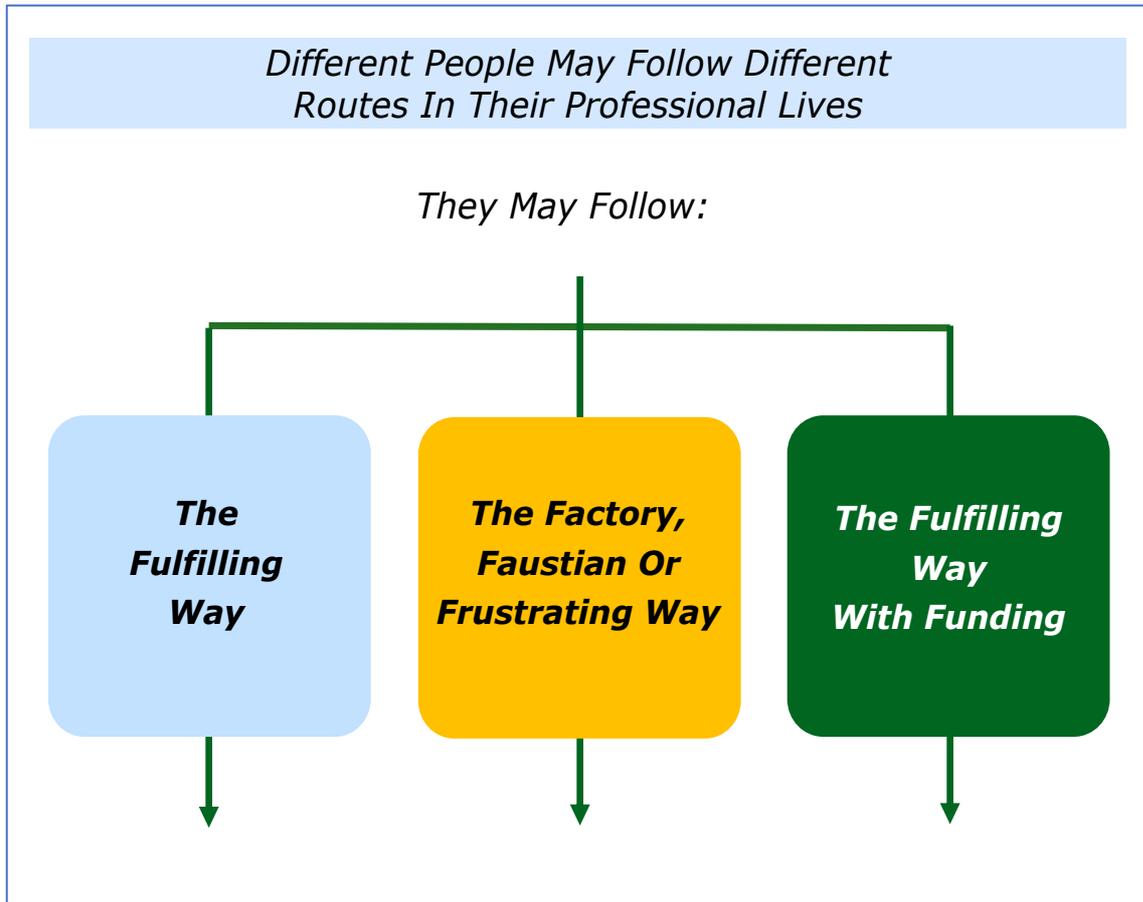

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to do positive work that helps people or the planet. This section provides practical tools that people can use to follow this approach in their own way.

Different people start their working lives in different ways. Some aim to earn enough money to survive. Some find that serendipity takes them in certain directions. Some build on their strengths and do satisfying work.

Some aim to serve something greater than themselves. Some follow their purpose and principles. Some aim to encourage both present and future generations. Some aim to achieve a certain picture of success.

Different people also follow different routes in their professional lives. The following pages describe some of these routes. There are, of course, pluses and minuses to following each of these routes.

The Fulfilling Way

Some people do work they enjoy and are not too concerned about money. They may focus on encouraging people, playing music, teaching, computing, designing, selling or following a passion.

They love to do activities in which they feel alive and able to do their best. They follow this route rather than listen to advisers who urge them to study something that will give them a guaranteed career.

Many peak performers took the fulfilling route early in their lives. Later on they learned how to get paid for following their passions.

The Factory, Faustian Or Frustrating Way

Some people follow what could be called The Factory Way. This may be because it is was the one they were expected to take or the only one available. They found doing boring work was the only way to make a living

Some schools are encouraged to follow the factory approach. The teach to test and aim to get higher in league tables. They may say good things about helping children to fulfil their potential but instead they begin to resemble factories.

Some schools now focus on what are called the Four Cs of 21st Century Skills - Clear Thinking, Creativity, Cooperation and Communication. Some people develop these on their own by pursuing their hobbies. They may then learn how to transfer these to shaping their careers.

Some people follow The Faustian Way. They sell their soul for money and hope that one day they will be free to do what they really want. They accept messages such as:

"Climb the ladder and get a good position that will provide security ... Take a job that has prospects – it may be boring, but you can do what you enjoy on the weekends ... The work may be mind-numbing, but the job has a good pension."

If a person sells their soul, however, they may find it hard to reclaim their life and enjoy the anticipated rainbows.

Some people follow The Frustrating Way. They want to do work they enjoy but find it difficult to see how this is possible. They find that their lives become fragmented.

They may have occasional periods of doing fulfilling work but then find themselves doing lots of hamster-like activities. This can lead to becoming frustrated.

Some people find their own way to do more fulfilling work. Sometimes this may be an activity they do to the side of their day job. This can feed their soul, but they long for something more.

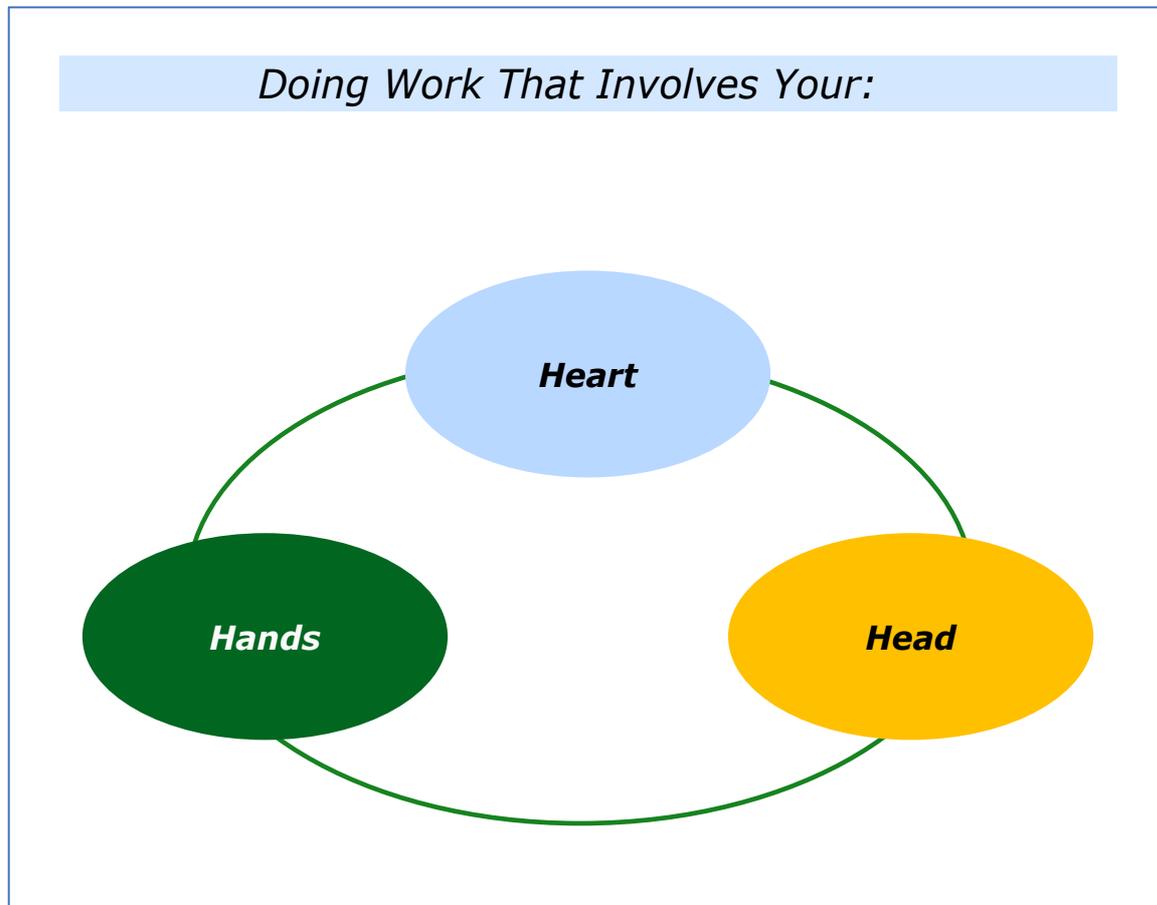

The Fulfilling Way With Funding

Some people learn how to do fulfilling work and get funding. They find potential sponsors - people who will pay them for doing what they do best. They then help those sponsors to succeed.

Such people learn to balance their soul work and salary work, their mission and mortgage. Some do it by going freelance. Others create their perfect role in an organisation. They use their nous to craft a role that is a win-win for both themselves and the employer.

Different people focus on different things when following this approach. The following pages describe some of the ways they may aim to do fulfilling work.

The Heart, Head And Hands Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to follow the old rule and do work that involves the heart, head and hands.

Your heart loves to do the specific activity. Your head has an understanding – a model or a picture – of what you are aiming to achieve. Your hands brings something into being.

By hands I mean, in some cases, literally your hands. You may paint, build, fix, type or do another activity.

But in other cases it may be using your whole being – your experience, body, voice or whatever to produce a result. Let's explore where you do such work.

Heart

What are the activities that make your heart sing? You feel entranced and carried-away. You may love gardening, painting, teaching, cooking, solving problems, climbing, writing, inventing or whatever. You feel entranced and carried-away.

You may feel at home when doing the activity. Some people go on long journeys before discovering where they do their heart work and feel at home.

They may try many activities before finding something where they feel in their element. Feeling at ease and yet able to excel, they may say things like:

"This is where I feel at home."

Different people feel they are doing their heart work in different situations at different times of their lives. One former actress who is now a communications coach expressed this in the following way.

"During my early career I felt at home in front of the TV camera or performing on stage. After a while, however, I began to feel more comfortable writing for others and directing programmes."

"Now I prefer to work with individuals rather than be in the public eye. I like to focus on their agenda and help them to develop their communication skills."

"My role is to help them to be true to themselves and communicate in a positive way. The vehicle I use is communication skills, but I find that people also grow in other ways. This is something I love."

Head

What is the specific activity that involves both your heart and your head? Your heart really wants to do it. Your head has a model for making sense of what you are doing.

Entering a situation, you go 'A, B ... and then leap to ... Z'. You have a strong feeling – or perhaps have a picture – about the goal.

Starting from this destination, you work backwards to the present. You rehearse different strategies to see which are most likely to succeed. When you feel ready, you pursue your chosen strategy.

Sometimes there will be challenges. You will then use your knowledge to find creative solutions and maybe even redraw the route. You will keep your eyes on the goal, however, and continue until you reach the destination.

Hands

When do you use your hands to bring something into being? By hands I mean, in some cases, literally your hands. You may love to paint, build, fix problems, type on your laptop or do another activity.

But in other cases you may be using your whole being. You use your experience, body, voice or other senses to produce a result.

Translating intention into action, you may do something that aims to improve the world. You may be cultivating a garden, encouraging another person, teaching a class or implementing a solution.

How do you feel when doing these activities? One person said:

"I am so involved that I forget myself but, afterwards, I feel more real, more myself."

The heart, head and hands approach can also be used when making decisions about the road you want to take in the future. When looking ahead, you can ask yourself the following questions.

Heart

What does my heart want to do? What is the route it wants me to take in the future? What may be the pluses and minuses of pursuing this route? How could I build on the pluses and manage the minuses?

Head

What does my head tell me about the key strategies I could follow to achieve success? Bearing in mind what I can control, on a scale 0-10, how would I rate the chances of success?

Hands

What is the kind of work I will need to do to achieve the goals? What are the strategies I will need to pursue? What are the skills I may need to demonstrate myself? What are those that I may need to buy in?

Bearing all these things in mind, on a scale 0-10 how motivated do I feel to pursue this route?

Let's return to your own life and work. What may be specific activity where you feel you are using your heart, head and hands? How can you pursue this activity in the future? What will be the benefits of taking this route?

The Architect, Builder And Craft Worker Approaches

Architects, Builders And Craft Workers

Some people are architects, some are builders, some are craft workers. Some combine all these approaches at certain times.

Architects

They focus on designing and overseeing the strategies for building the house.

Builders

They focus on implementing the strategies for building the house.

Craft Workers

They focus on doing specialist work for building the house.

Different people have different styles of working. They also like to focus on different aspects of getting the work done. The following section looks at three approaches that people follow to apply their talents.

Architects

Some people are architects. They focus on the big picture and make key decisions about the 'house'. They shape the design of the project, team, organisation or company.

Such individuals also decide on and oversee the key strategies to be followed. They may then work with builders and crafts workers who use their skills to build the house.

Builders

Some people are builders. They follow the agreed strategies and maintain high standards. Such individuals make clear contracts with the architects about the desired outcomes. They then act as managers or project leaders who coordinate people's skills to build the house.

Craft Workers

Some people like to follow their craft. They often have specialist skills and apply these to do superb work. Such individuals like to know the outcomes to achieve and the principles to be followed. They may also need support to use their skills and make their best contributions.

Some people move between the roles of being architects, builders and craft workers. They often do this when focusing on a specific activity which they find interesting or feel is important.

Let's return to your own work. What are the specific activities where you like to act as an architect? You like to be in charge of shaping the goals to achieve and also the strategies for achieving the picture of success.

What are the activities where, providing you agree with the brief, you are happy to be a builder? You may then enjoy implementing the strategies and making things happen.

What are the activities where, providing you agree with the aims and strategies, you do specialist craft work? You may then enjoy doing satisfying work on the detail and delivering success?

What are the specific activities when you may enjoy moving between the roles? You may want to shape the big picture, pursue the strategies and also sometimes do specialist work that delivers success.

The Service Approach

Alec Dickson – The Desire To Serve

"I believe that young people have enormous idealism and, at the same time, there are many unmet needs in society.

"So why not match these two together? We can use the young people's energy to meet those needs and build a better world.

"The act of giving can show us a positive way forwards. The receiver is given help and the giver can also learn about themselves as a person. This can help to build a more humane and caring society."

Some people like to serve something greater than themselves. They choose to take this approach rather than focusing on their own self-promotion.

The service approach was one I learned from Alec Dickson, one of my mentors. He founded Voluntary Service Overseas and Community Service Volunteers.

It was Alec who gave me my first opportunity to work with people. Travelling to CSV's office in London in 1967, I had no idea how my life would change. Several years had been spent trying to get a full-time voluntary job helping others, but this had proved difficult.

During the visit to Toynbee Hall, I had a promising meeting with Elisabeth Hoodless, who was later to lead CSV. Alec then introduced himself. The things he said struck an immediate chord. My lack of education did not matter, he said. I had something to give.

Treating me as if I was extremely intelligent, he explained the philosophy behind VSO and CSV. Here is a summary of some things he said.

Alec believed that the giver often receives as much as the receiver. Why? Our self fades into the background when we are giving and yet we often feel more real afterwards.

Leaving the meeting, I floated along the pavement. Elisabeth and Alec had promised me they would find a place for me to serve. They gave me the opportunity to become a housefather for mentally handicapped children. Since that day I have always had the opportunity to do fulfilling work.

Many people reported similar meetings that changed their lives. Here is an extract from an obituary written about Alec after his death in 1994. It was written by Martin Stephen for The Independent.

A Meeting Multiplied Many Times

I met Dickson on many occasions but the abiding memory is of the first: being summoned by him to a meeting at 11.30pm at Sheffield Midland station (he was, as usual, in transit), to discuss my recently announced placing as a volunteer at a northern remand home.

I was barely 17 years old. Though there were clear similarities between my recent experience in a public school boarding-house and life with 50 delinquents in a secure unit, my sense of panic was held at bay only by my sense of shock.

I do not remember his exact words, but he said he trusted me, as he trusted all his volunteers, to do the job, to help someone along the way and to end up just a little wiser after.

It was a turning point in my life and I know from countless conversations that I was one of many who were similarly affected.

The Solid Ground Approach

People often work best when they are on solid ground rather than dangerous ground

Solid Ground

Dangerous Ground

People often do their best work when they build on what for them is solid ground. They work less well when they are on dangerous ground. Let's explore these themes.

Solid Ground

Looking at your own work, when do you feel on solid ground? You may be running a mentoring session, dealing with a certain kind of crisis, leading a team, playing a sport or doing another activity.

Different people feel comfortable in different situations. One person may feel comfortable dealing with complex technical problems, one when treating patients in an intensive care unit, one when performing on stage.

Different people also feel more at ease in certain kinds of cultures. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I have always felt at ease working with entrepreneurs and pioneers. I am less good working with people in old style institutions.

"During my youth I travelled around the world, beginning by doing voluntary work. After a while I got used to living off my wits. This helped when I stumbled upon some of the first dot.com businesses.

"Although I knew little about the field, I had learned a lot about decision making and the consequences. Soon I found myself acting as a listening ear to people who were running these businesses. After a while this turned into a full-time role.

"Over the next decade I tried to learn everything I could about decision making. I did not have the money to study at business schools, but I did manage to meet many leaders in the field.

"Now I make my living helping people to make decisions. That might sound scary. But I am actually quite comfortable going into situations where the decision making has wide implications."

Let's to return to where you feel on solid ground. You may feel at ease because you know your subject area, know your audience and know their specific goals. Certainly you will be happy to stretch yourself, but you feel confident of being able to succeed.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

First, describe the specific situations where you feel on solid ground. Second, describe the specific reasons why you feel on solid ground in these situations.

Solid Ground

The specific situations where I feel on solid ground are:

*The specific reasons why I feel on

Dangerous Ground

When do you feel on dangerous ground? You may feel uncomfortable working with certain kinds of people or where your values may not fit the culture.

People can develop by stretching themselves, of course, but one point is worth underlining. They need to be in a situation where they stand a chance of achieving success.

Great workers often focus on certain specialist areas where they can become experts. They also work with the kinds of people with whom they work best.

Trying to change their offering to reach a different audience can become dangerous ground. It can be important to reach different kinds of people, but not at the expense of diluting their top talent.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind your chosen activity, describe the following things.

How can you avoid putting yourself on dangerous ground?

If you must go there, how can you prepare properly? How can you be professional and manage potentially difficult moments?

The Mission And Mortgage Approach

What gets you out of bed in the morning? Your mission, your mortgage or a combination of both? A person may aim to get the right blend in their life. They may say something like:

"I'd like to pursue my labour of love, but also maintain a certain lifestyle. Is that possible?"

Let's explore how you can balance pursuing your mission and paying your mortgage.

Pursuing Your Mission

Many people who feel fulfilled in their work have a similar pattern. Early on in their professional lives – between the ages of 16 and 28 - they followed their passion.

Years later they may have learned how to make money, but during that formative time they pursued their mission. This may have been hazy, such as wanting:

"To help people ... To create beauty ... To fight for justice ... To show a better way ... To make inspiring music."

They did everything possible, however, to explore and then pursue their chosen road. Later they translated this mission into ways they could pay their mortgage. Bearing this in mind, somebody may ask:

"Sound okay, but what about after 28, is there hope?"

Of course, but this calls for regaining the habit of doing what you enjoy. Why? People make financial commitments from their mid-20s onwards.

They may want to regain their sense of purpose, but are not sure how to do so whilst, at the same time, paying their mortgage.

People who make this transition successfully often take the following steps.

They clarify their mission – their purpose – by identifying their long-term picture of success.

They clarify the principles they can follow to pursue these goals.

They translate the principles into daily practise and work towards their picture of success.

They do something each day – however small – that contributes to achieving their life goals. Such habits become a lifestyle and begin to fulfil their sense of mission.

The Guaranteed Income Approach

There are many exercises that people use to clarify their mission. One approach is to invite a person to do the old exercise My Guaranteed Income.

As you may know, this invites a person to explore the following theme.

"Imagine that you had a guaranteed income for the rest of your life. You had enough money live comfortably. What would you do?"

Few people say they would do nothing. Many reflect for a while. Then they say:

"What I would really like to do would be ..."

They often describe things that would make their soul sing. Bearing in mind their answers, one approach is to explore how they can begin doing some of these things.

Sometimes later they can focus on how they can do fulfilling work and, if they wish, get some funding. At the very least, however, this exercise provides a good beginning for getting the creative juices flowing.

Paying Your Mortgage

Many people want to maintain a certain lifestyle. The often means earning enough money to pay the mortgage. Sometimes this works out well. Sometimes it can lead to over-stretching, which can lead to problems.

Sometimes unexpected events cause people to assess their life goals. One person explained this in the following way.

"Five years ago our family went through a crisis. My partner became ill and I almost lost my job. Like many people in this situation, we asked:

'How much money do we need – as opposed to how much do we want?'

"Eventually we found it was possible to live on just over half our previous outgoings.

"Getting back in shape meant, for example, buying and using food carefully, rather than throwing lots of it away; reducing outgoings, such as certain kinds of insurance; and selling-off stuff at car boot sales.

"Looking back, the crisis taught us to value what was really important. We had spent years spending money on things that weren't necessary."

Financial turnarounds take time and creativity. But it can be liberating to feel that you – rather than others – are shaping your financial future.

Pursuing Your Mission And Paying Your Mortgage

How to get the right balance? If you are already following your mission, then it may be a case of aiming:

To do more of the things you find fulfilling.

To get enough funding to pay the mortgage.

By continuing to follow this pattern, eventually every piece of work will contribute to pursuing your mission, as well as paying the bills.

If the gap between mission and mortgage work is too painful, however, then it could mean making a transition.

Let's consider how to make this happen. We are sometimes told:

"Do what you love and the money will follow."

This sounds good, but another mantra is:

"Build on your strengths, do superb work and help your customers to succeed."

"Keep doing the right things in the right way every day. Then maybe the money will follow."

Imagine that you want to take this step. Let's explore some of the potential options.

One option may be to build on the satisfying parts of your present role. It is then to expand these until they can be translated into a full-time role.

How to increase the chances of an employer being attracted to such a proposal? They are more likely to accept it if they can see how it will help them to be successful.

Bearing this in mind, it will be vital to show how doing this role will benefit the employer. You can then ensure it provides wins for both yourself and your organisation.

A second option is to move to another employer. When doing this, however, it will be vital:

To clarify how you can build on your strengths, do satisfying work and help the employer to achieve success.

You can then position what you offer: a) by showing the employer you understand their challenges; b) by showing how you want to use your strengths to help them to achieve success.

Imagine that you have tried these approaches but prefer to go another route. You may want to go freelance or set up your own business.

There are several routes you can follow to make this happen. Here are three of the most common approaches.

People setting up their own business can choose to follow either:

● The Sink Or Swim Approach

They can give up everything and aim to start a new life.

● The Sideshow Approach

They can maintain their present role but build-up their new work during evenings and the weekends.

● The Serious Plan Approach

They can start by setting a date in the future. They can then implement a serious action plan for getting enough income by that date to make the transition to full-time enjoyable work.

The Sink Or Swim Approach

A person may get to this point because they feel overwhelmed and want to change everything immediately. They may say something like the following.

"I am totally fed-up with my present job. So I will hand-in my notice on Friday, give-up everything and start afresh. I will make it or bust."

Sounds brave and sometimes it works. Two types of people pursue this route successfully.

Emigrants who leave their country and start again with few assets. They work hard from day one and are also streetwise.

Entrepreneurs who start their business fired by anger.

They may have got sacked or got frustrated trying to get an idea through the bureaucracy of an organisation. They may say things like:

"I will show them. I will never be beholden to anybody again."

There is one group for whom this approach is less likely to work. People who are semi-institutionalised, disaffected with their present job and think that if they have a good idea the money will roll-in.

The pluses of the approach are that you start straight away, are forced to use your creativity and feel great if you succeed. The minuses are that you have little security, have few customers and may use all your energy just to survive.

The Sideshow Approach

A person may take a medium-term view. They may say something along the following lines.

"I will keep my full-time job but develop my own business on the side. I want to make sure the side business works before making the transition."

"If the part-time business takes-off, then I will quit my present job. I will then invest the time and money needed to make my business into a profitable enterprise."

The sideshow approach has become more common over the past decade. Previously frowned-upon by employers, it is now actually encouraged by many new media businesses, providing it does not clash with the corporate goals.

Frequently I hear people who take this route saying things like:

"I enjoy working here, but I also have another business which I work on it in the evenings."

"My partner runs the company, but I provide consultancy."

"I had the initial idea, but I found two people who took it to market and I sit on the board."

The pluses of this approach are you retain a sense of security. You can build from a position of strength and try many things to see if they work without risking everything.

The minuses are that you may feel split and exhausted. You may never progress beyond being a small business. You may also still take calculated risks when going full-time.

The Serious Plan Approach

A person may take a calculated long-term view. They may say something along the following lines.

"I will stay in my present job for the moment but aim to become a self-employed consultant in 6 months. By that date I aim to have customer orders totalling £25k for the first quarter."

"Starting from this goal and working backwards, I will make a specific plan showing the concrete things I must do to translate the dream into a reality."

"For example, I can probably get some work from my current employer, plus my previous boss who has left to join another company."

"Providing I do something every day towards getting future customers, I will probably achieve my goal by that date."

The serious plan approach has a good chance of success, providing the person implements it with a sense of urgency. This final point is crucial.

Sometimes in mentoring sessions I invite a would-be freelancer to consider the following scenario:

"Imagine that your present job is going to disappear in 6 months."

"You are then not allowed to work full-time with any company. But you are allowed to do freelance work for people in your present company and for other organisations.

"Who would be the first three people you would contact? What would you offer to these people? How could you help them to be successful? Do you think you would be able to survive?"

People invariably say they would survive, perhaps even thrive. They may only leap into action, however, when the knife is on their throat.

The pluses of this approach are that you build from strengths and minimise the risks. You reach satisfying milestones along the road and create the basis for building a successful business.

The minuses are that you must be disciplined and encourage yourself on the journey. You may experience conflicts of interests, especially with present customers who you may want to keep when you go freelance. You will never feel 100% certain of financial security.

A person may look at their various options and prefer to stay in their present role - even if it unsatisfying. This is also a choice and it has consequences.

The person can recognise that they have made this choice rather than feel resentful. They can then aim to build on the pluses and manage the minuses.

Let's return to your own life and work. How can you continue to get the right balance between your mission and mortgage? What will be the benefits of taking this approach?

Later in the book we will explore many practical tools you can use – and that you can help others to use – to do fulfilling work and get funding.

The Deviant Who Overdelivers Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to be a deviant and do things your own way. But this comes with a caveat.

If you are going to be a deviant, you have to overdeliver. Because otherwise some people may try to disqualify your work.

Imagine that you want to follow this route in your own way. One approach is to take the following steps.

Being Able To Channel Your Personality Rather Than Change Your Personality

Every person is different. They have their own personality style, strengths and successful way of working. The way a person operates can have both pluses and minuses for themselves and other people.

Some people learn how to channel their personality rather than change their personality. They learn how to behave in ways that help both themselves and other people.

Many creative people have a background of feeling different when they grew up. A person may have been a late developer, dyslexic or be different in another way. Those individuals who went on to thrive often had certain things in common.

They were supported by key people in their life - such as a parent, teacher or another significant person;

They were told to believe in themselves but were also taught how to survive or thrive in various situations;

They began to learn how use their differences to help themselves or other people.

People who learn how to channel their personality often follow certain guidelines. They aim to be positive, be professional and do their best to deliver peak performances.

Imagine that you want to follow these steps in your own way. Let's explore these themes.

Being Positive

One approach is to have a positive attitude towards people and help them to succeed. This sounds obvious but some individuals flaunt their individuality by dismissing other people's opinions.

'Be nice to people on your way up because you'll meet them on your way down', is an old saying from show business. Today's equivalent in fast moving organisations is:

"Be friendly towards everybody - whatever their role - because one day you may find yourself being interviewed by them for a job."

Being positive and helping people increases the chances of getting away with being different. It also puts goodwill in the bank – because there may be times when you need it.

Being Professional

Several years ago I was approached by a brilliant sales person who had twice been passed over for promotion. Getting a reality check from his boss, he found his colleagues considered him unprofessional. They described this in the following way.

"He is great with clients but not with colleagues. He promises clients that we can deliver certain things but doesn't always check with colleagues that this is possible.

"During meetings he does email rather than listen to what people are saying. He shows impatience by interrupting the speaker or going out to make phone calls.

"He has a brilliant sales brain but shows little respect for colleagues in the team."

The person had previously been in denial. But now he saw that his behaviour was preventing him getting promotion to a more strategic role. He could choose:

To ignore the feedback ... To say everybody else was wrong ... To attach himself to bosses who would hire him for his selling skills rather than interpersonal skills ... To take the messages on board and try to get another result.

He opted for the latter option. He aimed to become more professional with both colleagues and clients. Bearing this in mind, I invited him to explore the following theme.

"Imagine you are a freelancer running your own business and supplying services to this company. How would you behave?"

"You would recognise that you are always on stage. People make judgements about you every moment.

"So you would probably behave professionally towards everybody in the business - the receptionist, managing director, PA and potential future clients you met in the corridor.

"You certainly have these skills because you demonstrate them superbly with clients. Here are two questions to consider.

"Do you want to take the time to behave professionally towards everybody in the business? If so, how can you do so in the next week, month and year?"

The sales person chose to make the effort. When somebody stopped him to ask for a chat as he was rushing to a meeting, for example, he no longer brushed them aside. He gave them 100% attention and said:

"It would be good to catch up. Right now I am on my way to a meeting. But as soon as it is finished I will get back to you with a time when we can talk."

Doing simple things like saying 'Please' and 'Thank you' also had an effect. People began to feel easier in his presence and more willing to help him to succeed.

Being A Peak Performer

Great workers aim to deliver peak performances. How can you do this in your own way? Sometimes it can also be helpful to recall the basic rule about team sports that is often quoted in various forms.

Great team members look beyond their own success. They also help their colleagues and the whole team to achieve success.

Bearing this in mind, it is vital to proactively make clear contracts with your manager and other stakeholders about the outcomes they want you to deliver. You can then follow the basic rule in all service organisations.

You can use your strengths to do superb work and help all your stakeholders to achieve success.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to be a deviant who overdelivers. This can help to build goodwill and a positive reputation.

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of this approach? You may want to do it when performing a piece of work, building a successful prototype or doing another activity.

The Earning Things Approach Rather Than Entitlement Approach

Great workers believe in earning things rather than being entitled to things. They believe in following this ethic whilst also realising they may not always reap the rewards.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. One model is to focus on a specific activity where they have the ability to do superb work. They aim to earn things, apply their expertise and continue to evolve. They then do their best to deliver excellence.

Such workers keep returning to the theme of earning things. This is at the heart of what they do. They love to throw themselves into the work and apply their knowledge to deliver success. They don't like to get something for nothing.

They may spurn the idea of earning money from shares, for example, because they prefer to earn it through their own efforts. They have the ethic of earning things on the way to delivering excellence. Let's explore some of the steps they take along the way.

Enjoyment

Great workers focus on the specific activities that give them positive energy and where they can also perform superb work. They focus on those where:

They are in their element – at ease and yet able to excel ... They see the destination quickly – they go 'A, B ... and then leap to Z' ... They have a track record of finishing.

Such workers look forward to doing the work. They often enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal. They also get a creative high from doing their best and achieving their picture of success.

Earning Things

Great workers love putting in the effort required to do good work. They often use their strengths, strategic thinking and skills to apply themselves.

They love to pursue their craft. They take this approach whether working as counsellors, song writers, carpenters, designers or pursuing another path. They recognise that:

You never retire from your vocation.

Such workers have an almost spiritual view of the importance of earning things. They believe it is vital to put in the hours required to develop their craft. They see themselves as lifetime apprentices who will never become masters.

They believe in the importance of applying their gifts to earn money. They do not believe in earning money from shares or other people's labours.

They want to apply their gifts to help people in real-life situations and enable them to achieve success.

Excellence

Great workers believe in the old maxim that excellence is a habit. Whilst building on their expertise and experience, they believe in earning their corn each day.

Superb actors, artists, artisans and other workers believe in preparing properly. Whatever their age, they rehearse what they are going to do. They then click into action and do their best to achieve the desired results.

Such workers aim to do work that is: a) effective; b) excellent; c) maybe even extraordinary. Sometimes they do work that goes into another dimension and gives people a positive memory for life.

Some organisations bear these things in mind when recruiting people. They look for people who have a track record of believing in earning things rather than in entitlement. They then encourage these people to use their expertise to help the team to achieve excellence.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity where you want to follow the earning rather than entitlement approach? How can you follow this in your own way?

How can you focus on the specific activity you enjoy? How can you go through the process of earning things, applying your expertise and continuing to evolve? How can you do your best to deliver excellence?

The Awareness, Application And Achievement Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to go through the stages of awareness, application and achievement. Awareness is a good starting point but application is crucial. People can then work towards achieving their goals.

Some people become awareness junkies. They simply want to collect more ideas but seldom translate these into action. This can lead to frustration, both for themselves and other people. Application is crucial in order to achieve the goals.

Looking back on your own life, can you think of a time when you went through the stages of awareness, application and achievement? You may have wanted to improve your health, develop a skill or reach a specific goal.

What was the specific situation? How did you increase your awareness of the topic? How did you apply this knowledge? How did you do your best to achieve your goal?

Different people follow these principles in different ways. Let's consider these themes.

Awareness

Imagine that you want to explore a topic or tackle a challenge. Your first step may be to gather knowledge and develop your awareness about the theme. One person described their approach in the following way.

"Every year I had a regular health check. During one of these I got news about warning signs of a particular illness.

"At first this was a bit of a shock but then I went into research mode. Like many people do in this situation, I searched the web for information.

"This led to me finding one of the world's leading authorities in the field. Eventually I managed to get treated by him. I could not have been in more capable hands.

"He did the application part - the operations - rather than me! These were successful and hopefully I am now clear of the illness."

Good leaders also often focus on developing their people's awareness. Bearing in mind the team's strengths, they sometimes take the following steps when communicating with their people.

They describe what is happening in market, the team's future opportunities and the picture of success;

They describe the strategies the team can follow to give itself the greatest chance of success;

They describe the steps that people can take to translate the team's strategies into action and do their best to achieve success.

As mentioned earlier, awareness is a good starting point. This can then lead to the next step.

Application

Imagine that you have gathered enough information. Bearing in mind your goal, you may then aim: a) to clarify the strategies you want to follow; b) to translate these into a clear action plan. The next stage will be to apply yourself to the task.

Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to pursue their chosen strategies and take the following steps:

They follow their daily disciplines – they keep doing the right things in the right way to get the right results;

They focus on continuous improvement – they build on what is working and tackle areas for improvement;

They deal with any dramas along the way – they find solutions to challenges and work towards achieving their goals.

This final point is crucial. One person described their approach in the following way.

"I am good at following daily disciplines but it took time for me to learn how not to be distracted by dramas. Some events needed immediate attention but others could be dealt with at an appropriate time.

"Working as a leader, I aimed to anticipate potential situations that could throw us off course – such as crises in the market, staff issues or other challenges. It was possible to prevent some of these events happening.

"Sometimes we met unexpected challenges, however, which came out of the blue. After a while I learned how to buy time when faced by such events.

"My approach involved aiming: a) to keep focusing on the end goal; b) to understand the drama and explore the possible solutions; c) to implement the chosen solution and return to working towards the end goal."

Great workers continue to apply themselves to their chosen task. This can lead to the next step.

Achievement

Different people have different views regarding what constitutes achievement. Much depends on their approach to life and picture of success. Here are some things that people mention when exploring this theme.

Achievement For Me Is:

Being true to myself ... Being a good parent ... Staying sober each day ... Enabling my students to shape their futures ... Sharing knowledge that helps people.

Doing satisfying work ... Caring for people in Accident and Emergency ... Delivering peak performances in my sport ... Getting recognition ... Giving everything and having a sense of peace.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to work through the stages of awareness, application and achievement. You will, of course, have your own definition of achievement in your personal and professional life.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Principles Approach Rather Than The Prizes Approach

Different people follow different approaches in their lives and work

- Some people follow the principles approach.
- Some people follow the prizes approach.
- Some people follow their principles and, as a by-product, they also get prizes.

Some people do work they feel passionately about, follow their principles and do their best to get positive results. They are not worried about getting conventional prizes.

Some people spend a lot of time worrying about getting prizes. They worry about whether or not they will get promotion, gain status or be seen as successful.

Such an approach can lead to them tightening up and failing to do their best. Even if they do win a prize, they may then start worrying about whether they will win the next competition.

Some people get a prize each day by following their principles. The paradox is that, as a by-product, this can sometimes result in them getting conventional prizes.

The next section describes people who have used their talents to do positive work. This is followed by provide practical tools you can use to pursue this approach in your own way.

The Penny Brohn Cancer Centre

Penny Brohn created a remarkable legacy. She helped to give birth to The Bristol Cancer Help Centre. The work done there has helped many people to develop their inner strength and improve the quality of their lives. It is now called Penny Brohn Cancer Care.

As Dr Rosy Thomson says in her book Loving Medicine, the Centre was born out of pain. Penny discovered a cancerous lump on her left breast in the autumn of 1979. An operation under local anaesthetic produced bruising, bleeding and left part of the lump behind.

Doctors advised an immediate mastectomy, but she felt that full recovery depended on more than amputating her breast. Penny became convinced that her illness was the result of her lifestyle. It was a disease of her whole being, rather than being confined to any single part of her body.

Penny eventually met Pat Pilkington, Canon Chris Pilkington and Alec Forbes, a physician. The four people combined their talents to open the Centre in 1980. The Centre was then based on three key ideas.

The body, mind, emotions and spirit are interrelated ... The improvement in the health of any of these will improve the health of the whole person ... The belief that where there's a will there's a way.

These ideas were translated into certain guiding principles. These included the following.

The Centre believes in a holistic philosophy.

The Centre encourages patients to assume some responsibility for their own health.

The Centre teaches and practises a lifestyle designed to prevent cancer occurring or recurring.

The Centre educates and informs patients about safe and gentle therapies they can use to counteract disease and enhance health.

The Centre is a non-profit-making organisation that is available to everyone.

Holistic meant what it said. Far from turning on conventional medicine, the staff encouraged people to participate in choosing their own particular treatment.

While inviting patients to adopt a healthy lifestyle, diet and attitude, they did not rule out the benefits of radiotherapy and chemotherapy. Penny wrote:

We encourage patients to pack up their own individual processes and techniques: we help them to make sense of what they are doing; we stand by them whatever they do.

The Centre attracted national attention and moved into a new building at Grove House, which formally opened in 1983 by the Prince of Wales.

Penny's health was also improving at the time. During the 1980s she and the team provided inspiration for cancer sufferers across the world. Then came an enormous setback.

The Lancet published a report sponsored by two cancer charities. It said some patients who attended the Centre for treatment were twice as likely to die prematurely from the disease.

Penny, the Centre's team and the patients who had been interviewed threw themselves into refuting the report, which was eventually proved to be erroneous. This resulted in a public apology.

Penny Brohn Cancer Care moved to new premises in 2006 and continues to help people to change the way they live with cancer. It provides them with practical tools they can use to regain control of their lives.

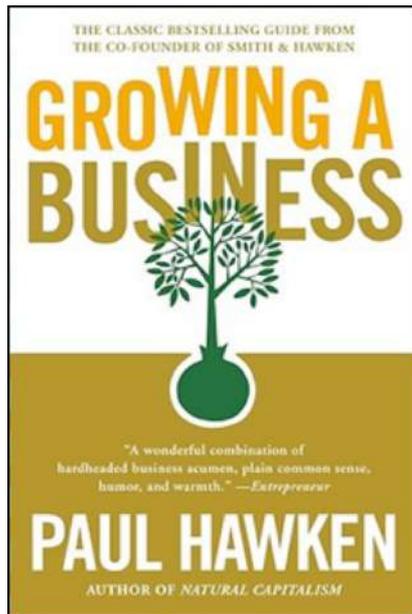

The aim is to enable people to live well with and beyond cancer. This includes providing a combination of physical, emotional and spiritual support. It comprises a range of complementary therapies, lifestyle information and self-help techniques.

Penny Brohn lived many years beyond the initial prognosis. During the 1990s, however, she suffered a spinal bone tumour. After deciding to have conventional surgery, she continued to work but also spent lots of time in Crete.

She lived there until her death in 1999, twenty years after the original diagnosis. Penny left a positive legacy.

Paul Hawken - Growing A Business

Paul Hawken - Growing A Business

Deliver quality and give great service.

Recreate something that has been lost.

Make sure you have the character to run an honest business.

Be imaginative and also be a problem solver.

Develop or, when appropriate, buy-in tradeskills.

Paul Hawken helped me to learn a lot about business even though we never met. He has a long history of helping people to build on their strengths and make their best contributions to the planet.

He began by working as a press coordinator with Martin Luther King's team in Selma, Alabama. Whilst continuing to work for human rights, he moved on to creating several ethical companies.

Paul founded Erewhon, which was based in Boston, Massachusetts. This focused exclusively on organically produced fruits, vegetables, dairy, beans, eggs, juices, and condiments.

By 1973, Erewhon had two mills, two rail cars and warehouses on both coasts. It had contracts with farmers in 37 states on 56,000 acres to supply its four stores and more than 3,000 wholesale accounts.

Paul then created Smith & Hawken - a $75 million catalogue and retail company, specialising in garden and horticultural products. It is credited with changing gardening in America by introducing European tools, techniques, varieties and literature.

His work as a practitioner – rather than just a theorist – led to him producing many books. These included The Next Economy, Growing a Business, The Ecology of Commerce and Blessed Unrest.

Paul reached millions of budding entrepreneurs through his 1980s American Public Television series Growing A Business. He advised people to develop their talents and produce quality. Many of the tips sound commonplace today, but back then they seemed radical.

Deliver quality and give great service

Deliver quality and make people feel special. Even in a recession, customers will pay for quality products delivered in a quality way. Paul explained that it is vital to focus on helping your customers.

You are trying to give your customer something other than what they are receiving from the competition. Remember that in business you are never trying to 'beat' the competition. It is a waste of time and energy trying to beat the competition because the customer doesn't care about that rivalry.

People are attracted to nostalgia – so recreate something which they believe has been lost forever. The friendly small town bank; the reliable mail-order firm or the honest garage. The quality ice-cream shop; the traditional cheese store; the aromatic coffee shop; the company that fixes mistakes without complaint.

Be imaginative – because too much money is worse than too little

Businesses suffer from a lack of imagination not capital, says Paul. Too much money tends to replace creativity. Companies without money are hungry; they must dream, imagine and improvise.

Companies awash with money try to buy solutions. They lavish vast amounts on consultants, lawyers, clever accountants, publicity agents and marketing studies. Cash and creativity are both necessary, but make sure you balance them properly.

Entrepreneurs are risk-avoiders

The common wisdom holds that entrepreneurs love to take risks, says Paul, but that's mostly hype. He explains:

Once the entrepreneur has seen how to create a product or service to meet demand, much of what the outsider perceives as risk in the situation is erased.

Entrepreneurs are like mountain climbers. They set clear goals, clarify their strategy and anticipate ways to tackle problems. On-lookers think the mountaineer is gambling, but the climber would risk more by not following their dream.

Business tests character

Business teaches you a lot about yourself, says Paul. You will face split-second decisions, to be honest or lie; to deliver quality or cut corners; to care for your customers or give shoddy service. He explains this in the following way.

The moment you enter the world of business - as a provider - not merely as a consumer - you will have a hundred opportunities a day to act beneficially or wrongly, to deal with people fairly or otherwise, to enhance your social environment or pollute it.

Businesses will always have problems

Paul once searched for magic solutions. Providing he read more books by business gurus, one day he might find business nirvana. Such enlightenment would make all his problems disappear. But then another truth hit him one sunny autumn afternoon. He wrote:

I had my nirvana, all right, but it was the opposite of what I had been seeking. On that pretty afternoon the actual truth finally struck me: I would always have problems.

In fact, problems signify that the business is in a rapid learning phase. The revelation was liberating. I couldn't understand why other people hadn't told me this earlier.

Problems create either energy or paralysis, says Paul. Get used to problems, they are an eternal part of everyday business. They may also present a chance to improve.

Develop Tradeskills

Tradeskills spell the difference between success and failure in a business, says Paul. People who have them demonstrate the following characteristics. (There are also other skills they need.)

They know how to focus on a particular market niche and create a specific service or product. They understand what people want, how they make their decision and how much they will pay.

They have a sixth sense that enables them to make quick decisions rather than get bogged down in months of meetings, brainstorming and market studies.

They know how to manage money so their income is greater than their outgoings.

They know how to keep reading the present and future needs of the marketplace.

You can still build a business without having tradeskills, says Paul. But then it may be useful to complement your strengths with people who do have tradeskills.

There are many ways to do positive work. The following pages provide many models that you can follow in your own way.

The Positive Work Approach

Introduction

The following section describes many ways to do fine work. These approaches often build on the eternal themes of What, How and When. They focus on the following questions:

- What are the real results you want to achieve?
- How can you do your best to achieve these results?
- When do you want to do your best to achieve these results?

There are many ways to explore these themes. Sometimes this can involve going deeply and then translating the ideas into action.

The Strengths Approach

“The world of work keeps changing,” some people say. “It is hard to know what skills people should learn to shape their futures.”

Perhaps. As the saying goes, however, the more things change, the more some things stay the same.

Creative people throughout history have followed certain themes to earn a living doing what they love. They have built on their strengths and found sponsors – employers or customers - who hired them for doing what they did best. They then helped those sponsors to succeed.

People who develop such eternal skills are more likely to shape their futures. Let’s explore how this works in action.

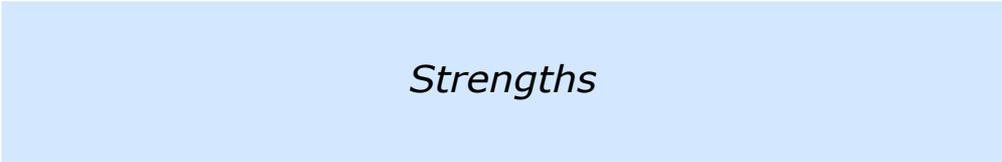

Strengths

Michelangelo, Anita Roddick and Steve Jobs had at least one thing in common. They did what they did best and got somebody to pay them for doing it. Some customers will always be interested in buying quality. And the best way of producing quality is to develop your top talents.

How can you clarify your strengths? One approach is to identify the deeply satisfying activities in which you deliver As rather than Bs or Cs.

You may be good at counselling, gardening, making furniture, singing, coaching a sport or developing software. You may be good at selling, customer care, nursing, leading certain kinds of teams or doing another activity.

Here are some questions you can ask to begin clarifying your strengths. You can then move on to clarifying the specific things you can deliver that will help people to succeed.

Strengths

Here are some questions you can explore to clarify your strengths

- What are the deeply satisfying activities in which you deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? When do you feel in your element – at ease and yet able to excel? What are the activities that give you positive energy – even when you think about them?
- What are the situations in which you see the destination quickly? When do you go 'A, B ... and then leap to ... Z'? What are the activities in which you are a good finisher and have a track record of delivering Z?
- What are the situations in which you see patterns quickly? Where do you have the equivalent of a photographic memory? Where do you have good personal radar - you seem to know what will happen before it happens?
- Where do you make complicated things appear simple? What are the activities in which you have natural self-discipline? Where do you score highly on drive, detail and delivery? Where do you always do the basics and then add the brilliance?

Sponsors

Anybody can do work they love, the art is getting somebody to pay you for doing it. Creative artists have faced this challenge throughout history.

How to find sponsors – employers or customers - who will hire you for what you do best? One approach is to start by clarifying your perfect customers or employers.

Who are kinds of customers with whom you work best? What are the characteristics of these people? When have you done good work for such people? What did you do to help them to achieve success?

If you mainly work within an organisation, what is the kind of manager with whom you work best? What are the characteristics of such a manager? What makes it good to work with them?

Here are answers that individuals give to these sets of questions.

"I work best with achievers. They love to set goals, work hard and achieve success. Being adrenaline driven myself, I enjoy working with others who like to stretch themselves to achieve success."

"I work best with pioneering leaders. Such people often aim to be pacesetters. It is exciting to work with such people who are aiming to make the new rules for the game."

"I work best with people who have humanistic values. They often want to create workplaces that encourage people. At the same time, however, they are prepared to take tough decisions."

Imagine you have clarified your perfect customers or employers. Looking at the world from their point of view, what are the challenges they face? How can you help them achieve their goals?

Imagine you are working with external customers. What are the pressures they face? What are their present and future needs? What are their professional goals?

Imagine you are mainly working within an organisation. Your internal customers are your colleagues, manager and the directors. What are their challenges? What are their professional goals?

Most employers want to improve the Three Ps. They want to improve their profits, product quality – including processes and service quality – and people. How can you help them to tackle these challenges and also achieve the organisation's goals?

Imagine you have identified your potential sponsors. How can you reach them in a way that fits with your values system? How can you create a showcase – a shop window – for your work? How can you give to people and help them to succeed?

Later we will go into greater depth regarding how to reach people in ways that work for you. Before then, however, here are some themes you can explore to clarify your potential sponsors.

Sponsors

Here are some questions you can explore to clarify your potential sponsors

- Who are the kinds of people - customers or employers - with whom you work best? What are the characteristics of these people? What are the reasons you work well with such people?
- When have you worked well with these kinds of people in the past? What did you do right then - what were the principles you followed - to help them to achieve success? What were the specific things you actually delivered?
- Looking at these kinds of people, what may be happening in their world? What may be the present and future challenges they face? What may they want to achieve for themselves, their team or their organisation? What may be their picture of success?
- How can you reach these people in a way that fits your values system? How can you clarify what they want to achieve? How can you give to these people and pass on knowledge that may help them to succeed?

Success

Imagine you have settled on your potential sponsors. How can you use your strengths to help them to tackle their challenges? How can you help them to achieve their goals?

Great workers provide specific services or products that help their potential sponsors: to solve problems, to have positive experiences or to achieve their picture of success.

Depending on their strengths, different people help others in different ways. They focus on what people may need or want. They then provide practical help or knowledge that helps them to achieve their aims.

A doctor may help people to regain their health. A chef may offer people wonderful food. A sports coach may help athletes to perform at their best.

A project director may ensure strategies are delivered on time. A crisis manager may solve problems that threaten an organisation. A film maker may produce films that give people pleasure.

Looking at my work, the aim has been to encourage and enable people to achieve their goals. This has taken the form of providing practical tools that people, teams and organisations can use:

To build on their strengths; To do satisfying work; To build superb teams and organisations; To find solutions to specific challenges; To achieve their picture of success.

There is a vast repertoire of positive models that can help people to reach these goals. The aim has been to pass on practical tools that people can use in their own ways to achieve ongoing success.

Imagine that you have managed to meet with potential sponsors. It will be important:

To show that you understand the world from their point of view – such as their challenges and goals;

To, if appropriate, share how what you offer can help them to achieve their goals;

To, if they want to move things forward, make clear contracts on the specific things you will deliver to help them to achieve their goals.

To get some quick successes, provide great service and proactively keep them informed about the progress being made towards the goals;

To do superb work, find solutions to challenges, deliver the agreed goals and then add that touch of class.

You will do this in your own way. But here are some themes it can be useful to explore on the road to help them to achieve success.

Success

Here are some questions you can explore to clarify how you can help people to achieve success

- How can you use your strengths to help people to tackle their challenges and succeed? What are the specific things you can actually deliver? What will be the benefits to the various stakeholders of delivering these things to people?
- How can you make clear working contracts with these people? How can you agree on the specific things you will deliver? How can you show them that you will deliver some early successes?
- How can you perform superb work? How can you proactively keep people informed about your progress? How can you encourage yourself on the journey? How can you find solutions to potential challenges?
- How can you keep reassuring your sponsors by delivering results? How can you do everything possible to help people to achieve their picture of success? How can you then add that touch of class?

Imagine that you want to build on your strengths and do satisfying work. You also want to help others to achieve success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to explore the following themes.

Strengths

Describe the satisfying activities in which you have the ability to deliver As. These may be particular kinds of projects, tasks or other activities. Try to be as specific as possible and give concrete examples.

Describe the activities in which you deliver Bs or Cs. The B activities are probably those that you can do reasonably well but may not necessarily be satisfying. The C activities are those where you have little aptitude or desire to learn.

Sponsors

Describe the kinds of people – customers or employers – with whom you work best. These may be people with certain personality characteristics or other qualities. Describe the challenges they face or the goals they want to achieve.

Success

Bearing in mind your strengths, describe the specific things you can deliver to help these people. There are many ways to define what you offer.

The Vocation Approach

A person's vocation is their calling. It is what they are here to do. Their vocation may remain constant throughout their life. They may express this through various vehicles, however, on the way towards doing valuable work.

A person never retires from their vocation. They just find more ways to express it during their life. Let's explore these themes.

Finding Your Vocation

There are relatively few vocational themes but the way a person expresses these will be unique. Most of the themes revolve around the eternal human activities. These include, for example:

*Encouraging ... Nurturing ... Educating ... Exploring ... Creating ...
Designing ... Orchestrating ... Building ... Implementing ... Problem Solving ... Communicating ... Performing ... Or Doing Other Activities.*

How to find your vocation? One approach is to focus on several satisfying projects that you have done in your life. Looking at what made these satisfying can reveal your successful style of working. It can also provide clues to your vocation. Here is an exercise on this theme.

My Successful Style

This is a long but worthwhile exercise that highlights when you have translated your strengths into action. It invites you to do the following things.

Describe two or three satisfying projects you have done in your life

The word project can be used in its widest sense. For example: writing an article, organising a fun run, launching a web site, solving a particular problem, leading a team or whatever.

Describe each of these projects in turn and the things that made each of them satisfying

Try to be as specific as possible, especially about the things that made them satisfying. Looking at these projects, can you see any recurring patterns? These provide clues to your preferred style.

Describe your successful style of working and the principles you follow when doing satisfying work

You may, for example, find it satisfying to do something you really care about, be in a positive environment, set a stimulating goal, follow a certain rhythm and do your best to achieve your picture of success.

Describe how you can follow these principles in the future

This part invites you to consider how you can keep following your principles and do satisfying work. This is something you can do to pursue personal projects.

If you want to get paid for doing professional work, however, it may mean finding or creating a project where you can follow your preferred style. This will also mean delivering specific benefits that help the potential sponsors – employers or customers - to succeed.

Here is the exercise on this theme. You can use this to clarify your successful style of working. Bearing this in mind, you may continue to follow your successful style in the future.

It is possible, however, that you will express it differently in different situations. The key, however, will be to follow your successful style on the way to doing satisfying work and achieving success.

My Successful Style

Introduction

Everybody has a successful style of working. Clarifying this style is often the clue to finding their real strengths and sometimes even finding their vocation.

People often develop rather than change radically and their style often becomes more pronounced as they get older. The key is for them to know how to channel their style successfully.

This is a long but worthwhile exercise that highlights when you have translated your strengths into action. It invites you to do the following things.

Describe two or three satisfying projects you have done in your life.

The word project can be used in its widest sense. For example: writing an article, organising a fun run, launching a web site, solving a particular problem, leading a team or whatever.

Describe each of these projects in turn and the things that made them satisfying.

Try to be as specific as possible, especially about the things that made them satisfying. Looking at these projects, can you see any recurring patterns? These often provide clues to your preferred style.

Describe your successful style of working - the principles you follow when doing satisfying work.

You may, for example, find it satisfying to do something you really care about, set a stimulating goal, work with motivated people, have a manager who gives you freedom within parameters.

You may then follow a certain rhythm in your daily work, build in quick successes, work to a deadline and present your work.

You may also have two successful styles: one when you are working alone, one when working with other people. See what the exercise reveals.

Describe how you can follow these principles in the future.

This part invites you to consider how you can keep following your principles and do satisfying work.

If you want to get paid for doing so, however, it may mean finding or creating a project where you can follow your preferred style.

It will also mean focusing on how to deliver specific benefits that help potential sponsors – employers or customers – to succeed.

How to clarify your vocation? Looking at your satisfying projects, it is:

To clarify a recurring theme in terms of what made them satisfying ... To clarify the specific things you aimed to do when pursuing that theme ... To clarify your possible vocation.

Here are some of the examples of vocations that people give when exploring this topic.

My Vocation Is:

To encourage people to become the best they can be ... To create enriching environments in which people grow ... To build successful prototypes that show a better way.

To share knowledge that people can use to maintain their wellbeing ... To help people to become the architects of their lives ... To design sustainable systems that deliver ongoing success.

To design things that are simple, satisfying and successful ... To create beautiful things that inspire people ... To do practical work that helps to make the world a better place.

Imagine that you have begun to clarify your vocation. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Finding The Right Vehicle

Different people express their vocation through different vehicles on the way to doing valuable work. Let's look at one example. Imagine that your vocation may be:

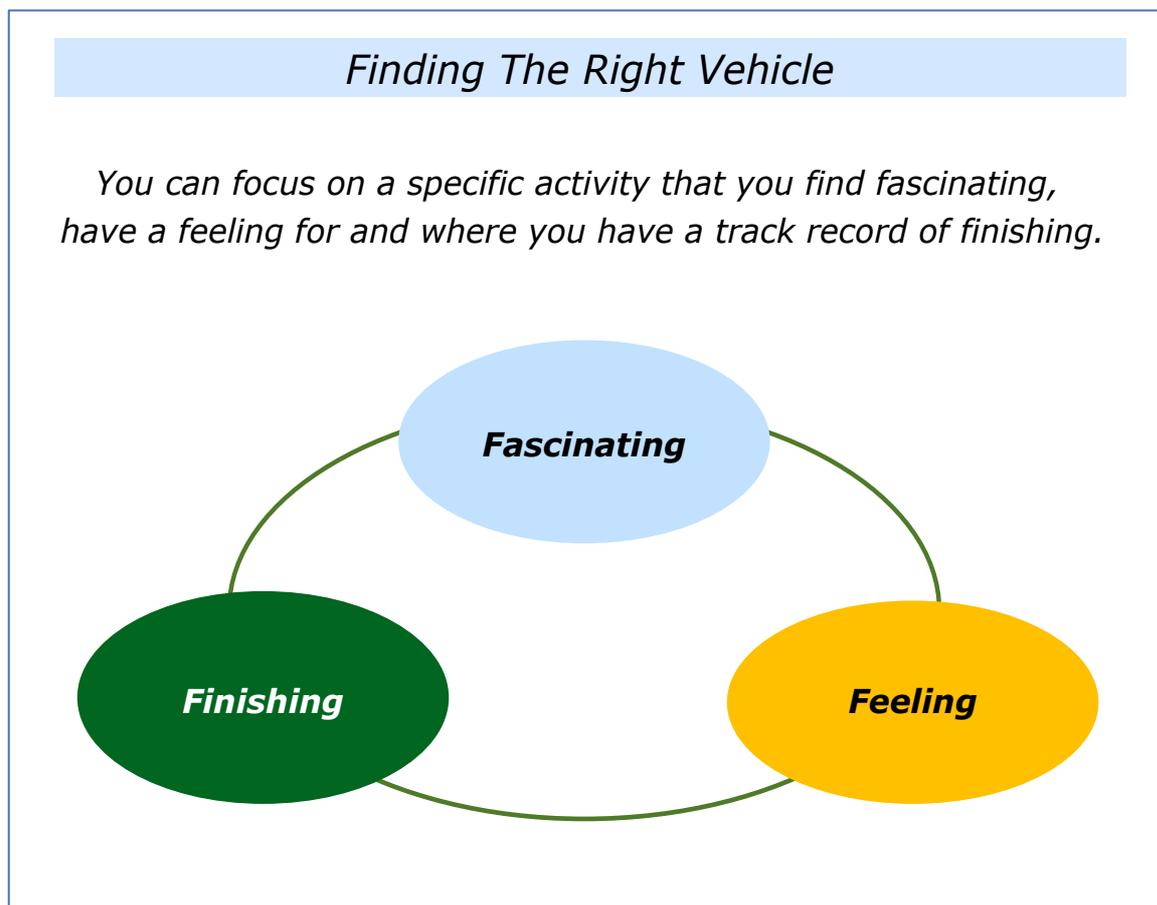

To create enriching environments in which people grow.

You can express this theme through many different vehicles. For example, you may choose:

To be an educator ... To be an interior designer ... To create inspiring music ... To do landscape gardening ... To lead a successful team in which people perform at their best ... Or whatever.

There are many ways you can express your vocation. One approach is to focus on: a) your chosen field of activity; b) your chosen form of activity. The following section describes how you can take these steps.

You Can Focus On Your Chosen Field Of Activity

There are several ways to find a field in which you may feel and ease and able to excel. One approach is:

To focus on the specific activity that you find fascinating, have a feeling for and have a track record of finishing.

Imagine you want to explore this approach. This involves focusing on the specific activities that have the following characteristics.

You find the activity fascinating

What are the things that fascinate you? What are the activities where you want to explore and make sense of things? What are those where you want to build models?

One clue is to choose a field where you would pursue this activity even if you did not get paid for doing it. It is a positive addiction.

Derek Jacobi, the actor, explained this approach in a television interview. When approached by young people who wanted his advice on becoming an actor, he said something like the following.

"If you want to become an actor, then don't do it. If you need to become an actor, then do it."

You have a strong feeling for the activity

Looking at the field of activity you have chosen, do you have a strong feeling for it? Are you good at it? If so, you can begin to explore how you can do more of this kind of work.

If not, take the time to pursue other fascinating activities. Looking at these activities, where do you have the ability to do good work that is fulfilling? Settle on one you want to explore further.

You have a track record of finishing

Let's return to the activity you find fascinating and have a feeling for. Is it one where you also have a track record of finishing? Here is an example given by one person.

"I have a good record of building and selling successful prototypes. This normally takes between two and three years."

"I did run one company for five years. But scaling the business meant I got involved in the maintenance aspects. My staff took care of the day-to-day work, of course, but I lost interest in running the business.

"Some people create and sell larger businesses for massive sums, but that is not my forte. I prefer to build prototypes, provide proof of concept and then sell to buyers. This is what I am good at finishing."

Superb workers have natural strengths in their chosen activity. They love to explore the various scenarios they may encounter when doing the activity.

They prepare properly before embarking on the activity. Looking ahead, they practice the strategies and skills they may need to achieve the desired results..

Such workers follow their chosen ritual for moving into action. They then concentrate fully and do their best to perform superb work. They sometimes combine being able to helicopter above the situation with being hands-on.

Some people go into an almost spiritual dimension. Looking back later, they say things like:

"It was like an out-of-body experience ... I seemed to do things slowly but others say I do them swiftly ... Time went away and I went into a state of flow."

Let's return to your own life and work. Are there any activities where you may have this ability? How can you do more of these in the future? How can you continue to do superb work in the activity where things go slowly yet swiftly?

You Can Focus On Your Chosen Form Of Activity

Imagine that you have some clues about your vocation. You can then aim to choose a form of activity that fits your successful working style.

You may prefer to express your talents by teaching, leading, managing, writing, speaking, designing, making films or doing another activity. You may prefer to work alone, to be a leader, to work in a team, to work in an organisation or follow another path.

Let's look at some people who have employed various vehicles to follow their vocation.

Person A's vocation is simplifying technology and showing how it can improve people's lives. Starting out as a techie, he also proved to be a gifted journalist.

He wrote articles that made technical things simple. Written in an accessible style, these led to him producing a much-acclaimed blog. He is now the official storyteller for a huge technology company.

Person B's vocation is creating events that enrich people's lives. Initially attracted to retail, she moved into the hospitality business. She built a business offering creative facilities for training events.

These centres offer great service and a sense of theatre. They also tasty food and sweets that adults remember from their childhoods. They aim to provide people with positive memories for life.

Person C's vocation is creating environments that empower people to take charge of their lives. He also has a great feeling for sport and, in particular, football. Following a personal tragedy, he focused on creating a World Cup for Street Football.

Running tournaments in local communities across the world, he used street football to bring people together. People made connections and, in many cases, then harnessed their talents to tackle other challenges in their communities.

Clarifying one's vocation can be a lifetime search but some clues can be found quickly. You can focus on the activities that give you positive energy and make your heart sing.

While the theme may remain constant, the way you express this may change over the years. If you wish, try tackling the exercise called My Vocation. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe what you believe may be your vocation

Looking back at the satisfying projects you have done in your life, can you see any themes? Are there any red threads that run through the projects? Do these give any clues to your possible vocation?

If so, describe what you believe may be your vocation. Don't worry too much about the actual wording - that can take years - have a go at describing your vocation. Describe the times you may have expressed this vocation in various activities or projects.

*Describe the possible vehicles
you can use to express your vocation*

You may already use a tried and trusted vehicle. This may be writing, painting, gardening, building, encouraging people, teaching, solving problems, broadcasting, communicating or whatever. Focus on the vehicles that you feel most attracted to using.

Describe the specific things you can do to deliver valuable work when expressing your vocation through these vehicles

It is important to follow your chosen rhythm. You may wish to prepare properly, organise your time in blocks, work with particular people or do certain things to produce superb quality work.

Here is the exercise on these themes. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Vocation

The Positive Realist's Approach

Positive Realists

- They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality;
- They are good at seeing patterns – both successful and unsuccessful patterns - and staying ahead of the game;
- They are proactive and have a strong internal locus of control – rather than an external locus of control - and say:

"I can make things happen," rather than, "Things happen to me."

People who do fine work are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality.

Going into a situation in which they excel, they quickly see patterns. They see: a) the successful patterns; b) the unsuccessful patterns; c) the potential consequences. They then aim to clarify the possible picture of success.

Such people are proactive. They have an internal locus of control - rather than an external locus of control – and aim to make things happen. Bearing in mind what they can control, they then aim:

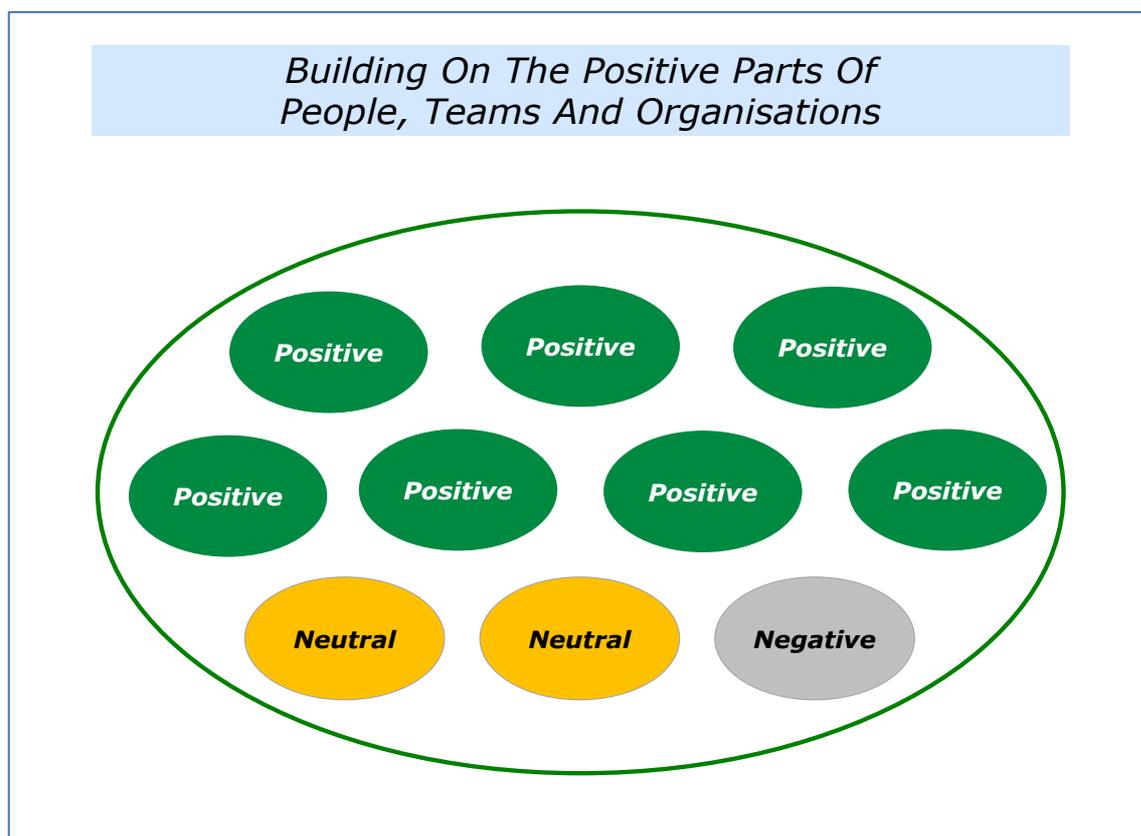

To set positive goals;

To build on the positive parts of people, teams and organisations whilst also dealing with any negative parts;

To do their best to achieve positive results.

Such people act quickly to stop any haemorrhaging. They then build on the positive parts of people, teams and organisations and help them to achieve ongoing success.

Positive realists take this approach when encouraging people, doing work or tackling a challenge. They may do so when acting as a parent, educator, leader or in another professional role.

Caring parents, for example, focus on what a child can do rather than harangue them about what they can't do. The child can then explore, set goals and work to succeed.

Such parents also find ways to help a child to develop the resilience required to tackle difficult challenges. Children who have experienced dyslexia or other difficulties, for example, often describe how their parents took this approach.

Great leaders help their teams to build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses. They also anticipate and manage any potential challenges.

Such leaders encourage their people to manage today's business and also shape tomorrow's business. They encourage, educate and enable them to achieve ongoing success.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a situation when you acted like a positive realist? You may have been retaking control of your life, encouraging people or managing a challenge.

What did you do to clarify the real results to achieve? How did you build on the positive things in the situation? If appropriate, how did you do your best to find possible solutions to challenges?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific situation in the past when you aimed to be a positive realist.

Describe the specific things you did to aim to be a positive realist.

Describe the specific things that happened as result of taking these steps.

We will then look at how you can follow elements of the positive realist's approach when working as a leader.

Positive Realism In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I aimed to be a positive realist was:

The specific things I did then to aim to be a positive realist were:

Building On The Positive Things In An Organisation

Imagine that you have been invited to lead an organisation that has hit difficulties. There are many ways to tackle such a challenge. The following pages describe one approach.

Positive realists often aim to build on the positive things in an organisation. They take this approach rather than putting people through a change programme.

Before taking a role, however, they do their due diligence to clarify the possibilities of success. Providing they are happy with the prospects they then take the following steps.

They communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They build on the positive people and positive energy in the organisation.

They encourage people to do superb work, keep producing success stories and do their best to ensure the organisation achieves its picture of success.

They sometimes take these steps in the order described above. There may be times, however, when they find it appropriate to change the order.

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach. Here are some steps you may want to take.

You can do your due diligence before going into an organisation

Before taking the role it will be important to do your research. This involves clarifying:

The specific results you will be asked to deliver – the picture of success;

The specific positive and challenging things that are happening in the organisation and its area of activity;

The specific positive and potentially challenging things that may happen in the future;

The specific authority and autonomy you will have to deliver the desired picture of success;

The success rating you would give – on a scale 0-10 - regarding the present chances of delivering the goals plus the specific things you can do to improve the chances of success.

Success Rating

Bearing in mind the things I can control, the present rating I would give regarding the chance of achieving the picture of success is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Imagine that you have done your due diligence. Bearing in mind the things you can control, you rated the chance of success as 7/10. You can then clarify the practical things you can do to improve the chances of success. These include aiming:

To clarify your strategy for delivering the picture of success;

To make crystal clear contracts with the board about: a) the results to be delivered; b) the authority and autonomy you will have to deliver these results; c) the things you will do to proactively keep the board informed about the progress toward achieving the picture of success;

To build on the positive and professional people in the organisation;

To give the other people a chance to decide if they want to contribute to delivering success;

To get some quick successes that will reassure the board and give you freedom to implement your chosen strategy for achieving success.

Imagine that you have taken these steps and have made clear contracts with the board. You have the authority and autonomy required to deliver the goods. Let's consider the next steps you may want to take.

You can communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success

Good leaders aim to build a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They also recognise that it is important to give people the big picture. They therefore communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

This is especially important when working with knowledge workers who like to understand the context. They can then see their part in helping the organisation to achieve its goals.

Here is an overview of these themes. The Road Map just refers to the next year, but you can give a longer time frame if you wish.

Imagine that you have communicated the purpose, principles and picture of success. (You may or may not want to give a detailed road map, but that is up to you.)

You can then, if appropriate, give people chance to get into groups and compile any questions they have regarding what you have presented. Later in the book there are exercises you can use to facilitate people's responses.

Good leaders then give people time to reflect and decide if they want to work towards achieving the goals. If people choose to opt-in, they make clear contracts about their best contributions. People then do their best to achieve the picture of success.

The Professional Deal Approach

Good organisations aim to build a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They also communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They then give people chance to reflect on whether they want to contribute. If so, they make clear contracts with individuals about their best contributions towards achieving the goals.

Such organisations also explain the professional deal. This describes both the organisation's responsibilities and the individual's responsibilities in working to achieve the goals.

The world of work continues to change so it is important to be honest when communicating the deal. People can then decide if they want to opt in. Here are some themes organisations may cover when communicating the deal. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

The Professional Deal

The following pages describe both the organisation's responsibilities and the individual's responsibilities in working towards achieving the picture of success

The Organisation's Responsibilities Are:

- To be professional and help to build a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance;*
- To keep communicating the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;*
- To build on people's strengths and make clear contracts with them about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;*
- To give people the encouragement and practical support they need to do superb work;*
- To manage by outcomes rather than by tasks and enable people to deliver the goods;*

- To encourage people to take care of their wellbeing and provide the resources people can use to achieve this aim;
- To provide people with practical tools they can use to shape their future careers inside or outside the organisation;
- To, when necessary, make tough decisions that protect the culture;
- To keep sharing success stories that show how people are following the principles and keep people informed about the progress we are making towards achieving the picture of success;
- To ensure the organisation embodies the ethic of constant improvement and does what is necessary to achieve future success.

The Individual's Responsibilities Are:

- To be professional and help to build a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance;
- To make sure they understand the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;
- To keep following the principles and translate these into action in their daily work;
- To build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses;
- To make clear contracts about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

- To do superb work and proactively keep the key stakeholders – such as their manager and colleagues - informed about their progress towards achieving the agreed outcomes;
- To achieve their individually agreed outcomes and also keep contributing towards achieving the team's outcomes;
- To continue to develop and, when appropriate, use the practical tools the organisation offers them to shape their future careers;
- To take care of their wellbeing and, when appropriate, make use of the resources we provide for helping people to achieve this aim;
- To embody the ethic of constant improvement and make practical suggestions about what the organisation can do to achieve future success.

Imagine that you work for an organisation. On a scale 0-10, to what extent do you believe it communicates the professional deal to people?

What do you think you or it can do: a) to communicate the organisation's responsibilities; b) to communicate the individual's responsibilities; c) to make sure everybody is clear on the deal?

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the professional deal approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Professional Deal Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

You can build on the positive people and energy in the organisation

Imagine that you have given people the chance to reflect and decide if they want to contribute towards achieving the goals. Looking around, it has become apparent that people are choosing either:

To be positive and professional;

To be neutral;

To be negative or unprofessional.

How do you want to work with the different kind of people? In the old days organisations often concentrated on turning-around the negative people, but that did not work.

Another approach is to build on the people who choose to be positive and professional. Let's explore some approaches to focusing on the different kinds of people.

The Positive People

They are people you can build on. They are the engine, but they also need support. They often volunteer for tasks and do fine work, but they also get exhausted. You can encourage them:

- To build on their strengths and make their best contributions to the organisation;
- To act as positive models for other people in the organisation;
- To produce success stories that demonstrate the professional standards required for building a successful organisation.

“Reward the behaviour you want repeated,” is the motto, so encourage these people. They will spread positive energy and inspire other people.

One soccer manager I worked with took this approach. Taking over an under-achieving club, he was appalled by the attitudes of some key players.

The manager brought in three top professional players who could lead the dressing room. They had credibility with the other players and became what are known as cultural architects.

Acting as good models, they demonstrated the required professional standards. They also acted as the manager’s arm on the field. They inspired and urged the other players to perform at their best.

Good leaders often follow a similar path in organisations. They build on the positive people and encourage them to make their best contributions. Such people spread positive energy across the organisation.

The Neutral People

They can be great assets if they choose to work towards the goals. They must make that decision, but you can increase the chances of them choosing to give their best by ensuring that:

- They know the organisation's specific goals and strategy;
- They are given a sense of ownership in implementing their part of the strategy;
- They are given the support they need to do their job and deliver success.

Some people may appear neutral or guarded. There can be many reasons for their behaviour. They may have seen new leaders come in before, make big promises and then fail to deliver.

Whatever their reasons, however, at some point it is vital for them to opt-in. Otherwise the organisation is trying to climb a mountain with some people who are only partly committed.

Such people can make a good contribution if they choose to become positive and professional. They must each make their own decisions, of course, but you can increase the chances of them choosing to give their best.

One approach is to spend time with these people to ensure that they know the strategy. They also need to know they will be given support to do the job.

Different leaders do this in different ways. One leader who took over the European arm of a multi-national company explained their approach in the following way.

"I toured every country in the European region and did two-hour sessions in which I literally met every person. Meeting groups of around 20 people, I talked about last year's achievements, before outlining the goals for the next year.

"I used a flip chart and a few slides, but the tone was mainly conversational. Looking at the challenges ahead, I invited people to ask their questions and answered these as honestly as possible.

"Finally I reiterated the organisation's strategy and outlined what we could all do to get some quick successes. People seemed to appreciate the sessions."

Sounds hard work? Perhaps, but it can be harder if leaders do not connect with people. Given the right kind of support, people will often do superb work and go that extra mile.

The Negative People

They can choose whether they want to follow the professional guidelines required to achieve the goals. Bearing this in mind, you can again describe the following things;

- The Organisation's Purpose – the specific thing it aims to do;
- The Organisation's Principles – the specific professional standards that people are encouraged to follow to achieve the purpose;
- The Organisation's Picture Of Success - the specific results it aims to deliver by a certain date.

People who are negative or unprofessional need to make a decision. Do they want to follow the professional guidelines and make a positive contribution?

They must follow up with deeds, of course. rather than just say the right words. If they choose not to do so, there are consequences.

The soccer manager mentioned earlier took this approach. He describe the deal to his players. This was along the following lines.

The Professional Deal

The club's responsibility is to communicate the strategy, provide a supportive environment and work to achieve success. The players' responsibility is to follow the required professional standards and help the team to achieve success.

The manager held one-to-one sessions with each of the players. They were asked whether they would like to deliver the required professional standards and contribute towards achieving the goals.

If so, they were also asked what kind of support they would like to help them to do their best. Sometimes the support was professional, sometimes it was personal.

Many of the players were open to developing the mental side of their game. So they spent time with professionals who helped them to develop skills in that area.

Some players said they wanted to be part of the journey, but it was no more than words. They quickly got the message that the club was serious. Here is one example.

The manager explained that the daily training sessions on the field started at 10.00 sharp. Everybody should be warmed up by then and ready to go.

On the second day a star player arrived on the field at 10.01. In his view, being one minute late was not late. This was a pattern he had established under the previous regime.

On this occasion, however, he was in for a shock. He was immediately excluded from the session. The manager told him:

"We have certain professional standards. These are there for a reason because we rely on each other each day. Training is also vital because this is when we do the work to prepare for matches."

"We believe in people developing good habits. We don't expect people to turn up one minute after kick off during a match. The same rule applies to training. Let me know when you are ready to meet those professional standards."

The manager's strategy worked. He built on the players who followed the principles. The player who chose not to do so left for elsewhere. That season the club won its first-ever domestic trophy.

Imagine that you have chosen to build on the people who aim to positive and professional. You may then move on to the next steps for building a successful organisation.

You can enable people to do superb work, keep producing success stories and do your best to ensure the organisation achieves its picture of success

Great leaders encourage people to build on their strengths and make clear contracts about their best contributions. They then manage by outcomes and enable people to perform superb work on the way towards achieving the organisation's goals.

They keep showing what good looks like. One approach is to keep publishing success stories that highlight how people are following the principles. They then encourage people to follow these principles, keep improving and delivering success.

Such leaders sometimes need to make key decisions about the strategy and people. They clarify the results to achieve, clarify the options and settle on the way forward. They then do their best to ensure the organisation achieves its picture of success.

Let's return to your own situation. Imagine that you want to follow some elements of the positive realist's approach. This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may want to do so when living your daily life, shaping your future or tackling a challenge. You want to do so when acting as a parent, educator, leader or in another professional role.

The Building On What People Can Do Approach

Building On What People Can Do

This approach involves building on what people can do rather than what they can't do. One approach is to help them to go through the following steps.

This is an approach that can be used when working with individuals or groups of people. It encourages people:

To build on their strengths rather than only focus on their weaknesses;

To build on what they have got rather than what they have not got;

To build on what they can do rather than what they can't do.

I was reminded of this when working with a parent whose daughter was having difficulties with some subjects at school. Caring for their child, they had commissioned a special report from a psychologist.

Whilst it was possible this could help, being given a label might also have an adverse effect. Bearing this in mind, I asked the parent:

"What are your daughter's top three strengths?"

Pausing for a moment, the parent then gave the following answer.

"She is kind and persistent. She takes the lead when helping others, especially caring for other girls who get bullied. She loves organising things – such as doing drama and creative activities with her friends."

Several years ago I had a similar conversation with the newly installed leader of a business. Taking over the role, they had been met by people talking about the barriers to success.

The leader and I took another approach. Looking at the business, we explored the following themes.

What are its strengths? What are its assets? What are the specific things it can do? How can it build on these things to shape a successful future?

When have people performed brilliantly in the past? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow these principles – plus add other skills – to perform brilliantly in the future?

Who are the positive people in the business? How can we build on these people? How can we encourage them to continue to be positive models, be professional and achieve peak performance?

The leader built on the positive energy in the business. This involved forming task forces that focused on the specific things they could do: a) to manage today's business; b) to shape tomorrow's business. This helped them to shape a positive future.

Later in the book we will explore how this approach can be applied to teams and organisations. For the moment, however, let's return to focusing on individuals.

This approach is particularly useful when working with certain kinds of people. These include those who may be considered to have some of the following qualities.

To be different ... To be a specialist ... To be introverted ... To be dyslexic ... To be autistic ... To be highly sensitive in some areas ... To have synaesthesia ... To have physical or mental abilities in some activities but not in others ... To be late developers.

To be adrenaline driven ... To be potentially brilliant in some areas but bored in others ... To have been given a psychological label ... To be somebody with a different neurological make up ... To be a positive deviant.

To be intelligent in ways not normally recognised ... To have extreme attention to detail in some areas ... To be a pragmatist who won't learn something unless they can see the point of it ... To be somebody who sees things differently.

It is an approach I have seen used successfully in families, education, the arts, sports, workplaces and many walks of life. It encourages a person to develop by taking the following steps.

Step One: Can Do And Creativity

This involves focusing on what a person can do, rather than what they can't do. It means building on their strengths and, at a later point, helping them manage the consequences of any weaknesses. It often calls for being creative in finding ways they can make their best contribution.

Step Two: Clarity And Commitment

This involves clarifying how the person wants to develop their abilities and what they want to achieve. It also calls for clarifying their inner commitment. It is up to the individual, however, to decide whether they want to do what is required to achieve certain aims.

Step Three: Consistently High Standards And Class

This involves helping the person to pursue the strategies and skills required to consistently deliver high standards. It sometimes calls for encouraging them to go a step further and use their strengths to add that touch of class.

Looking back on your life, can you think of a situation when you helped a person or a group of people to take some of these steps?

You may have done this in some of the following scenarios.

When helping a young person to develop their confidence;

When helping somebody to build on their strengths and do satisfying work;

When helping a team to focus on the specific activities where they could do brilliant work.

Looking back, how did you help the person or group of people to build on what they could do? How did you help them to identify their possibilities? How did you find creative ways they could channel their strengths?

How did you help them to clarify their goals and decide if they wanted to commit to doing the work? How did you help them to deliver consistently high standards and, if appropriate, add that touch of class?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe what you did, what they did and the things that happened as a result.

Step One: Can Do And Creativity

The first step is to focus on what a person can do. This sounds basic but it is often overlooked.

Several years ago I worked with a parent whose son had recently been found to be dyslexic. Worried about their son's future at school, the family began giving him extra lessons. The young boy cried when pushed to do tasks that created a seizure in his brain.

The parent and I looked at websites they described the strengths of people who were dyslexic. These included the following qualities.

Dyslexics

They are highly aware of the environment ... They are more curious than average ... They think mainly in pictures instead of words ... They like to move and experiment with things.

They are highly intuitive and insightful ... They use many of their senses – which means they think and perceive multi-dimensionally ... They have vivid imaginations.

Dyslexics often do well in certain kinds of work. These include entrepreneurship, some aspects of business, the arts, work where they can move or create things and engineering.

Looking at these qualities, the parent paused for a moment. They then said:

"Our son has many of these qualities. He also has fighting spirit and is tough."

Many of my mentors focused on what people could do. Alex Dickson, the founder of Voluntary Service Overseas and Community Service Volunteers, took this approach. He encouraged people to use their strengths to help others.

Below is a summary of what he said during one conversation. On that occasion he had just returned from Northern Ireland after talking with people who had lost limbs in bombings.

Alec encouraged them to use their experiences to help other people. They had responded enthusiastically and offered their help. Alec told me about his approach to people.

"When I look at a person in a wheelchair or a person in any situation, I look at their abilities.

"They may be able to teach young people to read, to counsel people who have had a life-changing accident, to listen to older people in a hospice, to make films that share their own experiences of being resilient.

"Whatever their situation, everybody has something to give. It is in the act of giving that people both forget themselves and find themselves. We can give people the chance to use their gifts to help to meet some of the unmet needs in society."

During my work in sports I interviewed coaches in football. One coach expressed their philosophy in the following way.

"Many coaches talk about what a player can't do, but I have a different approach. When scouting players I watch them in action – especially when things get tough - and ask the following questions.

"What is the player's character? What are their strengths and skills? What is it they can do? How could they contribute to the team? How could we build on their strengths and compensate for any weaknesses?"

Different people focus on different things when exploring what a person can do. One approach is to focus on the person's attitude, ability and what they may be able to achieve.

Imagine you are watching a person in action or seeing an example of their work. It can be useful to explore the following themes.

Attitude

What is the person's attitude? Are they positive or negative? Do they take responsibility or avoid responsibility? How do they apply themselves when they are doing what they do best? How do they react to setbacks?

What is their attitude towards other people? What is their style of behaving, interacting and communicating with other people? What is their effect on other people? What are the three words you would use to describe their attitude?

Ability

What are the person's abilities? What are their strengths? What are the specific activities in which they can do superb work? What is the evidence that they can do these things?

What is their successful style of working? When have they done superb work in the past? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action?

Achievement

What are the specific things the person can achieve in the future? How could they do superb work and make their best contribution? What is the application they would need to demonstrate to achieve these aims?

What will be their best way of doing superb work? Will they work best by themselves, with other people or by leading projects? How can they use their strengths to help other people to achieve their goals?

Imagine that you have taken this approach. The next stage is to explore creative ways they may be able:

To build on their abilities and apply these to learn, develop, do superb work or help other people to succeed;

To, if appropriate, channel these abilities towards making their best contribution to a customer, team, organisation or society.

This sometimes calls for doing creative thinking. Several years ago I worked with a team that took this approach.

The team had eight specialists who were tech evangelists for the larger business. They also sometimes acted as trusted advisors with customers and helped them to solve problems.

A new COO was appointed at head office. Coming from a retail background, one of his first acts was to tell people they must be more sales-driven.

Speaking at the annual company gathering, he told people that he saw little difference between running a retail company and a software business.

The company needed to improve its sales performance, he said, so everybody must see themselves as a salesperson. Teams would therefore be given a financial target they must deliver.

This went down like a lead balloon. But, sure enough, every team was given a sales target and sent on a sales course. This had a mixed reception.

The specialist team I worked with wanted to play to their strengths but also keep their jobs. Bearing this in mind, we explored the following options. They could aim either:

a) To try to convince the bosses that their specialist function was different and they contributed to the company in other ways;

b) To follow the instructions and ensure that each of the eight specialists hit a specific sales target;

c) To develop their roles as trusted advisors to customers and find ways to sell when doing this role;

d) To hire a salesperson and business coordinator for the team – which would mean two specialists moving on in order to stay within the budget;

e) To hire a salesperson and a business coordinator, retain all the specialists and increase the team's sales target in order to pay for these people.

Looking at this final option, the company had a background of ratifying an increase in headcount providing a team increased its financial target.

The team considered all these options – plus other routes – together with the pluses and minuses of each option. After some discussion they chose to pursue option (e).

There were many twists and turns along the way, but eventually the leader got this approach signed off by their bosses. They recruited a salesperson and business coordinator. Cutting a long story short, the team hit its financial targets by playing to people's strengths.

The specialists continued to develop their skills as trusted advisors and also increased their ability to get funding. This helped them to shape successful careers in the future.

Let's return to the person you may want to help. How can you encourage them to build on and channel their strengths?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the person's abilities – based on the evidence you have seen - it invites you to complete the following sentences.

Step Two: Clarity And Commitment

Imagine that you are encouraging a person who wants to build on their strengths. The next stage is to explore the possible routes they can take in the future. This involves helping the person:

To clarify what they want to do to build on their abilities and the specific results they want to achieve;

To clarify whether they want to commit themselves to doing the work involved in achieving their aims.

Let's explore one example. The following section is based on a piece written by Bengt Elmén. Many years ago he attended a course I ran in Sweden. Here is his remarkable story, together with his views on how people can commit to achieving certain goals.

Decide Your Destiny

My own experiences with difficulty began early on – as early as birth, in fact. I had a rough delivery, during which I suffered lack of oxygen that resulted in a type of brain damage known as CP, or Cerebral Palsy.

As far as I'm concerned, though, CP actually stands for: "Cool and Powerful".

The brain damage diminished my ability to walk, talk and use my hands. Early on I had to learn to think of creative solutions to daily situations. I could sit for days, for example, using my mouth and nose to piece together a 500-piece jigsaw puzzle.

This taught me that it's always worth the effort to face your difficulties rather than trying to run away from them. Such lessons have been invaluable to me as an adult.

I also learned early on how to be intimate with people. However good I was at putting together puzzles, there were many other things I couldn't do without help. This means that over the years, I have employed several hundred people, and from this I have gained a precious understanding of people from all walks of life.

After I earned a degree in Public Law at Stockholm's University, I worked five years as director of the Stockholm Cooperative for Independent Living (STIL).

I wrote a book called 'Your Responsibility and Mine' which, unfortunately, is available only in Swedish. Despite my physical disability and speech impediment, I began to travel around giving seminars and workshops.

Taking Responsibility

Survivor speeches have become very popular at conferences over the last few years. I use humour to show how I coped with my 'tragic fate', explaining that it is possible to see hardships from two perspectives: positive or negative.

People often leave the session finding it harder to complain about trivialities, such as the food being too cold when they go home at night. The sessions show it is possible to overcome great difficulties, rather than drown in depression.

This is a message of hope and joy and people re-examine challenging situations in their own lives. But I have a confession to make. I am not interested in giving survivor speeches anymore.

Why? I am more interested in giving achiever speeches. I love working with Achievers. Such people are prepared to take responsibility and build on what they have got. Deciding what they want to do, they then work hard to achieve their dreams.

People do not define the hand of cards they are given at birth, but they do decide how to use the cards. That is what I mean by 'Decide Your Destiny'. Whether giving keynotes or facilitating mentoring sessions, I focus on giving certain messages with people.

Take Responsibility

Achievers are prepared to take responsibility for their lives. Perhaps that is why I like working with them.

As far as I know, this is the only life I have got. I met death already at birth due to lack of oxygen, but I disregarded him. I chose life.

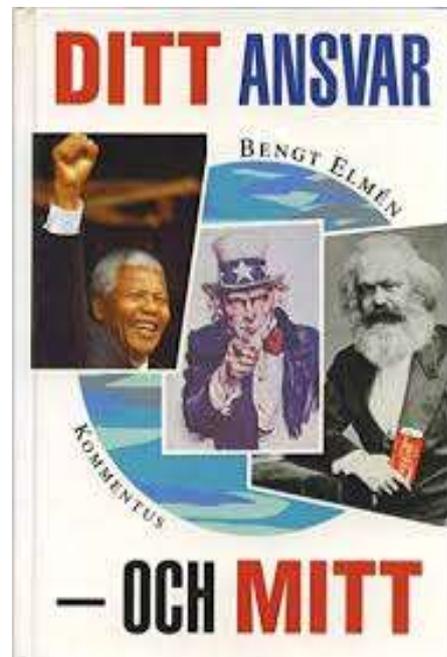

Since then death has been a reality to me. Life is short and it's no use hiding from the fact that we all are going to die someday.

Therefore I want to be in charge of my own life. I want to decide how I spend the time that has been given to me. I don't want to leave that to anyone else. It is my responsibility and I am not ready to spoil a second.

My first book in Swedish, 'Your Responsibility and Mine', provoked quite a response. I was urging people to do what they could do, rather than complain about what they couldn't do. This links to my second message.

*Bengt teaching a group - plus his book. The title translates as Your Responsibility And Mine.

Build On What You Have Got

Did Stevie Wonder stop singing because of his lack of sight? What about José Feliciano, Ray Charles and Andrea Bocelli? Did Stephen Hawking shape his life based on his doctors' early death sentences? Did Helen Keller's difficulties stop her helping other people?

Did Franklin D Roosevelt refuse to carry-out the presidency because he suffered from polio? If Ludwig van Beethoven had focused on what he lacked-rather than what he had - we would not have heard his Ninth Symphony and its tribute to the joy of life.

Life has taught me to build on what I have got. My physical abilities do not always reach 10/10! My walking ability is probably 3/10.

But I decided to transport myself from the physical world to the mental world - so I became fascinated by people's hopes, ideas, plans and ambitions. I manage the physical world with the help of technical aids and my personal assistants. For example, let me explain how I write.

Right now I am hitting each key on my Mac with a stick that is fastened to a band around my head. It is not the fastest way in the world, but it gives me time to think about what I want to write. (Think different!)

While other authors use their hands at work, I use my head. (And heart.) So that is how you turn a limitation into a strength. That is how you build on what you have got.

And when you have chosen to concentrate on what you have got, then you also have to pick the direction of your life. This brings us to my third message.

Dare To Be An Achieve - But Do It In Your Way

Achievers have a special quality. They decide what they want to do and then they do it.

Perhaps all of us have listened to inspiring keynote speakers who urged us to follow our dreams. But then what happens? The instant motivation begins to fade away and we return to our daily lives.

*If you look back at the times you have achieved, however, it is because:
a) you made an inner decision to do something; b) you were prepared to work hard; c) you did it in your own way.*

Pursuing your route can be affirming yet also lonely. In order to achieve greatness, you have to discover your own path.

Unfortunately, greatness never can be accomplished by copying someone else - and sometimes it means paying less attention to what others think. You will find it more beneficial to listen to your own inner voice when making the most important decisions in your life. Ask yourself:

"What are my innermost aspirations? What do I really want? What do I lack in my life right now? What do I want to accomplish within this lifetime?"

Creating new rules in the world can be difficult - but fun. I like to challenge people's traditional views of how life should be. Can the future be rainbow coloured - rather than grey?

Speaking to people in the business world, the best response has always been from 'new' businesspeople. They are unconventional, enjoy being challenged and want to discover new ways of looking at the world.

The new business achievers are going beyond old preconceptions. Just like the blind, deaf or disabled people I mentioned, some are prepared to follow their hearts and do what they are here to do.

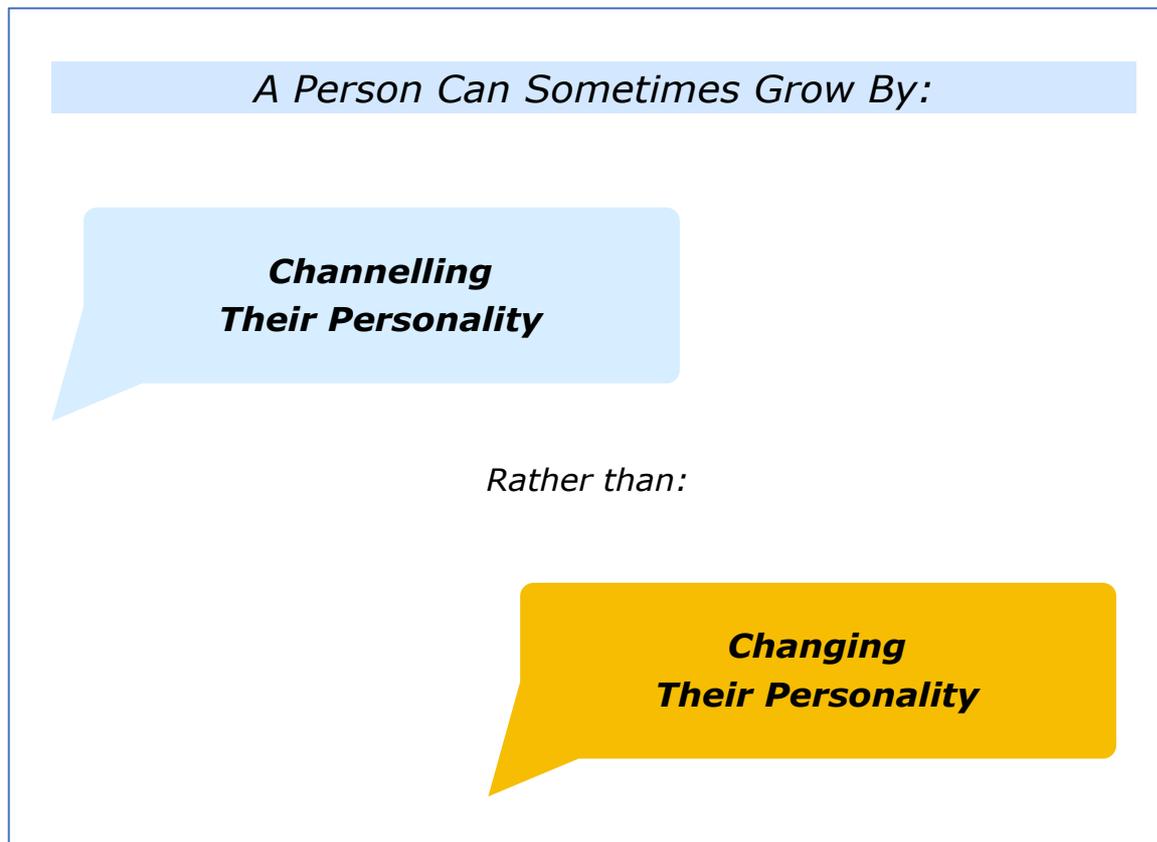

My passion is to help achievers to find their purpose, possibilities and peace in life. Why?

They love freedom - the freedom to be, the freedom to create - and so do I. Sometimes we all need somebody to say: "You can do it - let's explore how."

My work is about helping people to make that decision - then putting it into practise. Inspirational speeches can be a start, but then comes the sweat.

People are more willing to do the hard work, however, if they have taken the responsibility to decide their destiny.

The Channelling Your Personality Rather Than Changing Your Personality Approach

There are many models for helping a person to develop. One approach focuses on helping them to grow by channelling their personality rather than changing their personality. People develop, they seldom change. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to help them:

To clarify the real results they want to achieve in a situation – their picture of success;

To clarify their personality style – including both the potential pluses and minuses of their style;

To channel their personality style in ways that help them to achieve their picture of success.

This is an approach I have found useful when working with people who demonstrate certain characteristics. Here is one example.

Max is an energetic and highly driven leader. Being positive and results focused, he can be inspirational and has a track record of building pacesetting teams.

He also loves working with certain kinds of leading edge clients. He helps them to develop strategies that enable them to stay ahead in their field.

The pluses of his style include the following. He generates positive energy and gives people a compelling picture of the future. He is also good at helping certain kinds of clients to solve problems and achieve success.

The potential minuses of his style include the following. He gives lots of ideas and can overload people with information. He only works best with self-motivated achievers and can be impatient with other kinds of people. Max explained one piece of advice that he had been given.

"I have been told to slow down in order to take my people with me. Whilst I understand part of that logic, I find it difficult to follow.

"My mind keeps focusing on how to solve both the present and future challenges. Plus I get lots of ideas about how to create products that will help our customers to achieve success.

"The problem is that I can sometimes dive into the daily running of our business. If I see something that could be done better, I immediately try to fix it. Maybe I should try to be patient, but I am not sure that will work. Have you any suggestions?"

Max and I looked at how he could channel his personality rather than change his personality. His brain would continue to be in over-drive. Bearing this in mind, it was important for him to spend most of his time with pacesetting customers.

Max could help them to solve challenges and build prototypes that enabled them to achieve future success. This could create wins for them and also wins for his company.

At the same time, I suggested that Max follow the rule of three when sharing ideas with people. This involved him crafting his messages so that, when appropriate, he could aim:

To give the big picture – the context – and to describe the three outcomes to achieve;

To give the reasons for achieving these outcomes;

To check with people whether: a) they understood the outcomes to achieve; b) they would be happy to contribute toward achieving these; c) they had the support required to achieve the outcomes.

Max then moved on to the next stage. How to channel his personality in a way that delivered positive results? After some discussion he chose to take the following steps.

First, Max appointed a managing director who had the ability to run the business. This was somebody who Max had worked with in the past. They had the ability:

To keep focusing on the company's principles and translate these into action;

To build a positive environment in which motivated people could flourish and deliver good results;

To manage Max's interventions and integrate his ideas into continuing to build a successful business.

Second, Max applied his strengths to working with certain customers and also aiming to become a thought leader in his chosen field. This involved him taking the following steps. He chose:

To work with three leading edge customers and do superb work that enabled them to stay ahead of the game;

To produce success stories about this work which helped to build their reputations and also that of his own company;

To produce a series of short videos in which Max described pacesetting ideas that companies could implement to achieve future success.

Third, Max continued to share inspiring ideas with the people in his business but he did this through certain channels. He and the managing director ran sessions every two months where they aimed:

To give Max the opportunity to share his latest thinking and, when appropriate, how people could add some of these ideas to their present way of running the business;

To learn from what some of the company's leading edge customers were doing well and how to adapt these ideas when working with some of their other customers;

To focus on how the company could continue to following its principles, translate these into action and deliver positive results.

Max, the managing director and I continued to work on these themes over the next years. This helped to create an environment in which people applied strengths to help the company to achieve ongoing success.

Every person is different but many can learn how to channel their personalities rather than change their personalities. When working with introverts, for example, it is possible to help them:

To build on their ability to reflect, make sense of ideas and make their best contributions to a client, team or organisation;

To rehearse what they want to do or say and then share their knowledge in ways that increase the likelihood of them getting heard;

To be true to themselves and learn how to take a positive role in situations they find challenging – such as meetings, brainstorming sessions or social events.

There are many ways to help a person to channel their personality. Here are some guidelines that it can be helpful to bear in mind. You will, of course, apply these in your own way.

Helping A Person To Channel Their Personality

This approach involves exploring the following themes.

- Who is the person? What are their goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their aims?

- What is their personality style? What are the words you would use to describe their personality style? What are the potential pluses and minuses of their style? How can they build on the pluses and manage any minuses?

- How can they channel their personality to achieve their goals? How can I help them to take these steps? What are the practical tools I can pass on to help them to achieve their picture of success?

Let's return to the situation where you may be encouraging a person. If appropriate, you can clarify the specific route they want to follow to build on their abilities. You can then encourage them:

To clarify the specific things they want to achieve and set clear goals;

To clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving the goals;

To clarify their motivation – on a scale 0-10 – to do the work involved in achieving the goals. Make sure it is at least 8/10.

Step Three: Consistently High Standards And Class

This step involves helping the person to pursue the strategies and skills required to consistently deliver high standards. It also calls for encouraging them to go a step further and add that touch of class.

Different people take this step in different ways. Some people develop a sense of purpose. They then keep focusing on delivering high personal and professional standards.

This is an approach described by Clayton Christensen in the book he wrote with James Allworth and Karen Dillon called How Will You Measure Your Life?

Well-known for his work on entrepreneurship, Clayton also taught his students at Harvard to focus on their core principles. Here are some of the themes he described in an interview he gave the Harvard Business Review.

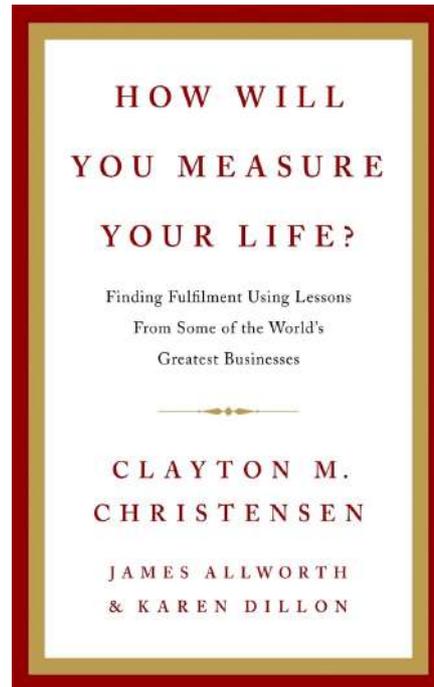

How Will You Measure Your Life?

I ask my students to find cogent answers to three questions.

How can I be sure that I'll be happy in my career?

How can I be sure that my relationships with my spouse and my family become an enduring source of happiness?

How can I be sure that I'll behave with integrity during my life?

How Will You Measure Your Life?

Clayton encouraged his students to focus on following themes:

- To clarify their purpose - because this would provide a rudder for negotiating both calm and stormy seas;
- To be humble - because this would enable them to be gracious, generous and lifelong learners;
- To keep acting with integrity and be good managers who helped people to grow;
- To always bear in mind the following theme;

"Think about the metric by which your life will be judged, and make a resolution to live every day so that in the end, your life will be judged a success."

Clayton often demonstrated a touch of class. He did this by listening to people and treating them with respect. When appropriate, he passed on knowledge that enabled them to achieve success.

Different people add class in different ways. Some do it by being kind. Some do it by using their strengths to produce something special that gives people a positive memory for life.

Let's return to the person you may be trying to help. How can you enable them to deliver consistently high standards? How can you encourage them to add that touch of class?

There are many ways to help people to build on what they can do. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Enjoyment, Effectiveness And Excellence Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to do work that is enjoyable, effective and excellent. Sometimes it may also involve going into another dimension and doing work that is extraordinary.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. Let's explore how you can do this in your own way.

You Can Do Work That Is Enjoyable

What are the kinds of work you enjoy doing? What are those where you enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal? What are those you can be effective and maybe also encourage other people? What are those where you may be able to deliver excellence?

Some individuals do their best work where they feel in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. They feel confident and in control. They say to themselves:

"This is where I was meant to be."

They have the strengths and skills to deliver success. They feel at ease in situations that others may find difficult. They may enjoy tackling certain challenges, managing crises, performing on stage, competing in sports or doing other activities.

They love to stretch themselves, feel alive and, in some cases, get an adrenaline rush. They then apply their abilities to work towards achieving their goals.

What are the activities where you enjoy the journey – even though parts of it may be exhausting? Here are some answers that people give when exploring this theme.

The specific activities where I enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal are:

Helping people to overcome setbacks ... Restoring houses ... Solving certain technical problems ... Passing on knowledge to people ... Helping people to find or create satisfying careers.

Being a trusted advisor to clients ... Working to build a fairer society ... Producing solutions focused journalism ... Orchestrating people to achieve a compelling goal.

Many people feel alive when doing stimulating work. Some people stop doing this and feel clogged up. Sometimes they can regain their zest for life by refocusing on the kinds of work they find stimulating.

Let's return to your own life and work. What is a specific activity where you enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal? What are the reasons why you enjoy this activity? What are the specific things you can do to pursue this activity in the future?

You Can Do Work That Is Effective

Great workers believe in doing work that is effective. When doing a particular project or tackling a challenge, they focus on what works. Some may also aim to do work that encourages people. T

They aim to build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and deliver success. They may work as a teacher, medical worker, sports coach or crisis manager. They may work as a scientist, specialist, leader, trusted advisor or in another professional role.

They may aim to create beautiful things, write inspiring articles or raise money for charity. They may run a social enterprise, improve people's quality of life, pass on practical knowledge or do another activity.

Imagine that you want to do work that is effective. One approach is to start by exploring the following themes.

Effective Work

Here are some questions it can be helpful to explore when focusing on how to do effective work

- When have I tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did I do right? What were the principles I followed? How can I follow similar principles – plus add other skills - to tackle this challenge?
- When have other people tackled similar challenges successfully? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can I follow these principles in my own way?
- What are real results I want to achieve from the project? What are the principles I believe in following? What the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success?
- How can I build on my strengths and follow my successful style of working? How can I manage the consequences of any weaknesses? How can encourage myself on the journey?

- How can I get some quick successes? How can I follow my chosen rhythm? How can keep following good habits? How can keep doing the right things in the right way?
- What are the potential difficulties I may face? How can I prevent these happening? How can I manage these if they do happen? How can I stay calm and find solutions to problems?
- Who are the stakeholders I want to satisfy? What are the actual words I would like them to say about the work I do for them? How can I do my best to ensure they are saying these things?
- How can keep doing reality checks? How can I build on what is working? How can I tackle the areas for improvement? What else can I do to increase the chances of achieving success?

Different people follow this approach in different ways. As mentioned, some aim to do work that encourages people. Let's look at one such approach.

Maggie's Centres aim to empower people to live with, through and beyond cancer. The following section includes excerpts from the organisation's website and images from some of their many centres.

Maggie Keswick Jencks was the co-founder, alongside Charles Jencks, of Maggie's Cancer Caring Centres. Maggie was a writer, a landscape designer, a painter and a mother of two.

In May 1993, Maggie was told that her breast cancer had recurred and spread to her bones, liver and brain. When asked, her Dumfries oncologist gave her two to three months to live.

By joining a trial involving advanced chemotherapy Maggie extended her life by a further 18 months and it was in this time that her idea for a cancer caring centre was born.

Our approach

We know that when you're diagnosed with cancer you need much more than just medical treatment.

We're here for anyone with cancer and their family and friends, whatever kind of cancer, and whatever stage they're at.

All our support is free. There's also no time limit on our support, we're here for as long as we're needed.

Professional support

Maggie's isn't part of the NHS – we're an independent charity – but our centres are beside major cancer hospitals across the UK and we have excellent relationships with our partner hospitals.

Many of our staff are NHS-trained and all our Cancer Support Specialists have expert knowledge about cancer and treatment.

She worked closely with Laura Lee, her oncology nurse, and was asked to write an article for a medical journal on a patient's perspective on being treated for cancer.

Maggie was convinced that everybody would feel better if they felt able to take some active role in what was happening to them.

She talked to her medical team at the Western General Hospital in Edinburgh about a place to help their patients with the very real, if not medical, problems of living with cancer.

She drew up a blueprint for a pioneering venture, in a stable block in the grounds of the hospital. Maggie died in July 1995. The first Maggie's Centre opened in Edinburgh in November 1996.

Charles Jencks was a renowned cultural theorist, landscape designer, and architectural historian. "The Architecture of Hope" was co-authored by Charles with journalist and author, Edwin Heathcote. It explores the history of Maggie's and the architectural tradition to which our centres and their gardens belong.

After Maggie's diagnosis in 1993 Charles not only supported her through her treatment but also in her idea of better spaces for people with cancer.

He encouraged Maggie to set up the very first centre that bears her name and after her death continued to champion the huge importance of environment in helping people with cancer and their families.

Charles helped to create beautiful buildings that contribute to the significant work done at Maggie's.

A friendly space

We work with some of the best architects in the world to design our centres because we know that light, colour and a connection to nature can help people to feel better.

Every Maggie's is thoughtfully designed to be calming and welcoming.

We also make sure there are plenty of peaceful corners for quiet moments and a chance to gather your thoughts.

You Can Do Work That Is Excellent

Imagine that you aim to do enjoyable work that is effective. You can then take the next step and aim to deliver excellence. Sometimes it can also lead to doing something extraordinary. Let's explore how you can take these steps.

Being Effective Creates The Platform For Delivering Excellence

There are many models for doing fine work. One approach is to do effective work to get to 7+/10. It is then to do something extra to get to 10/10.

Great workers often apply this approach. They aim to follow effective strategies and build a solid platform. They then, when appropriate, do something special to achieve excellence.

Doing work you enjoy is not always plain sailing. Sometimes it can involve tackling difficult challenges. It is then important to remind yourself of why you are doing the work.

Sometimes it can be useful to focus on the pleasure of doing such work - even in so-called pressure situations. It is important to retain your sense of joy because otherwise things can go awry. One athlete explained this in the following way.

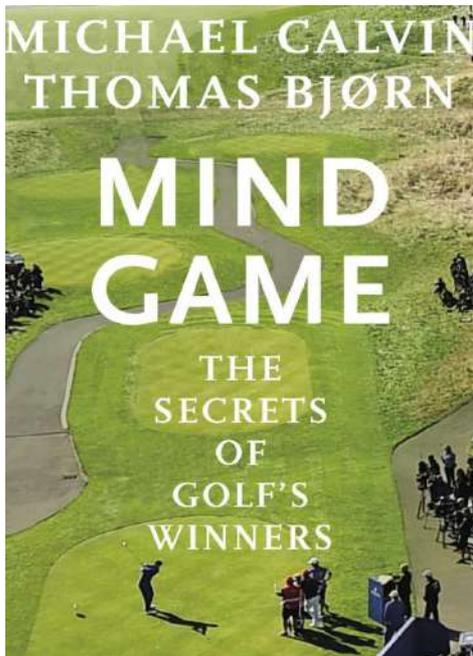

"I had to rediscover my love for the sport. I had become caught up with the whirlwind of chasing money and comparing myself to others. This led to negative self-talk and frustration."

Thomas Bjørn described a similar experience in the book he wrote with Michael Calvin called Mind Game: The Secrets of Golf's Winners. In it he recalls learning how to deal with the demons in his own head.

This involved returning to the love he had for the game as a child. Here is an extract from the book where he describes facing this challenge.

"A light went out when I lost my swing for a couple of years. I look for myself today and realise I don't play the game with the same love I lavished on it as a kid.

"I don't run to practise or play golf for fun with my friends. To me, it is a job, and it is therefore a short-lived thing."

Thomas began to rediscover his love for the game. He goes on to describe how this helped him.

"It helped drive away the demons by reminding me of those beguiling moments when golf is just a game instead of a starkly defined, casually cruel profession.

"Innocence is lost quickly, easily. If you cannot reconnect with the sense of wonder you had as a child, then you, too, will be lost."

Another athlete aimed to do their personal best but not at any cost. They expressed their philosophy in the following way.

"I began playing sports for pleasure. I loved feeling alive and doing my best. My talent took me to the point where playing sport became a career. People then told me that I would need to sacrifice myself and even suffer if I was to reach the top.

"Looking at the people who had won titles, some said that it bought relief rather than joy. Some even lost things that were important in life – such as their marriages and contact with their children.

"I continue to get pleasure from my sport and make a good living. The most crucial thing, however, is that I have managed to focus on what I believe to be the most important things in life."

The Entertainment Approach

Some people use their talents to focus on providing entertainment. This sounds far removed from doing effective work but the people who take this route often start by mastering the basics.

There are many definitions for the word entertainment. Here is one that covers some activities in the arts, music, sports and other fields.

Entertainment consists of performances that give people pleasure.

Different kinds of performers will have different views on the nature of their work. Much depends on their philosophy and the principles they aim to follow.

Some football managers, for example, say they are only interested in the business of winning. Some great football managers – such as Matt Busby, Bobby Robson and others – also saw it as their job as to provide entertainment.

Justin Hayward, a lead singer in the Moody Blues, said that the band saw it as important to entertain the fans who attended their concerts. The Moodies continued to evolve by doing experimental work in the studio and on their albums.

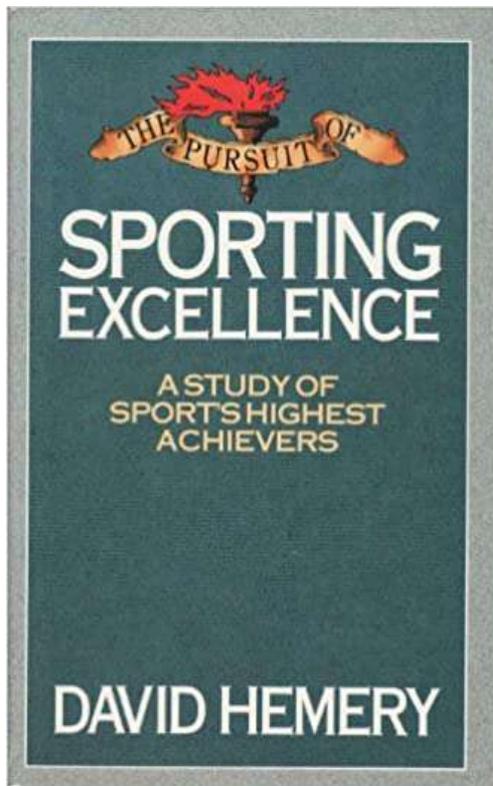

The band had a certain philosophy when it came to live shows, however, and focused on its audience. Here is a summary of how Justin described this approach.

"Many fans have followed us for decades. They may be interested in some of our new work but they really want to hear the songs that give them pleasure. We aim to honour this and give them a great experience."

Excellence

Great workers aim to become the best they can be. They aim to deliver consistently high standards and produce excellence.

David Hemery, an Olympic Gold Medal winner, described the importance of athletes taking this approach in his 1991 book Sporting Excellence. Here is the official description of the book.

David found that great performers had intrinsic motivation.

This began at an early age. They chose to play their sport because they wanted to play it rather to please other people.

They followed their inner drive and developed their inner discipline.

They then aimed to build on their talent and become the best they could be.

In his survey of over 50 world-class performers, David Hemery examines the common factors which separate the highest performers from the rest of the competition.

He asks over 80 questions covering subjects such as childhood, upbringing, parental guidance, coaching, personal relationships, destiny, stress and the influences of the mind.

Over the course of the study covering the performers' physical, social, mental and moral development, various patterns emerged and these are illustrated with direct quotes taken from interviews given by the performers.

David aimed to spread this approach with his work in education, sports and business. His work includes creating a programme for schools which encourages young people to do their personal best.

The programme reached thousands of youngsters. It encouraged them to use their talents in the arts, sports, dance, maths, engineering, leadership and many other activities. David explained this approach in the following way.

Be The Best You Can Be!

Tens of thousands of young people from many backgrounds, ranging from the deprived to the privileged, are currently engaged in the Be The Best You Can Be! Programme across the UK.

All are enabled to follow their own unique learning journey to achieve their full intellectual, physical, social and spiritual potential as responsible individuals, citizens and member of their community.

There is a spark of greatness, something special and unique in everyone and Be The Best You Can Be! is designed to unlock more of each individual's untapped potential and is the translation of inspiration into action.

Great organisations create an environment in which people are encouraged to do their best. This sometimes involves taking the next step.

Building An Excellence Culture Rather Than An Excuse Culture

When have you encountered an excellence culture rather than an excuse culture? You may have visited a sports team, hospital, company or other organisation where people continually delivered high standards.

What did people do to create such a culture? How did they keep reminding people of what good looked like? How did they deal with any quality problems? Let's explore how it is possible to make this happen.

Excellence Culture	Excuse Culture
The characteristics of people in an excellence culture are:	The characteristics of people in an excuse culture are:
They ...	They ...

Many years ago I encountered two extreme cultures during the course of a week. The first culture exuded excellence.

The pathway to the building was clean and attractive. The reception people had been told I was arriving and had a badge ready. They provided coffee and fruit for visitors in the reception area where customer success stories were displayed on the walls.

Watching the employees arrive, they appeared friendly and wanting to work. The whole environment buzzed with a sense of energy. People took responsibility for maintaining the high standards.

The Chief Executive came to collect me rather than sending somebody else. Building on my comments about the reception area, she explained the company wanted the visitors to go away saying:

"That is the best reception area I have ever visited. It exemplified what the company aims to do each day. I wish my company's reception area could be like that."

Great Organisations

- They keep sharing the picture of success.
- They keep showing their people what good looks like.
- They keep rewarding the behaviour they want repeated.

The second company I visited was much less inspiring. The grounds outside the main entrance were littered with cigarette butts, chewing gum and empty cans in the hedges.

The reception area was grubby and staffed by uninterested people from a security company. The meeting rooms were dark, had faulty window blinds and had packages stacked in the corners.

The company was grey. There were few signs of energy or love for the work. People failed to take responsibility for improving the standards. I left wondering how people got through each day.

Looking at your own experience, what do you think are the characteristics of an excellence culture? What are the values that people believe in? How do people translate these values into action? How do they actually behave?

Looking at the other extreme, what do you think are the characteristics of an excuse culture? How do people behave in such a culture? What happens as a result?

Good leaders reward the behaviour they want repeated. They also never walk past a quality problem - otherwise they have said it is okay.

Never walk past a quality problem – because otherwise you have said it is okay

A Managing Director taught me about this when I was due to meet him. Sitting in the reception area of his company's offices, I saw him park his car and begin walking toward the main entrance.

Suddenly he dived into the hedge and emerged with an empty drinks can. It was 7.30 in the morning and the can had obviously been thrown from the nearby main street during the night.

The MD explained his approach in the following way.

"I refuse to walk past a quality problem. If we don't keep our hedges and car parks clean, visitors will think we don't pay attention to our products."

This approach also applies to dealing with people who display poor professional standards. Here is one example.

Imagine the scene. It is 9.30 on a Monday morning and one team member arrives 30 minutes late for a 9.00 meeting at the office. He then says the following things to the rest of the staff.

"What a terrible day. The trains are late and later I am due to meet the client from hell. What a way to begin Monday."

What to do about such an entrance? You can ignore the person, confront them or adopt some other approach.

I witnessed such an incident when the leader asked the team member who arrived late to leave the room. He said:

"I wonder if you can replay that situation. Everybody has found it hard to get into work today, but we want to get on with the job."

"I would like you to go out, then come in again. This time, think about the impression you are giving to people in the office."

"I don't want you to come in with a forced smile, but I do want you to think about the tone you are setting on a Monday morning. Do you want to try it? It's up to you."

That approach sounds heavy, but it actually worked. The team member smiled wryly, accepted the message and said:

"Sorry."

They left the room and came in again 30 seconds later with a totally different attitude. The leader was not looking for clones, far from it, but he did want people who behaved professionally.

You will have your own way of never walking past a quality problem. This can be easy when it applies to physical products or customer service. But it can be harder with human behaviour.

People must get the message that certain actions are encouraged, however, whilst others are unacceptable. Corporate misdemeanours can often be traced back to ignoring people who behaved badly.

Good organisations encourage the people who take responsibility and deliver the required professional standards. They do not dilute their principles for those who do not want to fulfil the agreed contracts. It is about maintaining standards.

Imagine that you aim to build an excellence culture. You may wish to do this in a school, sports team, organisation or wherever. How can you do your best to make this happen?

You Can Sometimes Aim To Do Work That Is Extraordinary

Some people may go into another dimension and do work that is extraordinary. Let's look at some examples.

Michael Murphy and Rhea White describe how great performers take this step in their book In The Zone. This explores transcendent experiences in sports, the arts and other fields.

One section describes how Mikhail Baryshnikov aimed to take ballet into another dimension. The authors do this by using the following quote from Herbert Saal, the ballet reporter.

The most exquisitely chilling weapon in the arsenal of this complete dancer was his ballon, his ability to ascend in the air and stay there, defying gravity, especially in the double tour en l'air, in which the male dancer revolves two full times before landing.

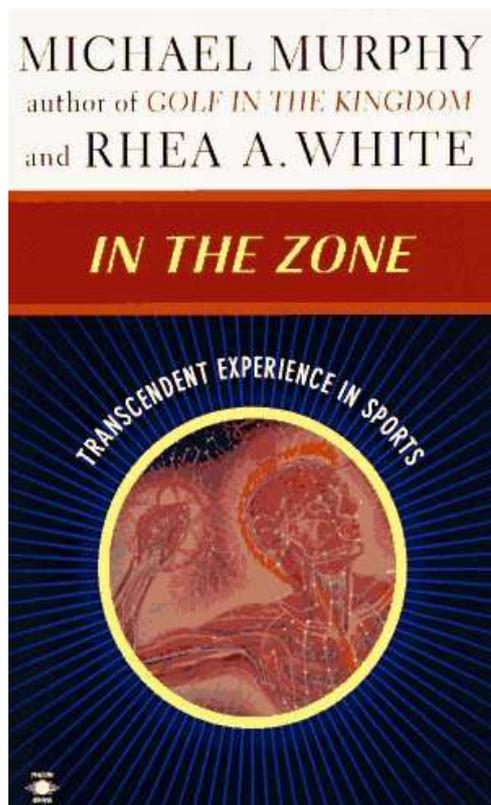

The Stuttgart Ballet's Richard Cragun can turn three times in a blur of motion. But Baryshnikov did it in slow motion. And it was unbelievable.

He blasted off with the hesitation and majesty of a spaceship. He turned – once, twice – and every thread on his costume was plainly visible as he soared high above the audience like an astronaut looking back at earth.

The authors describe a similar phenomenon happening in team sports. They quote Bill Russell, who played for the Boston Celtics, describing how the basketball team produced magic in games. Bill explains how the process would start with three or four of the team's top players acting as a catalyst. He explained this in the following way.

"The feeling would spread to the other guys and we'd all levitate. At that special level all sorts of odd things happened. It was almost as if we were playing in slow motion."

Bill goes on to describe what happened next.

"I could almost sense how the next play would develop and where the next shot would be taken.

"My premonitions would be consistently correct, and I always felt then that I not only knew all the Celtics by heart but also all the opposing players, and that they all knew me.

"These were the moments when I had chills pulsing up and down my spine."

Some people experience this feeling in their daily lives. They do this by continuing to have a sense of gratitude, appreciate life or feel at one with the world. They may experience it when doing creative work, playing music or performing another activity.

Some people experience it through their senses. They immerse themselves in activities and feel fully alive. They then feel transported into another dimension.

Some people may also experience something like the original Greek definition of ecstasy. This involves standing outside oneself and becoming at one with the experience. Sometimes it involves being in a state of rapture or at one with the divine.

Some people experience this feeling through making a creative breakthrough. They may be deeply engaged in a piece of work or searching to find a solution. The moment of enlightenment then brings a rush of happiness. Carl Sagan said, for example:

"Understanding is a kind of ecstasy."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking to the future, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the enjoyment, effectiveness and excellence approach. How can you do this in your own way?

The Craft Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One model is to follow the craft approach by focusing on caring, creativity and contentment. Let's explore these themes.

What are the kinds of work you really care about doing? You may care about encouraging people, solving certain problems, helping people to succeed, building a better world or doing another activity

How can you translate what you care about into pursuing a particular craft? You may aim to do this by working as a counsellor, educator, nurse, writer, film maker, scientist, problem solver, leader or in another role.

How can you do creative work when pursuing this craft? Bearing in mind your strengths, how can you focus on doing a specific project? How can you concentrate and do superb work? How can you use your creativity to find solutions to challenges?

How can you set goals each day and reach these aims? How can you encourage yourself on the journey? How can you finish properly? How can you, if possible, get a feeling of contentment?

How can you rest and reflect? Bearing in mind what you care about, how can you then continue to develop as an educator, coach, mentor, musician or in another role? How can you continue to pursue your chosen craft?

There are many definitions for craft. Originally it applied to making things by hand. More recently it has expanded to include other activities that involve the pursuit of excellence. One definition is:

To create or make something with skill and careful attention to detail.

Imagine you want to follow this path in your own way. Let's explore some of the themes you may wish to pursue.

Caring

Seth Godin, the author, believes that sometimes it is difficult to find our calling. He recommends instead to focus on the things we care about. Here are some of the themes he explored in his blog.

Seth Godin - The Importance Of Caring

"I don't think we have a calling. I do think it's possible to have a caring."

"A calling implies that there's just one thing for you, just one thing you're supposed to do."

"What we most need in our lives, though, is something worth doing, worth it because we care."

"There are plenty of forces pushing us to not care. Bosses, systems, bureaucracies and the fear of mattering. None of them are worth sacrificing something as important as caring."

Imagine you want to pursue this path. One approach is to start by clarifying the kinds of work you really care about doing. Different people give different answers when exploring this theme. Here are some of the things they describe.

The Kinds Of Work I Really Care About Doing Are:

Helping people to care for their wellbeing ... Creating beautiful things ... Writing inspiring music ... Making sure everybody has access to clean water ... Making films that inspire people to care for nature ... Developing technology that empowers people.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Start by brainstorming the kinds of work you really care about doing.

Looking at this list, have a go at describing the top three things. Then rate the extent to which you care about these on a scale 0-10.

Caring

The specific kinds of work I really care about doing and the extent to which I care about these are:

* _____ / 10

* _____ / 10

* _____ / 10

The next step is to focus on one of these and translate it into doing a specific project. Depending on your chosen path, you may want:

To write an article ... To run a series of seminars ... To produce a piece of art ... To direct a play ... To nurture a garden ... To coach a youth football team ... To perform in a choir ... To make a sculpture.

To help people find satisfying work ... To renovate a house ... To help children with dyslexia ... To care for animals ... To solve a specific problem ... To do another activity.

The specific kind of work I really care doing about is:

The specific things I can do to translate this into doing a specific project are:

Creativity

Imagine that you have clarified what you want to do. You may then aim to do creative work when pursuing your craft.

As mentioned earlier, great workers often do work that involves the heart, head and hands. Their heart loves to do the specific activity. Their head has an understanding – a model or a picture – of what they aim to achieve. Their hands brings something into being.

By hands I mean, in some cases, literally their hands. They may paint, build, fix, type or do another activity. But in other cases it may be using their whole being – their experience, body, voice or whatever to produce a result.

Dave Gamache, a designer and builder, encourages people to follow certain principles to develop their craft. Here are excerpts from a piece he wrote for the lifehacker website.

Craftsmanship - Doing What You Love And Doing It Right

- The concept of craftsmanship fascinates and drives me. There are many definitions of craftsmanship.
- Some silo the term to physical trades like carpentry, while others pigeonhole it to artistic endeavors. My understanding of craftsmanship is much more fundamental.
- Craftsmanship is doing what you love and doing it right. No matter what you do - designer, baker, electrician, architect, author - your job is your craft.
- Learn to think of your work as practice towards becoming an absolute expert at what you do. Craftsmanship is not a destination; it's a life-long discipline.

● Love your craft every day. Designing a product, web site, or workflow shares the same core values as any other craft. It's experience, the quality of the work and a passion for betterment.

● Improve your work by learning from others and from your own experiences. Design the simplest, most delightful product you can. Watch people use your product and make it better for them.

● Craftsmanship is universal. It's near impossible to capture all the nuances 'craftsmanship' carries, but when you see it, feel it, experience it - you know it.

● Make things that you want to show to others. Build things that will make you proud ten years from now. Sweat the details and the final product will be something to be admired.

Some people start following this path early in life. They begin by throwing themselves into a particular hobby or interest. They get into the habit of doing this activity deeply and well.

The next stage comes later in life. They settle on a particular passion they want to pursue. They then aim to follow certain principles and master certain skills to achieve their picture of success.

Pursuing this path becomes a lifetime journey. They may aim to become the best they can be as an artist, teacher, designer, mentor or whatever.

Here are some examples from women who have enjoyed this journey and helped others to develop their skills. These are based on their biographies for events celebrating female craftswomen on International Women's Day.

The Pleasure Of Pursuing Your Craft

The following pages provide quotes from women who have pursued their craft

Liz Wellby – Artist, Teacher and Maker

"I am a maker and a tutor and I love both roles. They allow me to play, explore and connect with other people, make me smile and bring me joy."

Lucille Scott – Little Duck Forge

"I love teaching and encouraging young people to develop their natural talent, when it comes to adults I feel I am making them more aware of the skills involved in such an amazing craft."

"As a female doing this craft, I am just one of many but I hope that every girl that sees me feels encouraged and that every person I work with won't give it a second thought."

"The metal industry is amazing and respects you for what you can do, most professionals are gender blind."

Jo Harris – Henley-on-Thames School of Art

"Being a female artist, as well as a tutor, I really get to witness firsthand the nurturing aspect of exploring our own creativity.

"There's something very special about welcoming fledgling artists into the studio and watching them come to life as they relax into their own drawing style."

Joe Gregory - Creative With Nature

"I'm a full time willow sculptor. Being a female craftswoman means freedom and independence, a way I can earn a living doing something totally sustainable, in something I love.

"I've been weaving for 12 years and this has led me to develop a series of popular & achievable full day and two day weaving courses in sculpture and basketry. Something I'm truly passionate about."

Kim Stoddart – Green Rocket Courses

"I'm been gardening for 30 years. I've been writing for the Guardian on all matters grow your own since 2013 and teaching gardening since 2014.

"My approach is very hands on and accessible and designed to debunk a lot of the jargon to make gardening accessible and wonderful for all.

"The nurturing of a seed into food is magical and increasingly important. I delight in teaching how by working with nature you can create a more resilient, productive and enjoyable space in which to be.

"I edit The Organic Way magazine and have gardening columns in the press. I am the author of The Climate Change Garden book."

Alan Cooper, a pioneer in computing, described some qualities involved in pursuing a craft. Below are some key points he made in a speech at the Interaction Design Association conference in 2008.

An Insurgence Of Quality

Best to market, particularly in high tech, comes about only through craftsmanship. And craftsmanship is all about quality.

The goal of craftsmanship is to get it right, not to get it fast. The ultimate measurement of craft is not speed. It's quality. It's a pure measurement. And a delightful measurement.

Craftsman - craftspeople - do it over and over, until they get it correct. And in their training, in their apprenticeship, they build things over and over.

They learn how to do things correctly, so they can bring enormous expertise to create successful products. Thus the training of craftsman is a long and drawn-out personal process.

Many people have tried to draw a distinction between the arts and crafts. Denis Dutton, the academic and entrepreneur, explored this topic in a Radio New Zealand broadcast in 1990. Below are some of the points he outlined in his talk The Difference Between Art and Craft.

Denis Dutton - Craft Is One Of The Borderlands Of Art

- Craft work is skilled work. It involves the application of a technique and human intelligence. It produces things which are useful for various human purposes.
- Art involves involves craft. The training of practitioners in all the arts is based on the mastery of techniques. The artist then uses their talent to create art.
- Craft can also go beyond technique. It can involve exploring novel and undiscovered possibilities. Hence, in this respect, it can sometimes be considered to be art.
- Craft is, in fact, one of the borderlands of art.

Imagine that you have translated what you care about into pursuing a certain craft and doing a specific project.

How can you set aside time to do the work? How can you rehearse what you are going to do? How can you follow your chosen ritual for beginning the work? How can you set yourself achievable goals?

How can you follow your principles when doing the work? How can you build on your strengths and your skills? How can you develop your craft on the way towards achieving the specific goals?

The specific goals – the real results I want to achieve - by doing this project are:

Contentment

Imagine that you are pursuing your craft and working towards achieving your goals. As ever, it can be useful to focus on the following steps towards doing superb work.

Step One: Strengths

You can build on your strengths and follow your successful style of working.

Step Two: Strategies

You can set specific goals and clarify the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success.

Step Three: Success

You can do superb work, continue to develop and work towards achieving your picture of success.

Pursuing your chosen craft may mean that sometimes you go into what Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi called a state of flow. You become so absorbed in the activity that time goes away.

Different people do this in different ways. Malcolm McCullough described some of the steps that people take in his book Abstracting Craft. Below are themes he describes in the book.

Malcolm McCullough - Pursuing Your Craft

- This quality of engagement is personal. If you are like most people, you probably work well only when your attention is focused on the task at hand.
- Something must draw your interest. This might be the pleasure of handling a material or the concentration required not to ruin a piece of work.
- It could be the intricacies of solving a problem or the anticipation of a finished product. It might be the ambition to succeed, or the fear of failure.
- Or it could simply be the calming effect of routine, based on soothing motions, habitual expertise, and a sustaining commitment to practice.
- If enough of these engaging qualities are sufficiently strong, nothing will distract you from your work - the hours will fly by, and you might not even hear the phone ringing.

Sometimes you will reach your daily goal and get a feeling of contentment. Sometimes you will enjoy such moments but then turn your thoughts to the next day's work

This highlights the different drives within a craft worker. They enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal. They then want to keep improving when pursuing their craft. Contentment can sometimes arrive by accepting and combining these different drives.

It can be the feeling of completeness when seeing their finished product.

It can be the feeling of following their desire to keep developing and making even better finished products.

It can be the feeling of using their talents to make their best contribution during their time on the planet.

Seth Godin believes that, if we focus on the things we care about, we want to keep improving. He described this in the following way.

When we care enough, we raise the bar

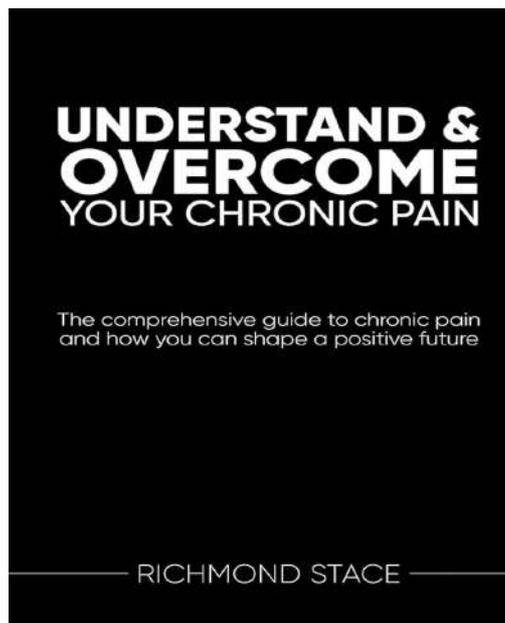

Practice alone, the 10,000 hours thing, doesn't produce work that matters.

No, that only comes from caring. From caring enough to leap, to bleed for the art, to go out on the ledge, where it's dangerous.

When we care enough, we raise the bar, not just for ourselves, but for our customer, our audience and our partners.

Different people demonstrate their caring in different ways. Let's look at one person who translate this approach into action.

Richmond Stace – The Pain Coach

Richmond uses his skills to help people to shape a positive future. The people referred to him may be experiencing persistent pain or other symptoms.

He recognises the importance of a person wanting to immediately feel better and on the road to recovery. Richmond provides people with practical tools that they can use:

To manage, understand and, wherever possible, eliminate pain;

To care for their health by building on their inner resources and adding other practical skills;

To, if they wish, develop their ability to maintain a healthy lifestyle and shape a positive future.

Many of his clients benefit from this approach. Here are a selection from some of the many testimonials.

Back to running after a couple of weeks after struggling with plantar fasciitis for a year

Richmond Stace really helped me and more importantly empowered me to get out of a hole!

His holistic approach, with no stone left unturned, got me to see clearly where I was and provided me with the toolbox not only to get fit again but hopefully to stay healthy.

I'd had a year of plantar fasciitis and other on-going chronic injuries before I turned to Richmond. With a range of mental and physical techniques, he helped me to heal and get back on track with my running.

Paul Cheetham, European Masters Marathon Champion (M45) 2017, World Masters Half Marathon: Team Champion (M45) 2019.

More hopeful and more energy - fibromyalgia

The Pain Coaching with Richmond has helped me to identify and focus my attention on the most important things in my life, introduce structure to my routines and take steps towards my goals and build my confidence.

Definitely I can say that I feel more hopeful and I have more energy to invest in what matters most for me in life.

I follow the exercise programme learned during the treatment, and use practices such as mindfulness, breathing, gratitude, pursuing my purpose and more. As a result, I learned to shift my attention and focus on something more meaningful and enjoyable for myself rather than on my limitations.

The Pain Coaching enabled me to get in tune with my body and the sensations, be more focused and physically active.

Back to writing after a post-traumatic dystonia

Olivia was just 17 in January 2016 when she was diagnosed with viral meningitis and a tumour deep in her brain and in March she took a ball to the head in a lacrosse match which resulted in her having a stroke.

She was immediately thrombosed and spent 5 days on an acute stroke ward.

As a result of the stroke, she was diagnosed with post traumatic dystonia and we were referred to Richmond by Dr Marie Helene Marion in September.

Olivia's right hand would totally freeze, sometimes for hours or days, with the longest being for 2 months. The stress of being 17 and in the middle of university applications and big exams whilst being unable to write was huge.

We came to see Richmond weekly and he helped her enormously with not only coping with the stress levels but the total rehabilitation of her hand and how to retrain her brain in to making her hand move again.

The big breakthrough came after a few weeks when her fingers started to twitch and move again and she worked very hard on all the exercises that Richmond gave her to do to re-associate her brain to her hand and to love it again.

She re-learnt how to hold a pen and how to write and every week her writing would get smaller and neater and it is now totally back to normal.

It has been a very scary year for her but Richmond has always been very calming, explaining everything clearly and teaching her how to cope and how to improve.

We found him to be extremely kind and compassionate and there are not many people who could make a scared teenager feel totally at ease from the first meeting, so positive, encouraging and always at the end of an email if we had a query.

I can't thank Richmond enough for everything that he did for Olivia and for me!

He has restored her confidence and has taught her good coping strategies for the future.

Her hand is now fully functioning, she aced her exams, passed her driving test and has got amazing offers from top universities.

All things that 6 months ago looked impossible to achieve with the dystonia. We would have no hesitation in recommending Richmond – a nicer man you could not meet.

The Picture Of Success Approach

The Picture Of Success Approach

This approach involves helping individuals, teams and organisations:

- To clarify the picture of success;
- To follow the key strategies for achieving the picture of success;
- To deliver the picture of success.

This approach can be used to help individuals, teams and organisations to achieve their goals. It can be used in face-to-face sessions, workshops or remote learning.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. You may be aiming to help a person, team or organisation to achieve their goals. This involves focusing on the following themes. Whatever the situation, you can help people:

To clarify the picture of success;

To follow the key strategies for achieving the picture of success;

To achieve the picture of success.

Bearing these things in mind, it can be useful to get some background before moving on to helping people to achieve their aims. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

The Present Situation

What is happening in their world? What may be the challenges they face? What may be the goals they want to achieve? What is the first topic they want to explore? What is actually happening in the situation? Can they give some specific examples?

The Picture Of Success

Looking at the topic they want to explore, what are the real results they want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What would be the benefits of achieving these goals? What would be the specific things that would be happening that would show they have achieved the goals?

The Possible Ways Forward

What are the things they can and can't control in the situation? Bearing these in mind, what are the possible options for moving forwards? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? Are there any other potential creative solutions?

What is the route they want to follow? What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they get some quick wins? What else can they do to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success?

When appropriate, the approach also involves you passing on knowledge and practical tools they can use to achieve their goals. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

Looking back, can you think of a situation you followed some elements of the picture of success approach? You may have been encouraging a person, facilitating a workshop, leading a team or doing another activity.

How did you clarify the real results they wanted to achieve? How did you clarify the strategies they could follow? How did you pass on knowledge and practical tools they could use? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Picture Of Success Approach In The Past

The specific things I did then to use the picture of success approach were:

There are many ways to clarify the picture of success. The following pages explore some of these approaches.

The Goals Approach

My Goals

The goals I want to achieve in my life or work are:

- To ...
For example ...

- To ...
For example ...

- To ...
For example ...

This is one of the most basic approaches to working with people. It focuses on helping them to clarify and achieve their personal or professional goals.

The first time I came across it was when practicing Reality Therapy. This encouraged people to take responsibility for shaping their futures.

There are many ways to use the goals approach. These include variations such as the classic GROW model. This encourages a person to focus on their goals, reality, options and their will to work towards achieving the goals.

Whatever approach is used, these often involve using the keywords What, How and When. Different people use different questions when using this approach. They may, for example, invite somebody to explore the following themes.

What

What do you want to do in your life? What do you want to do in your personal or professional life? What are your specific goals? What will be the benefits of achieving those goals?

How

How can you do your best to achieve the goals? What are the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success? How can you translate these into action?

When

When do you want to work towards achieving your goals? How can you get some quick successes? What will be happening that will show you have achieved your goals?

There are many ways to apply this approach. The following pages explore some of the most common ways to help people, teams and organisations to achieve their aims.

The Real Results Approach

The Real Results Approach

This approach goes deeper than focusing on the goals a person says they want to achieve. Bearing in mind their aims, it involves exploring with them:

- What are the real results you want to achieve?
- What will be the benefits of achieving these results?
- What is the picture of success?

Imagine that somebody has asked for your help in clarifying their aims. Different individuals will want to explore different themes. They may, for example, describe some of the following aims:

I want:

To help our son to pass the exams needed to get to university ... To keep progressing in my career ... To regain a sense of purpose in my work ... To become a marketing director ... To change the culture in our company ... To fulfil my potential.

Imagine that a person wants to focus on one of their goals. It can be useful to clarify the real what – the real results to achieve.

What does a parent want to achieve, for example, by helping their son to pass exams? Do they want to help them to get into university or to have a satisfying career?

There may be other ways to help their son to have a satisfying career without going to university. They can help them: a) to build on their strengths; b) to do stimulating work; c) to earn a good salary.

What does a person want to achieve by becoming a marketing director? They may want to do strategic marketing work and build an outstanding reputation.

Some marketing directors are able to do this, but some join companies where the CEO sees themselves has the chief marketer. They simply want somebody who is an implementer. The person may be able to find other ways to build a reputation as a strategic marketer.

Imagine that a customer asks you to fix a specific problem. They may already have an idea about what needs to be fixed and how. They may say something along the lines of:

"We want your help in fixing: a) ... b) ... c) ... The things we would like you to do to help fix it are: d) ... e) ... f) ..."

The customer is understandably focusing on the immediate issue, but there may also be a longer-term issue. Bearing this in mind, you may say something along the following lines.

"I can fix the present problems and make sure they never happen again. If you are interested, I can also build something that will ensure you achieve your future goals."

You can clarify the real results to achieve in both the short and long-term. The customer may or may not be interested. If they are, however, you can help them to achieve ongoing success.

The Actual Words Approach

The Actual Words Approach

The actual words I/We want to hear the person or the group of people saying are:

The specific things I/we can do ensure they are saying these things are:

Imagine you are helping a team to set their goals. They may well focus on what they want to achieve in terms of profits, product quality and people's wellbeing.

You can bring these goals to life by inviting them to do this well-known exercise. People go into groups and take the following steps.

They list each of the key stakeholders they want to satisfy – such as their bosses, the various customers, their colleagues and other stakeholders.

They describe the actual words they would like to hear each of these stakeholders saying about the work the team is delivering.

They describe the specific things they can do to do their best to ensure the stakeholders are saying these words.

The team may want the customers, for example, to be saying the following things about the service it provides.

"They really understand our business ... They deliver great service that helps us to achieve our goals ... They act as one-stop shop for dealing with problems ... They are true partners and help us to achieve success."

The team may also want the leaders at headquarters saying the following things.

"The team always delivers its targets ... It is self-managing, proactive and makes a good contribution to the business ... It delivers great service to its internal customers ... It produces people who go on to take important roles in the company."

This is an exercise I have used many times with individuals and teams. People describe what they want their stakeholders to be saying. They then aim to deliver this picture of success.

The Stakeholder

The name of the stakeholder is:

The actual words we would like to hear them saying are:

The Outcomes Approach

The Outcomes Approach

This involves continually focusing on the following themes:

-  To clarify the desired outcomes;
-  To make clear contracts about the desired outcomes;
-  To keep working towards the desired outcomes.

This approach mirrors some of the themes explored in the picture of success approach. It is included here because many people apply it in their daily lives and works.

The outcomes approach can be used in different situations. It can be used when setting personal goals, helping a person or working with a group of people. Let's explore how this can work in practise.

Clarifying The Desired Outcomes

The approach starts by clarifying the outcomes to achieve. These can be on many levels – such as concrete, emotional and other outcomes. It can also be useful to clarify the benefits of achieving these results.

This involves starting from the destination. It calls for clarifying the real What – the real results to achieve – before moving on to the How. It then involves translating these into a clear picture of success.

The next step is to explore the How. It is to clarify the key strategies you can follow to achieve the goals. Sometimes you will do this by yourself, but on other occasions you will involve other people.

This will obviously be the case if you are helping an individual. You will create an environment in which they are able to clarify their aims. If appropriate, you can then help them to settle on their strategy for achieving the desired outcomes.

Great leadership teams often clarify the real results to achieve – the What - and the key aspects of the How. When appropriate, then they involve their people in building up the complete picture.

Whether you are setting personal goals or working with other people, it is vital to clarify the outcomes to achieve. You can then move on to the next stage.

Clear Contracting About The Desired Outcomes

Good leaders often communicate the following things to their people. They start by giving them the big picture and context. They then explain:

The specific outcomes to achieve together with the benefits of achieving these outcomes;

The specific strategies for working towards achieving these outcomes;

The specific contributions that will be required to achieve these outcomes.

They always give the big picture and the reasons for the strategies. They also give people the chance to ask questions and, when appropriate, add their ideas.

Such leaders then give people the chance to reflect and decide if they want to contribute towards achieving the goals. If so, they again describe the outcomes to achieve. They then go through the following steps.

They make clear contracts with each person – or each team – about:

The specific things they will deliver towards achieving the outcomes;

The specific support they will need to deliver their part of the outcomes;

The specific things they will do to proactively keep others informed about their progress towards delivering their part of the outcomes;

The specific early successes they will get on the way towards delivering their part of the outcomes.

Good leaders make sure that everybody knows what each person – or each department – is contributing towards achieving the goals. This helps to ensure that everybody is working towards the same picture of success.

Individuals sometimes make clear contracts with themselves. They may do this when working towards their personal or professional goals. Such people often go through the following steps.

They clarify the outcomes they want to achieve and the benefits of achieving these goals;

They clarify the specific things they can do to do their best to achieve these goals;

They clarify the pluses and minuses involved and, bearing these in mind, rate their motivation – on a scale 0-10 - to do what is required to reach the goals.

Such individuals make sure the rating is at least 7+/10. They then ask themselves the following questions.

"Am I really serious? Am I prepared to do what is required to reach the goals?"

They then decide if they really want to go for the goals. If so, they make a contract with themselves about the actual things they will do to do their best to achieve success.

Continually Working Towards The Desired Outcomes

Great workers continually check that they are working towards the desired outcomes. They clarify what is working and what they can do better. They then keep following the disciplines required to achieve the goals.

Events sometimes occur that call for readjusting the goals. If so, people clarify what they can control. They then commit to achieving the new picture of success.

Good leaders also educate their people to continually focus on the desired outcomes. One leader I worked with did this when team members came to them to talk about challenges.

A person once asked him how to deal with a client that was causing problems. The leader said something along the following lines.

"Let's go back to the outcomes we want to achieve. Do we still want to get wins for our company, wins for the customer and wins for our people? If so, what could that look like?"

"What is the profit we want to make as a company? What is the quality of service we want to give to the customer? What are the feelings we want our staff to have? How can we do our best to achieve these outcomes?"

The leader and staff member clarified the real results to achieve. They then explored the possible options for going forwards – together with the pluses and minuses of each option.

Taking time to reflect, they considered if there were any other creative solutions. They then settled on the route they wanted to follow to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

There are many ways to use the outcomes approach, but it is worth repeating one key issue. The approach often calls for focusing on the more than the tangible results. It considering the emotional aspects.

Good decision makers often take this approach. They clarify the actual things they want people to be feeling, saying and doing after reaching the goals. These outcomes form part of the desired picture of success.

The Sharing The Dream Approach Rather Than The Selling The Dream Approach

Good leaders sometimes follow the sharing the dream approach rather than the selling the dream approach. This highlights a paradox.

This is because some people are more likely to buy into a dream that is being shared rather than being sold. Such people then feel more freedom to decide if they want to support it. This is because:

Sharing the dream is about describing something and showing the benefits to people;

Selling the dream is about trying to do something to people.

Different leaders share the dream in different ways. This can depend on the aims they are sharing with people. Whatever the goals, however, some leaders take the following approach.

Sharing The Dream

This sometimes involves:

- Showing the dream;
- Showing the benefits of achieving the dream;
- Showing the strategies for achieving the dream.

Showing The Dream

This involves describing the picture of success. It is important to bring this to life by giving concrete examples that resonate with people. It is also important to describe some of the specific things that may be happening when people have delivered the dream.

Showing The Benefits Of Achieving The Dream

This involves describing the benefits – for all the various stakeholders – of achieving the picture of success. People buy success but it is important to be honest with people. It is vital to describe the potential pluses - and how to manage any potential minuses - involved in delivering the dream.

Showing The Strategies For Achieving The Dream

This involves describing the strategies for achieving the picture of success. It is to show people: a) the strategies most likely to achieve success; b) the potential early successes; c) the ways to deal with any challenges. It is to show people a practical plan for delivering the dream.

Some leaders go through these steps. If appropriate, they may then invite people to decide if they want to contribute towards achieving the goals. If so, they make clear contracts about how people can use their strengths to help the deliver the dream.

The sharing the dream approach is about people being motivated to achieve the picture of success. It is not about people being briefly motivated by charisma or an inspiring speech. These can be helpful. But people must be motivated by wanting to do the work.

The sharing the dream approach may sound counter intuitive. But the paradox is that, when done properly, it can be more attractive than trying to sell a dream.

People are more likely to opt in when they are treated like adults and given the full picture. They can then decide whether they want to contribute and do their best to deliver the dream.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Second Empathy Approach

Good mentors often use both the first and second empathy. The latter approach calls for being able:

To connect with people's aspirations ... To establish clarity about what they want to achieve ... To help them to achieve concrete results.

The First Empathy

Some mentors show that they can see, feel and experience the world from the other person's point of view. They play this back to the person to ensure they have got the right picture. This is the first empathy.

The Second Empathy

Some mentors connect with people's aspirations. They do this in such a way that the person feels it is possible for them to achieve these goals. This is the second empathy.

How to practice the second empathy? One approach is to focus on when a person has used their strengths or followed their successful style – even if it only for a few seconds. It is then extrapolate this information to explore what the person can become in the future.

This involves using the organic approach. It is to focus on examples of when a person has done fine work. It is then to show how it may be possible for them to follow these principles to shape their future.

Belief is an inside job. People have to believe in their guts. If they have done something before, they are more likely to believe they can do it again. They can follow similar principles – plus add other skills – to succeed in the future.

Good mentors invite a person to talk about their aspirations. It appropriate, they also clarify what they believe the person can achieve. They may then say something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, you want to ... Is that right? Let me ask you a question. Would you also like:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"The reason I ask is because, from what you have said and the things I have seen, I believe you could do achieve these aims. It would involve you setting certain goals and doing the work. But I believe that you could achieve these goals. What do you think?"

This seems an enormous leap but I have seen it taken by many great counsellors, educators and mentors. Here is an introduction to what such mentors do when using the second empathy.

The Second Empathy

Some mentors are good at connecting with people. Some are good at connecting with people's aspirations. They sometimes do this by going through the following steps.

Step One

They make the person feel welcome and at ease. They clarify what is happening in the person's world. They then invite them to focus on the first challenge or topic they want to explore.

They clarify what the person says they want to achieve. They also listen for any underlying themes. They clarify what they believe may be the person's short and long-term goals.

Step Two

They watch the person, listen and ask certain questions. They quickly gather information about the person's attitude and abilities. They begin thinking about the person's possible ways forward and potential.

They do this by focusing on certain things. They focus on the person's positive spirit – the times when they come alive or do good work. They also focus on their strengths and successful style.

Step Three

They clarify what they believe the person can achieve. They base this on the information they have gathered. They then clarify how they can best share this with the person.

They play back what they believe the person can achieve in their life and work. They see which of these themes resonate. They clarify the route the person wants to take and help them to achieve their aims.

The Second Empathy Involves Understanding Different Worlds

People who use this approach often have the ability:

- To see what is happening – the various situations – in different worlds;
- To see the challenges and potential solutions in the different worlds;
- To see what people can do to achieve success in the different worlds.

People who use the second empathy approach are often good at understanding the challenges that different individuals may be facing. They often have a background of learning about what is happening in different worlds.

Such people gather information in a neutral way without rushing to judgement. They like to understand: a) the challenges that people face; b) the potential solutions; c) the things that people can do to achieve success in these worlds.

They often have a pattern of being curious since childhood. They may have read extensively, watched films, visited various countries or done other things that widened their horizons.

This is a quality often shown by good therapists, educators, interviewers, trusted advisors and people in other fields. It helps them to understand other people's situations and help them to manage challenges.

Seeing what is happening in different worlds

Looking back at your life, when have you explored what was happening in different worlds? You may have read many kinds of books, explored various spiritual faiths or thrown yourself into learning about aspects of sport, art science or other fields.

You may have developed empathy by putting yourself into many different situations. These may have included nursing, drama, teaching, volunteering or other activities.

You may have watched many television programmes that take you into different worlds. These help them to get an inside view of what is happening in hospitals, banking, technology, sport and other fields.

Some people gather such information to learn. They may have strong opinions, but they gather information in a neutral way. They want to widen their lens and develop their understanding. They do not see things through a narrow lens and rush to judgement.

Such individuals are aware of their confirmation bias. They like to gather information and then, when appropriate, decide on their chosen way forwards.

Seeing the challenges and solutions in different worlds

Different people look for different things when exploring different worlds. Some people simply like to gather information and learn.

Some want to understand more about: a) the people; b) the challenges they face; c) the potential solutions. Such people may use the following framework when looking at a situation.

What is happening in this world? What are the situations that people face? What are they doing to tackle the challenges? What are they doing to achieve success?

Who are the individual people? What is their background? What is happening in their lives? What are the reasons they are doing this kind of activity? How does this fit into the rest of their lives?

Looking again at this world, what is actually happening in the various situations? What are people aiming to achieve? What are the challenges? What are the potential solutions to such challenges?

Seeing what people can do to achieve success in different worlds

Some people focus on success when exploring different worlds. They may ask the following questions when looking at a situation.

What are people trying to achieve in this kind of world? What works in the various situations? What are the successes? What are the benefits of delivering these successes?

What are people doing right to deliver these successes? What are the principles they are following? What are the strategies and skills they employ? How do they translate these into action?

What may people in this world want to achieve in the future? How can they do their best to achieve success? What will be happening that will show they have achieved their picture of success?

Let's return to your own life and work. When do you sometimes explore what is happening in different worlds? What do you learn from exploring these situations? How do you sometimes apply this knowledge?

The Support And Space Approach To Helping People To Achieve Success

There are many models for helping people to develop. This is an approach that can be used with individuals, teams and organisations.

The approach starts by clarifying their picture of success. It then involves giving them the support and, within certain parameters, the space they need to achieve success. Let's explore these themes.

Success

Imagine that you are helping a person to develop. After making them feel welcome, you will clarify their aims. The way you do this will depend on the situation. Let's consider some scenarios.

Personal Goals

Imagine that a person has asked for your help with their personal development. You may begin by inviting them to describe the themes or challenges they want to explore. Looking at the first topic they want to tackle, you may aim:

To clarify the real results they want to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

To clarify their responsibilities and the support they would like from you to achieve the picture of success.

Bearing these things in mind, the person may then make a clear action plan. The next step may be for them to get some quick successes on the way towards achieving their goals.

Professional Goals

Imagine that you helping a person to make their best contribution towards an organisation. Much will depend on your role, but one approach is go through the following steps:

To focus on the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To, bearing in mind their strengths, clarify their best contribution towards achieving the picture of success;

To make clear contracts about the outcomes they will deliver, the support they need and how they will proactively keep people informed about their progress towards delivering their part of the picture of success.

Bearing these things in mind, the person may then pursue their action plan. If appropriate, you can meet with them regularly to enable them to achieve the goals. This highlights the next stage.

Support

Many people are self-motivating but it can also be useful to offer them support. This can take many different forms. If appropriate, you may be able:

To offer them encouragement and emotional support;

To offer them positive strategies and practical tools they can use in their own ways;

To offer them other kinds of support that they can use to achieve their goals.

Bearing these things in mind, it can be useful to have a conversation with them about:

The specific things they see as their responsibilities in working to achieve the goals;

The specific kinds of support they would like from you or from others to help them to achieve the goals.

You will do your best to help the person to succeed, but it is important to be clear on the kinds of support you can and can't offer. You may be able to provide encouragement and practical tools, but they may need to continue to motivate themselves.

Imagine that you have made clear contracts about the person's responsibilities and the support you can provide. It may then be time to move on to the next step.

Space

People like to have space to pursue their chosen strategies. This means them having the emotional, physical or other kinds of space to use their knowledge to achieve the goals.

People need space to develop and grow but, in some cases, this can involve operating within certain parameters. They may be encouraged:

To follow certain principles or professional standards;

To operate within other parameters on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Good leaders, for example, make clear contracts with a person on the specific goals to achieve. They also explain the principles that the organisation wants people to follow, plus the reasons for these principles.

Such leaders manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They encourage people to use their knowledge and skills within certain parameters to deliver the goods.

Imagine that you have made clear contracts with a person about their aims and the support they would like to achieve their goals. You can then encourage the person:

To be true to themselves and, when appropriate, use their emotions in a positive way;

To build on their personal or professional strengths and follow their successful style;

To find their way of following certain principles or professional standards on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

You can encourage the person to feel that they have the freedom, within certain parameters, to use their strengths to achieve their goals. This can lead to the next step.

Success

Imagine the person is pursuing their chosen strategies towards achieving their aims. How can you encourage them on the journey?

This may depend on whether they are working toward personal or professional goals, but some common themes can be worth bearing in mind. When meeting with the person, it can be useful to help them:

To refocus on the real results they want to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify what they are doing well and what they can do better on the road towards achieving the picture of success;

To, when appropriate, offer them positive models and practical tools they can use to achieve the picture of success.

You can continue to provide encouragement and pass on knowledge. The person can use this in their own way to achieve their picture of success.

There are many ways to help people to grow. One approach is to give the support and space they need to achieve their goals.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to use elements of this approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Flip Questions Approach

Flip Questions

- "You say that you feel bad. What do you want to feel instead?"
- "You say that a person behaves in a way you that don't like. What do you want them to do instead?"
- "You say that people in the organisation failed to do something properly in the past. How would you like them to behave in a similar situation in the future?"

This approach encourages people to channel their energies in a positive way. It can be used in situations where an individual or a group express themselves in a negative way. They may be saying:

"I don't like it when x does y ... I can't understand why they behave in that way ... The organisation is messing up again ... etc."

One approach is to just listen. If the person or the group keeps complaining, however, this may not help. Another approach is to ask Flip Questions.

These invite the person or the group to say what they would like to see the other party do instead. It is to say things like:

"What would you like to see happen? What do you want the person or organisation to do instead? What could they do to encourage you? What could they do to help you to achieve success?"

People who are complaining may resist this approach at first or may choose to stay in the negative spiral. They may also say there is little point in trying because the other party will not change.

Good mediators, for example, stay patient. They keep inviting people to say what they would like to see happen. They ask them:

To clarify what they would like the other party to do instead;

To clarify the specific things they can do to present these options in a positive way – including explaining the benefits to all parties;

To act as good models and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Therapists also use flip questions. Whilst they may show empathy, they sometimes invite the person to channel their energy in a positive way. They may ask some of the following things to a person.

"You say that you feel bad. What do you want to feel instead?"

"You say that you want to stop feeling angry. What do you want to you want to feel instead?"

The therapist will help the person to clarify how they can do their best to achieve the positive results.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you have used elements of this approach? If so, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

The Success Stories Approach

This is an approach that can be used to help individuals, teams, organisations and even societies to achieve success. It is based on the principle that:

People buy success rather than the theory of success.

People are more likely to change their behaviour if they can see what works and see the benefits. Let's explore how this can work.

Helping people to learn from their own successes

Imagine that a person or a group of people would like to tackle a challenge or achieve a specific goal. One approach is to invite them to learn from their own success stories. You can invite them:

To recall when they have tackled a similar issue in the past and achieved success;

To clarify what they did right then – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – to achieve success;

To clarify how they can follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – to tackle their present issue and achieve success.

Helping people to develop by you doing superb work and producing success stories

Imagine that you have been asked to do help people to succeed and maybe even shift a culture. You can try to get everybody in a system to change their behaviour. This seldom works, however, and can lead to frustration.

Another model is to take the success stories approach. This involves taking the following steps.

The Success Stories Approach

People buy success rather than the theory of success. It can therefore be useful to do superb work and share the knowledge by producing success stories. It be helpful:

- To choose a specific area where you can do superb work and produce a success story.
- To set things up to succeed, do superb work and deliver success.
- To share what worked and pass on the knowledge by producing a success story.

This approach is explained in greater depth later in the book in the section called The Three Waves Approach. It describes how to shift a culture by building prototypes and sharing success stories.

The first step is to focus on a specific area – such a topic, team, project or other activity. It is to choose one where, providing you do superb work, you stand a good chance of delivering success.

The second step is to focus on what you can control and set things up to succeed. It is then to get some early wins, do superb work and deliver success.

The third step is to pass on the knowledge by producing success stories. The aim is to show what works. It is then up to people to decide if they want to apply these principles in their own ways to achieve their picture of success.

The Gold Medal Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to have a gold medal mentality.

Peter Vidmar won a gold medal in gymnastics at the 1984 Los Angeles Olympics. Looking back at how his event was scored in those days, he describes the steps people took to get a Perfect Ten, which was first achieved by Nadia Comaneci in Montreal.

They must first achieve the Olympic standard of competence. This often took years of dedication and would give them the 9.4.

They could then add 0.2 by taking a risk; 0.2 by demonstrating originality - something that had never been done before; and 0.2 by showing virtuosity - flair. Such a brilliant performance would produce a 10 and, hopefully, the Olympic Gold.

Peter is an inspiring speaker. Many people leave his sessions fired up. Some say:

"We can now believe in our dreams. All we have to do is to be original, take risks and demonstrate virtuosity."

They only forget one thing. Peter's most important message is that people must first achieve the 9.4. That is the first step towards winning an Olympic Gold.

Imagine you want to follow elements of this approach. Here are three steps you may want to take in your own way.

You can choose an activity in which you stand a chance of achieving a 10

Focus on an activity where you stand of a chance of delivering peak performance. What is your professional version of the Olympics? Which is the event – the activity - in which you stand a chance of competing for a gold medal?

On the other hand, you may not be interested in competition. You may be a pioneer who invents a new event. Great performers are, by definition, extremists. They are extremely good at what they do and are often brilliant niche suppliers.

Focus on the activity where you are able to excel. There is no point in going into an event where, at best, you can only get a 6.

You can work to achieve the 9.4

Great workers build on their strengths and are also prepared to sweat. They pursue their chosen strategy, find solutions to challenges and work hard to achieve success.

As ever, you can start by clarifying what you can control in the situation. You can then aim: a) to clarify the picture of success; b) to clarify the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of success.

Clarify your road map, complete with milestones, and set out on the road towards achieving your goals. Then follow daily disciplines. Start each day with an early success, perform superb work and encourage yourself on the journey.

Do the right things in the right way until they become second nature. Do everything possible to reach your equivalent of the 9.4.

You can add the risk, originality and virtuosity to achieve the 10

Great workers deliver the goods at vital moments. Providing the foundation is in place, they may take what appears to be a risk. But in their minds – or in their muscle memory - they have done it a thousand times. One person said:

"People say that I take risks, but I have already rehearsed all the scenarios, explored the possible strategies and settled on the way forward.

"I feel comfortable with what I am doing. In fact, it would be a greater risk not to take what appears to be a risk."

Great performers also do something that appears original. But it is the result of spending hours, days or months finding creative solutions to challenges. Then comes the final piece: virtuosity, flair or showmanship.

They may do something magical that stays in people's minds forever. How can you follow these steps in your own way? How can you build on the 9.4 and do your best to produce your equivalent of a 10?

The Positive Pictures Approach

The Positive Pictures Approach

This is a positive approach to helping people. It involves being able:

- To study positive pictures;
- To share positive pictures;
- To support people and help them to achieve their positive pictures.

This approach is based on studying success in many areas of life. It is to study what works, share what works and support people to do what works on the way to achieving success.

One key point is worth mentioning at this stage. Whilst this piece uses the word pictures, some people will have other ways of learning from positive models. They may learn through listening, talking, thinking and then making sense of experiences. Bearing this in mind, let's explore the following themes.

Studying Positive Pictures

Imagine you want to study what works in a specific area of interest. You may want to learn about how people live fulfilling lives, do rewarding work, manage traumatic events, build successful teams or do another activity.

One approach is to study positive models. It is to learn from people, teams or organisations that have done these things successfully. It is to study what they did right – the principles they followed. It is then to build a picture of how they achieved success.

This is an approach that my mentors encouraged me to follow. The first step was to study what worked in the role I had at the time - running therapeutic communities for young people. As my work evolved, however, it involved studying the principles that people followed:

To build on their strengths, follow strategies that worked and achieve success;

To do positive work and, when appropriate, build positive teams and organisations;

To manage setbacks and find solutions to challenges and go on to achieve success;

To manage traumatic events and, as far as possible, go on to live fulfilling lives;

To manage differences and to find, as far as possible, win-win solutions;

To do pioneering work, build successful prototypes and help to shape a positive future;

To focus on their purpose, follow their principles and achieve their picture of success.

You will have your own approach to learning about what works in your specific areas of interest. Sometimes this can lead to the next step.

Sharing Positive Pictures

Different people apply what they have learned from positive models in different ways. They may apply the lessons in their own lives or, when appropriate, pass on the knowledge to other people.

There are many ways to share positive pictures. Depending on their strengths, a person may pass on the principles that work through:

Writing, speeches, films or other media;

Offering therapy, education, workshops or other learning media;

Sharing stories that show people how it is possible to achieve success.

This is an approach that can be used to encourage people. It can help them to learn from positive models and, if appropriate, begin thinking about how they can apply the ideas in their own lives.

Different people do this in different ways. Looking at my own work, this has sometimes involved aiming:

To understand people's situations and clarify what they achieve – their picture of success;

To share what works in these situations – such as the principles that other people have followed to achieve success;

To learn from their positive history – such as the principles they followed in similar situations to achieve success.

There are many ways to build on what works. Sometimes this can involve the next step.

Supporting People And Helping Them To Achieve Their Positive Pictures

This is an approach that I was encouraged to follow early in my career. When meeting a young person who came for an interview at our community, for example, I said something along the following lines:

"Welcome to our community. What do you want to do in your life? If you wish, we can help you to achieve your life goals."

"We do have certain community guidelines. We expect people to take responsibility, encourage other people and work towards their aims.

"It is your choice, of course, so take time to decide if you would like to come here and follow these guidelines. If so, we can provide tools that you can use to achieve your life goals."

The aim was to encourage people to channel their energy in a positive way. Some wanted us to treat them as patients but we did not take that approach. We immediately focused on the carrot – their life goals – and then helped them to work towards their picture of success.

This is an approach that I adapted when working with schools, sports teams, businesses and organisations. After clarifying what the key stakeholders wanted to achieve, I would begin the actual session by saying something along the following lines.

"Welcome to the session. As far as I understand, you want to continue to build on your strengths and work towards your picture of success.

As far as I understand, the specific results you want to achieve are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

"We can focus on these and any other things you want to achieve.

"My role is to provide encouragement and practical tools that you can use to achieve your goals. Your role is to encourage each other, take the ideas you like and use these in your own way.

"Bearing this in mind, are there any other topics you would like to add to the agenda? We can then start working towards the picture of success."

Inspiring speakers sometimes adapt this approach in their own way. They take people to a positive place by describing an inspiring but believable vision. They may say things like:

"I have a dream ... Imagine a place where ... We can get to the moon and back ..."

Such speakers describe more than a positive vision – they also have a plan. They move from the concept to the concrete by giving concrete examples of what the vision may look like in practice.

Mentors also help people to work towards positive pictures. They start by making the person feel welcome and the centre of their world. They then aim:

To clarify the results the person wants to achieve – their picture of success;

To pass on knowledge that the person can use to achieve their picture of success;

To, when appropriate, provide ongoing support to help the person achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may use elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

There are many other methods that people can use to work towards a picture of success. Several of these are described elsewhere in the book. These include the following.

The Mission Approach

People focus on delivering a crystal-clear mission. This often has the following characteristics:

It has a clear and achievable goal;

It has a strategy that can work and the resources required to achieve the goal;

It has a clear time frame and the equivalent of an exit strategy.

The Positive Legacy Approach

People may want to pass on a positive legacy during their time on the planet. They may want to help others emotionally, financially or provide them with hope. They may do this by passing on models, knowledge or practical tools that enable people to shape a positive future.

This is an approach that can be when interviewing people for a role or helping them to set goals in a new job. You can introduce the exercise in the following way.

“There are many ways to set goals. One approach I would like you to explore is to look into the future and do an exercise called Positive Legacy.

“The exercise invites you to describe the three things you want to have achieved or to have passed on by the time you move on from the role. We can then explore how it may be possible to pass on this positive legacy. Here is the exercise.”

The Positive Future Approach

This section has explored several models for helping people. Many of these are based on the positive future approach. This helps people to move from their present situation and take practical steps towards achieving their picture of success.

The Positive Future Approach

This involves helping people to move forwards from their present situation and take practical steps towards achieving their picture of success.

The first step is to help people to clarify their aims. It is then to offer them practical tools they can use to achieve positive results. As mentioned earlier, these are topics we will be exploring in greater depth later in the book.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to use elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may want to encourage a person, support a team or enable an organisation to achieve its goals. How can you help them to clarify their picture of success? How can you then provide practical tools and help them to achieve positive results?

The Pacesetter's Approach

Pacesetters have a different kind of psychology. They take the lead, maintain the lead and extend the lead. They often develop by surfing several sigmoid curves. They may also create a paradigm that shows people another way of achieving success.

There are many ways to build on your strengths and do pacesetter work in your chosen field. Some people do this by focusing on the following steps.

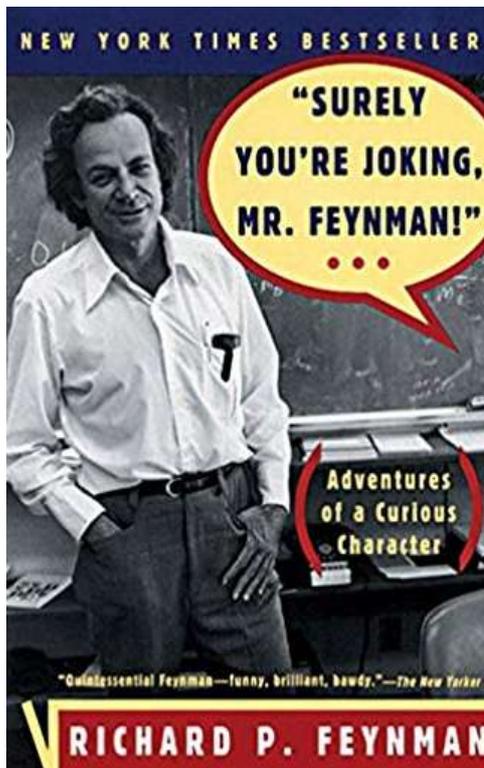

Positive

Pacesetters have a positive attitude to their work. They often follow a passion where they have the ability to do great work. They love to explore positive possibilities for the future.

Such people take their work seriously but also have a sense of play. Some retain this quality throughout their lives. Play powers our imagination. As George Bernard Shaw wrote:

"We don't stop playing because we grow old; we grow old because we stop playing."

Richard Feynman, the professor of physics, urged his students to focus on what they loved to do. This could take them into different dimensions. He kept returning to the following themes.

Fall in love with some activity and do it!

Explore the world. Nearly everything is really interesting if you go into it deeply enough.

Work as hard and as much as you want to on the things you like to do best.

Don't think about what you want to be, but what you want to do.

Keep up some kind of minimum with other things so that society does not stop you from doing anything at all.

Pacesetters often see patterns and extrapolate what may happen in the future. They visualise how things can be and want to deliver this vision.

Such people are able to see the destination quickly. When entering the situation in which they excel, they quickly see the potential picture of success. They go A, B ... and then leap to ... Z.

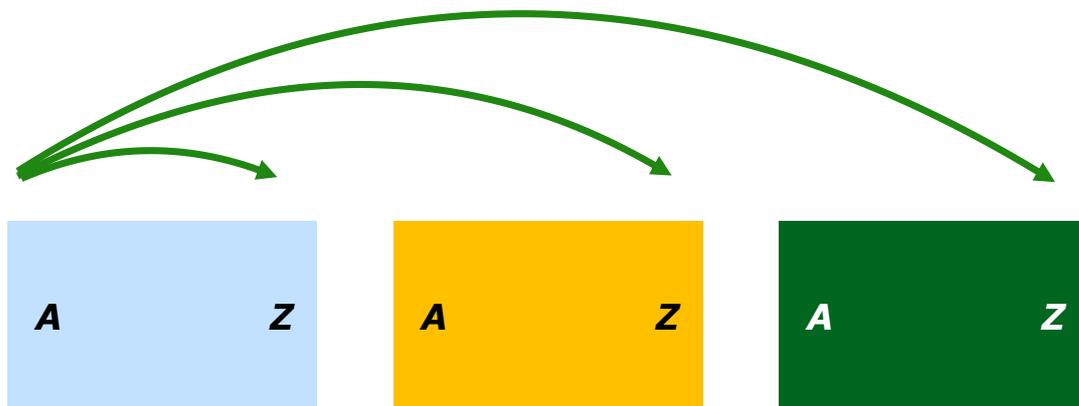

The architect walks onto a site and visualises the finished house. The innovator sees how a piece of technology can transform the world. The mediator imagines a win-win solution for people who are stuck in conflict.

Some people go beyond the first Z. They go onto the second alphabet. Some people go even further. They go into another dimension and onto the third alphabet in their chosen field.

The Third Alphabet

People who are good at a certain activity often see the destination quickly. They go A, B ... and then leap to ... Z.

Some people go beyond Z. They are already onto the second alphabet. Some people go even further. They go into another dimension and go onto the third alphabet.

Such people can be inspiring to work with but also challenging. One Chief Operating Officer explained this in the following way.

"Our leader is a real visionary. He sees the future and is years ahead of everybody.

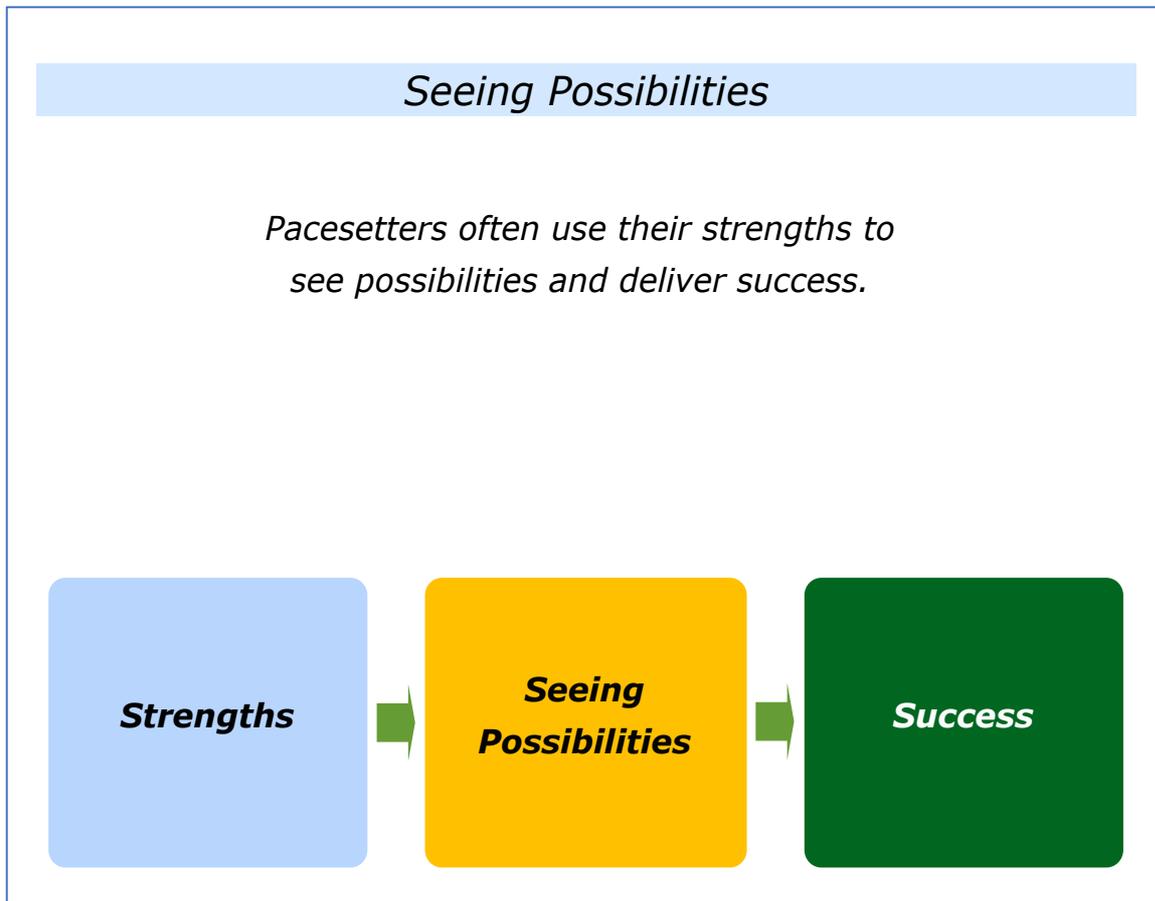

"It is as if he is actually there. He can see, feel and experience what is happening. He can also describe the steps that have been taken to get to this place.

"Whilst a visionary, he can explain some aspects of the journey in great detail. He describes the steps to take and how to overcome challenges. On other occasions, however, he gets exasperated with people who throw in objections.

"He simply says: 'We can solve that,' and goes on to explain the vision.

"Many people find him inspiring, whilst other want more detail and get frustrated. My job is to act as a translator. It is to clarify how we can keep running the business whilst also working towards his long-term vision."

Pacesetters See Possibilities

Pacesetters often use their strengths to see possibilities and deliver success. Sometimes they do this in positive situations. Sometimes they do it when faced by challenges. They then ask some of the following questions.

What are the possibilities in the situation? What are the potential solutions? What are the opportunities rather than just the obstacles? What are the principles I want to follow? What are the practical solutions? How can I do my best to get positive results?

Such people are often lifelong learners. Everybody is different, but creative thinkers may demonstrate some of the following characteristics.

They developed self-learning skills early in life. They explored through reading, experiences or other methods. They were encouraged to follow their passions or were left alone to adventure.

They explored many different philosophies and the many approaches to life. They may have met different kinds of people or lived in different cultures.

They have learned to see things from different angles. They learned to explore different options without passing judgement. They pursued the things they found fascinating before settling on their chosen specialism.

People who see possibilities aim see the big picture. They look for patterns and connections. They then do deep work on the way towards achieving a compelling goal.

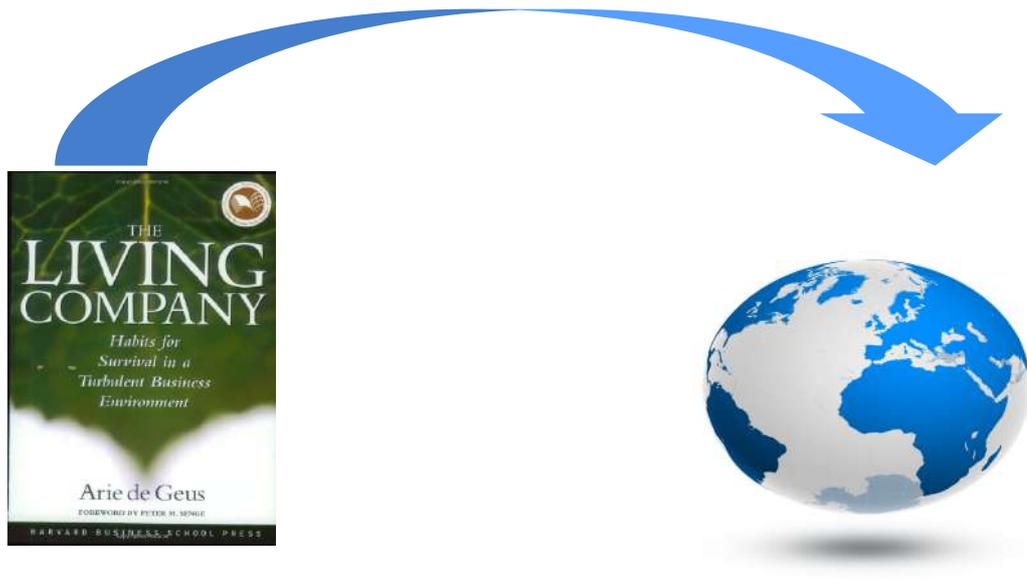

Creative people are sometimes prepared to explore many options without rushing to judgement. They may consider what may seem contradictory ideas and love to keep adding colours to their paintbox. When hearing something, they may ask themselves:

"What if the opposite is true? What happens if I turn the idea upside down? What if I see this as an opportunity rather than an obstacle? What if we turn this so-called limitation into something that is liberating?"

Pacesetters sometimes have what Arie de Geus, the author of The Living Company, called a memory of the future. Such workers anticipate challenges and find potential solutions.

Developing A Memory Of The Future

Great workers continually look ahead to envisage what will happen and develop a memory of the future.

Looking ahead, they use their imagination to take the following steps.

They explore both the positive and challenging scenarios;

They explore how to capitalise on the positive scenarios and how to prevent or, if necessary, manage the challenging scenarios;

They explore the best ways forwards for improving the chances of creating future success.

Such workers find these rehearsals help them as events unfold. Even if the unexpected happens, they will have rehearsed strategies for dealing with many scenarios. This gives them an advantage over others who may not have rehearsed properly.

Such people sometimes go beyond having positive visions. They want to translate these into action. They then focus the next step.

Principles

Pacesetters often follow their chosen principles. The next section looks at people who have done this in different fields.

John Wooden, the legendary American College basketball coach, was a pacesetter who influenced many coaches in sports. He never mentioned winning, but his teams won more titles than any other in College basketball history.

During his early career he began developing his famous Pyramid of Success. This consisted of guiding principles that athletes could put into practise both on and off the court.

The base of the Pyramid consists of phrases such as: Industriousness; Friendship; Loyalty; Cooperation; Enthusiasm. Behind each word there is an explanation. Industriousness, for example, is explained in detail. This includes the phrases:

"In plain language, I mean you have to work – and work hard. There is no substitute for hard work. None. Worthwhile things come only from real work."

There are several levels to the Pyramid of Success. It culminates in the principle of Competitive Greatness. This is explained as:

"Perform at your best when your best is required. Your best is required each day."

John Wooden reinforced the Pyramid of Success by using certain maxims to remind people of their responsibilities. These included the following.

There is a no substitute for hard work and careful planning. Help others. Make friendship a fine art. Make each day your masterpiece.

Never try to be better than someone else. Learn from others, and try to be the best you can be. Success is the by-product of that preparation.

Success is peace of mind which is a direct result of self-satisfaction in knowing you did your best to become the best you are capable of becoming.

Many people were influenced by his work. Here are two quotes about Coach Wooden. The first is from Bill Walton, a former player.

"(He) has a heart, brain and soul that have enabled him to inspire others to reach levels of success and peace of mind that they might never have dreamed possible on their own."

The second is from Alan Castel, UCLA assistant professor of psychology, who interviewed Wooden about aging and memory during the summer 2008

"Wooden was a role model, not just as a coach and a wise man, but also for his modesty and character, and on how to age successfully."

"He was a legend in ways that go far beyond basketball. His personality, positivity, wisdom and attitude toward aging played important roles in his cognitive vitality."

Maria Montessori was a pioneering educator who followed certain principles to help children to develop. She began her career by qualifying as a doctor but then wanted to work as a teacher.

Finding it difficult to get a role in the educational system, she was offered the opportunity to educate children in a mental hospital. Able to work as she wished, Maria created what became known as the Montessori Method.

This produced remarkable results and inspired many other educators to help children to develop. Many people have enjoyed learning in Montessori schools. Some of the famous names include the following.

Anne Frank, the diarist; Gabriel Garcia Marquez, the novelist; Katherine Graham, the former owner-editor of The Washington Post; George Clooney, the actor; Jeff Bezos, the founder of Amazon; Sergey Brin and Larry Page, the co-founders of Google; Jimmy Wales, the founder of Wikipedia.

Many others have supported or taught at such schools. These include: Helen Keller, Alexander Graham Bell, Thomas Edison, Buckminster Fuller, Jean Piaget, the Dalai Lama, Erik Erikson and Nigel Kennedy. Here are some of the themes she followed in her approach to education.

Maria believed in following certain principles to help children to learn. She developed her own philosophy which is allied to the concepts of deep learning and deep work. She expressed this later in the following quotations.

We must not dwell on a child's limitations but focus on their possibilities.

The teacher's task is to prepare and arrange a series of motives for cultural activity in a special environment made for the child.

The essential thing is for the task to arouse such an interest that it engages the child's whole personality.

Childhood passes from conquest to conquest in a rhythm that constitutes its joy and happiness.

"Our aim is not only to make the child understand, and still less to force him to memorize, but so to touch his imagination as to enthuse him to his innermost core.

"The essential thing is for the task to arouse such an interest that it engages the child's whole personality.

"It is necessary for the teacher to guide the child without letting him feel her presence too much, so that she may always be ready to supply the desired help, but may never be the obstacle between the child and his experience."

"The first essential for the child's development is concentration. The child who concentrates is immensely happy. The first dawning of real discipline comes through work. Every action of the teacher can become a call and an invitation to the children.

"The more the capacity to concentrate is developed, the more often the profound tranquillity in work is achieved, then the clearer will be the manifestation of discipline within the child. Childhood passes from conquest to conquest in a rhythm that constitutes its joy and happiness."

Pacesetters Can Learn To Channel Their Personalities

Pacesetters sometimes have personalities that are seen as different. They may be considered to be introverted, highly sensitive, dyslexic or slow learners at school.

Such people can learn to channel their personalities rather than change their personalities. They can learn strategies to survive but these may be different from those needed to succeed when following a conventional route.

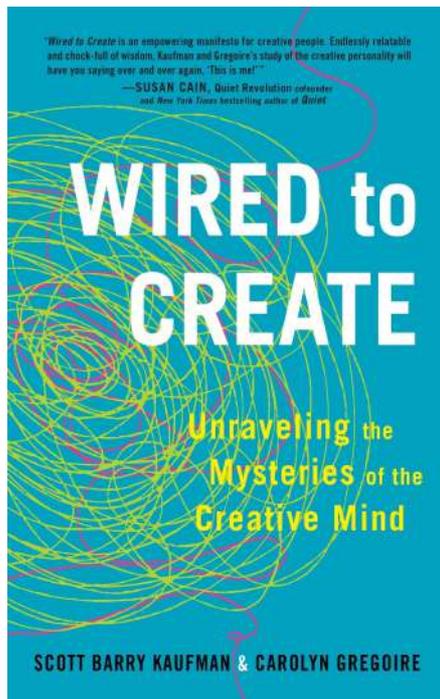

Some people who have such qualities are encouraged but others have a more difficult time at school. They may be labelled as dyslexic, having Attention Deficit Disorder or other challenges.

Some find their niche when moving into work. One successful trader I know had synaesthesia, the joining up of senses that are normally separate. They talked about their ability to actually 'smell a deal'. They followed their nose and delivered the good.

Some people are inventive and create their own field rather than try to succeed in an established field. They may invent a new sport, industry or activity. They then aim to thrive and perform at their best in this new field.

There are many books on the subject of how creative people can learn to develop. The following section describes some ideas outlined in Wired To Create by Carolyn Gregoire and Scott Barry Kaufman.

Here is an excerpt from the official description of the book. This is followed by some characteristics displayed by creative people. These are based on an article that Carolyn Gregoire wrote for the Huffington Post.

This book shines a light on the practices and habits of mind that promote creative thinking.

Kaufman and Gregoire untangle a series of paradoxes – like mindfulness and daydreaming, seriousness and play, openness and sensitivity, and solitude and collaboration.

They show that it is by embracing our own contradictions that we are able to tap into our deepest creativity.

Some Of The Things Highly Creative People Do Differently

- They daydream.

They let their minds wander and sometimes go through a process of creative incubation.

- They observe things.

They see possibilities and are constantly taking in information that becomes fodder for creative expression.

- They work the hours that work for them.

They will often figure out what time it is that their minds start firing up and structure their days accordingly.

- They take time for solitude.

We need to give ourselves the time alone to simply allow our minds to wander. It's important to take time to find and express your inner voice and vision.

- They turn life's obstacles around.

They sometimes use setbacks as a spur to doing work that improves things in their own and other people's lives.

- They 'fail up.'

Doing creative work is often described as a process of failing repeatedly until you find something that sticks, and creatives - at least the successful ones - learn not to take failure so personally.

- They ask the big questions.

Creative people are insatiably curious. They generally opt to live the examined life, and even as they get older, maintain a sense of curiosity about life. They look at the world around them and want to know why, and how, it is the way it is.

- They take risks.

Steven Kotler wrote the following in Forbes.

"Creativity is the act of making something from nothing. It requires making public those bets first placed by imagination.

"This is not a job for the timid. Time wasted, reputation tarnished, money not well spent - these are all by-products of creativity gone awry."

- They view all of life as an opportunity for self-expression.

They are more likely to see life and the world as a work of art. They constantly seek opportunities for self-expression in everyday life.

- They follow their true passions.

Writing in The Handbook Of Creativity, M.A. Collins and T.M. Amabile explain: "Eminent creators choose and become passionately involved in challenging, risky problems that provide a powerful sense of power from the ability to use their talents."

- They lose track of the time.

They may find that when they're writing, dancing, painting or expressing themselves in another way, they go into the zone or a flow stage that helps them to create at their highest level.

- They surround themselves with beauty.

Creatives tend to have excellent taste, and as a result, they enjoy being surrounded by beauty. Some surround themselves with things are stimulating.

- They connect the dots.

If there's one thing that distinguishes highly creative people from others, it's the ability to see possibilities where others don't -- or, in other words, vision.

Many great artists and writers have said that creativity is simply the ability to connect the dots that others might never think to connect.

Pacesetters Follow Their Own Creative Principles

Pacesetters enjoy being creative. Some like to start with a blank piece of paper and lots of resources. This sounds alluring but can lead to paralysis. A person may take a long time to decide what they actually want to create on the blank piece of paper.

Some people prefer to start with the equivalent of borders around the piece of paper. They are then forced to use their imagination to achieve their goals. The borders they are given may include:

The results they aim to deliver ... The resources available for delivering the results ... The time limits within which they must deliver the results.

Karen Hough described this approach in an article she wrote called Creative Constraint: Why Tighter Boundaries Propel Greater Results. Below is an extract from the article.

It sounds counter-intuitive, but boundaries can actually boost creativity. Think about procrastination — deadlines are often the single factor that ensures projects get done. As Dave Gray commented on his blog:

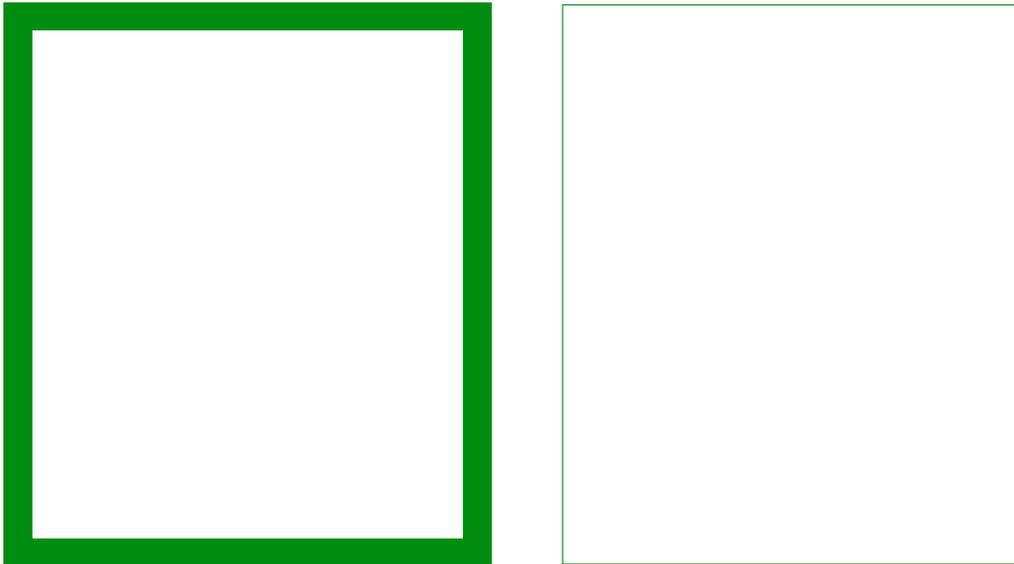

"Creativity is driven by constraints. When we have limited resources — even when the limits are artificial — creative thinking is enhanced.

"That's because the fewer resources you have, the more you are forced to rely on your ingenuity."

When there are no boundaries, the possibilities may seem too large. That's why some of the greatest art and innovation has come from a situation of constraint.

Being Creative Within Borders

People can sometimes be more creative when forced to work within borders rather than when being given a blank piece of paper.

Different pacesetters choose different ways to pursue their chosen route. Some prefer to work alone or run their own businesses. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I spent years working inside organisations trying to persuade people to change. But I was battling against the nature of systems theory.

"Systems move towards homeostasis – the drive to return to their present state. Sometimes this can be good because it creates stability. But sometimes it can be dangerous because it can be a question of develop or die.

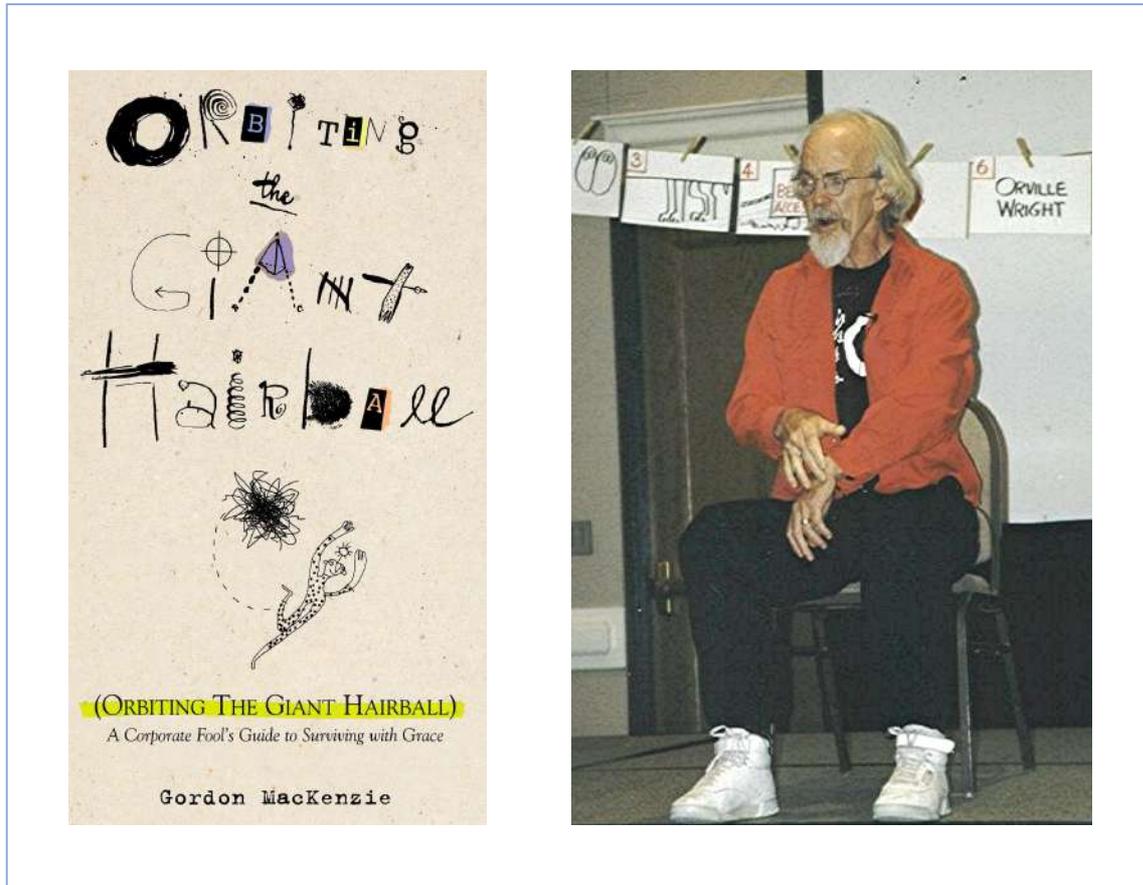

"Systems sometimes drive out the creativity they need to survive. So I found other ways to develop new ideas."

Gordon Mackenzie was somebody who did creative work within an organisation. He described how to do this in his book Orbiting The Giant Hairball: A corporate fool's guide to surviving with grace.

He spent 30 years working for the Hallmark Card Company and managed to orbit around what he called the hairball of organisational bureaucracy.

Gordon encouraged people to continue to dare, explore and be pioneers. One chapter in his book consists of just one sentence:

"Orville Wright did not have a pilot's licence."

Gordon believed that every person is an artist but the process of suppressing this spirit starts early. During his working career he often spent whole days in elementary schools and asked each group of children the same question. Starting the day in the kindergarten class, he asked:

"Who here is an artist?"

Everybody in the room put their hands up. Many wanted to show their paintings or other creative work they had done. The first grade class responded in a similar way, though with a little more caution.

Gordon continued to ask the question as he worked through the grades. By the end of the day few young people raised their hands. Something had happened to the spark within.

How can a person continue to be an artist? Some people choose to express their talents by being freelancers. Others go into organisations and try to change them from the centre.

Both routes are options, said Gordon, but there is another route. This is to contribute by orbiting around the centre rather than let it cramp your creativity. He explained this in the following way.

"Orbiting is vibrancy. Orbiting is manifesting your originality. It's pushing the boundaries of ingrained corporate patterns."

"It's striking a relationship with the corporation so that you can benefit from what it offers - its physical, intellectual, and philosophical resources - without being sucked in by its gravitational pull."

"It's a symbiotic relationship: without the hairball, the orbiter would spiral into space; without the orbiter's creativity and originality, the hairball would be a mass of nothing."

Certainly it is vital to fulfil your obligations to the organisation that pays your wages. At the same time, however, it is important to express your creativity. Here are some quotes from Gordon.

"Everyone has a masterpiece within them from birth. When we are young, society draws pale blue lines, as if your life were a paint-by-numbers kit."

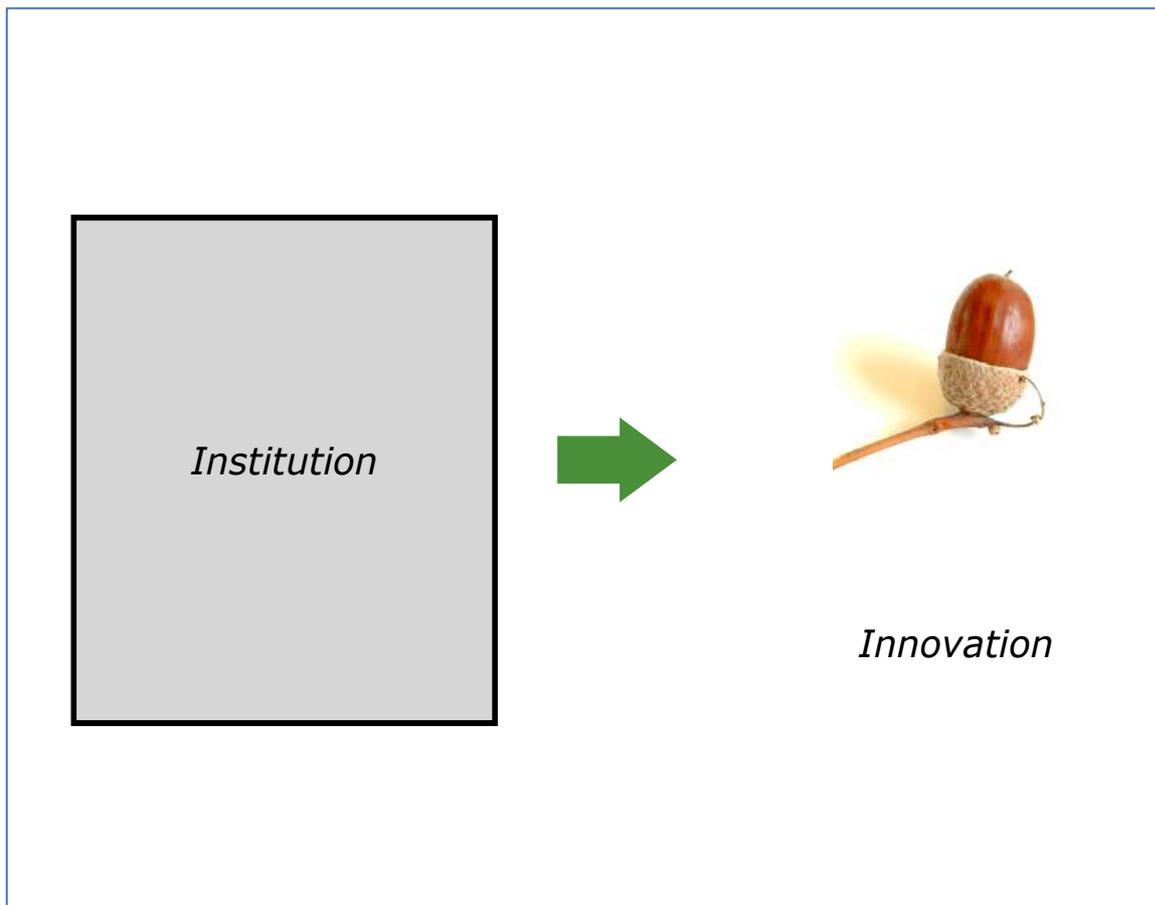

"The message is: If you stay in the lines your life will be a masterpiece. That's a lie. You have to constantly battle to be nobody but yourself."

"What is the biggest obstacle to creativity? Attachment to outcome. As soon as you become attached to a specific outcome, you feel compelled to control and manipulate what you're doing and in the process you shut yourself off to other possibilities."

"Creativity is not just about succeeding. It's about experimenting and discovering. If you go to your grave without painting your masterpiece, it will not get painted. No one else can paint it. Only you."

Some people find ways to do creative work in organisations but others choose another route. Let's explore this path.

The Innovation Often Takes Place Away From The Institution Approach

Sometimes it is possible to encourage people to use their imagination within an institution. Many innovators, however, choose to spend time away from institutions.

The institution may be a building, organisation or other body that has an ambivalent attitude towards creative thinking. It can therefore be useful to go beyond such a situation and find other stimulation.

Some innovators may still belong to an organisation but they create some kind of distance. This may be a physical distance - such as working at home or in their own laboratory. Sometimes they aim to create a psychological distance - such as doing things differently.

Let's look at one example. Tom was a broadcaster who made compelling films that highlighted problems but also presented positive solutions. His work gained national prominence through regular appearance on television.

Two years after his breakthrough Tom was approached by a national organisation. They gave him the following message.

"We like your innovative ideas and want to hire you to head our organisation. The challenge we face is that we need to revitalise our approach. Unless we do that, we may not be around in five years."

He admired the institution and chose to take the role. Full of energy at the outset, Tom then ran up against barriers. At this point he and I explored how he could thrive and do good work.

Tom's strengths lay in certain areas. He believed passionately in improving activities that overlapped with the organisation's aims. A superb communicator, he also had a track record of making powerful films that brought about change.

The organisation did not seem to understand his strengths. Arriving for the first day at the office, he was given the following message.

"We have mapped out your diary for the first two months. This includes running the Monday morning meetings and taking charge of operations."

"We also want you to dine with our traditional backers in the Shires. They are sceptical of change, but you can win them round."

Tom launched into fulfilling the schedule but soon became disillusioned, which is when he contacted me. During our first meeting we focused on how to do good work. He soon realised that it was important:

To focus on one area of the organisation's charter that he believed in and translate this into doing a specific project;

To use his strengths as a broadcaster and communicator to mobilise national attention around this topic;

To show practical ways forward in this area and do his best to deliver positive results.

Tom took this route. He made regular appearances on national television, mobilised public opinion and the project was successful.

His employers were uneasy, however, and issued an ultimatum. They wanted him: a) to energise the organisation; b) to do this in a way that left many of the same things in place.

Tom decided to return to his first love – making compelling films and communicating with the public. He continues to do this and recognised as a respected figure in his field.

The organisation he left remains in a difficult place. Many of its traditional backers are no longer around, so funding is a challenge. It says it wants to follow its principles – which are sound – but has difficulty in applying

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may be more innovative away from an institution? The institution may be a workplace or a set way of doing things.

Both of these can be useful at times because they can provide a framework for doing fine work. It may be that on some occasions, however, you may want to get away from such a familiar setting.

You may want to get stimulation by going for a walk, listening to music, appreciating beauty, being in a different place or having other experiences. There may also be other ways to spark your imagination.

Imagine that you want to do a piece of work. You may want to do a creative project, build a successful prototype, shift a culture or do another activity. You may also want to do work that embodies the following qualities.

Pacesetters Often Surf The Sigmoid Curve

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is followed by many pacesetters. It is to keep developing and surfing the sigmoid curve. Let's explore this approach.

Charles Handy popularised the sigmoid curve approach in his book The Age of Paradox. Originally a mathematical term, it can also be used to track the development of a product, an organisation or even a civilisation.

People can also apply this approach to their careers. As one curve reaches its peak, they can aim to create and surf onto the next sigmoid curve.

They can then keep doing stimulating work and developing rather than lapse into what they see as decline.

Different people will be at different stages of the curve at different stages of their careers. Sometimes they get the right balance between stability and doing stimulating work that helps them to develop. Sometimes they stay too long at a certain stage. One person expressed this in the following way.

"My greatest challenge has been deciding how long to stay in a particular role. Looking back at the jobs I have had, sometimes I kept growing and did fine work.

"At other times, however, I have stayed too long. Sometimes I lapsed into cruise control, when really I should have developed my successor and moved on."

You will make your own decisions regarding how you can continue developing in your own way. If you wish, however, it can sometimes be useful to explore the following themes.

You Can Clarify Where You Are On The Sigmoid Curve

Imagine you are climbing the curve in a specific aspect of your professional life. Where are you now?

Perhaps you are halfway up the curve. Feeling hungry, you may believe there is lots of scope for development. On the other hand, you may have hit a ceiling or believe that your own growth - or the product or service you offer - is deteriorating.

Looking at the wider picture, the sigmoid curve approach also has implications for businesses. Many companies invest heavily in research and aiming to climb or create a new curve.

The reality is that they may money, however, from the products that have already reached their peak or are in decline. It is therefore important to maintain high standards when delivering the older services and products.

This approach may also call for employing different kinds of people in different parts of the business. Such an approach means that it is possible:

To continue developing new products ... To continue capitalising on the older products that are providing the money for the new developments.

Many people are attracted to creating the new products but the research and development stages seldom brings early returns. It is therefore important to provide encouragement for those who are making money from the older products.

Let's return to your present work. Imagine you are still climbing the curve. How can you keep developing? How can you keep building on your strengths? How can you stay close to your customers and help them succeed?

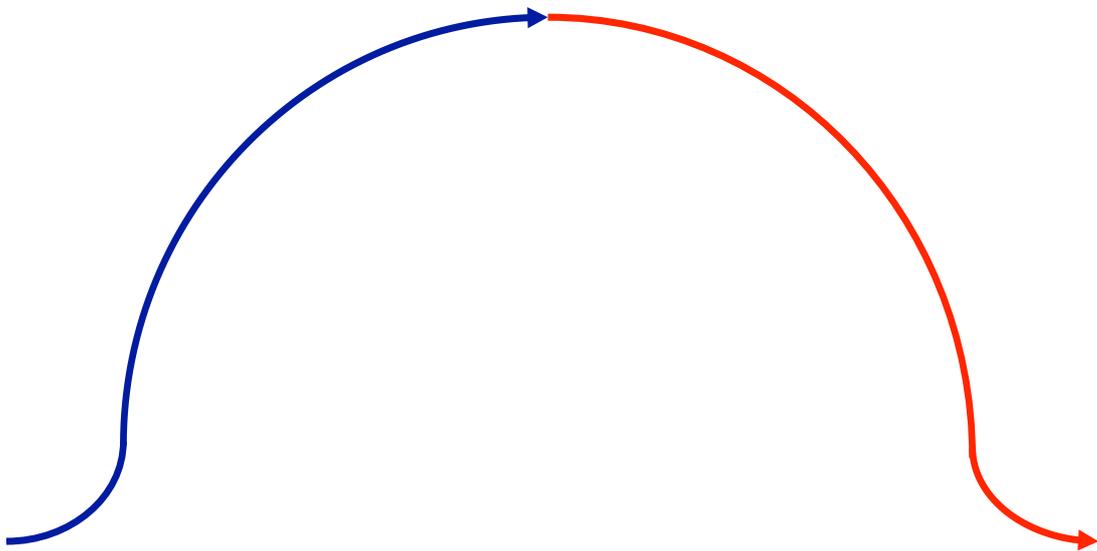

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe a specific aspect of your professional life that you want to focus on. Describe where you are on the sigmoid curve in this aspect of your professional life.

Where I Am On The Sigmoid Curve

The specific aspect of my professional life that I want to look at is:

The specific place where I am in this aspect of my professional life is:

You Can Surf Onto The Next Sigmoid Curve

Imagine that you want to surf onto the next curve. Bearing in mind your strengths, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

How can I stay ahead of the game? Looking at my professional life, what will be happening in my field in the next three years? What may be the innovations and challenges that people face? How can I spend time with pacesetting customers who will be focusing on these issues?

How can I build on my strengths to create services or products that will tackle these issues? How can I help these pacesetting customers to succeed? How can I build successful prototypes? How can I do these things and create or surf onto the next sigmoid curve?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the specific things you can do to find or create the next sigmoid curve.

The specific things I can do to find or create the next sigmoid curve are:

You Can Climb The Sigmoid Curve But Also Be Aware Of Warning Signs

Pioneering workers often enjoy building new things. When appropriate, they may therefore hand over the new service or product to other people who can maximise its value for the company.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you are enjoying climbing a new sigmoid curve. It may be important to be positively engaged but also recognise any warning signs that mean you lose concentration. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

How can I continue to do stimulating work? How can I do this in a way that works for my customers? How can I deliver a superb service or product? When appropriate, how can I hand over this knowledge to other people so they can apply it in the company?

How can I stay fully focused and do superb work on this sigmoid curve? How can I be aware of any potential warning signs – such as losing interest? How can I make sure I deliver the goods properly before focusing on the next sigmoid curve?

Let's assume that you are doing superb work on producing a new service or product. As mentioned, it can be important to deliver the goods properly before moving on to surfing the next sigmoid curve. How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Doing Superb Work On The Sigmoid Curve

The specific things I can do to deliver superb work on the current curve and then, when appropriate, focus on the next potential sigmoid curve are:

Pacesetters Aim To Deliver Positive Results

Different pacesetters choose different ways to deliver positive results. They may aim to build a successful prototype, pass on their knowledge or offer people a different paradigm.

Anita Roddick was somebody who acted as a role model for people who wanted to build ethical and successful businesses. Whilst it was important that The Body Shop was profitable, she also talked about different definitions of success.

She may have come across as an idealist, but Anita was remarkably savvy. She learned the 'can do' attitude from her Italian parents. They ran an American-style Diner café in Littlehampton, Sussex, during the 1950s.

Opening the café at 5.00 am to cater for the fishermen's breakfast, they kept serving throughout the day until the last customer was satisfied. Anita served in the café from an early age and felt what it was like to handle money.

Gilly Mckay and Alison Cork take up the story in their book The Body Shop. They say that Anita's apprenticeship proved invaluable when starting her first shop in Brighton in 1976. Here are some quotes from Anita that are in their book.

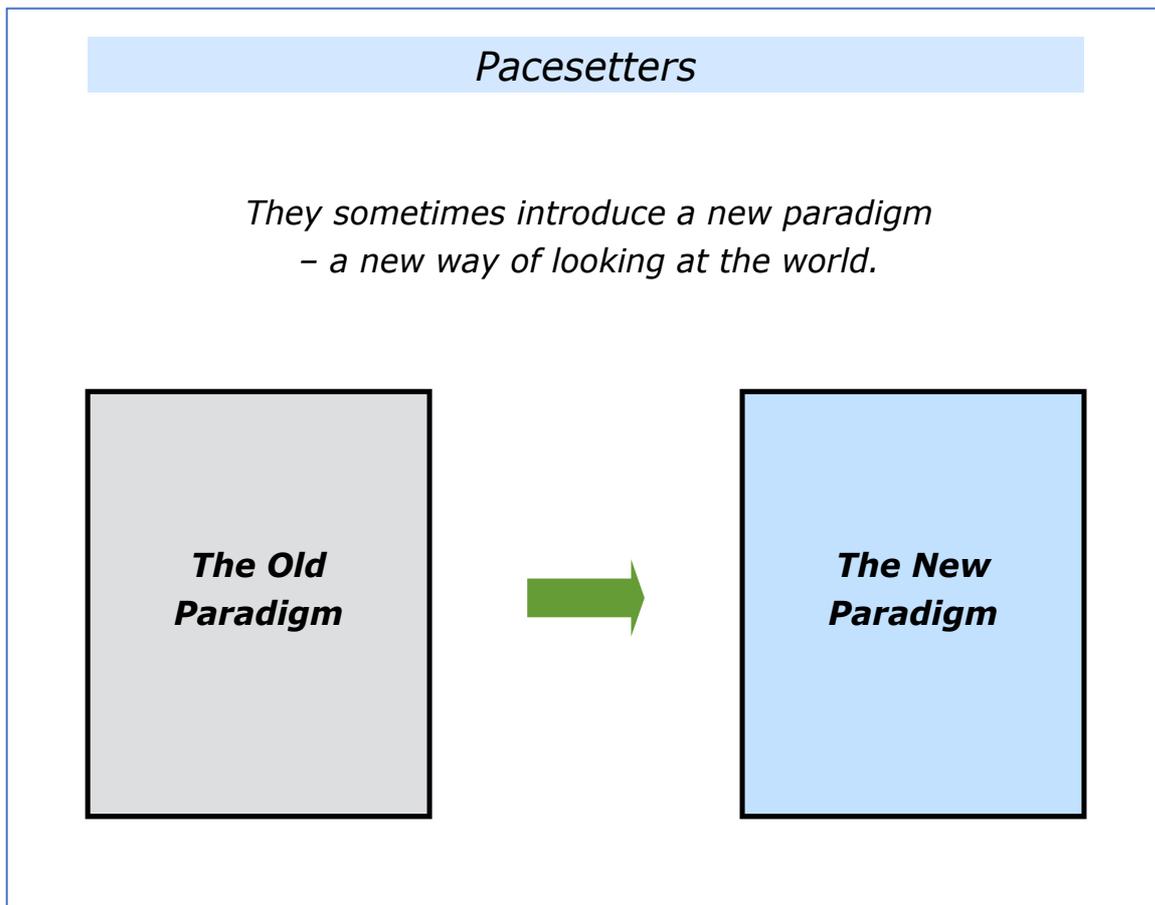

"When I opened the doors, I was not thinking about changing the world. I simply had to take £1000 in the first week to feed the baby and pay the bills."

Anita had learned, however, to provide good service that attracted and retained customers. Believing that retail is theatre, she tried to create a good atmosphere in the shop.

"With £4000 borrowed from the bank I could only afford to spend £700 on products. But the 20 products we formulated looked pretty pathetic all standing on one shelf. So to make the shop look busy and full I produced them in five sizes of bottles."

"I couldn't afford fancy packaging so I bought the cheapest bottles available and the labels were handwritten. We painted the ceiling of our tiny shop green to cover the damp patches and put garden fencing on the walls to stop rain splashing the products."

"The first day we opened was a Saturday and we took £100. The other retailers in the street were laying odds of 10-1 against our surviving six months, but we were on our way."

Pacesetters sometimes introduce a new paradigm – a way of looking at the world – that shifts things in a profound way. Such ideas can be transformational and change the rules of the game.

Dick Fosbury created a revolutionary method of high jumping. Sony invented the Walkman. The internet had a profound effect on the way people live, work and do business.

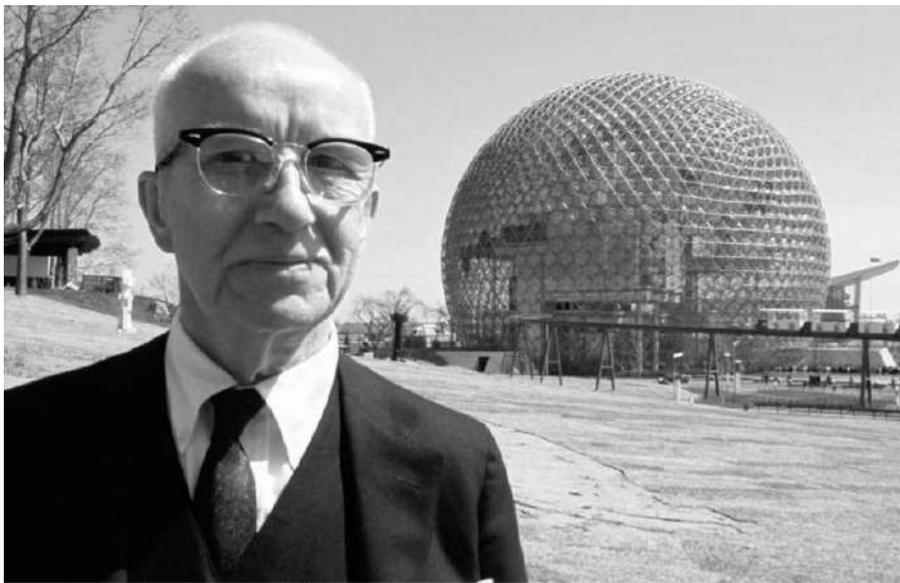

Thomas Kuhn popularised the term paradigm shift in his 1962 article on The Structure of Scientific Revolutions. He explained how breakthroughs in science sometimes come from seeing the world in a different way.

The example that is often quoted is the Earth once being considered the centre of the universe. Seeing that it actually revolves around the Sun enabled people to see reality in a different way.

Pioneers do not subscribe to the cliché of thinking outside the box. They do not actually see a box. They improve things a transformational way and introduce a fresh paradigm. This can sometimes revolutionise whole industries or societies.

This was an approach taken by Buckminster Fuller, the author of Operating Manual For Spaceship Earth. He believed it was vital to show people another way of living, working and sustaining Planet Earth. Bucky believed in the following approach.

*You never change things by fighting the existing reality.
To change something, build a new model that makes the existing model obsolete.*

Pacesetters sometimes seem to go into a different dimension to deliver the desired results. They may be playing a sport, performing a song, solving a problem, tackling a challenging or aiming to achieve a specific goal.

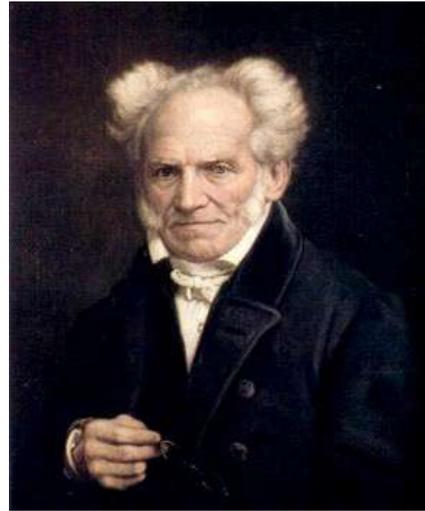

They do things that go beyond what others can imagine. They seem to focus on something that only they can see. They then translate this into reality and do something special to deliver the goods.

People who do such things may demonstrate a touch of genius. They then bring to life the often cited quote by Arthur Schopenhauer.

Genius

Talent hits a target no one else can hit;

*Genius hits a target
no one else can see.*

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow some elements of the pacesetting approach. How can you do this in your own way?

You may want to do this in the field of counselling, education, health care, business or another activity. You may want to do it when working an individual, a leader or when building a successful prototype.

What may be the piece of work you want to do? How can you deliver this successfully? What will be the benefits of doing such a piece of work – both for yourself and for other stakeholders?

The Class Act Approach

“They are a class act,” is a phrase used to describe somebody who consistently performs brilliantly and also adds that touch of class.

The singer produces a memorable encore. The victor behaves generously, whilst the loser makes a gracious speech. Nelson Mandela turned away from violence and personally thanked his warders when leaving Robbins Island.

Looking back, can you think of when you did superb work and added that touch of class? What were the principles you followed? How can you follow these principles – plus add other skills – to add that touch of class in the future?

How to become a class act? One approach is to start by choosing a specific activity where you stand a chance of becoming a class act. You may want to choose one where:

You are in your element – at ease and yet able to excel;

You move through the stages of doing work that is effective, excellent and extraordinary.

A singer may have this ability when performing certain kinds of songs but not others. A footballer may have this ability when playing in one position but not another. A counsellor may have this ability when working with certain kinds of clients but not others.

Imagine that you have chosen to focus on a specific activity. Here are some steps you may consider on the road to doing your best.

Character

Character is the foundation of success. Looking at the activity in which you aim to excel, do you have the character to deliver the goods? Do you have the right drive, discipline and determination?

A salesperson must have the drive to hit financial targets. An actor must have the resilience to overcome rejection. An athlete must have the discipline to train every day.

There are many models for exploring where you may have the characteristics for becoming a class act. One approach is to focus on a specific activity where you demonstrate calmness, clarity and the ability to deliver concrete results. Let's explore these themes.

Calmness

Great workers often feel calm in the situations where they excel. Establishing clarity, they then do their best to deliver the desired results.

The paramedic stays calm when arriving at the scene of the accident. Seeing the whole picture, they recognise what must be done to help people recover. Picking their way through the wreckage, they take the necessary steps towards saving lives.

Where do you experience something like this feeling? You may be facilitating a one-to-one session, leading a team, tackling a particular kind of problem or doing another activity.

Going into the situation, you feel calm. You feel also alive, alert and able to make a positive contribution. Looking at the situation, you ask:

"What is happening?"

You see both the big picture and the small details. You use your personal radar to see patterns. Extrapolating these patterns, you anticipate what could happen.

Clarity

Stepping back, you focus on what you can and can't control in the situation. You then move on to establish clarity by asking:

"What are the real results to achieve?"

Settling on the goals, you list these in order of priority. You consider the possible options for going forward together with the consequences of each option.

Casting your ideas wider, you look for potential creative solutions. You ask:

"What are the key strategies to follow that will give the greatest chance of success?"

Concrete Results

You then move on to the next stage. Committing to your chosen course of action, you perform superb work.

You are fully present. You are able to both helicopter above the situation and be hands-on. You then do your best to deliver the goods

Calmness, clarity and concrete results is a good starting point. But becoming a class act may call for other qualities. These may include having a positive attitude, encouraging others, being resilient or other characteristics.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind that activity in which you want to become a class act, describe the following things.

The rating I would give myself in terms of demonstrating these characteristics is:

___ / 10

Competence

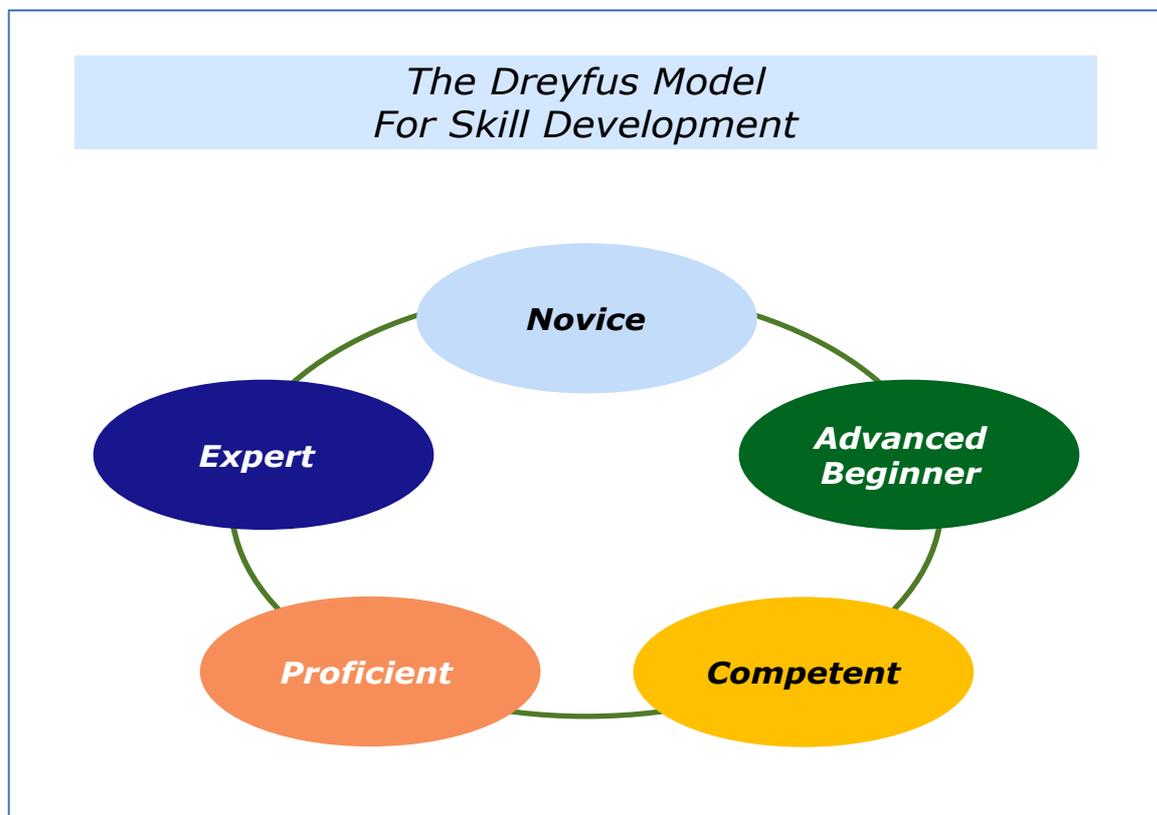

Character is a good starting point but a person must also have the required competence. This calls for having the right combination of strengths, strategic thinking and skills.

Chefs must have a natural feeling for food and have a good palate. Trouble-shooters must be able to quickly get to the heart of the matter and make good strategic decisions. Carpenters must have the right skills to produce works of craftsmanship.

Great workers continue to develop. Let's look at one approach to making this happen.

The Dreyfus Model

Hubert and Stuart Dreyfus studied superb practitioners in many fields. Here is the model they created that describes the stages a person goes through to progress from being a novice to an expert.

Here are the descriptions they use to describe each stage of the model.

Novice

They have little or no experience. They have little situational perception or discretionary judgement. They have a rigid adherence to rules.

Advanced Beginner

They start trying tasks on their own. They have difficulty troubleshooting. They want information fast. They can place some advice in the context required. They use guidelines but without holistic understanding.

Competent

They develop conceptual models. They are able to deal with crowdedness. They develop conscious planning and routines. They troubleshoot on their own and seek out expert advice. They see actions in terms of long-term plans and goals.

Proficient

They are guided by maxims but apply these to current situations. They see situations holistically and see what is important. They self-correct and learn from the experience of others. They make quicker and better decisions that achieve success.

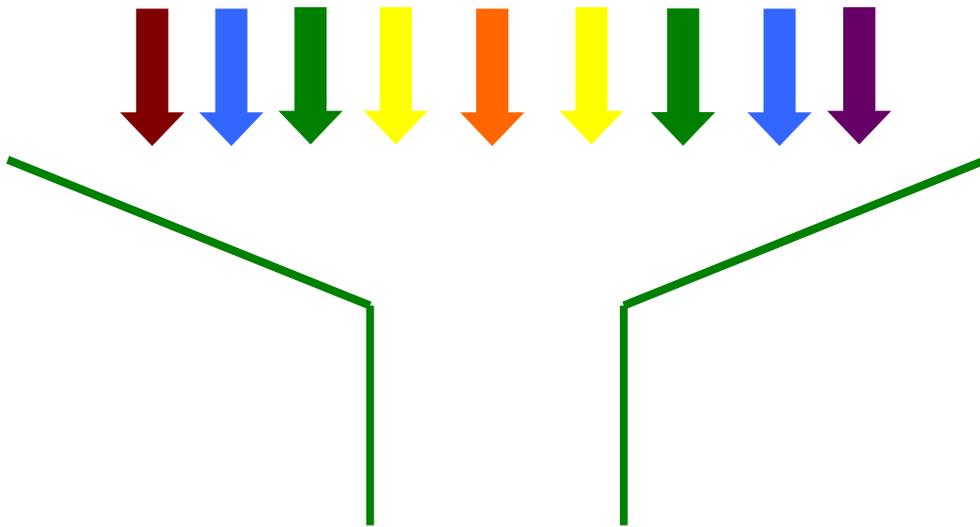

Expert

They transcend rules, guidelines and maxims. They work primarily on intuition based on deep understanding. They sometimes return to analytic approaches used in novel or problematic situations. They have a vision of what is possible and deliver it.

Imagine that you are helping a person to go through some of these steps. One of the key factors is to help them to manage crowdedness.

Crowdedness

People can sometimes experience crowdedness - many things happening at once in a specific activity. They can then feel out of control and overwhelmed when doing this activity.

Some people may feel comfortable managing complexity in certain activities but may get thrown off-course in other areas. The slightest complication or setback can lead to them feeling burdened.

This highlights the following factors.

Some people who are good at a specific activity may naturally be able to manage crowdedness in this particular activity;

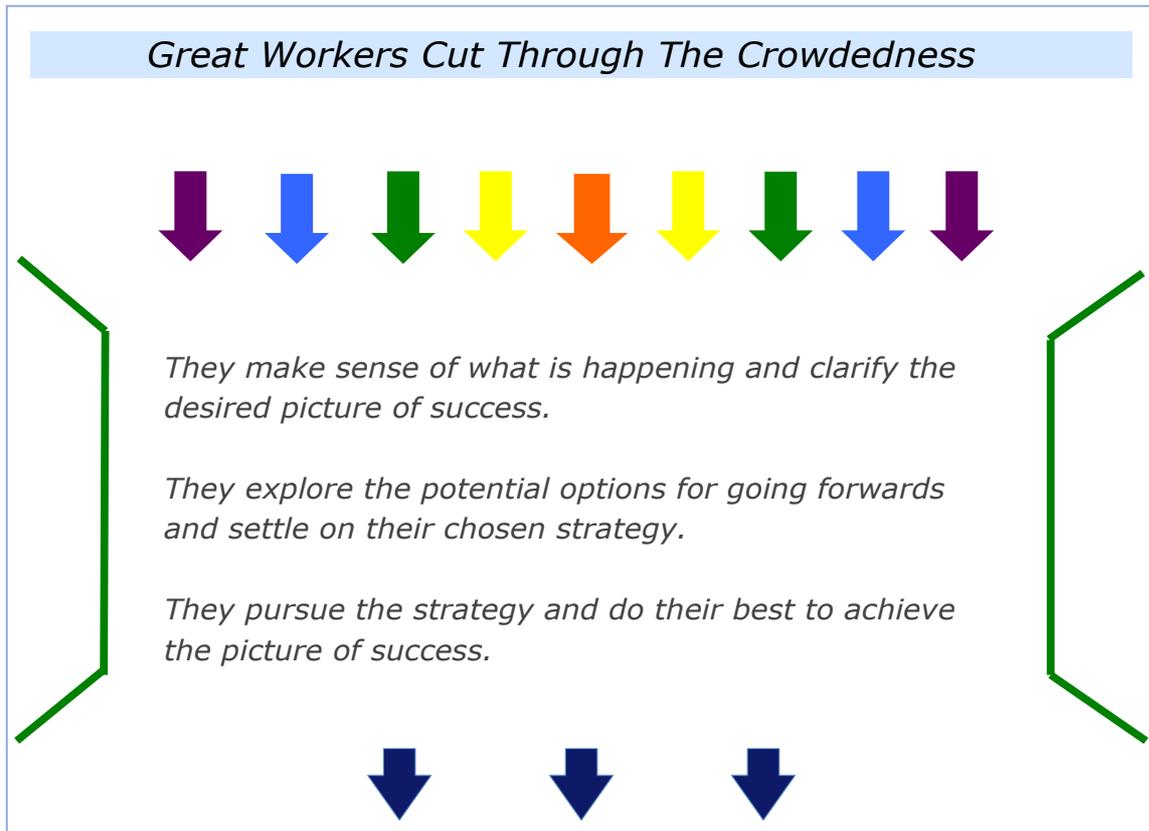

Some people may be able to add to their repertoire of skills for managing crowdedness in a particular activity;

Some people will be good at managing crowdedness in some activities but often have difficulties in other areas.

Great workers have the ability to cut through crowdedness in the activities where they excel. They can deal with masses of information - and many things happening at once - in situations that may confuse other people.

Different people demonstrate this skill in different situations. They may have it when solving technical problems, helping people who have emotional challenges, dealing with particular kinds of crises or whatever.

Such workers often have a strong feeling for the activity. They have a framework for making sense of the information, clarifying what is important and then pursuing their chosen strategy.

People can learn tools for dealing with crowdedness in the areas where they feel uncomfortable. Sometimes they can do this by themselves. They can identify the triggers that lead to them feeling out of control, getting angry or feeling overwhelmed.

They can develop a ritual for buying time to think. They can clarify the options for going forward – including the pluses and minuses of each option. They can then pursue their chosen strategy for achieving the desired results.

Some people may need help to take this step. If appropriate, you can help them learn how to manage their emotions. You can help them to develop their own rituals for taking control in the situation and working to achieve success.

Let's return your chosen activity. What are the kinds of competence you need to demonstrate? How can you keep developing and adding to your skills?

Consistently High Standards

Great workers have a strong work ethic. This is because they love their work. They therefore aim to deliver consistently high standards whether they are performing at the Village Hall or the Carnegie Hall.

They believe in honouring their work. Professional to their fingertips, they aim to do the right things in the right way every day. Different people develop consistency in different ways. Let's explore one model.

People Who Aim To Deliver High Standards

*They have a strong work ethic because they love their work.
They often take the following steps when starting their career.*

-  They aim to build on their gifts and get a good grounding.
-  They aim to learn from good models and get good experiences.
-  They aim to keep developing, maintain high standards and do good work.

They Aim To Get A Good Grounding

People who want to build on their gifts often aim to get a good grounding. They do this whether they aim to go be good at nursing, education, football management, performing on stage or doing another activity.

Great actors, for example, often describe the importance of them playing repertory theatre. They developed their skills by performing comedies, tragedies, musicals and other plays.

They Aim To Learn From Good Models And Get Good Experiences

Great workers often talk about learning from superb performers. These may have been senior professionals, coaches, mentors or other people who acted as good models.

People often aim to emulate people they admire. They may take this approach when developing as songwriters, teachers, footballers or doing other kinds of work.

Great workers often focus on the field of work where they can use their gifts. They may then try many different activities in this field before specialising in a particular niche.

People who aim to go into the caring professions, for example, may gather experience by working in care homes, hospitals and hospices. This can help them to settle on their chosen path.

Such workers have often had a background of good experiences, even if some of these may have actually been bad experiences. They translated the difficulties into a good experience by learning from the challenges they faced.

They Aim To Keep Developing, Maintain High Standards And Do Good Work

Great workers learn skills for self-development. Some ask themselves the following questions after an experience.

What were the lessons I learned from the experience? What was good about it? What was challenging?

*What were the things I did well? What could I have done better and how?
How can I apply these lessons in the future?*

Such workers develop the habit of continuous improvement. This is a skill they continue to use throughout the years.

Great workers often have a pattern of starting to produce good work in their early careers. They may do this when working as a writer, chef, teacher, carpenter or in another role. They then begin to develop consistency.

Young footballers, for example, sometimes produce good performance but then fall away. Some commit themselves to their careers and continue to develop. This can result in them beginning to deliver consistently good performances.

Let's return to your chosen activity. What are the consistently high standards you need to deliver? How can you keep delivering these day after day?

Creativity

Success calls for employing the right creativity at the right time to get the right results. Creativity comes in many different forms.

Class acts have great personal radar in their potential field. They quickly see patterns and see the potential picture of success. They seem to know what will happen before it happens.

They have a wide professional repertoire. They have the strengths, strategies and skills required to deliver the goods. They then employ their radar and repertoire to pursue their chosen strategy towards delivering the right results.

There are many approaches to being creative. One approach is to keep your eyes on the goal rather than the obstacles. It is then to find creative ways to reach the goal.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Some people explore the following themes.

They Clarify The Goals By Asking:

What are the goals? What are the real results we want to achieve? What will be the benefits? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the goals?

They Clarify How They Can Reach The Goals By Asking:

What are the things we can control? What are our strengths? What are our assets? How can we use these to reach the goals? How can we find creative ways to go around any obstacles to reach the goals?

Creative people recognise that sometimes there are barriers that it can be good to remove. But it is important not to become addicted to focusing on barriers.

One organisation, for example, told its people to spend lots of time focusing on removing blockers and barriers. It worked for a while but then people paralysed themselves by talking endlessly about barriers.

This led to people becoming institutionalized. They fell into the habit of waiting for the organisation to make life perfect before they could be creative. We eventually helped people to revive their creative muscle and develop new ways to reach their goals.

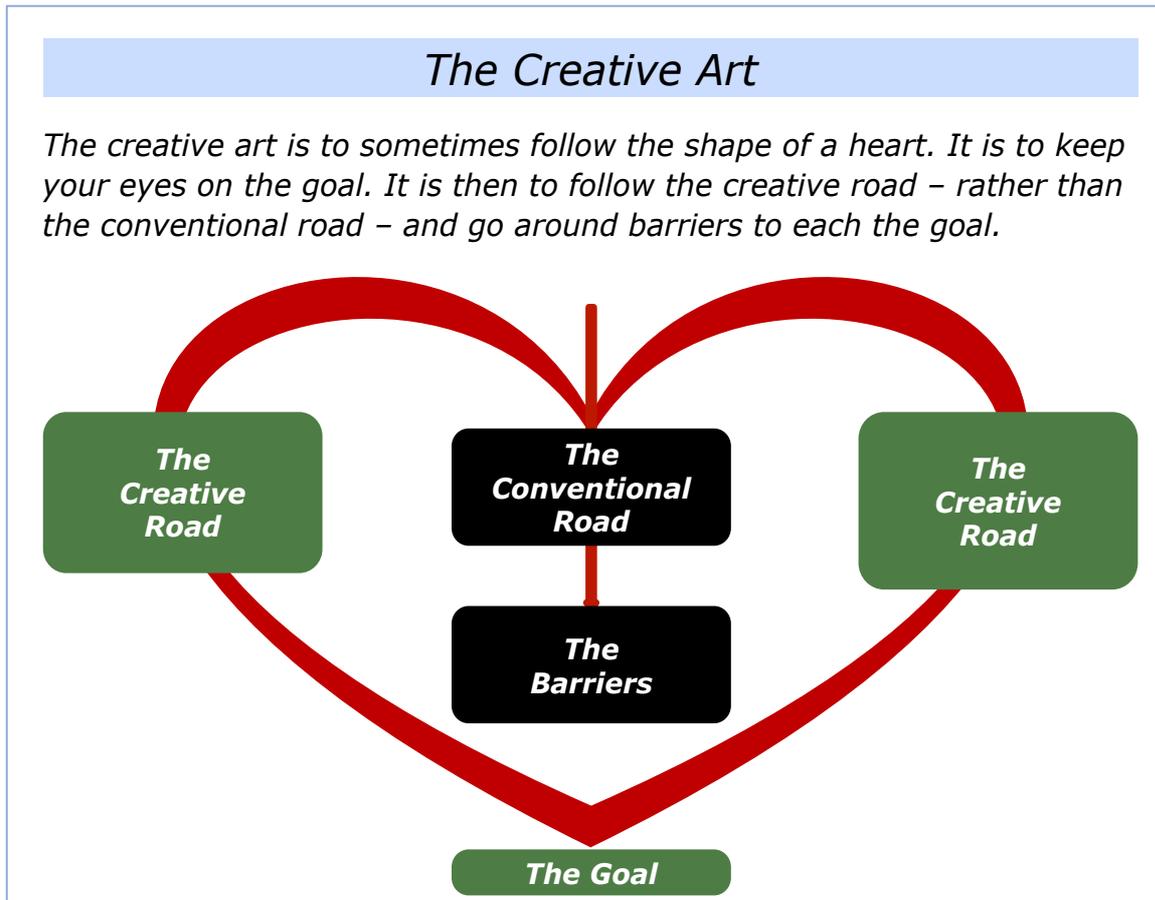

Many creative people follow the creative art. They go around barriers to reach the goal. A teacher described this model during a lecture I attended in the early 1970s. He gave the following description.

"There are creative thinkers and conventional thinkers.

"Creative thinkers spend a lot of time clarifying the What. They then find imaginative ways to reach the goals.

"Conventional thinkers quickly jump to the How. They spend lots of time analysing barriers. They can sometimes become dispirited and feel that the problems are impossible to solve.

"Creative thinkers often follow the shape of a heart. They keep their eyes on the prize and think of creative ways forward. They go around barriers to reach the goal."

During the 1970s I got the chance to work with entrepreneurs and other creative people. Such people did not follow the cliché of thinking outside the box. They did not recognise there was a box.

The creative people I met used different approaches to making things happen. One approach they had in common, however, was to focus on the real results to achieve.

They did not keep banging their heads on the barriers. They went around barriers by following the shape of a heart. They kept following the creative art to achieve their goals.

Let's return to your chosen activity. What are the kinds of creativity that are required to do great work? Which do you have at the moment? How can you keep adding to your repertoire?

Class

Great workers keep doing the basics and then add the brilliance. Sometimes they reach the goal by adding that touch of class.

Great sprinters employ their talent and technique to get in sight of the tape. They then flow, focus and finish. This sometimes involves taking the following step.

Many people have the natural ability to get to 7/10 in a specific area. They may do this as an athlete, singer or in another professional role. But then comes the hard part - the exponential climb towards 10/10.

Great workers also aim to make the exponential climb from 7/10 to 10/10. This is the equivalent of going from county champion to national champion to continental champion to world champion.

Some people find they can do this occasionally, but then comes the hard part. It is to perform superbly on a regular basis.

Great workers play to their strengths and follow their successful style of working. They put themselves into positions where they can take their approach. Being realists, they also find ways to manage the consequences of their weaknesses.

They build on their strengths. They also keep developing their repertoire of strategic thinking skills and the practical skills. They aim to perform superb work and produce peak performances. They then repeat the cycle to keep doing great work.

Sometimes people reach their goals by adding that touch of class. Sometimes this can be spectacular. Sometimes it can be a simple act of kindness. Sometimes it can be something that gives people a positive memory for life.

Nelson Mandela demonstrated this quality on many occasions. Here is one instance I heard about from the staff of a London hotel where he stayed. He showed a personal touch that they all remembered.

When departing at 6.00 in the morning, Nelson saw 20 staff lining up to form an aisle towards the door. Though being asked to leave quickly by his security guards, he took the time to say goodbye to each of the twenty staff members.

Giving each person his famous two-handed handshake, he looked them in the eyes and said:

"Thank you for looking after me."

There are many models for doing great work. One approach is to focus on a specific activity where you have the ability to excel. You can keep developing the character and consistently high standards required to do superb work. You can then add that touch of class.

The Flow, Focus And Fulfilment Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people aim to flow, focus, finish and, as a by-product, sometimes find fulfilment.

Different people pursue this approach in different ways. They may follow it when encouraging people, doing creative work, playing a sport or doing another activity.

Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi did much of the pioneering work on flow. He described his findings in books such as Flow: The psychology of optimal experience and Creativity: Flow and the psychology of discovery and invention.

Before Mihaly's work some people talked about flow in terms of being in the zone or having peak experiences. Timothy Gallwey also touched on these themes with his books on The Inner Game of Tennis and also Inner Skiing.

Mihaly says that flow experiences are those where you become completely absorbed in an activity and time goes away.

You start by tackling a stimulating task that you have a chance of completing. Setting clear goals, you embark on the work. You feel a sense of control, concentrate and get immediate feedback.

Becoming absorbed in the task, you experience a deep and effortless involvement that removes the frustrations of everyday life. The experience is so enjoyable that time goes away.

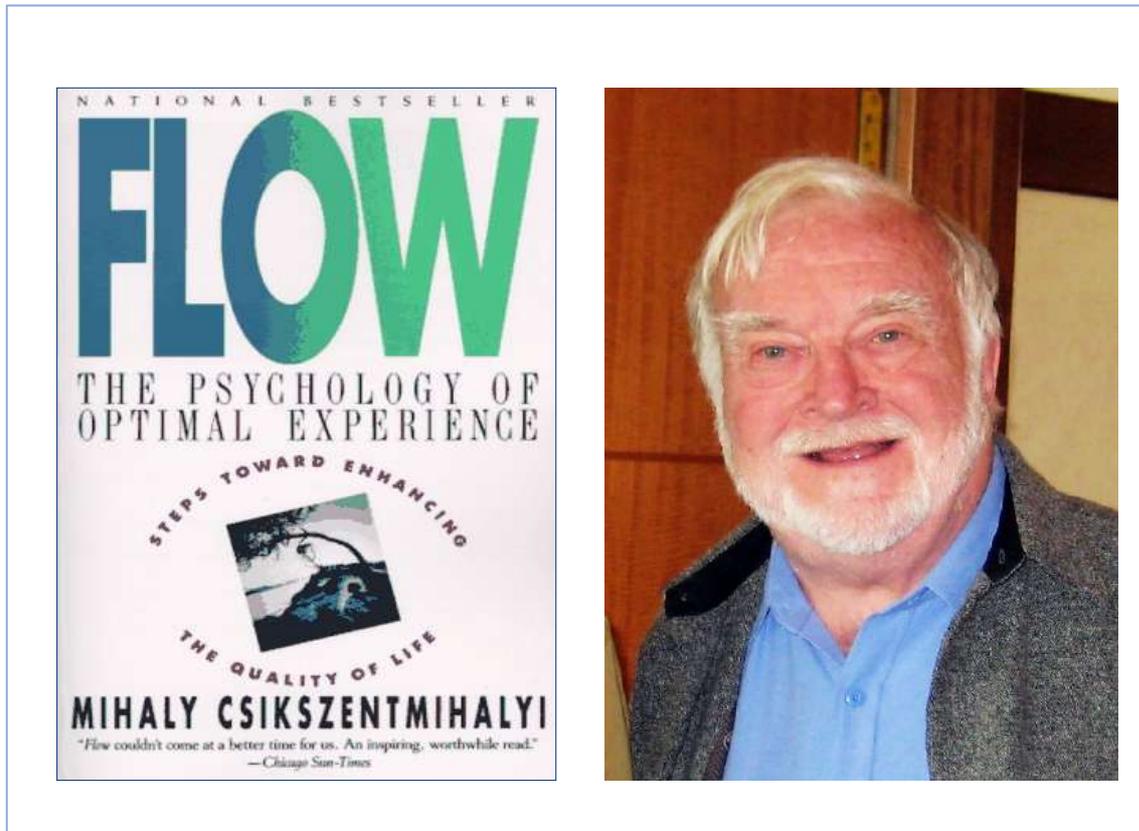

Your sense of self disappears when doing the task but afterwards you emerge stronger. Mihaly explains this in the following way in his writing.

We have all experienced times when, instead of being buffeted by anonymous forces, we do feel in control of our actions, masters of our own fate.

On the rare occasions that it happens, we feel a sense of exhilaration, a deep sense of enjoyment that is long cherished and that becomes a landmark in memory for what life should be like.

The best moments usually occur when a person's body or mind is stretched to its limits in a voluntary effort to accomplish something difficult and worthwhile.

Optimal experience is therefore something that we make happen.

The following pages explore one framework that people can follow to flow, focus, finish and find fulfilment. There are, of course, several parts to each of these stages. Let's explore these themes.

Flow

Looking at your own life, when do you experience a sense of flow? You may do this when encouraging a person, gardening, painting, cooking, dancing, playing music, riding a horse, solving a certain kind of problem or doing another activity.

Later we will look at how you can do more of these things in the future. Before then, however, let's explore what inspired Mihaly to study this concept.

He was born in Rijeka, Croatia. His family was Hungarian, and his father Alfred, a diplomat, had been posted to Italy. Living in cities such as Rome and Florence exposed Mihaly to different cultures and he became fluent in Hungarian, Italian and German.

Despite being a child, he was interned in Italy for a while and tried to make sense of events. Interviewed years later by Dava Sobel for Omni Magazine, he explained this in the following way.

"As a child in World War 2 Europe, I was dismayed to find that grown-ups had no idea what was going on and were helpless to extricate themselves from the mess they had created.

"I resolved to figure out how one could live a better life. I tried many things, such as art, fiction, philosophy and working in youth organisations.

"I discovered psychology through the writings of C.J. Jung, and thought that perhaps this was the best way to understand behaviour and history. I can't say I have, but in the process I learned a lot and had a good time."

Travelling to Switzerland when he was around 16, Mihaly heard Carl Jung lecture about the human soul and this had a profound effect on him. He told Sobel:

"Because as a child in the war I'd seen something drastically wrong with how adults - the grown-ups I trusted - organised their thinking.

"I was trying to find a better system to order my life. Jung seemed to be trying to cope with some of the more positive aspects of human experience."

Choosing to study psychology at university level, he found the most attractive courses were in America. He applied to the University of Chicago and, despite speaking little English, was accepted.

Mihaly arrived in Chicago in 1956 with little more than a dollar in his pocket. He did well at university and went on to study for a Masters. Explaining his chosen field of study, Mihaly told Elizabeth Debold of Enlightenment Magazine:

"I did my doctoral dissertation on young students at the Chicago Art Institute.

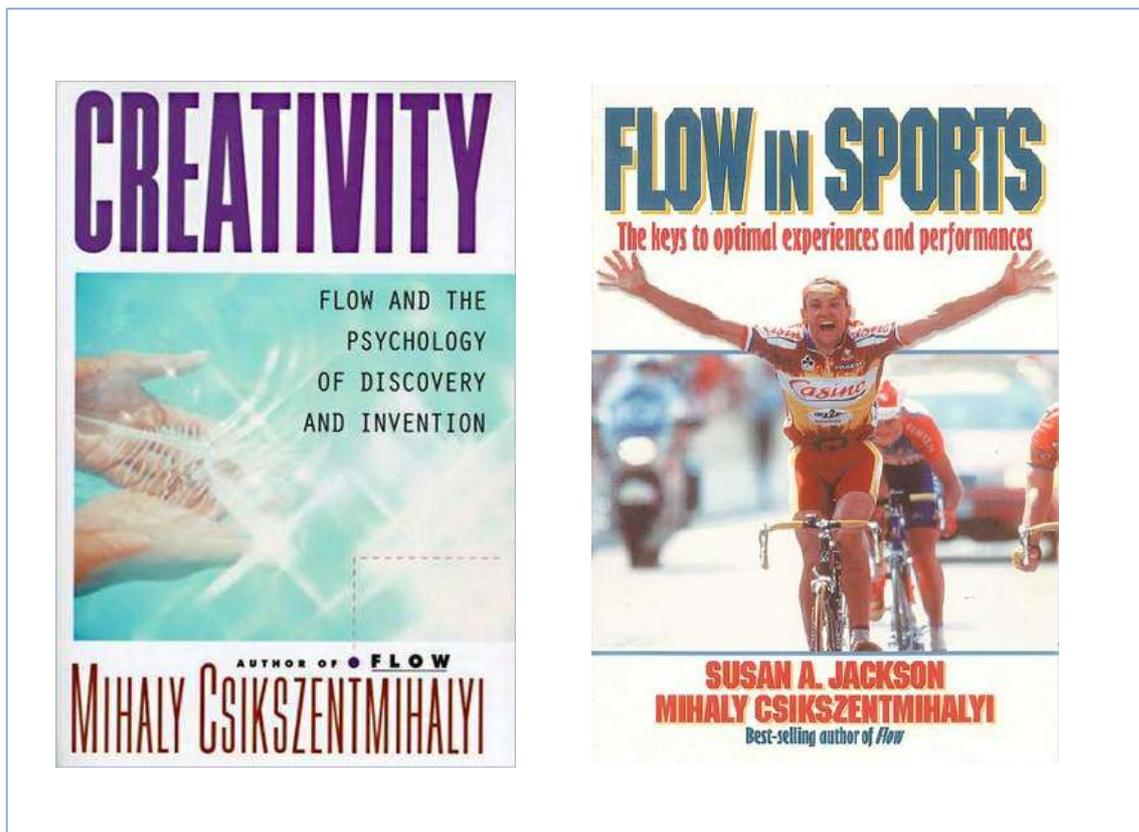

"One thing that I noticed - and I knew also from my own experience - is that when they started painting, they almost fell into a trance.

"They didn't seem to notice anything, and they just moved as if they were possessed by something inside themselves.

"When they finished a painting, they would look at it, and they'd feel good for about five or ten minutes.

"Then they'd put the painting away and not look at it much after that. What became important was the next canvas.

"So I tried to understand what psychologists have written about this kind of thing, this state of complete involvement."

Mihaly moved on to studying chess players, rock climbers, musicians and basketball players. He asked them to describe what happened 'when what they were doing was really going well'.

Despite coming from different fields, people reported similar experiences. Explaining this in an interview with Sarah Trevelyan, Mihaly said:

"Women who weave tapestries in the highlands of Borneo, meditating monks in Europe, also Catholic Dominican monks, and so forth. They all said these same things. So 'flow' seems to be a phenomenological state that is the same across cultures.

"Many of the interviewees described their feeling as 'being carried away by a force greater than myself,' or 'being in a current,' or 'being in flow.' I chose the last of these analogies as being the most simple."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking at the activities where you enjoy a sense of flow, can you think of one you would like to build on in the future?

You may want to do this when helping people, cooking, writing, painting, designing or doing another activity. What are the reasons why you would like to pursue this activity? What would be the benefits for you and for other people?

Focus

Great workers sometimes follow their flow and translate this into a specific goal. They may aim to write an article, climb a mountain, perform a piece of music, run a marathon or do another activity. They then take the following steps.

They focus on achieving a specific goal;

They focus on the key strategies they can follow to achieve the specific goal;

They focus fully on the task they are doing when working towards achieving the specific goal.

Individuals and teams take this approach. They prepare properly and then click into action. Looking at teams, Mihaly gave the following example in his writing.

Surgeons say that during a difficult operation they have the sensation that the entire operating team is a single organism, moved by the same purpose.

They describe it as a 'ballet' in which the individual is subordinated to the group performance, and all involved share in a feeling of harmony and power.

Great workers commit themselves fully to the task. They often do this after doing lots of research. Bearing in mind the activity they want to pursue, they take the following steps.

They clarify the real results they want to achieve and the key strategies they can follow to achieve the goals;

They clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goals;

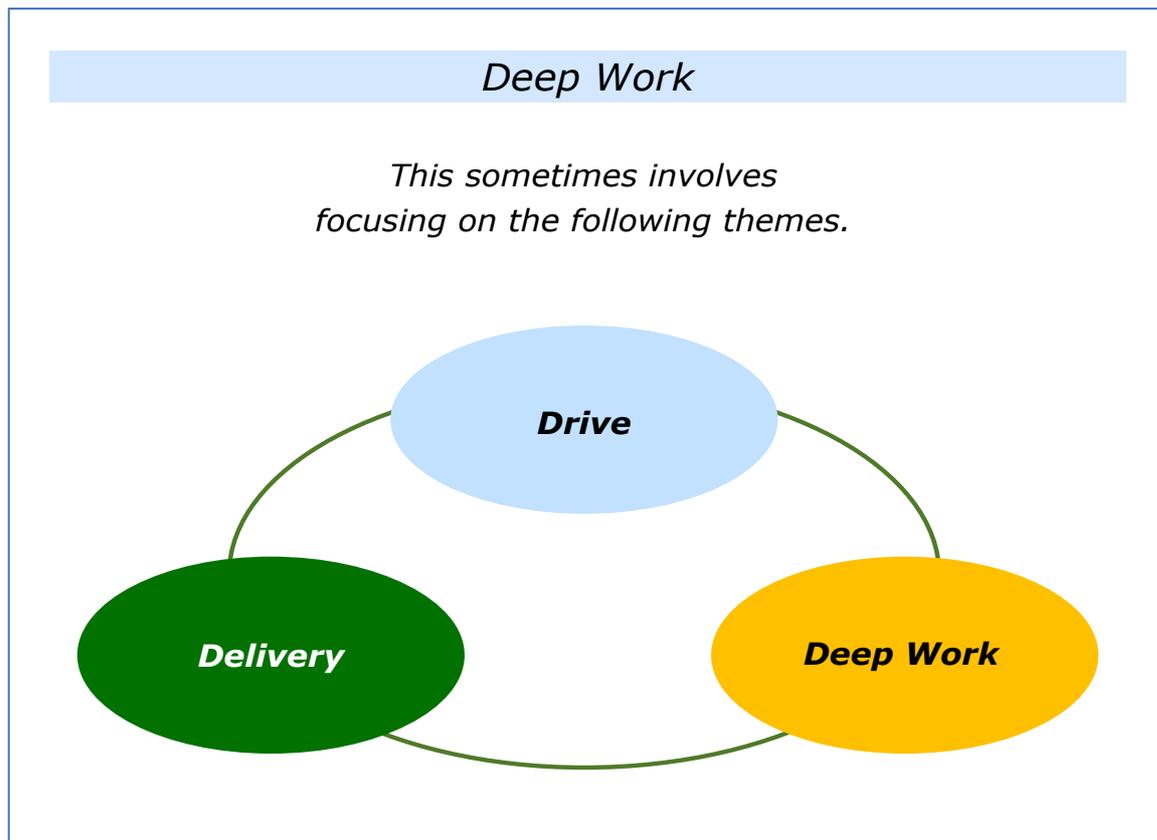

They clarify their motivation to achieve the goals and make sure it is at least 8+/10.

They then commit themselves fully to achieving the goals.

Great workers sometimes demonstrate elements of what might be called self-chosen autism. They cut-out everything else and focus fully on the piece of work.

Some cut themselves off physically by going to a specific place where they can focus on the work. Some cut themselves off psychologically by going into their own world. Some make full use of their talent by pursuing the following approach.

The Deep Work Approach

Many people love to absorb themselves in doing deep work. One approach they take is to focus on the following themes.

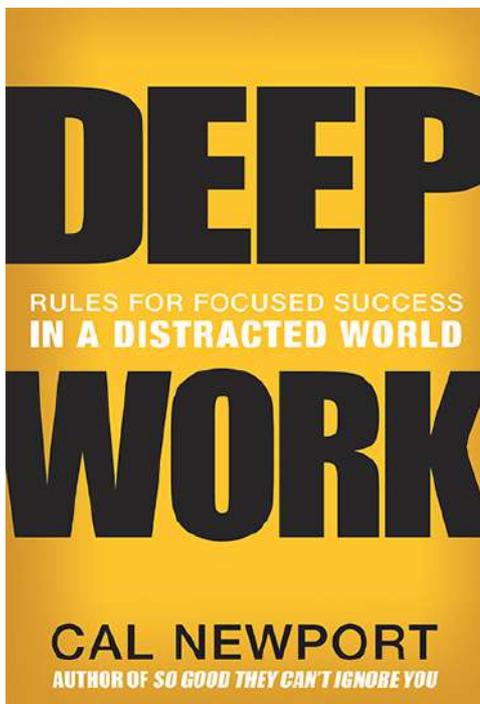

Drive - They feel driven to do a certain activity and decide to work towards achieving a specific goal.

Deep Work - They follow certain disciplines and absorb themselves completely in the activity to do deep work.

Delivery - They continue to do their best and find solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving their goal.

Different people do different things to take such steps. One approach they have in common, however, is to set aside time to go through a process of absorption, adventure and achievement.

Cal Newport's book Deep Work helped many people to take this approach. Here is an extract that shows the benefits of doing such work.

Deep work is the ability to focus without distraction on a cognitively demanding task.

It's a skill that allows you to quickly master complicated information and produce better results in less time.

Deep work will make you better at what you do and provide the sense of true fulfilment that comes from craftsmanship.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

Drive

Looking at your own life, what are the specific activities you feel driven to do? What are those that give you positive energy? Or, as the Gallup Organization says when helping a person to find their strengths:

What are the things you cannot help but do?

Different people give different answers to these questions. Here are things that some of the mentees I have worked with mentioned when exploring this topic.

I feel driven:

To encourage people ... To help people to find positive ways to manage pain ... To make films about fixing old Land Rovers ... To teach people how to write best-selling pop music ... To show people how they can use technology to simplify their lives.

Great workers often build what they feel driven to do. They then make some decisions by exploring the following questions.

How can I translate this drive into doing a piece of work? What are the real results I want to achieve? What are the key strategies I can follow to achieve the picture of success?

Imagine that you have focused on something you feel driven to do and set a specific goal. It may then be time to move on to the next stage.

Deep Work

People who do such work sometimes have a certain history. Some grew up in environments where they were given the opportunity to take the following steps.

Such individuals absorbed themselves in deep play. They got used to pursuing a passion, following certain principles and achieving positive results.

Some then focused on deep learning and explored the things they found fascinating. This sometimes involved gathering experience, making sense of experience and applying these lessons in their lives.

These experiences provided a good grounding. They got into the habit of following their own rhythm and then following certain disciplines when doing a piece of work.

Some individuals also follow certain rituals. They may slow down, go for a walk or rehearse what they are going to do next. They then click into action and absorb themselves in doing the work.

Such workers aim to be fully present. One approach is for them to prepare properly. It is then to have a positive attitude, follow their chosen principles and do their best to achieve the picture of success. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Some people say that I work hard but I see it differently. I feel driven to do something and love following certain disciplines. This often involves responding to what is happening, finding solutions and doing deep work. This is enjoyable and does not feel like hard work."

Imagine that you are following elements this approach and doing deep work. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Delivery

People who do deep work love to achieve their aims. As Maria Montessori said, however, this sometimes means satisfying both an inner goal and an outer goal. One writer expressed this in the following way.

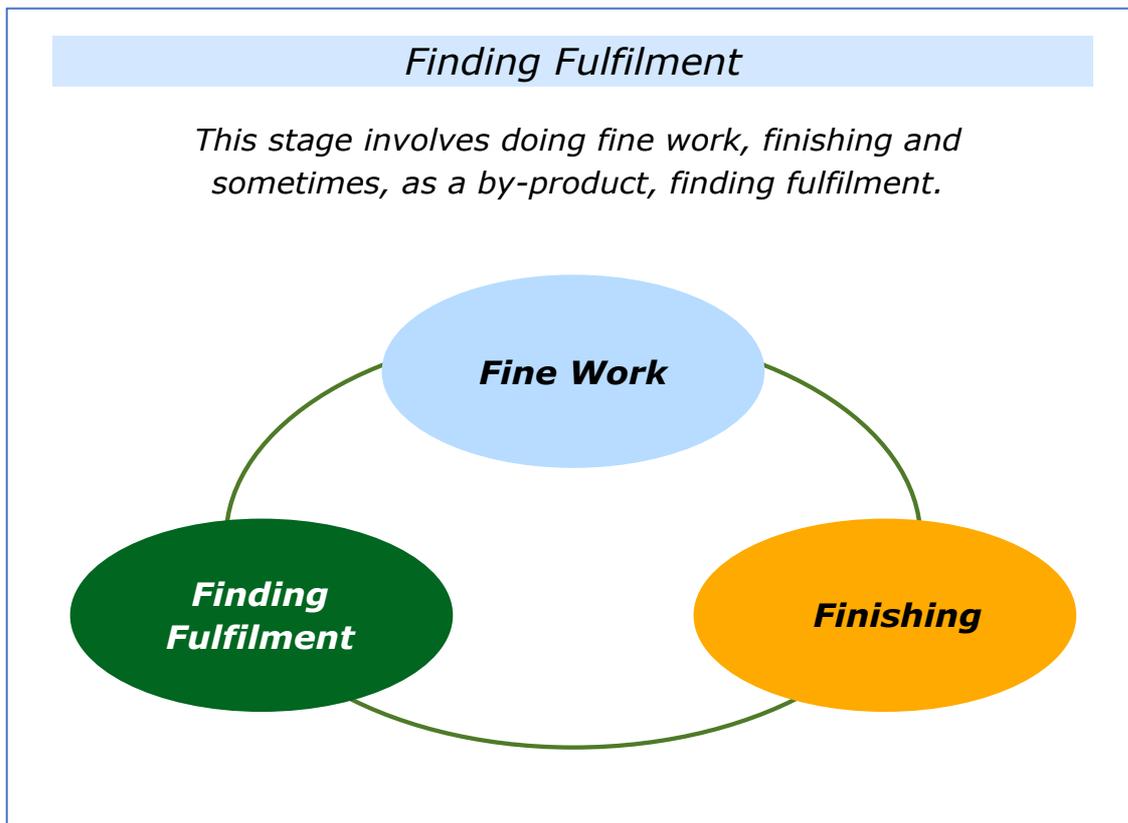

"I keep writing until the piece feels finished. I need to feel this in my gut. It needs to look right, sound right and feel right. I am then ready to publish the piece and share it with people."

You will have your own approach to finishing properly. Sometimes this involves continuing to do your best and finding solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving your goal.

Imagine that you are pursuing an activity where you are able to flow and focus. You may then move into action and aim to take the final step.

Fulfilment

There are many parts to taking this step. These sometimes involves doing fine work, finishing and, as a by-product, finding fulfilment. Let's explore how you may want to follow these steps in your own way.

Fine Work

Imagine that you are embarking on doing a specific project. How can you do fine work? There are many definitions for such work. These include:

Great Workmanship ... Excellent ... High Quality ... Very Good ... Outstanding ... Superior.

People who do work they care about put their hearts into what they are doing. Kahlil Gibran described this approach in his writing. He wrote:

Work is love made visible

And what is it to work with love?

It is to weave the cloth with threads drawn from your heart, even as if your beloved were to wear the cloth.

It is to build a house with affection, even as if your beloved were to dwell in the house.

It is to sow seeds with tenderness and reap the harvest with joy, even as if your beloved were to eat the fruit.

Different people have different approaches towards finishing. One approach is for them to do their best to achieve excellence.

Ron Berger encourages students to develop the habit of delivering excellence. He wrote the following piece when working in a small school.

Fostering an ethic of excellence

For 25 years I've led a double life. I'm a fulltime classroom teacher in a public school. To make ends meet for my family, I've worked during the summers, and sometimes weekends, as a carpenter.

In carpentry there is no higher compliment builders give each other than this: That person is a craftsman. This one word says it all. It connotes someone who has integrity, knowledge, dedication, and pride in work - someone who thinks carefully and does things well.

I want a classroom full of craftsmen - students whose work is strong, accurate, and beautiful; students who are proud of what they do and respect themselves and others.

In my classroom I have students who come from homes full of books and students whose families own almost no books at all.

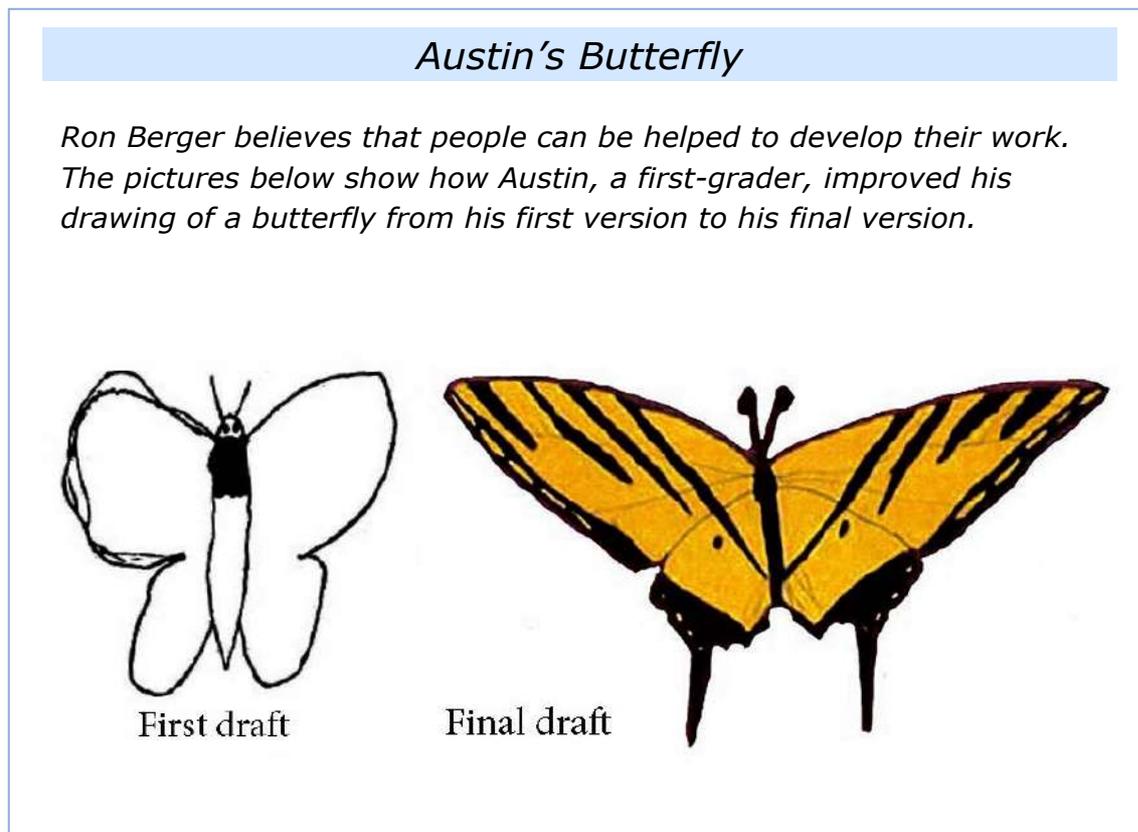

I have students for whom reading, writing, and math come easily, and students whose brains can't follow a line of text without reversing words and letters.

I have students whose lives are generally easy, and students with physical disabilities and health or family problems that make life a struggle.

I want them all to be craftsmen. Some may take a little longer; some may need to use extra strategies and resources. In the end, they need to be proud of their work, and their work needs to be worthy of pride.

Ron has gone on to provide teachers with many practical tools they can use to help students deliver excellence. One of the most well-known is the video called Austin's Butterfly.

This showed how Austin, a first-grader, developed his original drawing of a butterfly. Below is a picture of his first version. This is followed by one where he had made improvements and finished properly.

Finishing

Imagine that you are doing a piece of work. How can you finish it properly? One approach is to follow your successful pattern for finishing.

Looking back, when have you finished something properly? You may have written an article, run a marathon, renovated a house, led a team to success or done another activity. What did you do right then to finish? What were the principles you followed? For example, you may have chosen:

To commit yourself to finishing properly ... To set aside time to finish ... To rehearse what you were going to do ... To break down the work into manageable pieces ... To click into action.

To become absorbed in the work ... To keep doing the right things in the right way ... To encourage yourself on the journey ... To build in time for rest and recovery ... To keep going until you felt satisfied

Fulfilment

Imagine that you have done fine work and followed some of your successful principles for finishing. You may then experience a sense of fulfilment.

Sometimes this can happen during the work, sometimes at the end. Sometimes it comes from stretching yourself to reach a goal that is stimulating and achievable.

Mihaly describes people who took this path when recovering after accidents. Tragedies Transformed is the title of a study conducted by Professor Fausto Massimini who interviewed paraplegics.

Many said their accident had produced both positive and negative consequences. Tragic events presented them with extremely clear goals. Learning to live again was in itself a matter of pride.

People who mastered the fresh challenges experienced a clarity of purpose they had not felt before their accidents. Lucio had been a 20-year-old gas station attendant when a motorcycle accident paralysed him below the waist. He explained what he had done since the accident.

"When I became paraplegic, it was like being born again. I had to learn from scratch everything I used to know, but in a different way.

"I had to learn to dress myself, to use my head better. I had to become part of the environment, and use it without trying to control it. It took commitment, willpower and patience.

"As far as the future is concerned, I hope to keep improving, to keep breaking through the limitations of my handicap. Everybody must have a purpose. After becoming a paraplegic, these improvements have become my life goal."

Franco also has paraplegia. Before his accident his most intense flow experiences came from acrobatic dancing on Saturday nights. Now paralysed from the waist down, he has set new targets. The most important goal in his life is:

"To feel that I can be of use to others, help recent victims accept their situation."

Franco, Lucio and other paraplegics have focused on what they want to accomplish in their lives. They have set specific goals and strived to reach them on the way towards achieving their pictures of success.

Different people apply the flow approach in different situations. Let's look at one such application

The Flow Approach In Action

The flow approach is sometimes used with athletes, performers or others in certain situations. They may be playing a sport, auditioning for a musical role, giving a keynote speech or doing another activity.

The aim is to encourage them to flow rather than be paralysed by fear. Looking ahead, we focus on how they can relax, rehearse properly and then follow their rhythm.

They aim to be positive and do their personal best. It is also to follow their principles rather than worry about the prize. The key is to emerge from the experience feeling that they have done everything possible to perform at their best.

This is an approach that works, but people may need to keep returning to it before every event. They can then aim to pursue the flowing way rather than the fearful way.

Great workers who go into a state of flow often enjoy the journey as much as reaching the goal. They see finishing as another name for beginning.

They feel satisfied for a while but then want to focus on the next journey. They love following the principles as well as achieving the prize. Mihaly explains this approach in the following way.

The mystique of rock climbing is climbing; you get to the top of a rock glad it's over but really wish it would go on forever.

The justification of climbing is climbing, like the justification of poetry is writing; you don't conquer anything except things in yourself. The act of writing justifies poetry. Climbing is the same: recognising that you are a flow.

The purpose of the flow is to keep on flowing, not looking for a peak or utopia but staying in the flow. It is not a moving up but a continuous flowing; you move up to keep the flow going.

Some people also aim to flow and show fighting spirit on the way to fulfilment. They take this approach rather going straight into fighting mode.

One person described how they learned to follow this approach rather than immediately getting into the boxing ring.

"Most of my life has been spent in fight mode. I have run companies where the emphasis was on selling, beating the opposition and growing every year.

"I have actually been good at fighting but there has been a price to pay. Every day was a battle and I sometimes passed this on to my family.

"One breakthrough came when helping my son who is dyslexic. At first I tried to force him to fight it but then I had a realisation.

"My son and I related best when we did activities where he was in flow. This was when we went cycling, swimming and doing other activities. At those times I relaxed and supported him.

"Bearing this in mind, I experimented by aiming to go into flow at work. I did this before channelling my fighting spirit. This worked and I am much happier for it.

"Of course, sometimes I go straight into the boxing ring but then I remind myself to slow down and flow. This is both more effective and makes everybody happier."

Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow the flowing approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may want to do this when encouraging a person, renovating a house, playing a sport, doing a creative project, tackling a challenge or doing another activity. You may want to do this when acting as a parent, educator, medic, trusted advisor or in another role.

Looking ahead, how can you give yourself the chance to flow? How can you set things up to succeed? How can you also plan to encourage yourself on the journey?

You may set aside a block of time to do the work and follow certain rituals before moving into action. Focusing fully on the task, you may aim to follow your rhythm and do fine work. You may work for a while but then take time to recharge your batteries.

Looking ahead, you may relax, reflect and then rehearse what you are going to do next. You may then again immerse yourself fully in the task, do fine work and finish. This may then lead to having sense of fulfilment.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Teams Approach

This section looks at one approach to building superb teams. It is based on a model that I have seen work in many fields during the past fifty years.

Although here it is called Positive Teams, the organisations I have used it with have branded it in different ways. They have called it Super Teams, Peak Performing Teams or other names.

Whatever the name, however, the principles remain similar. They are based on what works and - providing people do the work - it works.

This piece on teams is long because it includes many models and tools you can use to build such teams. You can then use these in your own way. Let's explore these themes for building such teams.

Setting The Scene

Positive Teams

They create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance

Good leaders start by creating a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. They sometimes take the following steps towards making this happen.

Such leaders make sure that everybody understands the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. They do this because they believe that people work best when they have context and can see the big picture.

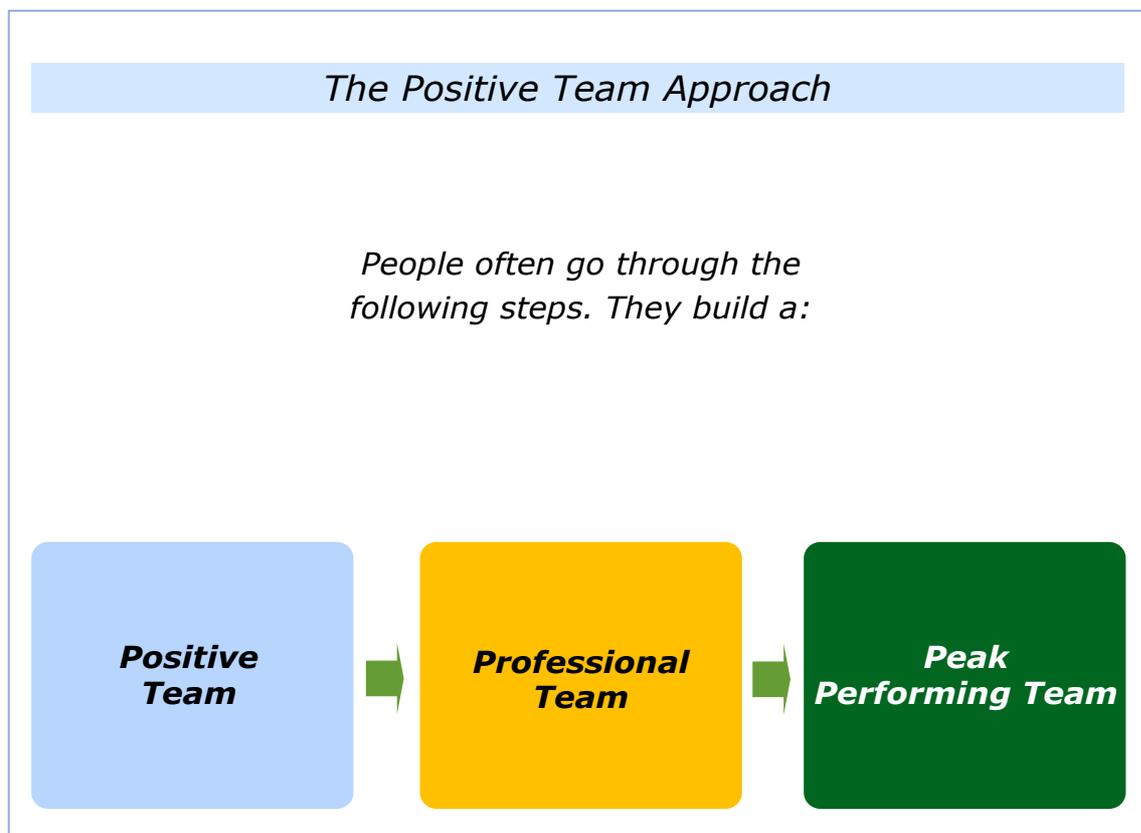

They then give people the chance to reflect and decide if they want to contribute. If so, they encourage people to build on their strengths and clarify their best contributions.

Positive teams are made up of people who aim to be positive, professional and peak performers. They also want to do superb work and do their best to help the team to succeed.

Good leaders make clear contracts with people about the results they will deliver towards achieving the goals. They also give people the support they need to deliver the goods.

They then manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They encourage people to coordinate their strengths, perform superb work and find solutions to challenges. People then do whatever is required to achieve the picture of success.

People often go through the following steps on this journey. They choose to build a positive team, a professional team and then a peak performing team. They do not choose to build a poor team.

Imagine that you are leading a team that is about take the next step in its development. You will have your own framework for making this happen.

If you wish, however, you can use the following approach for enabling people to achieve peak performance. The following pages describe the specific things you can do:

To clarify and communicate the team's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To make clear contracts with people about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To enable people to perform superb work and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Clarifying The Team's Purpose

There are many ways for a person or team to begin clarifying their purpose. Here are some of the common approaches.

People focus on something they want to serve - such as a set of values, vocation or mission - that is greater than themselves.

People focus on the things they feel passionately about in which they can also achieve peak performance.

People focus on how they can build on their strengths and do superb work that helps all their stakeholders to achieve success.

Some people combine all of these approaches. They then translate their findings into a compelling purpose.

Many start by building on their strengths. This involves them taking the following steps.

They clarify their strengths – the deeply satisfying activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs.

They clarify the specific kinds of people – customers, clients and other stakeholders – with whom they work best and the challenges these people face.

They clarify how they can use their strengths to do satisfying work and help these people to achieve success.

Building on what they have discovered, they then do an exercise that involves them beginning to clarify their purpose.

Imagine that you want to take this step. Imagine also that you and your colleagues have already done some work on clarifying the team's strengths.

You can then invite them to build on the team's strengths and define the specific thing that the team really wants to do. Here is one approach you can take to begin the process.

Invite each person to complete the following sentence. They can write their ideas on Post-its.

The purpose of our team - the specific thing we really want to do - is:

"We want to ..."

You can also invite people to give some examples of what this might look like in practise. They can write these examples on separate Post-its.

People can put their ideas on flip charts that are headed in the following ways. They can also explain what they have written on the Post-its.

The Team's Purpose

The purpose of our team - the specific thing we really want to do - is:

* We want to ...

Here are some examples of the things that will be happening that will show we are achieving our purpose:

Imagine that you have done this exercise with your colleagues in the leadership team. It can then be useful:

To build on the points people have in common;

To take time to reflect and then have a first go at wordsmithing the team's purpose;

To use this as the basis for focusing on the principles and picture of success - but also being prepared to return to the one liner and recraft it if you wish.

There is one key point worth bearing in mind when doing this exercise. Some people may want to get into a discussion about the difference between a purpose, mission and vision.

Different people interpret these words in different ways, so try to avoid getting into a long discussion about semantics.

One view is that a team's purpose describes the specific thing people feel really driven to do. They then translate this into specific goals that they want to achieve by a certain date. This then becomes the team's vision or picture of success.

Some organisations prefer to use the word mission. A military mission, for example, must have achievable objectives. It must also be time based and, if appropriate, have a clear exit strategy. Military people then know what they must achieve by a certain date.

Susan Ward studied many organisations that took this approach. Here is her definition of a mission statement.

A mission statement is a brief description of a company's fundamental purpose. It answers the question, "Why does our business exist?"

The mission statement articulates the company's purpose both for those in the organization and for the public. For example: "Tesla's mission is to accelerate the world's transition to sustainable energy."

Imagine you have focused on the team's purpose. The theme you have come up with may need some wordsmithing, which you can do later. It can be useful, however, to move on to the next step.

Clarifying The Team's Principles

The next step is to define the principles - the guidelines - you would like people to follow to achieve the purpose. There are many ways to define these principles.

One approach is to simply invite people to describe the Dos and Don'ts that everybody in the team can follow to work towards achieving the goals.

If you wish, you can invite people to take this step by them writing what they believe are the Dos and Don'ts on Post-it Notes. They can then put these on flip charts under these respective headings.

The key thing about principles are that these describe the guidelines people can follow to increase the chances of achieving the goals. These are driven by the team's purpose rather than by the whim of the leader.

Here is a list of the Dos that one organisation communicates to people when they join. They describe these as their professional guidelines and use real examples to bring these to life.

Principles

The principles we would like people to follow to work towards achieving our goals are:

Do be positive and encourage other people;

Do be clear on the organisation's goals and your part in contributing towards achieving these goals;

Do make clear contracts with people and fulfil these contracts;

Do focus on outcomes - the real results to achieve in a situation - and do your best to achieve these outcomes;

Do behave professionally, present solutions to challenges and help both colleagues and clients to succeed.

You will have your own set of Dos and, if appropriate, Don'ts. It is also important to be able to give the reasons for each of the principles. When communicating these, you can say:

The first principle we would like people to follow to increase the team's chances of achieving success is:

The reasons why it is important to follow this principle are:

This helps people to understand the team's purpose and also why it is important to follow certain principles to reach the goals. If you wish, you can invite people in the leadership team to complete the following exercise.

The Team's Principles

The principles we would like people to follow - the Dos and Don'ts together with the reasons for these - when working towards achieving the purpose are the following.

The Dos

- * Do ...

- * Do ...

Clarifying The Team's Picture Of Success

Imagine that you and the leadership team are reasonably happy about the team's purpose and principles. You can then translate these into specific goals to achieve by a certain date. These goals will then become the team's picture of success.

There are many frameworks you can use to take this step. One approach is to see it as clarifying the team's story, strategy and road to success.

This involves focusing on the What, Why, How, Who and When. It involves you using the following headings.

The What

The specific goals we want to achieve are ...

The Why

The specific benefits of achieving these goals will be ...

The How

The specific strategies we aim to follow to achieve the goals are ...

The Who

The specific responsibilities of the various people in working towards achieving the goals will be ...

The When

The specific things that will be happening - and when - along the road towards achieving the goals will be ...

Several points are worth bearing in mind when writing the team's road to success.

You can choose your own time frame.

Different teams choose different time frames. You may want to pick a date one year, two years or three years in the future.

Start by settling on your chosen date. Describe the specific things you want the team to have achieved by that date. This becomes your picture of success.

You can be clear on the mandatory things the team must deliver to achieve success.

The team will be expected to deliver its scorecard – the specific targets it must deliver - over the financial year. You can add other things on top of this – such as stimulating projects and successes - that will enrich the team's story.

You can clarify for whom you are writing the presentation.

You may initially write it for your employees. This will ensure everybody knows the team's goal. Later you can adapt the presentation – whilst staying true to its spirit – so that it resonates with other key stakeholders.

You can write the presentation by yourself or, if you wish, involve other key people at various stages.

This will give people a sense of ownership in terms of shaping the future.

Choosing A Template

Different teams use different templates for framing their goals. Many leaders in companies focus on the three Ps when clarifying their aims.

They focus on the Profits, Products – including Customer Satisfaction – and People. These are, of course, interrelated. For example:

Profits - the profitability they want to deliver;

Products - the product quality, customer satisfaction and processes they want to deliver;

People - the culture they want to deliver.

Here is one approach you can use to craft the picture of success.

Clarifying The Road Map

The road map is the When part of the story. This will become the team's ongoing working document. Several things are worth remembering when making the road map.

Start from the destination and work backwards.

Start by picking a date in the future. Describe the specific goal you want the team to achieve by that date. Also describe the specific things that will be happening then that will show you have achieved the goal.

Dating the road map.

Start at the top of the Dates column and put the end date. Then work backwards towards the present day. You may want to break up the road map into quarters or other suitable periods.

This starting from the destination approach is used on many successful projects. It encourages people to keep focusing on the end goal.

Choose a suitable template for chunking the goals.

Here we have used the Three Ps framework – Profits, Products – including customer satisfaction – and People. You may prefer to use another template.

Describe the cumulative targets.

The totals under each heading for each quarter should be cumulative. This is illustrated below with Profits but you can do it with each heading. For example:

Q4. Profits £1 million
 Q3. Profits £750k
 Q2. Profits £500k
 Q1. Profits £250k

This describes the headline under Profits, but this could be broken down into more detail. You might want to consider having three bullet points of deliverables under each of Profits, Products and People. This helps to flesh out the road map

Bring the road map to life with quotations.

Describe the actual words you would like to hear people saying at various stages of the journey. These can be quotes from leaders, customers, colleagues or whoever.

Here is the framework for the road map. This describes the specific things the team needs to have delivered by the end of each quarter over one year. You can use a longer or shorter time frame for the road map.

Communicating The Picture Of Success

Imagine you want share this with the whole team. If this is the first time you have described the purpose and principles to your people, then it will be important to spend some time on these.

What you may find, however, is that people may simply see these as confirmation about the overall direction. They may be more concerned with their specific goals for the next year.

If you feel it is appropriate, you can give people further background about the purpose and principles. It will be important to explain the reasoning and bring the ideas to life by giving concrete examples.

You can then share the picture of success. Describe and bring to life the What, Why, How and Who, because this provides the overall direction for the team.

You can also give people a brief overview of the team's road map – the When. This can be explored in greater depth, however, after people know the team's direction and picture of success.

You may want to gather people together and say something along the following lines. You can supplement this with attractive slides that bring the ideas to life.

The Team's Purpose, Principles And Picture Of Success

Welcome to the session. Today we would like to look at how the team can continue to achieve ongoing success.

The Picture Of Success

Looking ahead, there are certain goals we want to achieve in the next year. We have translated these into a provisional picture of success. Before describing this, we want to give you some context.

We want to explain the possible strategies we have considered for going forwards. We will then describe the strategy we have chosen to follow and the reasons for pursuing this route.

Bearing in mind the various challenges we face, there are many different routes the team can take towards achieving its goals. Here is an overview of some of the possible routes we could take in the future.

Option A would be to ...

We have therefore put together the following picture of success.

Later we will describe the potential road map. We will then want your input regarding the action plan.

You can then go through the slides that describe The Picture Of Success.

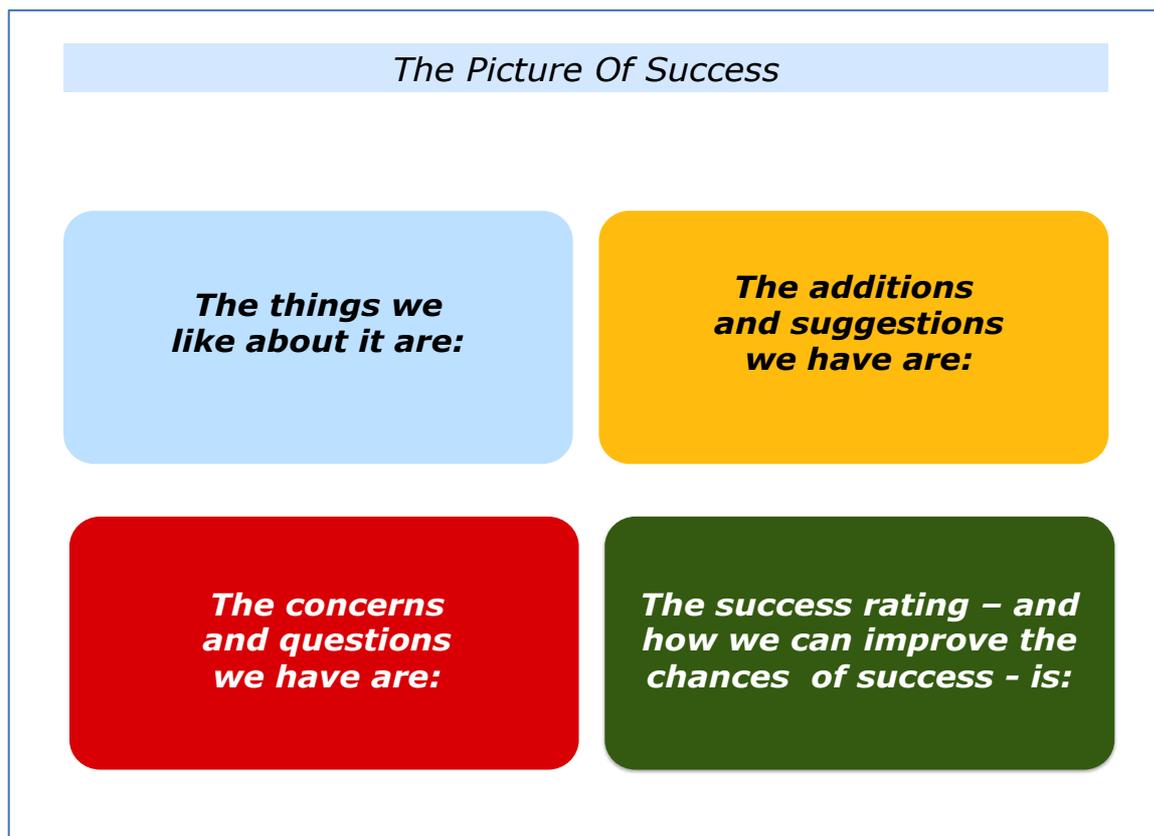

Getting Responses To The Picture Of Success

Imagine you have communicated the purpose, principles and picture of success. Again, if this is the first time you have communicated the team's purpose and principles, it will be good to get people's responses to these themes.

Imagine, however, that people are already generally aware of these. It can then be useful to explain that, whilst you are happy to answer questions about the purpose and the principles, you mainly want their views on the picture of success.

How to get good quality responses from people? Instead of simply asking for questions, you can take the following steps to stimulate and involve the team.

Invite people to form groups. There is to be a scribe in each group. Ask people to give their responses under the following headings.

Give people at least 30 minutes to do the exercise. Each group's ideas can be written on flip charts as they go along.

If you are the leader – or if there is a leadership team that has introduced the strategy – you can give people twenty minutes to get started. You can then go around and look at the themes that are emerging.

This helps you to prepare to address the themes and answer any questions. (You will have told people beforehand that you will be going around to see the themes that emerging.)

The next step is to invite people to report back. It can be useful to cluster the themes and questions that emerge. You can then respond and answer more effectively. When answering questions, explain the following guidelines to people.

You will aim to be honest and answer as fully as possible. You will do this because you want people to understand the strategy, the rationale behind it and the steps going forwards.

You will focus on the overall strategic issues when answering the questions. You will not be able to say exactly what each person in each job will be doing in a few months.

You will set aside time over the next week to meet individuals and answer their questions. They can book a time to see you.

You may not be able to answer all the questions in the session. You will be able to get back with some answers. There may also be questions that, because of certain issues, you will choose not to answer.

You will also take away the ideas and see which of these can be added to the strategy.

Bearing these things in mind, you can embark on addressing the themes and questions that have emerged.

Good leaders often see these sessions as an opportunity to educate people about the strategy. People go away with a wider grasp of the issues. They are then more able to explain the strategy to new people who join the team.

Here are the exercises you can give to the team members to get their responses to the presentation.

Clarifying Everybody's Contribution Towards Achieving The Picture of Success

Good leaders aim to build a culture in which people can thrive. They also recognise, however, that great teams are made up of people who have similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths. Diversity of spirit is a recipe for disaster.

Such leaders create teams that are made up of people who aim to be positive, professional and peak performers. They then invite these people to make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success. They take the following steps to make this happen.

They communicate the purpose, principles and picture of success.

They give people a chance to reflect and decide if they want to opt into achieving the goals.

They invite people – the smaller teams within the larger team and the individuals within those teams – to make clear contracts about their best contributions towards achieving the goals.

Good leaders manage by outcomes rather than by tasks, so you may wish to take the following steps:

To, if appropriate, ask each smaller team within the team to produce its road map towards delivering its contribution towards achieving the overall picture of success;

To pick a date – perhaps three weeks in the future – when the whole team will gather and each smaller team will present its road map;

To then set a date by which each individual will have made clear contracts about the contribution to achieving the picture of success;

To make sure that these contracts are written in outcome terms - the specific things people are going to deliver under the headings of profits, products and people;

To tell people that, after the contracts are agreed, everybody will gather each month to report their progress on the road towards achieving the picture of success.

Imagine that you have clarified each small team's contributions. People can then clarify the outcomes they will personally deliver towards achieving these goals.

There are many frameworks you can use to help people to clarify their individual contributions. Here is one approach that can be used.

The Team Member's Pack

This pack to be sent to the team member two weeks before the planned meeting with their manager. They are then to send the relevant parts to their manager at least two days before the session.

Introduction

This pack invites you to do several things to prepare for the meeting with your manager where you will agree on your contribution towards achieving the team's goals.

Some of these exercises you may only need to do occasionally, such as clarifying your strengths. Others you may do on an ongoing basis. The pack invites you to do the following things.

To clarify your strengths and your best contribution.

To agree on your contribution towards achieving the team's goals.

To clarify how you will keep your manager informed about your progress towards achieving the agreed goals.

Here are the exercises.

My Strengths

Some Background

We aim to build a strengths based team and co-ordinate these strengths to reach the goal.

We must, however, deliver the Scorecard. These are the mandatory things the team must deliver. This will sometimes mean everybody getting involved in doing great work and helping to do the other tasks.

We want to encourage you to build on your strengths, because you are then more likely to do great work. At the same time, however, it is your responsibility to manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

We want to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Once the outcomes are agreed, we ask you to be accountable for delivering the goods. How you achieve this - providing you follow the organisation's agreed principles - is up to you and your team.

The Picture Of Success*

Introduction

Bearing in mind the team's picture of success and your strengths, this exercise invites you to describe the following things.

The specific results you aim to deliver towards achieving the team's picture of success.

These aims should be written in outcome terms - such as the specific results you will deliver - rather than as a list of activities.

The specific benefits - to the various stakeholders - of delivering these results.

The specific things you will do to proactively update people about your progress towards achieving the results.

The specific support you would like to help you to achieve the results.

The specific early successes you will aim to deliver.

Complete these exercises up to and including the page Specific Early Successes and send these to your manager. You can then agree on your goals for the year.

After the meeting you can then complete the section in which you write your agreed goals for the year.

My Agreed Goals

Introduction

After clarifying your strengths you will then meet with your manager and agree on your goals.

When doing this, it is important to bear in mind the team's picture of success and your strengths. You will then agree with your manager on your contribution towards achieving this picture of success.

Try to write your goals in outcome terms. Describe the actual things you will deliver, rather than a set of activities.

You can then keep referring back to these goals when having ongoing meetings with your manager.

After meeting with my manager, the agreed specific results I will aim to deliver are:

1) To

For example:

Good organisations ensure that everybody knows the overall goals. Each team and each person then makes clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the aims. So the overall picture may look something like the following.

Continuing To Focus On The Picture Of Success

Good leaders encourage people to keep doing the right things in the right way every day. The road map may evolve, of course, but it is vital to keep people focusing on the goals.

Imagine that you have gone through the stages mentioned earlier. You can then encourage people:

To perform superb work;

To proactively report on their progress towards achieving the goals - this also involves producing and publicising success stories;

To find positive solutions to challenges and achieve the picture of success.

Good leaders enable people to take these steps. They also ensure that people keep reporting their progress towards achieving the goals.

One approach to doing this is to meet with each person on a regular basis. Here is one framework that they can follow for reporting the progress they have made and their plans for the future. They can then share this with you, for example, every month or another time frame.

My Progress Reports

Introduction

This section provides a framework you can use for meeting regularly with your manager.

Bearing in mind the results you aim to deliver, it invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific outcomes you have agreed to deliver.

Describe the specific things you aim to deliver in the next month (or other time frame).

Describe any other things you would like to discuss in the meeting with your manager.

Positive teams are special. They pursue their chosen strategies, perform superb work and work towards achieving their picture of success. They also communicate the progress the whole team is making towards achieving its goals.

Here is one approach to sharing the team's achievements along the way. This is similar to the framework used with individuals, but you can adapt it to describe the team's successes and plans. People can then continue to build a super team and deliver the picture of success.

Many organisations are now made up of people who are located in different places. Let's consider how to lead such organisations.

Good organisations often manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Such organisations also get the right balance between the global purpose and the local practice. They combine the best aspects of a big organisation with the spirit of a small enterprise.

The centre communicates the purpose and the principles. The way that people practice these is up to them, within parameters, in their part of the organisation. But this comes with a proviso: people must show how what they are doing is following the principles and contributing to the purpose.

Good leaders encourage people to think global and act local. This calls for creating an adult-adult relationship, however, with everybody taking responsibility for making their best contributions to the company.

Imagine that you lead a large organisation and are addressing all the employees. You will aim to communicate the big picture whilst also encouraging people to take ownership for the local practice.

Different leaders will do this in different ways. One approach is to say something along the following lines. This covers some of the topics mentioned earlier regarding communicating with a team, but it also adds some important provisos.

Welcome To Today's Session.

I am going to give an overview of our organisation's purpose and the part you can play in making this happen.

Later I will give some examples of how people have contributed to this purpose in the past and how they can contribute in the future.

But first let me give an outline of our overall approach to working together.

The Purpose

The purpose of our organisation is:

* To

The Principles

The principles we aim to follow to pursue our purpose are:

* To

* To

* To

The Picture Of Success

The picture of success we want to achieve in the next year that will be an expression of our principles is:

* To

* To

* To

The Practice

The way you practice these principles and contribute to achieving the picture of success will - within parameters - be up to you in your part of the organisation.

But there is a key point. You must show how what you practice supports the principles and contributes toward achieving the goals.

We want you to take time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute. If so, we will then make clear contracts with you about the outcomes you want to deliver towards achieving the picture of success.

Good leaders build on the people who want to contribute. They then take the following step.

Managing By Outcomes

Good leaders give people the big picture because they recognise that knowledge workers, for example, want context. They then manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

They spend a lot of time with people agreeing on what must be delivered. Many people are used to writing lists of tasks and talking about what they will do. It can take time to educate them to focus on the outcomes they will deliver.

Good leaders make crystal-clear contracts about the real results to achieve. Why? Because from then on virtually every performance conversation will start by concentrating on the agreed outcomes, rather than get into supervising the tasks.

After such a contracting session, for example, here is how one team leader might describe their contribution under the Three Ps.

*My Team's Contribution Towards Achieving
The Picture Of Success*

The results we want to have delivered by the end of the FY in terms of profitability, products and people are these.

Profitability

By the end of the financial year, we want:

- To have ensured our team beats its financial targets and makes a profit of ...*
- To have achieved this by providing 80% of our standard products and 20% of our newer products.*
- To have achieved it by continuing to work with our existing clients and also adding 3 new clients.*

We want to achieve these goals in order to pay our people and also to invest in shaping a positive future.

Products

By the end of the financial year, we want:

- To have ensured that more than 90%+ of our customers say they are extremely satisfied with our work.*
- To have produced 12 success stories that show how we have helped our customers to achieve their goals.*
- To have simplified 2 of our complex processes to ensure these are more user-friendly for both our customers and colleagues.*

We want to achieve these goals in order to help our customers and our colleagues to achieve success.

People

By the end of the financial year, we want:

- To have achieved an internal morale rating where more than 85% of our people say they enjoy working here.
- To have maintained a culture where people translate the company's principles into practice and get positive results.
- To have provided the team members with practical tools they can use to shape their future careers.

We want to achieve these goals in order to help our colleagues to achieve success.

Why take this approach? People can get into a pattern of talking about details, making excuses or whatever. They may also confuse activity with results.

Certainly sometimes it is vital to revisit the aims to ensure these are still desirable and possible. Whether it concerns profits, product quality or people, however, the mantra is:

"Let's focus on the desired outcomes. How can we do our best to deliver these results?"

Sounds tough? Perhaps, but it is also a good way of leading a team. People learn:

To clarify the specific goals that are written in outcome terms;

To make clear contracts about the goals, including the required support;

To take responsibility, be creative and do their best to deliver the agreed outcomes.

Managing By Outcomes – The Rule Of Three Approach

There are many ways to encourage people to focus on the outcomes to achieve. One of the simplest is the rule of three approach.

This involves communicating the three goals to achieve. If appropriate, each of these can be broken down into three sub goals. You can then aim to bring these to life with specific examples.

Here are some of guidelines it can be useful to follow when taking this approach.

Managing By Outcomes

The Rule Of Three

You can use the rule of three approach when communicating the outcomes to achieve

You can aim to make these:

- Mission Driven

You can aim to make the goals mission driven and focus on the specific outcomes to achieve.

- Magical Or Memorable

You can aim to bring the goals to life by giving examples that resonate with people.

- Measurable

You can aim to describe the specific things that will be happening that will show the goals have been achieved.

Managing By Outcomes In Challenging Situations

Good leaders also focus on outcomes when people face challenges in their work. One leader I worked with took this approach when a team member asked them about how to deal with a problem client. The team member explained this in the following way.

"We are having problems with a difficult client. They are always complaining, even though we give good service, and this is wearing down our staff. The client is part of a culture where the bosses rule by fear, which may be why they take the same approach with us.

"The client now wants us to lower our prices. This will be difficult, however, because we make little money from our work with them. I also fear for our staff who are near breaking point. I would be grateful for any ideas you have about what we can do."

The leader listened to their team member. They then said something along the following lines.

"Thanks for the background information. Of course, I am happy to offer some ideas. Before then, however, let's look at the outcomes we want to achieve. Do we want:

"To keep the client – at least until we have found another to replace them; to keep giving good service and make some profit; to care for our staff and encourage them whilst we are trying to replace the client?"

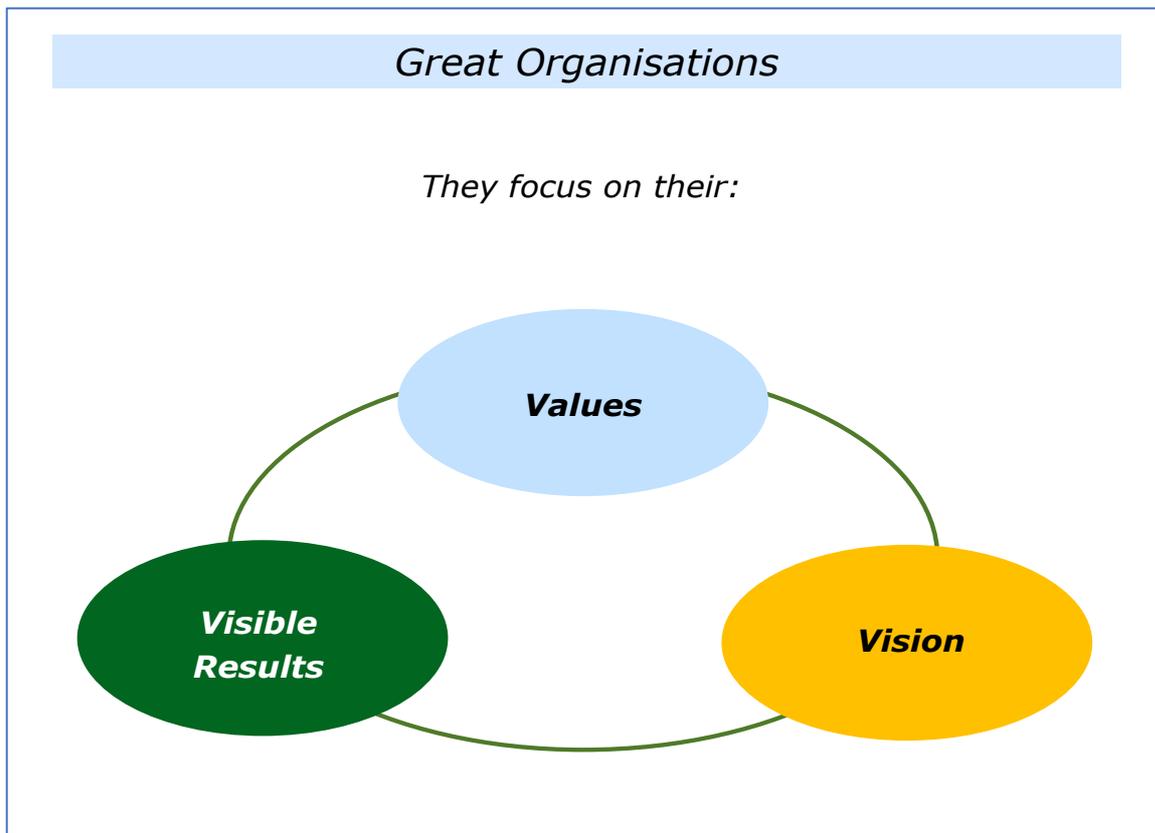

"Are there any other things we want to achieve? Bearing these things in mind, let's explore the key things we can do to achieve these outcomes."

The leader and team member agreed on a plan: a) to continue to give good service to the existing client; b) to find a new client to replace the income stream; c) to give support to their staff in the meantime. They translated their plans into action and resolved the issue within two months.

Many leaders find that over the years their control needs get stronger. They also realise, however, that they will be judged by the performance of their people.

How to square this circle? One approach is for them to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Taking this step can help them to build more self-managing and successful teams.

The Values Driven Organisation Approach

Let's consider another approach to doing fine work. This is for people to build a values driven organisation. They then aim to follow their values, translate these into a clear vision and deliver visible results.

Great organisations are serious about taking this step. They provide a set of guiding principles that people can refer to every day. They aim to live the values rather than just laminate the values.

Such organisations encourage people to focus on this common compass when making decisions or doing their daily work. They also share success stories about how people have translated the values into action.

During the past 50 years I have worked with many organisations that wanted to take this route. When doing this it has been important to adopt the organic approach.

This involves ensuring the values build on when people in the organisation have performed at their best. Such an approach stands the greatest chance of success.

Different organisations obviously develop different values. Below is a combination of the values created by some of the organisations with whom I have worked.

These values may sound simple, but the organisations actually translated them into daily action. The values included:

Take Responsibility ... Earn Trust ... Be Brilliant ... Pioneer The Way ... Encourage People ... Help Others Succeed ... Share Knowledge ... Give Great Service ... Keep Improving ... Deliver Success.

"But those values are not unique," somebody may say. "Any organisation could say they have those values."

Great organisations are unique, however, inasmuch that they live their values. Like peak performers, they actually do what they say they are going to do. This is what makes them different.

Looking at my own work on this theme, it has been important to invite the key leaders to consider the implications of going the values route. It has then been to ask them:

Are you serious?

There are many pluses to focusing on values but there are also potential minuses. Here are some of these.

Building A Values Driven Organisation

The pluses and potential minuses

The Pluses

- The values provide a common framework and language that people can understand – something they can refer to every day;*
- They communicate the professional standards that the organisation wants people to demonstrate on the way towards achieving the goals;*
- They provide a common compass that people can use when making decisions, providing customer service, recruiting or promoting people and running every aspect of the organisation;*
- They provide guidelines for producing success stories that highlight people living the values in their daily work - this helps to keep showing what good looks like;*
- They make the organisation special - by actually living its values - and increase its chances of achieving ongoing success.*

The Potential Minuses

- The leaders may need to act as positive models and live the values because people will watch what they do rather than what they say;
- The values must be introduced in a way in which people say: "Yes, that is us," and gives them a sense of ownership - within certain parameters - which can be hard to do;
- The values must be written in concrete language plus illustrated with real life examples that people can relate to - rather than vague concepts - and this can be hard to do;
- The values must be translated into concrete actions for the foreseeable future - rather than being issued and then forgotten;
- The values will be tested - such as when making tough decisions - but these situations can also be a chance for the organisation to show it is serious about living the values.

Similarity Of Spirit And Diversity Of Strengths

There is another reason for focusing on values. Great organisations are often made up of people who have similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths. Diversity of spirit is a recipe for disaster.

Such workplaces start by defining the spirit - the values or principles - they want people to demonstrate. They get the right people with the right attitude.

Attitude is non-negotiable, but they want characters, not clones. People will express the spirit in many different ways, but they must always demonstrate high professional standards.

Spirit gets people so far. But it is the diversity of strengths that enables the team to produce something special when it matters.

Every organisation is different, but three themes consistently emerge regarding the required spirit. Different places use different wording, but here are the recurring themes.

Great Organisations

They often want their people to embody the following characteristics.

- To be positive

To have a positive attitude, take responsibility and encourage other people

- To be professional

To deliver consistently high professional standards

- To be peak performers

To do their best, keep improving and deliver peak performances

Clarifying The Values

Imagine that you have been invited to help an organisation to clarify and follow its values. There are several ways to make this happen. Each route has both pluses and minuses.

One point is worth underlining. The leaders need to take charge of developing and then living the values. They are accountable for running the organisation.

Employees will watch what these people do rather than what they say. The leaders must therefore believe in the values and see these as the basis for shaping the future.

This does not mean that the leaders go into a bunker and emerge to email the values to everybody else. And it certainly does not mean they hire a marketing company to come up with the values.

The leaders need to craft the values in an organic way. The values must build on the organisation's strengths yet also provide the basis for shaping a successful future.

The leaders can also involve a wider group of people in shaping the values. This must be done properly, however, to give people a sense of ownership within certain parameters.

Imagine that are helping an organisation to craft its values. Here are three options for taking these steps. There are, of course, other approaches you can take to clarifying the values.

The Positive History Approach

You can develop the values by focusing on when the organisation has performed brilliantly. Looking back at the organisation's positive history, you can clarify several things.

The specific times when people in the organisation have performed brilliantly;

The specific principles people followed then to perform brilliantly;

The specific things people can do to follow these principles – plus maybe add other things – to perform brilliantly in the future.

You can then make these principles the basis for shaping the organisation's values.

The pluses of this approach are:

It is organic and builds on the organisation's strengths. It can be a superb way of involving key people in clarifying the values. It is believable. When the values are presented, you can point to the times when people have followed them successfully.

The potential minuses are:

It may be important to add other principles that people may need to follow to be successful in the future.

The Positive People Approach

You can focus on the employees who embody the behaviours the organisation wants people to demonstrate in the future. You can take this approach by clarifying the following things.

The specific employees who the organisation believes embody the values the organisation must demonstrate in the future;

The specific ways that these people translate the values into action;

The specific values that the organisation can build on to be successful in the future.

The pluses of this approach are:

It is based on real people and can therefore lead to highlighting concrete examples. It is believable. When the values are presented, you can point to people and teams who have followed the values successfully.

The potential minuses are:

It may be limiting in terms of the values it reveals. It can sometimes focus only on the star players. So it is important to highlight the soul players – and the qualities they demonstrate – that make sure the engine of the organisation keeps running.

The Blank Piece Of Paper Approach

You can start with a blank piece of paper and invite people to clarify the values they believe the organisation must demonstrate in the future. They can brainstorm and agree on the following things.

The specific values they believe the organisation should follow in the future;

The specific ways these values can be translated into action;

The specific ways the leaders are going to live the values and then ensure the values are lived throughout the organisation.

The pluses of this approach are:

It can be appropriate if the organisation needs to be transformed in order to be successful. It puts the emphasis on the leaders being good models and living the values. It can provide a compass that enables the organisation to be successful in the future.

The potential minuses are:

It is not organic. The values may be taken from outside the organisation rather than from within. On the other hand, this may be exactly what is required to transform the organisation.

The Positive Mantra Approach

This is an approach often used by teams involved in sports, adventures or working together on other projects. They start by clarifying their purpose, principles and picture of success. They then aim:

To focus on the key principles they can follow to increase the chances of achieving the picture of success;

To summarise these in a positive mantra that they can keep focusing on when working towards the picture of success;

To keep doing the maintenance – the things that must be done – and then add the magic on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

Creating such a mantra can be an effective and quick way to begin developing a certain culture. Let's look at one example.

One football manager gathered the whole squad together for a pre-season workshop. People were then invited:

To recall when they had done positive work in a team;

To agree on three words they wanted to have as their positive mantra;

To focus on how they could translate this positive mantra into action in different situations.

The entire squad brainstormed the possible words. These included words such as: together, resilient, supportive, classy, excellent, relentless plus many others. They then voted on these to produce the top three words.

People formed small groups to clarify how they as players and staff could translate each of these words into action. They then focused on how to follow their chosen words in challenging situations.

The squad settled on their final positive mantra – which comprised of three words. They put this in their dressing room and around the training ground. It replaced the old cut-and-paste motivational slogans.

People felt ownership of their mantra. Simple and memorable, it provided a guide they could follow when things got tough during the season.

The pluses of this approach are:

It is a quick yet effective way of setting the tone and beginning to build a culture. People feel a sense of ownership by producing their own positive team mantra.

They can then focus on how to translate these into action in real situations. The mantra can also act as a quick call to action – a reminder of how to behave – when they are working towards a goal.

The potential minuses are:

The leaders must set the scene properly and show they are serious about involving people in producing the mantra. They also need to show how it relates to building a certain culture.

If some participants refuse to take it seriously, it won't work. Of course, such people should not be part of the culture.

The Positive Mantra

The three words we want to follow as our positive mantra are:

We can then aim to keep translating these into action.

The Actual Process Of Helping An Organisation To Agree On Its Values

Imagine that the leaders in the organisation have chosen to pursue a particular approach to clarifying the values. Here are some things to bear in mind when helping them to take this step.

The number and wording of the values

Some organisations produce values statements that end up as long tracts full of good intentions and complicated sentences. Here are some guidelines that seem to work.

It can be useful:

To have a maximum of four values – because this make them easier to remember;

To have a maximum of three words per value – because this makes them sharper;

To start each value with a verb – because this provides a call to action.

Good organisations often follow these rules. They also, if appropriate, expand on each of the values and bring them to life with real examples.

The methods for agreeing on the values

Imagine that you are helping the leadership team to begin clarifying the organisation's values. There are many ways to take this step. Here is one approach you can take.

Step One

You can invite people: a) to recall specific situations in the past when people in the organisation have performed brilliantly; b) to clarify the values that people followed then and how they translated these into action.

This can help to clarify the values that are demonstrated by people when they perform at their best. It can also provide food for thought when they take the next step.

Step Two

You can give each person four big strips of paper. You can then invite each person to write four values that they believe it is important for people in the organisation to follow in the future.

They are to write one value per piece of paper. When writing the values, they are: a) to start each value with a verb; b) to have no more than three words per value.

If people ask for a guide regarding the areas to cover, it can be worth mentioning that some organisations focus on the following themes when clarifying their values.

The Values

*Here are some things to consider when writing the values.
These are suggestions, however, rather than steadfast rules.*

- To have a maximum of four values; to have no more than three words per value; to start each value with a verb.

- To have one value that relates to the attitude people need to demonstrate; one value that relates to being professional; one value that relates to working well together; one value that may be quirky, different or makes your organisation stand out.

- To make sure that you can think of concrete examples when people have lived some of the values.

Imagine people have finished writing their suggestions. You can ask each person to go up in turn and put their four pieces of paper – their suggested values – on the floor. They are also to explain the reasons they have written their suggested value.

If you have ten people in the group, you will end up with 40 pieces of paper on the floor. Many of the values will appear to be similar, but that is okay.

Step Three

You can then invite people to vote on their preferences regarding the values. This can be done in various ways. One approach is to give each person four Post-it Notes. These are weighted in the following way:

One Post-it is worth 10 points and they can put this on their first choice value.

One Post-it is worth 8 points and they can put this on their second choice value.

One Post-it is worth 6 points and they can put this on their third choice value.

One Post-it is worth 4 points and they can put this on their fourth choice value.

Invite people to all go up together and place their votes on their four chosen preferences. They can vote for the value they suggested and for other people's suggestions.

You can again remind them not to worry about any values that look similar. They are to put their votes on their preferences and any overlaps will be worked out later. People will vote and there will be lots of Post-it Notes on the various pieces of paper.

You can then invite people to add up the total votes on each of the values and write the total number on each of the papers. This will result in some values having lots of cumulative votes and others not so many.

Looking at the votes, invite people to see if there are any similar looking values that have quite a lot of votes. If so, people can consolidate these under the value that has the most votes.

The aim is to try to produce four – or at the most five – headings that cover most of the things that have been written by people.

My own experience is that people often produce about five or so main headings. This is okay. After the next step, however, they often find a way to consolidate these under fewer headings.

Step Four

Imagine that people have sorted the paper strips into columns. You can then lead a discussion that will result in settling on the values.

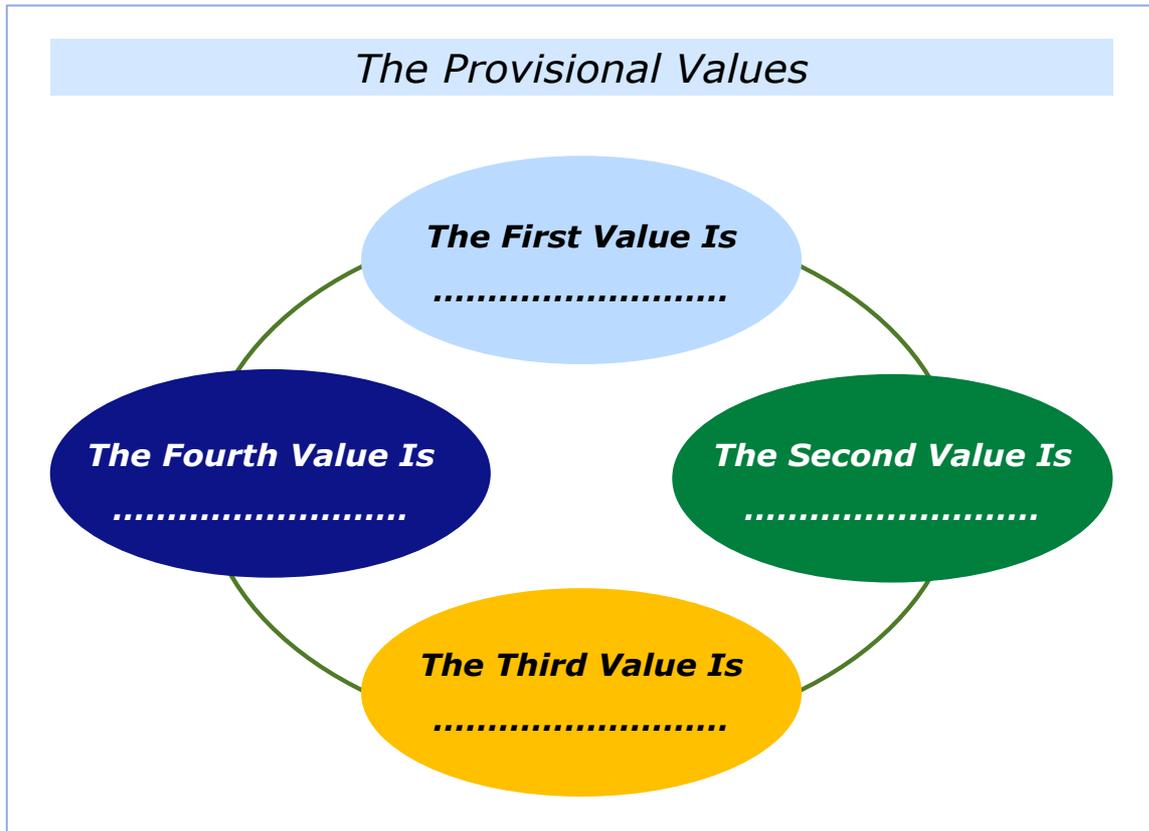

You can draw interrelated circles on a flip chart and aim to fill these with the agreed values. You can then ask people:

Which is the value with the most votes?

Write this in the top circle on the flip chart. You can also invite people to discuss which other values they have mentioned that might fit under this heading.

Move onto the value with the second most votes and repeat the process. Continue until all the circles have a value written in them.

Explain to people that these are still provisional values. They are not to be too concerned at this point about covering every eventuality or about wordsmithing.

Step Five

You can continue the discussion until it feels like people are reasonably happy with what has been produced. You can check this by covering the following themes in your own way.

Looking at the values, let me ask you a few things to check if they fit for you.

Do the values feel right for you? Can you think of people in the organisation who embody some of these values? What do they do to demonstrate some of the values in action?

If you were to show these provisional values to people in your organisation, do you think that some of them would say: 'Yes, that is us?'

You can again emphasise that this is the start of the process and it will be possible to expand or add to the values. At a certain point, however, you may want to move on to focusing on how people can translate the values into action.

Clarifying the specific things people can do to demonstrate the values

Imagine that the leadership team has settled on some provisional values. You can invite them to do some in-depth work on exploring the implications of introducing the values. They can focus on each of the values and clarify the following things:

The specific things they as leaders can do to translate the value into action;

The specific things that their people can do to translate the value into action;

The pluses and potential minuses of having this value;

The specific things they can do to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses;

The specific things they can do to encourage their people to live the value.

If there are four values, invite them to form four groups and complete the following exercise. They can then present back their findings to the whole group.

The First Value Is:

The specific things we as leaders can do to translate this value into action are:

The specific things that our people can do to translate this value into action are:

The pluses having this value are:

The potential minuses of having this value are:

The specific things we can do to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses of this value are:

The specific things we can do to encourage our people to live this value are:

Imagine the leaders have done these exercises and discussed the implications of following the values route. It can then be useful to invite them to make a considered decision regarding if they want to take the next step.

You can again ask them to reflect and decide if they are serious. If appropriate, you can cover of the following themes in your own way.

Are You Serious?

We have done some work on clarifying the values. There may be some more work to do on these, but before doing so it is important to consider the following things.

Bearing in mind the pluses and minuses involved, do you want to move forward with the values approach?

If so, we know there are certain things that work when pursuing this route. It will be important:

To polish the work done on the values and prepare these properly before presenting these to your people in the organisation;

To involve people in fleshing out the values – perhaps through values in action workshops which, when run properly, can be helpful in involving your people;

To clarify the concrete things you can do quickly to show you are serious about living the values in the organisation.

We can focus on what works when taking these steps. Before then, however, it is important to go back to one of the original themes.

Bearing in mind the benefits and possible challenges, are you serious about going the values route? If so, we can move on to making an action plan.

Communicating The Values To People In The Organisation

Imagine that the leaders want to go ahead and pursue the values route. One of the most effective ways is by involving their people in values in action workshops.

This will involve the leaders introducing the values to people. When doing so, it can be useful for them to bring the values to life with photographs of staff members who have demonstrated them in the past. People need to be able to look at the values and say:

"That is us."

Different leaders introduce the values workshops in different ways. One approach is for them cover the following themes in their own way at the start of the sessions.

Values In Action – Introduction

Welcome to today's session on values.

As you know, we have been focusing on the values that we believe it is important for us to continue to follow in the future.

Today is about sharing those values and giving you the chance to show how we can live them in the future.

These values are mostly based on the times when people in the organisation have done superb work. We will invite you to do an exercise on this theme early in the workshop.

We will then introduce each value in turn. When doing so, we will aim:

To highlight how people have demonstrated this in the past;

To focus on how we can live this value in the future.

There are, of course, pluses and minuses involved in aiming to follow certain values. We will be honest about these. We will also look at how we can build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

We are sure that many of you have been to sessions where initiatives have been started and then petered out.

We will therefore conclude the session by describing the specific things we will do to show we are serious about following the values.

We are serious about maintaining the momentum so that, this time next year, you can look back and say:

"We have an organisation that is really serious about living its values."

Bearing that in mind, I will hand over to the facilitator.

They will start by highlighting the importance of building values driven organisations.

They will then invite you to do the exercise regarding when you have seen people in the organisation doing superb work.

Enjoy the day.

The values in action workshops usually involve mixing people from different departments. They are interactive and involve a combination of short inputs, exercises and people working on fleshing out the values.

Here is an overview of the themes covered during such sessions.

Values In Action Workshops

Such workshops are a mixture of short inputs, exercises and people fleshing out the values. The aims are to do the following things.

- To focus on the importance of building values driven organisations.
- To introduce the provisional values by showing how these are based on:
 - a) the times when people have performed well in the past; b) the other elements that can be added to perform well in the future.*
- To give people an opportunity to flesh out the values by doing exercises on the following themes:
 - a) the specific things that people can do to live the values; b) the specific pluses and minuses of having the values; c) the specific things the organisation can do to show it is serious about living the values.*
- To show the how the organisation will encourage and support people in living the values.
- To show how the organisation will maintain the momentum and ensure it continues to live the values.

Creating A Common Language

Winston Churchill is quoted as saying that first we shape our buildings and thereafter our buildings shape us. We can also say:

"First we shape our language, then our language shapes us."

Great organisations often use their values to create a common language. This can help people to focus on certain themes and channel their energies in a positive way.

Simon Walker, a successful skipper in the BT Global Challenge round-the-world yacht race, involved his crew in creating such a mantra. The crew eventually agreed on three key principles. These were: "Safe, Happy, Fast."

People kept focusing on this mantra. It encouraged them focus on how they could travel safely, maintain a happy ship and keep finding ways to go faster.

“But isn’t that dangerous?” somebody may say. “It sounds rather cultish.”

Certainly that can be true, so it can be useful to follow certain guidelines. It is important that the language encourages people:

To focus on a common purpose ... To follow the key principles ... To work towards achieving the picture of success.

Maintaining The Momentum

Let’s return to one of the earlier themes. Great organisations show they are serious. They also use many methods to maintain the momentum. These include some of the following.

They keep focusing on the values – especially when making decisions.

They continually publish success stories that show how people are living the values.

They recruit, promote and reward people who embody the values.

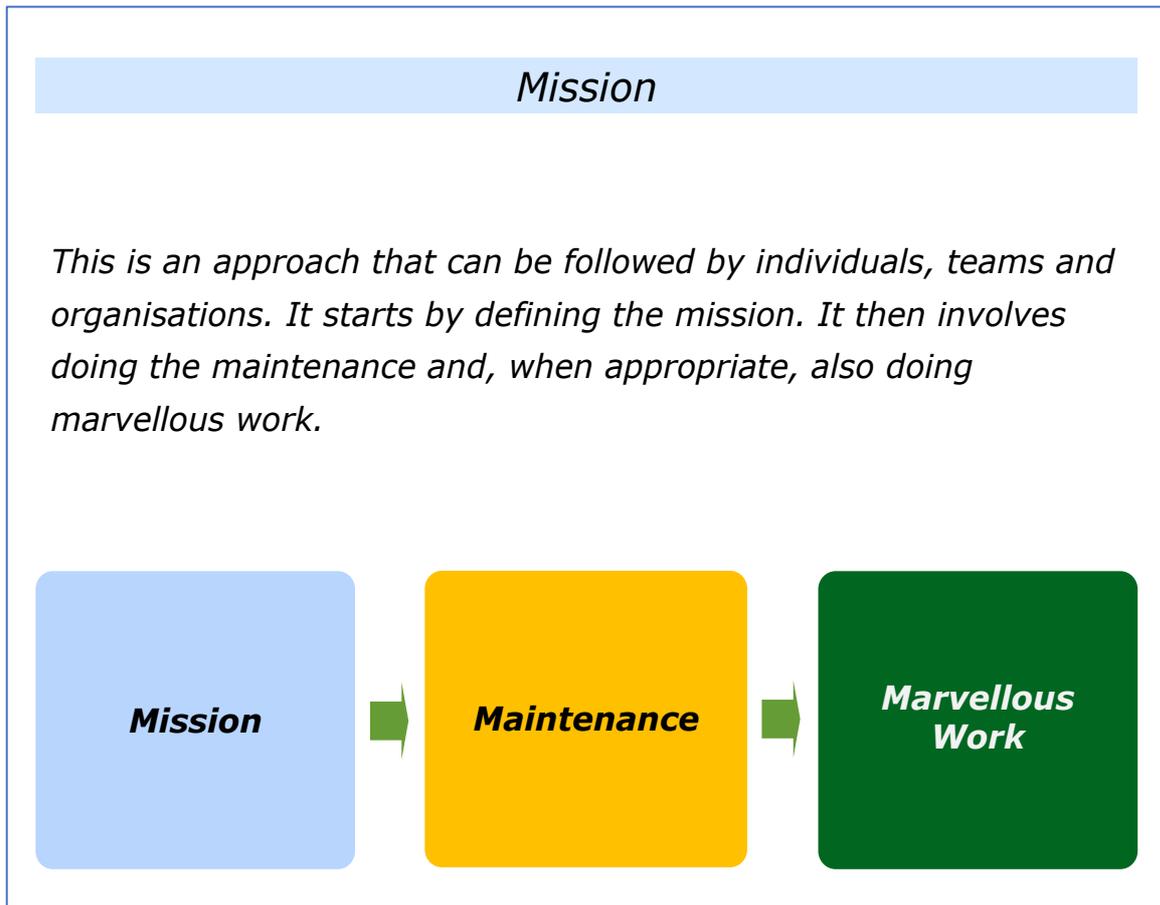

They never walk past a quality problem and instantly tackle any form of behaviour that goes against the values.

They ensure the values are embodied in every aspect of running the organisation – such as recruitment, interviewing, induction, management style, customer service and other aspects.

Sounds tough? Maybe, but it can be even harder to lead an organisation where people’s values are not aligned.

Great organisations make sure they are serious before pursuing the values approach. As mentioned earlier, they then aim to live the values rather than just laminate the values.

The Mission, Maintenance And Marvellous Work Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. This is an approach that can be followed by individuals, teams and organisations.

Let's start with you as an individual. You may want to begin by defining the mission. This can be something you want to do or deliver in your personal or professional life.

The next step will be to do the maintenance. These are the necessary tasks that must be done. When appropriate, you may also do marvellous work to deliver the mission.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you followed some of these steps in your own way? If so, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Mission, Maintenance And Marvellous Work Approach In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I followed elements of this approach was:

The specific things I did then to follow these steps were:

The specific things that happened as a result were:

Imagine that you want to follow some of these steps again in the future. You may want to do this as an individual or when leading a team. Let's explore how to make this happen.

The Mission

The approach starts by defining the mission. This may be philosophical, practical or focus on delivering positive results. Some missions combine all these elements. Here are some missions that people may aim to achieve.

The Mission

I want to follow my spiritual faith ... I want to use my strengths to help people to succeed ... We want to ensure that every child has access to a laptop ... We want to pioneer a new way of doing business in our field ... We want to create a vaccine for Covid.

People love to have a sense of mission. They love to feel they are contributing towards achieving something worthwhile. This can provide a sense of meaning to their lives and work.

Charles Garfield, the author of Peak Performers, said that people are driven by a sense of mission. A clinical professor of psychology, he saw this approach in action when he led a team of engineers, scientists and support staff on the Apollo 11 project.

Charles said that people, teams and organisations mobilise great strength when pursuing motivating missions. People want to serve a cause, follow their vocation or deliver a stimulating project. He wrote:

People want to feel proud of themselves, to achieve something, to leave a mark and a contribution, and they follow their plans for doing all that purposefully and tenaciously.

The most powerful human motivator of all is the desire to be proud of ourselves in the pursuit of something we care about deeply.

Imagine that you want to take this approach as an individual. You may want to write an article, renovate a house, create a self-help group for recovering patients or do another activity.

Imagine you want to take this approach when leading a team. Your team may aim to find a cure for a disease, solve a pressing problem, build an innovative product or deliver a worthwhile project.

Different people have different views of what constitutes a mission. Military missions, for example, must often meet the following criteria.

They must have an achievable objective, a strategy what will work, the required resources, a specific time frame and a clear exit strategy.

Military people then know what they must achieve by a certain date. It is also vital to have an exit strategy or, in some cases, a transition strategy.

Susan Ward produced an excellent definition regarding mission statements which is reproduced below.

A mission statement is a brief description of a company's fundamental purpose. It answers the question, "Why does our business exist?"

The mission statement articulates the company's purpose both for those in the organization and for the public.

Let's return to your own life and work. What is the mission you as an individual would like to pursue? What are the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of delivering the mission?

What are the specific things that will be happening that will show you have delivered the mission? What will be the benefits – for yourself and for other people - of pursuing this mission?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Mission

The specific mission – the specific thing I would like to do or deliver - is:

*

The key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of delivering the mission are:

The specific things that will be happening that will show I have delivered the mission will be:

*

The Maintenance

Imagine you have defined your individual mission. The next step is to make sure the maintenance gets done. This provides the platform for delivering the mission.

You will have your own approach to making sure these tasks get done. One approach is:

To keep pursuing the strategies most likely to deliver the mission;

To keep making sure all the necessary tasks get done;

To keep delivering consistently high standards.

Good leaders take a similar approach in teams. They recognise they are accountable for delivering the mission. They often have mission holders, however, who take responsibility for achieving aspects of the goals.

Imagine that you want to take this approach when leading a team. Who are the people you would like to be mission holders for aspects of the plan?

Many mission holders will be duty driven and already doing good work. They may need people to take over some of their current duties. This will release them to take the extra responsibility.

Mission holders will need to keep you informed, but they need to be given the authority and autonomy required to deliver the goods. Here are some things to bear in mind when considering who can play this role.

The Mission Holders

Good teams have many people who are prepared to be mission holders and help to deliver the picture of success.

Here are some of the themes to bear in mind regarding such people.

Mission Holders

- They love to take responsibility. They often start their career by being eager beavers who make lists and implement action plans. They get a kick from getting things done and seeing positive results.*
- They may then move into a more strategic role where they act as orchestrators, coordinators or project directors. They build agreed action plans, make clear working contracts and coordinate people's strengths to achieve the goals.*
- They are prepared to take accountability. They must be given the authority and autonomy required to deliver the goods. They are then more likely to make their best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.*

Imagine you have clarified who you want to be the mission holders for aspects of reaching the goals. It can then be useful to set-up one-to-one sessions with such people. You can aim:

To explain the strategies for achieving the mission;

To explain that you would like them to consider being a mission holder to deliver part of the mission;

To give them chance to reflect on whether they would like to contribute in this way to deliver the mission.

If so, you can then make clear contracts with them about what they want to deliver. One approach is to invite them to complete the following exercise.

*The Mission -
My Best Contribution*

I would like to be a mission holder for delivering parts of the mission. Bearing in mind my strengths, here is what I believe would be my best contribution.

It would be good to discuss this and then make clear contracts about my best contribution towards achieving the mission.

The Specific Goals

The key strategies I will aim to follow to deliver these results are:

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the key strategies you can follow to increase the likelihood of delivering your mission?

What are the specific things that must be done to deliver the mission? How can you continue to make sure the maintenance gets done?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Maintenance

The specific mission – the specific thing I would like to do or deliver - is:

*

The specific strategies to keep following and the specific maintenance tasks that must be done to deliver the mission are:

The specific things I can do to make sure these things continue to be done are:

The Marvellous Work

Imagine you have delivered high standards when implementing the strategies and doing the maintenance. If appropriate, the next step is to do marvellous work.

Different people do this in different ways. You may go that extra mile to give great service, provide exceptional medical care or do something special to deliver success.

Sometimes it means knowing how to manage the moving parts. These can include: a) the predictable things that you know will be moving and developing; b) the potential unpredictable things that may be moving. It is to manage these and, if possible, aim to do marvellous work.

Imagine that you lead a team and want to encourage your people to take these steps. One approach is to invite them to do an exercise on this theme. You can introduce this in the following way:

"Great teams keep doing the maintenance. This is mandatory. Such teams maintain high standards and do what is necessary to deliver the mission.

"Good service providers, for example, build on the old idea of blending high tech and high touch. They get all the technical things right and also add the personal touch. They do something extra to help their customers achieve success.

"Bearing this in mind, I would like you to each write Post-it Notes describing the specific things that we may be able to add the marvellous work.

"We will then focus on how to do some of these things on the way towards delivering the mission."

Depending on the kinds of work they do, different teams produce different ideas when doing this exercise. Here is a snapshot of some ideas that teams have produced.

Marvellous Work. The specific things we can do to do marvellous work are:

To put the right people in the right places in the team ... To get the casting right by putting the right people with the right customers ... To encourage people to use their strengths to help our customers to succeed.

To keep delivering the scorecard – the mandatory things we must deliver to keep our bosses happy – and to also do stimulating projects that benefit the organisation ... To build successful prototypes and produce success stories.

To create a stimulating environment that works for introverts – who like quiet spaces – and extroverts ... To involve everybody in our regular monthly updates about the progress we are making towards achieving the mission.

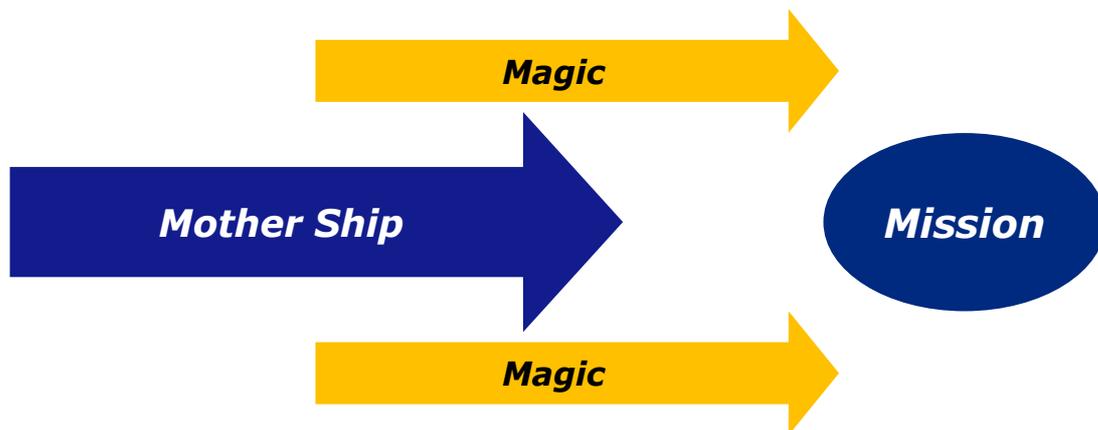

To work with pacesetting customers – those who are tackling challenge that others will face in the future - and help them to find solutions to these challenges ... To use this knowledge to produce our own future products and services.

To keep focusing on how we can follow the mission, do the maintenance and add the marvellous work ... To do superb marketing that shows how we can help people to achieve success ... To do this in a way that embodies our principles and delivers positive results.

There is another approach to encouraging people to focus on the mission. This sometimes involves certain people using their talents to go into another dimension and do magical work. Let's explore this theme.

The Mission, Mother Ship And Magical Work Approach

The first step is to clarify the mission. The second step is for people in the Mother Ship to implement the key strategies for achieving the mission. The third step is to ensure that other people – who may be able to add magical work - align their efforts to achieve the mission.

This approach was brought to life by the COO of a company. They described their challenge in the following way.

"I am in charge of the Mother Ship. Our job is to make sure the daily operations are on track. But we have a challenge.

"We have a visionary leader and several other key contributors who can sometimes create challenges. They are brilliant at what they do – such as selling or producing new technology.

"These people can add a lot to the company. It is important to encourage them to use their strengths and focus on the future, however, rather than diving into the overall operations."

The COO managed the challenge by doing the following things. They agreed on the following steps.

Step One

This involved clarifying the mission.

Step Two

This involved clarifying the key strategies people could follow to achieve the mission.

Step Three

This involved everybody in the company continually aligning their efforts to follow the strategies and work towards achieving the mission.

The people in the Mother Ship continually focused on doing the maintenance work and marvellous work required to follow the strategies towards achieving the mission.

The special individual workers sometimes went into another dimension and did magical work that contributed towards achieving the mission.

The COO coordinated all these efforts. They aimed to keep the Mother Ship on course. They also aimed to coordinate the individual workers' special talents in ways that contributed towards achieving the mission.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow the mission, maintenance and marvellous work approach?

What may be the mission you want to achieve? How can you do the necessary maintenance? How can you, when appropriate, do the marvellous work? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

follow elements of this approach may be:*

The Beliefs, Basics And Brilliance Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to do what they believe in, do the basics and then, when appropriate, add the brilliance.

This is an approach that can be followed by individuals, teams and organisations. It often involves focusing on the following themes.

Beliefs

This involves people doing what they do best, doing what they believe in and aiming to do brilliant work.

Basics

This involves people doing the basics and, when appropriate, showing battling qualities.

Brilliance

This involves people adding the brilliance and, when appropriate, also adding the beauty.

The following piece describes how this approach can be applied to building teams. As mentioned, however, the themes can be adapted to working with individuals, groups and organisations.

Beliefs

Belief is crucial. Charismatic leaders can sometimes inspire people to believe in themselves but real belief must come from within. People need to develop a gut belief that they can reach their goals.

One approach is for people to focus on doing what they do best and doing what they believe in. It is then to translate this into aiming to do brilliant work. Let's explore how to take these steps.

Doing What You Do Best

Imagine that you lead a team. You can start by inviting people to focus on the team's strengths and what it does best. Here are two exercises you can use.

The Team's Positive History

People are more likely to believe they can do something when they build on their successful patterns. Bearing this in mind, you can invite them:

To clarify the specific situations in the past when they have done superb work;

To clarify what they did right then – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – to do superb work;

To clarify how they can follow these principles in the future – plus add other skills – to do superb work.

The Team Performing Superbly

The specific situation in the past when the team did superb work was:

The specific things people did right then – the principles they followed and how they translated these into action – were:

The specific things people can do to follow these principles in the future – plus maybe add other skills – to do superb work are:

The Team's Strengths

Imagine that you have explored elements of the team's positive history. This provides clues to the team's strengths and how it has translated these into action.

Bearing this in mind, you may want to be more specific about these strengths. If appropriate, you can invite people to focus on the following themes.

Strengths

People can clarify the specific activities in which the team can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. These may be the specific services, products, projects or other activities in which the team can perform superb work.

Specific Customers

People can clarify the specific kinds of customers with whom the team works best. These may be customers who are in a certain sector, have certain personality characteristics or who are at a certain stage of their development.

Success

People can clarify the specific ways in which the team can use its strengths to help these customers achieve success. They may, for example, be able to help customers to improve their profits, product quality, processes, people management or other areas.

If you wish, invite people to do the following exercise. This will provide the basis for moving on to the next step.

The Team's Strengths

The specific activities in which the team has the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs are:

*

The specific kinds of customers with whom the team works best are:

The specific ways the team can use its strengths to help these customers achieve success are:

*

Doing What You Believe In

Imagine that you have clarified the team's strengths. Bearing these in mind, it will be important for people to do what you believe in. Belief works best when people are able:

To follow their successful patterns – such as the principles they have followed before to achieve success;

To focus on what they can control – such as having a positive attitude and being professional - and manage what they can't control;

To set specific goals where they believe – providing they do their best – they have a good chance of achieving success.

Great teams take a specific approach to setting goals. They focus on what they can control and what they believe they can achieve. They then translate this into a clear picture of success.

Here is an exercise on this theme. Invite each of the individuals in the team to write Post-it Notes under the following headings.

Can Achieve - The specific things that I believe the team can achieve.

Maybe Can Achieve - The specific things that I believe the team maybe can achieve.

Probably Can't Achieve -The specific things that I believe the team probably can't achieve.

Give people 15 minutes to write their Post-its and emphasise that you want people to be truthful. It is not about people pretending they think the team can achieve certain things or telling others they are wrong in their views.

Later you will build on what people have in common and set the future direction. For the moment, invite each person to do this exercise.

Beliefs

Can Achieve. The specific things I believe the team can achieve are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Maybe Can Achieve. The specific things I believe the team maybe can achieve are:

* To ...

* To ...

Can't Achieve. The specific things I believe the team probably can't achieve are:

* To ...

When people have finished, invite each person to go up in turn and put their Post-it Notes under the respective headings. Ask people to give examples regarding what they have written.

Looking at what people have written, begin clarifying the team's shared beliefs. Facilitate a discussion around the main headings.

The discussion is to be conducted in a spirit of enquiry, rather than telling people they must believe. Make provisional agreements about what comes under each of the headings. You can then move on to the next stage.

Clarifying The Team's Shared Beliefs

Imagine that you have completed the earlier exercise. It is now time to agree on the shared beliefs. When doing this it can be useful to explore the following themes.

What are the things that people believe we can achieve? Do we have the ability to translate these into doing the basics and delivering brilliant results?

If we do not have the ability, what can we do to increase the chances of success? Do we need:

To recruit more people who can help us to achieve the goal;

To be more selective and focus on fewer things that we believe we can achieve;

To make sure we have the support required to achieve the goals?

Finally, are there any ways we can convert some of the 'maybe can achieve' column into the 'can achieve' column?

Imagine you have had a discussion on these themes. You can then complete the following exercise.

The Team's Shared Beliefs

The specific things we believe the team can achieve are:

* To ...

For example:

To ...

* To ...

For example:

To ...

Brilliance – Clarifying The Team's Picture Of Success

Great teams are made-up of people who believe they can achieve a particular goal. If there are people in the team who do not share this belief, then there are two options. You either get people who share the belief or you can change the goals.

Let's assume that you are happy with what you believe the team can achieve. The next steps will be:

To clarify people's view of brilliance;

To clarify the real results they will have delivered by a certain date that will show they have done the basics and added the brilliance;

To translate this view of brilliance into the team's picture of success.

Imagine that the team has created a provisional picture of success. You can take it away and, perhaps with a few key people, do a reality check. When doing so, it can be useful to explore the following questions.

Bearing in mind what we can control, what are the chances of delivering this picture of success? How would we rate the chances on a scale 0-10?

What can we do to improve the rating? Do we need to add people, move people around or replace people? Do we need extra resources? What can we do to increase the chances of success to 8+/10?

You and the team will have your own approach to clarifying and finalising the picture of success. Whatever approach you use, it may resemble something like the following framework.

Brilliance – The Team’s Picture Of Success

The specific things we want to have delivered by ... are:

1) To ...

For example:

To ...

2) To ...

For example:

To ...

3) To ...

For example:

To ...

The Basics

Great teams focus on what they believe they can achieve. They then keep doing the basics required to achieve their goals.

Different teams will, of course, need to perform different basics to reach their desired goals. The principles they follow will depend on whether they work in sports, business, hospitality, medical care, therapy, technology or whatever.

Great teams implement the right principles with the right people in the right way. So it is vital to ensure you have the right people in the right places. You then stand a much greater chance of building a successful team.

How can you encourage people to keep doing the basics? One approach is to supervise the tasks. But this often has only a short-term effect.

Another approach is to manage by outcomes. You can explain the team's goals – the outcomes it must deliver – and then involve people in clarifying the basics.

This was the approach was taken by one leader I worked with who helped his team to focus on the basics and the brilliance. The leader explained what happened in the following way.

"One year ago my team was in a difficult state. Some people were in love with doing the attractive stuff but they did not pay enough attention to the basics.

"This meant I spent lots of time supervising their tasks. This wasn't sustainable in the long term, so I made some key decisions.

"First, I decided who might be able to deliver the required professional standards.

"Looking at each person in turn, I rated their potential on a scale 0–10. I kept the people who had the attitude and ability to reach 7+/10 and replaced those who didn't.

"Two left because they had a poor attitude, one because their skills just did not fit. This was difficult, but it was necessary for the team.

"We also did our best to help people to move on in a good way. This approach sounds tough, but the alternative was to continue supervising people. This would not benefit anybody.

"Second, I then involved everybody in clarifying the basics and the brilliance.

"Gathering people together, I shared the overall goal. Each person was invited to write Post-it Notes regarding what they saw as the basics that must be done to deliver the goods.

"People went up in turn and put these on a flip chart. Eventually we agreed on what must be done to deliver the basics."

During the 1980s I used this exercise with teams of talented young footballers. Believing they were super stars, the individual players often did their own thing. But success called for them combining their talents as a team.

When using this exercise with one team, they agreed on the following principles that everybody should follow.

Be Positive

Take responsibility ... Keep ourselves fit ... Arrive on time for training and all meetings ... Encourage each other.

Play Positive Football

Be calm ... Take control of the game ... Keep following the team's game plan ... Keep moving and helping our teammates ... Accept the referee's decisions.

Get Positive Results

Keep doing our best ... Keep overcoming setbacks ... Keep improving as people and as players ... Be good ambassadors for the club.

Battling Qualities

Great workers may also sometimes need to show battling qualities. They may need to show fighting spirit, drive and resilience on the way towards achieving their goals.

Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at two approaches to showing battling qualities – the spiritual approach and the soldier approach.

Some people behave in an almost spiritual way when aiming to do their best. They often have a core set of beliefs that they apply in a calm and clear way when tackling challenges.

Such people sometimes go into flow mode – rather than fight or flight mode – when dealing with tough situations. Buying time to think, they aim:

To clarify the real results they want to achieve;

To clarify the potential options for going forward – together with the pluses and minuses of each option;

To clarify the option they want to pursue and how they can do this in, as far as possible, in a positive way.

Such people often rehearse pursuing their chosen option. They rehearse what they plan to do and, when appropriate, what they plan to say in the situation. They then move into action and do their best to achieve positive results.

Some people behave in a more soldier-like way. They may summon all their energy, be belligerent and move into action. This approach can have pluses and minuses.

Sometimes it is necessary to act quickly to deal with threatening crises. It may be vital to stop the haemorrhaging, pull the plane out of a dive or take other drastic action. There are times, however, when acting in an impulsive soldier-like way can cause even more problems.

Some people may also combine elements of being spiritual and soldier-like. They are calm, clear but also act decisively when necessary. The key is for people to harness their spirit in a way that is required to deliver the desired results.

You will have your own method for helping a team to focus on doing the basics and demonstrating battling qualities. If you wish, however, you can adopt the following approach.

Start by reminding people of the things that they believe the team can achieve. Bearing these themes in mind, ask people to explore how they can translate these beliefs into action.

You can follow the approach mentioned earlier. Invite people to write Post-it Notes describing what they believe people in the team can do to always deliver the basics and demonstrate battling qualities. Here is the exercise.

The Team's Basics

The specific things we can do to always deliver the basics and, when necessary, demonstrate battling qualities are:

* To ...

For example:

To ...

* To ...

For example:

To ...

The Brilliance

Great teams keep doing the basics and then, when appropriate, add the brilliance. Different teams do this in different ways. The leader mentioned earlier explained his approach in the following way.

"I asked my team to focus on adding that touch of class. Looking back, I gave concrete examples regarding when people had taken this step.

"Frequently they had done things that were a win-win. They had created a win for the customer and a win for the company.

"Sometimes the touch of class had been a creative breakthrough. Sometimes it had been providing a great piece of customer service.

"Frequently it involved people showing the personal touch and helping our customers to succeed. This made the customers more likely to do business with us in the future.

"Each person was invited to describe how we could add that touch of class in the future. People wrote their Post-it Notes and put them on a flip chart.

"Many of the ideas involved getting close to customers, understanding their agendas and doing that bit extra. We then agreed on the ways people could add that touch of class in the future."

Paul Landau followed some of these principles when creating the company called Careology. Here is their story.

When my wife was diagnosed with cancer, I watched her go through six months of gruelling chemo, consume thousands of pills (and often struggle to remember if she had taken them), contend with two neutropenic infections, and endless blood transfusions, biopsies, scans, and appointments ... the list goes on!

I was struck that despite being seriously unwell, she didn't want to be a nuisance. She became so sick of being sick that we would regularly hold debates over whether she really had to let her nurses know about the side effects she was suffering, because she didn't want to go back to hospital for more prodding.

Fifteen years of consumer health-tech experience meant I couldn't help but spot the clear opportunity to support people going through treatment by creating great software and wearable tech, providing greater control and useful tools to help deal with the raft of things that need managing.

I wanted to connect people with a cancer diagnosis to their family and friends, and to their clinicians, to give peace of mind that if something needs attention, the people that matter know about it quickly and can act proactively, before things become more severe. Careology was born.

Careology empowers people living and dealing with cancer to feel in control of their care

The technology is designed to help patients stay on top of every aspect of treatment, with a complete record of symptoms, medications, side effects, appointments and general notes - all in one place.

Virtual support is provided whenever needed, with patients able to check symptoms in real-time, receiving personalised content from our charity partners, which is pulled through an API.

When symptoms may require medical attention, the technology prompts the patient to contact their healthcare provider. Patients can also nominate family and friends to receive status updates, allowing caregivers to give the required support.

Beauty

Great workers sometimes go beyond doing brilliant work. They may also aim to make it beautiful. Beauty can lift the spirit and the soul. Beauty can show what people can do when they perform at their best.

Different people create beauty in different ways. Some follow the principles of great design. They aim to create something that is simple, satisfying and successful.

It is simple but in a profound way. It is satisfying on both an aesthetic and practical level. It is successful. It works and helps people to get positive results.

Imagine you lead a team. How can you encourage people to add the brilliance and, when appropriate, the beauty? How can they add that touch of class and maybe make people's hearts sing?

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for people to do what they believe in, do the basics and then add the brilliance. You will, of course, follow this approach in your own way.

If you wish, invite the people in your team to tackle the final exercise on these themes. Invite them to describe the specific things they can do to add the brilliance and maybe even the beauty. You can then encourage people to keep doing brilliant work.

The Right Strategy Approach

Great teams implement the right strategy, with the right people in the right way. This is more likely to produce the right results.

(In this case I am using the word 'right' to denote something that works and gets the desired results rather using it in a judgemental way.)

Imagine you are leading the team you work in at the moment. Let's explore how you can pursue these themes in your own way.

The Right Strategy

Such teams clarify which mountain they want to climb. They also make sure they are climbing the right mountain. They sometimes do this by taking the following steps.

They clarify their strengths;

They clarify their perfect customers and the challenges such people they face;

They clarify how they can use their strengths to help their customers to achieve success.

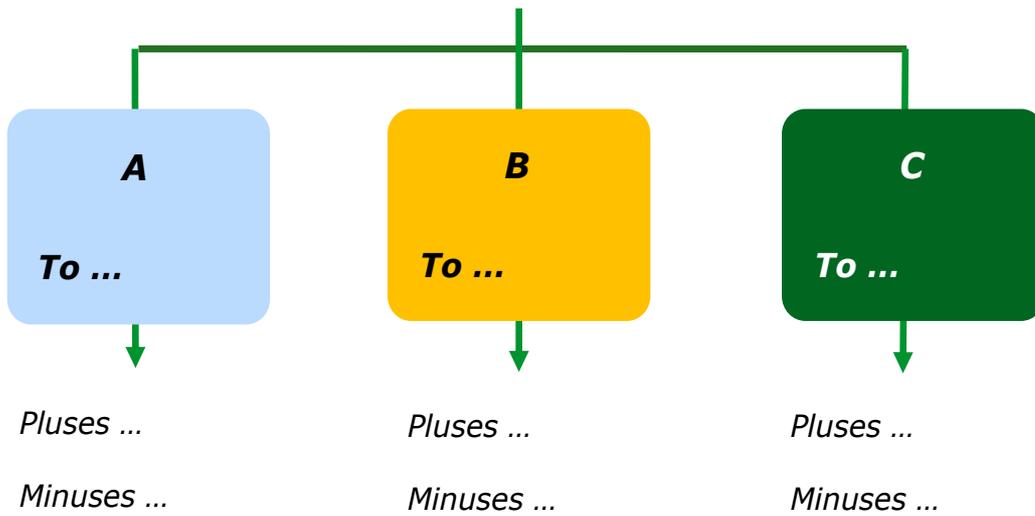

Great teams clarify the possible strategies – the routes forward – they can pursue in the future. They clarify the pluses and minuses of each route together with the attractiveness of each option.

After a period of reflection, they settle on their chosen strategy. Such teams complete the following exercise.

The Team's Possible Strategies

The possible routes the team could follow in the future are:

The attractiveness of each option is:

___ / 10

___ / 10

___ / 10

The Team's Chosen Strategy

The team's strategy for going forward is:

The reasons we have chosen to pursue this strategy are:

Good leaders often communicate this strategy to their people. Why? The employees must be able to explain to new joiners why the team has chosen to pursue a specific strategy.

Such leaders also communicate the game plan. They explain the What, Why, How, Who and When by covering the following points.

The What. The specific goals we are aiming to achieve are:

The Why. The specific benefits of achieving the goals will be:

The How. The key strategies we will follow to achieve the goals are:

Looking at the team you work in at the moment, to what extent do you believe it has the right strategy? Rate this on a scale 0 – 10. What are the specific things it can do to maintain or improve this score?

The Right People

Great teams employ people who have the right attitude and ability. They then put these people in the places where they are most likely to deliver the right results.

There are many models for getting the right people. The following pages explore some of these approaches.

The Positive, Professional And Peak Performers Approach

Imagine that you lead your present team. What are the qualities you want your people to demonstrate?

One approach is to employ people who aim to be positive, professional and peak performers. Let's explore how you can identify whether the people in your team demonstrate these qualities.

Positive

Start by looking at each person in your team or those you want to hire. Ask yourself the following questions.

Do they have a positive attitude? Do they generate positive energy? Do they encourage other people? How do people feel after meeting them?

Do they take responsibility? Do they use volunteer language, saying that they want to make things happen? Or do they use victim language, saying that things happen to them?

Do they look for positive solutions to challenges? When appropriate, do they try to find win-win solutions to conflicts? Are they resilient? Do they rebound from setbacks?

On a scale 0 - 10, to what extent would I rate the person as being positive: a) towards customers; b) towards colleagues?

Some employees can behave superbly with customers, for example, but may be difficult with colleagues. Great team members recognise that it is important to be positive with both groups.

Looking at each person in turn, rate them in both areas. Then describe what they can do to maintain or improve the ratings. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Positive

The name of the person is ...

The extent to which the person is positive towards customers and colleagues is:

Customers ____ / 10

Colleagues ____ / 10

The specific things the person can do to maintain or improve the ratings are:

*

Professional

Being positive is a good start, but it is also important for the team members to be competent. They need to support other people and deliver high professional standards.

Bearing this in mind, look at each person in turn and ask the following questions.

Do they behave professionally? Are they customer focused? Do they deliver good service to their external and internal customers? Do they produce good quality work?

Are they self-managing? Are they proactive? Do they make clear contracts with people? Do they meet their promises? Do they want to improve?

Are they good at decision making? When making a decision, do they clarify the real results to achieve? Do they explore the possible options? Do they see the consequences of each option? Do they then make good decisions?

Are they good at proactively managing their key stakeholders? What are the words that their key stakeholders – their managers, customers and colleagues – would say about them?

On a scale 0 - 10, to what extent would I rate the person as being professional: a) towards customers: b) towards colleagues?

Rate them in both areas and then describe what they can do to maintain or improve the ratings. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Professional

The name of the person is ...

The extent to which the person behaves in a professional way towards customers and colleagues is:

Customers ____ / 10

Colleagues ____ / 10

*The specific things the person can do
to maintain or improve the ratings are:*

Peak Performing

What we are looking at is the extent to which a person consistently delivers 8+/10. They may do this by always being professional and then, when appropriate, deliver peak performances.

Great teams are made up of people who continually do superb work and then rise to the occasion when it matters. They may do this when providing great service, managing crises or doing exceptional work.

Bearing these things in mind, ask yourself the following questions about a person.

Do they consistently deliver 8+/10? When do they do work that is effective, excellent and sometimes exceptional? When do they go that extra mile and add that touch of class?

What are their strengths? What are the specific activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? How can they use these to make their best contribution to the team?

If this was my own business – and my own money - would I employ this person? If so, what would I hire them to deliver? What would be the benefits to the team?

On a scale 0 - 10, to what extent do I rate the person regarding them to, when appropriate, delivering peak performances: a) when working with customers: b) when working with colleagues?

Rate the person in both areas and then describe what they can do to maintain or improve the ratings. Here is the exercise on this theme.

Peak Performing

The name of the person is ...

The extent to which, when appropriate, the person delivers peak performances with customers and colleagues is:

Customers ____ / 10

Colleagues ____ / 10

*The specific things the person can do
to maintain or improve the ratings are:*

Imagine that you have done these ratings. What are the kinds of scores are you looking for? It can be useful to have people who score the following in each area.

Being Positive: 8+. This is vital because the way they behave will affect other people.

Being Professional: 7+. This is providing they are willing to keep developing.

Being A Peak Performer: 7+. This is providing they are willing to use their talents to the benefit of the team.

One leader explained how he had used this approach when focusing on some of his team.

"The part I found most useful was rating one of my key players in relation to both customers and colleagues.

"He was superb with clients, but terrible with team members. He dismissed people's opinions and moaned aloud in the office.

"So I gave him the option of: a) choosing to be professional towards team members, or; b) carrying on being unprofessional and, as a result, being moved on from the team.

"After a period of reflection, he chose to be professional towards his colleagues. Since then he has been true to his word, but I am not taking any chances.

"So I have visited his customers, introduced them to other team members and have a back-up plan in case he reverts to his old behaviour."

It can be good to have team members who aim to be positive, professional and peak performers. This provides the basis for continuing to build a superb team.

Great leaders often follow this approach in their own ways. The Fast Company magazine published an article that described how film directors apply this approach.

The director sets the direction – such as the purpose, principles and picture of success. But they then make sure they have the right people in the right places. Here is an excerpt from the article.

Directing Is 90% Casting

Hollywood film industry veterans will sometimes tell you that "directing is 90% casting."

The secret of being a great Director is fielding a team of talented people who don't really need much coaching to deliver a solid performance.

Great directors have the ability to bring out the best in their teams, often with a contagious enthusiasm that spurs individuals and project groups to extraordinary achievements.

Directors in business and in film have the mantle of authority. But the best ones are content to let others take center-stage.

They are confident in the knowledge that their behind-the-scenes work will make the whole production come together.

Let's return to your own work. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Building A Positive Team

The specific things I can do to build a team of people who are positive, professional and peak performers are:

The specific benefits of building such a team will be:

The Decision Makers, Drivers And Deliverers Approach

Great teams get the right balance of decision makers, drivers and deliverers. Decision makers set the strategy. Drivers act as the gears and translate the strategy into action. Deliverers produce the goods.

People may move between all these roles at times but it is important to get the right balance in your team. Let's explore these different roles.

Decision Makers

Decision makers set the compass and communicate the team's direction. Different people communicate this to their people in different ways. Some describe the following themes.

Decision Makers

- They Describe The Destination

They communicate the team's destination – the picture of success – and the benefits of reaching the destination.

- They Describe The Dos And Don'ts For Reaching The Destination

They communicate the Dos and Don'ts – the guidelines – it will be important for people to follow to work towards the destination. They describe the reasons for these guidelines.

- They Invite People To Decide If They Want To Contribute Towards Reaching The Destination

They say something like: "Take time to reflect. Let us know if you want to use your strengths to follow the guidelines and work towards reaching the destination?"

Good teams frequently have two or three people at the centre who take responsibility for setting the overall direction. They often involve other key people, however, to ensure they have a real sense of ownership in terms of setting and implementing the strategy.

Imagine you are applying some of these ideas to the team in which you work at the moment. Ask yourself the following questions.

Who are the good strategic decision makers in the team at the moment? How can they continue to make good decisions and, when appropriate, communicate these clearly to the whole team?

Who are the people in the team who could become good strategic decision makers? How can we help them to continue to develop their decision making skills?

Will we at any point need to add any more strategic decision makers? Where might we find such people? What could we then do to ensure they embody the team's spirit and also add to the team?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the good strategic decision makers you already have in the team – write their names. Describe the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, develop or add more good strategic decision makers.

Decision Makers

The good strategic decision makers we already have in the team are:

*

The specific things we can do to, if appropriate, develop or add more strategic decision makers are:

*

Drivers

Drivers are the gears of the team. They act as positive models and often lead smaller teams within the whole team. They translate the strategy into action and ensure their people deliver results.

Such a driver approaches the leader and says something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, the strategy of the overall team is: To ..."

"My team's part in making the strategy happen is: To ..."

"Is that correct? Right, I will go and make it happen."

Leaders must make sure that all their direct reports embody these qualities. Otherwise they will leapfrog them and micro-manage the deliverers.

Great sports teams, for example, recruit drivers to form the spine of the team. Spurring-on their teammates, they ensure the strategy is translated into action. How does this work in your team?

Good drivers act as positive models. They keep reminding their people of the team's purpose and principles. They then manage by outcomes and enable their people to deliver the desired picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the good drivers you already have in the team – write their names. Describe the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, develop or add more good drivers.

Drivers

The good drivers we already have in the team are:

The specific things we can do to, if appropriate, develop or add more drivers are:

Deliverers

Deliverers are often doers who take responsibility. They make clear working contracts, do superb work and keep others informed about their progress. Good finishers in their areas of expertise, they make sure that things get done.

Some deliverers go on to become drivers, but this calls for adding to their repertoire of skills. They need to act as positive models and develop their skills as coordinators.

Some deliverers therefore prefer to remain as brilliant niche providers. This is okay: providing they have a positive attitude, do good work and contribute to helping the team reach its goals.

Good leaders know the strengths of their people. They know where each person is likely to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. They therefore aim to put the right people in the right places. This makes it more likely that people will deliver the goods.

Great teams get the right balance of decision makers, drivers and deliverers. As mentioned earlier, however, sometimes each person may play each of these roles when doing certain kinds of work.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the good deliverers you already have in the team – write their names. Describe the specific things you can do to, if appropriate, develop or add more good deliverers.

already have in the team are:*

The Rebuilding The Team Approach

“But it is so difficult to get the right people,” somebody may say. Maybe, but it is even more difficult working with the wrong people in the wrong places.

There is a much-quoted principle regarding government: “Personnel is policy.” The personal beliefs and qualities of the key people will have a profound influence in the way the policies are implemented.

Imagine that you have a blank piece of paper to rebuild your present team. Imagine also that everybody in the team has left and reapplied to join. Let's explore how you can revitalise your team.

The Rebuilding The Team Approach

Imagine you had a blank piece of paper and could rebuild the team. Looking at the people, try answering the following questions.

- Who are the people that you would definitely rehire? What would you do to encourage them to play to their strengths? What are the specific things you would rehire them to deliver?
- Who are the people that you would maybe rehire? What would you rehire them to deliver? What would be the working contracts you would make with these people?
- Who are the people that you would not rehire? What would you do to behave toward them in a moral and professional way and help them to move on?
- Who are the kinds of people that you would add to the team? What would you do to hire these people and enable them to make their best contributions to the team?

You need people who have a positive attitude and who aim to do professional work. Otherwise you may spend time dealing with people issues rather than working towards achieving the picture of success.

Clarify the people that you would definitely rehire

Who are the people that you would definitely rehire? Bearing in mind their strengths, what would you rehire each of these people to deliver? How would you make clear contracts with them about their contributions to the team?

You will have your own criteria for making these decisions. Here are the headlines of a response that one leader gave to these questions.

"I know exactly the people that I would rehire. There are several people that form the backbone of the team.

"Mary, the Operations Director, who makes things work. Sarah, the Sales Director, who is brilliant with certain kinds of clients. Dave, the Human Resources Director, who focuses on how people can use their strengths to implement the strategy.

"Looking at the next level, there are at least five people I would rehire immediately, two of whom could step into the leadership team.

"There are also fine people on Reception and in charge of Facilities. Looking overall, I would rehire about 60% of our people. They provide the backbone for the company."

Imagine you lead your team. Who are the people you would definitely rehire? How would you encourage them to play to their strengths?

The next step would be to make clear contracts with them about their best contribution. You could agree with them on:

The specific results they will deliver that will contribute towards achieving the team's goals.

The specific support they need to achieve the agreed goals.

The specific things they will do to proactively keep you informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this topic. This invites you to write the names of each person you would rehire and complete the following sentences.

The People I Would Definitely Rehire

The person's name is:

*The specific things I would do
to rehire them to deliver are:*

The specific things I would do to encourage and enable them to deliver these results are:

Clarify the people that you would maybe rehire

Who are the people you would maybe rehire? Bearing in mind their strengths, what would you maybe rehire them to deliver?

What is the attitude you would like them to demonstrate? What are the professional standards – the Dos and Don'ts – you would like them to bear in mind when contributing to the team? How can you give them these messages in a positive but clear way?

How can you then give them chance to reflect and decide if they want to follow these professional guidelines? If they want to opt in, how can you then make clear contracts with them about their best contribution to the team?

You will have your own criteria for making these decisions. Here is the response that the leader mentioned earlier gave to these questions.

"There are one or two people I might rehire, but a lot would depend on their attitude. The leaders of our IT department, for example, must become more customer-focused.

"During the early days we just had a couple of people who took care of the internal systems. At the time they were contractors and really put in the hours. As the business grew, we offered them the chance to lead the department on a full-time basis, which they grabbed straight away.

"Since then the IT department has grown, but the leaders have become locked into their systems, rather than serving the internal customers.

"I might rehire the two original people, because they are talented. But I will invite them to decide if they want to show the commitment they did when working as suppliers.

"For example, I want them to deliver a service where our people say things like:

'The IT department provides great service that helps us to do our jobs ... They are responsive and sort out problems quickly ... They help us to get up to speed quickly with the newest technology ... They are the best IT department I have worked with in any company.'

"I will give them the chance to decide if they want to get these kinds of responses from our people. If so, I will invite them to produce a plan to ensure they achieve these goals. I will give them a deadline by which this plan should be produced, but I won't chase them.

"If they do not get back to me by the agreed date - or if they produce a plan but fail to deliver the goods - then that is their choice. I will find people who are prepared to deliver the required professional standards."

Imagine that you have clarified how you would maybe rehire. The next step would be to make clear contracts with them about their best contribution. You could agree with them on:

The specific results they will deliver that will contribute towards achieving the team's goals.

The specific professional standards required to make their best contribution to the team.

The specific support they need to achieve the agreed goals.

The specific things they will do to proactively keep you informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this topic. This invites you to write the names of each person you would maybe rehire and how you would encourage them to deliver the desired results.

The People I Would Maybe Rehire

The person's name is:

*The specific things I would do
to rehire them to deliver are:*

The specific things I would do to encourage and enable them to deliver these results are:

Clarify the people that you would not rehire

Who are the people you would not rehire? What are the reasons why you would not rehire these people? How could you manage these situations in a moral and professional way?

Different leaders give different reasons for not rehiring certain people. Here are some that they offer.

"They have the wrong attitude. They have crafted a role that suits them, but it does not add value to the company."

"They rose quickly in the company and got a great financial package. Now the company has changed and we need different things from a person at their level. But they want to carry on doing the same things and drawing a high salary."

"They are high-maintenance. They expect the company to satisfy all their needs rather than them taking responsibility for making their best contribution to the company."

Imagine you have clarified the people you would not rehire. The next step is to handle the situation in a professional way.

Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to make sure all the legal areas are covered and also to be generous in any package you offer a person.

If appropriate, you may then write a script you want to follow when talking with the person. This may include the following messages.

"As you know, the team faces many challenges as it moves forward. This means that people will need to demonstrate certain qualities to be the right fit with what is required."

"The characteristics that people will need to demonstrate in the future in order to help the team achieve success are:"

"Whilst you have certain qualities, unfortunately the ones you have do not fit with what is needed in the future team. We will, of course, offer you the best available package to move on."

"I am prepared to answer any questions you have about this decision. Also, we will provide as much support as we can in helping to make the transition easier for you and the team."

"If you want to reflect for a while, please do so. I will then answer any questions you have regarding the next steps for moving forwards."

Imagine that you have given a person these kinds of messages. If the person asks for more information about the decision, it is important to be able to give specific reasons.

You can, for example, describe the positive qualities the person would need to have demonstrated. So you may say something like:

"The professional attitude and standards that people need to demonstrate in the future team are:

"You have certain qualities, but unfortunately have not shown the ones we require in the future. Therefore it is probably not the right fit for you or for the team."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this topic. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People I Would Not Rehire

The person's name is:

The specific reasons why I would not rehire them are:

The specific things I would do to manage the situation in a moral and professional way are:

Clarify the people that you may want to add to the team

If you wish, clarify the kinds of people you may want to add to the team. One approach is to start by asking yourself the following questions.

*What are the individual and collective strengths we have in the team?
What are the strengths that we need to add? How can we do our best to hire people who will add those strengths?*

Imagine, for example, that you have many people who are entrepreneurial or experts. They have lots of ideas, but sometimes their efforts are not aligned. You may need to add several good coordinators. They will make sure that people align their efforts and get the work done.

Good leaders are like good sports coaches. They spend a lot of time looking for potential hires. Aiming to get ahead of the game - rather than being left in the lurch - they fill the recruitment pipeline with people who might want to work in their team.

The General Manager of one hotel chain I worked with, for example, took notice of people who gave him good service on his travels. If appropriate, he would hand them his card and say something like the following.

"You gave us great service today. If you are ever interested in developing your career, let me know. Drop me an email and we can have an informal chat over coffee."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this topic. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The People I Would Like To Add

The specific kinds of people I would like to add to the team are:

The specific things I can do to find these people and then make clear contracts about their contributions to the team are:

Clarify the specific things that you can do to rebuild the team

How can you translate these ideas into action? One person explained this approach in the following way.

"I do this exercise every year and act on it. At first it seemed a bit scary, but that was because there was so much to sort out.

"It took six months to get the team right, but now it functions brilliantly. Nevertheless, I still do the exercise to ensure we stay on track."

Imagine that you have done the previous exercises. Bearing in mind the decisions you have made about people you may want to take the following steps.

You can rehearse the conversations you are going to have with each person

This is vital. Make sure you are crystal clear on the key messages you want to give to: a) the people you definitely would rehire; b) the people you maybe would rehire; c) the people you would not rehire; d) the people you want to add to the team.

You can rehearse how to make clear contracts with the people who will be in the future team

This will involve agreeing on the results they will deliver and the support needed to achieve the goals. Looking ahead at the different types of conversations, anticipate the potential challenges. Rehearse how you can deal with these in a professional way.

The Interviewing Approach

There are many models for advertising roles and interviewing people. There are different ways of posting such a role.

Some organisations still list all the tasks that the person should be good at doing. Another approach is to focus on the qualities you want people to demonstrate and the outcomes you want them to deliver.

There are many ways to advertise such a role. Here is one approach that can be used when, for example, looking for a HR Manager. The wording can obviously be changed when posting other roles.

HR Manager

We are looking for a positive and professional HR Manager who believes in helping people to build on their strengths and do superb work. Are you somebody:

Who would love to work in a pacesetting company that has a clear purpose;

Who wants follow our principles of building partnerships, providing great service and helping people to achieve success;

Who has experience of recruiting and helping knowledge workers to perform at their best;

Who can work with key stakeholders and help them to achieve success;

Who has the required qualifications and the other qualities needed to build and maintain a superb HR function in a pacesetting company?

If so, please contact us. We can then give you more details about the results we would like somebody in this role to deliver.

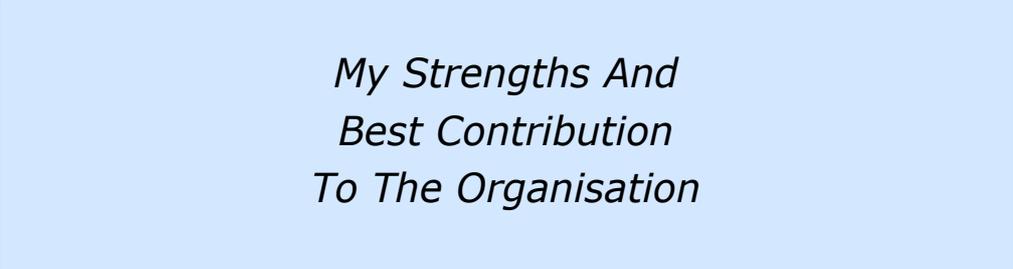

Imagine that several candidates have applied for a role. There are many ways to interview people. Let's consider one approach.

The Prewrite Approach

This involves inviting a person to do some prework before the interview. When taking this approach, it can be useful to send the person some information on: a) the organisation's goals; b) the organisation's values.

You can then ask them to do the following exercises. (These are similar to those described elsewhere in the book.)

This is an approach that I have used many times. The way that the person tackles the exercises can provide clues about their character. Here are the exercises. You can, of course, adapt these in your own way.

My Strengths And Best Contribution To The Organisation

Introduction

The following slides invite you to clarify your best contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals.

We appreciate that it will take you some time to do this exercise but it can be useful to do this before the interview. When doing it, bear in mind the organisation's goals – we can explain more about these if you wish.

Also bear in mind the values we try to follow in our work. You will find more information about these in the organisation's cultural handbook that we have sent to you.

Two points are worth bearing in mind when doing the exercise.

First, try to be honest as possible when doing it. Second, do the exercise to the extent to which you feel able with the information that you have available.

Describe your strengths – the activities in which you have the ability to deliver As.

Describe the deeply satisfying activities in which you have the ability to deliver As rather than Bs or Cs. These may be particular kinds of tasks, activities or projects. Try to be as specific as possible and give concrete examples.

Describe the activities in which you may deliver Bs or Cs.

The B activities are probably those that you do reasonably well. They are not your As. The C activities are those in which you have little aptitude.

Describe your best contribution towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Bearing in mind the organisation's goals and your strengths, the exercise then invites you to describe the following things.

Describe the specific results you aim to deliver towards achieving the organisation's goals.

These aims should be written in outcome terms - such as the specific results you will deliver - rather than as a list of activities. As mentioned earlier, we can give you more information about the goals and the values we aim to follow when doing our work.

Describe the specific benefits - to the various stakeholders - of delivering these results.

Describe the specific things you will do to proactively update people about your progress towards achieving the results.

Describe the specific support you would like to help you to achieve the results.

Describe specific early successes you will aim to deliver.

Some Background

We aim to build a strengths-based organisation and coordinate these strengths to reach the goal.

We must, however, deliver the organisation's goals. These are the mandatory things that people must contribute towards delivering. This will sometimes mean everybody getting involved in doing great work and helping to do the other tasks.

We want to encourage you to build on your strengths, because you are then more likely to do great work. At the same time, however, it is your responsibility to manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

We want to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Once the outcomes are agreed, we ask you to be accountable for delivering the goods. How you achieve this - providing you follow the organisation's agreed principles - is up to you and your team.

My Stakeholders

The actual words - the actual phrases - I would like my key stakeholders to be saying about my contribution after my first three months at the organisation.

Introduction

This is an old exercise that you may have done many times in service organisations but it can still be useful to do before the interview. It invites you:

To write the names of your key stakeholders both inside and outside the organisation – let us know if you want more information about whom these may be;

To describe the actual words or phrases you would like each of these stakeholders to be saying after three months about your work and what you are delivering for the organisation.

We can then explore some of the practical steps you may want to take to increase the chances of these stakeholders saying some of these things. Here is the exercise.

The CEO (only if you are reporting directly to them)

Clarifying The Results To Achieve In A Role

Let's look at a final theme regarding agreeing with a person on the results they will achieve in a particular role. Before meeting with them it can be useful to think through the following points. You may aim:

To clarify the specific results the person will need to deliver in a particular role;

To clarify whether you think the person may have the attitude and ability required to deliver these results;

To clarify whether the person may want to do the role and how it fits into them achieving their long-term career goals.

Looking at this final point, bear mind the person's overall career goals. Clarify whether they may think the role will fit with them working towards these long-term goals.

If appropriate, you can then have a conversation with the person around the following themes. Here are some of the things you may say in your own way.

The Potential Role Is ...

Results

"These are the results that somebody in this role will need to deliver. They will need:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

Responsibilities

"These are the responsibilities the person will need to make sure get covered when delivering those results.

"You may have strengths in certain areas but not necessarily in others. Bearing this in mind, we will encourage you to build on these strengths.

"If appropriate, we can get somebody who has complementary strengths to work alongside you to cover the other areas.

"At the same time, you will of course still be accountable for ensuring the overall results are delivered."

Role

"Bearing in mind your career goals, is this a role you would like to take for the next (time frame)?"

"If so, let's make clear contracts about how we can set things up so that you can succeed in the role.

You will, of course, go through these steps in your own way. You can then make clear contracts regarding the results the person will deliver in the role.

Let return to the theme of making sure you have the right people in the team. Imagine that you lead your present team. Do you have the right people in the right places in the team? What can you do to make this happen?

The Right Way

Great teams encourage, educate and enable people to implement the right strategy in the right way. People can then keep delivering high professional standards on the way towards achieving the right results.

Imagine you lead your present team. Let's assume you have communicated the purpose, principles and picture of success. Everybody has also made clear contracts about their best contributions. You can then aim:

To make sure that every team member has the support required to do the job;

To hold monthly update sessions where each person presents the following;

a) the things they have done in the last month towards achieving the goals;

b) the things they plan to do in the next month towards achieving the goals;

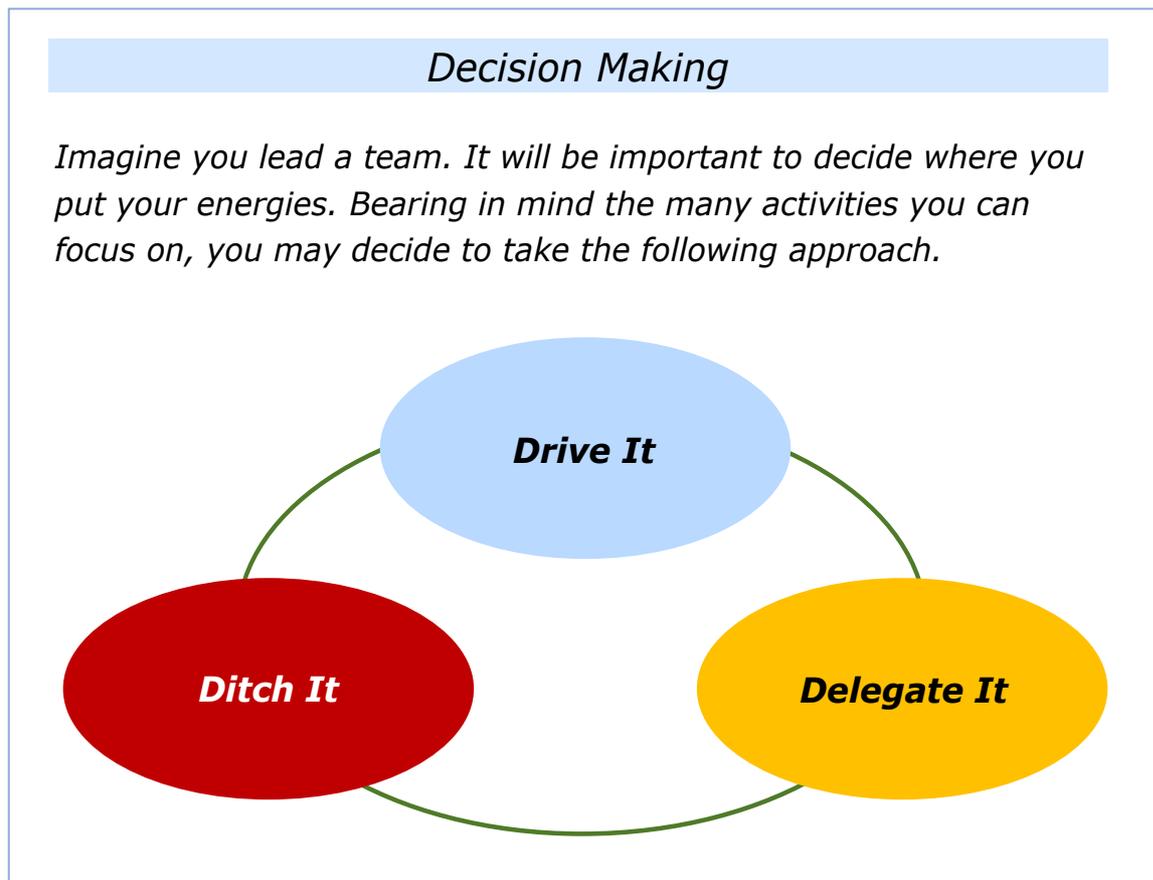

c) the challenges they face, their strategies for tackling these challenges and the support they need to reach the goals;

To keep publishing success stories that highlight when people have performed superb work and how the team can follow these principles in the future;

You can also encourage people to embody the concept of continuous improvement and do what is necessary to ensure the team delivers success.

Let's explore another theme regarding making your best contribution.

The Drive It, Delegate It And Ditch It Approach

Good leaders aim to drive the key strategies for helping the team to achieve success. They manage their energy properly and aim to be selective to be effective.

Sounds simple in theory, but sometimes the leader's diary gets crowded as they take on more things to do. One leader described this in the following way.

"My 'To Do' list is full and there are only so many jobs I can tackle. My days should be spent driving strategy, but they get consumed by catching-up on tasks.

"I only have so much energy, so it is important to channel this into the activities that will make a real difference. Sometimes at the end of a day it is hard to know what I have achieved."

Imagine that you lead your team. How can you be effective? Start by listing the things that must be done to deliver the picture of success.

Divide these into three headings: Drive It, Delegate It, Ditch It. Then work through the following steps.

Drive It

Looking at the 'To Do' list, start by describing the things that you personally want to drive. The leader mentioned above explained their approach to doing this in the following way.

"I am clear on our team's goals. I am also clear on the three key strategies we can follow to achieve that goal. I plan to take responsibility for the top two strategies.

"The first strategy is to continually manage and reassure our key stakeholders – my bosses and the banks – by delivering the required profitability.

"The second strategy is to build and maintain a culture in which people can deliver peak performance.

"I will take a hands-on approach to making these two strategies happen. This will also involve working with the right people to ensure we deliver the required results."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind your 'To Do' list, this invites you to do the following. Describe the specific things you want to take responsibility for driving and how you can make these happen.

Drive It

The specific things I want to drive to help the team deliver the picture of success are:

The specific steps I can take to drive these things are:

Delegate It

Looking at your 'To Do' list, move on to the things you want to delegate. Delegation sounds easy in theory, but it is vital to do the following things.

To describe the specific outcomes that are required – the picture of success;

To delegate to people who are capable of delivering these outcomes – otherwise you will be spending your time micromanaging them;

To check they have understood the required outcomes – by asking them to play back their understanding – and make sure they want to do the job.

To give them the support required and how they will proactively keep you informed of their progress towards achieving the goals.

The leader mentioned above explained their approach in the following way.

"Looking at our key strategies, I decide to delegate our approach to developing a successful digital arm.

"Certainly I was still accountable for the results, but my Chief Technology Officer was more than capable of making it happen.

"We made clear contracts about the desired outcome, the support required and how they would proactively keep me informed about the progress toward achieving the goal.

"This meant I could sleep more easily at night."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind your 'To Do' list, this invites you to do the following.

Describe the specific things you want to delegate and how you can delegate these properly.

Delegate It

The specific things I want to delegate are:

The specific steps I can take to delegate these things properly are:

*

Ditch It

Looking at your 'To Do' list, describe the things you want to ditch. It will also be important to describe how to manage the consequences of ditching these.

The leader mentioned earlier described their approach in the following way.

"I find it easy to ditch things in theory, but it is more difficult in practise.

"I start out with good intentions, but then get guilty about neglecting certain activities. So I often end up doing these things anyway.

"Bearing this in mind, I gathered my leadership team and we focused on the following things.

"The key strategies we could follow and how we could deliver these successfully.

"The specific things we wanted to ditch – the tasks, projects and other activities – because these were time consuming and did not contribute greatly to achieving the goals.

"The specific things we could do to manage the consequences of ditching these things.

"The discussion became heated at times because it sometimes involved pet projects, but we got there in the end.

"Ditching some activities also had implications for some of our stakeholders.

"Bearing this in mind, I spent quite a lot of time meeting these people and, where appropriate, provided alternative solutions.

"The ditching process eventually went well. It freed up more time for implementing the key strategies and achieving success."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the 'To Do' list, this invites you to complete the following sentences.

Ditch It

The specific things I and the team want to ditch are:

The specific steps I and we can take to ditch these things and manage the consequences are:

This section has explored ways to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. Taking this approach increases the chances of delivering the right results.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

___ / 10

The Coordination Approach

People use different models for building great teams. Whatever model they use, however, it is vital for to coordinate people's efforts towards achieving the picture of success.

Coordinators are great orchestrators and make things work. They are often good at connecting with people and coordinating their strengths to deliver the desired concrete results.

Modern organisations recognise that coordination is crucial. Why? Getting creative people to combine their talents can be a challenging task at the best of times. Coordinators ensure that people channel their efforts towards achieving the agreed goal.

Clarity is vital. The leader's role is to communicate the purpose, principles and picture of success. The team member's role is to make clear contracts about their part in achieving the goals. People then deliver consistently high standards and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

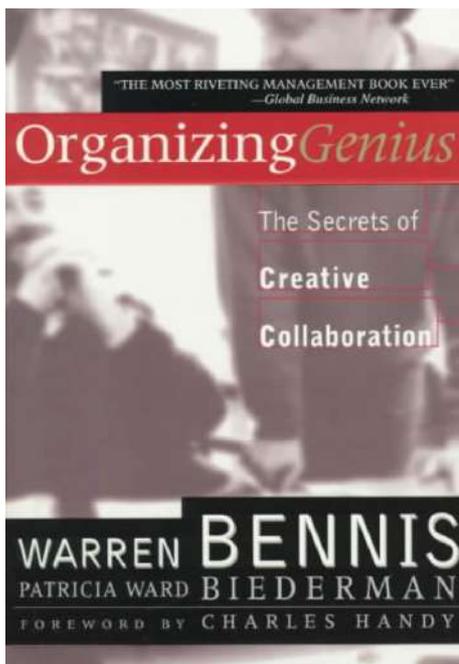

Great leadership and coordination plays a key role in all teams. Warren Bennis and Patricia Ward Bierdeman underlined these themes in their book Organizing Genius – The Secrets Of Creative Collaboration. Here is an excerpt from one summary of the book.

The authors studied six Great Groups whose work affected and sometimes changed the modern worlds.

These include the Disney organization; the Xerox Corporation's Palo Alto Research Center, which designed the first user-friendly computer and the Black Mountain College in the foothills of North Carolina, which lasted only from 1933 to 1956 but attracted many major artists.

All of these groups, the authors stress, consisted of enormously talented people with a sense of mission, who worked under a strong leader and were imbued with pragmatic optimism.

Great Groups

Warren Bennis and Patricia Ward Bierdeman studied creative teams that performed superbly.

Their book Organizing Genius described how such people collaborate to do great work.

Here are some of the principles they highlighted.

● Greatness starts with great people. Every great group has a superb leader. The leaders of great groups love talent and know where to find it.

● Great groups are full of talented people who can work together. In great groups, the right person has the right job.

● Every great group is an island, but has a bridge to the mainland. Sometimes it is a leader or other person that provides this bridge.

● Great groups are optimistic. They think they are on a mission from God or their equivalent. They often see themselves as winning underdogs.

● The leaders of great groups give their people what they need and free them from the rest. People in great groups have no distractions.

● Great groups ship. They always deliver a superb product. They also find that great work is its own reward.

Strong coordination plays a vital part in channelling people's talents towards a compelling goal - otherwise individuals may do their own thing. Let's explore how this works in practise.

Clarity

Coordinators are good at managing upwards and clarifying the real results the leader wants to achieve. They then communicate this clarity to other people in the organisation.

Sometimes this involves continuing to communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. Sometimes it may involve focusing on a specific piece of work and clarifying the real results to achieve.

Coordinators realise that sometimes the desired results can evolve. This can be the case when working with a visionary founder or leader who has lots of ideas.

Bearing this in mind, they keep in touch with the leader to confirm or develop the desired goals. Sometimes they may need to translate these new aims in ways that enable the employees to take them on board.

Coordinators may also sometimes need to provide air cover for their people. This can be necessary if other stakeholders start passing down tasks without first checking that these fit with the overall strategy.

Coordinators also encourage the leader to play to their strengths. They see their role as making sure the engine keeps running and delivers excellence. This helps the leader to feel more at ease and focus on where they excel.

Coordination

Good coordinators make things work. They often do this by harnessing people's strengths to achieve the agreed picture of success. They aim to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

They start by explaining the big picture. This is especially vital with knowledge workers who want to know the context. They then take the following steps before making clear contracts with people:

They remind people about the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

They explain where the specific piece of work fits into achieving the picture of success;

They explain the real results – the outcomes - to achieve by doing the piece of work;

They then take these steps to coordinate people's strengths.

Coordinating People's Strengths

Coordinators often focus on the following themes and ask the following questions when coordinating people's strengths to achieve the goals.

Clarifying The Picture Of Success

What are the real results – what are the outcomes - we want achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the goals?

What are the key strategies we can follow to achieve the picture of success? How can do our best to follow these strategies and achieve the picture of success?

Coordinating People's Strengths

What are people's strengths? What are the specific activities in which each person - or each team - delivers As rather than Bs or Cs? How can we coordinate people's strengths to achieve the picture of success?

What are the remaining practical tasks that must be done? How can we find creative ways to make sure these tasks are completed successfully?

Clear Contracting About People's Contributions

How can we make clear contracts with people about their contributions? How can we agree on the specific outcomes they will deliver towards achieving the picture of success? How can make sure there are mission holders who will take responsibility for delivering specific projects?

How can we build in regular coordination meetings? How can we ensure that we keep tracking our progress towards the goals? How can we ensure that people keep others informed about:

The specific things they have delivered in the past month towards achieving the picture of success;

The specific things they will deliver in the next month;

The specific challenges they face and their solutions for tackling these challenges;

The specific kinds of support they would like to help them to deliver success.

Good coordinators manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They make clear contracts with people about the contributions they will make towards achieving the picture of success.

People must be able to describe what they will deliver in outcome terms. This can be challenging because many people are used to writing lists of tasks. They describe what they are going to do rather than what they are going to deliver.

Good coordinators spend a lot of time with each team and, when appropriate, each person agreeing on the outcomes to be delivered.

Why? Because from then on virtually every performance conversation will start by concentrating on this What – the agreed outcomes – rather than getting into supervising the tasks.

After such a contracting session, here is how one team leader might describe their contribution under Profits, Products and People.

My Contribution To The Picture Of Success

Profitability

To ensure my team achieves its financial targets – a profit of £500k;

To develop three new customers and do work with them that delivers a profit of £100k;

To reduce our overheads by £100k.

Products

To ensure more than 90%+ of our customers say they are extremely satisfied with our work;

To develop two new products and pilot these successfully with customers – then launch these products by the end of the year;

To simplify two of our complex products to ensure these are more user friendly for customers - then get a further £100k's worth of orders for these before the end of the year.

People

To deliver an internal morale rating of 90%+ of our team members saying they enjoy coming to work each day;

To educate, equip and enable two of my team members to win promotion and move on to other roles in the company;

To recruit four new positive team members who take responsibility and who will contribute to helping the team to achieve success.

Coordinators set-up people to succeed. They agree on the outcomes to achieve and give people the required support. They also like to be kept informed. They ensure that people proactively update them about their progress towards achieving the goals.

Coordinators focus on the outcomes to achieve when people are faced by challenges. During the conversation, they keeps returning to the agreed What. They say something along the following lines.

Let's go back to the real results to achieve. How can we do our best to deliver those results?

What are the options going forwards? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? What is the route we want to follow? How can we follow this route and do our best to deliver the results?

Why take this approach? People can get into a pattern of talking about details. They may also confuse activity with results. Whether it concerns profits, product quality or people, the mantra is:

Let's go back to agreed outcomes. How can we do our best to deliver those results?

Coordinators sometimes need to orchestrate a constellation of stars - diverse individuals or teams - to achieve a specific goal. This is quite possible, though can sometimes be challenging. One of my clients expressed this in the following way.

"Every day here is like managing Glastonbury. We aim to deliver brilliant performances, but some people seem to on their own agenda.

"The work can be thrilling, especially when things go well, but it can also be challenging."

Great leaders often employ a good orchestrator who can coordinate people's efforts to achieve a compelling goal. Let's consider what makes a good orchestrator.

Good Orchestrators

They choose to be orchestrators. This is a vital step. They are then good at being able to get an overview and orchestrate people's strengths to achieve the desired outcomes. They often aim:

- To make clear contracts with their key stakeholders about the specific outcomes to achieve and to agree on the picture of success;
- To communicate these outcomes to their people and make clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success;
- To manage by outcomes, coordinate people's contributions and ensure they deliver high standards on the ways towards achieving the picture of success.

Such people must want to be orchestrators. This is a vital step because it can be both a rewarding and taxing role.

They are often good at being able to get an overview of the situation. They are then good at orchestrating people's strengths to achieve outstanding results.

Sometime ago I was asked to interview a person who had applied for a role as Chief Operating Officer in a knowledge organisation. Whilst the person was good operator, they needed to develop their skills as an orchestrator.

Here is an excerpt from the report I wrote for the company about the person's fit for the role. It gives some context regarding the role of the COO in a modern knowledge company.

Candidate for the Chief Operating Officer Role

Thanks for the opportunity to talk with ... The headline is this:

His suitability for the role: 7+/10.

This rating could improve as he shows a willingness to develop into being more of an orchestrator as well as doing some of the operational work.

Here is some background regarding the rating.

The Outcomes

The COO's role in a modern knowledge based firm is somewhat different from that in a traditional company. They need to be a good orchestrator who can coordinate people's talents to achieve the company's goals.

In your company it is important for a person in this role to be a custodian of the culture. They need to embody the company's principles. They also need to demonstrate the following characteristics:

To clarify and agree with the CEO on the goals for the business and, when appropriate, to add ideas to this picture of success;

To clarify and coordinate the key strategies for achieving this picture of success;

To connect with the people in the company and make clear contracts about their best contributions;

To coordinate people's strengths, manage by outcomes and enable them to achieve the company's goals;

To ensure that the company maintains high standards in delivering today's business and also shapes tomorrow's business to achieve ongoing success.

One key point is worth underlining. Whilst many potential COOs may be operators, they may not necessarily be good orchestrators.

Those who are will be worth their weight in gold. They will orchestrate your people's talents and ensure they deliver high standards on the way toward achieve the desired goals.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you are aiming to coordinate a constellation of teams, knowledge workers or talented individuals. One model that works is the framework outlined in the global-local approach. You can aim:

To keep focusing on the purpose, principles and picture of success;

To make this the guiding compass and to explain to people:

"This is the purpose, these are the principles and this is the picture of success. Take time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute. If so, then we can make clear contracts about:

"The specific contribution you want to make; the support you need; the specific things you will do to proactively keep me informed about your progress; the specific things you will deliver and by when."

One point is vital when coordinating teams. You can make clear contracts with the leader, but it is important to have a coordinator in each team.

They can make sure the plans are implemented and keep you up to date with the team's progress. You can then orchestrate everybody's efforts to achieve the picture of success.

Clear Contracting

You can make clear contracts with them – each team or each person – by saying something along the following lines.

- "This is the purpose, these are the principles and this is the picture of success.
- "Take time to reflect to decide if this is something you want to contribute towards achieving?
- "If so, let's make clear contracts about your best contribution."

It then calls for each person or each team – through its leader or its coordinator – to proactively keep you informed about their progress towards achieving the picture of success.

The Complementary Strengths Approach

The Complementary Strengths Approach

This approach starts by establishing clarity – the results to achieve. It then involves focusing on the following themes.

Good leaders hire people who want to achieve the team's goals. It can be important to recruit people:

Who embody the spirit required in the team;

Who have strengths that will contribute towards achieve the team's goals;

Who demonstrate consistently high standards and deliver the goods.

Good coordinators may have some responsibility for putting together teams. If so, it can be useful to remember that:

Great teams are often made up of combinations of people who have complementary strengths

Each team member may have specific strengths. Some of these people may work best, however, when working with others who have complementary strengths.

A visionary leader may work best with a good coordinator. A brilliant technical person may work best with a good people manager. A superb sales director may work best with a good operator who manages the day-to-day activities.

Coordinators may sometimes be able to put together such teams. This may be the case, for example, when putting together project teams.

As ever, it is important to communicate the concrete results to achieve. It then:

To put together teams of people who have complementary strengths and who want to achieve the results;

To help them to coordinate their efforts and deliver high standards;

To do everything possible to deliver the desired concrete results.

Let's consider one of the key themes to focus on when working towards the team's goals.

Consistently High Standards

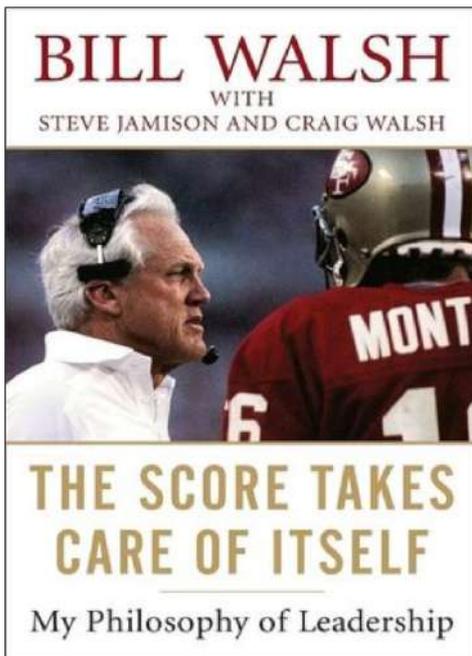

Coordinators encourage people to deliver consistently high standards. They make clear contracts with the teams and individuals about:

The specific standards they will deliver when working towards achieving the picture of success

There are many models for encouraging people to maintain high standards. One can be found in the work of Bill Walsh, the coach of the San Francisco 49ers American Football team.

Bill believed it was vital for everybody in an organisation to deliver a certain Standard of Performance. This was more important than striving for winning. He believed that, providing people consistently delivered the Standard of Performance, the score took care of itself.

Great players keep practicing their Standards of Performance until they achieve routine perfection.

They don't start hunching up, grimacing or trying to 'hit the ball harder' at critical points.

Great players aim to keep delivering the Standard of Performance. The score then takes care of itself.

Did it work? Despite not focusing on winning, his team was hailed as a dynasty.

It took two seasons - 1979 and 1980 - to turnaround the ailing team. The 49ers then won the Super Bowl three times - in 1981, 1984 and 1988 - before Bill retired.

Taking Over The San Francisco 49ers

Bill took over the team in 1979. Interviewed for the book The Score Takes Care of Itself, by Steve Jamison and Craig Walsh, he said that his aim was to create an environment of excellence.

The first two years were difficult. He aimed to build a top-notch organisation rather than one that was toxic.

This called for hiring great people and moving on those who chose not to meet the required standards. Bill explained this in the following way.

"I came to the San Francisco 49ers with an overriding priority and specific goal – to implement what I call the Standard of Performance.

"It was a way of doing things, a leadership philosophy that has as much to do with core values, principles, and ideals as with blocking, tackling, and passing: more to do with the mental than with the physical.

"While I prized preparation, planning, precision, and poise, I also knew that organizational ethics were crucial to ultimate ongoing success.

"It began with this fundamental leadership assertion: Regardless of your specific job, it is vital to our team that you do that job at the highest possible level in all its various aspects, both mental and physical (i.e., good talent with bad attitude equals bad talent).

"There are also the basic characteristics of attitude and action – the new organizational ethos – I tried to teach our team, to put into our DNA.

"Of course, for this to happen the person in charge – whether the head coach, CEO, manager, or assembly line foreman – must exhibit the principles."

This called for commitment to details, such as people having a positive attitude, no shirttails out when wearing the 49ers uniform, being prompt, showing good sportsmanship.

No strutting, posturing or cheap shots, controlling of profanity, treating fans with respect and always exhibiting professional behaviour.

The Standard Of Performance

Here are some excerpts from The Standard Of Performance.

These principles applied to the coaches, players, ticket sellers, receptionists and all people who worked for the 49ers.

Each person was expected to focus on how they could – in their role – deliver the relevant Standard of Performance.

-  Use positive language and have a positive attitude. Demonstrate character. Be fair and demonstrate respect for each person in the organization and the work they do.
-  Exhibit a ferocious and intelligently applied work ethic directed at continual improvement. Maintain an ongoing level of concentration and focus that is abnormally high.
-  Seek poise in yourself and those you lead. Show self-control, especially where it counts most – under pressure. Deal appropriately with victory and defeat, adulation and humiliation (don't go crazy with victory nor dysfunctional with loss).
-  Demonstrate and prize loyalty. Promote internal communication that is both open and substantive (especially under stress). Make sacrifice and commitment the organization's trademark.

Bill believed that leaders must develop the right strategy for delivering success. This included developing the right planning for tackling various scenarios. He explained this in the following way.

"The motto of the Boy Scouts, 'Be prepared,' became my modus operandi, and to be prepared I had to factor in every contingency: good weather, bad weather, and everything in between. I kept asking and answering this question: 'What do I do if...?'"

"You must envision the future deeply and in detail – creatively – so that the unforeseeable becomes foreseeable. Then you write the script for the foreseeable. Of course, there's always something you can't anticipate, but you strive to greatly reduce the number of those foreseeable."

He followed the 80/20 rule. The 49ers focused on maximising the 80% they could control in a game. There may be 20% they couldn't control, such as a referee's call, a bad bounce or fortune.

Bill encouraged his teams to prepare properly. People were expected to practice relentlessly until their execution at the highest level was automatic. He called this routine perfection and described it in the following way.

"Maintenance workers, ticket takers, parking lot attendants, and anyone receiving a pay check with the emblem of the San Francisco 49ers on it were instructed as to the requirements of their own job's Standard of Performance and expected to measure up."

Bill saw himself as a teacher as well as a coach. He believed in encouraging and enabling motivated people to consistently deliver the basics. They could then add the brilliance.

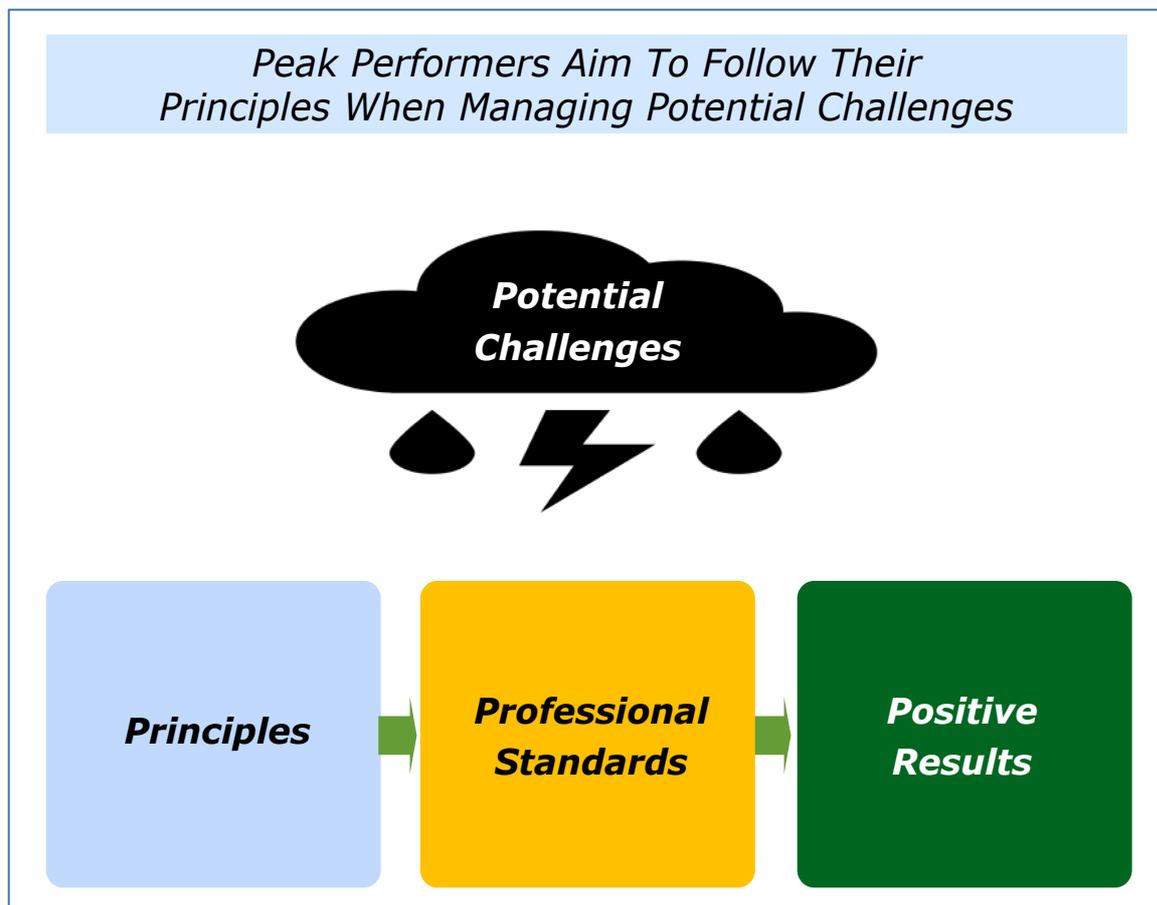

Looking back at his time at the 49ers, Bill said the turnaround took time. Some people chose not to meet these standards, so they were moved on. Despite setbacks, people began to deliver the required standards. He explained this in the following way.

"Eventually – within months, in fact – a high level of professionalism began to emerge within our entire organization.

"I moved forward methodically with a deep belief that the many elements of my Standard of Performance would produce that kind of mindset, an organizational culture that would subsequently be the foundation for winning games.

"The culture precedes positive results. It doesn't get tacked on as an afterthought on the way to the victory stand. Champions behave like champions before they're champions; they have a winning standard of performance before they are winners."

Bill encouraged people to follow the agreed principles and translate these into action. This called for them continuing to deliver consistently high professional standards when managing potential challenges. Let's consider this approach.

Many people can follow their principles when things are relatively predictable. Some people do certain kinds of work, however, where circumstances may always be changing and developing.

This can be the case if they are playing a sport, nursing in an emergency unit or doing another activity. It may also be case when they are making decisions in government or doing other activities that are affected by outside events.

Good leaders sometimes use the following framework when encouraging their people to rehearse how to manage potentially challenging situations.

Principles

What are the principles we want to follow? What may be a challenging situation that we may face in the future? Bearing in mind what we can control, what are the positive results we want to achieve in the situation?

Professional Standards

How can we follow our principles in the specific situation? How can translate these into action? How can we deliver high professional standards?

Positive Results

How can we keep doing reality checks? How can we build on what is working and tackle areas for improvement? How can we do our best to achieve the desired positive results?

Bill Walsh embodied elements of this approach. He saw himself as a teacher as well as a coach. He educated motivated people to consistently deliver the basics. They could then add the brilliance. This is an approach I have seen mirrored by other organisations that achieve success.

Successful sports teams, for example, embody similar principles to those found in many organisations that aim to achieve peak performance. They provide clarity from the top. This starts at board level and is communicated throughout the organisation.

The board has a clear philosophy, principles and picture of success;

The board employs a sporting director and coaches who use their strengths to follow the agreed principles and work towards achieving the picture of success;

The board supports the coaches – providing they are behaving in a professional way – and enables them to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

The leaders ensure that everybody knows the approach and their parts achieving the goals. Sports teams get into trouble when there is a constant switching of philosophy and approach.

Great organisations also encourage their people to deliver high professional standards. Here is an example of how one organisation described this approach to new joiners.

The Professional Standards

Introduction

Welcome to our work place. We want to encourage you to build on your strengths and make your best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

We want to create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance. This calls for following certain principles that can help us to achieve ongoing success.

The organisation's part of the professional contract is to create a positive environment. It is also to encourage, educate and enable our people to succeed.

This is something we will continually try to do. Taking these steps will lay the groundwork for achieving ongoing success.

We do, however, invite people to fulfil their part of the professional contract. We employ people who want to follow certain principles and deliver certain professional standards.

These are based on the specific things we need to do to deliver the organisation's goals. We do not try to persuade people who do not want to follow these standards. We work with people who want to follow these principles and help us to achieve peak performance.

At the same time, however, we want characters not clones. The ways that you follow these principles will be up to you.

The one key proviso, however, is that it is important to encourage other people and help the organisation to achieve success. Here are the suggested guidelines.

The Professional Standards

The guidelines we would like people to follow are these.

-  Do have a positive attitude, be professional and encourage other people.
-  Do be clear on the organisation's goals and your part in contributing towards achieving these goals.
-  Do make clear contracts with people and fulfil these contracts.
-  Do focus on outcomes - the real results to achieve in a situation - and do your best to achieve these outcomes.
-  Do perform superb work, present solutions to challenges and help both your colleagues and clients to succeed.

Let's return to the theme of coordination. Good coordinators stay calm in challenging situations but also act with appropriate urgency. They also sometimes need to find creative solutions to challenges. Let's explore this theme.

Creativity

Coordinators plan ahead and aiming to prevent potential difficulties. They also consider how to solve problems if, despite everything, these challenges do happen. Some people do the following exercises to prepare for such challenges.

Managing Potential Challenges

The specific difficult challenges we may face on the way towards achieving the picture of success may be:

The specific things we can do to prevent some of these challenges happening are:

The specific things we can do to manage some of these potential challenges if, despite our best efforts, they do happen are:

Good coordinators often enjoy finding solutions to challenges. They often aim to buy time to think, gather information and explore the possible ways forward.

Different people use different approaches for creative problem solving. One approach is to use the Three C model which involves focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results. We will be exploring this approach later in the book.

Concrete Results

Good coordinators get some early wins rather than embark on long process analyses. Success breeds success. It also buys time to tackle the more long-standing challenges.

They keep in touch with the leader and see their role as being proactive rather than that of being a glorified progress chaser.

They have regular meetings with the leader to look ahead to the next week, the month and the next quarter. They clarify the challenges facing the team and agree on the potential solutions.

Good coordinators ensure that people proactively keep them informed about their progress towards achieving the goals. They set up sessions where each team, for example, continually reports on the following themes.

The specific other topics we would like to highlight – such as positive suggestions, solutions, challenges and any other issues – that are relevant in terms of working towards the goals are:

Some coordinators take another approach to making sure things are on track. They have a dedicated room or other place that shows the state of play regarding pursuing the various strategies.

People flag up the activities that are currently in the green, amber and red zones. They also suggest what can be done to maintain or improve what is happening in these areas.

One company I worked with had a dedicated room where people constantly updated the progress towards achieving the goal. It had charts that covered the following areas.

Coordination Is Crucial

Coordinators encourage people to keep track of their progress by focusing on the things that may be in the:

The Picture Of Success

People could keep referring to the company's aims that were displayed on one wall. These were grouped in terms of what it wants to achieve under the Three Ps: profits, products – including customer satisfaction – and people.

The other walls had the following charts that described the current state of play regarding various activities.

The Green Zone

People listed the things that were going well. They also provided concrete suggestions regarding how to maintain or build on these activities.

Great workers build on what is working. If things are going well with a particular customer, for example, they explore how to continue providing great service. This can lead to developing the relationship even further.

The Amber Zone

Great workers worry about things that are in the amber zone. They are concerned that, unless these issues are addressed, these may quickly slide into the red zone. So they focus on how to move these activities more towards the green zone.

People listed the things that were going badly and gave suggestions regarding how to improve these activities. These could involve making radical improvements or for taking key decisions.

Great workers think ahead to ensure that things do not slide into the red zone. Crises do occur, of course, so then it is vital to find positive solutions.

There may be some issues, however, that are continually falling into the red zone. If systems are breaking down, for example, these may well need replacing.

A more challenging issue could be if a particular customer continually makes life difficult. Certainly it is vital to do whatever possible to provide great service. In some instances, however, a customer may prove impossible to please.

They may also prove to be a massive drain on resources. In such cases it may mean deciding to move on from the customer. This can be a difficult but necessary decision.

The company also went further and added another area called the blue zone. This was the space for both practical and imaginative ideas.

People listed the specific ideas, suggestions and other things that it might be worth considering to help the team shape a successful future. This led to some of the ideas being implemented and delivering positive results.

Great workers continually look for ways to improve. It can be useful to create different forums for exploring these ideas and then translating some of these into action.

Good Orchestrators Sometimes Bridge The Gap Between The Originators And The Operators

As mentioned earlier, orchestrators play a key role in organisations. They often start by clarifying the outcomes to achieve. They then orchestrate the available resources to achieve the desired outcomes.

One area in which they do this is by bridging the gap between originators and operators. Originators want to create new ideas; operators want to translate ideas into action. The only problem is that sometimes these two groups speak different languages and find it hard to work together.

Orchestrators start by clarifying the outcomes that the operators want to achieve. They then go to the originators and, through various means, encourage them to deliver these requirements.

Such orchestrators coordinate people's efforts. They make things happen and produce the required results for the organisation.

Taking Action

Good coordinators also encourage people to embody the ethic of continuous improvement. They invite people to build on their strengths and also tackle areas for improvement.

There are many models for making this happen. One approach is to invite people to review the piece of work they have done by completing the exercise at the end of this section.

Good leaders and coordinators get their act together. They know that clarity is the starting point for any venture. But coordination is the bridge to producing concrete results.

The Positive Leadership Approach

There are many models for leadership. Let's consider one of these approaches.

Good leaders are positive and predictable. They also enable motivated people to achieve peak performance. Poor leaders are negative and unpredictable. They result in that people feel unsure and unable to do their best.

Good leaders are credible. Whilst being positive, they are good at explaining challenging situations and the possible solutions. People see them as truthful and also sometimes inspiring.

They are predictable. They explain the principles they believe in following and they aim to be consistent. People know what to expect and this helps to create a feeling of predictability.

Good leaders each have their own ways of encouraging people to perform at their best. Depending on their strengths, they may be good at inspiring, educating or a creating a framework in which people can do great work. They do have one thing in common, however, when taking this step.

They create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you demonstrated positive leadership? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

You may have done this when acting as a teacher, coach, manager, leader or in another role. You may have done it when helping a group of people, coaching a sports team, directing a play, leading a project, building a successful prototype or doing another activity.

What did you do then to behave in a positive way and also be predictable? What did you do to communicate the picture of success? What did you do to enable people to achieve peak performance?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive Leadership In The Past

The specific situation when I was positive, predictable and did my best to enable people to achieve peak performance was:

The specific things I did then to follow these principles in my own way were:

Different leaders follow these strategies in different ways. Let's explore some of these ways.

Positive

Imagine you lead a team. On a scale 0-10, to what extent do you believe people perceive you as positive? What can you do to maintain or improve the rating?

Why pose the question this way? Some leaders see themselves as positive, but the way they behave towards other people can come across as negative.

Positive leaders act as good models and create an encouraging environment. The ways they behave can affect people throughout an organisation. Here are two examples that I witnessed.

Leader A

Leader A arrived at the office in the morning and greeted people personally. They spent time talking with the cleaners, reception staff and other people. They aimed to make each person feel the centre of their world.

They believed it was vital to give people the big picture and gathered everybody together every month. This included the catering staff and other background workers. They kept communicating the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They updated people on: the progress being made; the plans for the next month; the challenges ahead and the strategies for tackling these challenges. They also shared stories highlighting good work by people.

Leader A was positive but also communicated the required professional standards. They acted as a custodian of the culture and acted quickly if people chose not to follow the required standards.

Leader A established credibility in their own way. They explained their role was: a) to keep focusing on the organisation's goals; b) to provide the experts with the support they needed to deliver success.

They managed by outcomes rather than by tasks. These often involved getting wins for the organisation, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues. When a person came with a problem to solve, they would say:

"Let's focus on the outcomes we want to achieve. How can we do our best to achieve those results?"

They were good during crises. They acted quickly to deal with any problems and communicated the future strategy. People felt involved and helped each other to achieve the goals.

Leader A helped the organisation to hit its targets, but then left to take another role. The board decided to change direction. It brought in another person who promised to increase the organisation's profits.

Leader B

Leader B arrived at the organisation in a blaze of publicity but there were soon warning signs. He tried to make himself feel important rather than make the staff feel important.

Gathering people together, he started by describing the prizes he had won in his career. He then announced:

"Things are going to change around here."

Leader B tried to make himself look big by making other people feel small. Looking for scapegoats, he publicly criticised several employees who had previously done good work.

He replaced two well respected senior managers with two acolytes who bullied people. This created a climate of fear that led to many fine people leaving the organisation.

Leader B had been hired by the board. Despite representations from the staff, at first the board refused to believe the reports about his behaviour. They said that:

"People are just afraid of change."

More good workers left. Those that remained played safe and put their heads down. The collateral damage included people taking sick leave and the organisation becoming understaffed.

The Board remained in denial. The reports of bullying became so persistent, however, that eventually he was asked to leave the organisation.

This led to one of the previously fired senior managers returning to take over the role. Many people breathed a sigh of relief, but it took a long time for the organisation to heal.

Let's return to your own work. Looking at the people you lead or work with, to what extent do you think they rate you as being positive?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the extent that you believe other people see you as positive. Do this on a scale 0-10. Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Positive

The extent to which I believe other people see me as positive is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Predictability

Good leaders are predictable. People know what to expect from them and the guidelines they can follow in their daily work. They don't have to spend time guessing how the leader will behave that day.

Negative leaders can be unpredictable. They can veer from being stable to being sarcastic, ranting or cruel. People spend time guessing the leader's mood. This does not help them to do good work.

Good leaders are caring rather than callous. They aim to build a positive culture where people are clear on 'the way we do things around here'. They therefore take the following steps.

They communicate the required professional standards and give the reasons for these standards;

They personally follow these professional standards and keep sharing success stories that highlight how employees are translating the standards into action;

They act immediately to maintain the professional standards and protect the culture if somebody chooses not to follow these standards.

Good leaders sometimes go a step further. When taking over a team, for example, they explain their leadership style. People then know what to expect from the leader rather than spend six months guessing.

Different leaders do this in different ways. The following section describes an exercise I have used with leaders to help them explain their leadership style to people.

Afterwards the team members often say that it is good to know what they can and can't expect from the leader. They can then take a stand towards how they respond.

Imagine that you are taking over a team. Here are some steps you can take to communicate your leadership style to people.

Clarifying Your Leadership Style

This exercise invites you to clarify and then communicate the following things to people.

- * The things you will and won't do as a leader.
- * The Dos and Don'ts for working well with you.
- * The consequences of your style.

Be very honest when completing the exercise. This is about your actual leadership style. It is not your aspirations.

Remember, there are not necessarily good or bad styles. But there are consequences. Below is the exercise. This is accompanied by an example of what one person wrote when communicating their leadership style.

My Leadership Style

The Way I Will And Won't Work As A Leader

I Will:

- Provide a clear vision for the team. I also give you freedom, within parameters, on how you get to the goal.

For example: I will agree with you on the outcomes to achieve and the support you need. I will expect you to proactively keep me informed, but I won't micromanage you unless you fail to deliver.

- Be full of energy in a morning.

For example: I am a morning person, so I am quite energetic early on and want to make sure everybody is clear on what we are aiming to do that day. I may also ring you before 9.00.

- Get to the point quickly in conversations rather than do social chat.

For example: I tend to be impatient, so I want to get to the headline. I won't always start by asking how you are.

- Talk quickly, but sometimes not check out that you have understood what I have said.

For example: I often have a vision in my head about what we should do, but sometimes forget to tell people, even though I think I have communicated it.

- Protect you from unnecessary interference from my bosses - but expect you to deliver on your promises.

For example: I will provide air cover so you do not get overloaded with information from above, but I expect you to take responsibility and also be good at managing our key stakeholders.

- Try to play to your strengths.

For example: I will ask each of you to clarify what you do best and how you can make your best contribution. But there will be times when we need to do other kinds of work to deliver the goods.

I Won't:

- Always look at you directly when you are speaking.

For example: I will look at you when we start the conversation, but then may look away when trying to make sense of the information. Don't take this personally. I am listening.

- Micromanage you unless you fail to deliver.

For example: As mentioned earlier, I will agree with you on the outcomes to achieve. It is then up to you to keep me informed in an appropriate way and to deliver. If you don't, then I may start micromanaging you.

- Get involved in lots of social events.

For example: I will go to bed early on off-sites rather than sit around talking into the early hours.

The Best Way To Work With Me

Do:

- Be professional.

For example: Make clear contracts about what you will deliver. Keep your promises. Deliver great service to customers. Encourage your colleagues. Be contactable between 9.00 and 18.00. Prepare properly for meetings with me. Start by explaining what you want to discuss and what you want from me.

- Be honest.

For example: Let me know bad news quickly. It's good if you can outline the possible options for moving forward. But don't hide bad news if you have not yet thought of a strategy.

- Accept that we work for a big multinational company.

For example: This will not always be easy, but we are adults and knew the deal before we joined.

Don't

- Be unprofessional.

For example: Don't be late for meetings. Don't be unprepared. Don't do your emails during meetings. Don't pass the buck. Don't treat your colleagues badly.

- Put your own agenda before that of the team.

For example: Don't pursue your goals at the cost of other people. Don't compete with your colleagues - we are here to help each other. Don't expect me to manage your career. I will give you lots of opportunities to develop. It will be up to you to take these and shape your future career.

- Wing it.

For example: Don't waffle. Get to the point. It is also okay to say you don't know something and you can then get back to me later.

The Consequences Of My Style

The Pluses:

- It is likely that we will reach our goals.

For example: I will aim to keep our key stakeholders happy and give you the tools for doing the job. Providing we combine our strengths, we have a good chance of reaching the goals. This will benefit all of us.

- Self-managing people will thrive.

For example: People who make clear contracts on the outcomes will have freedom, within parameters, to use their talents to deliver the goods. This will enable them to develop.

- I will encourage you to shape your future career.

This sounds counter-intuitive but, providing you deliver the goods, I will encourage you to keep developing your career. This can mean that, at some point, you decide to move on. That is okay. I prefer to work with people who keep growing rather than those who decide to stagnate.

The Potential Minuses:

- Sometimes I may not immediately give you my full attention.

For example: I am an introvert who likes to think a lot. This means that sometimes I am in my own world and it takes time for me to switch into giving you my full attention.

- People may feel I am not taking an interest in what they are doing.

For example: After agreeing on the outcomes to deliver I will provide the support you need. I will not keep checking on you, but I expect you to keep me appropriately informed. Just contact me if you need help.

- I am not good with people who want lots of reassurance but I can help during crises.

For example. I can sometimes be a good counsellor, listen and help a person come through a crisis. But I am not good at working with people who often want a lot of reassurance. As I said, however, please come to me if you want help with a difficult challenge.

Communicating Your Leadership Style

If you wish, find an appropriate time to share your leadership style with your team. I have often invited leaders to do this during a leadership team workshop, but other times can also be appropriate.

Providing it is communicated properly, the response is normally positive. People like to know how their leader operates, so it's good to make the implicit explicit. They can then take a stand towards how they work with you.

This exercise also works with leaders who have been with a team for a long time. After one such leader shared it with their team on a workshop one person gave the following reactions.

"We have been working together for five years, but this document sums you up, warts and all. For example, it took me six months to figure out that you have a memory like an elephant, even though you seldom write anything down.

"I thought you weren't paying attention during our conversations, but later you could recount every detail. Now I tell new starters to ignore your body language, which can be a bit disconcerting.

"They need to know that you notice every detail about them and the conversation. Some people find this intimidating, but most eventually get used to you.

"I wish somebody had told me your rules when I first joined the team."

The leader who gave the examples mentioned above later met with me. They explored how to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses of their style. They explained this in the following way.

"Building on the pluses, I will continue to provide direction and give people the tools they need to do their jobs.

"Aiming to minimise the minuses, I will spend one hour with each person each month. Ahead of the meeting, I will ask them to do some preparation.

"I will provide them with a framework they can use to send me an email describing:

a) the specific things they have done well during the past month and how they can build on these;

b) the specific things they can improve in the future and how;

c) the plans they have for the next month and the practical support they need from me.

"We can have some quality time together. I will aim to help them to keep developing and also make their best contribution to the company."

Team members often appreciate the honesty a leader puts into this exercise. Some leaders also invite their people to do a similar exercise about themselves.

Good leaders are predictable. Even though, in some cases, this means that people know that the leader is sometimes unpredictable in a positive way.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at yourself as a leader, describe the extent that you are predictable. Do this on a scale 0-10. Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Predictable

The extent to which I am predictable is:

___ / 10

Some leaders maintain predictability in their teams or organisations by taking the following route. They appoint custodians who ensure people keep focusing on the core principles. Let's explore this approach.

The Custodians Of The Culture Approach

The custodian approach is used in many teams and organisations. Here are some definitions of the word custodian.

*A person who is responsible for protecting or taking care of something ...
A person who protects particular principles or ideas ... A person who guards or maintains something that is valued.*

Great organisations appoint many custodians who embody the desired culture. Such people are often demonstrate the following qualities.

They are strong characters who are caring and consistent;

They embody the core principles and act as good models;

They translate these core principles into practise – especially in challenging situations - and deliver concrete results.

Some organisations say they have such custodians in place, but they have not followed these guidelines. They have instead appointed a committee or people who don't follow the agreed principles.

The following pages describe two examples of where I have seen the custodian approach work successfully. These are drawn from teams and organisations in different fields.

The Start-up Company

During the early 2000s I acted as a mentor to a digital start-up. The company grew exponentially to a successful sale within five years. One reason for this was that it built a positive and peak performing culture.

The CEO had certain strengths. He was good at providing an inspiring vision, clarifying the strategy, getting financial backing and being a thought leader. Aware of his weaknesses, he built a good leadership team.

The CEO also nominated three senior people to act as custodians for the culture. These people continued to perform their professional roles. When appropriate, however, they reminded the leadership team of the company's principles.

They did this in a positive way. At certain times, they would say something like the following.

"Looking at the challenge we face, there seem to be several options for going forwards. Each of these have pluses and minuses.

"Bearing these in mind, it may be useful to return to our core principles. As you know, our principles are: 1) To ... 2) To ... 3) To ...

"Looking at the possible options, which of these will fit closest to our principles? What else could we do to ensure we are following our principles?"

The company kept returning to this compass. It used the principles as the basis for recruiting people and also for educating staff how to find solutions when faced by challenges.

The company was sold after five years. The buyers said that one of the main attractions was the company's culture. Unfortunately the buyers destroyed the culture within a few months.

The CEO and several leaders moved on to founding another company. They again focused on pursuing certain core principles and their business proved successful.

The Sports Team

One football manager I worked with used the custodian approach when taking over an ailing team. He brought in three senior internationals who were respected by players in the existing squad.

The three players were good models. They acted as what people call cultural architects. They provided inspiration and the club went on to win its first national trophy.

The custodian approach has been adopted by many other teams. Some managers appoint what they call a leadership group. Sometimes this works, sometimes it doesn't.

The key factor is to appoint players who demonstrate the required professional standards. Some managers put talented but difficult players in the leadership group. This produces mixed results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to use elements of the custodian approach?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

I may use elements of the custodian approach may be:*

Peak Performance

Good leaders often combine personal humility and professional will, says Jim Collins. Writing in his book Good To Great, he says that such people – those he calls Level 5 Leaders – often get the best from people. They also create a positive legacy.

Such leaders enable motivated people to pursue their potential and achieve peak performance. Different people do this in different ways. Depending on their strengths, they may be good at inspiring people, educating people or a creating a framework in which people can do great work.

Some lead a team that focuses on its purpose, follows its principles and achieves its picture of success;

Some lead a team that focuses on its values, translates these into a clear vision and does valuable work;

Some lead a team that enables people to flow, focus, do fine work, finish and find fulfilment;

Some lead a team that encourages people to build on their strengths, do superb work and achieve ongoing success;

Some lead a team that follows Robert Greenleaf's approach to servant leadership – they serve the people who aim to serve a particular cause.

Good leaders realise they are judged by the performance of their people rather than just by their own performance. This is often overlooked concept that can come as a profound realisation to some leaders.

Benjamin Zander, the conductor, described his own insight regarding this concept. This came when he was invited to conduct the Berlin Philharmonic. Here is a summary of what Benjamin said.

"Walking into the auditorium for the first rehearsal with the orchestra, I had a realisation about my role as a conductor. This came as an epiphany, because in the music world the conductor is seen as all powerful.

"My realisation was this. It did not matter how much I waved my arms around. The audience was going to judge my work by the performance of the musicians in front of me."

People leaders need to develop certain skills to create superb teams. One rising leader I worked with in a giant tech company had such an epiphany. Here is the gist of what he said.

"For me this will mean changing my mindset. I have got to this stage of my career by being driven and hitting certain targets.

"I now want to be a good people leader. Whilst I have some of the necessary skills, I want to learn how to create a framework that helps other people to succeed.

"I'm not sure how this approach will be perceived, however, because we are still an organisation that rewards individual performance. But I want to help the people in my part of the business to thrive and perform at their best."

Giving People Empowerment Within Parameters

Good leaders clarify the outcomes the team must deliver. They then clarify the strategies people can follow to achieve the picture of success.

They may involve their people in adding ideas. When doing this, they communicate the parameters within which people can make suggestions. They incorporate some of these in the plans for achieve the goals.

They then make clear contracts with people about their parts in achieving the aims. This includes giving people empowerment – within parameters – about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Imagine you want to take this approach. Here is one framework that you can adapt in your own way.

The Positive Approach To Giving People Empowerment Within Parameters

This involves clarifying the specific outcomes to achieve and the key strategies for achieving the picture of success.

You can then involve your people – and give them empowerment within parameters - by focusing on the following themes.

The Picture Of Success

- *
- *

You can communicate the outcomes to achieve and the strategies. You can explain the reasons for pursuing these strategies towards achieving the picture of success.

The Parameters

You can encourage people to add ideas. Communicate the parameters within which they can make suggestions. Then settle on the plans for achieving the picture of success.

The Personal Contributions

You can make clear contracts with people – including empowering them within certain parameters – about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Different leaders take this step in different ways. One leader gathered their team together and said something along the following lines. (I have omitted the quotation marks.)

The Picture Of Success

Welcome to the session. I want to give you the big picture about the specific outcomes we aim to achieve in the next year.

This involves delivering certain results in terms of our profitability, our product quality and our people. We want to create wins for our company, our customers and our colleagues.

As you know, there are certain mandatory things we must deliver. We have also added other stimulating projects and these have been included in the goals.

I want to share the key strategies we aim to follow. I also want to explain the reasons for pursuing these on the way towards the picture of success. After doing this I am happy to take any questions. We will then move on to the next stage.

The Parameters

I then want to involve you in adding your ideas regarding the strategies and the picture of success. It is only fair, however, to explain that these need to be within certain parameters.

As mentioned earlier, there are certain mandatory goals and other things we want to deliver. Bearing these in mind, I would like you to share the specific suggestions you have:

To add to the goals;

To add to the strategies and how these can be implemented successfully;

To add to anything else you believe we should consider – this includes giving you the support needed to deliver success.

After collecting these ideas, we will and discuss these together. We will then settle on the plan for going forwards to achieve the picture of success.

The Personal Contributions

We will then move to the next stage. This will be to make clear contracts with you about the outcomes you will deliver towards reaching the goals.

We will also give your freedom – within certain parameters – regarding how you apply your talents. We will also ask you to proactively keep us informed about your progress toward delivering the picture of success.

This is an approach I have seen used by many fine leaders. Let's look at another example.

The CEO of one company adapted it when involving people in clarifying the company's values. Bringing together twenty-four managers from around the world, he asked me to run a two-day workshop in London.

One week before the session he contacted me to express a concern. Here is a summary of what he said.

"I am bringing together these people, but I am worried in case they come up with values I do not believe in. What do you think we can do?"

Talking about this issue, it transpired that there were two key values he believed the company should follow. He did not want to go through the pretence of trying to get people to come up with these values.

We agreed that, as the founder, he had the right to define some values he wanted the company to follow. At the same time, he wanted to give his managers a sense of ownership.

We therefore created an email to send to his managers. This was along the following lines.

The Values Workshop Next Week

I am looking forward to seeing you all in London next week. As you know, we are going to be working on creating the company's values. Bearing this in mind, there are three things I want to mention.

First, as the founder, I obviously believe that we should follow certain values. At the same time, I want to make sure you have some ownership of creating the values.

Second, I do not want to bring you all to London on false pretences. Therefore I would like to start with two values being in place. These are:

1) To ...

2) To ...

The reason I believe in these values are because ...

Third, I would like to give you the chance to add to these values. This is important, because it is vital to involve you in creating and then living the values.

I wanted to let you know the guidelines before you come to the workshop. I hope you are still happy to come along and then we can craft the rest of the values together.

Please contact me if you have any questions before then. I look forward to meeting you in London.

The CEO's people responded in a positive fashion. Many said it was good to know the guidelines for the session and they later contributed superbly to the workshop.

Many years later the company still takes a pride in how it lives its values. This was helped by the CEO being clear at the outset. He gave his people empowerment within parameters.

The Making A Clear Contract With Your Team Approach

The Team's Contract
The Leader's Responsibilities Are:	The Team Members' Responsibilities Are:
<ul style="list-style-type: none"> * To ... 	<ul style="list-style-type: none"> * To ...

Imagine you are a team leader. One of your first jobs will be to make a clear working contract with the team.

People must be clear on the responsibilities of both the leader and the team members. Such a contract can cover both the psychological and practical responsibilities of working together.

Here is one approach to making an overall working contract. You can, of course, also make clear contracts about other aspects of working in the team. Gather people together and invite them to focus on the following themes.

Clarify the leader's responsibilities in the team

Prepare two flip charts. One is to be headed The Leader's Responsibilities and the other is to be headed The Team Members' Responsibilities.

Give each person a set of Post-it Notes and invite them to describe what they see as the leader's role in ensuring the team reaches its goals. Each person is to write one idea per Post-it but they can write as many ideas as they wish.

There are many approaches to leadership. People may consider, however, that the leader's role includes some of the following themes.

To keep communicating the team's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To create a positive environment in which motivated people can do good work;

To make clear contracts about each person's contribution towards achieving the team's goals;

To manage by outcomes rather than by tasks;

To manage upwards, provide air cover and protect people from interference;

To coordinate people's strengths to achieve the goals;

To make tough decisions and do whatever is necessary to guide the team to success.

There will be a chance to discuss these ideas later. But at this stage invite each person to go up in turn and put their Post-it Notes regarding what they see as the leader's responsibility.

It is also good if they can explain their reasons and give examples for each idea. They can then move onto the next stage.

The Leader's Responsibilities Are:

* To ...

Clarify the team members' responsibilities in the team

Invite people to describe what they see as the team members' responsibilities in ensuring the team reaches its goals. For example:

To be positive and professional;

To understand the team's picture of success;

To make clear contracts about their contribution towards achieving the goal;

To perform good work, find solutions to challenges and deliver on their promises;

To help their colleagues and customers to achieve success.

Again, invite each person to go up in turn and place their Post-its under what they see as the team members' responsibilities. It is also good if they can give their reasons and examples for each idea.

The Team Members' Responsibilities Are:

- * To ...

- * To ...

- * To ...

- * To ...

- * To ...

Clarify and agree on the team's working contract

Looking at the ideas under the respective responsibilities, invite people to arrange these under themes and discuss the topics. When you feel people are ready, invite the team members to agree on the team's working contract.

As the leader, you will have the final say, but team members often produce an excellent agreement. Conclude by writing the contract and, if appropriate, putting it in a place where people can see it each day.

How can you use the contract? There are two main ways.

It can provide a constant reminder of people's respective responsibilities;

It can be used when tackling difficult situations.

If a person behaves unprofessionally, for example, don't get dragged down into arguing about the details. Just go back to the contract. Ask whether the person wants to follow the agreed principles.

Sometimes it may be appropriate to alter the conditions but then make sure the whole team are in agreement. If a person continues to break the rules, however, they are choosing to leave the team.

Clear contracting provides the basis for building a successful team. It provides a framework that people can use follow the agreed guidelines and deliver the picture of success.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach when leading a team. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Enabling People To Achieve Peak Performance

Imagine that you lead a team. How can you enable motivated people to pursue their potential and achieve peak performance? Here is one practical exercise that I have seen work.

You Can Clarify Each Person's Preferred Working Style

This is an approach that can be used in one-to-one meetings. If you feel it would be useful, however, you can invite people to do the following exercise individually and then share their work in a group setting.

The next section explores this second approach. There are several points to bear in mind when doing the exercise.

The exercise is most effective when each person in the team wants to deliver professional performances. You can then help them to make their contribution to the team's picture of success.

The exercise is not about working in a group setting with individuals who are delivering poor performances. You can hold those kinds of discussions elsewhere in a one-to-one meeting.

Start by asking each individual to complete the following pack about how they work best. Explain that the team will then meet together to explore how to build on people's strengths.

Explain that the sharing will be done in a positive atmosphere. It will not be about getting people to change. Several points are worth bearing in mind when introducing the exercise.

Ask people to be as honest as possible. There are no good or bad working styles - there are just consequences.

Ask them to be as specific as possible. When in doubt, they are to describe things in behavioural terms.

Talk them through each part of the pack, perhaps giving examples from your own style to bring it to life.

Here is the pack that you can invite people to do. There is an introduction to each part.

My Preferred Working Style

Introduction

The following exercises invite you to describe your preferred working style - the way you work best.

Several things are worth bearing in mind when doing the exercises. Be as honest as possible. There are no good or bad working styles - there are just consequences.

Try to be as specific and give examples of your style. When in doubt, describe things in behavioural terms - what you actually do.

The exercises invite you to do the following things. There are more detailed explanations at the start of each section in the pack.

- * Describe the specific kinds of work you like doing, feel okay about doing and don't like doing.
- * Describe the way you work best.
- * Describe the way people can get the best from you.
- * Describe some of the consequences – the potential pluses and minuses - of your style.
- * Describe what you believe would be your best contribution to helping the team to achieve its goals.

This sounds a long list, but people often find the exercise worthwhile, especially when working in a team. Over to you.

*The Way I

Introduction

This part invites you to describe the following things.

 Describe the way you work best.*

Different people will obviously describe different ways of working. You may, for example, say that you like:

To work on projects that you really care about ... To agree with the key stakeholders on the outcomes to achieve ... To have freedom, within parameters, how you achieve these goals.

To work with certain kinds of customers or colleagues ... To, if you are an introvert, work in a quiet space ... To, if you are more extrovert, occasionally bounce ideas off people ... To do your best work at certain times of the day ... Etc.

 Describe the way you don't work best.*

You may, for example, say that you don't like:

To work on tasks where you can't see how they fit into the big picture ... To be micromanaged ... To work with certain kinds of customers or colleagues ... To work in noisy offices.

 Describe some characteristics you display when you work.*

These may include certain patterns you follow or behaviours you display. They may also include some quirky things you do. At least, others may consider these behaviours a bit different.

To Work With Me*

Introduction

The following sections invite you to describe the overall guidelines - the Dos and Don'ts - people can follow to encourage and get the best from you.

Different people will obviously describe different things. Here are some things that people have written when outlining these guidelines.

Do give me the big picture as well as the task to be done, because this helps me to see the context.

Do give positive suggestions rather than just problems.

Do, on the other hand, be honest and tell me the truth about issues even though you have not yet found a solution.

Do be professional but also human.

Do double-check things with me if you are unsure about something I have asked you to do. This is because sometimes I think I have given the full picture and I haven't.

Do make allowances for my body language when I reflect on things. For example, sometimes if you start talking to me I will then look away. This is because I am thinking and trying to make sense of things, so please don't take it personally.

Do let me know how I can encourage you. Sometimes it helps me to have some guidelines rather than me guessing.

Do give me positive suggestions if you want me to do some things differently in the future.

The Don'ts may be the opposite of these kinds of things, plus perhaps some other points.

Imagine that you have given people time to do these exercises. As mentioned earlier, you can follow up with them in one-to-one sessions. Another approach is to take the following step.

You can facilitate a session in which people share their preferred working styles Create an informal atmosphere in which people feel able to share their working style. You may then wish to take the following steps.

Explain The Rules

Each person will have fifteen minutes to share their answers to the exercises. People can ask questions when the team member presents, but mainly for information. It is again worth underlining the following point:

The aim is to understand the person. It is not to get them to change.

Fifteen minutes seems a long time, but it can take longer. If people have done the exercise properly - and the group asks questions for information - it may take up to thirty minutes per person.

Providing you have created a positive atmosphere, you will find that people open-up and are willing to be honest. This is an approach that - providing it is done properly - can help people:

To understand each other's working styles; To understand how to encourage and get the best from each person.

If appropriate, you can then meet each person to make clear contracts about their best contribution to the team. You can then employ your strengths to enable the team to achieve peak performance.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

There are many ways to demonstrate positive leadership. The following pages describe different ways that people implement this approach.

The STAGE Model of Leadership

The STAGE Model

This involves covering the following aspects of leadership.

- Strategic
- Tactical
- Administrative
- Grunt Work
- Emotional

The STAGE model works well for leaders whose strengths lie in strategic and emotional leadership. They can focus on these aspects and ensure that others manage the tactical, administrative and grunt work parts.

Imagine you are a leader who has such strengths. Here are some themes to consider when following the STAGE model.

Providing The Strategic Leadership

Good leaders keep communicating the team's strategy. Your job is to keep people's eyes on the following themes.

The What: The specific goal the team is aiming to achieve.

The Why: The specific benefits of achieving the goal.

The How: The specific strategy for achieving the goal.

The Who: The specific responsibilities of various people in working to achieve the goal.

The When: The specific milestones along the road towards reaching the goal.

It is important to keep communicating the big picture, especially when it gets tough. This helps people to make a link between their daily actions and the long-term picture of success.

Managing The Tactics, Administration And Grunt Work

Good leaders may have grand strategies but these must be translated into action. As a leader, you can try to do everything yourself, but you will then be doomed to failure. Your job is to focus on the strategic and emotional leadership.

Good teams often have a superb coordinator. So, if possible, get a coordinator to oversee the TAG part. Otherwise the danger is that you will keep dipping down into the detail and fall into firefighting.

The coordinator's job is to oversee three things.

Tactics

It is to ensure that grand plans are translated into tactics that contribute to achieving the goals.

Administration

It is to ensure that diaries are kept up to date, meetings scheduled and the hygiene factors managed, otherwise the team falls into chaos.

Grunt Work

The leader and coordinator ensure people are equipped and enabled to do the daily tasks and that these are completed.

Imagine you have a good coordinator who acts as a mission holder for making things work. They may not actually do all the work themselves, but they do ensure it gets done.

“Must it be one person?” somebody may ask. “I have four people reporting into me. Can’t they all act as coordinators?”

Yes, they can. But be wary of having too many people who report to you directly. The danger is that you will turn into a micro-manager, rather than operating as a leader.

Providing The Emotional leadership

Good leaders harness people’s emotional energy to achieve the goals. Different leaders do this in different ways.

Some are good in one-to-many situations. They give inspiring speeches and provide rallying calls to action.

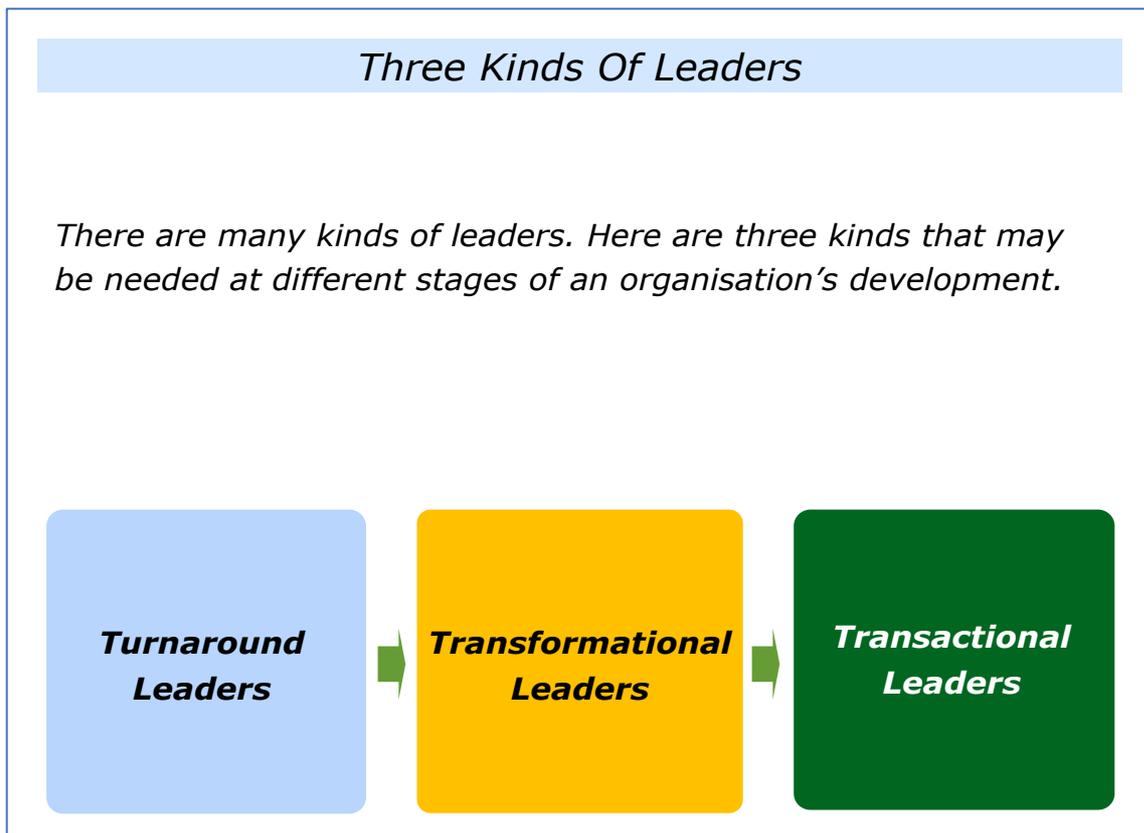

Some are good in one-to-few situations. They prefer small groups where they can listen, connect with people’s agendas and find positive solutions.

Some are good in one-to-one situations. They provide the personal touch, make individuals feel valued and encourage them to do their best work.

Good leaders play to their strengths. They then surround themselves with people who can compensate for any of their weaknesses.

The STAGE model is just one approach to leadership. The keys are the strategic and emotional parts. It is crucial to inspire people to put their hearts, as well as their heads, into achieving the picture of success.

The Turnaround, Transformational And Transactional Leadership Approaches

James MacGregor Burns coined some of these terms in the 1970s. He mainly studied political leaders, but the ideas have since been researched in organisations, business and other fields. This has resulted in expanding some of the original definitions.

Different organisations may need different types of leaders at different times in their development. So it is useful to know which type of leadership characteristics you demonstrate. Let's explore the three kinds of leaders.

Turnaround Leaders

Such people love the challenge of turning around a failing system and making it work. They have a strong belief in their own ability to make this happen. They also have the resilience required to overcome obstacles and achieve the goal.

This can be a lonely job. So some take around with them a core team of people who help to make change happen. One such leader said:

"I love to go in and fix things. Maybe it is because of my background as an engineer. I analyse what's wrong and get a picture of what is required. Then I implement the tough decisions required to make it work.

"Interestingly, once it is functioning well, I tend to lose interest. I can take something from 3/10 to 8/10 but am not motivated to take it to 10/10.

"I then get fascinated by the next turnaround project."

This is not the case with all such leaders, but I have heard it from many. Some also take the further step of coaching their successors who will deliver ongoing success, but that involves developing a different skill.

Turnaround leaders sometimes take the following approach.

They clarify the organisation's strengths and its potential future picture of success.

They clarify how to build on its strengths but also quickly fix the things that may be causing the haemorrhaging.

They work with a core group of people who follow the key strategies that will give the organisation the greatest chance of success.

They mobilise their people by continually focusing on the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They may take action quickly to get some quick wins or improve the profits, products and people.

They keep pursuing the key strategies and get reality checks. This feedback is crucial. They focus on: a) The things that are working and do these more; b) The things that could be better and how.

They manage potential problems – maybe even turning some of these into opportunities - and find creative solutions to challenges.

They do whatever is required to turnaround the organisation and focus on the future picture of success.

They may hand over the reins and coach others to achieve sustainable success. Alternatively, they may simply move on. They then look for the next turnaround project.

Transformational Leaders

Burns believed that transformational leaders connect with people on a values level. They translate this into an inspiring vision and energise people to deliver visible results.

Some people love working for such leaders. They are encouraged to take ownership, combine their talents and continue to develop.

Transformational leaders are now seen to go much further than the original definition. Whilst connecting with people's aspirations, such leaders often take some of the following steps:

They transform an existing system – such as radically changing an organisation.

They create a new system – such as building a successful prototype.

They introduce a new paradigm, a new way of thinking and change people's consciousness.

Different transformational leaders focus on different themes when, for example, leading a business. Some take the following approach.

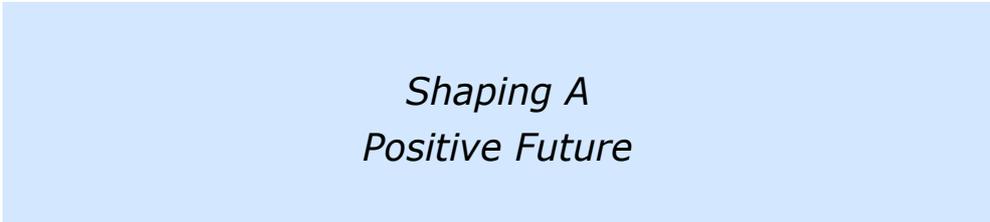

Today's Business

They aim to build on the best of today's business. They focus on certain customers and provide them with great service. This can maintain the cash flow and may also lead to getting more business with these customers.

Tomorrow's Business

They often focus on shaping tomorrow's business. Sometimes this involves imagining they were starting the business again today. One approach is for them to explore the following themes.

Shaping A Positive Future

One approach is to imagine you were starting the business again today. Here are some themes it could be useful to explore.

- Strengths

Bearing in mind our strengths, if we were starting the business again today what would we do? What would be the products and services we would offer? How could these help our customers to achieve success?

- Specific Customers

Who are the kinds of customers with whom we work best? How could we continue to work with these and also find similar customers? What are the kinds of challenges these customers may face now and in the future?

- Success

How could we use our strengths to help these customers to achieve success? How could we realign our business to make this happen? Who are the people in our business we would build on to follow these strategies? How could we make sure we put the right people in the right places and give them the support they need to deliver success?

Transformational leaders may pioneer the way by changing the rules of the game. They may work as a sole contributor – such as an inventor, writer or philosopher - who shows people a new way of looking at the world. Alternatively, they may prefer to work with people on a tangible project.

Building on Burns' original definition, they encourage a group of believers who translate the ideas into behaviour and deliver brilliant results. The new approach transforms the way people feel, think or behave in the future.

Transactional Leaders

Such leaders often operate within a given system and make things work more effectively. They get satisfaction from making incremental improvements on the road to achieving success.

Transactional leaders are vital if an organisation is to move from, for example, entrepreneurship to execution to excellence. One such leader said:

"My role is being an implementer. I like to have a clear goal and guidelines within which to operate.

"I then enjoy designing and delivering processes that enable people to succeed. Most of all, I enjoy doing real work and seeing a tangible result."

Transactional leaders were somewhat tarred in the past because they were seen as process driven. But such leaders play a vital part in delivering the goods.

This is because not much gets delivered without good transactions taking place in a team, organisation or society. Warren Bennis, the respected author on leadership, wrote:

Leaders are people who do the right things; managers are people who do things right.

Good transactional leaders combine elements of both. They enable people inside a system to follow key principles and do the right things in the right way. Such leaders demonstrate some of the following characteristics.

They clarify the goal and the guidelines for implementing the strategy.

They get satisfaction from making things work successfully. So they may double check with the sponsors to ensure they are absolutely sure regarding what must be delivered and by when.

They have high professional standards and demand these from other people.

They are often hard working and diligent people, so they may fall into doing many of the tasks themselves.

It is vital for the stakeholders to ensure the transactional leader has the support to do the job. It is important to encourage the person:

To keep an overview of the tasks; to hire the right people, those with similar professional standards, and to delegate properly; to keep themselves healthy, because they can burn themselves out.

They translate the strategy into specific tasks that must be completed to achieve the goals.

They design processes that ensure the tasks are implemented properly. They do, if they are good leaders, give people a sense of ownership in implementing these processes.

They perform superb work, solve problems and ensure people deliver the required quality.

They continue improving the system's effectiveness and efficiency. They keep their stakeholders informed and deliver the agreed goals.

Some people combine elements of being a turnaround, transformational and transactional leader. It can be important, however, for a person to decide which kind of situation they prefer. They are then more likely to guide people to success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe kind of leader that you prefer to be and how you can translate this into action.

The Setting A Positive Agenda Approach

The Positive Agenda Approach

It can be important to clarify and communicate a positive agenda to people. This can help to fill a vacuum that may otherwise be filled by people with other agendas. It can also be helpful:

- To encourage people and communicate clear and compelling positive goals;
- To show people the benefits of working towards these positive goals;
- To, when appropriate, channel people's energies towards working to achieve these positive goals.

This is an approach that is used by many good leaders. They aim to clarify and communicate a positive agenda to people. They may aim to do when:

They are communicating with the public, the media or other groups of people;

They are communicating with their people about the team's purpose, principles and picture of success:

They are communicating with their people – whether they are running group meetings or having other sessions.

Good leaders aim to communicate a positive vision to people. They do this:

To encourage people and communicate clear and compelling goals;

To show people the benefits of working towards the positive goals;

To, when appropriate, channel people's energies towards achieving these positive goals.

Such leaders also recognise that it is important provide a positive vision to fill a vacuum. Otherwise this vacuum may be filled by people with other agendas.

They keep focusing on the vision and, when appropriate, explain the aims. They do this to give people context and the big picture.

They take this approach, for example, when being interviewed by the media. Whilst being prepared to give direct answers, they give these within the wider context. They do not fall into being distracted by the latest item in the news cycle.

Good leaders also set a positive agenda for running team meetings with their people. They follow the tried and trusted format for such internal meetings. (This sounds rather basic, but some organisations fail to do such simple things.)

They communicate with their people ahead of time and may position the session in the following way.

The Purpose

The purpose of the meeting is to help us to continue to channel our energies towards achieving our picture of success. We will begin by reminding ourselves of the goals we want to achieve this year.

Agenda

We will then focus on the following themes that we can follow to achieve these goals:

How to ...

How to ...

How to ...

Any other business.

I would like you to come with your ideas about how we can pursue these themes and do our best to achieve the picture of success.

Please let me know in advance about any other topics you would like us to cover. It can also be useful if you can make any suggestions about how we can tackle these issues in ways that help us to achieve success.

We will finish the meeting by aiming:

To agree on the action steps we want to take to implement what we have agreed;

To agree on who will be the mission holders for implementing these actions and the support they will require to deliver success;

To, if appropriate, agree on the equivalent of a press release that we can communicate to our people to describe the big picture and the actions we will be taking to achieve success.

Good leaders aim to set a positive agenda. They aim to connect with people and, when appropriate, encourage them to channel their energies towards achieving positive goals.

The Positive Leader's Approach To Communicating With Their People

Let's conclude this section by focusing on how such leaders communicate with their people. They sometimes take the following steps to give people the big picture.

They start by reminding people of the team's purpose and picture of success.

They explain the principles the team can follow to achieve the picture of success.

They invite people to make clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Different leaders do this in different ways, but the aim is the same. It is to give people the big picture – the context – and show individuals that they have an important contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

Positive Leaders

They encourage people to focus on their personal contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

They sometimes do this by communicating the following things to their people.

- The Picture Of Success

They give people of the big picture. They may do this by reminding people of the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. They also show the benefits of achieving the goals.

- The Principles

They again explain the principles the team aims to follow and, if appropriate, the priorities it needs to focus on to achieve the goals. They explain the progress made, the potential challenges and the next steps towards the picture of success.

- The Personal Contribution

They invite people to clarify the contributions they want to make towards achieving the goals. They then make clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some of the principles of positive leadership? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you aim to be positive? How can you be predictable and create an encouraging environment? How can you use your strengths to enable people to achieve peak performance?

The Shapers, Spine And Specialists Approach

There are many models for building superb teams. You may start by making sure you have people who embody the team's spirit and have certain strengths.

The next step is to get the right blend of people who are shapers, who make up the spine and who are specialists. You can then coordinate their strengths to achieve success. Let's explore these themes.

Shapers

Great teams have people who are shapers. These may be strong personalities who are good at making strategic decisions and setting the team's direction. They aim to ensure that people keep focusing on the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

Such individuals may also act as positive models when shaping the team's culture. People watch how these individuals behave and see this as 'the way we do things around here'.

Shapers often need to play to their strengths and, when appropriate, have colleagues who compensate for any weaknesses. Many leaders, for example, build a leadership team that covers the areas necessary for helping their people to achieve success.

Spine

Great teams have people who make up the spine. Such individuals are often superb workers who deliver consistently high professional high standards.

Many leaders recognise that they rely on people in the spine to translate the team's strategies into action. The quality of the work done by people in the spine often determines the quality of work done by the team.

Great teams encourage people in the spine. These people are good at implementing strategies, but it is important to give them some ownership of how to achieve the goals. Teams that take their spine for granted do so at their peril.

Specialists

Great teams make good use of specialists. Such people need to embody the spirit of the team and also provide specialist skills in their areas of expertise.

Leader often manage by outcomes when harnessing the talents of specialists. They start by giving people the context. They explain the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

Bearing in mind the person's strengths, they make clear contracts about each specialist's best contribution. They then encourage and enable them to do superb work on the way towards achieving the team's goals.

The Role Of Shapers And People In The Spine Sometimes Changes

The role that a person plays can sometimes shift depending on their responsibilities. The CEO of the European arm of a US company, for example, will act as a shaper for their people in Europe. The US head office, however, may see them as part of the spine.

A Department Head may be seen as part of the spine. They will act as a shaper, however, for the people in their team. They will have a strong influence on the culture of the team.

Let's return to your own work. Imagine that you are the leader for the team that you work in at the moment. Imagine also that you aim to make sure that you have the right blend of people in the team. If you wish, try exploring the following themes.

The Shapers

Great teams frequently have two or three people at the centre who shape the overall direction. They may involve other key people, however, to ensure that such individuals have a real sense of ownership in terms of setting and implementing the strategy.

Some teams limit themselves to a relatively small number of shapers who set the strategic direction and ensure there is alignment. This is because having many people who consider themselves to be strategic shapers can lead to some individuals pursuing their own agendas.

Great teams involve their people in helping to build the strategy but they do this within certain parameters. They make sure that everybody is committed to focus on the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

Let's return to your team. Who are the shapers you already have in the team? Write the names of these people.

What are their individual and collective strengths? What do they do well? How can they do more of these things? What can they maybe do better in the future and how?

Looking ahead, will you at any point need more shapers in the team? If so, how can develop or add more shapers? What are the steps you can take to make this happen?

The Spine

Let's return to your team. Who are the people who make up the spine? These are the people who translate the strategies into action and deliver consistently high standards.

Such people are vital. They may sometimes be taken for granted, however, so it is important to keep close to them. You can provide them with the required support and also give them the opportunity to develop.

Bearing this in mind, how can you encourage such people? How can you spend quality time with them? How can you ensure they have the support needed to do the job? How can you help them to keep developing?

Such people are often duty driven. Whilst they are prepared to implement the strategies, it is important to give them a sense of ownership in how to make things work properly.

As mentioned earlier, ignore such people at your peril. They are the people who make things work. The last thing you want is for them to walk out of the door.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Write the names of each of the people who make up the spine of the team. Then describe the specific things you can do to clarify:

The specific things they think are going well;

The specific things they think can be done better and how;

The specific support they need to be able to do their jobs well;

The specific ways they would like to develop as professionals.

You can follow up by providing this support and helping them to continue to develop. Finally, if appropriate, describe the specific things you can do to develop and add to the spine in the future.

The Specialists

Who are the specialists in your team? These are people who have specialist skills and the ability to contribute towards achieving the team's picture of success.

Such people may have specific job titles. They may be knowledge workers or individual contributors. They may be full-time workers, part-time workers or people you hire to do specialist work.

As mentioned earlier, harnessing their specialist skills often calls for managing by outcomes. Bearing in mind the person's strengths, it is important to make clear contracts with the specialist in the following areas.

The What

The specific results you would like the person to deliver towards achieving the team's goals. It is vital to agree on these outcomes.

The How

The specific strategies you would like the person to follow - and the support they need - to achieve the goals. It is also important, however, to give the specialist freedom - within certain parameters - regarding how they use their strengths to deliver the results.

The When

The specific things the person will deliver and by when. Also agree with the specialist about how they will proactively keep others informed about their progress toward achieving the goals.

The Shapers, Spine And Specialists – The Action Plan

Imagine that you have worked through the previous exercises. It is now time to translate your ideas into action. Bearing this in mind, it can be worth exploring the following themes.

What can you do to ensure the shapers play to their strengths? How can you compensate for any of their weaknesses? How can you make sure that each of them make their best contributions to the team?

What can you do to care for the people in the spine? How can you support and encourage them? How can you clarify what they think is going well and what can be done better? How can you clarify how they want to develop as professionals?

What can you do to harness the skills of the specialists? How can you make clear contracts about their best contributions? How can you keep focusing on the outcomes they are to deliver and enable them to do superb work?

What are the kinds of decisions you may need to take regarding the kinds of specialist skills the team may need in the future? How can you be proactive in taking these steps?

Let's bring this all together. What are the actions you need to take to get the right blend of shapers, people in the spine and specialists? How can you translate these ideas into action? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

There are many ways to build teams. This section has looked at one approach. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Taking Over A Team Approach

Taking Over A Team

You can aim:

-  To meet with the key stakeholders to agree on the team's goals;
-  To find and follow your successful leadership style;
-  To meet the team members to clarify their strengths and contributions towards achieving the team's goals;
-  To, if appropriate, build a good leadership team;
-  To develop your skills for communicating with people in the team.

Imagine that you are taking over a team. In the old days leaders were given one hundred days to make their mark. Nowadays people make judgements more quickly. Let's assume that you have already done the following things:

You have done your research and know what must be done to lead the team to success;

You have made clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the team's goals;

You have a clear mandate from these stakeholders to do whatever is necessary to achieve the team's goals.

Imagine you have taken these steps. The following pages describe some steps you can take in your own way when taking over a team.

The Following Your Successful Leadership Style Approach

Successful Leadership

One Approach Is:

- To find your successful leadership style;
- To follow your successful leadership style;
- To develop your successful leadership style.

There are now many books about leadership. Whilst many of these models can be helpful, it can be useful to clarify your own successful leadership style. You can complement this with other skills to deliver success.

There are many different kinds of leaders. There are people leaders, thought leaders, creative leaders and other leaders. Let's explore how you can find and follow your style in your own way.

Clarifying Your Successful Leadership Style

Most people have led something successfully at some point of their lives. They may have led a team, a task force, a campaign, a sports team or another group.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to go through the following steps.

Describe the specific times when you have led something successfully

Looking back at your life and work, when you have led something successfully? These could have been big or small events. They could have been personal or professional.

You may have been leading a specific project, an activity, a team or whatever. If possible try to think of two or three examples. Here are some that people have described.

I led something successfully:

*When I put together a team to solve a difficult problem for a client ...
When I organised my own wedding ... When I organised a fun run at university.*

*When I was captain of the national under-16 football team ... When I led the launch of a software package ... When I made a film for charity ...
When I created an induction programme for my company.*

Describe what you did right then – the principles you followed – to lead each of these things successfully

Looking at each example in turn, what did you do right to lead it successfully? Some of your answers may sound repetitive, but don't worry about that.

Some may also sound rather conceptual. If so, try to bring these to life with specific examples of what you actually did. Here are some that people have described.

The specific things I did were:

I chose to do something I felt passionately about ... I set myself a clear goal ... I spent a lot of time clarifying the What before moving to the How ... I agreed with my manager on the results to be delivered.

I put together a team of people who wanted to achieve the goal ... I put people in places where they could play to their strengths ... I had a team of people who were good at overcoming setbacks.

I kept people's eyes on the overall goal ... I kept my manager informed about our progress ... I ensured that we celebrated success ... I ensured that people rose to the occasion and delivered the goal.

What did you do right then to lead the team successfully? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? What did you – and other people – actually do? Here is the exercise.

My Successful Leadership Style

Describe your successful leadership style

Looking at the things you have led successfully, can you see any patterns? If so, describe what you think may be your successful leadership style.

One person I worked with found that their pattern was clear. He loved building prototypes. Sometimes he had done this within the company he was working in at the time. Other times he had found an employer who wanted to change the rules of the game in their particular industry.

Looking at when he had done such work, we explored the recurring patterns that made up his successful leadership style. These were:

To find a place where he could build a successful prototype;

To agree on the goals with his key stakeholders;

To set a deadline to work towards – because that was how he worked best – and for this to involve some sort of public launch;

To build a team of committed people who wanted to achieve the goals;

To explain the professional deal clearly to people before they joined the team;

To play to his own strengths and surround himself with people who could do the other work;

To encourage the team members to play to their strengths;

To get some quick wins that reassured his stakeholders;

To use these wins to buy time but also ensure he had the autonomy required to reach the goals;

To find solutions, make sure the prototype worked and produce success stories;

To do a public launch and show how the approach could help other customers to achieve success.

We then looked at each of these steps in depth. What did he actually do to make each of them happen? This helped to clarify his successful leadership style.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to look for any recurring patterns and then describe what you believe may be your successful leadership style.

Looking at the recurring patterns that have emerged, here is what I believe may be my successful leadership style.

Following Your Successful Leadership Style

Looking ahead, how can you follow your successful leadership style in the future? How can you follow it by, for example, finding or doing a specific project?

The person mentioned above took this route. They did this by taking the following steps. He clarified:

The specific kinds of prototypes he found stimulating to build;

The specific places where he could build such prototypes – such as for companies that wanted to be ahead of the game;

The specific ways he could position this offering by showing how building such a prototype would benefit the company.

Another person I worked with loved to make things work. She was superb at working for founders who wanted to get the right balance between consistency and creativity in their organisation.

She showed that she understood the founder's picture of success. She then implemented certain strategies to deliver the goods.

Showing respect for the knowledge workers, she ensured people followed similar principles – albeit using their own strengths – right across the company.

Few people have this skill, so she was often in demand. Bearing this in mind, she continually kept in touch with business owners she respected. There were always people who wanted her help to make sure the engine worked properly in their business.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the specific things you can do to follow your successful leadership style.

Developing Your Successful Leadership Style

There are many ways to develop your style. One approach is to build on your strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

Some psychometric tests tell people that they need to be well-rounded, but this ignores several factors. Great leaders are often extremely good at some things and not good at others. The key is for them to be aware of both their strengths and weaknesses.

Great leadership teams are often made up of people who complement each other's strengths. Sometimes people operate as pairs or trios to get the work done successfully. Bearing this in mind, let's return to your own leadership style. It can be worthwhile asking the following questions.

How can I build my strengths as a leader – the activities where I deliver As? How can I manage the potential consequences of my weaknesses as a leader – the activities where I deliver Bs and Cs?

How can I get people who complement my strengths and compensate for the areas where I am not so good? How can I add to my skills and continue to develop as a leader?

Good leaders realise it is vital for them to build a good leadership team. They need people who can ensure the organisation delivers outstanding work in specific areas. These include being able:

To manage the key stakeholders ... To implement the strategy ... To deliver the sales ... To market a compelling story ... To run the operations ... To build a positive culture ... To manage the finances ... To deliver great customer service ... To develop new products ... To maintain high staff morale ... To manage today's business and shape tomorrow's business.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can complement and add other skills to your leadership style. You can then implement these ideas on the road to achieving success.

Meeting With Individuals To Clarify Their Best Contributions

Imagine that you are clear on the successful leadership style. The following pages focus on how you can meet with the people in your team and clarify each person's best contribution.

Good leaders focus on clarity, competence and consistently high standards. They have a clear view about the team's goals. They also clarify the competence that each of the people will bring towards helping the team deliver consistently high standards.

Imagine that you want: a) to connect with each team member; b) to clarify their character and competence; c) to clarify their best contribution.

Different people do this in different ways. One leader explained their approach in the following way.

"Three years ago I took over the European arm of an American company. I spent the first month travelling to Rome, Madrid, Stockholm, Berlin and the other offices."

"People seemed a bit anxious about my visits. But I spent the time listening to their ideas, sharing my hopes and exploring how the company could be successful."

"Certainly I knew where to take the business, but I also wanted to connect with people in the different countries."

"My predecessor had not bothered to involve people. He told them that things needed to change and he was going to show them how to run a business."

"The meeting with individuals took time, but it was valuable. The sessions also told me a lot about the people I could build on and those who might not be ready for the journey."

"One month after the sessions I gathered everybody together to focus on the team's goals. During the presentation I referred to some of the ideas people had shared during our meetings.

"People understood it wasn't a democracy. But they enjoyed seeing how some of their ideas had influenced the vision."

How to do this in your own way? One approach is to hold one-to-one sessions with each team member. Here is an introduction to the approach.

Explain that before the sessions you would like each person to do some pre-work. Say that you obviously have a view of the team's strategy and goals. You would, however, also like to hear their views.

Invite each person to complete the following piece of work and send it to you before the session.

Hold the one-to-one sessions, listen to people's ideas and share some of your own views. Say you will soon be getting back to people to finalise the vision.

Here is The Leader's Pack for holding such sessions. This includes The Team Member's Pack that you can send to individuals before the meetings.

(This pack repeats several of the exercises already describe in The Positive Teams section of the book. I have included these here to produce a stand-alone section in case you to ever want to use it when taking over a team.)

*The Leader's Pack For Meeting Individuals
When Taking Over A Team*

Introduction

Imagine you are taking over a team and you will have already taken the following steps.

You will have done your research and know what must be done to lead the team to success.

You will have made clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the picture of success.

You will have a clear mandate from these people to do whatever is necessary to guide the team to success.

It can be useful to have meetings with the people in the team you are taking over. You will obviously do this in your own way, but here is one approach.

Explain that before the sessions you would like each person to do some prework.

Say that you obviously have a view of the team's strategy and road to success. You would, however, also like to get their input.

Invite each person to complete the following piece of work and send it to you before the session.

The Team Member's Prework Pack For The One-To-One Session

Introduction

Dear ...

As you know, I have recently taken over the leadership role in the team.

Obviously I have some clear ideas about the team's goals, strategy and road to success. But it is also important to get your input. So I would like to meet with you for a one-to-one session.

Bearing this in mind, I would like you to do some prework before the session. You can send it to me ahead of the session.

We can then use it to focus on how we can work well together to achieve the team's goals.

Here is an overview of the exercises. These are explained in more detail in the pack.

- * My View Of The Team's Goals
- * My View Of The Team's Strategies
- * My View Of The Team's Challenges
- * My Strengths And My Best Contribution

There is also space for highlighting any other topics you would like to discuss in the one-to-one.

The prework will take some time. It invites you to focus on the team's overall strategy, as well as your part. Set aside some time to do the exercises. You can send the pack to me ahead of the session and we will explore it together.

Start by bearing in mind the team's goals. Try to link your strengths and best contribution to achieving these goals.

If possible, also outline the potential pluses and minuses of making this contribution.

We cannot guarantee that it will be possible for you to do all these things. But it would be useful to know what you believe would be your best contribution.

You can set the tone and ensure people are working towards the team's goals

Imagine that you have held the one-to-one sessions with people. You can then set the tone by gathering people together and creating a positive environment.

Explain that you want to give an overview of the team's strategy and goals. You can also explain that you have had the opportunity: a) to meet with each person; b) to get their ideas; c) to clarify their best contribution. You can then describe:

The What – the team's specific goals;

The Why – the specific benefits of achieving the goals;

The How – the specific strategies for achieving the goals.

The Who – the specific role that each person can play in reaching the goals;

The When – the specific milestones on the way towards achieving the goals.

You can again make the professional deal clear. It is important to be honest about: a) your responsibilities and; b) the team members' responsibilities in working to achieve the goals.

You can explain professional standards required. It can then be useful to give people time to reflect and decide if they want to opt into the future culture.

Meeting again with each person, you can agree on their best contribution. You can encourage and enable people to achieve the team's goals.

This section has focused on how you can take these steps when taking over a team. When appropriate, you can take a similar approach to building a good leadership team. Let's explore this approach.

The Building A Strengths Based Leadership Team Approach

Strengths Based Leadership Teams

They clarify their purpose, principles and picture of success.

They clarify the strengths they have and the strengths they need to add to achieve the picture of success.

They then coordinate these strengths to achieve the picture of success.

There are many models for building good leadership teams. Some draw on the work done by Meredith Belbin. They aim to build teams that include a Shaper, Coordinator, Implementer and other roles.

Some are based on the roles in what people call the C-Suite. These include Chief Executive Officer, Chief Operating Officer, Chief People Officer and other roles.

Such teams must cover the following areas. They need people who can communicate the big picture, manage the finances, shape the culture and coordinate the operations.

They also need people who can lead the marketing, deliver the sales and provide great customer service. Most all you will need people who can coordinate these resources and deliver the picture of success.

Another approach is to build a strengths based leadership team. This embodies the approach described by Tom Rath. He explained that:

"Great leaders are not well-rounded, but great leadership teams are well-rounded."

Different leadership teams apply this approach in different way. Whichever route they take, it is important to have people who can use their strengths:

To communicate the team's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To build a positive culture in which motivated people can do superb work on the way towards achieving the picture of success;

To manage by outcomes and enable people to do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Imagine that you lead a leadership team and want to apply this approach. Let's assume that everybody is clear on the team's picture of success. You may then want to work through the following steps.

Clarify The Strengths The Team Already Has

You will do this in your own way. One approach is to look at each team member and clarify the specific activities in which they deliver As rather than Bs or Cs.

Person A. Their strengths are:

They can ...

They can ...

They can ...

Person B. Their strengths are:

They can ...

They can ...

Continue with this until you have described the specific activities where people deliver good work. You can then summarise these by completing the following exercise.

Clarify The Strengths The Team May Need To Add

Earlier in the book we focused on how to coordinate a team's strengths to achieve its goals. Bearing this approach in mind, you can then complete the following exercise.

Coordinating The Team's Strengths

The specific things we can do to coordinate the team's strengths to achieve the picture of success are:

Imagine that you have worked through these steps. You can then aim to do your best to coordinate people's strengths to achieve the picture of success.

As mentioned earlier, there are many ways to build a good leadership team. This section has looked at one approach.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to focus on your present team and complete the following sentences.

The Communication Approach

A person's communication style can play a big part in making or breaking relationships. Later we will explore how to connect with people in one-to-one, one-to-few and one-to-many situations.

Before then, here is a short introduction to some of the principles followed by good communicators. They sometimes focus on the following themes.

Clarity

This involves clarifying the real results they want to achieve and rehearsing how they can do they best to get these results when communicating with people.

Communication

This involves creating a positive environment and communicating in a way that is most likely to achieve the desired results with people

Concrete Results

This involves following up after the session and behaving in a way that is most likely to achieve the desired results with people.

Good communicators aim to connect with people. They often start by building on what people have in common and clarifying the goals for the conversation.

Such people give and receive information, find creative solutions to challenges and make clear contracts about the future. They ensure that everybody moves forward towards a shared picture of success.

Poor communicators are often more concerned with what they want to say rather than with the results to achieve from the conversation. This means they may not be fully present. They may miss cues and find it difficult to achieve mutual success.

Here is a short introduction to some of the principles followed by good communicators.

Good Communicators

They often rehearse by focusing on the Who, What, Why, How, When and Where. Here are some of the questions they may ask before meeting a person or a group.

The Who

- Who are the people - the person or group - that I will be communicating with? What are they like? What are their values? What are their personality styles? What are their communication styles?
- What will they want to get from the communication? What is happening in their world? What are the challenges they face? What is their picture of success?
- What are the Dos and Don'ts for communicating with these people? What are the examples I can use to show I understand their world? What for them would make it a good conversation or session?

The What And Why

- What are the real results I want to achieve from the communication? What are the results the other people want to achieve?
- What are the key messages I want to give people? What do I want people to be feeling, thinking and saying after the communication?
- Why do I want to achieve these results? What will be the benefits for the various people? What will be happening afterwards that will show that the communication or session has been successful?

The How

- How can I do my best to achieve the results? How can I connect with people? How can I build on what we have in common?

 - How can I establish clarity? How can I position the topics we are going to explore? How can I make sure we agree on the goals for the session? How can I double check everybody is okay with the agenda?

 - How can I communicate clearly? How can I put the key messages in a way that people can receive? How can I bring the messages to life with real examples from people's world? How can I make sure people have received the messages?
- How can I show I am listening? How can I show respect for people? How can I show I understand their point of view, even though I might have another view? How can I encourage people to work towards the agreed results?

 - How can I, if appropriate, help us to clarify the possible ways forward? How can I help to find creative solutions to challenges? How can I summarise what we have agreed? How can I double check we all have the same picture?

 - How can I make clear contracts with people about who needs to do what and by when? How can I make sure people get the practical support they need? How can we get some early wins? How can I help people to achieve the agreed picture of success?

The When And Where

- When do I want to communicate with people? Where would be the best place to hold the conversation or session? How can I create the right physical and psychological environment?
- How can I prepare properly? How can I mentally rehearse all the possible scenarios? How can I rehearse the strategies and solutions for achieving success? How can I help the other people to prepare properly?
- After the conversation, how will I know we are on the right road going forward? What will be happening that will show we are achieving the agreed concrete results? How can I continue to encourage people to achieve success?

Communicating One-To-One

Imagine you are meeting a customer, a team member, your manager or another person. or whoever. You will probably ask some of the questions mentioned above. You will focus on:

Who is the person? What is their agenda? What are the results they want to achieve? What are the results I want to achieve? How can I do my best to get win-wins?

Having rehearsed the meeting, you will then click into action and be fully present. You will then do your best to have a good conversation and achieve the desired positive results.

Let's focus on a different kind of one-to-one situation where you may be acting as a counsellor, coach or mentor. This may also call for you to use your listening skills. Let's explore this theme.

Good Listeners

They create an environment in which the person feels safe and at ease. They invite the person to talk and then go through the following steps.

- They listen for the theme in what the person is saying.
- They make sure they understand the picture inside the person's head.
- They may invite the person to describe their picture of success.

Good listeners listen for the theme in what a person is saying. They then play back what they have heard to check that they understand the picture inside the person's head.

This approach can be applied in both your personal and professional life. You can use it when encouraging a team member, clarifying a brief with a customer or listening to your partner. Let's explore this approach.

Imagine that a person has asked to meet with you to get some advice. They may want to talk how to tackle a challenge, how to take the next step in their career or some other topic.

Good listeners start by creating an environment in which the person feels safe and at ease. They then encourage the person to open up and talk. Different people do this in different ways. One approach is to ask the person some of the following questions.

"What would you like to talk about? What is on your mind? What is happening in your world? Are there any challenges or other topics that it might be useful to explore?"

Imagine that you have created such an environment. The person has opened up and begun talking about a particular topic. It can then be useful to take the following steps.

You can listen for the theme in what the person is saying

Good listeners pay attention to what a person is saying. They often look beyond the words, however, and look for recurring patterns. They listen for the theme in what a person is saying.

They may invite a person to go beyond generalities and give specific examples. This is because some people talk in concepts or use sweeping terms. They may say, for example:

"I feel stressed ... People upset me ... I want a more satisfying job ... The world has gone mad and nothing seems certain anymore."

Imagine that somebody is talking with you about their situation. It can be useful to listen for any recurring theme in what they are saying. You can then play back your understanding by saying something like:

"Are you saying that ...?"

Keep going until the person says:

"Yes, that is right."

You can then move on to the next step.

You can make sure you understand the picture inside a person's head

People see and interpret the world in different ways. So it is vital to understand what a person means when they explain their situation or talk about their goals. This calls for making sure you understand the picture inside a person's head.

Later we will look at how to take this step. Before then, however, here is a communication exercise that illustrates how people see things differently.

The exercise is called What Colour Is Your Horse? It is one that I have used many times on workshops.

This involves explaining to people that I am going to give them an exercise on communication. The next step is to invite people to close their eyes and give them the following instructions.

Imagine a field in the country. In the field there is a horse. It is up to you what colour the horse is. It could be black, brown, white or another colour.

There may be other animals around. There might be a farmhouse or other buildings nearby. It is up to you what kind of day it is.

The horse runs around the field, jumps over a fence and runs away into the distance.

You can open your eyes now. Form pairs and each spend 30 seconds describing your picture.

Calling people back together, I then ask:

"What colour was the horse?"

Different people give different answers. They may say brown, black, white or another colour. So I say something along the following lines.

"People interpret information in different ways and every person's picture is right for them.

"You would think it was crazy if you saw a black horse and I said you had got the wrong colour – that it was a white horse. But have you ever been in that situation?"

"You may think you have made an agreement with somebody. But then, when you follow up afterwards, they say you have got the wrong picture. This can happen with a boss, colleague or other person.

"Good communicators often finish a conversation by making clear contracts. They make sure everybody has agreed on the colour of the horse."

Good communication calls for double-checking your understanding of the other person's view. It is vital to understand the agreed picture.

Imagine that your manager says they want something done 'as quickly as possible'. Does this mean when you have finished your present task, when you have time or immediately? (They probably want it done yesterday!)

Imagine that a person says they want you to encourage them. Do they mean to praise them all the time, give positive but realistic feedback or make suggestions about how they can improve?

Imagine that your partner says they want you to change your behaviour. Do you understand the actions they want you to stop? Do you know what they want you to do instead in the future?

Let's explore another step that can be taken to understand the goals a person wants to achieve in their personal or professional life.

You may invite the person to describe their picture of success

Imagine that you have listened to a person and shown you understand the issues they face. If they have asked for your advice, for example, you may say something like the following.

"As far as I understand, this is what is happening. Is that right? If so, is it okay if I share some ideas about the possible ways forwards?"

Good mentors always go through this step. They check with a person that it is okay to share ideas. Why do they take this step?

Some people simply want to talk about problems but not do anything about solving them. Other people are prepared to do the work involved in exploring solutions and achieving success.

Good mentors follow the rule that a person must have the will before they can learn a skill. They therefore check if it is okay to share knowledge with the person.

Imagine another situation. What can you do if the person simply keeps talking about negative things?

One approach is to use what are called Flip Questions. It is to invite the person to describe their positive picture of success. Here are some examples of using such questions when helping a person.

"At the moment you say that you feel bad. What would you like to feel instead? Would you like to feel calm, at ease or have some other feeling? If you wish, we can explore how you can increase the chances of feeling this way in your life and work."

"At the moment you say that a certain person behaves in a way that causes problems. How would you like them to behave instead? What are the actual things you would like them to do in their interactions with people?"

"At the moment you say that some people in the team behave in ways that hurt others. I can offer some practical tools for dealing with these situations, but we can also look at your longer-term goals."

"Looking 6 months ahead, what would you like the people in your team to be saying, thinking and feeling? If you wish, we can look at how to achieve these things and build a successful team."

You will have your own approach to inviting a person to describe their picture of success. If appropriate, you can then pass on knowledge or offer practical tools they can use to achieve their goals.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a one-to-one situation where you may be meeting with a person?

What may be the results that: a) they want to achieve from the meeting; b) you want to achieve? How can you connect with the person, communicate clearly and do your best to make it a successful meeting?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Communicating One-To-One

The specific situation where I may be communicating with a person may be:

Communicating One-To-Few

Imagine you are the leader in such a situation. You may be conducting a meeting, catching with a work group or facilitating a workshop. When meeting the people, it will be important:

To clarify the specific goals for the meeting;

To check if anybody would like to add other items to the agenda;

To begin exploring the first topic.

It may be useful to open up the first topic, explain the goals to achieve, invite others to share their views, listen carefully and then, at an appropriate time, close down the topic.

Making a decision, you will ensure everybody is clear on the way forward. Moving onto the next topic, you will continue until the agenda is completed.

Sometimes you may play a different role in a group - such as when meeting with peers or simply contributing to a departmental meeting. Preparation is the key to participating in a group. You can choose:

To clarify the role you want to play and the contribution you want to make to the situation;

To anticipate everything that may happen in the situation;

To rehearse how you want to communicate and contribute to achieving a successful meeting;

You can then go in and do your best to make a positive contribution to the meeting.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Communicating One-To-Few

Communicating One-To-Many

Communicating with large groups can be challenging. One person expressed their feeling about this in the following way.

"I enjoy individual and small group meetings, but I feel uncomfortable talking to large groups.

"Maybe it is because in smaller sessions I can see how people respond and also get into dialogue. This is more difficult in big groups. The things you say seem to disappear into the ether.

"For somebody like me, who thrives on instant feedback, it can be quite challenging to speak to big groups."

Some leaders develop their ability to communicate in one-to-many situations. They may do this by focusing on the following themes.

They aim to be themselves in the situation. They use their own voice, language and examples. They aim to be professional but also express their personality.

They know their audience. They know the challenges these people face in their daily work and world.

They clarify the key messages they want to give people. They know how to communicate these messages in a way people can receive. They give examples to bring the messages to life.

They spend a lot of time preparing. They practice until they can forget. They go through the process of rehearsing, relaxing and then rising to the occasion.

They start the session by positioning what they are going to say. They often give the context – the bigger picture - before going on to give concrete examples. This helps people to see things in a wider context.

They give the key messages to people by moving between the concept and the concrete. They give an idea and then illustrate it with an example that people can recognise in their daily lives.

They conclude the session by outlining the next steps. They also, when appropriate, give people the chance to integrate and implement the ideas in their daily work and lives.

Some people are good communicators one-to-one, some one-to-few, some one-to-many. Whatever situation they enter, they find it useful to prepare properly and then do their best to achieve the desired picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on the theme of communication. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific situation where you may want to communicate with people on a one-to-many basis.

Describe the real results you want to achieve from the communication in the situation.

Describe the specific things you can do to connect with the people, communicate clearly and achieve the desired results.

The Different Kinds Of Clicks Approach

This section involves another aspect of communication. You may find it easy to work with some people but find others more challenging. With some people there is both a personal and professional click. With some there is a professional click. With some there is no click.

This aspect is important to consider if your role involves communicating with stakeholders. This can be challenging if it is difficult to connect with them. Let's explore these themes.

There is both a personal and professional click

You may share similar values with these people and have a similar view of the world. Connection is easy because you start from common assumptions.

You therefore begin at 7/10. This provides a springboard for getting to 10/10. Let's consider how you can build with such people, beginning with colleagues.

Who are the colleagues with whom you share similar values? How can you help them to succeed? How can you co-operate to achieve success? One person explained this in the following way.

"During the past 15 years I have worked on several projects with two colleagues I met when working at my first company.

"Since then we have set up and sold two marketing companies. We know each other, warts and all. We also know how to work with our respective strengths and weaknesses.

"People describe me as a serial entrepreneur. Wherever I go, however, I will always take these two people.

Let's move onto your customers. Who are the customers with whom you work best? What are their personality characteristics? How can you do more work with these customers? How can you help them to succeed?

They may recommend you to similar kinds of customers, but this should not be forced. Providing you do good work, this may well happen naturally.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at both colleagues and customers, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe the people with whom you have both a personal and professional click. Write their names. Describe the specific things you can do to build with these people.

Personal And Professional Clicks

There is a professional click

You may find this happens when working with somebody in your professional life. Whilst having differing personalities, you both strongly believe in achieving a specific goal.

Many famous comic partnerships in show business, for example, comprised of people who seldom saw each other socially. Once on stage, however, they produced fine performances.

Similarly, you may have customers with whom there is little social talk. It is quickly down to the matter in hand. You will probably take several steps to manage such relationships.

You will prepare properly. Looking ahead to any interaction, you will ask yourself:

"What will be the person's goals? What will they want to achieve in the short, medium and long-term? How can I help them to succeed?"

You will be professional. When starting a meeting you will double check what they want to achieve in the session. You will aim to deliver high professional standards in everything you do with the person.

You can aim to deliver positive results. You will aim to perform superb work and deliver the agreed results. Sometimes you may add go into another dimension and achieve peak performance.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at both colleagues and customers, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe the people with whom you have a professional click. Write their names. Describe the specific things you can do to build with these people.

There is no click

Sometimes you may find yourself in work situations where there is absolutely no connection between you and the other person.

It is best to avoid such problems, but circumstances may mean it is necessary to work together to achieve a specific goal. You may feel on guard, however, and unable to relax.

How to deal with such difficulties? Imagine there is a video camera on you all the time. You will aim to be professional and behave in a diligent way. It will be hard work, because you may need:

To mentally rehearse every situation that may arise;

To be fully alert and pay attention to everything;

To make crystal clear contracts before, during and at the end of each meeting or interaction;

To be super professional, perform superb work and deliver the goods;

To be prepared for increased demands or criticism and be able to manage such behaviour in a professional way.

We frequently do our best work with kindred spirits, but this is not always possible. It is therefore useful to clarify your strategies for working with different types of people. You are then more able to perform superb work and achieve an agreed picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. Looking at both colleagues and customers, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe the professional situations where you may be with people with whom there is no click. Describe the specific things you can do to behave in a professional way in such situations.

The Clear Contracting Approach

Clear contracting plays a crucial part in many areas of life. These include both personal and professional relationships. Making clear contracts can provide the platform for achieving success.

There are, of course, many different kinds of contracts. Some contracts may be practical – such as legal or working contracts – but others might be psychological.

Professional contracts often involve people following certain guidelines on the way towards achieving the agreed goals. Personal contracts often involve people agreeing about how they will behave when living or working together.

Sometimes contracts involve signing a piece of paper. Sometimes there is a spoken agreement. Sometimes the agreement is assumed but unspoken. The latter can, of course, lead to misunderstandings.

Different people make contracts in different ways. They do, however, often focus on the following themes.

- Clarity

This involves people being crystal clear on the real results to achieve – the picture of success.

- Contracting

This involves people making clear agreements on the responsibilities in working to achieve the picture of success.

- Concrete Results

This involves people fulfilling the agreements and doing their best to achieve the picture of success.

Clear contracting plays a key part in educational, coaching and other professional relationships. Sometimes this contract is extremely explicit.

This is the case when, for example, a therapist is working with a recovering alcoholic or addict. The therapist will make it clear that they will only work with a client if they want to be healthy and act in a responsible way. Breaking the agreement will lead to the end of the therapeutic relationship.

Looking at your own life, can you think of a situation when you made clear contracts with somebody or a group of people? What did you do to make the clear contracts? What did people then do to carry out what was agreed and fulfil the contracts?

Clear Contracting In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I made clear contracts with a person or a group was:

The specific things I did to then to make sure we made clear contracts were:

The specific things I and they did to make sure we fulfilled the agreed contract were:

As mentioned earlier, there are different kinds of contracts. This section of the book focuses on three themes. These are making contracts in professional relationships, making contracts in personal relationships and making contracts with yourself.

People often follow similar steps in each of these cases. As mentioned earlier, they focus on the following themes.

Clarity - people agree on the specific goals to achieve.

Contracting - people agree on the actions required - and who will do what - to achieve the goals.

Concrete Results - people carry out the actions and achieve the goals.

Making Contracts In Professional Relationships

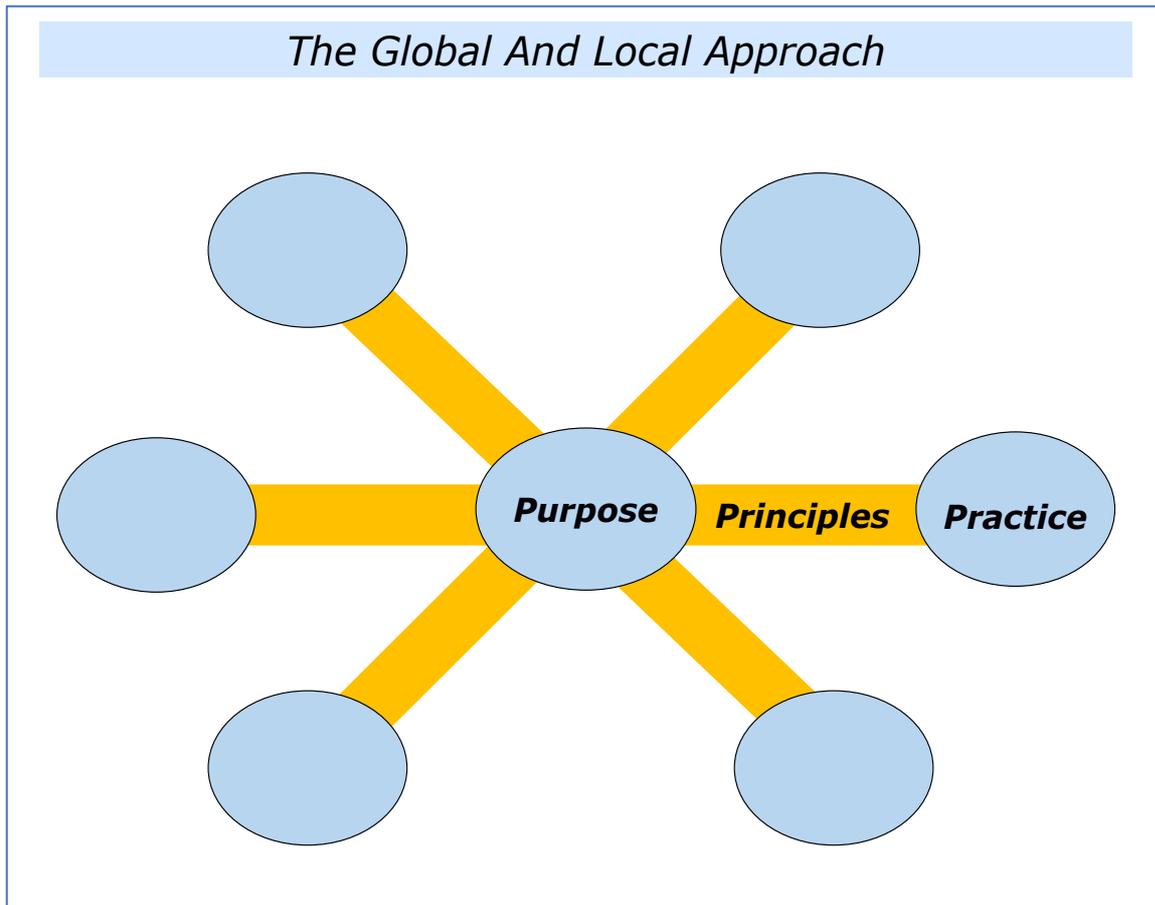

People often enter into a contract when taking up a professional role. Sometimes this is made explicit by them agreeing to follow a certain professional credo. This may require them to sign a formal agreement.

Sometimes it takes the form of people making a verbal agreement to follow certain principles. The guidelines that people are expected to follow will differ depending on the task.

They may be aiming to climb a mountain, build an elite sports team, run an Accident & Emergency Unit, find a breakthrough medical cure or whatever. People can be given chance to decide if they want to opt into following these guidelines to achieve the mission.

Let's explore how this can work in action. Good leaders, for example, manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. This involves them going through the following steps.

Clear Contracting When Managing By Outcomes

This approach is often used in organisations that get the right balance between the global and the local. They combine the best aspects of a big organisation with the spirit of a small enterprise. They also manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

The centre communicates the purpose and the principles. The way that people practice these is up to them, within parameters, in their part of the organisation.

But this comes with a proviso: people must show how what they are doing is following the principles and contributing to the purpose.

Good leaders encourage people to think global and act local. This calls for creating an adult-adult relationship, however, with everybody taking responsibility for making their best contributions to the company.

Imagine that you lead a large organisation and are addressing all the employees. You will aim to communicate the big picture whilst also encouraging people to take ownership for the local practice.

Different leaders will do this in different ways. One approach is to say something along the following lines. This covers some of the topics mentioned earlier regarding communicating with a team, but it also adds some important provisos.

Welcome To Today's Session.

I am going to give an overview of our organisation's purpose and the part you can play in making this happen.

Later I will give some examples of how people have contributed to this purpose in the past and how they can contribute in the future.

But first let me give an outline of our overall approach to working together.

The Purpose

The purpose of our organisation is:

* To

The Principles

The principles we aim to follow to pursue our purpose are:

* To

* To

* To

The Picture Of Success

The picture of success we want to achieve in the next year that will be an expression of our principles is:

* To

* To

* To

The Practice

The way you practice these principles and contribute to achieving the picture of success will - within parameters - be up to you in your part of the organisation.

But there is a key point. You must show how what you practice supports the principles and contributes toward achieving the goals.

We want you to take time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute. If so, we will then make clear contracts with you about the outcomes you want to deliver towards achieving the picture of success.

Good leaders build on the people who want to contribute. They then take the following step.

Managing By Outcomes

Good leaders give people the big picture because they recognise that knowledge workers, for example, want context. They then manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

They spend a lot of time with people agreeing on what must be delivered. Many people are used to writing lists of tasks and talking about what they will do. It can take time to educate them to focus on the outcomes they will deliver.

Good leaders make crystal-clear contracts about the real results to achieve. Why? Because from then on virtually every performance conversation will start by concentrating on the agreed outcomes, rather than get into supervising the tasks.

After such a contracting session, for example, here is how one team leader might describe their contribution under the Three Ps.

My Contribution To The Picture of Success

Profitability

To ensure my team achieves its financial targets – a profit of £500k.

To develop 3 new customers and do work with them that delivers a profit of £100k.

To reduce our overheads by £100k.

Products

To ensure more than 90%+ of our customers say they are extremely satisfied with our work.

To develop 2 new products and pilot these successfully with customers – then launch these products by the end of the year.

To simplify 2 of our complex products to ensure these are more user friendly for customers - then get a further £100k's worth of orders for these before the end of the year.

People

To deliver an internal morale rating of 90%+ of our team members saying they enjoy coming to work each day.

To educate, equip and enable 2 of my team members to win promotion and move on to other roles in the company.

To recruit 4 new positive team members who take responsibility, build on their strengths and get some early successes that contribute towards achieving the team's goals.

Why take this approach? People can get into a pattern of talking about details, making excuses or whatever. They may also confuse activity with results.

Certainly sometimes it is vital to revisit the aims to ensure these are still desirable and possible. Whether it concerns profits, product quality or people, however, the mantra is:

"Let's focus on the desired outcomes. How can we do our best to deliver these results?"

Sounds tough? Perhaps, but it is also a good way of leading a team. People learn:

To clarify the specific goals that are written in outcome terms;

To make clear contracts about the goals, including the required support;

To take responsibility, be creative and do their best to deliver the agreed outcomes.

Managing By Outcomes In Challenging Situations

Good leaders also focus on outcomes when people face challenges in their work. One leader I worked with took this approach when a team member asked them about how to deal with a problem client. The team member explained this in the following way.

"We are having problems with a difficult client. They are always complaining, even though we give good service, and this is wearing down our staff. The client is part of a culture where the bosses rule by fear, which may be why they take the same approach with us.

"The client now wants us to lower our prices. This will be difficult, however, because we make little money from our work with them. I also fear for our staff who are near breaking point. I would be grateful for any ideas you have about what we can do."

The leader listened to their team member. They then said something along the following lines.

"Thanks for the background information. Of course, I am happy to offer some ideas. Before then, however, let's look at the outcomes we want to achieve. Do we want:

"To keep the client – at least until we have found another to replace them; to keep giving good service and make some profit; to care for our staff and encourage them whilst we are trying to replace the client?"

"Are there any other things we want to achieve? Bearing these things in mind, let's explore the key things we can do to achieve these outcomes."

The leader and team member agreed on a plan: a) to continue to give good service to the existing client; b) to find a new client to replace the income stream; c) to give support to their staff in the meantime. They translated their plans into action and resolved the issue within two months.

Many leaders find that over the years their control needs get stronger. They also realise, however, that they will be judged by the performance of their people.

Clear Contracting In Coaching Situations

Good coaches often use the contracting approach when working with people. They do this when encouraging athletes, learners and in other professional situations.

They start by establishing a coaching contract. The following process seems very structured, but you can adapt it in your way.

The coach begins by inviting the coachee to have an initial go at filling in the coaching contract. The coachee is asked to describe:

The specific goals they want to achieve;

The specific things they see as their responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals;

The specific kinds of help they want from the coach and other people in working towards achieving the goals;

The specific things that will be happening that will show they have achieved the goals.

The coachee and coach then meet to agree on the coaching contract. This forms the basis for their work together.

What happens if the coachee breaks the contract? Depending on the situation, the coach may immediately stop working with the person. On other occasions, they may ask them:

"Let's go back to the goals you want to achieve? Do you still want to achieve these goals?"

"What do you see as your responsibilities in working to achieve the goals? Are you prepared to do those things?"

"If so, then we may have the basis for working together. If not, then that is your choice. And, as we know, every choice has consequences. If you wish, take time to reflect. Then let me know your answer."

Good encouragers are supportive, but they can also be tough. They give people clear messages and are prepared to follow through on the consequences. Here is the framework for the coaching contract.

The Coaching Contract

The coachee starts by filling the following pages. They then meet with their coach to agree on the coaching contract for working towards the coachee's goals.

The Goals. The specific results I want to achieve are:

Making Contracts In Personal Relationships

Good relationships often involve clear contracting. Looking at your own life, you will know the people who will do exactly what they say they will do. There may be others about whom you are less certain. Breaking the agreements can lead to breaking the relationships.

People often enter into contracts in their personal lives. Some involve both verbal and written agreements. These may include getting married, drawing up a will or making financial agreements.

People also make verbal contracts when living together. They agree on who will take care of the various tasks involved in earning money, looking after the house, caring for the children and doing other activities

Individuals also make assumptions, rather than clear contracts, with their friends and loved ones. They develop ways of relating to each other that, whilst seldom spoken about, form the basis for their interactions.

They may get upset if others behave in ways that veer from what they expect. If appropriate, they may then try to rectify matters by talking about the issue and making clear contracts for the future.

During my early career I worked with both healthy and unhealthy families. This highlighted how clear contracting played a part in building good relationships.

Healthy parents were positive and predictable. They were supportive, created a safe environment and encouraged others to develop.

Such parents gave clear messages, however, about how people were expected to behave. People in the family felt valued but also knew the consequences if they behaved in ways that hurt others.

Unhealthy parents were negative and unpredictable. They often gave conflicting messages that caused chaos and confusion. As a result, other people felt scared and unable to develop.

During family therapy we invited people to make clear contracts about how they wanted to treat each other. Every family already had contracts. Some contracts were unspoken, however, and some caused difficulties.

One father, for example, told their teenage addict son that he must learn to take responsibility and get a job. At the end of the session, however, they gave the son money to go and spend with their friends. The unspoken agreement was:

"I am going to tell you to take responsibility, but then I am going to enable you to stay in your role as an addict."

Both parents were asked if they were serious. Did they really want their son to take responsibility? If so, it was important to make clear contracts about him looking after himself.

The parents agreed and, despite a few difficulties, stuck to their parts of the bargain. The son left home and stayed with friends. He was a survivor and began to put his life together.

Imagine that you want to make a clear contract with somebody. Sometimes this will be relatively simply. Both yourself and the other person may want similar things. You can then agree on common goals and work together to achieve the picture of success.

Sometimes it is more complicated. People may want some things in common but have differences in other areas. You may then want to apply the approach described elsewhere in the book in the section on finding win-win solutions.

There are many ways to make contracts with people in personal relationships. This often involves taking the following steps:

To focus on a specific topic about which you want to make a clear contract;

To, when looking at the topic, create an environment where each party feels able to say what they would like to do or achieve;

To build on what you have in common – or focus on win-win solutions to differences - and clarify the real results to achieve;

To clarify each party's responsibilities in working towards the goal and make sure that everybody has the same picture;

To encourage each other and do your best to fulfil the contracts and achieve the desired results.

One approach is to use the following framework. This sounds very structured, so you may wish to adapt it in your own way.

Clear Contracting

The following framework can be used when people make clear contracts. The approach looks formal, but it can be adapted to different situations.

The key is to make sure that everybody is clear on the results to achieve, the guidelines to follow and each party's responsibilities. They can then work to achieve the agreed goals.

The Why. The specific benefits of achieving the results will be:

Making Contracts With Yourself

Sometimes the most important contract you make is with yourself. You may believe in following certain principles in life, for example, and aim to follow these, even when things get tough. Faced by a challenging situation, you may buy time to think. You may then ask:

"What is happening in the situation? Bearing in mind what I can control, what do I want to do? What are the real results I want to achieve? What are the principles I believe in following in life? How can I follow these principles in this situation? How can I do my best to achieve the picture of success?"

Peak performers, for example, make a clear contract with themselves about what they want to do in their personal or professional lives. They start by clarifying their goals. They then do due diligence and clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving the goals.

Such people then commit to pursuing their chosen path. They keep returning to this internal contract – which acts as a compass – when making decisions about their future actions.

Making an internal contract calls for translating ideas into action. A person may choose to get up at a certain time, eat certain foods, behave in certain ways or do certain activities. They develop a rhythm for doing these things and this becomes part of their daily life.

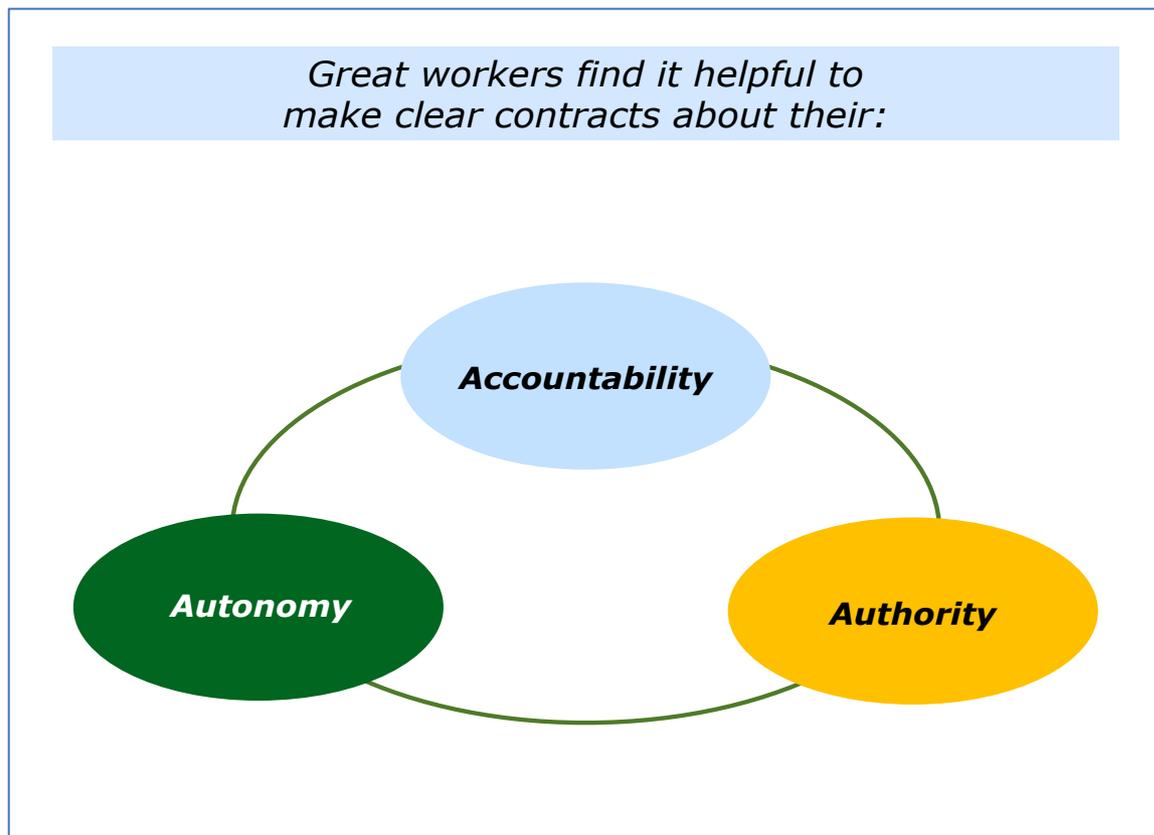

Some people make a contract with themselves to follow a certain mantra. A person may, for example, keep saying the following things to themselves (other people may follow other scripts).

Keep being positive. Keep doing your best. Keep encouraging other people.

Such a mantra acts like a personal contract that they aim to follow in different situations. As one person said:

"My contract with myself is always to do my best."

Clear Contracting When Taking A Professional Role

Imagine that you are on the point of taking a role in an organisation. During the interviews you established credibility by doing the following things.

You showed that you understood the organisation's goals;

You described the specific results you would deliver to contribute towards achieving the organisation's goals;

You described how you would keep the stakeholders informed about your progress toward delivering the organisation's goals.

Before taking the position, it can be useful to make clear contracts about various aspects of the role. Whilst you will be happy to be accountable, you may also need the required authority and autonomy to deliver success.

You can explore these themes with your potential employer. It is important to do this in a positive and professional way, however, rather than being seen as demanding.

Clarifying Your Accountability

As mentioned earlier, you will have clarified the results to achieve. Agree with your potential employer about what must be delivered and by when.

Play back your understanding to ensure that you all agree on the same picture. It is important to be absolutely clear about the results on which you will be judged.

Imagine that you take the role. Events can occur that mean your employer needs to change what they want you to deliver. Bearing this in mind, it will be useful to - in a diplomatic way - keep making clear contracts about the picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at the role for which you are applying, this invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific results you will be accountable for delivering.

Describe, on a scale 0 – 10, the extent to which you believe you will be held accountable for delivering these results. (It will probably be 10/10.)

Describe the specific things you can do to keep making clear contracts about the results to be delivered.

Accountability

The specific results I will be accountable for delivering will be:

*

The specific extent to which I will be held accountable for delivering these will be:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to keep making clear contracts about the results to deliver are:

*

Clarifying Your Authority

Clarify the authority you will have to perform the role. Make sure it feels like you have at least 8/10 in terms of having the power to act.

Authority and autonomy are intertwined, of course, and you may need both to operate successfully. One manager explained this in the following way.

"Several years ago I took a high-profile European position with a stretching brief. Unfortunately I was not given the authority to do the job.

"The company told me to implement a customer service programme across the region, but we were in the midst of matrix madness. Dotted lines abounded everywhere and nobody took responsibility.

"Lacking direct power, I was supposed to use my influencing skills to improve customer service in ten countries. My time was spent circling in the holding position above airports, attending meaningless meetings and eventually becoming dispirited.

"Learning from the tough experience, I got a clear brief and mandate before taking my present job."

If you wish, try completing the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the kinds of authority you would like to have in order to deliver the results.

Describe, on a scale on to 10, the extent to which you feel you will have the authority to act.

Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Authority

The specific kinds of authority I would like to have in order to deliver the results are:

The specific extent to which I feel I will have the required authority is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Clarifying Your Autonomy

Clarify the freedom you will have to perform the role. Make sure it feels like you have at least 8/10 in terms of having the autonomy to shape things as you wish.

You must operate within parameters, of course, but you need oxygen to breathe. Agree with the employer on the autonomy you will have, for example:

To set the team's goals ... To set the team's strategies ... To manage the team's budget ... To decide who to hire and fire ... To do whatever is necessary to achieve the team's goals.

As mentioned earlier, it can be useful to clarify your accountability, authority and autonomy before taking a role. There may be times, however, when you feel that the original deal has changed. This can happen as events evolve.

You can then make new clear contracts with your employer. If you feel that there is not enough authority and autonomy in the role, however, you may need to make a decision.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the kinds of autonomy you would like to have in order to deliver the results.

Describe, on a scale on 0 - 10, the extent to which you feel you will have the autonomy required to deliver the results.

Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Autonomy

The specific kinds of autonomy I would like to have in order to deliver the results are:

*

The specific extent to which I feel I will have the required autonomy is:

_____ / 10

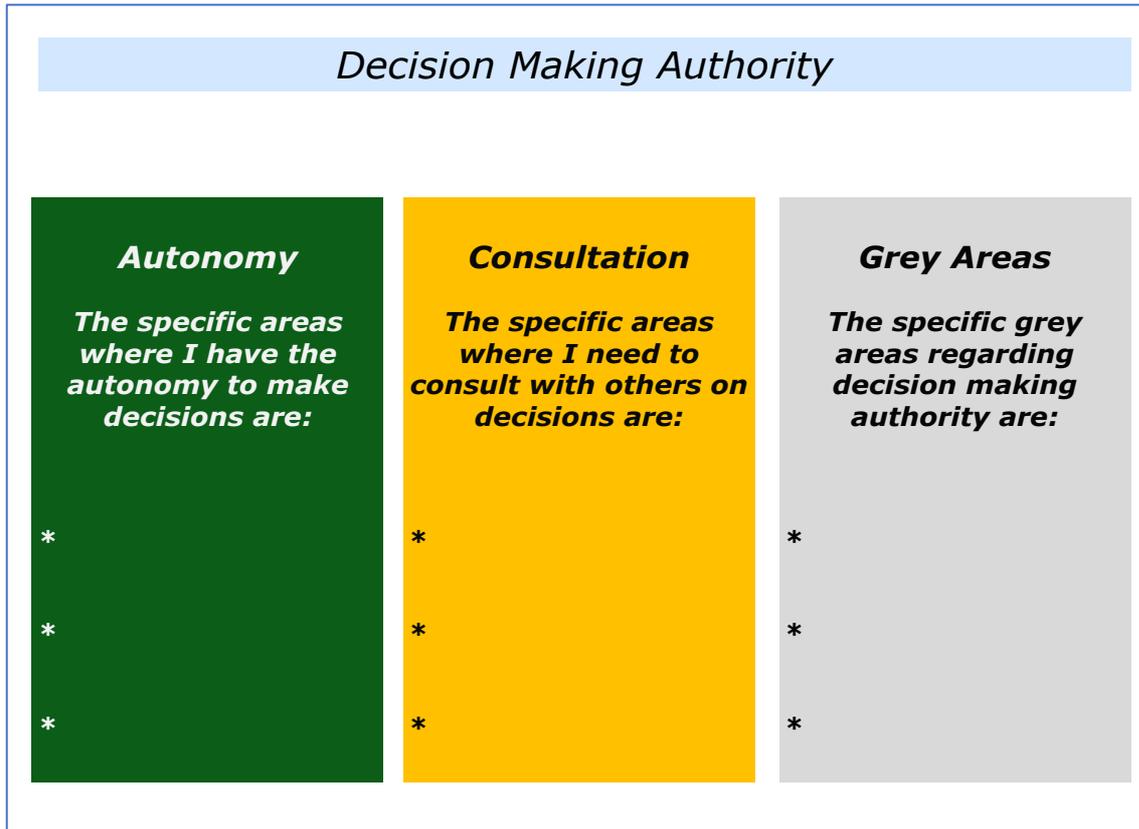

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

The Decision Making Authority Approach

People can get into difficulty because of confusion about their decision making authority. This section explores how it is possible to make clear contracts regarding decision making.

Imagine you have recently taken a new role in an organisation. You started with enthusiasm and agreed your goals. After trying several creative ideas, however, you met resistance.

When taking the job, you believed you had a clear brief and mandate. But several departments feel you are treading on their toes. How to tackle this challenge?

One approach is to meet with the manager to whom you report - and the other stakeholders - to make clear contracts about your decision making authority. Let's explore how to take these steps.

Agree with your manager about your decision making authority

You are prepared to be accountable, but you also need clarity. Bearing this in mind, arrange a meeting with your manager and get their views on the following topics.

Autonomy

Start by focusing on the areas where you both agree you have such autonomy. These may include aspects of the budget, the people in your team, managing certain issues with customers and other topics. Agree with your sponsor on the following aspects.

Autonomy

The specific areas where I have the authority to make decisions are:

*

Consultation

Sometimes there may be other stakeholders you need to involve before taking action. This is especially true in large organisations.

Clarify the areas where you have to consult with other people – and with whom – regarding making decisions. This can slow things down, but it is important to keep the key stakeholders on board.

Bearing this in mind, agree with your manager about whom you should consult with and about what. Later you can make clear contracts with these people.

Consultation

The specific areas where I may need to consult with other people – and with whom – regarding making decisions are:

Grey Areas

These are the areas that can lead to confusion. People may not know whom can decide about what. This can result in individuals making assumptions, invading each other's areas or letting things fall through the net.

It is often the grey areas that can create problems. Bearing this in mind, brainstorm with you sponsor what may be the topics that fall into this category. You can then focus on these areas and try to establish clarity.

Grey Areas

The specific areas where there may be confusion about decision making are:

Clarify The Decision Making Authority

Imagine that you have done some initial work on these themes. You can then begin making clear contracts with the various stakeholders.

The following section describes how John, a manager I worked with, applied this approach. He began by meeting with his manager.

"The first step was to agree on the specific activities where I had the power to act autonomously. This proved relatively easy, though there was slightly less freedom than I had imagined.

"The second step was to explore the areas where I had to consult. My manager agreed it was important that as few people as possible be involved in making certain decisions, otherwise there would be paralysis. So we agreed on the activities:

a) where other people should be fully consulted in making a decision; b) where other people should be given a sense of ownership, but that I had the final say; c) where other people had the final say and I had to try to work with them to get a win-win.

"The next step was to explore the grey areas. These were the activities where it was not clear who could make a decision and this was creating difficulties.

"We began moving these grey areas into one of the first two sections – those where I had the authority to make decisions or where I needed to consult with others. It was important to take this step, otherwise there would be continued confusion."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can make clear contracts with your manager about your decision making authority.

Decision Making Authority

The specific things I can do to make clear contracts with my key sponsor about my decision making authority are:

Agree with the various stakeholders about the decision making authority

John then moved on to having conversations with other stakeholders. He described how his manager laid the groundwork for these meetings.

"Before I approached the other stakeholders – such as the heads of departments – he requested their help. He sent the following message.

'As you know, we are all aiming to achieve a common goal. This calls for making clear contracts about each person's – and each department's – decision making authority.

"Bearing this in mind, John will be meeting each of you to agree on the respective areas of decision making authority.

'At the moment, you each have areas: a) where you have the autonomy to make decisions; b) where you need to consult with others; c) where the areas are somewhat grey.

'I would like you to work together with John to make clear contracts about the respective areas of decision making authority. I look forward to seeing the outcomes of your meetings.'

The manager's message set the scene for the meetings with other stakeholders. John explained this in the following way.

"My manager also talked with some individuals heads to ease the way. Although there were still some challenges, we worked together to find win-win solutions. We managed to work out the respective decision making authority."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can make clear contracts with other key stakeholders about your and their decision making authority.

Continue making clear contracts about the decision making authority

Unexpected events or poor communication can jeopardise working relationships. So it is important:

To keep making clear contracts;

To keep connecting with key sponsors and stakeholders to update how things are going and review or change the contracts;

To anticipate future events and clarify the respective responsibilities when tackling these challenges.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can continue to make clear contracts with your manager and other key stakeholders.

How can you find out what each party wants? How can you agree on the results to achieve? How can you make sure that each party has the same picture?

The Three Waves Approach To Shifting A Culture

Imagine you are a leader. You have been given the authority to do whatever is necessary to shift an organisation's culture. Some leaders invite the employees to change, but this seldom works.

Another approach is to use the three waves approach. This involves aiming to go through the following stages.

The First Wave

Building successful prototypes that embody the desired culture and produce success stories.

The Second Wave

Working with more people who follow the principles, deliver success and produce success stories.

The Third Wave

Making the principles mandatory, providing people with the support they need and keep producing success stories.

You then invite people to choose whether or not they want to be part of the new culture. Let's explore this approach.

The First Wave: Building Successful Prototypes

You can start by clarifying your picture of success. Start from your destination - perhaps 18 months in the future. Describe what you want to see happening at that date.

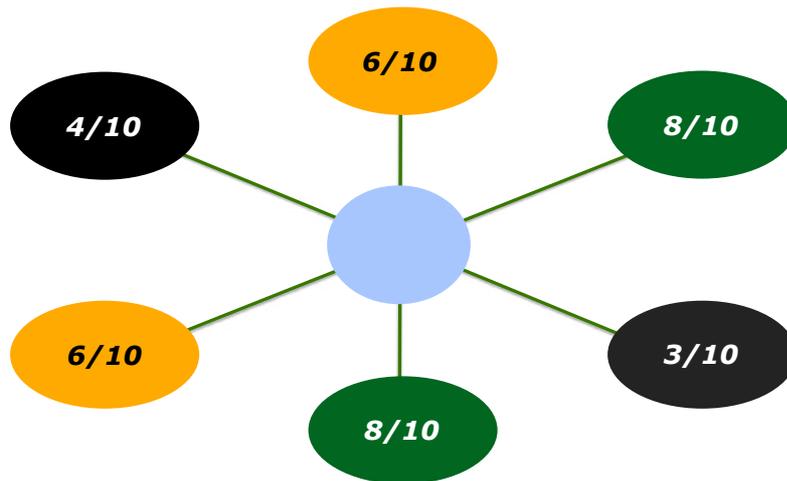

Working backwards, describe the things that must be achieved by the end of each quarter and work back to the present day. That is your road map towards achieving the picture of success. Then move onto the next stage.

Looking around the organisation, identify where you can build prototypes that will embody the future culture. These must stand at least a 7+/10 chance of success.

If you are running an organisation that covers a continent, for example, identify the country leaders who will support the approach.

Building Successful Prototypes

Begin by looking at the various opportunities and rate the chances of success. Rate these on a scale 0 – 10. Build on where there is positive energy and then deliver success stories.

Good leaders communicate the organisation's story, strategy and road to success. They aim to do this in a compelling way that resonates with people.

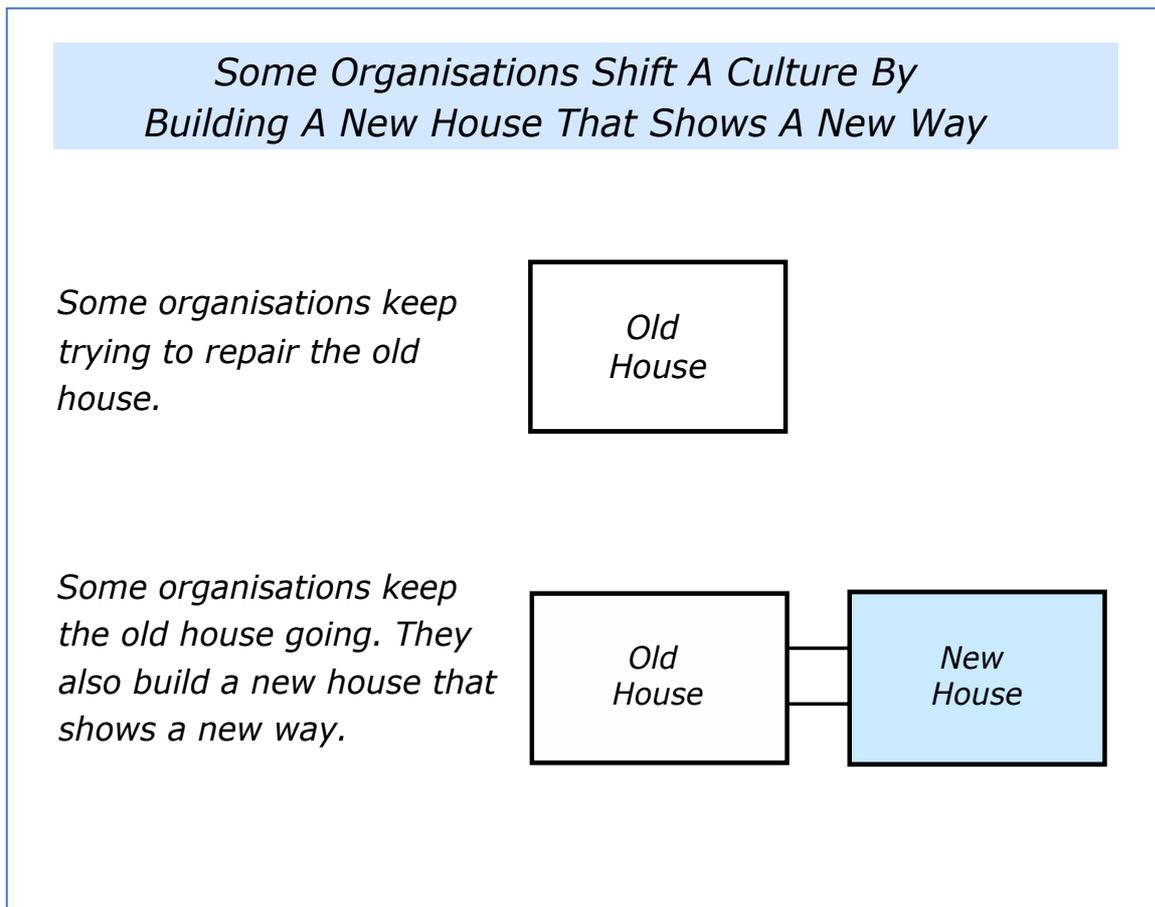

Explain to everybody in the organisation that you are building the future business. You would like volunteers who want to act as models. But make sure you have already earmarked three such places. Others may want to join, but make sure these are prepared to work hard to succeed.

This approach is the equivalent building a new house rather than renovating an old house. It is to build a new system that shows a better way.

Repairing an existing house – or an organisation – can be challenging. Sometimes changing a system meets resistance. Too much time can be spent trying to persuade people, rather than delivering the required results.

Shifting a culture sometimes calls for retaining the best elements of the old house but building a new house – a new way of doing things. One key point is worth underlining. It is important to have a long connecting corridor - some distance - between the old house and the new house.

The new house may develop a different culture and a fresh way of doing things. There is no point in rushing back every half hour to ask if it is okay to do things in the new way. If you do that, the old system will take over.

You are aiming to build a new system that delivers the goods. Bearing this in mind, it is important to ring fence the fresh approach. At the same time, however, it is vital to deliver success. Do everything possible to help people to build the successful prototypes.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to describe the principles people followed to deliver the goods. Let's look at one way to share such guidelines.

Success Stories

People buy success rather than the theory of success. Bearing this in mind, it can be important to encourage people to produce success stories. Such stories can then be published internally or presented at an organisational event.

One key point. It is important to be humble when presenting these stories. It is to give credit to other people – rather than yourself – and to also explain that this describes a way of reaching certain goals.

Here are some guidelines that can be borne in mind when sharing success stories. Later we will offer a framework that people can use to write such stories.

Success Stories Can Generate Ongoing Success

This is an approach that can be used to encourage people, teams and organisations to follow certain principles to deliver success.

- You can produce success stories that highlight people following certain principles to achieve success.
- You can describe the principles that people followed – and how they translated these into action - to achieve success.
- You can encourage people to follow these principles in their own ways to achieve success.

You can keep producing success stories to maintain the momentum and encourage people to achieve ongoing success.

The Second Wave: Working With Volunteers Who Follow The Principles And Deliver Success

People have shown the approach works. If appropriate, you can now ask for other volunteers to model the desired culture. There are certain Dos and Don'ts during this crucial stage.

Dos

Do be certain you have the right leaders in place in each of the next wave of models.

Do work with them on clarifying their picture of success.

Do make sure they follow the principles embodied in the new way of doing business - rather than simply modify their present ways.

Do encourage them to work through the potential tough decisions.

Do provide the support they need to do the job and encourage them to get some early wins.

Do help them to do whatever is required to achieve success.

Don'ts

Don't back leaders who say the right words but don't translate these into action.

Don't be half-hearted – people need to be serious about making change happen.

Deadlines focus the mind. Give people a deadline for presenting their success stories at another organisational event in, for example, six months.

At the same time, encourage the first wave of prototypes to move onto a higher level. They can also present their new successes at the next organisational event.

There are many ways to build and maintain a positive culture. As mentioned earlier, one approach is to show what good looks like by continually producing success stories. Below is one framework for producing such stories.

People choose a title for the story. They then describe the specific situation they encountered. They could be helping a client, solving a problem, making systems work better or whatever. They describe the challenges they faced and the desired picture of success.

People move on to describing the key strategies – such as the principles they followed - to tackle the issue. They describe the results that were delivered to achieve the picture of success. They then summarise what was learned from the experience.

The Success Story

The title of the success story is:

Specific Situation

The specific situation we faced – including the specific challenges and the desired picture of success - was:

*

Specific Principles

The specific things we did - the principles we followed and how we translated these into action - to tackle the challenge and achieve the picture of success were:

*

Success

The specific results that were delivered were:

*

Summary

Here is a summary of: a) the specific things that worked and how we can follow these principles in the future b) the specific things we could do better next time and how; c) the specific other things of interest that emerged.

The Third Wave: Make The Successful Principles Mandatory And Build The Desired Culture

The first and second waves of prototypes present their success stories. You then give people clear messages about the behaviours that are necessary for the future culture, but the future is now. The message you are giving in the third wave is that:

The principles are now mandatory

People can choose whether or not they want to opt-into the new way of working. They are to communicate with you - or their manager - within a month to show how they would like to contribute to the organisation's goals. You will also provide them with the support they need to achieve ongoing success.

If they do not want to take this route, then it may simply be a matter of 'fit'. The organisation will do its best to find a good way for them to move-on.

Sounds tough? Perhaps - but not tackling this issue is even tougher. The future is beckoning, however, so you present the organisation's new picture of success. People realise that you are announcing the next first wave. They can be part of shaping the future.

Many people ask: "How do you change a culture?" One approach is to say:

"You create a new culture rather than try to change the old one.

"It is up to people to decide if they want to follow the principles.

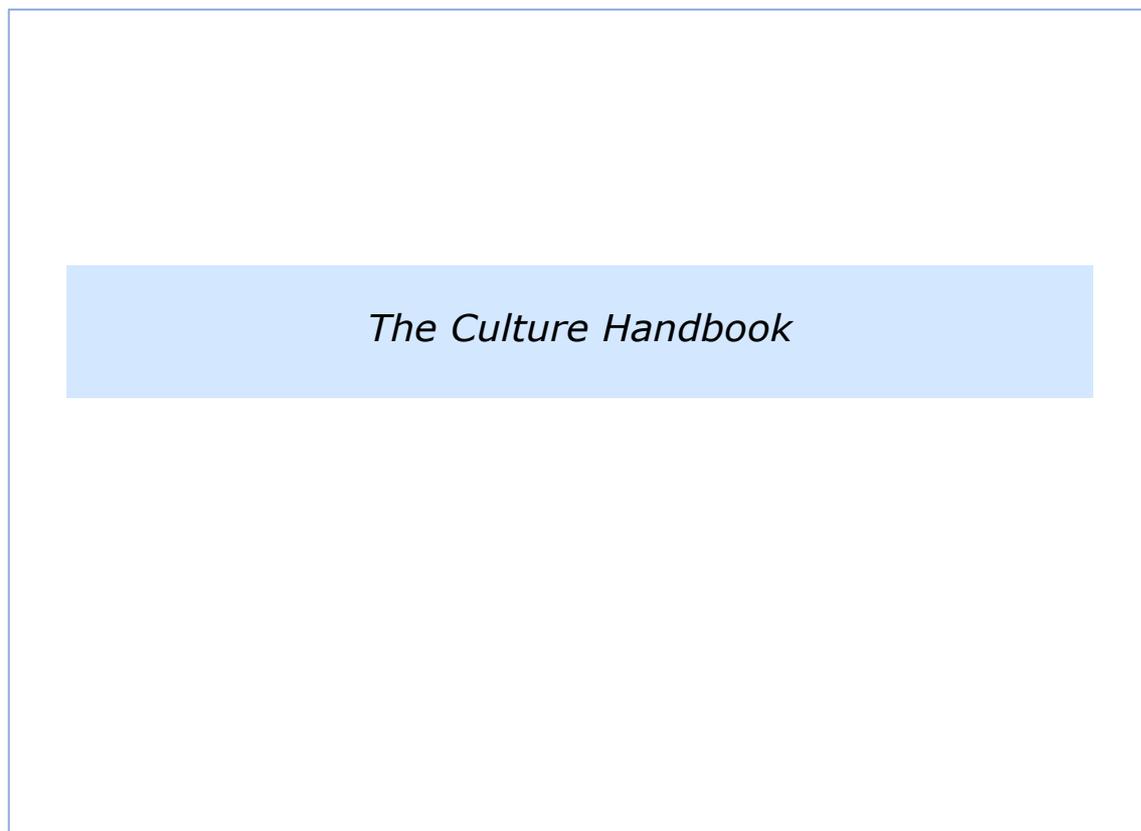

"If so, you encourage them to use their strengths to work towards achieving the picture of success."

Imagine that you have taken this step. It will be important to ensure that the people who apply to the organisation know what they are getting into. How to make this happen?

One approach that has been re-invented by many organisations is to return to producing a Culture Handbook. This needs to be short, attractive and with lots of illustrations. (It is certainly not a procedure manual.)

The handbook is given to new joiners and shows examples of how people have lived organisation's principles. It then invites people to focus on how they want to follow these in their own way and work towards achieving the goals.

Below is a framework that some organisations use for producing such a handbook.

Introduction

Welcome to our organisation. This handbook gives an introduction to our purpose and the principles we aim to follow. It also describes the goals we want to achieve - the organisation's picture of success.

It can be useful to read the handbook and see how people have translated these principles into action. We have tried to bring these to life with real examples and illustrations.

You can then meet with your manager. Bearing in mind your strengths, you can clarify how you can make your best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

The Entrepreneurship, Engine And Excellence Approach

There are many models for developing and innovative idea and implementing it successfully. One approach is to focus the themes of entrepreneurship, building an engine and delivering excellence. Let's explore these steps.

The Entrepreneurship

Imagine that you are part of a leadership team in a start-up company or that you want to scale a business idea within a larger organisation. Here are some steps to consider at the entrepreneurial stage.

Start with an idea that will deliver success

This is the spark. Sometimes the idea may be innovative. Sometimes it may imitate or improve an existing idea. Sometimes it may simply be a way to improve implementation.

Show how the idea will deliver success

Success breeds success - so show how the idea will deliver the goods. Demo or Die is the motto. It is important to get your first customer or to build a prototype that produces tangible benefits.

Show how the idea can be scaled and Get backing for delivering this success

Some entrepreneurial ideas can be delivered by an individual. Others may need to be implemented on a larger scale. This may call for building an engine that will deliver excellence.

Imagine that you want to follow the latter course. This may call for demonstrating a business case and getting backing from decision makers. You may therefore wish to present the following steps.

The What: The specific results it will deliver in terms of success.

The Why: The specific benefits for the various stakeholders.

The How: The specific strategies that will deliver success.

The Who: The specific responsibilities of people in delivering success.

The When: The specific milestones on the road to delivering success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Entrepreneurship

The specific entrepreneurial idea that I would like to implement is:

The specific benefits for the various stakeholders would be:

*

The specific things I can do to get support for this idea and build an engine to make it happen are:

*

The Engine

Let's assume you have got the necessary sign off for implementing the idea. The entrepreneurial spark can provide the idea, but you may need to build an engine to deliver success.

Engines can take many different forms, but the following steps are often required. It will be important to clarify:

The strategies for delivering success;

The systems and standards required to achieve success;

The staff – the people who will set up and run the engine – and the support required to deliver success.

You will need to ensure that the right strategies are implemented by the right people in the right way. The people must be implementers who want to make things work.

There is no point in trying to coax or coach people who don't have the right attitude or aptitude. One leader described his approach in the following way.

"My strength lies in producing strong commercial ideas. I can outline and oversee the strategic plan and make sure it delivers the required results. My weaknesses lie in doing the day-to-day implementation.

"My best work has been done when working with a good coordinator who has shared similar professional standards. They have translated the strategy into action and made sure that things worked on the ground."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Engine

The specific entrepreneurial idea that I would like to implement is:

*

The specific things I can do to make sure we build an engine that implements the idea successfully are:

*

The specific kinds of support I can give to the staff to enable them to implement the idea successfully are:

The Excellence

Leaders need to ensure that the organisation delivers consistently high standards. If the engine does not work, however, they can spend much of their time fixing daily problems.

Imagine you want to ensure that people continue to run the engine and deliver excellence. Let's explore some steps you can take.

You can continue to employ the right people and ensure they run the engine successfully

As mentioned earlier, it is vital to employ people who enjoy making things work on a daily basis. You will need a key mission holder takes responsibility for delivering the goods.

This mission holder needs to lead a team of people who are committed: a) to running the engine and maintaining high standards; b) to doing what is required to help their stakeholders happy.

This is vital for several reasons. First, it will be important to make sure the daily systems keep working. This will provide a platform for helping the organisation to achieve success.

Second, it will also be important keep their key stakeholders happy and at bay. The last thing they want is for senior people donning their overalls and making impromptu visits to instruct them how to run the engine.

You can encourage people to build a self-managing team that ensures the engine runs successfully

Looking at your own role, at some point it may be important to help the team to become more self-managing. One approach is for you to take the following steps:

To employ people who want to be self-managing and also want to ensure the engine keeps running;

To, at an appropriate time, meet with the team to ask them if they would like to become more self-managing;

To make clear contracts with them about: a) the specific outcomes to be delivered; b) the role they want to play in running the engine; c) the role they want you to play; d) the support they need and the specific things they will do to proactively keep you informed.

You can build and maintain a culture in which people deliver excellence

You can keep in touch with the mission holder and other key people. They will be doing a vital but sometimes unglamorous job. Such people can be taken for granted.

Whilst they may be self-managing, it can be useful to meet with them to have regular one-to-ones. You can then aim a) to provide them with the necessary support; b)) to help them to maintain the job satisfaction and also focus on their professional development.

You can continue to publish success stories. People who run the engine may be soul players who don't go in for self-promotion. It can therefore be useful to highlight the principles people are following to run the engine successfully.

You can encourage people to keep meeting with their stakeholders. They can get feedback on: a) the specific things they are doing well; b) the specific things they could do better; c) the specific things they could do to deliver excellence to their stakeholders.

How can you ensure that the engine then delivers excellence? If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Innovation, Implementation And Impact Approach

This approach starts by clarifying the real results to achieve. It then invites people to go through stages of innovation, implementation and checking they have achieved the desired impact.

The model can be used by individuals, teams and organisations. It can help them to build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses.

Some companies, for example, are good at innovation. Some are good at implementation and delivering impact. Some may be good at all three, but that is a rarity.

The following section gives an introduction to how I used this approach with two companies. Both worked in the digital space, but the principles we explored can be used in many fields.

Company A and Company B both had around 30 employees. Each was considering whether to scale up and increase their numbers. The exercise resulted in each company making different decisions about shaping their futures.

As mentioned earlier, this approach can be used by individuals. It can help a person to build their own business or clarify their best contribution to an employer. They can focus on their strengths and how they can use these to help others to achieve success.

The approach can also be used by teams and departments in organisations. They can clarify: a) the areas where they are strong; b) the areas where they are weak; c) the specific things they can do to make their best contribution to the organisation.

Let's return to the two companies mentioned earlier. Each company held a day workshop that focused on them shaping a positive future.

Before the session I asked them to do some homework. They were invited:

To clarify their strengths by describing the principles they had followed – and the ways they had translated these into action - to do brilliant work for customers in the past;

To clarify the specific kinds of customers with whom they worked best and: a) the challenges these customers faced at the present time; b) the challenges they would face in the future;

To clarify the specific things they could do to build on their strengths to help these customers: a) to manage their present challenges; b) to achieve success in the future.

The following section describes some activities we did during the leadership team workshops. The outcomes were interesting.

Company A chose to be an innovations house; Company B chose to become an implementation house. Both went on to achieve good results. Let's explore some of the steps we went through during the sessions.

Clarifying The Desired Impact

Company A started by clarifying how good it was at connecting with customers and clarifying the desired impact. The leader explained their approach to establishing clarity – the real results to achieve.

"Our people are relatively good at clarifying a customer's brief and playing this back to them.

"The customer is often already suggesting how they believe it is possible to solve the present problem. Those ideas may or may not work. But we have to be careful how we position what we can do to help them succeed.

"We are good at producing innovative solutions. Bearing this in mind, we could probably use our expertise more: a) to solve their present challenges; b) to solve the challenges they will face in the future.

"This probably has implications for the way we shape our company in the future. But we can look at that later."

The leadership team then did an exercise. Each person gave the company a rating regarding the following area.

Impact

The rating I would give our company regarding clarifying the desired impact – the real results the customers want to achieve – is:

___ /10

Company B had different strengths and were good at implementation. Bearing this in mind, the leader explained their approach to clarifying the desired impact.

"Businesses often hire us to improve and run their systems. This calls for making crystal clear contracts about:

- a) The specific systems and service outcomes to deliver;*
- b) The specific principles and processes to be followed;*
- c) The specific key performance targets by which we will be judged.*

"This means that we have to check and re-check before signing up to a contract.

"The pluses of this approach are that the customer and we agree on clear targets. This makes it easy to organise our resources and measure the success.

"The possible minuses are that we may narrow our focus too much on solving the present problems. There may be future business opportunities that we miss."

Company B's leaders gave themselves 9/10 in terms of clarifying the desired impact. They felt that sometimes they were too reactive, however, and could be more proactive in focusing on the customer's future challenges.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Imagine that you work in a team, organisation or company. This could be your present workplace or one where you have worked in the past. Try completing the following sentences.

Innovation

Company A was good at doing innovative work that helped customers to achieve success. The leader recognised, however, that the business had reached a crucial point in its development. They expressed this in the following way.

"Looking at innovation, we probably score at least 8/10. We have a track record of designing and delivering creative solutions.

"The customers often like our innovative work. They then ask: 'Can you implement it for us?' This has led to us doing more long-term contracts, which can be lucrative.

"We have hired lots of people who are good at doing ongoing work. This has led to us having more than 30 people in different locations.

"The question is: do we really want to be in this kind of business? Perhaps that is a question we can explore later. In the meantime, when it comes to innovation, we score highly."

Company A's core people loved being problem solvers and prototype builders. This was difficult to scale, however, so the business faced some challenges.

Company B's leader knew its strengths. She expressed these in the following way.

"We do some innovation, but not much. I would give us a 6/10 in this area. We are best at doing hands-on work for customers. They rely on us to make things work over a long period of time.

"We have tried to bring in people who might help us to be more innovative, but this has not worked out. Some wanted to do their own thing and not blend into the company. These hires also cost us a lot of money."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. How would you rate your workplace in terms of being innovative in helping customers to succeed? How could it maintain or improve the rating? Try completing the following sentences.

Innovation

The rating I would give us regarding being good at the innovation stage is:

_____ / 10

The specific things we can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Implementation

Company A was good at clarifying the strategic implementation principles that their customers could follow to achieve success. It was not great at managing the daily work involved in helping customers to run operational processes.

Such projects paid well, but these seemed like an add on to the core business. The leadership team therefore rated the company 6/10 in terms of ongoing implementation with customers.

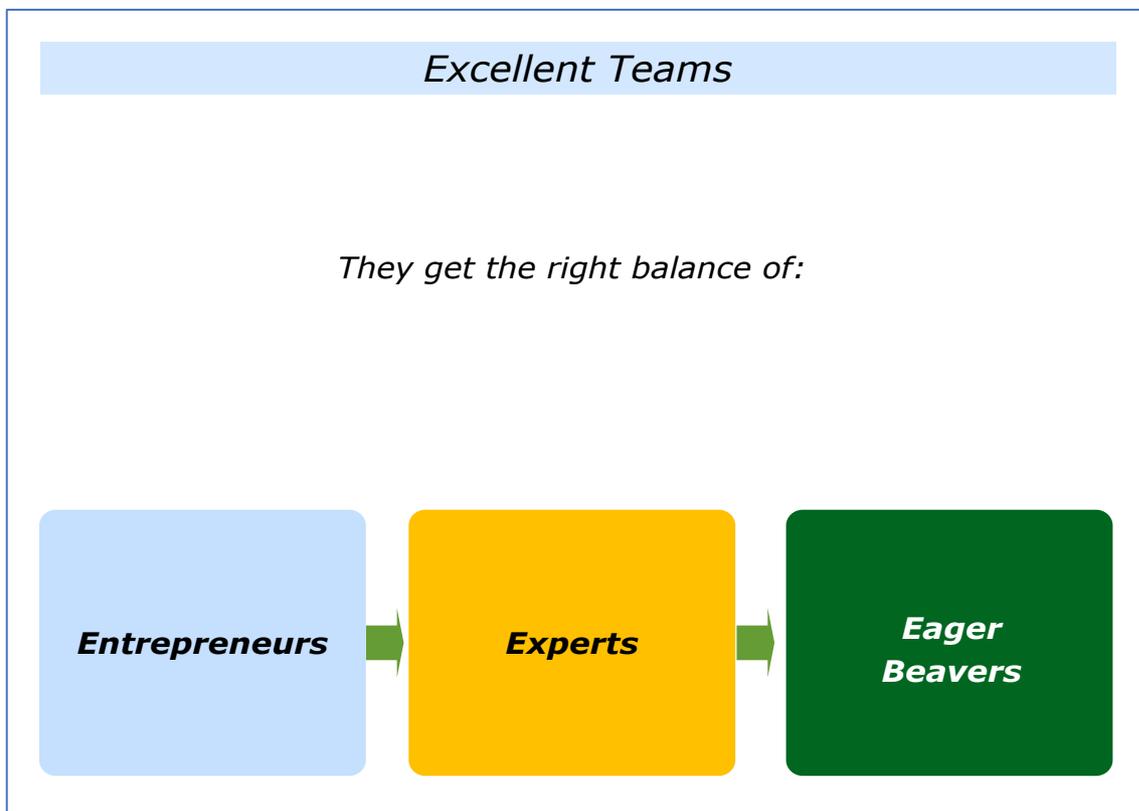

Company B was strong on implementation. Their leaders expressed in the following way.

"Most of our work involves doing long-term projects for customers. Some we can do from our office but we also spend a lot of time on-site in their workplaces.

"Previously we thought our business would be threatened by off-shoring. This has happened in some fields, but many of our clients want us to support them by running different projects.

"Many of our people enjoy following a structure, doing technical work and getting things done. Looking at implementation, I would rate us as 9/10."

Company A and Company B were made up of people who had different drivers in terms of doing satisfying work. Company A had many people who were either entrepreneurial or experts in their fields. Company B had many more eager beavers who enjoyed getting things done.

Eager Beavers

Excellent teams explain the outcomes to be achieved. They then employ lots of eager beavers who want to deliver these outcomes. Such people are self-managing and savvy. They like to make things work and often have the following characteristics.

- They are energetic and enthusiastic.
- They enjoy being effective by focusing on the outcomes to achieve and making clear contracts about the agreed picture of success.
- They enjoy translating the strategies into action by working through lists and delivering excellence.

Excellent teams often get the right balance of entrepreneurs, experts and eager beavers. This balance they aim to get will, of course, depend on their chosen work.

Teams that focus on innovation will need to be enterprising and use their expertise to generate solutions. They will also need a few coordinators and eager beavers who make sure things get done.

Teams that focus on implementation need some people who are entrepreneurial. They may also need many coordinators and technical experts. Such people need to be industrious and channel their efforts towards getting things done.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Try completing the following sentences.

Implementation

The rating I would give us regarding being consistently good at implementation is:

_____ / 10

The specific things we can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Impact

Company A and Company B looked beyond the headline issue of delivering the goods. They focused on the following things;

Being good at delivering the agreed impact – the required results – for the customers;

Being good at documenting, describing or, when appropriate, publicising the impact;

Being good at building a reputation about the impact the company delivered.

Company A's leadership team gave differing marks for each of these themes. They believed that, when the business played to its strengths, it was good at delivering the desired impact. The leader expressed this in the following way.

"When we focus on what we do best, we probably get 9/10 for delivering the desired results. This often leads to getting more business.

"We are not so good at publicising our success stories. This is something we could do better, providing we get the client's permission."

Company B gave a similar response. They were driven by results because their funding depended on hitting certain performance targets. These often involved delivering high quality standards and fulfilling the agreed service contracts.

Their work often came from previous clients who trusted them to deliver. Some work was highly confidential, so they were not able to share it publicly. Nevertheless, they felt it was possible to improve their reputation for doing good work.

Both companies decided to find ways to share success stories. This needed to be done sensitively, however, in order to maintain their good relationships with customers.

Look at your own workplace, how would you rate it in the following areas? Being good at: a) delivering the required impact; b) publicising the impact; c) building a reputation about the impact it delivers?

You will probably have different scores for each theme. Bearing these in mind, describe the specific things your workplace can do to boost the ratings.

about the impact we deliver*

Shaping A Successful Future

Both companies moved on to the final stage. Bearing in mind their strengths, they each took decisions and translated these into action. As mentioned earlier, these resulted in each business doing certain things to shape their futures.

Company A decided to focus on their talents as innovators. They rebuilt the business around their core strengths and focused on their perfect customers. These were often pacesetting businesses that were already ahead of the field.

They spent time with these customers, clarified their challenges and found solutions. They built prototypes that worked and helped the customers to achieve both present and future success.

They decided to split the business. There were 12 people in the core business. They still delivered impact, but mainly through developing innovation solutions.

This core business proved profitable. It delivered high quality work and had much fewer overheads. The leader realised that it would be harder to sell such a knowledge-based business because it relied on its key people. But they were happy to go this route.

Company A sold its implementation arm. This was taken over by managers in that part of the business. It improved its delivery to clients and continued to make profits.

Company B chose to focus on implementation. The leadership team spent masses of time with both present and potential future clients. This led to more contracts and ongoing work.

The company needed good managers to coordinate so many moving parts. This proved a challenge. Some managers they recruited behaved like supervisors and this caused problems. Several crises led to the leaders moving back into operational roles to get things on course.

Company B is still doing well. It has encouraged and educated its managers to maintain good teams. It has also created an excellent wellbeing programme for its people. This has contributed to helping people to deliver success.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. Imagine that your workplace has worked through the stages described in this piece.

What decisions may it now need to make? How can it build on its strengths? How can it do its best to shape a successful future? If you wish, try completing the following exercise.

The Positive Reframing Approach

There are many ways to manage challenges. Some people take the positive reframing approach. They often demonstrate the following qualities.

They have a positive philosophy. They appreciate life and build on their assets. They then aim to do their best when facing a challenge or working towards a picture of success.

Such people see positive possibilities and solutions. They often study what works and apply it in certain situations. They also use their imagination to focus on the possible ways forward.

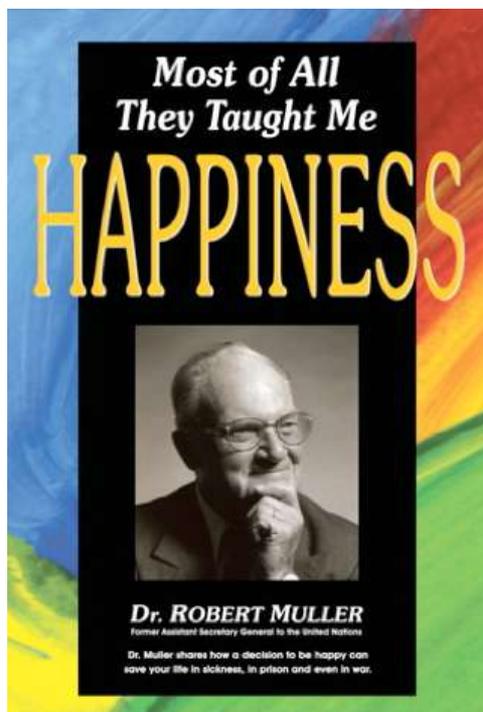

They sometimes manage their emotions by reframing things as positive projects. They may do this when tackling a challenge, embarking on a course of medical treatment or working to achieve a specific goal.

Different people follow these principles in different ways. Let's look at how some have translated these into action.

They Have A Positive Philosophy

People who take this approach are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. The following section describes how one person translated their positive philosophy into action in a frightening situation.

Robert Muller, an Assistant General Secretary of the United Nations, was somebody who took these steps. He reframed challenging situations as a chance to find creative solutions. Here is a summary of his approach.

Robert Muller faced many challenges when working at the United Nations. He chose to believe it was possible to build on what people had in common and find solutions.

Sometimes this could take time, but he remembered what his parents and grandparents taught him. He focused on helping others rather than being concerned about himself. He said:

"Today, whenever despair menaces me, I hasten to count my blessings, I concentrate on one of them, and almost forthwith my worry vanishes or takes on a more reasonable proportion."

Robert focused on the opportunities in many challenging situations. He adopted this approach as a student when he was hunted by the Nazis during the Second World War.

One day he found himself trapped in an attic on the top floor of an hotel that also served as an office building. Several Nazis entered the reception area and asked people where they could find Robert. How could he escape the hunters?

Drawing on his positive attitude to life, Robert began thinking of creative solutions. He explained his approach in the following way.

"I was a great fan of Hollywood films, so I decided to see the situation as taking part in a film. I was being hunted, so how could I find a way to escape?"

David Gillies takes up the story in his biography about Robert called The Hatmaker's Son. Here are excerpts from David's book.

Robert took several deep breaths.

"I must overcome my fear and think rationally," he decided. This was the moment of moments to be creative.

"What an opportunity, what a tremendous adventure – a 20-year- old student trapped by Nazis in a fancy hotel. Won't it be great if I slip through their fingers?"

Robert took a few minutes to consider his options. The Nazis had some idea what he looked like but they probably had an old photo. How could he take on a different persona?

The hunters were also expecting to find a cowering student trying to hide in the milling crowds on each floor of the building. How could he be ingenious and do what the Nazis least expected?

Robert settled on his plan and began translating it into action. This involved making his way down four floors from the attic and walking out onto the street.

Putting a thick file under his arm, he exuded an air of authority as he made his way from floor to floor. Nonchalantly smoking a cigarette, he passed various groups of people.

Reaching the ground floor he approached a group of Nazis who were quizzing the receptionist. She chose not to recognise him, even though she was being threatened.

Robert went up to the Nazis and asked what was happening. They replied they were looking for Louis Parizot (the name by which Robert was known in the building).

He responded by saying he had seen Parizot on the top floor. Just like in a film, the Nazis rushed up the stairs. Robert then made his way out onto the street and rode away on a bike.

Robert faced many challenges in life, but he tried to see things in perspective. During a time spent in prison he focused on how he could appreciate life and give to others.

Strongly influenced by his parents and grandparents, he aimed to help others and build a better world. He continued to apply this approach throughout his life.

Thankful for the love he had been given, Robert kept returning to this positive philosophy. Even in the darkest hours, he had a sense of gratitude. He then applied his skills to help people to build on what they had in common and find positive solutions.

They See Positive Possibilities

People who take this approach look for possibilities and opportunities in situations. They study what works and apply these lessons to do what works. They also use their imagination to find solutions to challenges.

Thorkil Sonne is somebody who took this approach when founding the Specialist People Foundation. This aims to create one million jobs for people with autism.

Such people have many strengths. They often have outstanding memories, a remarkable eye for detail and do repetitive tasks with enthusiasm. These skills can be valuable for companies that specialise in developing technology.

The following section provides excerpts from the organisation's website. This describes how Thorkil focused on pursuing the most positive option.

Focusing On Strengths – Not Difficulties

One percent of the world's population may have Autism Spectrum Disorder. This is equivalent to 68 million people worldwide.

Even more people may have other disorders on the autism spectrum. These are all potential specialist people – with great business potential.

We have set our goal: to provide meaningful and productive jobs for one million people with autism and other invisible disorders.

The Idea for Specialisterne and Specialist People Foundation Started with Lars

My son Lars was 2½ years old when my wife and I noticed that his development began to differ from that of his older brothers.

We arranged with his nursery carers that he would get extra support from a qualified child psychologist, all the while hoping of course that we could learn how best to help him become more like his brothers.

Our Lives Changed

Eventually, we were informed that Lars had infantile autism – a life-long invisible handicap in the category of Autism Spectrum Disorder (ASD).

Lars would face a life where he would be constantly misunderstood and isolated because it would be difficult for him to interpret what others expected of him. Most likely, Lars would never have a normal working life.

My Fight

I became active in the Danish Autism Association. I also studied the Danish welfare model, and realized that although the model is strong and has many good aspects, there was a lot of room for improvement.

I learned that families with a child with ASD have a high risk of disintegration.

This is most often because this handicap is invisible, meaning that the family has to struggle to get the outside world to understand and provide timely support.

Social workers also work under difficult conditions where welfare schemes are available, but the knowledge of how best to help people with complicated invisible handicaps is thin on the ground.

I experienced that both those who need the help and those who provide help are under great and increasing strain.

Specialisterne

With the support of my family I re-mortgaged our home and established Specialisterne (The Specialists) in an attempt to tailor a working environment geared towards people with ASD, enabling them to use their specialist skills to act as consultants to the business sector, at market terms.

My vision is to create new possibilities for people with ASD and to influence society to adopt a more positive attitude towards people with ASD.

One Million Jobs

It is believed that one percent of the world's population may have Autism Spectrum Disorder. This is equivalent to 68 million people worldwide.

Even more people may have other disorders on the autism spectrum, such as Attention Deficit Hyperactive Disorder (ADHD). These are all potential specialist people – with great business potential.

We have set our goal: to provide meaningful and productive jobs for one million people with autism and other invisible disorders.

Thorkil Sonne was elected as an Ashoka Fellow in 2009. Here is the citation that was published at the time.

Thorkil changes the way society perceives autism by transforming it from a handicap to a competitive advantage.

His Specialist People Foundation employs autistic people, who have a ten times lower fault rate in software testing and other tasks. Thorkil now plans to go beyond Denmark, empowering people with ASD globally.

They Reframe Things As Positive Projects

People who take this approach sometimes manage their emotions by reframing things as positive projects. They may do this when tackling challenging situations.

This is an approach I learned about many years ago when reading about Ken Kesey. A leading figure in the counter-culture movement, he was said to have treated events as projects. One person reported that Ken even saw his approach to dying as a project.

This approach was helpful when I was fortunate to get an early diagnosis of prostate cancer. After a short while, it was possible to reframe it as a project. The aims were:

To do research and get the best non-invasive treatment ... To produce a blog that helped other men to get such treatment ... To continue to enjoy life and give to people.

Fortunately I was treated by some of the best surgeons in the world who did superb work and helped with the recovery. The blog also reached men who then chose to have non-invasive treatment. The journey also helped me to appreciate life and give to people. A good project.

Jack Sim is somebody who applied the project approach to achieving tangible goals. Taking a pride in being known as Mr. Toilet, he is committed to providing sustainable sanitation for people around the world.

Jack founded the World Toilet Organization. Here is some background about him and the organisation taken directly from its website.

Jack Sim, Mr. Toilet, has broken the taboo on sanitation and brought issues about toilets and hygiene out into the open. After attaining financial independence as a businessman in Singapore by 40, Jack decided to devote the rest of his life to development work in line with his motto:

"Live a useful life."

In 1998, Jack established the Restroom Association of Singapore (RAS) whose mission is to raise the standards of public toilets and address the issues of poor toilet design, inadequate building codes and poorly trained cleaners.

As Jack began his work, he realized there were organizations similar to this in other countries and without any central governing body.

Soon thereafter, he founded the World Toilet Organization (WTO) in 2001. Since 2001, Jack has been involved in sustainable sanitation efforts all over the world.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive reframing approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Sharing What Works Approach

There are many ways to encourage people. One approach is to study what works, simplify what works – in a profound way - and share what works. It is then to provide people with practical tools they can use to follow these principles in their own ways.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach. You may want to apply the knowledge either: a) to reach your own goals; b) to help other people to reach their goals. This can involve exploring the following steps.

Studying What Works

The approach starts by focusing on a specific topic you want to learn about. Depending on your interests, you may want to explore one of the following themes.

I want to learn about:

How to be a good counsellor ... How to help troubled teenagers ... How to help people to build on their strengths and do satisfying work ... How to coach young footballers ... How to transform a negative culture into a positive culture ... How to lead successful teams.

Imagine you have chosen the topic you want to explore. Bearing this in mind, you can ask yourself the following questions.

What works in this activity? How can I study success? When have people done superb in this activity? What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How did they translate these into action?

How can people follow these principles - plus maybe add other skills - in their own way? What are the key strategies they can follow to increase the chances of achieving success? What may be the pluses and minuses of following this approach?

This is an approach I followed when running therapeutic communities. I visited many programmes to see what worked when helping troubled teenagers. The staff and I then followed these principles in our own ways to help the young people.

Sports psychologists applied a similar approach from the 1970s onwards. They asked athletes to recall their best performances and what they did right. They then helped athletes to focus on how they could follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills - in the future.

David Cooperrider and Diana Whitney followed this path when creating Appreciative Inquiry. They invited people in organisations to clarify the principles they had followed to perform brilliantly in the past.

People then focused on how they could pursue these principles to do great work in the future.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Simplifying What Works

Imagine that you have focused on a specific activity you want to learn about. The next step may be to simplify what works but to do this in a profound way. How to make this happen?

Great educators, for example, look for patterns in a specific activity. They take the following steps to study and simplify knowledge in a particular field.

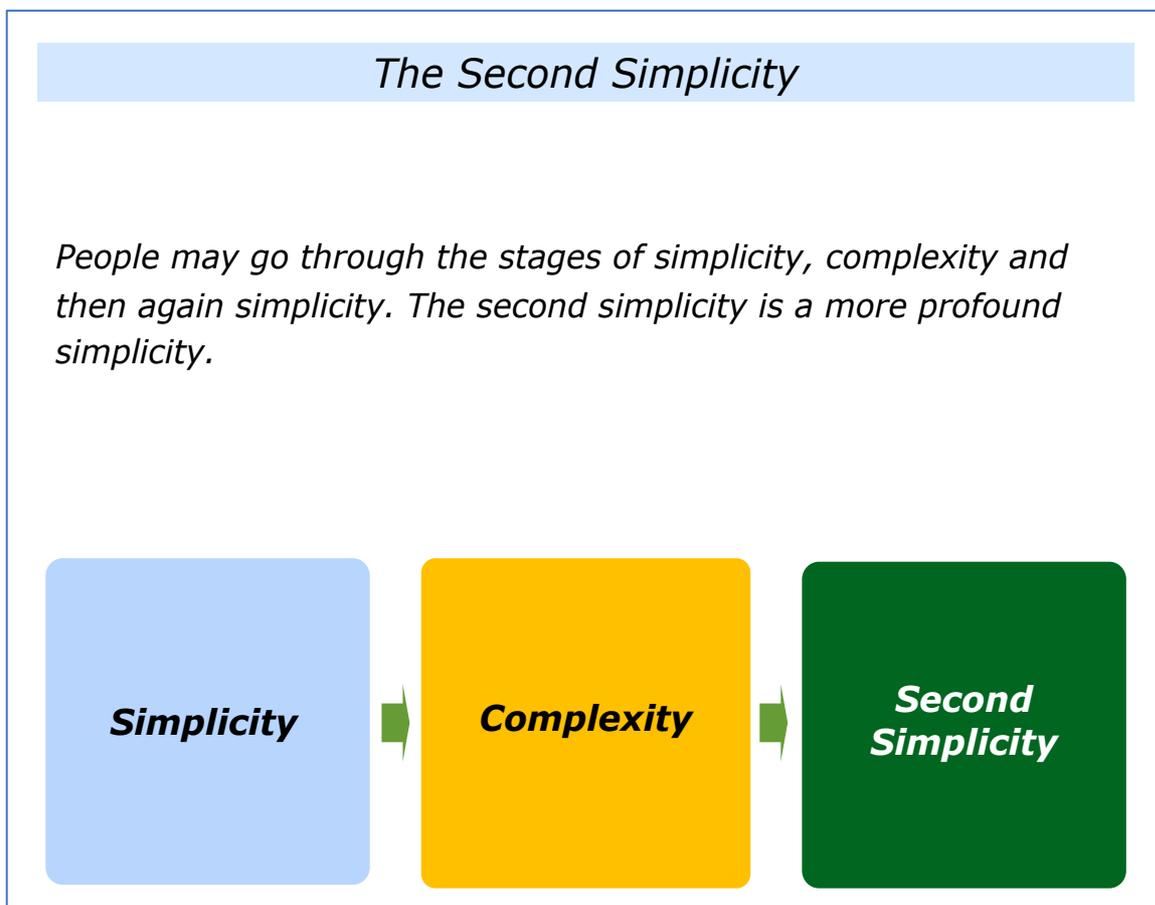

They focus on what people do right - the successful patterns they follow - to achieve their picture of success;

They translate these patterns into principles that people can follow to achieve their picture of success;

They provide practical tools that people can use to follow these principles in their own ways to achieve their picture of success.

Great workers often demonstrate simplicity in action. A great dancer, footballer or artist can make executing the most difficult skill look deceptively easy. They make complicated things look simple. This is the result of combining their natural talent with years of practice.

Great educators who know their subject often demonstrate the second simplicity. Getting to the heart of the matter, they say things that are simple yet profound.

People sometimes go through the following stages in life: simplicity, complexity and again simplicity.

Simplicity

They start by seeing life – or the activity in which they are talented – as simple. Speaking with bravado, they state clearly what they believe to be true. Passionate about these beliefs, they demonstrate the idealism and confidence of youth.

Complexity

They may then enter the age of complexity. Gathering information, they become experts and speak in a more complex language. Sometimes they over-analyse. This does not help them or other people. Whilst still performing well, they feel something is missing.

Second Simplicity

Overcoming challenges, they enter another dimension. They may return to their original philosophy, but experience has brought wisdom. The pains and pleasures of life bring an extra timbre to their voice.

The second simplicity is a profound simplicity. Speaking from the depths of their being, their words resonate more deeply. They are real rather than in role. They have wisdom in their bones. Passing on what they have learned in life, they want to help others to succeed.

Different people choose different ways to simplify and share what works. Let's look at one organisation that takes this route.

The Solutions Journalism Network

This organisation describes stories that provide practical hope. Here is their explanation of the difference between good stories and solutions journalism. Here is an introduction to its approach.

Good news stories focus on the vision, kindness or courage of someone doing something positive.

A common approach is to profile a person who had a personal awakening (often preceded by a personal crisis) which prompted him or her to quit a stable job to launch a charitable effort in a village in, say, Namibia.

The person finds new meaning and, though living on a shoestring, usually talks about being happier and more fulfilled. This kind of story can be heart-warming and authentic, but is usually delivered without much critical analysis.

Good news stories also rarely get people to think about systemic change. By contrast, solutions stories are driven by the problem solving - and rely on independent evidence to solve it.

Solutions Journalism

A knock-out solutions journalism story does some of the following things.

- It explains the importance and deeper causes of the social problem.
- It describes the response to the problem.
- It analyses and explains why the response seems to be working or not working and uses external evidence wherever possible.
- It explains the 'How' in addition to the traditional 'Who, What, When, Where and Why' of journalism

- It puts the response in a broader context. Is this a break from the past? What is different in this approach compared to the standard approach to a problem?
- It provides a critical approach response about the strengths and limitations of the approach.
- It generates curiosity and tension within the narrative, especially with the 'How to ...' details and the issues at hand.
- It draws on experts who have ground-level understanding of implementation, not just 30,000-foot critiques.
- It focuses more on the value of the idea more than the charisma or talent of the people behind it.

Like any good story, solutions journalism has interesting characters, action and tension, but they are constructed more like puzzles or mysteries than profiles or descriptive pieces.

The tension is not grounded in an argument, but in the inherent difficulty of changing a system or making an idea come to life. If told well, what gets revealed is often a little treasure of understanding - an insight about how the world works.

You will choose your own way to describe what works. Bearing in mind the activity you want to study, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the specific things you can do to simplify what works in this activity.

Sharing What Works

Imagine that you have clarified what works in a specific activity. As mentioned earlier, you may want to apply this knowledge to reach your own goals. Alternatively, you may want to share what works to help other people to succeed.

Imagine that you want to take this second approach. One approach is to focus on the What, Who, Why, How and When. Let's explore these themes.

The What

What is the specific activity you have studied? What works in this activity? What are the reasons why you may wanted to focus on this activity? What is the knowledge you want to pass on to people?

The Who

Who are the people you would like to reach? What are the characteristics of these people? Would they be young people, budding entrepreneurs, athletes, leaders, social entrepreneurs, therapists or other people?

The Why

Why would you like to pass on this knowledge? What would be the benefits for people? How can they use the knowledge to tackle challenges or achieve their goals?

The How

How would you like to share your knowledge with people? Bearing in mind your strengths, would you like to write articles, teach, run workshops, coach, mentor, make films or use another media?

The When

When do you want to share the knowledge with people? What would be the preferred setting or situation for passing on the ideas? How can you find or create a situation for passing on the knowledge?

Good educators often aim to study what works, simplify what works and share what works. You will follow these principles in your own way.

The Win-Win Approach

There are many ways to try to solve differences. One approach is for people to aim to – as far as possible – get win-win solutions. These are more likely to achieve long term success rather than those that are based on win-lose or lose-lose.

Good mediators use their individual strengths to help people find solutions. Many of them, however, focus on the following themes.

Good Mediators

They aim to create a positive atmosphere and help people to find solutions to challenges. Some of the steps they may take are:

- To make sure that people want to solve the problem and are prepared to find win-win solutions;
- To find out what each party wants, build on the common ground and get some quick successes to build confidence;
- To then focus on one of the potential differences and clarify what each party wants;
- To clarify the real results to achieve – plus the benefits of achieving those results – and explore the possible solutions by keep asking: "How can we get a win-win?";
- To – as far as possible – find potential win-wins, set specific goals and work together to achieve success.

This approach may sound idealistic but, providing people are prepared to work together, it is often possible to make it work. It calls for finding and building on common ground, however, and then finding creative solutions to challenges.

This is a positive way forwards. Human beings need to find win-win solutions in order to live and work together. Win-Lose will just lead to more conflict in the future. Win-win is vital for both people and the planet.

Good mediators recognise that most people want similar things in life. They want to be loved, happy and live in peace. They want to feel free, valued and respected. They want to be able to shape their futures and achieve success.

Mediators aim to build on what people have in common and find positive solutions. This can be quite challenging, but the alternative produces lots of losers. Let's explore how this approach can work in different situations.

The Win-Win Approach

Imagine that you have been asked to help people to resolve differences between them. This could be a married couple that are experiencing difficulties, departments that are blaming each other or some other kinds of warring parties. The following pages explore some of the steps you can take to help people tackle such challenges.

Making Sure The Conditions Are In Place For Finding Win-Win Solutions

As mentioned earlier, several conditions must be in place before it is possible to solve deep differences.

People must want to solve the conflict ... People must be prepared to work hard to find, as far as possible, win-wins.

Timing is everything. Many conflicts only get resolved when the parties are exhausted. Couples feel weary from fighting a divorce, terrorists became too old or too tired to fight, employers and strikers are exhausted after an industrial dispute.

People get tired of the negative energy. They are then more willing to sit down and find positive solutions. Before getting involved in any conflict resolution, it is important to ask the following questions.

Are people ready to work together?

Do they really want to solve the problem? Remember, some people are addicted to conflict so they may not want to solve the problem.

Are people prepared to co-operate to find, as far as possible, a win-win solution?

How high is their motivation to do this on a scale 0 - 10? People need to score at least a 7+ to have a chance of producing success. This also calls for people to focus on finding positive solutions rather than scoring points.

Are people ready to focus on how things can be better in the future?

This is crucial. Some people want to simply argue about the past and allocate blame. Whilst it may be vital to admit mistakes, the key is to focus on how to create a positive future. Providing people want to solve the problem, it is then possible to move onto the next step.

Are people willing to focus on finding alignments rather than getting into arguments?

People who work towards win-wins tend to focus on finding positive solutions rather than scoring points. They do this by trying to create alignments rather than by getting into arguments.

They focus on what they have in common and what they all want to achieve. Those who are prepared to take this approach are more likely to achieve positive results.

People Who Work Towards Getting Win-Wins

They aim to do this:

By Trying To Find Alignments

Rather than:

By Getting Into Arguments

Clarifying What Each Party Wants and Building On Common Ground

Imagine the right conditions are in place. You can then move on to clarifying what each person or each party wants. One key point:

This includes what people want on a feeling level as well as a factual level.

People may want, for example, to feel valued, respected and able to shape their futures. Later it will be possible to explore to what extent it is possible for people to get the things they want.

Focus on what people have in common rather than the differences. Some people may try to draw you into arguing about the differences, but return to the similarities.

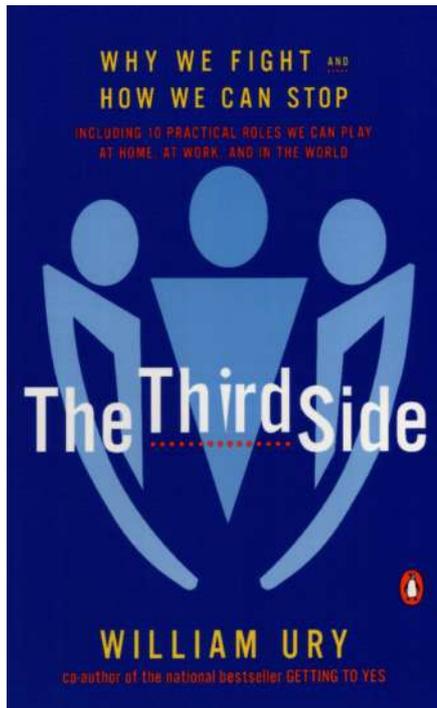

When working with divorcing parents, for example, you will start by focusing on the shared aims they have in common. They may get into arguments, but both will probably say they want the best for their children.

You can then build on this shared aim. There will be lots of time later to explore the differences.

There are many models for helping people to build on common ground. One approach is to encourage people to focus on the Third Side. Here is a short introduction to this approach.

The Third Side

The following section is based on work done by William Ury, who has helped many people to find solutions to conflicts. One approach he uses is to encourage people to focus on what he calls the Third Side.

William Ury says we do not have to get into fighting by taking the first or second sides.

He says we have a powerful alternative - The Third Side.

This can transform our daily battles into creative conflict and cooperation at home, at work, and in the world.

People can get into difficulties because they sit opposite each other and fight for their own agendas. Each party says the equivalent of: "I am right," or "Our side is right." "You are wrong." These are the First and Second Sides.

The First and Second Sides

People can get into difficulties if they sit opposite each other and fight for their own agendas.

Each party may say the equivalent of: "I am right," or "Our side is right." "You are wrong."

These are the First and Second Sides.

People are more likely to achieve a positive outcome if they can sit side-by-side and look together towards a Third Side. This is the greater What and Why.

People often get into arguments about the How, but it is important to focus on the higher purpose. This purpose may be, for example, the children's welfare after a divorce, the team's goals or the kind of world we want to pass on to future generations.

When working with divorcing parents, for example, you will start by focusing on the shared aims they have in common. They may get into arguments and say that:

"We have nothing in common."

They blame each other and say that things would be better if the other person changed. At a certain point, however, you may say something like the following.

"You say you have little in common, but do you both want the best for your children?"

They will probably agree that they do, but may disagree on how to achieve those aims. You may then say something like:

"Looking ahead, let's explore the actual words you would like your children to be saying in 10 years about the way you managed the divorce.

"For example, you may want them to be saying things like:

'Mum and Dad behaved in a good way when they went apart. They never used us as pawns or blamed us.

'They continued to encourage us and helped us to develop. We now have two homes where we can go and feel at ease.

'Mum and Dad managed the difficult situation in a positive way.'

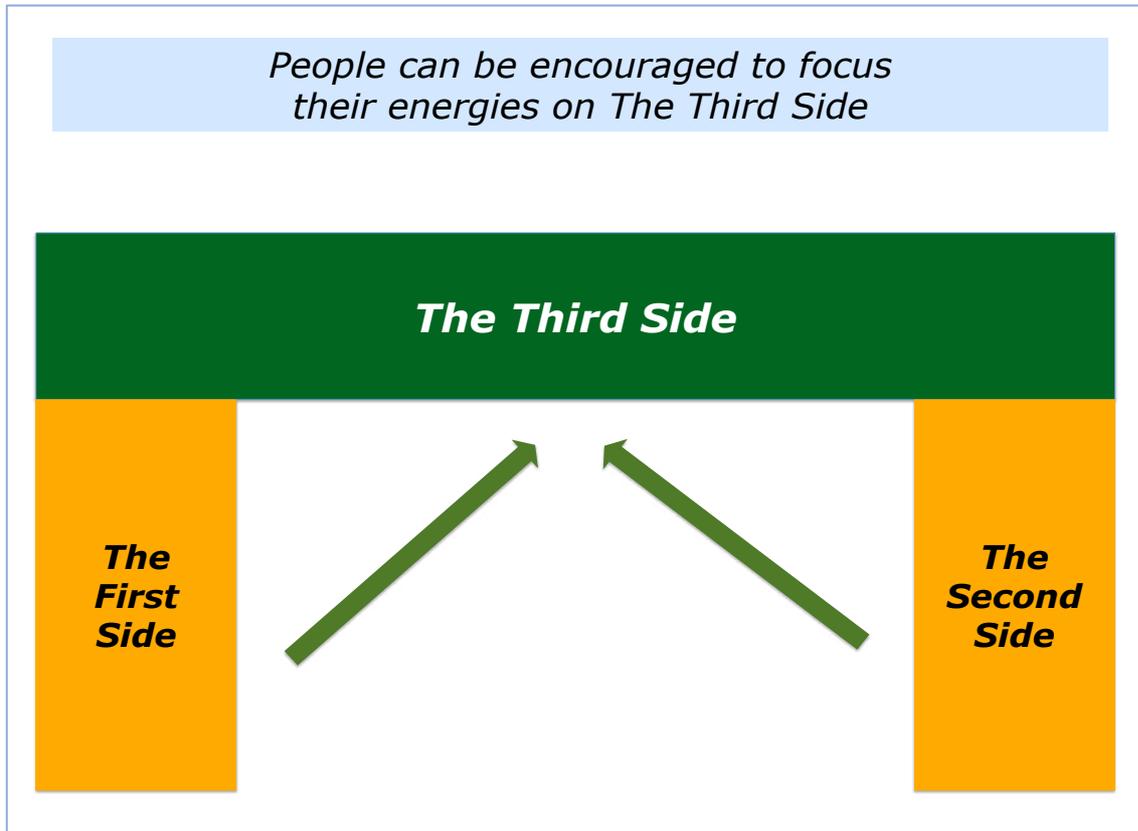

Sometimes it is possible to build on what people have in common and agree on a set of goals, a mission or a company's picture of success. This becomes the Third Side.

Providing people are clear on the agreed overall goals, you can then say things like:

"As far as I understand it, these are the goals to achieve. This is the picture of success.

"These are the benefits – for the various parties- of achieving the goals.

"Is this something you want to work towards achieving?"

Mediators recognise that it can take time to get to this point. Bearing this in mind, let's explore this approach in more depth.

Clarifying The Common Goals – The Third Side

Imagine that you have been asked to facilitate a discussion about enabling people to work together towards a common goal. The first step is to clarify the potential Third Side.

This is what I was asked to do when invited to work with two departmental heads in a company. The Chief Executive was losing patience with the two teams that were supposed to work together to achieve the company's goals.

The challenge was that each team focused only on their own targets. When asked about cross-functional work, they blamed each other for failures. This downward spiral affected the service given to customers and the whole company performance.

Bearing this in mind, I met the Chief Executive to clarify the real results to achieve. He was crystal clear on what he wanted them to contribute towards achieving the company's picture of success.

This called for the respective departments to implement certain strategies to work together, deliver high levels of customer satisfaction and, in the process, contribute to achieving the company's goals.

The key would be to encourage the departmental heads to focus on these outcomes. They had forgotten to focus on the real What – the things they must deliver to achieve the company's picture of success. Instead they had fallen into arguments about the How.

This sounds relatively straight-forward. But what happens when you don't have an authority – such as a CEO - who can let people know about the desired Third Side?

Clarifying What Each Party Wants and Building On Common Ground

One approach is to meet with each party and clarify what each of them wants. The keys will be:

To clarify their respective aims;

To then build on common ground.

Each party may want to begin by expressing their feelings about the situation. When appropriate, however, you can invite them to focus on the future.

Good mediators show that they recognise people's feelings. They then encourage people to channel their energy towards finding solutions. One approach is to invite them to look to the future. It is to ask questions around the following themes.

"Looking ahead, what would you like to happen? What are the real results you want to achieve? What is your picture of success?"

Mediators listen without judgement and play back what they are hearing. If appropriate, however, they sometimes invite people to express their ideas in a positive way.

If one party says that they want others to stop doing something, for example, the mediator invites them to say what they would like the others to do instead.

Towards the end of the conversation the mediator will summarise what they believe to be a party's goals. They may say something along the following lines.

"As far as I understand it, the goals you would like to achieve are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

"Is that right? Are there any other things that you would like to happen in the future?"

Imagine that you have taken this approach. You will have met with each party and clarified their aims.

The next step is to bring people together and focus on some of the common goals. Some people may try to draw you into arguing about the differences, but it can be useful to keep returning to the similarities.

Keep bringing people back to the What – the real results they want to achieve. This can be challenging because people often want to get into arguing about the How. When helping people, it can be useful to bear in mind some of the following guidelines.

Good Mediators

They aim to create a positive atmosphere and help people to find solutions to challenges. Some of the steps they may take are:

- To make sure that people want to solve the problem and are prepared to find win-win solutions;
- To find out what each party wants, build on the common ground and get some quick successes to build confidence;
- To then focus on one of the potential differences and clarify what each party wants;
- To clarify the real results to achieve – plus the benefits of achieving those results – and explore the possible solutions by keep asking: “How can we get a win-win?”;
- To – as far as possible – find potential win-wins, set specific goals and work together to achieve success.

Building On The Common Ground

The next step is to make sure the parties are prepared to build on the common ground. Sometimes this calls for again explaining it is important to get some quick successes rather than rushing into trying to solve deep differences.

Looking at the work with the two departmental heads, both had worked with me before so they knew the session would be positive. During the meeting it was important to take the following steps.

To create an encouraging environment and explain that I was sure we could pool our resources to find a win-win;

To explain that, if they were open to it, we would explore how they could be supported to combine their talents to achieve the company’s goals;

To put these goals in front of us so that we were literally all on the same side and looking together at the company’s picture of success.

Going deeper, I explained we had been tasked with working together to find solutions. Were they willing to work towards satisfying the customers and achieving the company's goals?

"Yes, of course we are willing," was the joint reply, followed by a few caveats.

Taking Steps To Achieve The Common Goals

Success builds confidence. So it is vital to focus on specific things that people can do to deliver some early wins. This is what happened with the two departmental heads in the company. They made specific action plans that involved them co-operating:

To deliver superb service to the customer;

To produce success stories that enhanced the reputation of the customer and company;

To proactively keep the Chief Executive informed about their contribution towards achieving the company's picture of success.

The two people worked together to get some quick wins. They then developed a pattern of building on what they had in common rather than only focusing on differences. This laid the groundwork for helping them to achieve ongoing success.

Imagine that you want to take this approach in a specific situation. This could be in the family, work or an organisation. As mentioned earlier, however, people must want to find win-win solutions.

Bearing this in mind, you can use the following framework. This involves mapping out: a) the specific things each party wants; b) the common ground; c) the specific thing people can do to build on common ground and get some quick successes.

Building On Common Ground

The different parties – the different people and groups – and what each wants.

Party A. The things they want are:

Party B. The things they want are:

Party C. The things they want are:

The Common Ground

The specific things that everybody wants are:

*

The specific things we can do to build on the common ground and get some quick successes are:

Managing Differences

You can now move onto the differences. This can be an emotionally loaded area, so you can do your best to maintain a positive atmosphere.

Bearing this in mind, sometimes it can be useful to make clear working contracts. These can be based on the guidelines that mediators know work well in such situations.

Such agreements often cover the following themes. a) the goals to achieve – such as to find a win-win solution; b) the mediator's role and the other parties' roles in working to achieve the goals; c) the suggested guidelines people can follow to work to achieve the goals.

Making Clear Contracts

Clear contracting helps to provide a structure that people can follow to channel their energies in a positive way. There are many ways to take this step. One approach to making clear contracts is:

To show respect to people and explain that you will do your best to help them to find solutions;

To outline some guidelines for working together to find solutions;

To ask if they are willing to follow the guidelines and work together to find solutions.

Mediators sometimes suggest the following guidelines. To have one person speak at a time; to respect each person's views; to seek to understand what the person is saying before responding; to build on areas of agreement; to solve any conflicts by asking: "How can we, as far as possible, get a win-win?"

Sometimes the situation may get heated. If appropriate, you can call a time out and give people chance to calm down. Returning to the agreed contract, you can invite people to decide if they want to continue working to find solutions.

Imagine that people have agreed to the working guidelines. You can focus on each difference – each topic – in turn. Maintaining a respectful atmosphere you can aim:

To focus on the first challenge and, whenever possible, phrase this in positive terms;

For example, encourage people to focus on: "How can we live in peace?" rather than: "Why do we keep fighting?"

To clarify what each person or party wants or would like to happen in the future – this to be on both a feeling and factual level;

To build a picture of the things people want and clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the benefits – for all the various stakeholders – of achieving this picture of success;

To move on to doing some creative problem solving and aim to find – as far as possible – win-win solutions.

There are many models for finding solutions to challenges. One approach is to use the Three C model. It encourages people to focus on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

We will explore this approach in greater depth later in the book during the section on Mentoring. It involves finding solutions to challenges by exploring the following themes.

Clarity

This involves clarifying the real results to achieve – the picture of success.

Creativity

This involves exploring the possible options for going forwards – the possible choices and consequences – together with the pluses and minuses of each option.

The next step is to do some creative thinking. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, you can invite people to explore any other possible creative solutions.

If appropriate, at a certain point you may ask if it is okay for you to share some possible ideas. If so, you may say something like the following.

"One possibility is ...

"Another possibility is ...

"Another possibility is ...

These ideas are offered in the spirit of being other possibilities rather than telling people what to do. The people will eventually need to commit to an idea that they want to pursue.

Concrete Results

This involves inviting people to choose the specific route – or combination of routes – they want to pursue. It also involves agreeing on an action plan and getting some quick successes.

Good mediators stay calm during the process. They recognise that some of the differences may be deep-seated. Some may also involve feelings of pain, mistrust or fear.

Mediators encourage people to focus on one topic at a time and get some quick successes. They recognise, however, that many topics are interlinked, but jumping from topic to topic will not work.

A more fruitful approach can be to tackle one topic, get a success and build confidence. It is then possible to explore the links to other topics and again get successes.

Another key point is worth bearing in mind. People may want similar things and agree on the picture of success. But they may have differences about the style that others follow to achieve the goals.

A strong-willed person, for example, may have the ability to inspire or intimidate other people. If they pursue the intimidation strategy, then this can create collateral damage. Such a person can learn to channel their personality, however, rather than change their personality.

If appropriate, it can be useful to ask a person something like the following.

"Would you be open to adding another option to your repertoire to help you and others to achieve success?"

"Would you be open to adding to another option to your repertoire to help you and others to achieve success?"

If the person says they would, it may be possible to help them to add to their strategies. They are more likely to be open to such additions, however, if they feel these will help both themselves and others to achieve success.

Bearing all these factors in mind, mediators often focus on the following themes during the sessions.

They encourage people to keep following guidelines that we know work for finding solutions;

They encourage people to keep focusing on the future, the real results to achieve and the benefits of achieving this picture of success;

They encourage people to explore the potential choices, the consequences and the options that are most likely to achieve the desired consequences.

They encourage people to avoid using moral judgements - such as them saying that things are good or bad, right or wrong. Such moral judgements do not help. The future is about choices and consequences. Which set of consequences do they want?

They encourage people to focus on the results to achieve – plus the benefits – and keep saying things like:

"As far as I understand, the results you want to achieve are: 1) to ...; 2) to ... ; 3) to ... How can we do our best to get these results? How can we, as far as possible, get win-wins?"

Good mediators stay patient. They believe that people can, when they wish, be incredibly creative and find solutions. They also, when appropriate, offer suggestions that can help people to achieve their picture of success.

How do painful problems get solved? Some don't - people go on fighting. Some get solved because people lose interest - they get tired, accept the differences or move-on with their lives.

There are many ways to tackle challenges. The win-win approach is more likely to achieve lasting success rather than those that are based on win-lose or lose-lose.

Imagine that you have helped people to build on what they have in common. This could be in the family, work or an organisation. You will have also helped them to get some successes.

You may then want to explore how to help people to manage the differences. One approach is to use the following framework. You will, of course, adapt this in your own way to help people to get win-win solutions.

Managing Potential Differences

The first topic – the first difference – to explore is:

Looking to the future, the various things that people want are these.

Party A wants: ...

Party B wants: ...

The real results that people want are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

The possible win-win solutions could be:

 To ...*

 To ...*

The Facilitation Approach

Imagine you have been asked to facilitate a team workshop. Your aim will be to help people to channel their energies towards achieving their chosen goals. This may involve taking the following steps.

Focusing

Clarifying the aims for the session and setting it up to succeed in achieving these aims.

Facilitating

Facilitating the actual session and helping people to work towards achieving the aims.

Finishing

Doing your best to ensure the session finishes properly and, if appropriate, following up to help people achieve their aims.

Before looking at your own facilitation style it can be good to learn from good practice. Martin Gilbraith is a specialist in this field.

Here are excerpts from his website in which he describes the role of facilitation. This is followed by the Six Core Facilitation Competencies described by the International Association Of Facilitators.

Facilitation

The word facilitation is derived from the Latin 'facile' which, simply translated, means 'to make easy'.

A facilitator is therefore someone who makes something easy for others. A classic if lengthy definition is that of Roger Schwarz:

"Group facilitation is a process in which a person, whose selection is acceptable to all members of the group, is substantively neutral, and has no decision-making authority.

"The facilitator diagnoses and intervenes to help a group improve how it identifies and solves problems and makes decisions, to increase the group's effectiveness."

The outcome remains the responsibility of the group, thus helping to ensure the group's ownership and commitment to it.

The Six Core Facilitation Competencies

A Competent Facilitator Will Aim:

- To create collaborative client relationships;
- To plan appropriate group processes;
- To create and sustain a participatory environment;
- To guide the group to appropriate and useful outcomes;
- To build and maintain professional knowledge;
- To model a positive professional attitude.

You will have your own approach to facilitating the session. Like many facilitators you will prepare properly. Let's consider this step.

Focusing

You may start by gathering information about the situation, the people involved and the goals to achieve. You will also aim to set up the session to succeed.

It will be important to meet with the key stakeholders. These may include the team leader and, if appropriate, their manager. It may also include meeting other people in the team.

The following section describes some key themes it can be useful to explore with these people. After gathering information it will be important to make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about:

The specific goals for the session – the picture of success;

The specific guidelines to follow – the Dos and Don'ts – during the session;

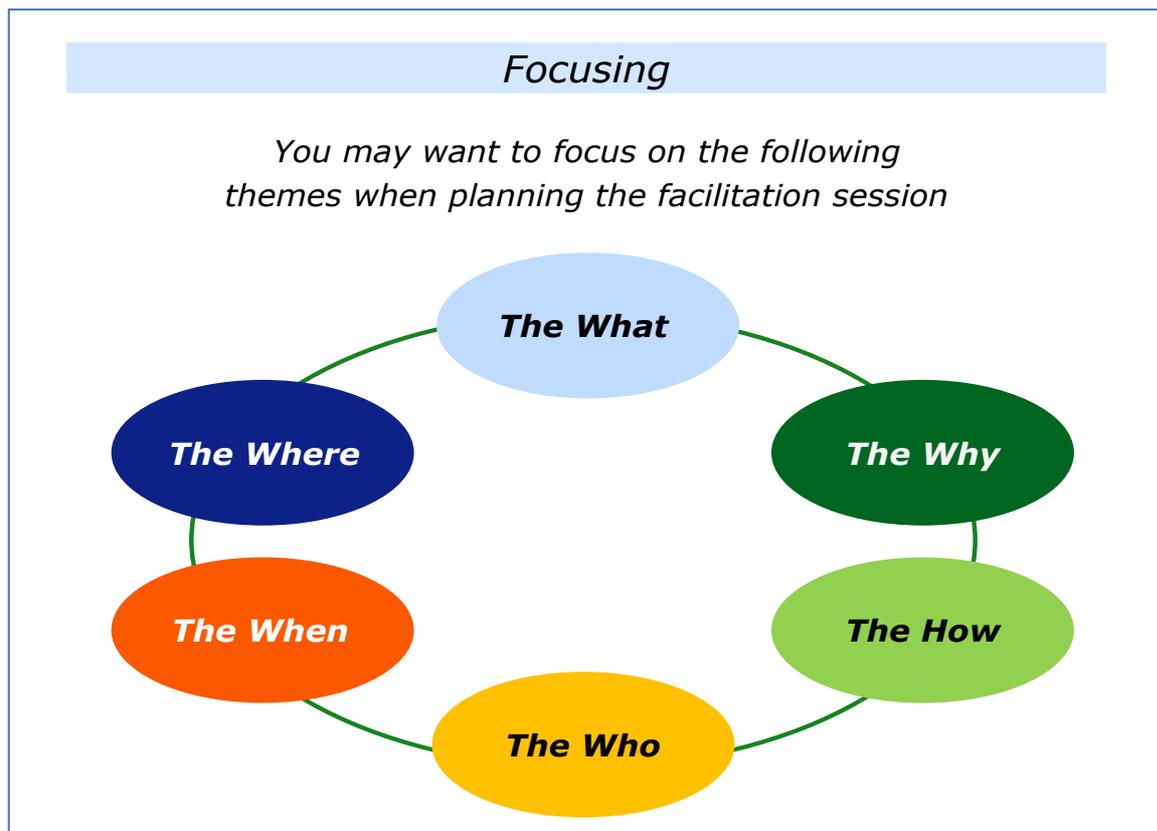

The specific roles of various people in the session;

The specific things that can be done to increase the chances of success in the session;

The specific things that can be done to follow up the session and achieve the picture of success.

One approach to gathering information is to explore the What, Why, How, Who, When and Where. The following section provides a framework you can use to explore these questions, but there is one key point to bear in mind. This is a framework rather than a list.

Depending on the situation, you may want to begin by asking about the Who – who will be attending – rather than the What or Why. Like all frameworks, you can adapt it in your own way.

The first step will be to meet with the team leader and, if appropriate, their manager. You can then meet with other people.

Here are some themes you can explore with the individuals. As mentioned earlier, you can pick and mix from the various sections.

The What

Here are some of the headline questions it can be useful to explore on this theme with the key stakeholders. These are explained in more detail in the following section.

- What are the goals for the session? What are the real results you want to achieve?
- What are the specific things you want people to be feeling, thinking, saying and doing after the session? What is the picture of success?
- What do you want to happen as a result of the session? What do you believe the team can achieve in the future?

What are the goals for the session? What are the real results you want to achieve? What for you will make it a successful session? What are the specific things you want people to be feeling, thinking, saying and doing after the session?

What is the session expected to produce? For example, does it aim to create a sense of ownership, a clear strategy, an increased sense of motivation, a specific action plan or something else?

What do you want to happen as a result of the session? What may be potential actions you want to implement? What do you believe the team can achieve in the future? What is the longer-term picture of success?

Bearing these things in mind, let me check the goals for the session. As far as I understand it, the results you want to achieve from the session are:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

Is that the case? Are there any other things you would like to add?

The Why

Here are headline questions to explore. One key point: these are sometimes phrased as What questions. This is to make it easier for people to describe the reasons Why they do things.

- What are the reasons you want to hold the session at the moment? What other information can you give that might help with understanding the big picture?
- What will be the pluses of running a successful session - for the team, colleagues, customers and other stakeholders? What could be the potential minuses?
- What are the challenges the team faces? Who are the key stakeholders that the team must satisfy? How can the team keep these people happy?

Sometimes it is easier to explore a person's reasons for doing things by asking them What questions rather than Why questions. This is something I learned when running therapy sessions. There are several reasons for taking this approach.

First, a person may find it easier to answer an open What question rather than a closed Why question. This can help them to loosen up and explore the possible reasons.

Second, some people experience Why questions as a criticism or accusations. They may tighten up or think there is only one right answer.

For example, if a person has asked for your help in changing their negative behaviour, it is difficult for them to answer the question:

"Why do you behave in that way?"

It can sometimes be easier for them to answer if you ask:

"Looking ahead, what do you want to do in the future? How do you want to behave? Would it be okay to explore some ways that you can achieve those results?"

Bearing this in mind, here are some of the questions it can be useful to ask the stakeholders on this theme.

What are the reasons for wanting to have the session? What is happening in the team at the moment? What other information can you give that might help to understand the big picture?

Let's imagine that the session is successful. Looking ahead, what will be the benefits of achieving the agreed results? What will be potential pluses – for the team, colleagues, customers and other stakeholders? What could be the potential minuses?

Looking at the team, I would like to know a bit more about its history, successes and challenges. Can you tell me about the history of the team?

What are the factors that have brought it to this point of wanting to have a session? What are the challenges facing the team? What have people tried before to tackle these challenges? What were the results of these efforts?

Let's have a look at the team's strengths. Looking back, when have people in the team worked well together? What did they do right then? How do you think they can follow these principles – plus maybe add other elements – to work well together in the future?

Looking at the team at the moment, what does the team do well? How can it do more of these things in the future? What can the team do better in the future and how?

Who are the key stakeholders that the team must satisfy? What do each of these stakeholders want? What do your backers, bosses and customers want? How can people in the team do their best to keep these people happy?

Are there any other factors I need to know regarding the team's future? How long do you think some of the people will be around? What do you think your organisation sees as the future of the team? Is there anything else it would be helpful to know?

The How

Here are some of the headline questions to explore.

- The aim will be to follow the usual principles for facilitating a session. Building on these, are there any other guidelines – Dos or Don'ts - you would like me to bear in mind when running the session?*
- What are the areas people agree on? How do you think people can build on these and work towards common goals?*
- Are there areas where people may have differences? How do you think it may be possible to find some solutions – even some win-wins?*

Let's move on to some of the guidelines it would be useful to follow during the session. It will also be important to agree on the responsibilities of various people during the session. For example:

My Responsibilities Will Be:

To create a positive environment; to make clear contracts about the goals for the session; to explain what I see as my responsibilities and the team member's responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals;

To explain it will be important to encourage each other, listen and, when appropriate, work together to find positive solutions; to help people to achieve the agreed goals. To do my best to ensure they go away saying things like:

"That was a good session. We used our individual and team strengths to find solutions to challenges. We now have an action plan that we believe in and will do our best to achieve the goals."

The Team Members' Responsibilities Will Be:

To maintain a positive environment; to agree on the goals; to encourage each other; to work together to find solutions to challenges; to conclude the session by making clear plans; to have mission holders who will take responsibility for ensuring the plans are carried out; to then get some quick successes.

Are there any other guidelines – Dos and Don'ts - it would be useful to follow to improve the chances of having a successful session?

My approach is often to build on what people have in common and, when appropriate, find solutions to any differences. Bearing this in mind, it would be good to know about the following things.

What do people already agree on? What are the areas where people want to work towards common goals? How do you think people can build on these in the future?

What are the areas where people may have differences? If so, what are the different views, feelings or approaches they have?

If appropriate, I may be able to help people to find some solutions. This is something we can explore. Are there any particular areas where this might be helpful?

Decision making is vital and at times somebody simply needs to make a decision. Bearing this in mind, let me ask a couple of questions.

What may be the specific areas where - despite attempts to find agreement - you or other key people may simply need to make a decision? What may be the pluses and minuses of taking this route?

Is there anything else you want to say or ask me about regarding how we conduct the session?

The Who

Here are some of the headline questions to explore.

- Who are the individual people in the team? What are each person's strengths? What do you think would be their best contribution to the team or the organisation in the future?
- What is each person's style? How do they behave, communicate and relate to other people? What are the pluses and possible minuses to their style?
- How do you think each person will behave during the session? How will they encourage people? Are there any triggers that might lead to them behaving in ways that may not be helpful?

Who are the individual people in the team? What are their specific roles? What are the results they are accountable for delivering in each of their roles?

What are each individual's strengths? When do they do good work? What do they do right then? What are the principles they follow? What do you think would be their best contribution to the team or the organisation in the future?

What is the person's style? How do they behave, communicate and relate to other people? What are the pluses of their style? Are there any potential minuses to their style? What are the consequences?

Looking at each person, how do you think they will behave during the session? How will they encourage and support people? Are there any triggers that might lead to them behaving in ways that may not be helpful?

Let's revisit the various roles in the session. My role is to do my best to guide the team to success.

Looking at your role – as a leader or manager – what role do you want to play in the session?

You will, of course, be a participant. During some parts of the session, however, you may want to introduce a topic, give some background or play another role. At that point it will be important to let the group know that you are taking that role for a certain time.

Decision making is important. Bearing this in mind, who will ultimately make the key decisions regarding various topics? Who will then be following up the work that is done during the session?

The When

Here are some of the headline questions to explore.

- What do you want to happen after the session? What will be the road map – including the specific milestones – for achieving the goals?
- Who will be the mission holder in charge of coordinating the road map? Who may be the potential mission holders for various aspects of the work?
- What can people do to get some early successes? What will they do to keep reporting their progress towards achieving the goals?

Looking ahead, let's imagine the session goes well. What do you want to happen afterwards? What would like to see delivered and by when?

What do you think could be the kind of action plan and timetable? What will be the road map – including the specific milestones – on the road to achieving the goals?

Who will be the mission holder in charge of coordinating the road map? Who may be the potential mission holders for various aspect of the work? What will be their brief? What support will they need to deliver the road map successfully?

Looking ahead, what can you do to maintain the momentum? What can you do to get some early successes? What can people do to produce some quick wins?

What can people do to proactively report their progress towards achieving the goals? What else needs to happen – and when – to ensure the team has a good chance of achieving its goals?

The Where

Here are some of the headline questions to explore.

- *Where will the session be held? What is the location like?
How can we make the environment as positive and encouraging as possible?*
- When do you want to start and finish? How can we provide all the materials required for the session? Is there anything else we should do regarding the arrangements?
- Looking ahead, what else can we do to ensure the session has a good chance of achieving success? Is there anything else you would like me to do before, during or even after the session?

Where will the session be held? What is the location like? How can we make the environment as positive and encouraging as possible? How can we make sure the physical and emotional things are right?

What will be the timings for the session? When do you want to start and finish? I will organise the session so that people can do the work but also have regular breaks.

How can we provide all the materials required for the session? Is there anything else we should do regarding the arrangements? Who will be in charge of making those happen?

When will people be informed about the session? What do you want to tell them about the agenda and goals? What do you want to say about the attitude that will be required for us to achieve success?

Looking ahead, what else can we do to ensure the session has a good chance of achieving success? Is there anything else you would like me to do before, during or even after the session?

You may then want to summarise the discussion by saying something like the following to the stakeholders.

"Looking at what you want to achieve, here is a potential framework for the day.

The Goals For The Session Are:

The Schedule For The Session – Including The Topics We Will Cover – Will Be:

*

*

"Is there anything you would like to add or change? Bearing this in mind, I will send an email confirming the goals and timetable.

"Let me know if you have any further thoughts or want more information. Otherwise I will see you on the day. Is that okay?"

Preparing For The Session

Imagine that you have gathered all the information. You may then take time to reflect and rehearse the session. Bearing in mind the controllables – the things you can control – you may aim:

To focus on the goals for the session;

To settle on your plans for running the session;

To rehearse running the session.

Different people rehearse in different ways. You may, for example, look ahead and rehearse going through the following steps.

Travelling to the location ... Getting there at least an hour before the start ... Setting up the room ... Preparing any flip charts and making sure all the equipment works.

Completing the preparation and giving yourself time to think ... Again rehearsing the day in your head ... Greeting each person as they arrive ... Making them feel welcome.

Starting the session ... Inviting the leader to give an introduction to the day and what they would like the team to achieve ... Confirming the agreed goals ... Explaining the format and schedule for the day.

Making clear contracts about your role and the participants' roles ... Explaining the key principles to follow during the day – such as encouraging each other and working to find solutions ... Asking if people have anything to add to the agenda.

Moving onto the first topic on the agenda ... Introducing the topic by explaining the concept and giving concrete examples ... Giving exercises or other ways of helping people to explore the topic.

Being encouraging ... Enabling people to produce ideas or solutions for tackling challenges ... Building on areas of agreement ... Making action plans ... Making the transition to the next topic.

Moving on to any areas where people may have differences ... Helping people to clarify what they each want ... Using creative problem solving methods to help people to find, as far as possible, win-win solutions.

Anticipating any possible difficulties during the day ... Clarifying how you can prevent these difficulties happening ... Clarifying how you can manage them if, despite everything, they do happen.

Continuing to work through the agenda ... Reaching the final part ... Handing over to the leader to explain the next steps ... Making sure the team has mission holders who will take responsibility for delivering aspects of the action plan.

Giving a short exercise before finishing ... Inviting people to share what they have learned or relearned during the day ... Thanking people ... Handing over to the leader to conclude the day.

You may wish to complete your preparation by clarifying the Dos and Don'ts for running the session. For example:

Do encourage people; Do focus on the results to achieve; Do focus on areas of agreement; Do encourage people to find solutions; Do keep connecting with the key stakeholders to ensure they are happy with the process.

Do stay calm; Do buy time to think if the group hit trouble; Do think of the possible ways forward; Do rehearse taking the next steps; Do everything possible to help the team to reach its goals.

There may be other guidelines you wish to follow. The Don'ts may probably be the inverse of the Dos. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Facilitating The Session

The Dos to bear in mind when facilitating the session are:

* Do ...

* Do ...

* Do ...

The Don'ts to bear in mind when facilitating the session are:

Facilitating The Actual Session

Before setting out for the day, you may rehearse again the overall plan for running the session. Getting to the venue early, you will make sure everything is in place.

You will welcome people and then invite the team leader – or other key stakeholder – to set the scene for the day. They will hand-over to you to run the session.

One approach is to simply start by giving people an overview of the schedule for the day. You will then run the session in your own way. Here is an introduction to some of the steps you may want to take, however, on the way towards helping people to achieve their goals.

Confirm the goals for the session

People will already have been sent an introduction to the goals for the session. Bearing these in mind, you can describe these again. You may say something along the following lines.

The Goals

As far as I understand it, the goals for the session are:

● To ...

● To ...

● To ...

Is that okay? Are there any other topics you would like to add to the agenda?

Make clear contracts about people's roles

Explain your own and the participants' roles in working towards achieving the goals. Done in a positive way, this can help to set the tone for the session.

Contracting

My Role Is:

- To be a good encourager, keep things on track and help you to work towards achieving the agreed goals;
- To act as a good facilitator and enable you to use your strengths and skills to achieve the agreed goals;
- To, if appropriate, share positive models and practical tools that you can use to achieve the agreed goals.

Your Role Is:

- To encourage each other and keep working toward achieving the agreed goals;
- To use your strengths and skills to achieve the agreed goals;
- To, if appropriate, find creative solutions to challenges and do what you can to achieve the agreed goals.

If appropriate, you may also want to outline some of the guidelines for the session. These may only be necessary if there is a likelihood of people behaving in ways that may cause difficulties for others. These kinds of guidelines may include the following.

One person to speak at a time; Respect each person's views; Seek to understand what the person is saying before responding; Build on the areas of agreement; Solve any conflicts by asking: "How can we, as far as possible, get a win-win?"

Be a good model by being positive and encouraging people

Good facilitators are often calm, clear and create an environment in which people can achieve concrete results. Your own behaviour can set the tone for the group. It can therefore be useful to try to act as a good model.

Focus on the first topic to explore

Introduce the first topic to explore. People need context so, if appropriate, show how tackling this topic will help towards achieving the overall goals. You can also describe any models or tools they can use to focus on the particular topic.

Follow your chosen approach for helping people to reach their goals

You will have your own approach to facilitating the discussions. When appropriate, you may also introduce exercises and breakout sessions that enable people to work on the themes. The important things to bear in mind are:

To use an approach that is likely to work;

To customise the approach to make it work in the situation;

To do your best to help people to achieve the goals.

Many models apply versions of the What, How, When approach. Here is an introduction to some questions that it can be useful to invite people to explore when using this approach.

What, How, When

You can keep focusing on:

- What

What are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits?

- How

How can we do our best to achieve these results? What are the possible choices for working towards achieving these results? What are the pluses and minuses each option?

What is the route - or combination of routes - we want to follow? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

- When

When do we want to take this route? Who will be the mission holders? What do we want to achieve and by when?

Encourage people to build on their areas of agreement

Good teams build on areas of agreement. Bearing this in mind, you may occasionally say things like:

"Let's clarify what we have agreed on so far. As far as I understand, the things we have agreed on are:

1) ...

2) ...

3) ...

"We can translate these into action and get some early successes. We can then, when you are ready, focus on how we can find solutions to any topics where there may be differences."

On occasions it may be okay to move into other roles

Your role is to act as a facilitator and help people to achieve the goals. Depending on your approach, this can also involve providing stimulating input, such as summaries, models and tools.

There may be some rare occasions, however, when it may be helpful for you to move into another role. This is more likely to be the case if you are working with the team in other roles, such as a mentor.

If you want to step out of the facilitator role in the session, it will be important to position this by saying something like:

"With your permission, I will step out of the role as a facilitator for a moment and take the role of ... then I will go back into the role."

This should only be done if it is appropriate and will help people in the session. Then, after giving a piece of input, you can move back into the role of facilitator.

Conclude work on the first topic and move on to the next topic

Ensure that people have got as far as they can with the first topic. You may then want to say something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, you have agreed upon the following things:

1) ...

2) ...

3) ...

"Bearing these in mind, it can be a good time to take a break. Before we do that, however, let's agree on the next topic you want to explore.

"Here are the other topics on the agenda. We can, of course, add other points. Looking at these topics, which one would you like to focus on after the break?"

Keep connecting with the key stakeholders

Choose your own way to keep in touch with the key stakeholders during the session. It can be useful to catch up with them occasionally and say something like the following.

"Are you okay with how things are going?"

"Looking ahead, the next topics we will be focusing on will be ...

"Are there any other things you would like me to bear in mind or are there any other topics you want us to explore?"

Keep connecting with them. Ensure they are happy with how things are going and, where necessary, make alterations to ensure the session achieves its goals.

Buy time to think when necessary

There could be challenging moments during the session. People could get stuck, fall into arguments or hit other difficulties. If these happen, it can be useful to buy time to think.

Stay calm and use your own approach to finding solutions to challenges. As mentioned earlier, one way is to keep asking yourself:

"Looking ahead, what are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the picture of success?"

"How can we do our best to achieve those results? What are they key things we can do to give ourselves the greatest chance of success? If appropriate, what can we do to – as far as possible - get win-wins?"

"How can I help people to take these steps? How can I share the possible ways forwards? How can I help people to take their chosen route towards achieving the desired results?"

If appropriate, consider using some of the tools described elsewhere in this book. These include helping people to find win-win solutions or work towards a compelling Third Side.

Clarify the specific things you can do to help people. Rehearse what you are going to do next. You can then do your best to help people to achieve the desired results.

Finishing

Continue until people have completed the agenda and or feel they have done what they can during the session. If appropriate, you can finish by asking each person to write down the following things.

The specific things that I have learned or relearned in the session are:

The specific things I believe we need to do to maintain the momentum and do our best to achieve the goals are:

If it is a relatively small group of up to 12 people, you can then invite each person to each describe what they have written. This can help to reinforce a feeling of success in the group.

If it is a larger group, you can invite people to share their ideas in pairs or trios. After they have done this, ask if any would like to share some things they have written. This can again help to finish the session on a positive note.

Finish your part of the session and hand over to the key stakeholders

Find a way to catch up with the key stakeholders. Say that you will be handing over to them at the end of the session. Explain that it may be good for them to conclude the session by outlining the next steps.

They will, of course, do this in their own way. One approach is for them to cover the following areas.

To thank people for their contributions and to summarise what has been agreed;

To explain the next steps regarding the actions to implement and the mission holders who will take responsibility for ensuring these are delivered;

To describe some quick successes they as leaders are going to deliver to maintain the momentum on the way towards achieving the team's goals.

If the key stakeholders are happy to do this, you can conclude your part of the session and hand over to them. They can then aim to finish the session in a positive way.

Following Up

The session will probably result in some kind of outcome. This could be project work, an agreed action plan or other activities.

If requested by the key stakeholders, you could help them with the follow up. Depending on your skill set, these may include opportunities:

To facilitate further sessions with the team;

To hold individual mentoring sessions with the team members;

To use your strengths to help the team to achieve its picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you can do your best to finish the session in a positive way.

The Achievement Approach

Imagine that a person has asked for your help in working towards achieving their career goals. You can start by creating an encouraging environment.

If appropriate, you can then focus on the following themes to help the person to achieve peak performance.

Achievement

Imagine that a person has said they want to shape their future career. Before settling on their goals, it can be useful to invite them to explore the following questions.

"What are the things you want to do in your career? What are kinds of work you find most satisfying? What are the specific things you find satisfying when doing these kinds of work?"

"Imagine you had a blank piece of paper and could create your ideal job. Describe three things you would love to have in such a role.

My Ideal Work Would Be Where:

"Let's move into the future. Imagine you are looking back at the end of your career. What do you want to have achieved by then? What for you will mean that you have had a satisfying career?"

You can start by exploring what the person wants to do. If appropriate, you can also think about what you believe they can achieve. How to clarify their possibilities?

One approach is to ask yourself some of the following questions when looking at a person or an example of their work.

When does the person show positive energy? What are the person's strengths? When do they do satisfying work? What do they do right then? How can they follow these principles in the future?

Bearing in mind what I have seen, what do I believe it may be possible for the person to achieve? What are the reasons why I believe they can achieve these things?

Good coaches, for example, often focus on what they believe a person can achieve. They then check whether such aims resonate with the person. They may say something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, you want to ... Is that right? Let me ask you a question. Would you also like:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"The reason I ask is because, from what you have said and the things I seen, I believe you could do those things.

"This would involve you choosing to set certain goals and do the necessary work. But I believe that you could achieve those goals. What do you think?"

Imagine that you have shared some of these ideas with the person. It will then be time to settle on the goals they want to achieve. Bearing this in mind, you may say something along the follow lines.

"Looking at the various possibilities, which of these themes would you like to focus on? What are the specific goals you would like to work towards?"

"Let's focus on your chosen goal. Looking at this, what are the real results you want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these aims?"

Let's return to the person who has asked for your help in shaping their career. How can you clarify their aspirations? How can you then help them to settle on the specific goals they want to achieve?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Achievement

The person who may ask for help in working towards achieving their goals is:

*

The specific goals they may want to achieve are:

Attitude

Imagine that a person wants to achieve certain goals. They may want to do this when working as a writer, actor, business leader, footballer or in another professional role.

What attitude must they demonstrate to succeed? Depending on their chosen activity, they may need:

To be positive ... To be kind ... To want to learn ... To be proactive ... To think ahead ... To be resilient ... To have a sense of perspective ... To be patient ... To be committed to continuous improvement.

Some people may already have the required attitude. Some people may need to choose if they wish to demonstrate these qualities. A person can choose:

To be positive or negative ... To be a creator or a complainer ... To take responsibility or avoid responsibility ... To help people or hurt people ... To do their best or not to do their best.

Will the person be working alone or with other people? If the latter, then it is important to ask the following questions.

What is the person's style of interacting with other people? How do they communicate with and relate to people? What are the consequences of the person's style? How do people feel after interacting with them? What will be the effect they have on their colleagues, customers and other stakeholders?

Imagine that you are helping somebody to work towards achieving their aims. Looking at their behaviour, ask yourself:

What is the attitude the person must demonstrate to achieve their goals? On a scale 0-10, to what extent do they demonstrate this attitude?

When have they demonstrated these qualities in the past? How can they demonstrate these qualities in the future? How can I help them to maintain or develop the required attitude?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Attitude

Ability

Imagine the person wants to work as a counsellor, singer, football manager, scientist, lawyer, developer, salesperson, business owner or in another role. What are the abilities they must demonstrate?

Depending on their chosen activity, they may need to score highly in the following areas:

To encourage people ... To have certain professional skills ... To think strategically ... To be able to see patterns ... To be a problem solver ... To enable other people to perform at their best ... To build superb teams.

How to clarify whether the person has such abilities? One approach is to explore their positive history and invite them to do the following things:

To describe two satisfying and successful projects they have done in their life;

To describe what made each of these satisfying;

To describe the actual things they did – in behaviour terms - to deliver success.

Look for any recurring patterns. These can give clues to a person's successful style of working. Imagine you have clarified some of the person's abilities. It can be useful to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the specific abilities they need to demonstrate to reach their goals? On a scale 0-10, to what extent do they have these abilities? What can they do to maintain or improve the rating?

Application

A person's attitude and ability provide a good foundation for them working to achieving success. It will then be important for them to apply themselves fully to the task.

Depending on their chosen activity, they may need to score highly in the following areas:

To have the necessary drive ... To be self-disciplined and self-managing ... To follow their chosen strategies ... To keep doing the right things in the right way every day ... To do superb work ... To find solutions to challenges ... To help their customers and colleagues to succeed.

There are many models for clarifying how a person can apply themselves. Here is one approach.

Alertness

The person feels alive and alert. They give their full attention to the activity. They may be encouraging a person, playing an instrument, practicing a skill or doing another task.

Antennae

The person uses their antennae to sense what is happening. They pursue their chosen strategies and apply their skills. They keep focusing on: a) what is working; b) what they can do better and how.

Achievement

The person does their best to achieve their aims. They may then choose to rest, reflect and repeat the cycle again. They are committed to constant improve and achieving ongoing success.

Let's return to the person you may be helping. Bearing in mind the person's chosen activity, it can be useful to ask yourself the following questions.

Does the person apply themselves when tackling their chosen activity? Do they prepare properly? Do they rehearse when they are going to do? Do they clarify their chosen strategies? Do they anticipate the potential challenges?

Does the person follow rituals before embarking on the activity? Do they then immerse themselves fully? Do they keep following the right strategies in the right way?

Do they build on their strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses? Do they apply their skills in the right way? Do they keep reading reality? Do they keep improving?

Application

The rating I would give the person regarding them being likely to apply themselves properly to achieve the desired results is:

_____ /10

The specific things they can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Adventure

Application will get a person so far and that may be enough to reach the goals. On some occasions, however, they may need to dare to adventure.

Great workers always do the basics and then add the brilliance. Bearing this in mind, the kinds of adventure a person needs to demonstrate will depend on the activity they are doing.

Sometimes it may involve being consistent and then being creative. Sometimes it may involve being disciplined and then choosing to be daring to deliver the goods. Sometimes it may involve finding solutions to challenges.

How to find clarify whether a person can demonstrate this sense of adventure? You can ask yourself the following questions.

What are the real results the person are aiming to achieve when doing their chosen activity? When may they need to be creative or find solutions to challenges? When may they need to be daring and demonstrate a sense of adventure to achieve their goals?

What are the kinds of qualities they may need to demonstrate when taking this step? When have they shown these qualities in the past? What were the principles they followed then? How can they follow similar principles – plus add other skills – in the future?

What may be the specific situations where they need to demonstrate this ability? What can they then do to make good decisions and, when appropriate, show this sense of adventure? How can I help them to take these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the following things.

Achievement

Imagine that the person has demonstrated the right attitude, built on their abilities and applied themselves properly. Here are some of the many models for helping individuals to move from potential to peak performances.

The Channelling Your Champ Rather Than Your Chimp Approach

Positive people often aim to channel their inner champ rather than their inner chimp. What does this mean?

During the last decade Steve Peters has helped many athletes to manage their chimp. Their chimp can take many forms. It can be self-doubt, irrational emotion and negative self-talk.

Steve helps them to manage these impulses. He also encourages athletes to make specific plans for performing at their best. He uses his own terms to describe this pursuit of excellence and become the best they can be.

One way of looking at it, however, is that he helps people to channel their champ, whilst managing their chimp. Let's explore how people can produce their equivalent of championship performances.

Clarifying Your Champ

Everybody has a positive history. So it can be useful for a person to explore when they have performed brilliantly, even if this was only for a few minutes. They may have been encouraging another person, managing a crisis, completing a piece of work or whatever.

Different coaches and educators use different questions to help people learn from such experiences. Whatever words they use, however, they often help people to explore their strengths and successful style.

They encourage the person to build from within, which is the organic approach. If appropriate, they also help them to add other skills to reach their goals. They may begin by asking the person some of the following questions.

When have you performed brilliantly? What were you doing right then? What were the principles you were following? How can you follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to perform brilliantly in the future?

Good counsellors may take this approach when working with individuals who are experiencing difficulties. Whilst acknowledging the person's feelings, they invite them to recall when they have dealt with challenges successfully. They may say something like the following.

Looking back, when have you encountered a similar challenge and come through it successfully?

What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed to tackle the challenge successfully?

You already have the strength and successful patterns within you. So let's explore how you might follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to tackle the present challenge.

Peak performers follow a similar route. They constantly recall their best performances. They know that following similar principles can ensure they do the basics and achieve 8+/10.

Such people then aim to add the brilliance and achieve 10/10. They build on their champ rather than get distracted by their chimp.
If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the specific situation in the past when you delivered your equivalent of a championship performance.

Describe the specific things you did right then – the principles you followed – to deliver your equivalent of a championship performance.

Champ In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I delivered my equivalent of a championship performance was:

Channelling Your Champ In The Future

Good teams also use this approach to keep developing. One football team used it, for example, to improve the way they finished games.

The team's manager was concerned that, on several occasions, the players had failed to close out games when they were leading by the odd goal. They had drawn or lost games where, with ten minutes to play, they were leading 1-0 or 2-1.

The players forgot to do the basics. They became paralysed and kept watching the clock, hoping for the game to end. This led to the other team scoring and taking over the game.

The manager had a choice. One option was to rip into them for forgetting to do the basics. Taking this route, however, may have increased their sense of fear. So he chose another route.

The manager invited the team to build on its strengths. The team recalled the matches when they had led by one goal with ten minutes to go and went on to win.

The players recalled what they had done right to keep playing, rather than become paralysed, and win the game. They then focused on how to follow these guidelines in the future. It worked. The team learned how to stay calm and go on to win the games.

People sometimes want to deliver their equivalent of championship performances. Singers want to do this, for example, when making a record or performing at a particular concert. Recently when working with such people, we have recalled their best performances.

Looking back, they prepared properly. Before going on stage, they breathed deeply and then clicked into gear. They walked on stage and served the song, rather than worry about the audience reaction.

Looking ahead, we explored how to do these things in the future. The aim was to build organically. They knew what worked, so we built on these beliefs. They settled on the specific things they could do to deliver their equivalent of championship performance.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe a specific situation in the future when you want to deliver your equivalent of a championship performance.

Describe the specific things you can do then to do your best to deliver your equivalent of a championship performance.

The Blue Head Approach

Writing in his book Legacy, James Kerr describes how the New Zealand All Blacks rugby team used elements of this approach. He begins by describing how the players are expected to inspire the nation and win every match.

Looking at the team's history, however, this has sometimes led to the players having negative emotions and failing to deliver the goods. This was sometimes because they had difficulty making good decisions at critical moments.

James describes how the players learned to feel calm rather than frantic. They switched to a state they called Blue Head rather than Red Head. Here is an overview of the two states.

Daniel Coyle, author of The Talent Code, summarised this approach in one of his blogs. Below are excerpts from the piece.

Quick background: a few years ago, the team was going through a period of uncharacteristic struggle. Some players were having trouble controlling their emotions in matches.

So, with the help of a former Rhodes Scholar named Ceri Evans, they devised a tool to fix that, built on a simple two-part frame that describes the mental state you want to avoid, and the one you want to be in. They call it Red Head/Blue Head.

Red Head is the negative state, when you are heated, overwhelmed, and tense (H.O.T., in the parlance). Your emotional engine is smoking, your perceptions are slow, the game feels too fast, and your decision making is rushed.

Blue Head, on the other hand, is the precise opposite: the cool, controlled, pattern-seeing state, when you retain your awareness and your decision-making power, when you stay flexible and deliver top performance. The key is doing three things:

- 1) Seek to stay in Blue Head as your default setting;*
- 2) Sense cues when you are entering Red Head mode;*
- 3) Use a physical or mental trigger to get yourself back into Blue Head.*

On the All Blacks, each player is encouraged to devise personal triggers to make the transition.

One player stamps his feet into the grass, to ground himself.

Another uses mental imagery, picturing himself from the highest seat in the stadium, to help put the moment in perspective.

Whatever tool you use doesn't matter - what matters is realizing you're in the wrong emotional zone, and finding ways to cool yourself off and get back in a high-performing head space.

The Flowing Approach

This approach helps a person to go into their version of the zone. They can then aim to flow, focus and finish.

Michael Murphy and Rhea White described such experiences in their book In The Zone: Transcendent experiences in sports. They quote Margherita Duncan writing about Isadora Duncan in the following way.

When she danced the Blue Danube, her simple waltzing forward and back, like the oncoming and receding waves on the shore, had such ecstasy of rhythm that the audience became frenzied with the contagion of it.

They could not contain themselves, but rose from their seats, cheering, applauding, laughing and crying.

You can discover more about this topic in the section of the book called The Flow Approach.

How to clarify whether a person may be able to achieve their aims? You can ask yourself the following questions.

When does the person achieve their aims? When do they do their personal best? When do they go beyond 8+/10 – even for a short time - and achieve peak performance?

What are they doing right then? What are principles they are following? How do they translate these into action? How can they be helped to follow these principles in the future and achieve peak performance?

On a scale 0-10, how high would you rate the likelihood of the person achieving their chosen aims? What can they do to maintain or improve the rating?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Following Your Rhythm Approach

Following Your Rhythm

This approach starts by clarifying the results you want to achieve. It then involves going through the stages of rehearsal, following your rhythm and doing your best to deliver the desired results.

Great workers often aim to follow their chosen rhythm in order to get the desired results. This also enables them to feel in control and maintain their wellbeing on the way towards achieving their goal.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. The approach starts by clarifying the results you want to achieve and translating these into a clear picture of success.

It then involves going through the stages of rehearsal, following your rhythm and doing your best to deliver the desired results. Let's explore how it is possible to focus on these themes.

Results

The first step is to think of a situation where you may want to achieve a specific goal. You may want to encourage a person, do a piece of work, lead a team, tackle a challenge or do another activity.

Imagine that you have chosen to work towards a specific goal. Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, you can explore these steps.

What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals? What will be happening that will show I have achieved the picture of success?

What are the strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I translate these into a clear action plan? How can I get some early wins? How can I do my best to achieve the picture of success?

Let's assume you have explored these themes. If appropriate, you can summarise these in the following way. You can then move on to the next stage.

The Picture Of Success

The specific thing I want to do is:

The specific results I want to achieve are:

*

The specific strategies I want to follow to do my best to achieve these results are:

Rehearsal

Great workers often rehearse what they are going to do next. Sometimes they spend a long time taking this step. Sometimes they take a short time – especially when they need to make quick decisions.

Imagine that you are going to take this step. You will, of course, do this in your own way. If appropriate, however, one approach is to work through the following stages.

Rehearsal

You can focus on the results you want to achieve and then go through the following steps.

- You can rehearse following your chosen strategies and working towards your goals;
- You can rehearse managing any challenges and then continuing to work towards your goals;
- You can again rehearse following your chosen strategies and doing your best to achieve your goals.

Imagine you have prepared properly by rehearsing these things. You are now ready to move into action. One approach is to focus on the following theme.

Rhythm

This step involves following your chosen rhythm – your preferred way of working – when following the strategies. It also involves regaining your rhythm after managing any challenges.

Every person has their own rhythm for living, working and resting. Some people learn to find and follow their chosen rhythm. They are then able to channel their energy in a positive way.

This can work well if they are working alone. If they are working with others – such as individuals, teams and organisations - they may need to recognise and manage other people's styles.

Some people do this successfully but others sometimes lose their own rhythm. This can lead to them feeling strangers to themselves.

Imagine that you want to pursue your preferred way of working whilst recognising and, when appropriate, managing other people's rhythm. Here are some steps to consider.

Finding And Following Your Own Rhythm

You will have different rhythms for different activities. So start by selecting a specific activity where you want to find and follow your preferred pattern.

Different people do this in different ways. One person began looking at their preferred way of working in the following way. They said:

"I chose to focus on my working week. Some of my work was satisfying, but sometimes I felt disjointed. It seemed like I was fitting into other people's patterns, rather than my own.

"Some give-and-take is obviously necessary when you work for a company. After all, the business won't change to fit your rules, but things felt out of sync. So I sat down and planned the best way to follow my natural rhythm during the working week.

"My first step was to identify when and where I worked best. My most productive times in the office are in the morning – between 7.30 and 11.30. So I organised my diary to, as far as possible, be in charge of my own agenda during those times.

"My most creative work is done in a quiet place away from interruptions. So I found a quiet corner to work on my laptop away from the open plan office.

"I felt quite energetic working in the office on Monday and Tuesday, but then wanted to be on the road, visiting clients. So that is how I arranged my diary. Meeting customers on Wednesday and Thursday, with Friday spent working from home.

"Internal meetings remained a challenge. I preferred meeting where I knew the purpose and agenda, rather than those that drifted. Bearing this in mind, I did two things.

"First, I emailed my boss the day before our regular catch ups to outline what I wanted to discuss. I did this diplomatically, of course, underlining we would be following his agenda.

"Second, when asked to attend other internal meetings, I requested the agenda before I accepted the request.

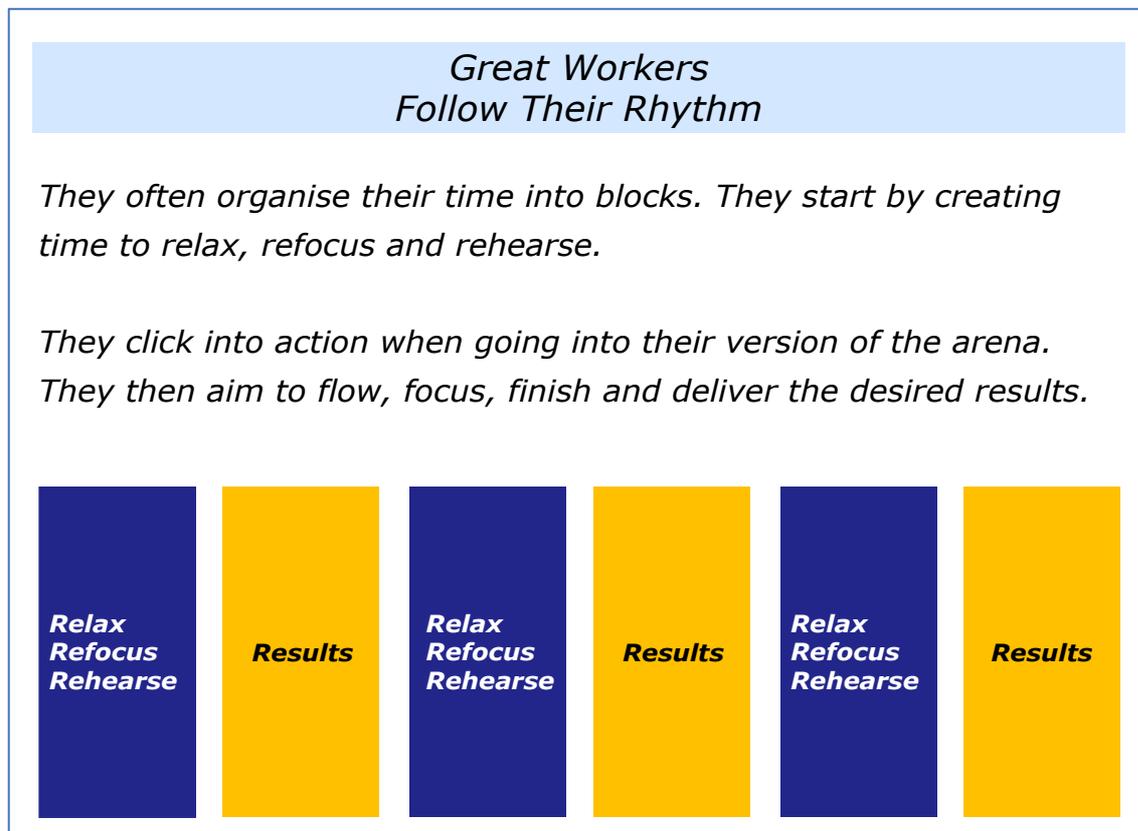

"Taking these steps helped me to be much more productive. I now feel more in sync with my preferred working pattern."

Different people choose different ways to set up and follow their rhythm. Here are some steps they take. You will, of course, adapt these in your own way.

Great workers often organise their time into blocks. They follow this pattern whether they are planning a day, a week, a month or a longer period of time.

A person may prepare by following their chosen ritual. They relax, refocus and rehearse what they are going to do next. They click into action and go into their version of the arena.

Fully present, they aim to flow, focus and finish. They do their best to deliver the desired results. Such a person may then take time to reflect. They relax, refocus and rehearse. They then repeat the process on the way to doing good work.

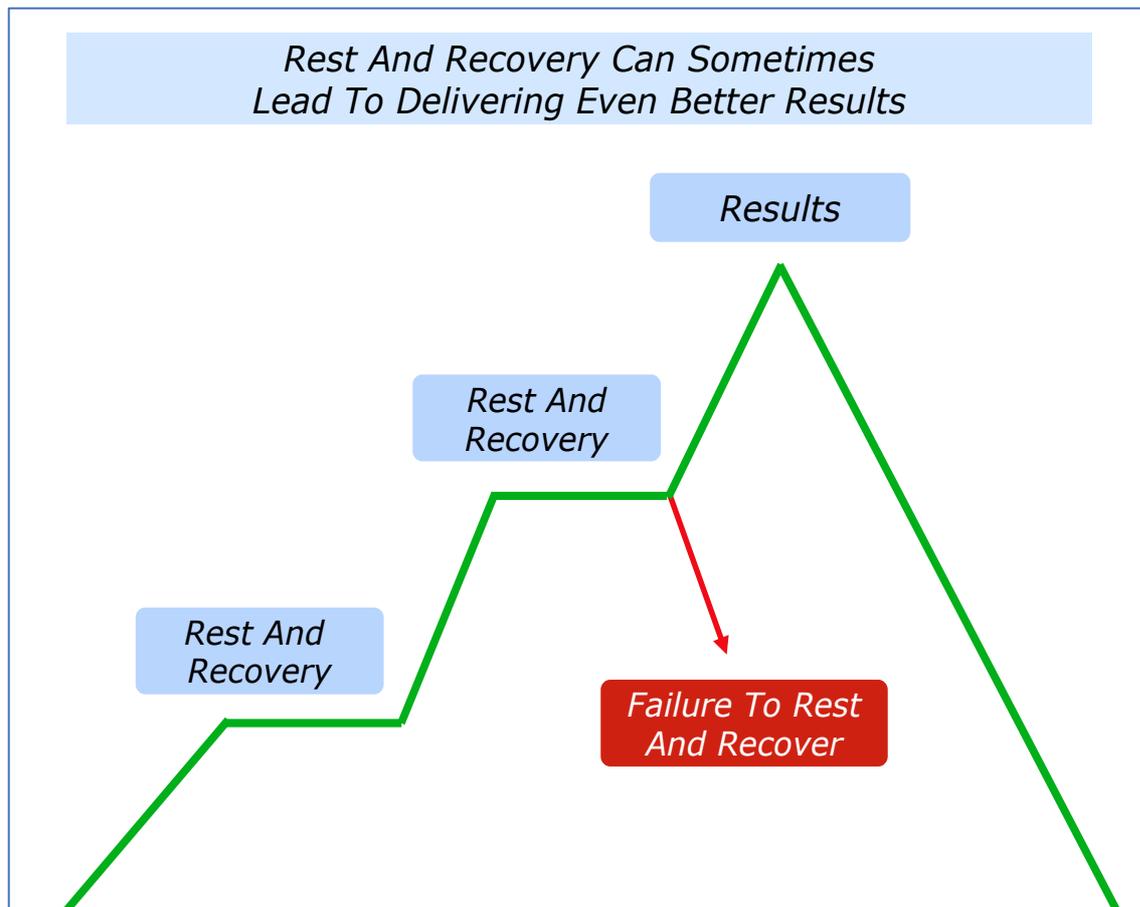

Imagine that you have found the rhythm you want to follow. You can then be positively engaged and pursue it in your own way. This can be rewarding, but it is also important to take care of yourself.

Peak performers focus on getting results, but they recognise this calls for building in times for rest and recovery. Failing to do so can mean they crash and burn.

Different people have different ways of regaining energy. You may choose to sleep, walk, listen to music, play sports or whatever. It can be useful to find and follow your own way to rest and recover. This can help you to deliver even better results.

Following Your Rhythm When Pursuing A Road Map

This approach involves following your rhythm when pursuing a road map on the way towards achieving the desired results. It involves starting from the destination and working backwards.

You can aim:

To clarify the results to achieve;

To make a road map towards achieving those results;

To then follow your rhythm when pursuing the road map on the way towards achieving the results.

The key will be to follow your rhythm, manage and challenges and do your best to achieve the results.

Following Your Rhythm Whilst Managing Other People's Rhythm

It can be helpful to follow your rhythm. You may also wish to find ways to deal with situations where the people, team or organisation has a different working pattern.

Organisations have the right to set their own working style, so it is important to recognise their rhythm. This does not necessarily mean, of course, that the approach they choose is effective.

It can be useful to take the following steps when working in an organisation.

Step One:

To, whenever possible, follow your rhythm for delivering results.

Step Two:

To recognise the organisation's rhythm – such as the way it schedules meetings, the business cycle and any other events;

To prepare properly to make your best contribution to these events;

To make a positive contribution to the events and help the organisation to deliver its desired results.

Step Three:

To then take time to relax, regain your own rhythm and continue to deliver results.

Sometimes you may also encounter individuals whose style creates challenges. Let's explore this theme.

Following Your Rhythm Whilst Learning How To Manage Other People's Rhythm

You will have a preferred way of working, listening and communicating with people. But there will be many occasions when you meet people who have different styles.

Imagine that you like to reflect before speaking. Sometimes you will work with people who talk quickly and demand a response. How to deal with such a situation?

It can be useful to pause, buy time to think and then give a professional response. One person explained how they took this approach in the following way.

"I used to have difficulty with managers who spoke quickly and aimed to spur others into action.

"My own style is more reflective. But, for a while, I tried to match the quick talkers and respond.

"Later I learned to be calm. I did this by learning to breathe properly, listen fully and try to summarise what a manager had said.

"Then I spoke in my own speed, reassuring them that I would fix things. If necessary, I checked information to make sure I was clear on what they wanted and by when.

"Whilst I absorbed information in my own way, the key was to then quickly produce results. This helped me to retain my sanity and also satisfy the manager."

This approach can work when you plan ahead and prepare properly. Sometimes you may be interrupted unexpectedly, however, when deep into a piece of work. Let's explore this theme.

Managing Transitions Between Activities

Great workers often immerse themselves deeply in their chosen activity. This has huge benefits, but there can also be challenges. They may be deeply engaged in an activity but then be interrupted.

This can throw them off-course. When does this happen for you? You may need to stop what you are doing and aim:

To give full attention to a loved one - your child, partner or another person ... To manage your manager who wants to talk with you urgently ... To deal with an unexpected event or crisis.

There are many ways to make such transitions. One approach is to go through the following steps.

Managing Transitions Between Activities

This often involves going through the following stages: a) being totally engaged in one activity; b) buying time to manage the transition properly; c) being totally engaged in the next activity.

You enjoy doing deep work, but then there is an interruption. Seeing things in perspective, you believe it is important to make a good transition to the next activity. One approach is to take the following steps.

Relax

Relax your mind and body. Breathe deeply and buy time to think, even if only for a few seconds.

Rehearse

Clarify the real results you want to achieve in the next situation. You can then rehearse how to achieve these aims.

Refocus

Focus fully on the new situation and move into action. Be totally aware of what is happening and do your best to achieve the desired results.

Tom Weede wrote an article on this theme called Learning From Biathletes. Writing in Men's Fitness, he described how athletes competing in the biathlon must switch from high intensity skiing to the calmness required to shoot at a target.

This calls for stopping, concentrating fully when shooting and then regaining their former rhythm. Here is an excerpt from the article where he describes the skills that biathletes employ.

De-stress In Seconds

As a result of the alternating demands of furious cardio and calm precision, these biathletes have to know how to relax and focus in highly stressful situations.

Remain Calm

On days when you'll be called upon to do something stressful, practise staying relaxed throughout the day — as opposed to hastily trying to compose yourself when you're about to give a presentation or line up a one-metre putt.

Breathe Deeply

In addition to being in good condition, biathletes increase their ability to relax and lower their heart rates by breathing correctly, deeply inhaling and exhaling as they approach the shooting range during a race.

Make It Mechanical

One way to reduce stress is by practising something over and over until it becomes automatic.

But biathletes can miss their targets, just as the rest of us miss free throws or lose our train of thought. So what happens if you fall out of the automatic mode and mess up?

"You definitely have to stop," says team member Jeremy Teela, who deals with such times by taking two breaths, closing his eyes for a second and then starting over.

"I jump back into it, just like I would if it was a new shooting," he says. "And then I shoot the next shots just as fast as normal ... so I totally clear what I just did (from my mind) and then start over."

Regaining Your Rhythm

Great workers aim to make things as predictable as possible. Sometimes they are able to follow their rhythm, make things routine and achieve the desired results.

Sometimes they may encounter random or unpredictable events that can throw them off-course. Buying time to think, they then clarify what is happening and take the following approach.

They clarify how to deal with any immediate challenges, take the necessary action and they then clarify the future picture of success;

They clarify the possible ways forward – together with the pluses and minuses of each option – and settle on their strategy for working towards the picture of success;

They clarify how to follow their chosen strategy, regain their rhythm and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Great workers then take action to do something to get a quick win. Building on this success, they then aim to follow their rhythm on the way towards achieving their goals.

There are many aspects to following your rhythm. This section concludes by considering the following theme.

Pacing Yourself To Get Positive Results

Pacing Yourself

You may sometimes want to do different things at different speeds. You may do some things at a slow pace, some at a medium pace, some at a fast pace.

This approach can help you to manage your energy. It can also help you to make good decisions, be fully present and do your best to achieve positive results.

Great workers do things at the right pace to get positive results. Some things need to be done slowly. Some things need to be done quickly.

Sometimes it can be hard to answer the question: "What is the right pace for doing things?" One possible answer is: "The right pace is the one that gets the right results."

Great workers spend a lot of time clarifying the real results they want to achieve before moving into action. They may then do some tasks extremely quickly, whilst others they may do slowly and deliberately.

Such workers also learn to manage their energy as they get older. They aim: a) to manage their physical energy; b) to manage their psychological energy. They learn to rest, recover and then be fully present in order to deliver positive results.

Imagine that you are following your rhythm and performing superb work. This can lead to the next step.

Results

Great workers keep delivering high standards, reading reality and focusing on continuous improvement. Sometimes they reach the goal by adding that touch of class. Let's explore these themes.

You Can Focus On Continuous Improvement

Imagine you are doing superb work. You can also be proactive, keep scanning the situation and reading reality. One approach is to focus on:

The specific things that are going well and how to build on these things;

The specific things that could be done better and how to improve these things;

The specific things that could happen in the future and how to deal with these situations.

You can then implement your ideas, get some quick successes and stay ahead of the gain.

You Can Finish Successfully

How to take this step? One approach is to look back at some of the things you have finished successfully.

Some of these may be tangible things. You may have worked to pass an exam, get your driving licence, become healthier, complete a project, overcome a setback or tackle a challenge successfully.

Some of these may be less tangible but also significant. You may have given specific encouragement to a person, helped students to find work they enjoy, found win-win solutions to a conflict or ended a relationship in a relatively good way.

Looking back, what did you do right to finish some of these things successfully? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? What happened as a result?

Looking ahead, what may be some of the principles you can follow in the future? You may need to add some other skills, of course, but following these principles may help you to finish things successfully.

You Can, When Appropriate, Add That Touch Of Class

Sometimes people reach their goals and add that touch of class. Different people do this in different ways. Sometimes they build on their strengths and do something special.

Sometimes this can be spectacular. Sometimes it can be a simple act of kindness. Sometimes it can be something that gives people a positive memory for life.

Imagine that you have reached your goals. If appropriate, how can you do something special to add that touch of class? What may be the benefits of taking this step?

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to clarify the real results you want to achieve. It is then to go through the stages of rehearsal, following your rhythm and doing your best to achieve the desired results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

How can you clarify the desired results? How can you rehearse following your chosen strategy? How can you follow your chosen rhythm and do your best to achieve the desired results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Following My Rhythm Approach

The specific things I can do then to follow this approach in my own way are:

The Design Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach involves going through the following steps.

Design

You decide on something you want to design. You may want to write an article, do a mentoring session, run a workshop, revitalise a room, lead a team, build a culture or do another activity. You clarify the real results you want to achieve with the piece of work.

Development

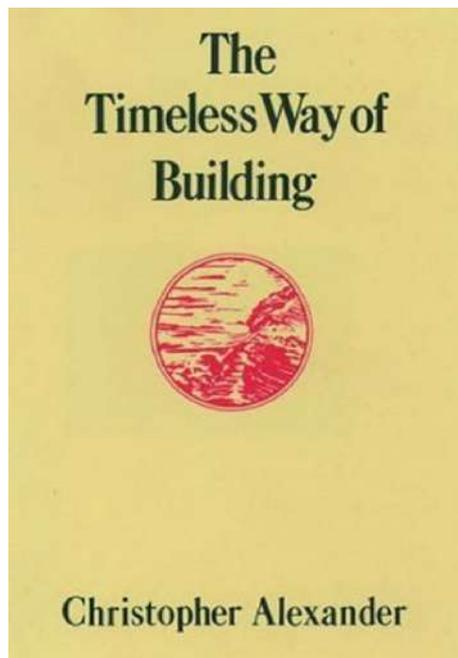

You develop the strategies you can follow to deliver success. You do your research and clarify: a) the strategies that are most likely to work; b) the challenges and solutions. You then rehearse and develop these strategies until you feel ready to do the piece of work.

Delivery

You go into your version of the arena. You are fully present, follow your chosen strategies and keep reading reality. You build on what is working and find solutions to challenges. You do your best to achieve the desired results and deliver the piece of work.

Human beings are natural designers. They love to make things work, find solutions to challenges or create their version of paradise. Some love to design experiences that enrich people's lives or take them into another dimension.

Christopher Alexander, the architect, said that all human beings have a strong drive to create. Writing in The Timeless Way of Building, he described this in the following way.

Each one of us has, somewhere in their heart, the dream to make a living world, a universe.

If you have a feeling-vision of the things – a painting, a building, a garden, a piece of a neighbourhood – as long as you're very firmly anchored in your knowledge of that thing, and you can see it with your eyes closed, you can keep correcting your actions.

There is one timeless way of building. It is a thousand years old, and the same today as it has ever been.

The great traditional buildings of the past, the villages and tents and temples in which man feels at home, have always been made by people who were very close to the centre of this way.

Architects nurse this desire at the centre of their lives, says Christopher. One day, somewhere, somehow, they want to create a building that is wonderful, a place where people can walk and dream for centuries.

Every person has some version of this dream, says Christopher. Some wish to create a house, a garden or a fountain. Others wish to create a relationship, a painting or a book. The following sections explore some of the different ways to design, develop and deliver great work.

The Simple, Satisfying And Successful Approach

Some designers make things that are simple – in a profound way – satisfying and successful. They make beautiful things that work.

They follow these principles whether they are providing a service, designing a product, building an organisational culture or doing another activity. Let's explore these themes.

Making It Simple

Simplicity is genius, we are told. Art Fry's invention of Post-it Notes demonstrated simplicity in action. So did the Sony Walkman and the Apple Macintosh. Here are some views on simplicity.

Simplicity is the ultimate sophistication. Leonardo da Vinci

*Everything should be as simple as possible – but no simpler.
Albert Einstein*

Perfection is achieved not when there is nothing more to add, but when there is nothing more to take away. Antoine de Saint Exupéry

Making It Satisfying

Superb design is satisfying on a number of levels. Physically it looks and feels good. Practically it works and is user-friendly. There is an old Shaker dictum that says:

*Don't make something unless it is both necessary and useful;
but if it is both necessary and useful,
don't hesitate to make it beautiful.*

Frank Lloyd Wright's famous house Falling Water shows how something can be simple, satisfying and successful.

Making It Successful

Great design works. It is sometimes simple, beautiful and effective. It does the job. Here are some quotes on this theme.

Design is not just what it looks like and feels like. Design is how it works. Steve Jobs.

Good design is probably 98% common sense. Above all, an object must function well and efficiently - and getting that part right requires a good deal of time and attention. Terence Conran.

Pioneers often build prototypes that show a better way. They do not spend their time trying to change the old way of doing things. They may aim to build sustainable systems that deliver ongoing success.

Different people do this in different ways. Let's look at how some educators are helping their students to develop these skills.

The Feel, Imagine, Do And Share Approach

Kiran Bir Sethi has done superb work that helps people and the planet. She founded the Riverside School in Ahmedabad and the global movement called Design For Change.

This encourages thousands of children to implement their ideas for building a better world. Here is an excerpt from its website.

Children and adults can shape their futures by moving from saying "Can I?" to "I Can." They can find something that bothers them, do something about it and make change happen. They can do this by following the design process of Feel, Imagine, Do and Share.

Children are dreaming up and leading brilliant ideas all over the world. They are implementing ideas from challenging age-old superstitions in rural communities, to earning their own money to financing school computers to solving the problem of heavy school bags.

Kiran Bir Sethi and Design For Change

The 'I Can' mindset equips every child to be aware of the world around them. It enables them to take action and empowers them to design a more desirable and sustainable future – today.

This year, Design for Change reached 34 countries and over 300,000 schools. It inspired hundreds of thousands of children, their teachers and parents.

It enabled them to celebrate the fact change is possible and that they can lead that change.

Children focus on challenges on their own doorstep. They may aim to clean local rivers, convert garbage dumps into playgrounds, ensure school friends can get home safely, care for the elderly or do other activities.

Kiran has a background in design. She and her colleagues therefore invite children to tackle challenges by going through the design process of Feel, Imagine, Do and Share.

Feel

Focus on something you feel strongly about. This could be something that bothers you or something you want to improve. Start to explore your desired picture of success.

Imagine

Imagine a way to make it better. Explore what good looks like and search the world for examples of best practice. Focus on what you can control and clarify your picture of success.

Do

Do the necessary work. This can be an eye-opener for some young people, because it calls for sweat and overcoming setbacks on the road to achieving success. One student described this in the following way.

"This part taught us to develop persistence. Our generation is used to having a short attention span and, if we get bored, moving on to the next idea. But we realised that you have to be persistent to make change happen. That taught us a lot."

Share

Share your story with the world. The students make videos of their work and also take part in the annual Design For Change School Challenge. These stories provide inspiration for others who want to achieve their pictures of success.

Kiran explains how this approach is helping young people to develop the skills necessary for shaping the future. She describes this in the following way.

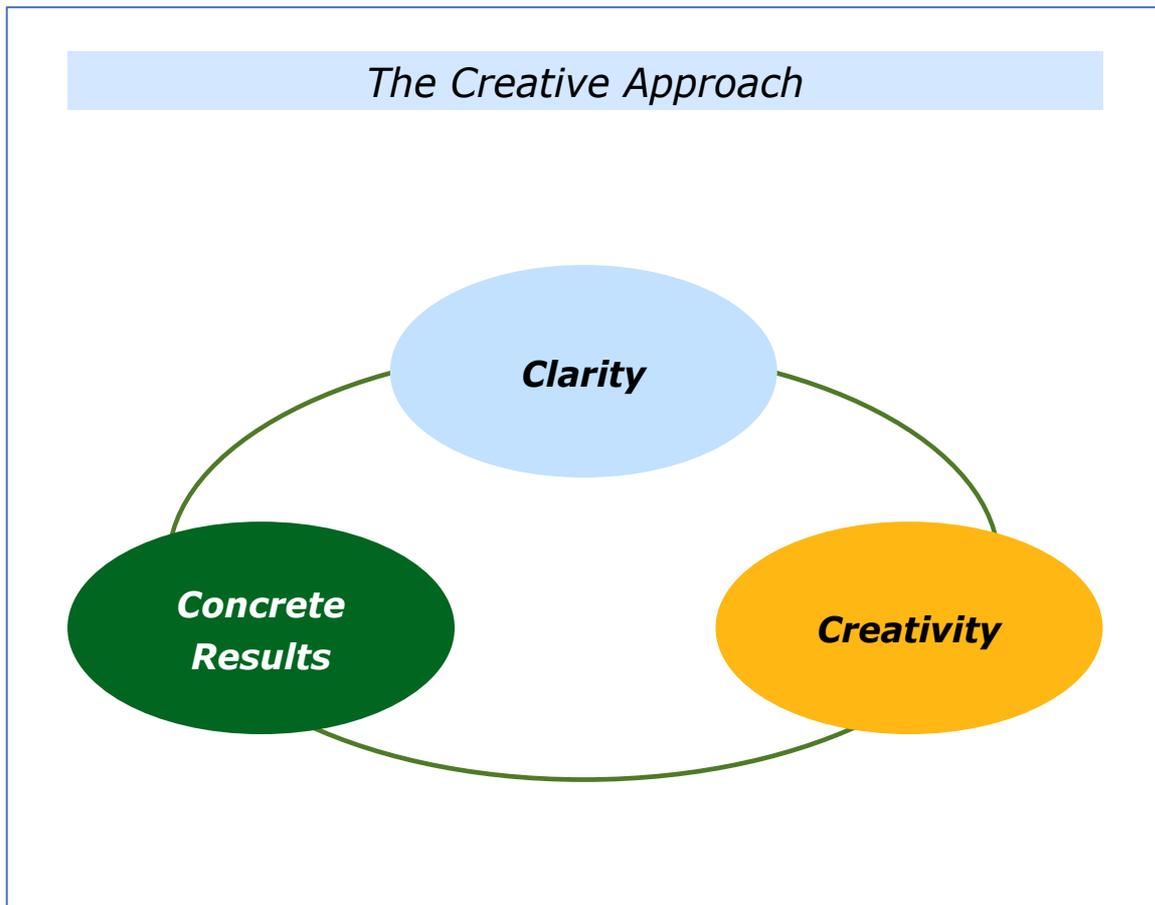

The Feel, Imagine, Do, Share framework helps to develop the much required 21st Century Skills in children. It builds their social and emotional competencies and promotes employability skills.

The power of Design Thinking allows both children and adults to transform the world into how they envision it - the power to create a more compassionate, empathetic world.

The Creative Approach

People love to design, develop and deliver solutions to challenges. There are many models for creative problem solving.

This section provides an introduction to Three C approach. It describes how people can find solutions by focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

This model can be used in many situations. Later in the book we will focus on how it can be used when running mentoring sessions. It can also be used for helping teams, organisations and communities to find solutions.

There are virtually always solutions to challenges. Some solutions may work superbly; some may cost money; some may cost very little. Some may please everybody; some may please fewer people. Some may simply be a case of doing the best you can in the circumstances.

Imagine that you are helping a group that wants to find solutions to a particular challenge. It can be useful to guide people through the following stages.

These are similar to when mentoring an individual. When working with a group, however, you will need more time to give people chance to share their views and then settle on their chosen way forwards.

Clarity

Clarity is crucial. It is vital to clarify the real What – the real results to achieve - before moving on to the How. Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to invite people to work through the following questions.

What is the challenge we want to tackle? For example: 'How to ...?' What are the things we can control in the situation? How can we build on what we can control and manage what we can't?

What are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture success? What will be the benefits of achieving the goals? What will be happening that will show us we have achieved the picture of success?

It important to frame the challenge in a positive way. For example, to say:

"How can we improve people's wellbeing?" rather than: "How can we help people to feel less stressed?"

"How can we, as far as possible, get win-wins?" rather than: "How can we stop behaving in ways that mean many people lose?"

"How can we use our strengths and work together towards achieving a common goal?" rather than: "How can we stop having conflicts?"

People may also be more motivated to achieve a goal if they see the benefits. It can therefore be good to describe the benefits for all the potential stakeholders.

As mentioned in the earlier section on mentoring, people may want to achieve many goals. If so, it can be useful to list these in order of priority. People can then translate these into a clear picture of success. For example:

The Picture Of Success

The challenge we want to tackle is: 'How to ...'

The real results we want to achieve – in order of priority - are:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

The benefits of achieving the picture of success will be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

Creativity

Imagine that you have helped a group to establish clarity. You can then invite them to work through the following questions.

What are the possible options for going forwards? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? What is the attractiveness of each option?

Are there any other potential creative solutions? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

It can be useful to invite people to start by brainstorming all the potential options, even those that they may initially dismiss. They can then see that they have many choices in the situation.

Looking at each option in turn, people can list: a) the pluses and minuses of each option; b) the attractiveness of each option on a scale 0/10. People can then produce something like the following chart.

Option A is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Option B is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Option C is: To ...

The pluses are ...

The potential minuses are ...

The attractiveness rating is ... / 10

Imagine that people have described what they see as the options going forwards. If appropriate, invite people to take a short break and return refreshed.

You can then take more of a steer and, if okay with the group, also offer some other options for achieving the aims. One approach is to restart the session by saying something along the following line.

As far as I understand, the goals we want to achieve are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Bearing these in mind, let's consider all the possible ways forward. We will then settle on our strategy for achieving the picture of success.

Looking ahead, are there any other potential options? Is it possible, for example, to combine the best parts of the most attractive options? If so, what might be a potential way forwards?

Let's learn from your positive history. Looking back, when have you tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did you do right then? What were the principles you followed? How could you follow these principles – plus add other skills – to tackle this challenge successfully?

Let's learn from other people's positive history. Looking back, have another other people or groups tackled a similar challenge successfully? What did they do right then? How can we follow these principles in our own way to tackle the challenge successfully?

If appropriate, let's consider how to find solutions to any potential conflicts. What does each person or each party want? How can we build on what people have in common? How can we, as far as possible, find win-win solutions?

Let's try to look at the situation in a dispassionate way. Imagine that we were outside consultants who had been invited to provide impartial advice.

Looking at the situation from above, what would we advise this group to do? Which option – or combination of options - would we advise people to pursue?

Is it okay for me to share some more ideas? Looking at the results you want to achieve, here are some options it may be worth considering.

Option D could be to...

Option E could be to...

Looking at all the options, which are the ones that make sense? Which of these would we like to explore further?

Looking at this chosen option, how these might this look in practise? What would be the pluses and minuses of pursuing this option? How could we build on the pluses and minimise the minuses?

Let's return to the real results we want to achieve? What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success?

Concrete Results

Imagine you have helped the group to work through the previous stages. It is then time to settle on the way forwards. If appropriate, you can guide them through exploring the following themes.

Let's return to the picture of success. What is the option – or the combination of options - we want to pursue? How can we translate this into a clear action plan?

What are the clear working contracts that we need to make about who does what and when? Who would like to be the Mission Holder who takes responsibility for guiding the plan?

Who else would like to contribute towards achieving the goals? What would you each like to do and by when? What are the other practical tasks that need to be done? How can we make sure these get completed?

How will each of us proactively keep people informed about our progress towards achieving the goals? What support do people need? How can we encourage ourselves on the journey? What can we do to get some quick successes?

Let's do a success rating. Bearing in mind what we can control, how would we each rate the chances of us reaching the goals. Do this on a scale 0-10. What can we do to increase the chances of success?

People are ingenious and are capable of finding solutions to challenges. When working with groups of people, however, there are several key issues to focus on. These are:

To create a positive atmosphere in which people feel at ease and take time to clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

To use the Three C Model for helping people to clarify their options and their chosen strategy for achieving the picture of success;

To encourage people to commit themselves to their chosen strategy, make clear contracts and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

Good decision makers recognise there are pluses and minuses to each option. Whatever their chosen way forwards, they build on the pluses, minimise the minuses and do their best to achieve success.

Let's return to your life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of something you would like to design? If so, it can be useful to work through the following themes.

Design

What would you like to design? You may want to design an educational session, a website, a service you can offer customers, a product or something else. What are the real results you want to achieve by doing this project? What will be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Development

How can you research and gather information about this potential project? How can you study what has worked in this past? How can you explore what could work in the future? How can you develop the prototype? How can you test it to see if it will deliver the required results?

Delivery

How can you set things up to succeed when delivering the design in a real live situation? How can you do superb work? How can you keep doing reality checks about: a) what is working) what can be improved? How can you do your best to deliver success? How can you keep improving the design and delivery?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The specific thing I would like to design, develop and deliver in the future is:

The Inspiration, Implementation And Integration Approach

There are many ways to help people. One model is to apply elements of the Three I approach which is used by many educators.

Good educators often focus on inspiration, implementation and integration. They create an inspiring environment and provide implementation tools that work. They then help people to integrate the learning in their own ways.

Let's explore how educators take these steps. You can adapt this approach in your own way to help people to achieve their goals.

Setting the scene

Good educators start by creating an inspiring environment in which motivated people can learn. Whenever possible, they make the sessions enjoyable and effective. They then encourage, educate and enable people to achieve ongoing success.

Before running the actual educational session, however, they aim to set it up to succeed. You will have your own approach to making this happen, but here are some things it can be useful to do before running a session.

Clarifying the goals for the session

Imagine that you are going to run an educational session for motivated people. This could be, for example, a workshop for an organisation. It will obviously be important to clarify the specific things that people want to take away from the session.

Clear contracting is crucial in any relationship, especially if you are supplying a service to other people. So it can be useful to talk with the key stakeholders beforehand and ask them some of the following questions.

"What are the goals for the session? What are the key themes it would be useful to focus on? What are the concrete things that you and other people would like to take away from the session?"

"Who are the people who will be involved? What is happening in their world? What are some of the challenges they face? What are the specific results they want to deliver – or must deliver - in their work?"

"What are their strengths? What are the specific areas in which people deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? How can they build on these strengths? What are the things they need to learn to manage the consequences of any weaknesses?"

"What for you would make it a successful session? What are the specific things you would like people to be saying, thinking, feeling and doing after the session? What are the steps they could take towards achieving their picture of success?"

Bearing these answers in mind, play back your understanding regarding the goals for the session. Make sure everybody is agreed on the desired outcomes.

Clarifying the roles for the session

Good educators aim to be both encouraging and ethical. This often involves explaining what they can and can't offer to help people to reach their goals.

Some of my own work, for example, has involved mentoring performing artists. I can't help them with the technical aspects of singing, acting or other areas of expertise. But I can provide them with practical tools they can use:

To clarify their picture of success;

To build on their strengths whilst managing the consequences of any weaknesses;

To pursue practical strategies and perform superb work;

To find solutions to challenges;

To do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Good educators make clear contracts at the start of the session about: a) the goals to achieve; b) their own responsibilities and other people's responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals.

Sharing these at the start of the session, they then ask people:

"Is there anything else you would like to add to the goals?"

Clear Contracting

You can make clear contracts about: a) the goals to achieve; b) your role and the participant's roles in working to achieve the goals. You can, if necessary, keep revisiting these during the session.

The Goals

As far as I understand it, the goals for the session are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Are there any other topics that you would like to add?

My Role In Working Towards Achieving The Goals Is:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Your Role In Working Towards Achieving The Goals Is:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Inspiration

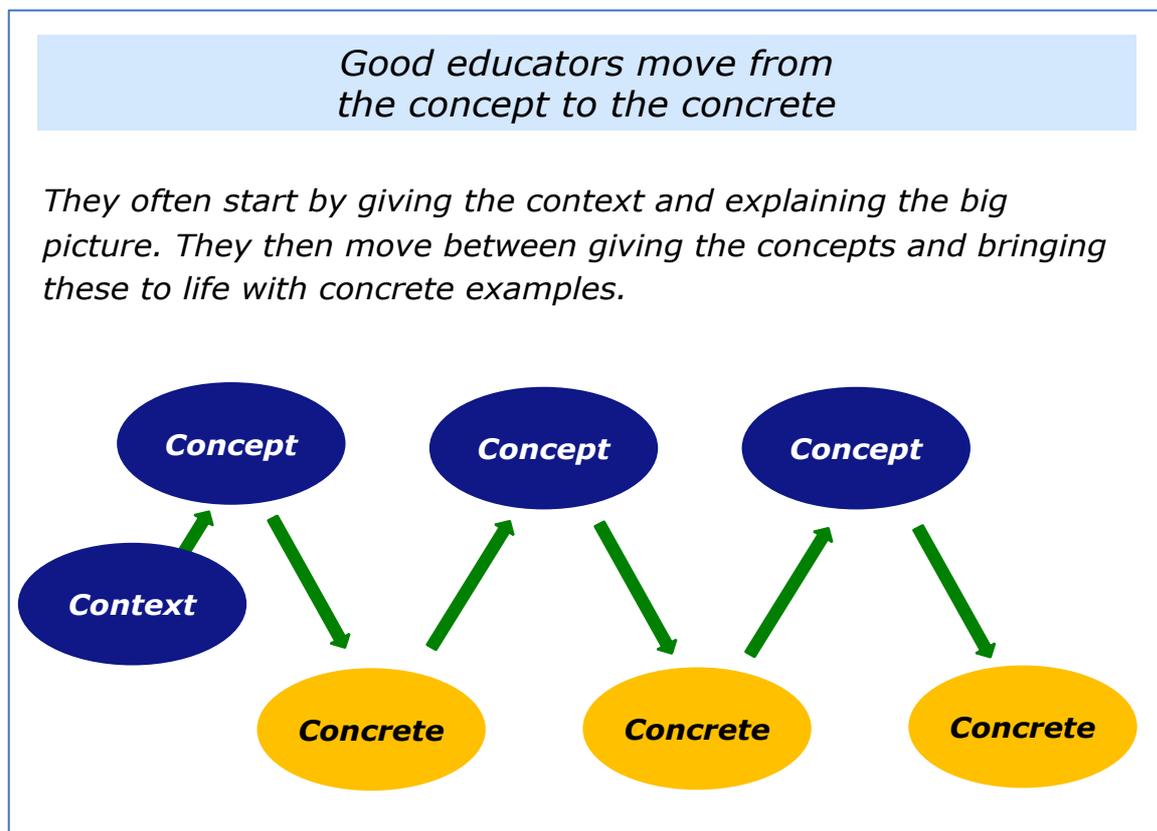

Good educators create an inspiring environment. They make sure all the physical and psychological things are in place to enable people to learn. They then launch into the first topic to explore.

Such educators often start by giving people the context and explaining the big picture. They then move between the concepts and the concrete. Bearing this in mind, they may say something like the following.

"The first topic we are going to focus on is ...

"The way this fits into the big picture regarding what we are aiming to do is ...

"The specific things we are going to cover are ...

Different people move from the concept to the concrete in different ways. Some follow each idea they introduce by saying:

"For example: ..."

This forces them to give a specific example to bring the idea to life. They aim to communicate this in a way that resonates with people.

Good educators demonstrate their enthusiasm. I worked with the head coach of a football club who loved his job. He invited me to watch him lead a training session.

There were only six players taking part – because many were away on international duty – but he made the 90-minute session enjoyable and effective. He was positive, encouraging and continually introduced fresh ideas to keep the players on their toes.

After the session I asked him how he motivated himself with so few players. He said:

"I think about what I want them feeling and saying afterwards. I want them to say: 'That was a good session. It was enjoyable and I learned things that helped me to be a better player.'"

"I am the coach and set the tone. If I am not enthusiastic, nobody will be, so I have to lead by example."

Good educators also tap into the inspiration within people. They encourage people to focus on the activities that give them positive energy. Then, when appropriate, they help them to set personal or professional goals.

Implementation

Good educators provide implementation tools that work. They are able to go from the philosophical to the practical. They provide knowledge, models and tools that people can use in their daily lives and work.

How do they gather this information? They study what works, simplify what works – but in a profound way - and share what works.

As mentioned earlier, such educators study success. They watch people, teams and organisations in action - or study examples of their work – and see what they do to succeed. They take the following steps when studying what works in a particular field.

They focus on what people do right - the principles they follow - to succeed;

They translate these principles into positive models that people can follow to succeed;

They provide practical tools that people can use to follow these principles in their own ways to succeed.

Good sports coaches, for example, share this information in a way that the person can use to reach their goals. They start by watching the person in action or studying examples of their work. Before sharing any knowledge, they ask themselves:

"What are the person's goals? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?"

"What are they doing well? How can they do more of these things in the future? What can they do better in the future and how? What are the specific things they can do to reach their goals?"

"What are the key messages I want to give the person? What are the positive models and practical tools I can share? How can I pass on this knowledge in a way the person can accept and use to achieve their goals?"

The next stage is to invite people to test the tools in reality to make sure they work. If so, the tools are added to the repertoire of options that people can use to reach their goals.

Integration

Good educators help people to integrate the learning in their own ways. They encourage, educate and enable them to achieve ongoing success.

A person needs to own the knowledge. They need to make it part of their own way of working towards achieving success.

Imagine that you want to help somebody to integrate a piece of learning. How can you take this step? One approach is to go through the following stages.

Invite the person to focus on applying a particular strategy or skill in a specific situation

Invite them to focus on a specific situation in which they want to succeed. Looking at the situation, invite them:

To be crystal clear on the real results they want to achieve;

To clarify the key strategies they can follow to do their best to achieve these results;

To mentally rehearse going into the situation and pursuing the strategies – plus dealing with any specific challenges – on the way to achieving the desired results.

The person goes into the situation, applies the strategy and aims to achieve the desired results. Then comes the next step.

Invite the person to evaluate their own performance

Give the person time to reflect on how they performed in the situation. When they are ready, invite them to work through the following framework.

My Self-Evaluation

The specific things I did well were:

*

The specific things can do to follow these principles more in the future are:

The specific things I can do better in the future and how are:

Encourage the person to share their self-evaluation. Explore how they can continue build on their strengths and, where appropriate, manage the consequences of any weaknesses. If appropriate, you can ask them.

"Is it okay for me to share some ideas you can use in your own way?"

The person will say that is okay, but it is important to make this psychological contract. You can then share knowledge the person can use to achieve success. Again, you can do this in a way the person can accept and use to achieve their goals.

Invite the person to clarify their learning and also plan ahead

When appropriate, give the person time to both reflect and look ahead. Invite them to make an action plan.

My Action Plan

The specific things I can do to build on my strengths and tackle the areas for improvement are:

*

How do you know when somebody has integrated an idea? They use their own language and methods to explain what they are doing to make things happen.

Good educators often take people through the stages of inspiration, implementation and integration. This is also a path sometimes taken by therapists, coaches, mentors and trusted advisors.

Different educators adapt this model when, for example, running workshops. Some follow the classic 1-2-3 model for running an enjoy and effective session. This involves going through the following steps.

The Educational Approach

There are many ways to run an enjoyable and effective educational session.

One approach is to follow the 1-2-3 model when running workshops or other types of sessions.

This involves going through the following steps.

The Caring Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the caring approach rather than the cruel approach. The route they follow has consequences – both for themselves and other people.

Different people follow the caring approach in different ways. They may focus on caring for people, for their products or for the planet. Some aim to combine all of these elements. Let's explore these themes.

They Care For People

Some people aim to care for their loved ones and for other people. They are kind, encouraging and supportive. They have also often learned how to take care of themselves in a healthy way. This means that when they meet a person:

They believe it is always about helping the other person. It is not about themselves.

Such people often have a clear moral compass, however, and are clear on what they can and can't do for other people. This means they do not become victims or enablers. They then do their best to help people to shape their futures.

They Care Their Products

Some people do work they care about. They believe in following certain ways of encouraging people, designing things, solving problems or doing other activities. They aim to do their best when helping people, providing services or creating products. They sometimes ask themselves:

How is this going to help people or the planet?

Such people do things they believe in. They do the basics and then add the brilliance. They may also follow some of the elements of great design. They may aim to make things simple – in a profound way – satisfying and successful.

They Care For The Planet

Some people aim to care for the planet. They may do practical things that encourage people, care for the environment or give hope to both and future generations.

Some people aim to share a positive paradigm. They try to show people a way of living or working that is practical and, in the widest sense, profitable. They show how it will benefit both people and the planet.

Imagine that you want to take some of these steps. You will do this in your own way, so let's explore some of the ways it may be possible.

Caring For People

How can you continue to care for your loved ones? How can you continue to care for other people? Different people express caring in different ways. Some ask themselves the following questions before meeting a person.

Who is the person I am going to meet? What is happening in their world? What may be their goals? What may be the challenges they face? How can I make them the centre of my world? If appropriate, how can I encourage them in their lives and work?

Some people aim to care for others in their daily lives. Some aim to create positive environments in which people can thrive. Some gifted people pass on guidelines that other people can follow to do great work.

Dame Cicely Saunders, for example, helped to helping to create the modern hospice movement in Britain. She cared about helping people who were moving towards the end of their lives.

Cicely trained as a nurse but suffered a back injury that halted that career path. Overcoming the setback, she became a medical social worker and got a job at St. Thomas' Hospital in London.

There she met a dying patient called David Tasma, whose plight revealed the lack of care for the terminally ill. A 40-year-old refugee from Poland, he was dying of incurable cancer.

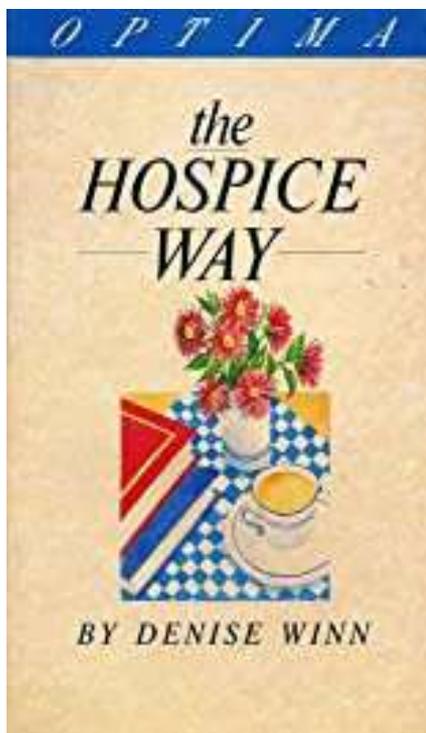

David had no relatives so Cicely devoted many hours to talking with him about his life. Apart from exploring his feelings, they discussed the need to create special facilities for people who were dying. Denise Winn takes up the story in her book The Hospice Way.

Although the hospital did its best, David suffered much pain and discomfort, both physical and mental. It was then that Cicely first mooted the idea of building a special hospital herself, to cater specifically for the very different needs of the terminally ill.

David was thrilled to be the inspiration for such an idea and when he died he left her all his money (£500), saying 'I'll be a window in your home.'

Cicely embarked on her mission. She studied to become a doctor and served in several posts. She then began raising the £500,000 necessary to build a specially designed hospital with highly qualified staff.

Ten years later she achieved her vision with the opening of St. Christopher's Hospice in South London. Denise Winn wrote describing it in the following way.

A beautiful yet homely building, with a wealth of windows overlooking peaceful colourful gardens as well as a road that hums with life, St. Christopher's is still the inspiration and model for the modern hospice movement.

It is a remarkable testimony to a remarkable woman, now Dame Cicely Saunders. And, by the large sunny window in the reception, is a plaque for David Tasma.

Caring For Products

What are the kinds of work you really care about? When do you do work that gives you positive energy? What are the kinds of work you find satisfying? When do you flow, focus, finish and find fulfilment?

When do you do work where you build on your strengths, follow strategies that work and achieve success? How can do more of this in the future? What will be the benefits for people or the planet?

People who care about what they are doing are more likely to do fine work. They believe delivering consistently high standards when helping people, providing a service or creating products.

Such people often start by choosing to do work they really care about. Here are some answers that individuals may give when exploring this theme.

The Kinds Of Work I Really Care About Are:

Helping children who are dyslexic ... Growing organic food ... Providing young people with sports experiences that help them to develop ... Running events that give people positive memories for life.

Working as a paramedic ... Making films that inspire people to care for nature ... Designing beautiful buildings ... Creating user-friendly software ... Passing on knowledge that helps people to succeed.

Different individuals follow different models to put their heart and soul into the work. Bearing in mind the thing they really care about, some people focus on the following themes.

Clarity

Such people start by establishing clarity. They sometimes do this by exploring the following questions.

What is the kind of work I really care about? How can I pursue this theme? What may be the piece of work I want to do to encourage people, provide a service or create a product?

What are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What may be the benefits of doing such work? How may it help people or the planet?

Creativity

Such people then plan how to do the work. Sometimes this involves focusing on both what they know works and also potential creative possibilities. They may do this by exploring the following questions.

What are the possible options I can follow to perform the work? What are the pluses and minuses of each option? What is the attractiveness rating of each option? What are the other potential creative solutions?

What is the route – or combination of routes - I want to pursue? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I translate these into a clear action plan?

Concrete Results

Such people move onto doing the work. Bearing in mind the results they want to achieve, they may take the following steps.

They keep following their chosen strategies, get some quick successes and do superb work;

They keep reading reality by focusing on: a) what they are doing well and how to do more of these things; b) what they can do better and how;

They keep finding solutions to challenges, do their best to reach the goals and add that touch of class.

Jürgen Griesbeck is somebody who followed elements of this approach. Spurred on by a tragedy, he developed Fútbol por la Paz (Football for Peace) in 1996. This was a project using football to combat violence and drugs on the streets of Medellín, Colombia.

Based on this experience, he created Straßenfußball für Toleranz (Street Football for Tolerance) in Brandenburg, Germany. His next step was to create streetfootballworld in 2002.

This harnesses the power of football to create environments that empower people to shape their future lives. Every year it reaches more than 2 million people in over 90 countries.

Running tournaments in local communities across the world, it uses football to bring people together. People make connections and combine their talents to tackle other challenges they face. Here is an introduction from their website.

We Want To Change The World Through Football

streetfootballworld believes in the unique power of football to change lives and bring people together behind a common goal.

Our mission is to strengthen our worldwide network of local organisations that use football to help young people overcome challenges like poverty, discrimination and lack of education.

A Beautiful Game, A Perfect Tool

No sport in the world generates as much passion as football. Football brings young people into social development programmes—and keeps them there.

Football also gets people from all walks of life speaking the same universal language. Establishing common ground is streetfootballworld's first step toward uniting the global community around a shared goal.

Jürgen went on to work with Juan Mata, the Spanish footballer, and in 2017 they founded Common Goal. This invites those involved in football to pledge 1% of their salaries to support disadvantaged young people.

Many players, managers and other people have pledged to support the venture. Here is an excerpt from the Common Goal website.

We're uniting the world of footballers behind a shared commitment to give back. The idea is simple. Players pledge a minimum of 1% of their wages to a collective fund. And we allocate this fund to football charities that create the greatest impact worldwide.

Imagine uniting the world of football behind a shared social vision. Imagine the impact we could create and the lives we could change. 1% may seem like a small figure, yet it stands to make a big difference.

If the entire football community pledged just 1% of its collective income to a movement like Common Goal, we would generate a colossal 400% increase in funding for high-impact football NGOs the world over.

This translates to an additional eight million disadvantaged young people gaining access to football-based development projects each year. Through Common Goal, this is what we are trying to achieve. And we want you to join us.

COMMON GOAL - OUR PURPOSE

UNITING THE GLOBAL FOOTBALL COMMUNITY IN TACKLING THE GREATEST SOCIAL CHALLENGES OF OUR TIME

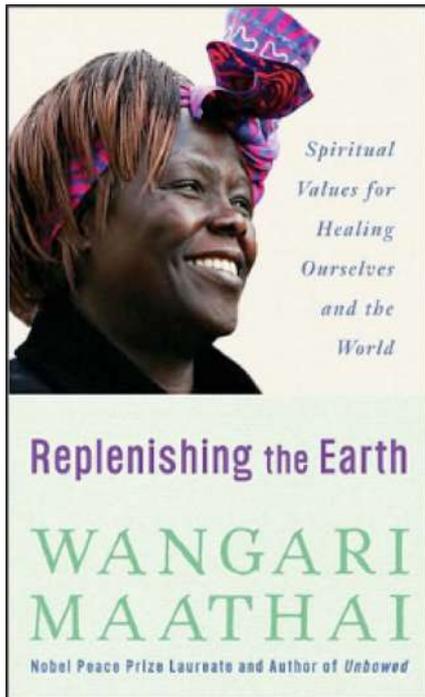

Caring For The Planet

Some people focus on caring for the planet. They may do practical things that encourage people, care for the environment or give hope to both and future generations.

Such people often invest enormous amounts of emotional energy into their work. Staying sane therefore calls for them remembering one key rule. They can focus on what they can control rather than what they can't control. They are then more likely to be able to see things in perspective.

Wangari Maathai was somebody who took this approach. Best known for her work with the Green Belt Movement in Kenya, she recruited hundreds of thousands of people who planted more than 40 million trees.

She was born in 1940, the third of six children, in a traditional mud hut with no electricity or running water. Wangari said that she was fortunate because her family sent her to a primary school run by Italian nuns.

Wangari Maathai translated her caring into action. She explained this in the following way.

"Finally I was able to see that if I had a contribution I wanted to make, I must do it, despite what others said. That it was all right to be strong."

"My little thing is planting trees.

"When we plant trees, we plant the seeds of peace and seeds of hope. We also secure the future for our children."

Showing great academic aptitude, she won a scholarship to the United States, being part of what was called The Kennedy Airlift. This involved some 300 Kenyans being chosen to study at American Universities.

After further study in Germany, she returned to Kenya. After working as a vet in some of the poorest areas, Wangari led academic departments in the University of Nairobi.

Extremely practical and logical (she was the first Kenyan woman to gain a Ph.D.), her work sprang from a philosophical base. She believed it was vital to live in harmony with nature and described this in the following way.

"We must repent our sins (i.e. rectify our wrongdoings) by dressing our motherland in her original beautiful and full green dress. In planting trees, we are adorning our motherland with belts. When we have done this our motherland will be healed and we shall reap a bounteous harvest."

Wangari was often asked if the idea for the Green Belt Movement came to her because she was a woman. Acknowledging that women bear life and respect nature, she said it was simply searching to solve a specific problem.

This involved helping people to climb out of poverty, replenish the earth and enjoy the fruits of their labours. She described this in the following way.

Inspirations come to all of us but many of us may not have the right mental peace and tranquillity at the critical time to allow the inspiration to grow beyond the stage when it appears like a dream.

I think I was just lucky. I do not know why I nursed the inspiration until it became an idea and finally an activity. I think that women in the NCWK (National Council of Women in Kenya) were quite good at pursuing an idea which for a long time bore little fruit. But patience is not the prerogative of women.

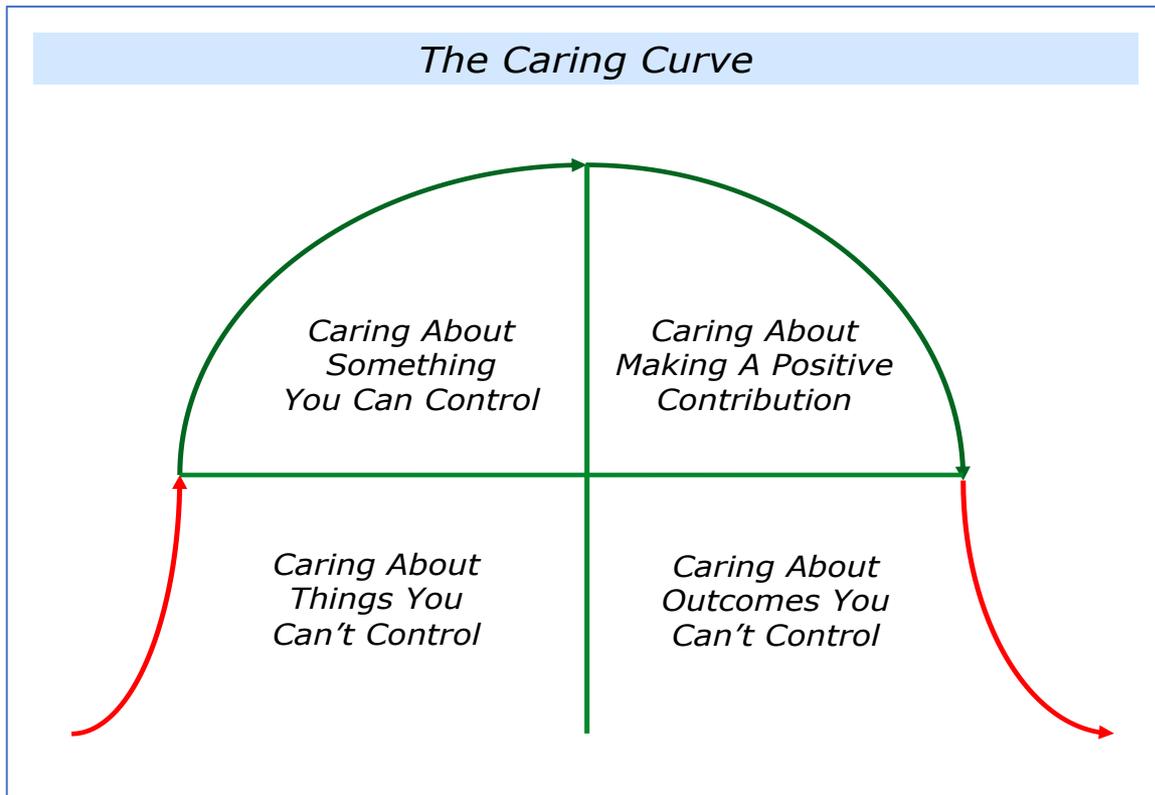

Tree planting became an honourable activity in Kenya, said Wangari. This led to creating thousands of greenbelts in the country and soon spread to other countries in Africa.

The act of planting trees enabled the earth to breathe and the crops to grow. Showing it was possible to make a difference encouraged people to take more charge of shaping their futures.

Wangari achieved much in her life before her death in 2011. By then she was acknowledged as a pioneer and honoured in many countries. She also won the Nobel Peace Prize.

Imagine that you aiming to follow some elements of the caring approach. Sometimes it can also be worth bearing in mind the following ideas.

The Caring Curve Approach

Different people care about different things in their lives. The way they express this caring can affect both themselves and other people. Let's explore this theme.

Imagine that you care about a particular situation. You may feel strongly about doing something positive to help a person, an organisation or the planet.

Different people manage such situations in different ways. Sometimes this can involve experiencing different emotions on the caring curve. Let's consider these possibilities.

Caring About Things You Can't Control

Imagine you care about a situation but can't see how you want to make a positive contribution. You want to do your best but feel limited by certain things you can't control. For example:

You may want to help a troubled person who refuses to take responsibility for their own behaviour;

You may want to improve things in an organisation that is led by a toxic Chief Executive;

You may want to help innocent people who are suffering as the result of actions by war lords.

Different people respond to such situations in different ways. Some keep worrying about the things they can't control. Some get depressed and fall into a negative cycle. Some focus on the following theme.

Caring About Something You Can Control

Imagine you want to tackle an issue you care about. How can you prepared properly to take this step? One approach is to focus on the following themes.

You can act as a positive model

Many people take this step. Bearing in mind what they care about, they aim act as a positive model in their own life. Borrowing from a phrase used in spiritual faiths and recovery programmes:

They aim to sweep their side of the street.

People who take this approach start by taking responsibility for their own actions. They aim: a) to have a positive attitude; b) to translate this into positive actions; c) to do their best to deliver positive achievements.

People who care about peace in other countries, for example, aim to embody this approach in their own lives. They aim to lead by example and show rather than just tell.

You can focus on the positive things in life and the potential solutions to challenges

Sensitive people often care about many things. Bearing this in mind, they may follow the rule that 'what you focus on you become'. They may need to put positive things – rather than negative things – into their system.

One approach is for a person to focus on: a) the positive things in their own life; b) the possible solutions to challenges. Many of these solutions are being translated into action by positive people and social enterprises across the world.

Imagine that you have followed elements of this approach. You have aimed to have a sense of gratitude and researched people doing good work around the world. Bearing these things in mind, you may then want to explore the following theme

You can focus on something you care about where you can build on what you can control

There are many ways to take this step. One approach is to clarify the things you care about and be selective to be effective. It is then to build on what you can control and tackle one of these issues.

Looking at the topic you want to explore, you may be able to control the following things. Your attitude, your professionalism and the way you aim to make a positive contribution.

Imagine you want to take this approach. You can start by brainstorming the things you care about. Here are some themes that people mention when exploring this theme.

The Things I Care About Are:

*Helping people to take care of their health ... Feeding hungry people ...
Enabling young people to find satisfying work ... Helping people to solve conflicts ... Showing people the benefits of protecting the environment ...
Applying Artificial Intelligence in a way that helps people and the planet.*

Let's assume you have brainstormed your own list of things you care about. If appropriate, you can focus on one of these where you want to make a contribution. It should also be one where you feel able to build on what you can control in the situation.

Caring About Making A Positive Contribution

Imagine that you aim to translate your caring into action. One approach is: a) to focus on a specific thing you care about; b) to build on what you can control in the situation; c) to make a positive contribution in this activity.

Different people choose different ways to make a contribution. They may aim to raise money for a charity, help people who are experiencing difficulties, build a successful prototype that shows a better way or do another activity.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to start by clarifying the specific thing you care about where you want to make a positive contribution.

Bearing in mind what you can control in the situation, it then invites you to clarify:

The specific results you want to achieve;

The specific strategies you can follow to do your best to achieve these results;

The specific pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goals;

The specific things you can do to build on the pluses and manage the potential minuses.

Here is the exercise.

My Positive Contribution

The specific thing I care about where I want to make a positive contribution is:

The Specific Goals

The specific results I want achieve when focusing on this activity are:

The Specific Strategies

The specific strategies I want to follow to do my best to achieve these results are:

The Specific Pluses And Minuses

The specific pluses involved in working to achieve the desired results may be:

*

The specific minuses involved in working to achieve the desired results may be:

*

The specific things I can do to build on the pluses and manage the potential minuses are:

Let's assume that you have embarked on doing the work involved. This may bring a sense of satisfaction but it can also be important to learn about the following theme.

Caring About Outcomes You Can't Control

Imagine that you are working to achieve the desired results. Sometimes you may feel up, sometimes you may feel down. The feelings you have may be affected by several factors that are beyond your control.

Bearing this in mind, it is important to maintain a positive attitude and also have a sense of perspective. One approach is to focus on the following themes:

You can always aim to do your best and build on what you can control in the situation;

You may experience both successes and setbacks on the journey towards your aims;

You may sometimes need to separate yourself from the outcomes because these may be affected by things you can't control.

Caring about the outcomes is natural but it can bring dangers. That is why it is on the red part of the caring curve. You can do your best but it is important not to let your self-esteem be affected by things you can't control.

Great sports people take this approach. They aim to prepare properly, follow their principles and deliver peak performances. Whilst being in a results business, they recognise that many factors can affect the outcomes.

Such people do what they can to shape these factors but they also have a certain criteria for judging their performances. They embody the ethic of continuous improvement by focusing on:

The specific things they are doing well and how they can build on these;

The specific things they can do better in the future and how;

The specific things they can do to implement these ideas.

Bill Walsh, the famous American Football Coach, took this approach. He encouraged his players to prepare properly for each match. They followed the agreed strategy and aim to practice what he called routine perfection. Bill then took pressure off his players by repeating this mantra.

Keep delivering the standard of performance and the score takes care of itself.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think a specific situation where you may want to follow some aspects of the caring curve?

What may be the specific thing you care about? How can you focus on what you can control in this area? How can you then make a positive contribution? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Caring Curve

The specific situation where I may want to focus on something I care about and make a positive contribution may be:

*

The specific things I can do then to make a positive contribution are:

*

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

*

The Caring And Competent Approach

There are many models for understanding people and their performance. One approach is:

To focus on the things they care about;

To focus on their competence in being able to deliver these things.

Good people leaders, for example, care for people and also have the competence to enable them to deliver great results. Some leaders care about other things, of course, such as power, money or status.

The following section focuses on the caring and competence approach to leading people. Different leaders may or may not demonstrate these qualities in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

Caring And Incompetent

Some people in leadership positions may be caring but incompetent. They may care about people and the project but do not demonstrate the required strategic thinking or skills.

Some leaders are successful in some situations but not in others. They may be good at running a start-up company, for example, or an organisation that is facing certain challenges. But they may not have the competence to succeed in other situations.

Some leaders are honest about their capabilities. They may stick to what they do best or aim to add other skills. Some may continue behaving in an incompetent way, however, and this can cause collateral damage.

People who work for such a leader sometimes feel split. Whilst still liking the person, they see that employees may be confused and concerned. The incompetent leader's actions can lead to the team or organisation ending up on the rocks.

Caring And Competent

Some leaders are both caring and competent. When talking about such a leader, people may say some of the following things.

"They show they care about people and the project ... They make people feel welcome and valued ... They show an interest in people and their ideas ... They are good at making others feel important rather than trying to make themselves feel important."

"They create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance ... They have the strategic thinking and other skills required to do the job ... They keep communicating the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success."

"They enable people to perform superb work ... They are good at making the tough decisions required to achieve the goals ... They have a track record of delivering ongoing success."

Uncaring And Incompetent

Some leaders may not seem to care about people or the project. They may only care about pursuing their own agenda. They may also not demonstrate the competence required to deliver the goods.

People often switch off from such leaders. They put their heads down and get on with their own jobs. Losing belief, they try to get satisfaction from their daily tasks or outside the workplace.

Uncaring And Competent

Leaders who demonstrate these characteristics can be cruel and dangerous. The only things they care about are their own agenda and power. They may be extremely competent at using techniques to pursue their aims, however, whatever the costs to other people.

People who behave like authoritarians, dictators and psychopaths can demonstrate these characteristics. They focus on pursuing their own agenda and don't care about other people's feelings.

Such people are never satisfied, no matter how much power they gain. They must always win and, at the same time, make sure that other people lose.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you may want to demonstrate caring and competence? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of you taking these steps?

If you wish, you try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Circles Of Compassion Approach

Different people show caring for others in different ways. They may demonstrate sympathy, empathy or compassion. Compassion is translating caring into action.

This has led to people creating the circles of compassion approach. This starts with the individual at the centre of the circle and them also having compassion for their loved ones.

Some individuals have compassion for people who are similar to them. Some have compassion and respect for people who are different from them. The extent to which we have compassion can govern our actions.

Some people have love and compassion for their community. Some for their nation. Some for all living things. Some for the whole planet. Some believe it is vital to care for the life-giving forces of the whole biosphere.

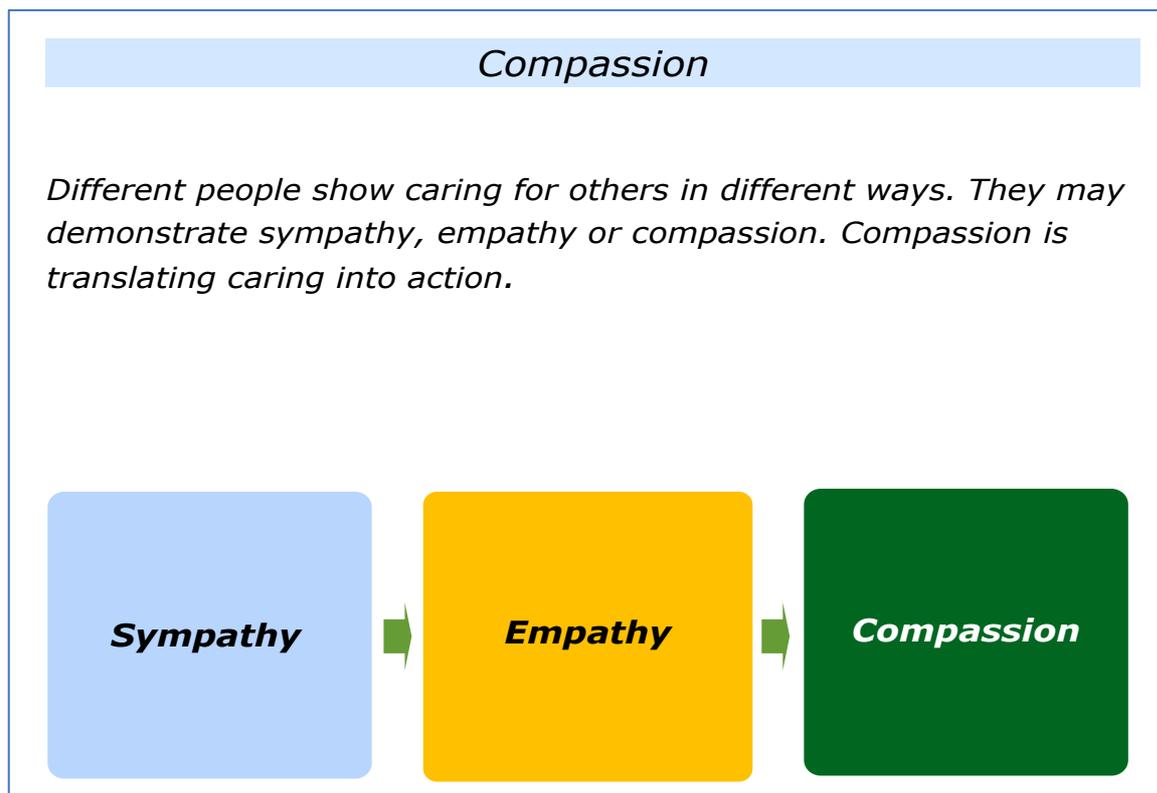

Some people seem to have a compassionate gene that is strongly developed. Many people who go into the caring professions – such as nursing – often demonstrate this approach. People who show compassion often have a history of being loved and being taught to respect other human beings. As the saying goes:

Love is like many things in life. If you don't learn it early, it is much harder to learn it later.

The same can be said for compassion. People who learn it early are more likely to show it later. At the same time, however, some people choose to show compassion as they get older.

William Ross Wallace alluded to this approach in a poem he published in 1865. This later became known as The Hand That Rocks The Cradle Is The Hand That Rules The World.

This emphasised the influence that mothers and fathers had on a child. The love – or lack of it – the child received then could affect their character later in life. Let's explore some of the ways that people may express these themes.

It is also necessary in both public and private life to refrain consistently and empathically from inflicting pain.

To act or speak violently out of spite, chauvinism, or self-interest, to impoverish, exploit or deny basic rights to anybody, and to incite hatred by denigrating others - even our enemies - is a denial of our common humanity.

We acknowledge that we have failed to live compassionately and that some have even increased the sum of human misery in the name of religion.

We therefore call upon all men and women to restore compassion to the centre of morality and religion

~ to return to the ancient principle that any interpretation of scripture that breeds violence, hatred or disdain is illegitimate

~ to ensure that youth are given accurate and respectful information about other traditions, religions and cultures

~ to encourage a positive appreciation of cultural and religious diversity

~ to cultivate an informed empathy with the suffering of all human beings - even those regarded as enemies.

We urgently need to make compassion a clear, luminous and dynamic force in our polarized world.

Rooted in a principled determination to transcend selfishness, compassion can break down political, dogmatic, ideological and religious boundaries.

Born of our deep interdependence, compassion is essential to human relationships and to a fulfilled humanity.

It is the path to enlightenment, and indispensable to the creation of a just economy and a peaceful global community.

Karen's work led to creating a board of Trustees who aim to translate the Charter for Compassion into action. Here is an excerpt from the website.

Compassion is at the root of many religions and spiritual beliefs. So let's revive the Golden Rule.

Always treat all other people with the respect that you would like them to treat you with. Do not cause pain to others that you would not like inflicted on yourself.

Compassion can help to build a global community that helps to achieve the common good. We believe a compassionate world is a peaceful world.

We believe a compassionate world is possible when every man, woman and child treats others as they would wish to be treated - with dignity, equity and respect.

We believe all human beings are born with the capacity for compassion, and it must be cultivated for human beings to survive and thrive.

The Greater Good Center – The Importance Of Compassion

The Greater Good Center, based at the University of California, Berkeley, focuses on the science of living a meaningful life. Here are excerpts from part of its website that is devoted to compassion.

Compassion is not the same as empathy or altruism though the concepts are related.

While empathy refers more generally to our ability to take the perspective of and feel the emotions of another person, compassion is when those feelings and thoughts include the desire to help.

Scientific research into the measurable benefits of compassion is young. Preliminary findings suggest, however, that being compassionate can improve health, wellbeing, and relationships.

Many scientists believe that compassion may even be vital to the survival of our species, and they're finding that its advantages can be increased through targeted exercises and practice.

Compassion makes us feel good.

Compassionate action (e.g., giving to charity) activates pleasure circuits in the brain, and compassion training programs, even very brief ones, strengthen brain circuits for pleasure and rewards and lead to lasting increases in self-reported happiness.

Being compassionate - tuning in to other people in a kind and loving manner – can reduce risk of heart disease by boosting the positive effects of the Vagus Nerve, which helps to slow our heart rate.

Brain scans during loving-kindness meditation, which directs compassion toward suffering, suggest that, on average, compassionate people's minds wander less about what has gone wrong in their lives, or might go wrong in the future; as a result, they're happier.

Compassion helps make caring parents: Brain scans show that when people experience compassion, their brains activate in neural systems known to support parental nurturance and other caregiving behaviors.

Compassion helps make better spouses: Compassionate people are more optimistic and supportive when communicating with others.

Employees who receive more compassion the workplace see themselves, their co-workers, and their organization in a more positive light, report feeling more positive emotions like joy and contentment, and are more committed to their jobs.

More compassionate societies - those that take care of their most vulnerable members, assist other nations in need, and have children who perform more acts of kindness - are the happier ones.

Compassionate people are more socially adept, making them less vulnerable to loneliness.

Compassion In Challenging Situations

Compassion can produce enormous benefits, both for ourselves and other people. It can help us to shape a positive future.

Certainly it is possible to show compassion and become a victim, but that does not help anybody. At the same time, however, it is important to recognise that there may be big things at stake.

Marjorie Clifton describes this approach in her article called Grace Under Pressure: Why difficult situations speak the most about you. She begins it with the following statement.

When my grandfather was once asked by a banker whether a dear friend of his of 20 years was trustworthy, he famously said, "I don't know, I've never seen his back against the wall."

I always wondered what he meant; after all, he had known the guy for most of his life. But, as a professional, and now a parent, I am acutely more aware of what he was really saying.

Marjorie goes on to share ideas about how people can respond when faced by a difficult scenario. Here are the headline themes.

Take a breath (or a walk) before you react ... If you have any hesitation, phone a friend ... Give people the benefit of the doubt ... Consider the long-term impact ... Take the high road, even when it hurts.

Compassion can uplift others and can also lead to longer-term feelings of happiness. Emma M. Seppala explores this theme in her article The Best Kept Secret to Happiness: Compassion. Here are some excerpts from this piece.

Compassion and service don't just make us happy but they also have a host of other associated benefits and may even contribute to a longer life.

One reason compassion makes us happy is by broadening our perspective beyond ourselves. We know from research on anxiety and depression that these tense and unhappy states are highly self-focused.

When you do something for someone else, however, that state of self-focus immediately dissolves ... All of a sudden your attention was on helping them.

Rather than feeling blue, you began to feel energized and before you knew it, you may even have felt better and had gained some perspective on your own situation as well.

Compassion Uplifts And Spreads

Why are the lives of people like Mother Teresa, Martin Luther King, and Desmond Tutu so inspiring?

Research by Jonathan Haidt at the University of Virginia suggests that seeing someone helping another person creates a state of elevation.

Have you ever been moved to tears by seeing someone's loving and compassionate behavior?

Haidt's data suggests that it may be this elevation that then inspires us to help others – and it may just be the force behind a chain reaction of giving.

Social scientists James Fowler of UC San Diego and Nicolas Christakis of Harvard demonstrated that helping is contagious – acts of generosity and kindness beget more generosity in a chain reaction of goodness.

What can we take away from this research? That material goods may give us fun short-term pleasure but that long-term happiness and fulfillment lies less in what we can take than what we can give.

Compassion may just be the best kept secret to being not just happy but also healthy, wealthy, and wise.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the compassionate approach?

You may want to do this by encouraging a loved one, friends or kindred spirit. You may wish to do it by showing respect and caring for somebody who is different. You may wish do something practical to care for living things or the planet.

The Specialist Approach

Imagine that you want to specialise in a certain kind of work that you find fascinating. You love developing your expertise in this specialism.

You may want to earn a living doing such work. This may also call for developing your strategic thinking, giving good service and helping your key stakeholders to achieve success.

Some people consider themselves to be generalists rather than specialists. They say things like:

"It is hard to find the right job title for what I do. I seem to do quite a lot of things and do not fit into a specific category. This can make it hard when applying for roles."

After exploring their successful style of work, however, we often find that such people are actually specialists in a particular activity. The keys are:

To clarify their successful style of working;

To put a name to what they do;

To define what they can actually deliver for an employer.

Let's consider how you may want to take some of these steps in your own way.

Becoming A Specialist

People who develop a specialism often start by doing things that give them positive energy. They may be exploring, playing with ideas or doing things where they feel creative.

Such people may then pursue one of the following paths. They focus on either:

The specific activities they feel passionately about where they may have the ability to deliver peak performances;

The specific activities they find fascinating, have a feeling for and have a track record of finishing;

The specific activities where they can build on their strengths, do satisfying work and deliver success.

Looking at your own life, when do you experience some of these feelings? What are the specific activities where you do satisfying work, develop and deliver the goods?

You may pursue this route when helping people, writing, drawing or performing songs. You may do it studying medicine, leading teams, tackling certain kinds of challenges or doing another activity.

People who develop a specialism often start by following their interests and exploring many areas on their chosen theme. These can eventually lead to them settling a specific activity. Here is one person who took this approach.

Steve - Becoming The Chief Storyteller

Steve Clayton grew up being fascinated by computers, stories and music. He went to university, studied IT and joined a small company. Enjoying being a techie, he wanted to bridge the gap between the technical world and the customers.

Believing that technology could enrich people's lives, Steve moved to Microsoft in the UK. This is where I met him when doing mentoring sessions for employees.

Steve was passionate about the company's products and ran customised seminars for customers. Returning to his love of writing, he began publishing a weekly blog explaining how Microsoft's technology could help people.

The blog became well-known and built a big audience. One day he received a call from the head office. They asked him to become Microsoft's Chief Storyteller. He continued in that role for over ten years.

Steve built a team that focused on bringing to life the value that the company's services could provide for people. Like many writers, they followed some of the classical frameworks for telling stories.

They also encouraged other people, teams and organisations to bring their services and products to life. This involved making the stories more human rather than just using technical terms. Here is a summary of the framework they used.

Steve Clayton – Microsoft Storytelling

Steve and his team adapted several approaches when settling on the Microsoft framework for storytelling. Here is a summary of the model they used.

- People

Good stories often talk about people. This can be an individual or a group of people who are tackling a challenge or working to achieve a specific goal.

- Place

Good stories are set in a certain place. This can be a school, work place, community or other environment. They describe how people in this place work to achieve a specific goal.

- Pictures

Good stories often provide or create pictures. It is important to bring the concepts to life with examples, images and pictures that people will remember.

- Personal

Good stories provide the audience with something personal. Try to relate what you are saying to individuals and how they can use the ideas in their daily lives or work.

- Platform

Good stories sometimes highlight the platform or product that embodies the strategy, service or solution that is being described. This is done in a sharing rather than selling way.

Specialists Sometimes Develop A New Specialism

During the 1970s I ran sessions for many people who considered themselves to be specialists. They focused on becoming experts in therapy, medicine, sports, business or another activity.

The path they took was relatively straight-forward. They studied a specific topic, gained qualifications and joined a department in an organisation. Climbing the ladder, they became respected by their peers and developed a niche within an accepted profession.

During the early 1980s another trend began to emerge, though it had probably been there for centuries. People began exploring new kinds of work and developing new roles.

Some people began inventing titles for what they did. Some titles were specific; some were woolly. The work they did was valuable, but sometimes it was hard to capture in a job title. One person expressed this in the following way.

"The existing job titles are a start, but I seem to combine elements of different roles. It is hard to find a name for what I do."

How to make a start? One approach is to explore the satisfying projects that a person has done in the past and look for recurring patterns. These give a clue to their successful style of working.

The next step is to find a name for it. Let's look at one person who took this approach.

Sue – A Superb Orchestrator

Sue had always been an organiser. Captain of the school netball team, at university she led the social committee. She still organised the annual ski trips taken by her friends from university.

She followed the classic route taken by people with these skills. She loved making lists and getting things done. This produced a feeling of satisfaction and accomplishment.

Sue joined a company, did her day job and also volunteered to manage projects. These included running events, building new technology and leading a mentoring programme for young entrepreneurs in the community.

She gained promotion and became a manager. Sue enjoyed aspects of the role and worked best with the motivated people. Although a good listener, she found it difficult to understand people who did not deliver the desired professional standards.

She spent the next ten years taking various roles. These included being a Project Manager, Project Leader, Coordinator and Customer Service Lead. She then became a Chief Operating Officer.

Sue and I met after she had spent three months in Africa leading a project for a social enterprise. Several COO jobs were on offer, but she did not want to pursue the traditional version of such a role.

The COO's role in a modern organisation is to be a good orchestrator. This is especially the case when aiming to coordinate teams and individuals to achieve a compelling goal.

The older type of COO was often an expert who got promoted to that role. Good in their specialism, they were an expert who was promoted to leader. Today's COO needs to be a leader of experts.

Sue could take a COO role but was not sure it would be satisfying. Bearing this in mind, we clarified what she could deliver to an organisation. This produced the following list.

Delivery

The specific things I can deliver to an organisation are:

To lead and orchestrate teams that deliver pioneering work which enables the organisation to achieve future success.

This could include, for example:

Delivering technology, products or services that will enable the organisation to stay ahead of the game;

Delivering programmes that recruit and retain people who embody the values and make their best contributions to helping the organisation achieve success;

Delivering coordinated work across many teams and cultures in a way that helps the organisation to achieve both present and future success.

Sue eventually chose to lead a worldwide project on improving technology for video conferencing. This played to her strengths as an orchestrator and was working with motivated people who wanted to achieve a compelling goal.

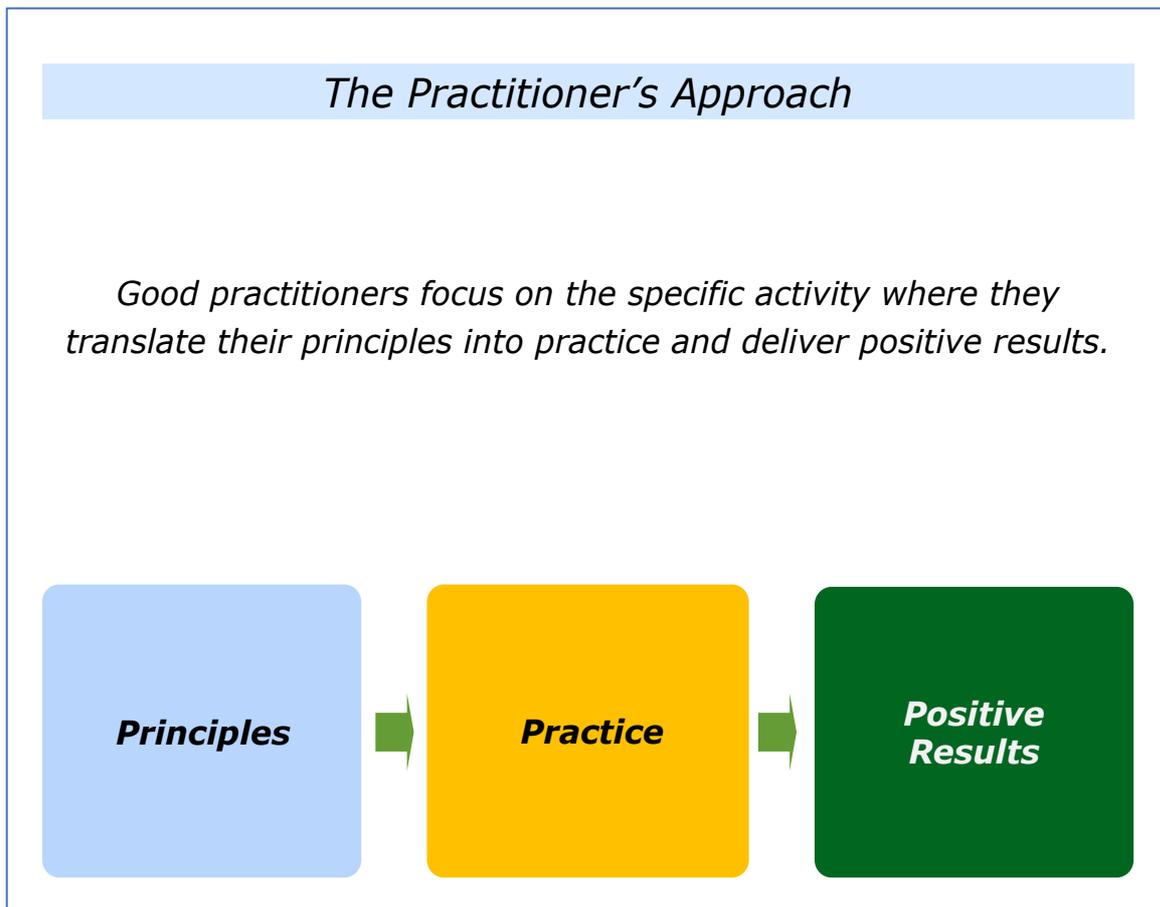

The project had a tight deadline, but this was fine. Sue believed in the work. She also believed that, when it was completed, she would find or create the next stimulating project.

The Specialist As Practitioner

Some specialists focus on the specific activity where they are good practitioners. They translate their principles into practise and deliver positive results.

Such people often see the big picture but then love to dive deeply into the detail. They enjoy the hands-on aspect of shaping the work. They may do this when working as a counsellor, chef, vet, film maker, technical specialist or in another practitioner role.

Let's return to your own life and work. At this point don't be concerned about putting a title to the work you do. It may be more useful to describe the specific things you can deliver to a potential employer.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Specialism

The specific activity I would like to pursue where I can build on my strengths, do satisfying work and deliver success is:

The specific things I can do to pursue this activity are:

The specific things I can deliver to customers, employers or other stakeholders when doing this work are:

Being Strategic

People sometimes need to think strategically beyond their particular specialism. Whether working in an organisation or running their own business, it is important:

To build on their strengths, do superb work and deliver success to their various stakeholders.

Some knowledge workers love to do satisfying work but sometimes neglect to manage their stakeholders. They may then be seen as just doing their own thing. This can lead to difficulties.

Such workers can follow certain principles to thrive. The way they express these may differ depending on whether they are working in an organisation or running their own business. Let's explore these approaches.

Specialists Working in Organisations

Specialists often need to combine being true to their calling with satisfying their key stakeholders. This calls for doing their due diligence before taking a role. They need:

To be aware of the pluses and minuses of working in the organisation;

To be clear on what they can and can't expect from working in the culture of the organisation;

To then make a decision whether they want to take the role and work in the organisation.

Bearing in mind these factors, do they want to take the role? If so, how can they build on the pluses and manage the minuses? How can they do good work and deliver success to the stakeholders?

Great workers go into a role with their eyes open. They then take the following steps to get wins for the organisation, wins for their customers and wins for themselves. They aim:

To make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the real results to achieve - the picture of success;

To be positive, professional and proactively keep their stakeholders informed about the progress being made towards the picture of success;

To get some quick wins, do superb work, continue to keep in touch with their stakeholders and deliver the agreed picture of success.

Taking these steps can help them to thrive rather than just survive. They can do good work and maybe get a good salary working in the organisation.

This can provide them with the platform: a) to develop their craft within the role; b) to develop by doing stimulating projects in their free time; c) to, when appropriate, move on to the next role that will help them to develop.

Specialists Helping Teams To Achieve Success

Many specialists are loyal to the values of their craft. This ensures that they continue to do good work in their field of expertise.

This approach is valuable, but it can create challenges if they cannot find the right place to make their contribution. They may find themselves in conflict with people or in certain kinds of workplaces.

Specialists want to make a living working in teams often need to understand the culture of the workplace. They can then position what they offer in a way that helps the team to achieve success.

Superb Teams

They employ the following types of people who embody the spirit of the team and want to help to achieve its goals.

Specialists need to bear this in mind when clarifying their best contribution to helping the team achieve success.

There are many models for building superb teams. One approach is where they employ the following kinds of people who embody the team's spirit and want to help it achieve success.

Shapers

They employ shapers who have strong personalities. Such people shape the team's spirit, strategy and the way it aims to achieve success.

Superb Workers

They employ people who embody the team's spirit, build on their strengths and do superb work that helps the team to achieve success.

Specialists

They employ specialists – sometimes as full-time employees, sometimes as suppliers – who help the team to achieve success.

Specialists who want to contribute to a team need to do their research. They may need to clarify:

What is the spirit of the team? Will I feel comfortable contributing to the culture? If so, what would be my best contribution? How can I position this in a way that helps the team to achieve success?

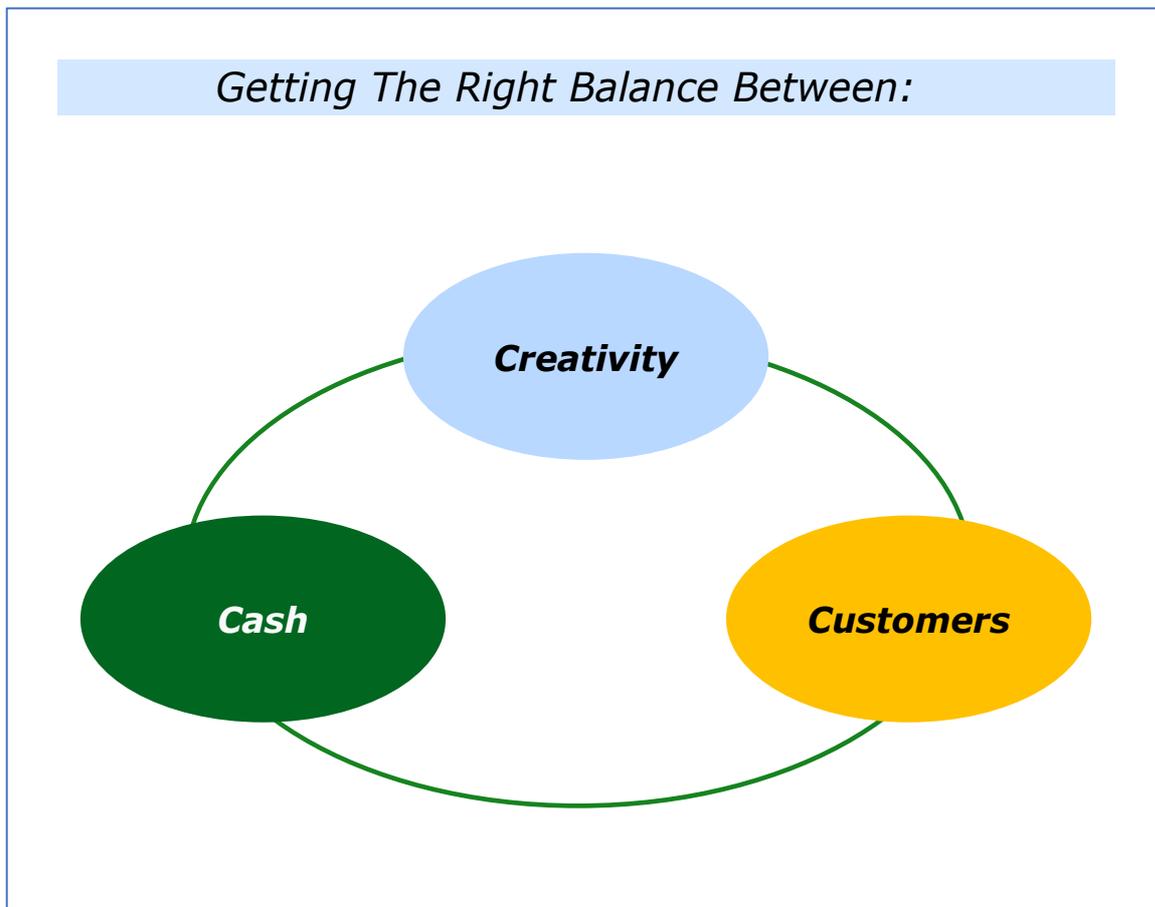

People who take this approach are more likely to be able to make a living by contributing to teams.

Specialists Running Their Own Business

Many specialists follow their calling and enjoy being creative. Some want to translate this into setting up and running their own business. Some take this step and thrive; others find they are more suited to working in an organisation.

Imagine that they want translate this into running their own business. This calls for getting the right balance between creativity, customers and cash. Let's explore this approach.

The Creativity, Customers And Cash Approach

Imagine that you have many creative ideas that you want to translate into action. You may also want to earn a living by providing services or setting-up a business that helps people to succeed.

You may want to work in consultancy, technology or another field. One approach is to get the right balance between creativity, customers and cash. Let's explore these themes.

Creativity

There are many views on creativity. Some people argue that it is hard to be truly original because many ideas have been thought of before.

Others say that creativity often emerges when applying the idea. This often calls for going through the stages of imagination, implementation and achieving impact.

What do you have ideas about? Frequently these will focus on the topics you find fascinating. These may include ideas about people, technology, business, art, sport or whatever.

Different people give different answers to this question. Over the years I have worked with people who have said the following things.

I have ideas about:

How people can take more care of their health ... How people can build on their strengths ... How people can use technology to improve education ... How to design gardens that give people pleasure ... How to create more environmentally friendly houses.

How to improve their recruitment and retention programmes ... How to create effective wellbeing programmes in organisations ... How companies can create more effective supply chains ... How companies can enable their people to deliver peak performances.

Many people have ideas. Sometimes these remain ideas but other times they are taken onto another stage. Let's imagine you want to take the next step.

Translating the creative idea into a service or product that will help people to succeed

How to make this happen? Looking at the creative idea that could have an impact, you can ask the classic questions.

Who are the potential customers? What are their needs? What are the challenges they face? What is their picture of success?

What are the specific things that the service or product could do? What would be the benefits to the customers? What could it deliver to help them to achieve success?

Creativity

*

The specific things I can do to translate this idea into a service or product that helps people are:

Customers

Creativity is fun. If a person wants to turn this into a business, however, the advice is:

"Go out and get your first three customers."

This can feel counter-intuitive to some people. They want to get things absolutely perfect before going out to market. Certainly this is vital when developing a service or product that must work properly first time.

People who provide other kinds of services, however, can make sure that what they offer will be of high quality. They can then go out to work with customers and continue to improve the quality.

Taking this step can be difficult for some people, especially knowledge workers. They may say:

"But I don't like to sell. It feels like I am imposing on people."

Sometimes they can reframe this in another way. Such people don't like to sell. But they do like to share their knowledge in a way that helps potential customers to succeed. They can then say:

"I want to help people to succeed."

Before taking this step, it is important to know how to position a service or product to potential buyers. If you aim to offer something to an organisation, for example, you can clarify how it will help them to improve their profits, product quality or people.

The key is to focus on the customers rather than yourself. As ever, it is about them, not about you. Trusted advisors, for example, show they understand people's goals. They then provide advice that enables them to achieve success.

Sometimes this can involve simply going and sharing knowledge that can help people to succeed. Imagine that you want to follow this route in your own way. The aims may be:

To clarify the challenges that potential customers may be facing or the goals they may want to achieve;

To find a way of reaching potential customers that fits your values system;

To pass on knowledge and practical tools that people can use to tackle their challenges or achieve their goals.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Looking at my own work, I have tended to do this for free. Then, at some point, a person may say that they want to take this further on a paid basis.

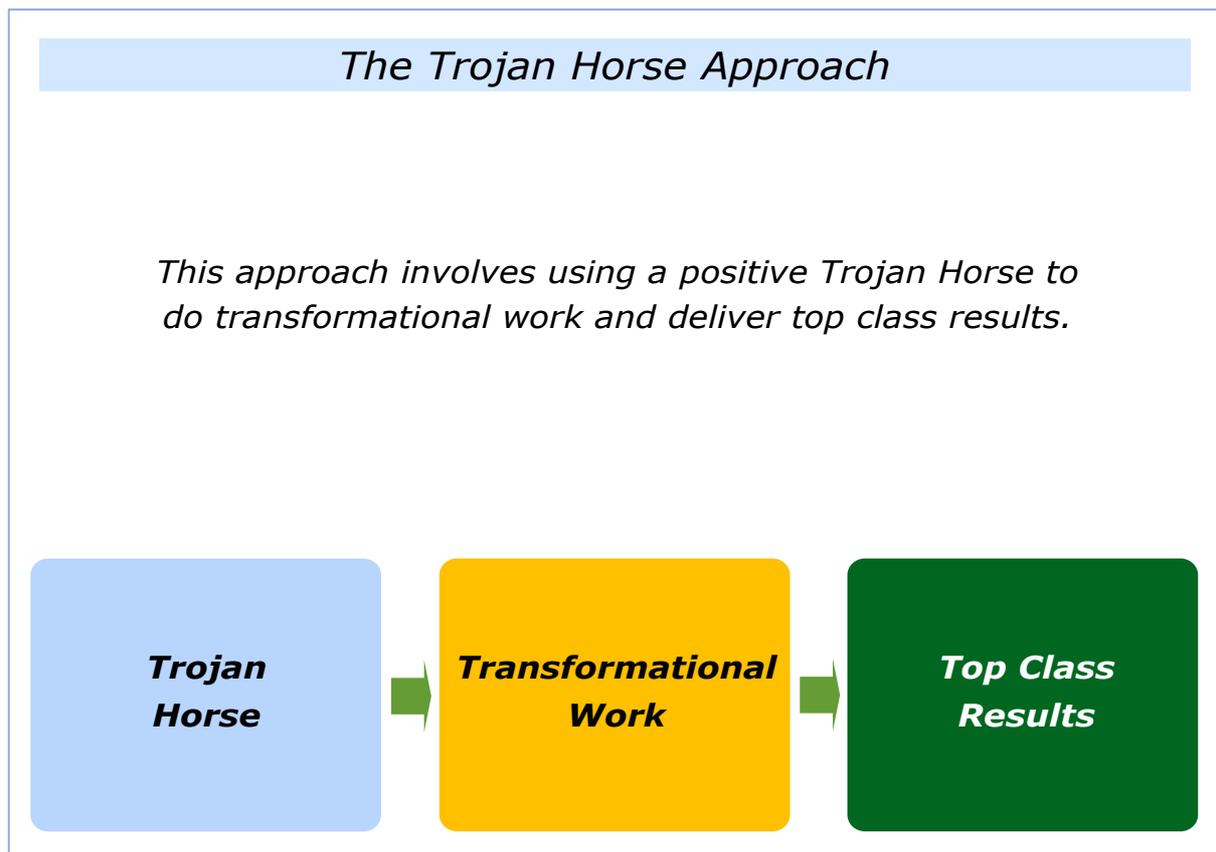

But other people will feel more comfortable with other approaches to getting work. Let's look at two possible ways.

The Shop Window Approach

This approach involves a person creating a shop window for their work. They may publish articles, produce a newsletter, make films or create a compelling website. This can increase their credibility and show the value of their work.

The Trojan Horse Approach

This is an approach that it is possible to use to start working with customers. The following section explores how this can lead to doing superb work.

Let's look at some examples of using a positive Trojan Horse. The first example is one that applies to people who work in the mentoring and coaching field.

Such people sometimes need to have a Trojan Horse that gives them the chance to begin doing such work. In the past some may have found a way in by inviting individuals to do psychometric tests.

The results of the test then provided a framework for having a conversation with a person. The test was just an opener. The quality of the mentoring or coaching depending on the quality of the conversation in the session.

During the 2008 recession I worked with some coaches who said they wanted to do transformational work with individuals. Some found that the market dried up, however, or that such one-to-one work was seen as a luxury.

We therefore explored how they could use a positive Trojan Horse. One approach was to do project work that could help organisations during the tough times.

Some took this approach with their existing customers and they helped to deliver top class results. It also led to them doing one-to-one work.

People need to choose a Trojan Horse they believe in. Looking at my own work, I often started working with organisations by providing workshops that helped people to build super teams. These then led to people having one-to-one sessions.

The Building A Successful Prototype Approach

The Trojan Horse approach can also be used to shift a culture. The aims can be:

To build a successful prototype that shows the principles that an organisation can follow to achieve future success;

To then help other parts of the organisation to follow these principles in their own ways to achieve success;

To produce success stories that highlight how people have followed the principles and delivered success.

The successful prototype is the Trojan Horse. With the backing of the organisation's leaders, the principles can be spread to transform other parts of the organisation. Eventually these principles may become the norm and enable the organisation to achieve future success.

Let's return to the topic of reaching customers. It is vital to follow your natural style and, if possible, help people to succeed.

Bearing in mind the service or product you want to offer, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Customers

The specific service or product I want to offer to potential customers is:

*

The specific things I can do reach potential customers and help them to succeed are:

Cash

People get satisfaction from doing good work but sometimes it can also be helpful to get a salary. This can put food on the table and also provide the platform for their future development.

Freelancers often remember the satisfaction of sending their first invoice and getting money in the bank. If you want to follow the fulfilling road and get funding, it is good to develop commercial awareness.

Different people do this in different ways. My own approach may be seen as being uncommercial. It has been to visit potential customers and spend a couple of hours with them once or twice.

The aim is to pass on practical tools they can use to succeed. If they would like a third visit – or want to take things forward in other ways - we explore the possibility of funding.

Because I am not good at talking about money, I have tended to use the phrase:

"Would there be any possibility of any funding?"

People may not want to make lots of money but they need to get cash in the bank. This can help to maintain your chosen lifestyle and also invest in shaping the future.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to get the right balance between creativity, customer and cash. This can help you to feel alive and also do satisfying work that helps people to succeed.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to explore how you can perform superb work and also get cash in the bank. Here is the exercise.

The Specialist's Approach To Helping Specific Customers To Achieve Success

Let's focus on these principles in another way. Imagine that you are a specialist who wants to do satisfying work but also earn a reasonable salary.

One approach is to follow the principles that we have explored in other parts of the book. Here are some exercises on these themes. You will, of course, follow these in your own way.

Success

Specialists sometimes have a multi-track approach to success. These may include the following elements.

Specialists want to keep doing satisfying work

They love to immerse themselves in doing their chosen work. Some enjoy the journey as much as reaching certain goals. They want to dive deeply, discover new things and keep developing.

Some immerse themselves in such a way that they appear to have self-chosen autism. They focus completely on pursuing their craft and cut out noise that could distract them from this task. This can mean that sometimes they have to remind themselves to connect with the world.

Specialist often want to pass on knowledge to other people

Such workers want to share knowledge about what they have learned. They may do this through writing articles, producing blogs, publishing books, making media appearances or using other media.

Some believe they may belong to a tradition. Many people have pursued this route in the past and many will pursue in the future. They want to follow their tradition and pass on knowledge that will help future generations.

Specialists want to work towards achieving their definition of success

Specialists have different definitions of success. Some want to keep doing superb work in their chosen field. Some want to be recognised as experts by their peers.

Some want to deliver tangible successes for their stakeholders. Whilst aiming to pursue their calling, they also believe it is vital to fulfil their moral obligations. They therefore do their best to deliver great work and help others to succeed.

Some want to feel they have done their best and made the most of their talent. Some want to earn lots of money. Some want to achieve status or win prizes. Some want to pass on a positive legacy.

Let's return to your own life and work. How can you continue to pursue your specialism? How can you continue to do satisfying work? How can you work towards your definition of success?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Driven Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One way is to follow the driven approach. It is to do what you do best and focus on the following themes.

Drive - this involves following your drive and deciding how you want to translate this into action.

Discipline – this involves following your chosen disciplines and, when appropriate, also being daring.

Delivery – this involves doing your best and dealing with dramas on the way to delivering the goods.

Looking back, when have you followed some of these steps? You may have been pursuing a project, writing a book, playing a sport or doing another activity. Try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Driven Approach In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I followed elements of this approach was:

*

The specific things I did then to follow some of these steps were:

*

The specific things that happened as results of taking these steps were:

Everybody is an artist, everybody is creative, everybody has something special to give to the world. Many people can be helped to find and follow their creative drive.

This approach was described by Antoine de Saint-Exupéry in his book Wind, Sand and Stars. He describes a long train journey in a crowded carriage in which he ponders on the possibilities within each human being.

I sat down face to face with one couple. Between the man and the woman a child had hollowed himself out a place and fallen asleep.

He turned in his slumber, and in the dim lamplight I saw his face. What an adorable face! I bent over the smooth brow, over those mildly pouting lips, and I said to myself: This is a musician's face.

This is the child Mozart. This is a life full of beautiful promise. Little princes in legends are not different from this. Protected, sheltered, cultivated, what could not this child become.

When by mutation a new rose is born in a garden, all the gardeners rejoice. They isolate the rose, tend it, foster it.

But there is no gardener for men. This little Mozart will be shaped like the rest by the common stamping machine. This little Mozart is condemned.

What torments me tonight is the gardener's point of view. It is the sight, a little bit in all these men, of Mozart murdered.

Different people feel compelled to create different things. They may want to help people, create encouraging environments, nurture beautiful gardens, design houses, make things work better or do another activity.

Creativity is something we often channel and obey. It is not something we own. But we do own the responsibility to our best with the gift we have been given.

Imagine that you want to follow some of these principles in the future. Let's explore how it is possible to take this route.

Drive

The process starts by focusing on something you feel driven to do. It then involves deciding how you want to translate this into action. You may then dedicate yourself to working to achieve a specific goal.

Different people follow their drive for different reasons. Some do it to satisfy their basic needs. Some follow it after having an epiphany. Some move forwards after a period of research and reflection. Here are some answers that people give when exploring this theme.

I feel driven:

To provide for my family ... To help people to manage pain ... To help young footballers to graduate from the academy to the first team ... To design care homes that enrich the lives of people experiencing dementia ... To pass on knowledge that helps people to succeed.

How can a person choose the theme they want to focus on? One approach is for them to ask:

What is the drive I want to pursue? What is the theme I keep returning to? What are the principles I believe in following? How can I translate this into action? What is my picture of success?

Imagine you have provisionally settled on the drive you want to pursue. You may then move on to the next stage. Translating the drive into action.

Decision Making

Great workers take time to think before deciding to commit themselves to working towards a specific goal. Bearing in mind their drive, they explore the potential way forwards and do their due diligence.

They then dedicate themselves to following their chosen route. Let's explore these themes, starting with making decisions.

There are many models for decision making. Some people explore their possible choices, the consequences and the attractiveness of each option. They then decide on their chosen route.

Some people work through these themes logically. Some do it quickly and use strategic intuition. Gary Klein studied people who took this latter approach. His books on the topic include Sources of Power: How People Make Decisions and The Power of Intuition.

He studied firefighters and other professionals who made decisions in pressure situations. The following section draws on an interview he gave to Bill Breen for The Fast Company magazine. He explained what he had learned in the following way.

"I noticed that when the most experienced commanders confronted a fire, the biggest question they had to deal with wasn't 'What do I do?' It was 'What's going on?'"

"That's what their experience was buying them - the ability to size up a situation and to recognise the best course of action."

Gary explained that firefighters saw the big picture and looked for patterns. They then began exploring potential strategies.

They reached into their experience – their hyperdrive - to scan previous scenarios and see what lessons might apply to the present situation;

They chose a potential course of action and played scenarios – like running a film in their heads – to see this might work in practice;

They ran the film to see if the strategy would work and, if so, they began pursuing it.

Gary said that firefighters kept exploring various strategies until they found one that worked. He explained this in the following way.

"Once they make a decision, firefighters evaluate it by rapidly running a mental simulation. They might run through several choices, but they never compare one option with another.

"They rapidly evaluate each choice on its own merits, even if they cycle through several possibilities. They imagine how a course of action may unfold and how it may ultimately play out.

"They don't need the best solution. They just need the one that works."

There are many models for exploring the possible ways forward. Sean Kim wrote an excellent summary of several models for an article on The Muse website. Here are two of the best-known tools.

Decision Making Tools

Sean Kim wrote an excellent summary of decision making tools in an article for The Muse website. Here is his description of two of the best known tools.

The 10/10/10 Rule

After reaching the top pinnacle of the publishing industry, Suzy Welch often used this strategy to help her navigate through tough personal and professional times.

This rule can be used to reflect on the future by asking yourself:

How will we feel about it 10 minutes from now?

How about 10 months from now?

How about 10 years from now?

The 10/10/10 Rule to think not only about how you'll feel about it later today but also years from today.

The Regret Minimization Framework

When Jeff Bezos was facing the dilemma of leaving his steady job at a hedge fund to start Amazon, he applied what he calls the "Regret Minimization Framework. Here's his explanation:

"If you can project yourself out to age 80 and sort of think, 'What will I think at that time?' it gets you away from some of the daily pieces of confusion.

"That's the kind of thing that in the short-term can confuse you, but if you think about the long-term then you can really make good life decisions that you won't regret later."

This approach is applicable for anyone making big jumps in his or her personal and professional life.

Imagine that you explored the possible routes you can take in the future. You may then want to focus on the following theme.

Dedication

Great workers commit themselves to doing their best and aiming to get positive results. This often involves them taking the following steps.

They clarify the route they want to follow, clarify the real results they want to achieve and translate this into a clear picture of success;

They clarify the key strategies they can follow to achieve the picture of success;

They clarify the pluses and minuses involved in doing the work and commit themselves to achieving the picture of success.

Great workers embark on their journey with their eyes open. They anticipate what can happen and decide if they are prepared to accept the whole package.

Imagine that you have clarified the thing you want to do, the strategies you want to follow and the desired picture of success. You have also considered the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving the goals.

Great workers often take one more step before dedicating themselves to achieving a specific goal. They check their motivation. This involves them working through the steps described in the framework below.

Looking at your own rating, make sure it is at least 8/10. You can also focus on how to maintain or improve the rating. This can include finding ways: a) to build on the pluses; b) to manage or minimise any minuses.

Discipline

Great workers take a delight in following certain disciplines. They also recognise that, when appropriate, they may need to be daring or demonstrate dexterity. They do this in a calculated way, however, to increase the chances of success.

Such workers often pursue their chosen discipline by following a certain rhythm. They aim to do the right things in the right way every day. Twyla Tharp, the American choreographer, believed in this approach.

Even into her sixties Twyla started the day at 5.30 am and walked out of her flat onto the Manhattan Street. She then hailed a cab that took her to the gym for a two-hour workout.

Writing in her book The Creative Habit, she explained how she followed certain rituals to develop good habits.

Being creative is an everyday thing, a job with its own routines.

The routine is as much part of the creative process as the lightning bolt of inspiration (perhaps more).

And it is available to everyone.

If creativity is a habit, then the best creativity is a result of good work habits.

Great workers aim to keep doing their best when working towards their goals. Different people do this in different ways. One approach is for them to clarify the daily disciplines they can follow to deliver the goals.

They do their best to keep following their daily disciplines and also take the following steps.

They keep developing – they build on their strengths, clarify what they are doing well and do more of these things.

They deal with disappointments – they focus on what they can improve and implement these ideas.

They do their best to deliver the goods – they keep doing what works, keep improving and do everything possible to achieve the goals.

Some people keep on ongoing journal describing the specific things they are doing well and how they can keep improving. Here is one example.

Daring

Great workers sometimes choose to be daring. They take this step in a calculated way, however, rather than by being careless. They recognise they may have more to win and less to lose by being daring.

They use their preferred decision making process to clarify the options for going forwards. They then dare to commit themselves fully to pursuing their chosen strategy.

The term daring rather than taking risks is one that I use deliberately. This encourages people to think in a more positive way rather than worrying about what they have got to lose. Let's look at some of the motivations for being daring.

Deciding To Be Daring

Different people choose to be daring for different reasons and in different ways. These may include the following.

- Daring by aiming to do something special.
- Daring by aiming to be decisive rather than drift.
- Daring because they have nothing to lose.

Some people choose to be daring because they aim to do something special. They may do this after following their disciplines but recognising that it requires something extra. They then build on their strengths and produce a superb piece of work that enables them to reach their goals.

Some people choose to be daring because they have nothing to lose. Such individuals can prove very difficult for opponents to deal with in sports or other activities because they are prepared to do almost anything to achieve their desired goals.

Great workers are determined and follow their chosen disciplines. When appropriate, they also demonstrate dexterity. There are several definitions for this quality. One of these is:

The ability to think quickly and effectively or to do something difficult extremely well.

Such workers have the ability to be agile and find creative solutions to challenges. This involves focusing on the next step

Delivery

Great workers keep doing their best. They keep following the strategies most likely to achieve success. They aim to make things as predictable as possible but sometimes they may need to manage other issues. Let's explore one of these themes.

Dealing With Dramas

Such workers may need to deal with dramas on the journey. They then channel their feelings into working towards achieving the desired goals.

They do not get distracted by such issues or their own emotional ups or downs. They do not, when working in organisations, get caught up in turf wars or game playing. They do not get side-tracked by individuals who choose to be dramatic or have serial problems.

Such workers anticipate the potential dramas they may encounter on the journey. They then explore the follow themes.

How can I prevent these dramas happening? How can I deal with any dramas if, despite my best efforts, they do happen?

How can I buy time to think? How can I focus on the real results to achieve in the short-term and long-term? How can I do my best to find possible solutions to the dramas? How can I implement these solutions?

How can I return to following the required disciplines? How can I get a quick success? How can I continue doing good work on the way towards the destination?

Great workers regain their rhythm and continue to do good work. They do this because they have rehearsed how to prevent and manage dramas.

Let's return to the route you may want to follow. Looking ahead, what are the possible dramas you may encounter? How can you prevent or manage these successfully? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Delivering The Goods

Great workers often demonstrate relaxed relentless. They are then more likely to flow on the way towards delivering the desired results. Let's look at one person who applied elements of this approach

Chris Hoy – Riding The Perfect Race

Chris Hoy, the Olympic cyclist, made a habit of setting big goals. Breaking these down into smaller targets, he focused on the step-by-step process of working to achieve these aims. This included visualising and riding the perfect race.

Chris gave an interview to Michael Johnson, who himself won four Olympic gold medals, for the video series Chasing Perfection.

In it he explained what he learned from working with Steve Peters, the psychiatrist who helps people to perform at their best. Here is a precis of what Chris said.

"I sought Steve's help because I wanted to improve. One trigger was what happened at the World Championships in 2003. Then I changed my strategy based on watching a rival's race and them doing an incredibly fast time.

"Instead of thinking that he was quick because of the track conditions - and therefore maybe we would all be quick - I changed the gears on my bike. I also attacked too hard at the start. This led to me dying off at the end and giving a really poor performance.

"Steve explained how he could and could not help.

"He said that it was not possible to suddenly become super human and conjure magical performances out of thin air.

"What it was possible to do, however, was to help me to do what I was fully capable of doing.

"It was also possible to help me to do this under the most extreme pressures."

"This would be particularly relevant in front of Olympic crowds where there might also be many distractions. For me it would be about focusing on my performance. Anything that was irrelevant and out of my control, forget it.

"The key would be hone in on the A-B-C process that I knew worked rather than worry about the outcome. If you perform at your best and focus on the process, the result will take care of itself."

He also describes how Steve prepared him to deal with potential challenges. Before one competition, for example, Steve asked him what he would do if one of his rivals went just before him and set a new world record.

Chris said that he did not want to think about such an issue. Steve explained that it was important to clarify how to respond to such challenges rather than ignore them.

Otherwise it is like somebody saying: "Don't think of a pink elephant." You immediately think of a pink elephant.

Steve urged him to practice how to take positive steps to deal with such potential issues. Chris explained this in the following way.

"Steve said that, from now on whenever you get a negative thought between now and the Games – there are only two weeks to go - I want you to visualise your race.

"It is only a minute long. Do it in real time, from the moment you are at the start gate. The count down, the deep breaths, the snap out of the gate, the first half lap. Visualise the whole race."

"I got to the race on the night itself and it seemed like Steve had some sort of crystal ball. I was to ride last. With four riders to go, including myself, the guy broke the world record.

"Three riders to go another guy broke the world record. The guy before me broke the world record again.

"Instead of panicking and changing my strategy, I was so focused on myself and getting my ride out.

Chris went on to ride his perfect race. He focused on the process, performed at his personal best and won the prize.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to do what you do best and follow your drive in the future.

How can you decide on the way forwards and dedicate yourself to this route? How can you follow the required disciplines? How can you, when appropriate, be daring? How can you deal with any dramas? How can you do your best to deliver the desired results?

The Carrot, Contract And Commitment Approach

There are many ways to encourage people to achieve specific goals. This is an approach that I have seen used by therapists, educators, coaches, leaders and people in other roles. It sounds basic but, when used respectfully, it can be effective.

The approach involves describing the carrot and the working contract. It then involves inviting people to decide if they wish to commit to doing their best to achieve the goals. Let's explore how this works in action.

The Carrot

The first step involves describing the carrot – such as the goals to achieve and the benefits. Different people describe this in different ways in different situations. Let's consider some examples.

The Leader's Approach

Some leaders describe a vision that people find inspiring. They may talk about having a dream, doing things that are insanely great or creating an ethical business that shows a better way.

Some leaders describe the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. Bringing this to life with examples, they work through the following framework.

The Purpose

The purpose of our team – the specific thing we want to do - is:

*

The positive benefits of achieving this purpose will be:

*

The Principles

The principles we want to follow when pursuing this purpose are:

The Picture Of Success

The picture of success – the specific things we want to achieve by ... - are:

Different leaders describe this in different ways. Whatever method they choose, the aim is to show people the big picture, the key strategies and the benefits of achieving the goals.

The Contract

The second step is to explain the contract. This involves describing the responsibilities of various people in working to achieve the goals. The leader may say something along the following lines.

The leadership team's responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals are:

The managers' responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals are:

The team members' responsibilities in working towards achieving the goals are:

The aim is to describe the attitudes and actions that people are encouraged to follow to work towards achieving the goals. It is also important to explain the reasons for following these principles to achieve success.

The Commitment

The third step is to invite people to decide if they want to commit to working towards achieving the goals. Different leaders do this in different ways.

Some leaders invite people to take time to reflect on whether they really want to take this step. They make sure that people know the pluses and minuses involved in doing the work. One leader expressed this in the following way.

"I want people to know the full picture – the pluses and minuses involved - before they commit.

"Providing I give them this information, is not my job to get them to get them to commit.

"It is their job to decide if they want to commit."

Such leaders then meet with the individuals who want to work towards achieving the goals. Bearing in mind the person's strengths, they make clear contracts about:

The specific contribution – the specific outcomes – the person will deliver towards achieving the goals;

The specific strategies they will follow and the specific support they need to achieve their contribution;

The specific things they will proactively do to keep people informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

The leader then meets with people on a regular basis. Bearing in mind the outcomes the team member aims to deliver, they encourage them to perform superb work and do their best to achieve the picture of success.

This is an approach I have seen work in teams. It is one that can also be used in other situations. Let's look at one example.

The Therapist's Approach

Imagine that you are a therapist and a client asks for your help. You will start by making them feel welcome and clarifying their goals. Different individuals will want to achieve different things. They may aim:

To give up drugs ... To take more control of their life ... To manage their emotions ... To feel more at peace ... To achieve other goals.

Bearing in mind their aims, it can be important to help them:

To set a positive goal;

To see the benefits of achieving the goal – this is the carrot.

It can also be useful for the person to recognise both: a) the upsides; b) the downsides involved in working towards achieving a goal. They can then decide if they are prepared to do what is required to achieve the prize.

Bearing these factors in mind, it can be good to spend a lot of time helping a person to see the benefits of achieving the goal. Some people will only change their lifestyle, for example, if there is a big enough carrot.

Imagine that a person is prepared to accept the whole package involved in working to achieve the goal. You may then move on to making a clear working contract. This may involve you explaining the following things.

My responsibilities as a therapist in helping you to work towards achieving your goal are:

Your responsibilities in working towards achieving your goal are:

Clear contracting is important in many areas of life. This is especially so in professional relationships. Many therapists therefore make clear working contracts when helping a client.

Imagine you have go to this point. You can then move on to the next step – commitment. Sometimes this involves revisiting some of the earlier themes. One approach is to encourage the client:

To clarify the specific goal they want to achieve;

To clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goal;

To clarify their commitment to doing their best to achieve the goal.

Different therapists clarify a person's commitment in different ways. One approach is to invite them to do the following exercise.

My Commitment

The extent to which I am motivated – on a scale 0-10 – to do what is required to achieve the goal is:

_____ / 10

The person's rating needs to be at least 7+/10. If appropriate, you can also encourage the person to focus on the specific things they can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Imagine that you have worked through these steps with a client. You can then help them to follow the strategies most likely to achieve their picture of success.

There are many ways to encourage people to work towards achieving a goal. One approach is to focus on the carrot, contract and commitment. This can be used when working with teams, individuals or even organisations.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Carrot, Contract And Commitment Approach

The specific situation where I may want to follow elements of this approach may be:

*The specific things I can do then to

The Establishing Credibility Approach

Credibility

Different people establish credibility in different ways. Here are some themes they can consider when exploring how to do this in their own way.

- Showing high professional standards and a pattern of achieving success.
- Showing specialist knowledge in the area in which people want to achieve success.
- Showing they understand people's aims and then using their strengths to help people to achieve success.

Different people focus on different challenges in their work. Some individuals want to explore the following themes.

"How can I establish credibility? How can I do this in my own way rather than try to be something I am not?"

The second point is vital. It is important for individuals: a) to be true to themselves; b) to build on their strengths; c) to help others to achieve success.

Some people aim to gain credibility by taking initiatives. They may volunteer their services and perform superb work. This helps them to build trust with potential customers or employers.

Some people aim to get credibility by gaining qualifications. Some aim to get it through self-promotion and bragging. Some aim to get it by trying to win arguments and proving they are Number One.

Looking back, when have you established credibility? You may have done this as a counsellor, teacher, nurse, engineer, leader, business owner, knowledge worker or expert in a specific field. What did you do then to establish credibility?

Imagine that you want to maintain credibility in the future. The following section explores some themes it may be useful to consider.

One key point is worth bearing in mind, however, when considering these themes. It is important to apply the approach that is most appropriate to the situation.

Many people workers, for example, actually start by focusing on the third theme that is described below. They aim to provide practical help that enables the client to get an early success. Getting a quick win helps to build confidence and lay the foundation for their future work together.

Bearing this in mind, here are the themes that it can be useful to consider.

Showing high professional standards and a pattern of success

Great workers realise they are always on stage. They recognise that other people are watching and will make judgements about what they do and deliver. They therefore maintain high professional standards.

Professionalism is a good starting point, but potential customers also want reassurance. They want to feel confident that the person offering the service has a track record of delivering the goods.

Potential clients want to know what a supplier will deliver – not just what they will do. They want more than a list of experiences and skills. So it can be useful to show a pattern of delivering success.

Different people do this in different ways. Some knowledge workers, for example, prefer to share what has worked - rather than try to sell - and also put people in touch with previous clients.

Showing specialist knowledge in the area in which people want to succeed

Great workers gain credibility by showing their expertise. They share their knowledge in ways that are informative rather than intimidating.

A good consultant, for example, may clarify a potential client's agenda and then share the possible options for going forwards. They may say something like the following.

"As far as I understand it, the goals you want to achieve are:

"To ...

"To ...

"To ...

"Some of the potential options for going forwards – together with the pluses and minuses of each approach – include the following.

"Option A is ... The pluses and minuses are ...

"Option B is ... The pluses and minuses are ...

"Option C is ... The pluses and minuses are ...

"Would you like to know more about each of these approaches? If so, I can give you more background and details."

Such workers demonstrate they know their subject in depth. They often bring the themes to life by moving from the concept to the concrete. They often say:

"Let me give you an example ..."

They give specific examples that the listener can relate to and can apply in their life or work. This builds confidence and shows that the worker knows their subject.

Showing you understand people's aims and using your strengths to help them to achieve success

Great workers recognise that people buy success rather than the theory of success. Bearing this in mind, they aim:

To clarify the real results the person – or a group of people – want to achieve;

To use their strengths do superb work, provide great service and find solutions to challenges;

To help the person – or the group of people - to achieve the desired results and, if appropriate, to achieve ongoing success.

Different people apply this approach in different ways, but the key is to deliver the goods. This helps to build a positive reputation.

Let's return to your own work. Looking to the future, what is the specific activity in which you may wish to develop or maintain credibility? How can you do this in a way that feels comfortable for you?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites to complete the following sentences.

The Managing Pressure Situations Approaches

There are many ways to do fine work. Some people focus on the specific activities where they play to their strengths and get pleasure from managing pressure situations.

Different people will do this in different situations. They may enjoy working in Accident & Emergency, playing sport at a high level or doing certain kinds of challenging activities.

Some people feel fully alive when working in what others see as pressure situations. Moving into action, they use their antennae to keep reading the situation and applying their abilities to achieve positive results.

They feel comfortable in certain kinds of pressure situations but not in others. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I feel alive and in control when doing certain kinds of work. It helps me to keep growing as a person and as a professional."

People who do good work in their chosen pressure situation often demonstrate the required character, competence and creativity. They apply these qualities to deliver the required concrete results. Sometimes they also add that touch of class.

Some people follow the mantra that is attributed to Billie Jean King. She saw playing in the final at Wimbledon as an opportunity. This led to her saying that sometimes pressure is a privilege.

Some people take another approach when embarking on doing work that could lead to prizes. They focus on the following mantra.

Managing Pressure When There Are Big Prizes At Stake

The only pressure is:

- To Be Positive;
- To Follow Your Principles;
- To Do Your Professional Best.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how they may follow this mantra in different situations.

They Aim To Be Positive

Such people choose to have a positive attitude. They focus on the possibilities and opportunities. They then aim to do their best in the situation.

They take this positive approach rather than worry about what some would see as pressures. When asked if they worry, they may then give the well-known response.

"Will it help if I worry? Probably not. So I aim to do my best when doing positive things and also when tackling potential challenges."

They play to their strengths and set positive goals. Bearing in mind what they can control, they clarify the real results to achieve. They then translate these into a clear picture of success. This leads to the next step.

They Aim To Follow Their Principles

Such people clarify the principles they want to follow to work towards achieving the goals. Different people may follow different principles in different situations. Here are some that some people mention.

Principles - The principles that I want to follow in my life or work are:

To build on my strengths ... To always do my best ... To encourage people ... To follow strategies that work ... To deliver high professional standards ... To focus on continuous improvement ... To do work that helps people or the planet.

They then focus on how they can follow their principles in a specific situation. This sometimes lead to the next step.

They Aim To Do Their Professional Best

Such people aim to do their professional best in the situation. Different people may do this in different situations.

They may focus on doing their professional best when they are aiming:

To counsel a troubled person ... To manage a specific crisis ... To perform in a sporting event ... To mediate in a conflict situation ... To perform a critical medical operation ... To defuse a bomb ... To tackle a daunting challenge.

They prepare properly. Moving into action, they are fully present and follow their chosen principles. They then do their professional best to achieve the picture of success.

Some people define this as doing their professional best rather than simply their personal best. One person expressed the reason for this in the following way.

"I often switch into professional role in certain situations and move into another dimension. I become alive, alert and use my antennae to focus fully on the task in hand.

"I tend to forget myself and, whilst still trying to be a compassionate person, clarify what needs to be done. I then do my professional best to achieve the picture of success."

There are many ways to manage pressure situations. One approach is to say that the only pressure is: a) to be positive; b) to follow your principles; c) to do your professional best.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Managing Multiple Challenges Approach

People sometimes face multiple challenges in their personal or professional lives. Some people take the following approach to managing such situations:

They manage themselves successfully;

They manage the first challenge successfully;

They move on to managing each of the other challenges successfully.

A person may take this approach in their personal life when managing several issues at once. They may take it in their professional life when working as a paramedic, a mediator, a crisis manager or in another role.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these principles into action.

They manage themselves successfully

Some people start by managing themselves properly when approaching a challenge. Depending on the kind of situation they may be facing, this can involve going through the following steps.

They manage themselves physically. They may rest, sleep or get into a certain physical condition. They aim to feel on top of their game when tackling the challenge.

They manage themselves psychologically. They have a positive attitude and focus on how they can manage their emotions on the way towards achieving their goal.

They manage themselves practically. They set things up to succeed by getting the required resources and putting in place the practical things that will increase the chances of achieving success.

People who take this approach may then choose to tackle certain kinds of pressure situations or challenges. They may take either of the following steps:

They may choose to proactively put themselves into challenging situations;

They may choose react to certain events by taking responsibility for tackling challenging situations.

Such people may display certain characteristics when managing themselves in certain situations. Let's look at one example.

People Who Defuse Bombs

Many people feel passionately about their work. Some individuals can work better, however, when managing their emotions. They are then more able to concentrate and be fully present when doing the work.

Bomb disposal experts, for example, often drain themselves of emotion and focus on the job in hand. This is especially so when advancing towards the device on what is known as 'the longest walk'.

Ed Chipperfield and James Day describe the qualities demonstrated by such workers in their article called What does it take to survive as a bomb disposal expert? Below are excerpts from the piece.

In a situation where the only outcomes are success or failure, psychologists say these soldiers require a certain mindset.

"We want people who minimise the unknowns," says Eugene Burke, a military psychologist.

"They're not impulsive but are able to make fast decisions, thanks to training. It's almost as though they're flicking through reference cards in their head to find a match to the problem in front of them.

"They're organised, focused on detail and think ahead to possible outcomes. Allowing stress to build up is not an option as the operative can become withdrawn and lose their temper."

Imagine that a person had done what they can to manage themselves successfully. They may then move on to the next stage.

They manage the first challenge successfully

They focus on the first challenge they want to tackle. They recognise, however, that it may also be necessary to manage other related issues.

They start by clarifying the real results to achieve. They then rehearse the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They also rehearse dealing with any problems they may encounter when working to achieve their goals.

They then move into action. Bearing in mind the results to achieve, they follow their chosen strategies. They also keep reading reality. They aim: a) to keep building on what is working; b) to tackle areas for improvement

Such individuals buy time to think when faced by unexpected problems. They then aim to find solutions, do their best to manage the challenge and achieve the desired results.

They take time to reflect after completing the work. They clarify: a) the specific things they did well; b) the specific things they could have done better and how; c) the specific lessons they can apply to tackle future challenges.

They move on to managing multiple challenges successfully

Some people move on to tackling multiple challenges. Such individuals may take the following steps:

They continue to manage themselves successfully;

They still focus on managing one challenge at a time – whilst managing any related issues – and manage the next challenge successfully;

They then emotionally box-off that challenge, move on to the next challenge and aim to manage it successfully.

Different people use different frameworks for following their principles when managing pressure situations. The following pages explore some of the models they may use when taking this approach.

The Professional Reframing Approach

Great workers sometimes reframe pressure situations as professional situations. This is an approach sometimes taken by first responders, medics, athletes and others in challenging professions.

Bearing in mind what they can control, some individuals take the following steps:

They channel their emotions by reframing the event as a professional situation.

They aim to prepare properly, be professional and do their best to achieve peak performance.

Different people follow these steps in different ways. One of the keys, however, is to channel their emotions in a positive way. Let's look at some examples.

First Responders

First responders in many professions learn how to stay calm and reframe situations. Virginia Duffy has helped many professionals to deal with difficult situations.

Below is an excerpt from her article Managing Emotions During Stressful Events. This piece describes how rescuers – such as firefighters, paramedics and others – can also care for themselves.

Remember emergency workers must deal with their own feelings first in order to best care for patients. Often we work on automatic and don't experience much emotion until the situation is over; then the emotions may flood us.

There are times however when the situation may feel overwhelming to us especially when it "hits close to home." The emotions felt by rescuers may include fear, anger, disgust, helplessness or the desire to leave.

Some strategies for dealing With your own emotions

Take a few seconds to think and calm yourself. Talk to yourself: "I can do this. I have done this before, just focus on the job."

Take a deep breath. Behaving as if you are calm will help to calm you. Force yourself to talk slow, move slow, be deliberate.

Direct your attention to the patient's most immediate concern. Once you are past your initial emotional response, you are usually home free. But also ask for help if you need it.

Doing Your Best In Sports

Great athletes care deeply about doing their best. Sometimes they can become anxious and perform badly, however, by caring too much about winning the prize.

Such athletes often use certain mantras to remind themselves of what they can do when performing in their version of the arena. They may say some of the following things.

Be calm, controlled and centred ... Keep following the process rather than worrying about the prize ... Try easy rather than try hard ... Flow, focus and finish.

Matthew Syed, the author of Bounce, gives an example of how this approach to perform at their best. Sarah Lindsay, the speed skater, took this step by maintaining perspective and following certain principles.

She spent years focusing on reaching the final of her event in the Winter Olympics. This called for beating her previous best performance. Sarah was seen preparing in the locker room before the final qualifying race saying the following things to herself.

"It's only speed skating. It's only speed skating. It's only bloody speed skating."

Sarah kept repeating the mantra. She then went out and performed beyond her previous best to reach the final.

Matthew goes on to describe how an athlete can overcome choking – continually failing to perform when it really matters.

As Mark Bawden, the sports psychologist who worked with Lindsay, put it:

"In order to make all the sacrifices necessary to reach world-class levels of performance, an athlete has to believe that performing well means everything."

"They have got to cleave to the belief that winning an Olympic gold is of life-changing significance. But that is precisely the belief that is most likely to trigger a choking response.

"So, the key psychological skill for someone with a tendency to choke is to ditch that belief in the minutes before competition and to replace it with the belief that the race does not really matter. It is a form of psychological manipulation, and it takes a lot of work to master."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a challenge that you can as reframe as a professional rather than a pressure situation?

How can you prepare properly for the situation? How can you behave in a professional way? How can you then do your best to achieve peak performance? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Putting Positive Pressure On Yourself Approach

Let's return to a variation of the model described at the beginning of this section. Some people choose to put positive pressure on themselves. They then aim to follow their principles and do their best to achieve peak performance.

We have explored these themes elsewhere in the book, so here is a brief overview. Such people often focus on the following themes.

Positive Pressure

Different people put positive pressure on themselves in different ways. Let's look at some examples.

A writer may set a date for finishing their manuscript. They may then tell their publisher that they complete it by that date. This may force them to follow a certain rhythm to finish the book.

A person may plan to be a certain weight on their wedding day. They may then follow a specific diet to make sure they can get into the clothes they have ordered for the big day.

A leadership team may choose to clarify the principles they want to follow in a company. They may then focus on how they can live these principles in their daily work. This is an approach we will explore later in this piece.

Different people have different motives for putting positive pressure on themselves. Whatever their reasons, some may then move on to the next stage.

Principles

Great workers, teams and organisations believe in following their principles. This can be relatively easy when things are calm. The hard part is following them in stormy weather. It can therefore be useful to test how to follow the principles in challenging situations.

One company I worked with took this approach. The senior team began by involving key people across the business in agreeing on the principles to follow in the future. These included the following:

Take Responsibility ... Be Professional ... Help People Succeed ... Deliver Great Results

The company held employee workshops where people explored how to translate these principles into action. It included this exercise.

The Principles Challenge

Choose a situation where it may be challenging to follow the principles.

Clarify the possible options for tackling the challenge together with the pluses and minuses of each option.

Clarify which of these possible options is the one where we can – as far as possible – follow our principles and translate these into action.

The employees threw themselves into the exercise and produced plans for tackling most scenarios. They did not consider one scenario, however, that soon presented the leader with a dilemma.

The Actual Challenge

One month after the workshop two senior staff members behaved in a way that violated the professional guidelines that had been communicated to staff.

The story about their behaviour spread across the company. People began to wonder if the company was serious about following the stated principles. The CEO had several options in the situation. Each option had pluses and minuses.

They could ignore the errant behaviour;

They could give the senior staff members a warning and hope it was a one-off;

They could show they were serious about following the principles and replace the senior staff members.

The CEO chose the third option. This surprised many people and created some short-term shocks, but it was beneficial in the medium to long-term. It showed they were serious about building and maintaining a positive and professional company.

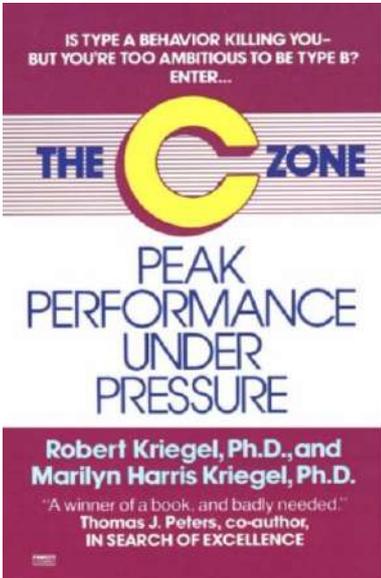

This highlights a key point. Great workers keep going back to their principles – which act as a guiding compass - especially during crises. This can lead to the next stage.

Peak Performance

Imagine that you have followed your chosen principles. You may then aim to follow these principles and do your best to achieve peak performance.

Different people do this in different ways. Some people follow the approach described by Robert Kriegel and Marilyn Harris Kriegel in their book The C Zone: Peak Performance Under Pressure.

People who take this route aim to be calm, controlled and centred. They then commit themselves to pursuing their chosen strategy to achieve their goals.

The C Zone is characterised by the following elements.

Being in control – by being prepared, skilled and effective;

Being confident – being prepared to dare and take initiatives without feeling overwhelmed;

Being committed – being prepared to do your best to achieve peak performance.

Some people have added their own C words to this approach. They aim to stay calm and focus on the following steps.

Control

They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They clarify what they can control in the situation. They then aim to build on what they can control and manage what they can't.

Clarity

They clarify the What – the real results they want to achieve. They clarify the How – the key strategies they can follow to achieve the results. They clarify the When – the action plan they will follow to achieve the results.

Concrete Results

They move into action. They pursue their chosen strategies but also keep reading reality. They build on what is working and tackle areas for improvement. They then do their best to achieve the desired results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to put positive pressure on yourself? How can you do this in your own way?

The Personal Best Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is to be the best you can be rather than what somebody else wants you to be. It is to play to your strengths, follow your principles and do your personal best. Let's explore how it is possible to follow these themes.

Playing To Your Strengths

This step involves doing what you do best. It involves building on your strengths, following your successful style and aiming to achieve your picture of success.

There are many ways to take this step. Here are some of the most common ways that people follow this approach. Many of these have been covered before in the book. So we will explore some in more depth than others.

The Strengths Approach

This is the classic approach to doing superb work. It is to focus on the specific activities where you build on your strengths, do satisfying work and achieve success.

The next step is to keep putting yourself into situations where you can do superb work. You can then keep improving on the way to fulfilling your potential. Here is an exercise on this theme.

The Sparks Approach

Peter Benson was a pioneer of this approach. Much of his work focused on helping children and teenagers but the principles he outlined can be applied to people of all ages.

He and his colleagues at the Search Institute focused on the times when young people came alive. Much of this work was around the theme of sparks. Peter described these in the following way.

"Children want to be known for their sparks."

"When you see these sparks in them, affirm them."

"A spark is something that gives your life meaning and purpose."

"It's an interest, a passion, or a gift."

"You shall know them by their sparks."

Peter looked for the good in everybody and everything. Whilst being a rigorous researcher, he conveyed his findings about people in a compassionate and inspiring way.

Joining the Search Institute in 1985, he played a key part in pioneering Positive Youth Development programmes across the world. Here is an extract from the Institute's web site.

Sparks are the hidden flames in kids that excite them and tap into their true passions. Sparks come from the gut. They motivate and inspire. They're authentic passions, talents, assets, skills, and dreams.

Sparks can be musical, athletic, intellectual, academic, or relational; from playing the violin to working with kids or senior citizens. Sparks can ignite a lifelong vocation or career, or balance other activities to create an emotionally satisfying, enriched life.

Sparks get kids going on a positive path, away from the conflicts and negative issues - violence, promiscuity, drugs, and alcohol - that give teens a bad name and attract so much negative energy.

Peter defined thriving as feeling fully alive, happy and, hopefully, giving to others. He described this approach in the article Thriving Starts On The Inside. Here are some excerpts.

The idea of spark is very much like the idea of spirit. The word spirit comes from Latin and means 'my breath, put into the world with vigour and courage.' Your breath, your essence, your spark.

Most of us, however, discover our spark between the ages of 10 and 20. You know it when you feel it. That is, you know it when you are doing something that makes you feel whole, when time stands still, when just doing it or being it is its own reward.

Being great at it or impressing people with it is not the point. Just knowing it, affirming it and putting it into play is the point.

Youth, when talking about their spark, almost always use romantic language in describing it. They say things like, "I love it when I'm playing the piano," or "I cherish the moments each day when I can help someone."

Thriving starts on the inside, with the knowledge and affirmation of your spark and the courage to put it into play. That's how we fall in love with life. The spark is a seed waiting to find fertile soil and a chance to flower. Name it. Love it. Use it to light up our world.

Peter died at the age of 65 in 2011. The Search Institute described him in the following way.

An inspiring leader who devoted his own life to making the world a better place for families, schools and communities.

Neal Starkman also provided a view of Peter's work. Writing on his blog, he paid the following tribute.

Peter Benson

What Peter Benson did that was so significant was to shift the way educators think about young people.

Rather than focusing on what's wrong with kids and trying to 'fix' them, he zeroed in on what was right with kids and tried to support them.

This is Peter Benson's important legacy: a way of looking at our nation's future in terms of strengths, not deficits; a way of treating young people not as problems but as resources.

People demonstrate sparks throughout their lives. During a workshop for 40 people, for example, I asked each of them to make a flip chart of the following exercise.

They put these around the walls, filling the whole room with their sparks. This provided lots of information for them to build on during the session and afterwards with their families. Here is the exercise.

The Sweet Spot Approach

This is an approach that can be used by individuals, teams and organisations. It encourages people to build on their strengths, do satisfying work and make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

The sweet spot concept stems from sport. Since then it has been applied to many other areas of life. Here are some definitions.

The point or area on a bat, club, or racket where it makes most effective contact with the ball.

The particular situation or combination of things that is the best and most effective possible.

The spot where you do something that may appear effortless but sometimes produces the most effective results.

Some elements of this approach have been used in career development workshops since the 1960s. It encourages individuals to do what they do best and make their best contributions to a team or organisation.

The approach is obviously related to the Japanese concept of Ikigai. But it does not necessarily cover their purpose, vocation or mission on the planet. When appropriate, however, these are themes I sometimes explore with a person. This involves focusing on the following themes.

Strengths. The specific activities where they do superb work.

Satisfying Work. The specific activities where they do satisfying work.

Specific Contribution. The specific contribution they can make towards helping people, the team or the organisation to achieve success.

Over the past fifty years I have worked with many people who have used this approach. The follow section describes some of these individuals.

Jack – Being A Specialist

Jack was unhappy in his role as Chief Operation Officer for a worldwide digital company. He had risen through the ranks by being good at solving technical problems and developing software.

Being ambitious, he was delighted when offered the COO role. This came with status – being a member of the C Suite – a pay rise and a number of shares. Unfortunately the role also involved certain aspects that did not play to his strengths. He was expected:

To manage multiple problems that often involved fire-fighting;

To deal with emotional issues as well as technical issues;

To manage people who had lower quality standards than himself and also be on duty 24/7.

Jack also had a young family and felt stretched. This led to him occasionally having outbursts that did not help himself or others. He was quite traditional in some ways. Whilst recognising it would be good for him to revert to a specialist role, he did not want a drop in status.

He and the CEO explored ways he could play to his strengths and also help the company to achieve success. This eventually led to him taking an individual specialist role. This involved him being able:

To do specific project work with certain departments across the world;

To develop pacesetting technical solutions that helped their clients to achieve success;

To maintain his shares and salary but only attend the C-Suite meetings when appropriate.

This proved to be a win-win. The company got the best use of his skills and it resulted in getting increased orders from the customers with whom he worked. Jack was able to do stimulating work, set specific goals and deliver success. This also benefited both his family.

Anna – Being A Chief People Officer

Anna had spent a number of years doing freelance work. Previously a head of HR, she had done projects helping companies to shape their cultures. She found this relatively fulfilling but missed leading a team.

Bearing in mind her strengths, she took a proactive approach to finding a full-time role that would be more satisfying. This led to one of her previous managers – who was now a CEO – asking her to consider joining their company as the Chief People Officer.

Such a role calls for a person demonstrating certain strengths in order to deliver success. They need to be able:

To clarify the CEO's philosophy, principles and picture of success regarding the company's people strategy;

To communicate this approach and lead a HR team that successfully implements the key principles regarding the company's people's strategy;

To embody the ethic of continuous improvement and continue to deliver the company's people strategy.

Anna scored at least 8/10 in each of these areas. Working alongside the CEO, she implemented a strategy that enabled employees to develop a people and as professionals.

There are many ways to apply the sweet spot approach. You can use it:

To clarify how you can continue to do satisfying work;

To help other people – such as your children, friends or customers – to do satisfying work;

To help people in your team or organisation to do satisfying work and make their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe how you may want to use elements of the sweet spot approach. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Pattern Recognition Approach

Pattern Recognition

Pattern recognition is one of the keys to peak performance. Great workers have the ability:

- To recognise both the successful and unsuccessful patterns;*
- To recognise the consequences of the successful and unsuccessful patterns;*
- To build on the successful patterns and manage the consequences of the other patterns.*

Great workers are good at seeing patterns in the areas in which they excel. Going into a situation, they clarify the results to achieve. They then scan the situation and take the following steps.

They look for how people are behaving or what is actually happening;

They look for both successful and unsuccessful patterns;

They look for how it is possible to build on the successful patterns and manage the unsuccessful patterns.

Great workers sometimes use this framework. They may look for different things, however, depending on whether they aim to see patterns followed by people or patterns in other situations. Here are some of the themes they may explore.

Seeing Patterns In People

Great workers may ask some of the following questions when looking for patterns followed by people.

- What is their picture of success? What are the real results the person or the group of people want to achieve in the situation? How are they actually behaving in the situation?
- What are their successful patterns? What are they doing that will help them to achieve their goals? What are their unsuccessful patterns? What are they doing that will not help them to achieve their goals? What are the consequences of their patterns?
- How can they build on their successful patterns? How can they manage their unsuccessful patterns? What else can they do to achieve their picture of success?

Seeing Patterns In Situations

Great workers may ask some of the following questions when looking for patterns in situations.

- What is the picture of success? What are the real results to achieve in the situation? What is actually happening? What are the patterns? What are the things that are happening again and again?
- What are the successful patterns and unsuccessful patterns? What are the things that are working and not working? What are the consequences? What will happen if these patterns continue?
- How can I build on the successful patterns? How can I manage the unsuccessful patterns? What else can I do to achieve the picture of success?

Such workers actually look at what is happening rather than rush into interpreting events. They then use their skills to deliver success.

Different people apply these skills in different situations. One mentor explained their approach in the following way.

"I used to do lots of team workshops. Whilst these often helped people to deliver results, I realised that I was better doing individual mentoring sessions."

"During the one-to-one meetings I found it relatively easy to find people's successful and unsuccessful patterns. I was then able to provide them with tools they could use to achieve their goals."

Some people are good at recognising patterns in counselling situations; some in technical situations; some in sporting situations. Some people are good at seeing patterns in financial and investments situations. They then aim to use their skills to deliver success.

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the situations in which you are good at seeing patterns? These could be when you are working with people or entering another kind of situation.

How can you put yourself into more of these in the future? How can you continue to build on your skills and deliver success in these situations? What will be the benefits of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences. We will then move on to the next step involved in performing to your potential.

Imagine that you have focused on a specific activity where you can play to your strengths. If appropriate, you may want to set specific goals and move into action.

There are many ways to take this step. One approach is to focus on following your principle's. Let's explore this theme.

Principles

Great workers often build on their strengths and translate these into setting a specific goal. They then aim to follow their chosen principles and do superb work on the way towards achieving their picture of success.

Such people then aim to do their best. Charles Garfield inspired people to follow this approach. Writing in his books Peak Performers and Second to None, he encouraged people to become the best they could be. He wrote:

"Do not compete with anyone except yourself."

He said it is vital for people to work towards a compelling purpose. He saw this when working as a computer analyst and leading engineers, scientists and staff on the Apollo 11 project.

Charles also founded the Shanti Project. This is a volunteer organisation that focuses on delivering service excellence for patients and families facing life-threatening illness.

Alongside this he worked as a clinical professor at the University of California Medical School in San Francisco. Charles said he first heard the phrase peak performance from a cancer patient who said:

"Staying alive these days is my peak performance."

He remembered the phrase and went on to study great workers in many fields. These included people in medicine, sports, business and the NASA work in which he was participating.

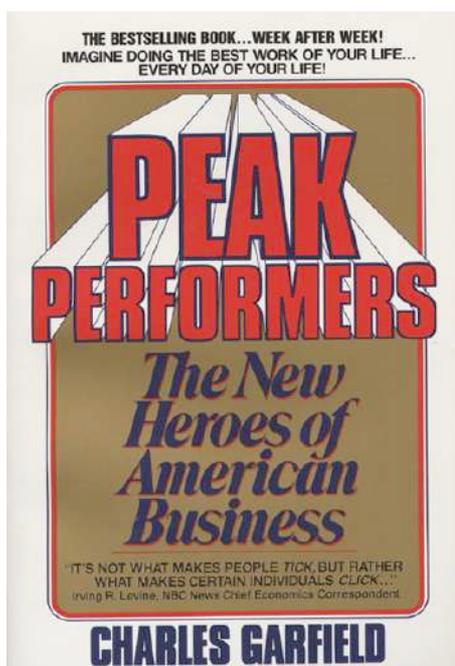

Charles said that towards the end of the 1970s he discovered a common trigger for peak performance. People were often motivated to follow certain principles.

They then translated this into pursuing a mission that gave them a sense of purpose. The key factor, said Charles, was for them to make an internal decision to perform at their best. He wrote:

Now I began to understand what I was hearing and seeing, as one peak performer after another spoke of self-training, learning by experience, organizing that experience around a single theme, speaking and finding a purpose, a personal mission that represents something important.

They want to feel proud of themselves, to achieve something, to leave a mark and a contribution, and they follow their plans for doing all that purposefully and tenaciously. That is what I – and many others I knew – wanted.

So peak performers are not merely exceptions. They represent a kind of person any of us can be – once we find the capacity in ourselves.”

"The mission of the individual needs to align with the mission of the team, which needs to align with the mission of the organization.

"In fact, I would take it further - the mission of the organization needs to align with the mission of the society in which it is embedded and the mission of the planet to which we are all indebted."

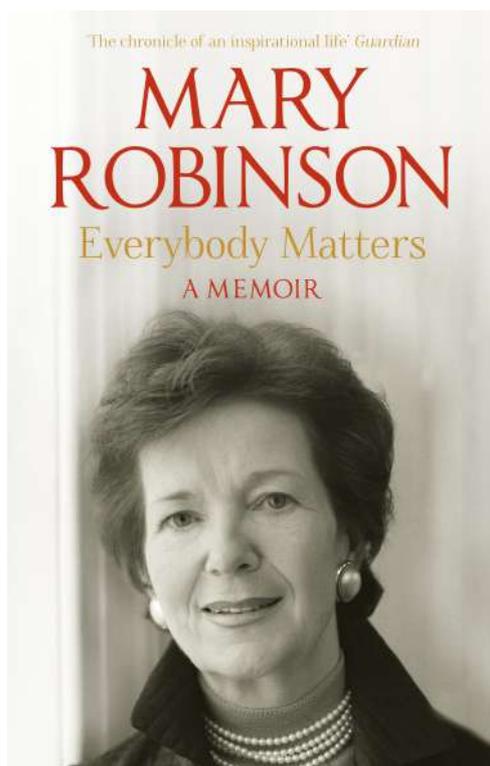

Different people follow different principles. Here are some that people may mention when describing those they want to follow in their work.

My Principles – The Principles I Want To Follow In My Work Are:

To encourage other people ... To create positive environments in which people can grow ... To create beauty .. To deliver high quality work ... To pass on knowledge that helps people to succeed.

Different people follow their principles in different ways. Mary Robinson, the former President of Ireland, believes in following the principle of kindness.

Whether the person is poor or a President, she shows warmth and tries to make the person feel the centre of her world. Mary explained this approach in her book Everybody Matters. This is followed by the official description of the book.

"People I admire have two qualities: a kind of simplicity, and generosity of spirit.

"It seems to me that the more impressive people are in what they have done, the simpler they tend to be in how they talk to you, or in what they say or write."

"The aim of human rights is to move beyond thinking and talking about the foundations stones - to laying those foundation stones, inch by inch, together."

The first woman President of Ireland, who became UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, Mary Robinson has spent her life in pursuit of a fairer world.

Now, for the first time, she reveals what lies behind the vision, strength and determination that has helped her to achieve so much for human rights around the globe.

She describes the upbringing which gave her a strong sense of values and how she came into painful conflict with her parents - marrying against their wishes and, later, helping to legalise contraception in a deeply Catholic Ireland.

As a barrister she won landmark cases advancing the causes of women and the marginalised against the prejudices of the day. When - to the surprise of many - she became the first woman President of Ireland in 1990, she put Ireland firmly on the international stage.

Accepting the position of UN High Commissioner for Human Rights in 1997 was her biggest challenge and here she describes the huge political difficulties she encountered among the many triumphs.

Subsequently, based in New York, she led Realizing Rights for eight years, pioneering how to implement in practice economic and social rights: working in African countries on health, decent work, corporate responsibility and women's empowerment in peace and security.

Mary now heads her Climate Justice foundation and works on behalf of the millions of poor people most affected by climate change.

Told with the same calm conviction and modest pride that has guided her life, Everybody Matters will inspire everyone who reads it with the belief that each of us can, in our own way, help to change the world for the better.

Personal Best

Great workers often aim to have a positive attitude, follow their principles and do their personal best. Different people do this in different ways. The following pages describe two people I have worked with who took this approach

Jacqui Smith – The Birth Of Homesmiths

Jacqui uses her talents to create interior design for houses, care homes and retirement living. The following piece is one that Jacqui wrote many years ago. She and I met on a career development programme I ran for a travel company during the 1990s.

During our meetings we focused on her vocation. This was to create enriching environments. The following section describes how she moved from the marketing role she was doing to co-founding HomeSmiths with her husband David.

They started by doing work for friends and family on the weekends before going full-time. HomeSmiths has now been going for 20 years and moves from strength to strength.

Jacqui is now also a Regional Director for The Society of British & International Interior Design and Chair of the Haywards Heath Dementia Action Alliance.

Below is a recommendation from one of Homesmiths' clients. It describes how they helped with the design of a Dementia Unit.

HOME
SMITHS

Welcome to HomeSmiths Interior Design

At HomeSmiths, we offer a range of interior design services to private residential clients, care home operators, providers of social housing and property developers.

"We called in HomeSmiths to design our soon to be opened Dementia unit and they provided us with an excellent service.

"We gave them a brief stipulation of the kind of environment we wanted to create and they came back to us with a superb bespoke design.

"They decided to theme it around famous local people – actors, cooks, and singers – and tied it all into the musical name of the unit."

"The result is a unit with a peaceful atmosphere with iconic photos and art that helps to stimulate our residents and aid in their memory recall.

"The tactile displays they installed are works of art in themselves: collages that depict different scenes whilst being a mix of vibrant colours and various fabrics.

"Furthermore, they were efficient and a pleasure to work with both on and off site.

"We are extremely impressed with HomeSmiths and would recommend them to anyone that could make use of their services."

The Birth of 'HomeSmiths'

As a child I could spend hours creating room sets for my dolls, fiddling with doll's house furniture, making camps for my brother to play in or rearranging my bedroom.

Whilst I followed art and excelled at it through my childhood and teens, my school was fiercely academic. So when it came to 'A' Level choices, Art was dropped in favour of Economics, Maths and German!

University followed and I gained a degree in Economics and Maths. Having little clue of what I wanted to do, I found myself in sales and marketing, which is where I stayed for some years.

Feeling unfulfilled with my work, job changes ensued but I was never really addressing the root problem. Sales and marketing were not playing to my strengths.

This left a whole host of skills and, more importantly, passions untapped. Outside work I was continuing with more creative pursuits, such as designing room schemes for myself as well as friends and family.

But I never thought of doing this for a living, telling myself:

"I'm not trained in Interior Design – how could I make money from this and why would anyone take me seriously?" Imposter syndrome was real!

Despite constant encouragement from friends, I remained unhappy in the corporate world. I then attended a two-day workshop aimed at helping people to make a living doing what they loved.

Focusing on my passions, talents, dreams and goals threw up a common theme which simply read as:

'Creating enriching environments.'

My husband David, a cabinet maker, had always wanted to run his own business - yet possessed none of the required sales, marketing or organisational skills. We also knew that one day we would set up on our own business.

David continued to design and make furniture in the short to medium term. In the longer term, however, he wanted to get more involved in bigger interior design projects.

I wanted to help people enrich their living environments with colour and texture - plus take on the challenge of running a business. A brainstorm and a bottle of wine later 'HomeSmiths' was born.

The name offers so much flexibility in terms of what we offer our clients. As our business has evolved over the years from residential and show home design to now predominantly care home and retirement living design, the brand works as well now as it did when we started.

When we started the business, the response from our immediate network was tremendous. Not only did people believe in the proposition, but truly believed in David and my ability, through our combined talents, to deliver.

Starting the business when our first child was four months old, people thought we were mad - but staying in our old roles was so much more frightening!

It has been hard work and we are still a young business, but we are building our reputation.

We work together incredibly well. Whilst David no longer makes furniture, he designs all the bespoke pieces for our projects and is responsible for managing our projects.

I lead on the design side and also the strategy and business planning. I always say that I could not run the business without David nor could he without me. It's a great partnership that really works.

One lesson I learned on the workshop all those years ago was to network but, most of all, to give something back to people in your network.

So true and such a simple and cost effective way to grow a business! I can cite about ten key networking encounters which have shaped where we are today.

I believe that challenges also shape us. In 2012 I permanently lost the sight in my left eye.

Determined to combine my personal experience of sight loss with my profession, I have specialised in how the built environment can support people living with sensory and or cognitive decline.

I cannot think of a better interpretation of Mike's observation at that workshop over 20 years ago, that my best work would focus around creating enriching environments. That is now exactly what I do.

I am evangelical about doing work you love and as a mother will certainly encourage my children to follow their natural paths in life and work.

Sue's Story – Aiming To Be A Good Parent

Sue Carter chose to shape her life in a positive way. In 1970 she came to the therapeutic community I was running for young people. Abandoned by her mother at the age of 2, she had grown up suffering abuse in institutions.

The community gave young people the chance to shape their futures. Sue recognised she was at a crossroads and began pursuing her chosen route.

In 2005, quite out of the blue, she emailed me to describe her journey over the past three decades. Sue was always feisty, which shines through her story.

Visited later in life by the Essex police who were investigating events at the children's homes, the police asked if she was a victim of abuse. Sue declared:

"No, I am a survivor of abuse."

Here is the piece she wrote about her journey.

My Aim To Be A Good Parent

My mother abandoned me and my two sisters in the park when I was two. During the next 14 years I moved from one children's home to another.

Sometimes I was abused but I did not know anything else, so I thought it was normal. One housefather kept hitting me with his belt, so I yelled:

"Why are you hitting me?"

He said it was because I needed to show him respect. I yelled back:

"I'm not going to respect you if you keep hitting me."

So he hit me harder.

One day I found myself in an institution that was famous for holding a girl who had killed a child. Looking back, I now realise that the only way I had kept my sanity was by rebelling, but it had got me into trouble.

Things looked bad, but then I got the chance to go to a community where young people like me had the opportunity to change their lives.

Over 30 years later I now have three sons and a wonderful granddaughter, who is the apple of my eye. The 30 years in-between have sometimes been difficult, but never dull.

After leaving the community I met a man and travelled around the world. Returning home, I began working in a children's home.

Growing up in institutions myself, I knew what the children needed and tried to help them to feel safe and loved. Even if I say it myself, I found that I was good with children.

During my twenties I had several long relationships and eventually got married.

Unfortunately my husband tried to control me. Even if I was going to Sainsbury's, he wanted to know what I was doing. I was never one to let anyone control me, so end of marriage.

Eventually I realised that I didn't have good relationships with men because I tested them to the limit. So I wasn't shocked when they didn't reach my expectations. And, of course, I also made some bad choices.

My greatest fear as a parent was that my kids could end up in care. So I then decided to be the best single parent I could be.

This meant relationships with men were out. I stayed on my own with the boys for the next 18 years.

Then I met a good man with whom I had a child. Even though the man and I have now parted, we are still good friends and he is a good father.

Looking back at my time in the community, I am so happy that I was given the opportunity to meet people who taught me it was okay to talk about things.

So much pain was bottled up inside me from the years spent in care and the abuse that I and my sisters suffered. I was one of the lucky ones.

I found a way to confront my demons, talk about them and they stopped hurting.

About 10 years ago my sisters and I were contacted by the police about the abuse we experienced in children's homes.

The police came to my house and met with me and my sisters and asked if we were victims of abuse. I stood up, faced the policeman and said:

"NO, I AM A SURVIVOR OF ABUSE."

Then I realised I had got rid of my demons. Some people never get the chance to rid themselves of past problems.

Looking back, the community showed there were people who could look after kids, value their opinions and not resort to abuse.

The community made us feel safe and we never betrayed that trust. Some newcomers tried to bring drugs into the house, but we said:

'Don't bring that stuff here. If you want to take drugs, leave the community.'

Sometimes we had fantastic talks. There would be eight of us sitting in a bedroom till midnight, just sharing thoughts we had never discussed with anybody before.

Every young person in the community had suffered problems. We encouraged each other to talk about the past, but didn't allow each other to use it as an excuse for behaving badly.

If I said, 'My mother left me in the park when I was two,' somebody else said: 'I can top that. How can you use that bad experience to help others in the future?'

Suddenly I realised that I didn't have to go on the path I was hurtling along, which would probably have led to drugs or prison.

The people in the community believed in us and my feelings mattered. Someone listened when I was screaming. What could be more wonderful than that?

Nowadays I try to help other people by volunteering to work at the local hospice. But the thing I am most proud of is being a good parent to my children.

Different people choose different ways to do their personal best. The following pages describe exercises that people can use to follow this approach.

The Positive History Approach

This is an approach used in sports and other fields. It invites a person to learn from their positive history and go through the following steps.

The Positive History Approach

*The specific piece

*The specific situation in the past when I did my

The Positively Engaged Approach

People often do their best work when they are positively engaged rather than partly engaged or pretend engaged. This sounds obvious but it can be important to recognise your different levels of engagement. Let's explore these themes.

Positively Engaged

What are the activities in which you feel positively engaged? Different people give different answers to this question. Here are some of the things they mention.

I feel positively engaged when I am:

Encouraging certain kinds of people ... Playing the piano ... Cooking nutritious food ... Working in my garden ... Doing interior design ... Solving technical problems ... Working in the hospice.

What do you do right when you are positively engaged? You may aim to prepare properly. Moving into action, you may feel alive and alert. You may then use your whole being to focus fully on the situation and work towards the desired picture of success.

Let's assume you have begun to focus on where you are positively engaged. It may also be useful to recognise another experience.

Partly Engaged

When do you feel partly engaged? Sometimes you are interested, sometimes you are not. The feeling is:

"I could be spending my time doing something more worthwhile."

How do you behave then? What are the consequences – for you and for other people – when you behave this way? Let's explore some of your options.

You can try to avoid putting yourself into situations where you feel partly engaged but sometimes this can be difficult. Bearing this in mind, how can you manage the situation?

One approach is to plan ahead and decide how you want to behave in the situation. If appropriate, it is to ask yourself:

How can I be professional? How can I play a positive role and support other people? How can I make a positive contribution in the situation?

This can work for a while. But you will need to prepare properly and rehearse how you will behave in the situation. Sometimes you may need to buy time and not react to triggers that can send you into a negative spiral.

Pretend Engaged

What are the activities in which you feel pretend engaged? You may feel uncomfortable, unreal and must make a real effort to appear professional.

Something bugs you. Maybe it is the values of the people or the company. Maybe you don't believe in what they are doing.

Nevertheless, you summon-up energy to do your best. But afterwards you may get headaches or other symptoms. Continually putting yourself in these situations can have consequences for your health.

Being Positively Engaged In The Future

Imagine that you want to focus on the activities where you feel positively engaged. Taking this step sometimes required planning. One manager described how they tackled this challenge.

"Looking back at my work pattern, I found that I felt positively engaged only 20% of the time. This was having an effect on both my personal and professional life. Looking to the future, I decided to do three things.

"First, to list the activities in which I felt positively engaged. These included selling to certain kinds of customers. Second, to spend more time doing these things. Third, to show the business case for doing these things by getting some quick wins.

"This approach proved successful. I began to put together the high points like a string of pearls across the week. Within six months I was spending 80% of my week doing stimulating work that brought benefits to the company.

"There are still some meetings where I feel partly engaged, but I try to be professional and make a positive contribution. I feel much happier in both my personal and professional life."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, how can you put yourself into more of the situations where you feel positively engaged? What may be the be the benefits– both for yourself and other people?

The Playing Your A Game Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is to focus on a specific activity where you have the ability to do superb work.

You can then aim to prepare properly. Moving into action, you can be positively engaged rather than partly engaged or pretend engaged. You then aim play your A game on the way towards achieving your picture of success.

Looking back, can you recall a situation when you played your A game rather than your B game or C game? What did you do to perform at your best? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Imagine that you want to follow similar principles in the future. Let's consider how you can make this happen.

Some of these themes we have explored in depths elsewhere in the book, so we will only touch briefly on those. Others we will consider if greater depth.

You Can Focus On A Specific Activity Where You Can Do Superb Work

What is the specific activity where you want to do superb work? You may be playing a particular role - such as a career, educator, leader, mediator, host, trusted advisor, scientist or another role.

You may be doing a particular project. You may be doing a task, playing a sport, performing on stage, building a house, designing a piece of software or doing another project.

You may be working in a pressure situation. You may be tackling a challenge, finding solutions to a problem, performing a surgical operation or working in another pressure situation.

Imagine that you have chosen to focus on a specific activity. You can then move on to the next stage.

You Can Prepare Properly

You will prepare properly in your own way. Sometimes it can be useful, however, to incorporate some of the steps taken by great workers.

Such workers prepare properly and set things up to succeed. They follow this discipline whether they aim to climb a mountain, lead a team or do a particular project.

Bearing in mind what they can control, they clarify the real results to achieve. They also clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

Great workers rehearse everything before tackling a challenge. Sometimes they do the physical rehearsal, sometimes they do mental rehearsal. Sometimes they do both. They often do the following things.

They rehearse pursuing the key strategies they will follow to achieve the goals;

They rehearse managing the challenges they may face on the way towards achieving the goals;

They again rehearse pursuing the key strategies they will follow to do their best to achieve the goals.

You will follow your own routine for preparing properly. You can then aim to be positively engaged and move on to the next step.

You Can Do Your Best To Play Your A Game

Different people have different versions of what it means to play their A game. Some sports coaches, for example, encourage their athletes to focus on being the best they can be.

A sprinter may aim to win an Olympic Gold Medal, for example, but recognise that this could be influenced by factors beyond their control. They could suffer injuries, compete against better athletes or experience unexpected setbacks.

Bearing this in mind, they will focus on what they can control. They may describe their goals in the following way.

Playing My A Game

The specific things I can do to keep playing my A game during the Olympics are:

To prepare properly both physically and psychologically;

To be fully present, follow my principles and translate these into action every day;

To be able to look back in the future and say that I did everything possible to perform at my personal best during the Olympics.

The sprinter will translate their aims into daily, weekly and monthly targets. They will then follow daily disciplines on the way towards achieving their long-term goal.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation when you may want to play your A game? How can you prepare properly? How can you be positively engaged? How can you then do your best to play your A game? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Expanding Your Comfort Zone Approach

Choosing To Expand Your Comfort Zone

There are many ways to develop. One approach is for a person to choose to expand their comfort zone.

They may do this by setting a stimulating goal, stretching themselves and doing their best to achieve success.

Some people aim to develop by continuing to expand their comfort zone. Many people urge others to develop by saying to them:

"You need to get out of your comfort zone."

This sounds okay, but it depends on what is meant by comfort zone. Let's consider the following examples.

Person A feels comfortable when they are doing their best. Should they try to develop by not doing their best and in this way feeling uncomfortable?

Person B is comfortable when running inspiring seminars for positive people who want to learn. Should they aim to be uncomfortable by working with unmotivated people who don't want to learn?

Person C feels comfortable when acting as a First Responder and managing crises that others find difficult. Should they try to develop by being uncomfortable when sitting at a desk and doing boring jobs?

What does somebody actually mean when they say that an individual needs to get out of their comfort zone? Maybe the message they want to get across is something like the following.

"The person needs to show more urgency. They need to stretch themselves and work harder if they want to fulfil their potential."

Another approach is for a person to build on and expand their comfort zone. The novice mountaineer stretches themselves by climbing increasingly difficult mountains.

They do not immediately move from tackling small climbs to scaling Everest. Certainly they would be out of their comfort zone – and they may succeed – but it is more likely to end in tragedy.

Comfort Zones
You Feel Comfortable When: You are doing your best You are following your principles You are playing to your strengths and following your successful style of working You are doing superb work You are continuing to develop and expand your comfort zone	You Don't Feel Comfortable When: You aren't doing your best You aren't following your principles You aren't playing to your strengths and following your successful style of working You aren't doing superb work You aren't continuing to develop and expand your comfort zone

As mentioned earlier, sometimes it is important keep building on and expanding our comfort zone. This is particularly the case, for example, if we are comfortable doing our best.

Let's look at how this approach works in practice. Imagine that a person has decided to improve their wellbeing by taking up running.

The person will not suddenly leap from their sedentary lifestyle into trying to run a marathon. Certainly that will involve going out of their comfort zone, but there may also be lots of collateral damage.

The person may choose instead to start by walking and jogging for short distances. They will then increase their running distances in a sustainable way.

They may enter half marathons followed by full marathons. Eventually they may run several marathons in succession. They will build up slowly and expand their comfort zone.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. It may be useful to focus on the following themes.

You Can Set A Stimulating Goal

You can choose a specific activity where you want to stretch yourself set a stimulating goal. The goal you set should be one where, providing you do your best, you have a good chance of success.

You Can Stretch Yourself

You can stretch yourself when doing the activity. This may involve stretching yourself physically, psychologically or even philosophically. It can mean going into new creative dimensions where you add to your repertoire.

You Can Do Your Best To Achieve Success

You can plan ahead, prepare properly and rehearse following your chosen principles when doing the activity. It will then be time to do superb work, keep improving and do your best to achieve success.

There is another approach to expanding comfort zones. Sports coaches, for example, talk about the idea of helping athletes to get used to positive discomfort.

This can involve doing new things, changing routine or dealing with challenging situations. Such coaches throw the occasional curve ball during practice.

This could be a new experience, a surprise or a challenge. The athletes can then learn to adapt, make decisions and perform at their best. This can help them to expand the situations in which they feel comfortable.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of an activity where you may want to expand your comfort zone?

How can you do this in your own way? How can you set a stimulating goal, stretch yourself and do your best to achieve success? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Comfort, Clarity And Class Approach

This approach involves focusing on the specific activities where you feel comfortable. This can also mean stretching yourself and expanding this zone. It is then to focus on clarity and delivering top class work. Let's explore these themes.

Comfort

Great workers often put themselves into places where they feel comfortable. They feel confident that they can play to their strengths, pursue strategies that work and do their best to deliver success.

Such workers pursue the activities where they are in their element – at ease and yet able to excel. They also have the following qualities;

They have the competence to do fine work;

They have the ability to deal with crowdedness – many different things happening at once;

They have the desire to focus on continuous improvement.

Different people do this in different activities. They may be helping troubled people, fixing technical problems, playing a sport or performing on stage. They may be climbing mountains, doing surgery, solving conflicts or doing another activity.

Such people give different reasons for feeling comfortable when pursuing their chosen activity. They may describe it as being in their sweet spot. They may say, for example:

"I feel at home there ... I feel stimulated when looking forward to the activity ... I feel alive when doing the work ... I love to stretch myself and deliver success."

People who take this approach often start by exploring the activities that give them positive energy. After a while, however, they may focus on the activity where they can move from 7/10 towards 10/10.

A musician may begin by playing many instruments. They may then find the one where they feel most at ease and in their element. They may then aim to become the best kind of performer they can be with that instrument.

A psychologist may begin by exploring many ways of working with people. They may come a point, however, when they decide to do in-depth work on positive psychology, helping people recover from trauma in another niche area. They then aim to keep improving in that field.

A management consultant may be in a major consultancy firm and work with many different clients. They may eventually realise they work best with entrepreneurs, for example, rather than people in big organisations. They may then set up their own business working with such entrepreneurs.

Great workers also highlight one of the key themes regarding feeling comfortable when doing their chosen work.

They only feel comfortable when they are doing their best and continuing to develop;

They don't feel comfortable when they are not doing their best or not developing.

Great workers can develop by expanding their comfort zone. But we need to be clear on what this means. Many people urge others to behave in a certain way by saying the cliché:

"You need to get out of your comfort zone."

This sounds okay but it ignores the approach taken by many people who do superb work.

They only feel comfortable when:

They are following their principles ... They are doing their best ... They are delivering high quality work ... They helping people to succeed ... They are continuing to improve.

Great workers would feel uncomfortable not doing these things. They may aim to continue developing, however, by setting stimulating goals, stretching themselves and working to achieve success. They may then expand their comfort zone.

Imagine that such a worker has put themselves into a place where they feel comfortable and continue to develop. They then move on to the next theme.

Clarity

Great workers go into a situation in which they excel and quickly gather information. They may then do some of the following things to establish clarity.

Great Workers Establish Clarity

They go into a situation in which they excel and aim:

- To clarify the specific things that are happening in the situation and also to see the big picture;
- To clarify the short, medium and long-term real results to achieve – the picture of success;
- To clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

This approach to establishing clarity is described in more detail elsewhere in the book. For example, you can find it in the piece about The Decision Making, Doing And Delivering Approach. Bearing this in mind, we will move on to the next stage.

Imagine that a person has clarified the strategies they aim to follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. This takes us to the next theme.

Class

Great workers aim to translate their strategies into action. They sometimes do this by focusing on consistency, creative and class. Let's explore these themes.

Consistency

Such workers aim to deliver consistently high standards. They aim to do this whether performing at the Village Hall or the Carnegie Hall. They may even enjoy doing aspects of the grunt work as well as doing the good work and the great work.

Every person has their own preferred working style when aiming to deliver consistency. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I love following a certain rhythm when doing the work. This involves rehearsing ahead of time, setting achievable goals and following my ritual for moving into action. I then aim to do superb work and achieve success."

Creativity

Great workers may go beyond delivering consistently high standards. They may also apply the right kind of creativity at the right time to get the right results. Creativity comes in many different forms.

Such workers often have great personal radar in their chosen field. They quickly see patterns and see the potential picture of success. They seem to know what will happen before it happens.

They also keep expanding their repertoire of skills for doing fine work and tackling challenges. Bearing in mind the results they want to achieve, they dip into their repertoire to find creative solutions and deliver success.

Class

Great workers aim to maintain consistently high standards and, when appropriate, be creative. They then do their best to deliver top class work.

Some people reach their goals by adding that touch of class. Sometimes this can be spectacular. Sometimes it can be a simple act of kindness. Sometimes it can be something that gives people a positive memory for life.

Mark Emberton, a professor of urology, did this when treating me for prostate cancer. He aims to make every patient feel special. I saw this in action when waiting for my first appointment with him.

Mark has his own office upstairs and, whilst he has an incredibly busy schedule, he makes a point of coming down to escort each patient to his office. He has the personal touch.

Showing the patient their x-rays, he explains in a clear way the situation and the possible ways forward. Mark does this in a kind, honest and yet realistic way.

People leave his office feeling that they have been treated with respect and also given a full picture. They talk about how such a famous oncologist made them feel the centre of his world. Plus they have a realistic picture of the possible way forwards. He is a class act.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of the comfort, clarity and class approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The One Chance Approach

One Chance

People who take this approach often have a positive rather than negative attitude. They may prepare properly for a specific event, however, by saying something along the following lines.

You have one chance:

- To do your best;
- To follow your disciplines;
- To do something special and deliver the goods.

This is an approach used by some individuals who want to do their best in certain situations. They may be helping a person, playing a sport, doing a creative project, performing on stage, tackling a crisis or doing another activity.

Such individuals frame an event as having just the one chance to do their best. They do have a positive attitude, however, when looking forward to the event. They use the approach to prepare properly and follow certain principles in the situation. They may then say to themselves:

You have one chance:

To do your best ... To follow your disciplines ... To do something special and deliver the goods.

People who follow this approach often embody a paradox. They find that doing so enables them to be relaxed rather than tense. After preparing properly, they go into the situation and aim:

To be positively engaged and fully present;

To pursue their principles rather than worry the prize;

To do their best to achieve peak performance.

Different people follow the one chance approach in different ways. Here is one example from sports. Some of these principles, however, can be applied in other areas of life.

Jamie Ward-Prowse is recognised as being brilliant at scoring goals from free kicks in football. His approach to practice is different from David Beckham's, however, who was also renowned for scoring from free kicks.

Here is an excerpt from a piece written by Daniel Storey for the inews website that highlights the difference. It can be worth considering whether you can apply these principles in any area of your life or work.

The biggest difference between James Ward-Prowse's approach to free-kicks and David Beckham's, according to Ward-Prowse himself, is not in the curl, the power or the percentage that go on target, but the practice.

Beckham would famously practice his set pieces repeatedly after training, staying behind with a bag of balls and a youth-team goalkeeper.

Ward-Prowse is proudly different. If practice usually makes perfect, he believes in an alternative method.

Once you have the ability to curl the ball beyond a goalkeeper's reach, it's all about making sure you peak at the right moment.

Take 50 free kicks in training, and it doesn't really matter how many you score.

Take far fewer, and you can better recreate the pressure of a match situation. Ward-Prowse explains this in the following way.

"At the start I would take 12 to 14; not every day, but twice a week. Now I'm more into taking six to eight, just once a week.

"I'm trying to recreate the pressure of a game because you don't get too many opportunities. If I can limit the amount I take and put pressure on those, it works better.

"To be honest, I don't even look too much at the goalkeeper or the wall. It's more about my process in terms of being able to deliver that."

The magnitude of the situation doesn't matter and it's never just a friendly in a World Cup year. No wall, no goalkeeper, nobody else. Just Ward-Prowse. and a ball.

Everybody is different. David Beckham's approach worked for him, whilst Jamie Ward- Prowse's approach works for him.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the one chance approach?

You may apply this mentality when running a mentoring session, helping a customer, leading a team, tackling a challenge or doing another activity. What can you then do to make the most of the opportunity?

How can you prepare properly? How can you click into action and be positively engaged? How can you follow your chosen principles? How can you do your best to achieve peak performance?

The Daring To Be Imperfect Approach

Olivia Hurley, an assistant professor and sports psychologist, described elements of this approach in her article What We Can Learn About Resilience From Elite Athletes. Here is an excerpt from the article.

Have The Courage To Be Imperfect

Too often in life, we aim for 'perfection'. As sport psychologists we should not recommend athletes use this term.

Instead we should work together to help them to produce Personal Bests (PBs), helping them to aim for performance excellence, but not expecting perfection.

Such PB targets should not stop anyone from giving one hundred per cent effort to their performances. But, by not feeling the need to be perfect, they are more likely to 'have a go', which often leads to the most effective performances.

Jeremy Snape, a sports psychologist, described how it is important to be fully committed rather than worrying about being perfect. He explained this in the following way.

"Perfectionism can be good for driving your work ethic and your attention to detail. But it can also cause stress, procrastination and even avoidance – because you're afraid of not achieving it.

"The really great sportspeople have the courage to throw themselves into any endeavour with 100% commitment, knowing that it's going to be imperfect."

The 'You Have An A Grade' Approach

Achieving An A Grade

The reasons why I may be considered to have achieved an A Grade during the academic year is because I have done the following things:

*

Benjamin Zander, a conductor with the Boston Philharmonic Orchestra, describes his approach to encouraging young performers do their best.

He tutors students who travel from around the world to pursue their musical studies in America. They are often financially supported by families who have saved to provide the necessary funding.

The students feel nervous on their first day in college. Anxious not to disappoint their parents, they are worried about passing their final exams. Benjamin greets the assembled students by saying something like the following.

You Have An A Grade

Let me put your minds at rest. You already have an A grade. But this is dependent on several things.

First, write me a letter dated May next year - the end of your time in college - titled Achieving An A Grade.

Imagine you are writing the letter after completing the course. Start with the words:

'The reasons why I may deserve be considered to have achieved an A Grade during the academic year is because I have done the following things ...'

Second, you and I will meet to discuss your proposed achievements and whether these deserve an A. If not, we will agree on what you want to you need to do to achieve another grade.

Third, it is then up to you to do the things required to reach the agreed grade.

Let's move on to another area where people are encouraged to do their personal best. This is the challenging topic of performance appraisals in organisations. Let's have a look at one unconventional approach.

Performance Appraisal – The Agreeing On The Rating At The Start Of The Year Approach

There are many models for doing performance appraisal or performance management. The following section describes one approach that I have seen work in a company. This involved going through the following steps.

Step One – Agreeing On The Rating

This involved meeting with the person and agreeing on the rating they want to achieve by the end of the year. The manager outlined that the available ratings were 5.0, 4.5, 4.0, 3.5 and 3.0. Anything below those could lead to other types of discussions.

The manager asked the person what rating they would like to achieve in the year. Naturally, many people said they wanted to get a 5.0. The manager then outlined what would be required to achieve such a rating.

This might mean delivering double their agreed target, producing a ground-breaking innovation, all their team achieving 100% job satisfaction and many other deliverables. The person might then say something along the following lines.

"That sounds a tall order. What do I need to do and deliver to get a 4.5?"

The conversation would continue until the person settled on an agreed rating.

The company made it clear that:

It was certainly okay for a person to aim for a 3.0, 3.5 or another grade.

There may be times in a person's life that they may prefer to go for such a rating. The company also made it clear that 3.0 was the lowest acceptable grade – but that included being professional and reaching certain targets.

The person settling on the rating they wanted to achieve. They then translated this into describing the things they needed to do and deliver to achieve that rating.

Step Two – Meeting Regularly To Clarify If On Course To Deliver The Rating

The person had regular meetings with their manager to clarify that they were still on course to deliver the agreed rating.

This provided a good reality check and also showed the progress being made towards delivering the agreed outcomes. Sometimes outside events occurred that meant it was appropriate to review the goals or review the agreed rating.

Step Three – Meeting At The End Of The Year To Confirm The Agreed Rating

This session was held at the end of the year and the session was normally predictable.

The person and the manager had made clear contracts at the beginning of the year and agreed on the desired rating. They had then met regularly to keep doing reality checks.

The company found that people normally delivered what had been agreed and achieved their desired rating. This made the sessions predictable with few surprises.

Sometimes there were deviations, but these were managed in a professional way. The company used this approach to make the performance appraisal sessions beneficial to both the individual and the company. Here are some of the tools they used to facilitate such sessions.

*Agreeing On The Rating

Introduction

This approach starts by agreeing with you on the rating you want to achieve by the end of the year.

The ratings are: 3.0, 3.5, 4.0, 4.5 and 5.0. Anything below these may lead to other discussions. We will agree with you on the rating you want to achieve.

Many people start by saying they want a 5.0. We will explore what you would actually need to deliver to achieve that rating. We will continue to explore until we agree on the rating you want to achieve.

We will then meet regularly to clarify that you are track to achieve your desired rating. If so, then the final rating will be predictable and not a surprise.

The Decisive Moments Approach

Great workers often do good work at decisive moments. Commentators may describe such people as having the following qualities:

"They deliver the goods when it matters ... They are good at managing crises ... They do great work on great occasions."

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. You may aim to encourage a person, lead a team, present to a large audience, appear on television or do another activity. One approach is to focus on the following themes.

Doing Your Best

Great workers maintain the habit of doing their best when performing certain activities. They often focus on a specific activity where they can do superb work. They then demonstrate the desire and discipline to do great work.

Great teams also encourage their people to develop the habit of doing their best. Many do this by recruiting people who are positive, professional and have the ability to be peak performers.

Some teams must start from scratch, however, and help their people to deliver the required standards. They encourage people:

To focus on the team's goals;

To focus on the key strategies they can follow to achieve the team's goals;

To focus on the professional standards they must deliver to achieve the team's goals.

This is an approach I saw in action when running the kick-off workshop for a yacht crew competing in round-the-world BT Global Challenge.

Each crew was made up of people from all walks of life, many with little experience of sailing. The team I worked with had their first meeting in North Wales.

After some introductions, the skipper asked people to brainstorm the team's goals. The crew members got excited, saying things like:

"We are going to win."

Listening to the presentations, the skipper showed respect for each of the suggestions. After summarising their ideas, he outlined his approach in the following way.

"Looking at the brainstormed ideas and adding to these, I would suggest the following goals. The top one is my guiding principle as a skipper. I would suggest the following aims.

The Goals

To get everybody around the world and home safely;

To get the boat to go as fast as possible every day;

To give people a positive experience they remember for a lifetime.

The crew members accepted the salutary lesson. After some discussion and refinement, they agreed on the real results to achieve. People then did a session where they focused on the following themes.

The specific goals they wanted to achieve ... The specific strategies they could follow to achieve the goals ... The specific pluses and minuses involved in working to achieve the goals.

The following pages describe the exercises that people did. They then clarified whether they were prepared to do their best to work towards achieving the goals.

The crew members explored these themes. Bearing in mind the tough conditions – such as storms in the Southern Ocean – it was important to explore the potential pluses and minuses involved.

The next step was to clarify each person's best contribution. Bearing in mind the standards of work required – which sometimes involved life or death situations - it was important to encourage people to play to their strengths.

This posed a unique challenge. A few people had sailed before, but most were novices. They all brought different skills, however, which they could use to help to achieve the goals. They were cooks, counsellors, teachers, salespeople, technicians and had other skills.

Bearing this in mind, each person was invited to make a flip chart describing their strengths and best contributions. They put these around the walls of the room and explored each person's strengths.

Delivering The Goods

Great workers focus on delivering the goods in certain situations. Bearing in mind what they can control, they often take the following steps to making this happen:

They clarify the real results to achieve – the picture of success;

They clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success;

They pursue their action plan for following these strategies and doing their best to deliver the picture of success.

Different people may, however, have different definitions of success. They may aim to encourage other people, build a happy family, gain status, win medals, leave a positive legacy or to achieve other things in their life.

Cath Bishop, an Olympic Medal Winner in rowing, encourages people to explore their definitions of success. Below is an excerpt from an article she wrote on this theme. She expanded on this topic in her book The Long Win.

What Does Winning Really Mean?

Of course, in sport it seems so temptingly obvious and simple – it's about crossing the line first, being on the top step of the podium, holding that trophy.

Yet those are all split-second moments. Those need to be translated into meaning beyond that split-second if they are to be long-lasting positive experiences.

When they aren't translated, that allows a world to exist where it's possible for an Olympic gold medallist to walk back into the village feeling 'empty' and 'hollow', or where 'winning sport stars' can actually be suffering depression and worse.

The best sports coaches are those who are not afraid to ask their athletes what they want to do after sport, and strong enough to ask and listen to the deeper motivations that have driven their athletes to be in this unnatural high performance environment striving to be the best in the world.

That's the beginning of building a wider perspective and deeper meaning about the extreme and often short-lived experience of elite sport.

Many organisations confidently define their raison d'être to be 'no 1 in the marketplace.'

But is that helpful to performance? Wouldn't it be better to define success in terms of the company's own vision of what it wants to achieve and contribute?

Isn't success about changing the world for the better in some way, whether through providing a better world-class service to its customers, creating a new and better product or having an impact that improves the environment and society around it?

Purpose starts a conversation about success that goes beyond winning.

It's about a longer-term timeframe, never just a split-second.

It's about a wider perspective, not a narrow view.

And it's about people's whole lives, as individuals and communities, not measured in short-term results, but longer-term experiences.

LONG WIN

The search for a better way to succeed

CATH BISHOP

I propose a new way of redefining success. The Long Win is based on:

Clarity of what matters: developing a sense of purpose and meaning beyond simply coming first or hitting short-term targets

Constant learning: recognizing and focusing on learning, progress and personal growth rather than outcomes and extrinsic rewards

Connection: prioritizing cooperation and collaboration over competition, creating authentic relationships and understanding each other

Decisive Moments

Great workers rise to the occasion when it matters. Some do this because they have developed the daily habit of delivering high standards. Some also believe that every moment is an opportunity to do superb work.

Great teams put people in the places where they are most likely to do superb work at decisive moments. They encourage people to focus on the specific activities – and perform the specific roles - where they demonstrate the following qualities:

They have good radar – they see patterns quickly and seem to know what will happen before it happens – and they clarify the desired results;

They have a wide repertoire of tools they can use to work towards achieving the desired results;

They have the ability to reach into their repertoire and apply the right tools in the right way to get the desired results.

Great teams encourage, educate and enable them to manage decisive moments. The yachting team I worked with took this approach. They looked ahead to potentially difficult situations. Such moments could include:

Crew members falling overboard ... Medical emergencies ... Falling a long way behind other competitors in the race ... Dealing with storms.

People having little sleep but needing to help each other ... Missing loved ones ... Being stationary and without any wind when in the Doldrums.

Great teams encourage their people to anticipate and, if possible, prevent such situations. They also educate them to focus on what they can do if, despite their best efforts, they encounter such challenges.

The yacht crew did many exercises on this theme. This gave them the opportunity to develop their skills for doing superb work at decisive moments. Here is the type of exercise they did.

Doing Scenario Planning For Decisive Moments

The Decisive Moment May Be:

The specific things I/we can do to do superb work on this decisive moment are:

Great teams have people who take control and act as calming influencers at decisive moments. They buy time to think, clarify the possible options and settle on their chosen strategy. They communicate a clear plan, coordinate people's strengths and enable people to do superb work.

As mentioned earlier, the yacht crew had the following goals:

To get everybody around the world and home safely;

To get the boat to go as fast as possible every day;

To give people a positive experience they remember for a lifetime.

The crew did get around the world safely. They kept improving their performance and finished in the middle of the pack. This also involved doing superb work at decisive moments, particularly during storms in the Southern Ocean.

The crew members experienced the joy of teamwork plus many dramas. People also learned lessons they could apply in their future lives. Many looked back on it as an experience that gave them positive memories for life.

There are many ways to fine work. One approach is to do your best and deliver the goods at decisive moments. It is to rise to the occasion and do great work when it matters.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life. How could you follow this approach in your own way?

The Organic Development Approach

The Organic Development Approach

This is an organic approach to development. It believes that:

- People already have the seeds of development within them.
- People already have strengths and successful patterns that they can develop.
- People can develop by being helped to build on their strengths and successful patterns - plus add other skills - on the way towards achieving success.

The following pages explore the organic approach to development. This is different from models that urge people to change. Paradoxically, however, the organic approach may result in people demonstrating changes.

The change approach can sometimes work if a person or a group feels they are in a critical situation. They may then feel motivated to achieve a different outcome, but this can still be challenging.

People who are told they must change may feel resentful or resist such calls. They may feel they are being told that they are failures or are bad people. This does not help.

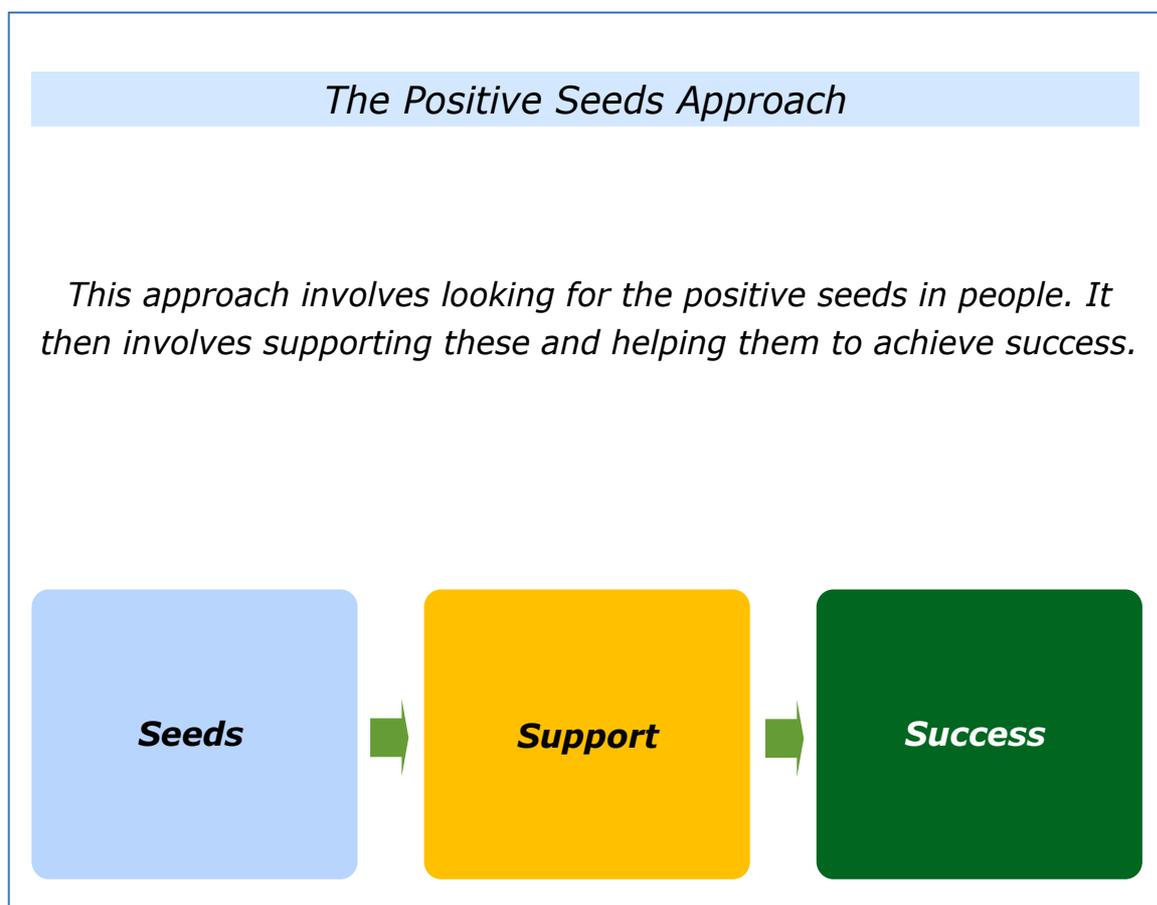

The organic approach believes that many people already have inner strengths and successful patterns. They can build on these – plus add other skills – to achieve their picture of success.

People are emotional beings. They need to believe in their guts that following a certain strategy will achieve success. This is easier to do if they have followed some of these approaches successfully in the past.

Individuals can obviously learn things from outside, such as knowledge, models and tools. But the belief must come from within. People are more likely to sustain their motivation when following successful principles they believe will work in a situation.

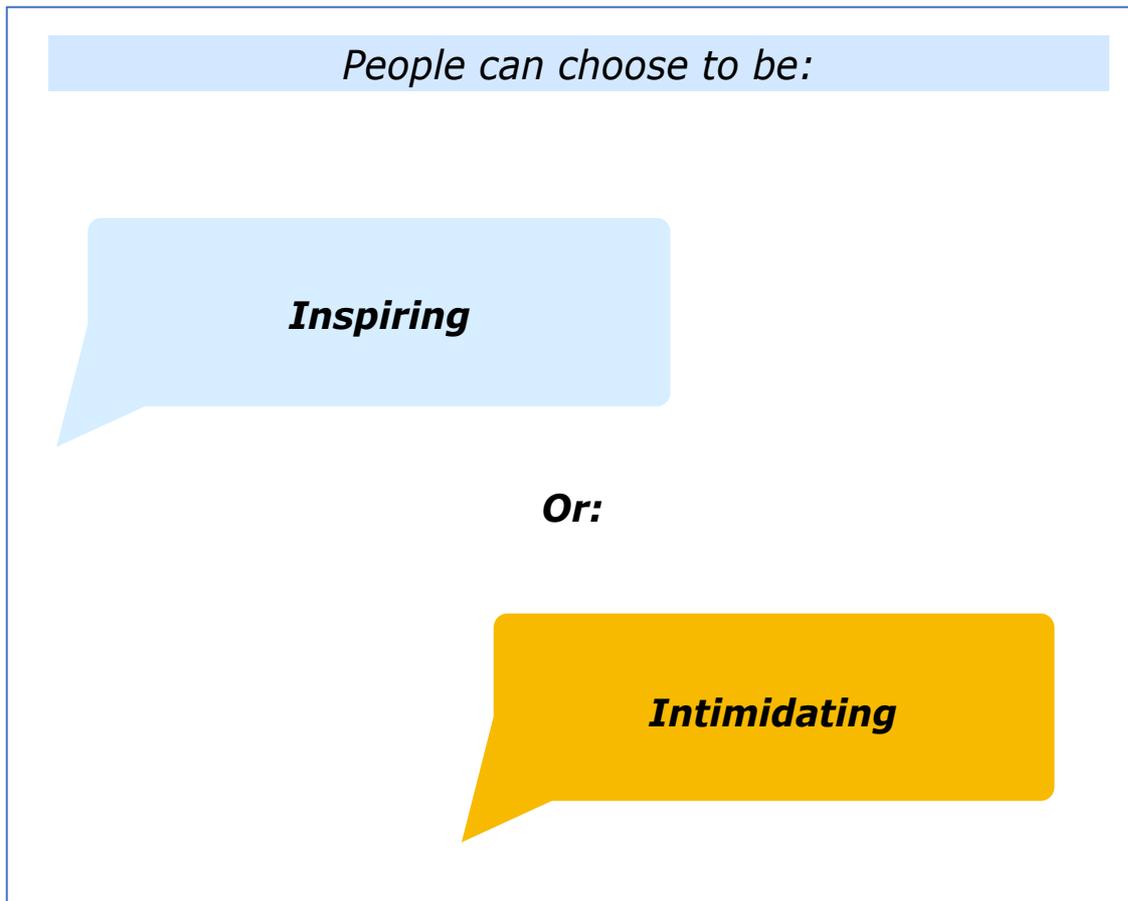

People are often more open if they are offered specific things they can add to their repertoires. They then have more practical tools they can use to achieve their goals.

Some people call this the positive seeds approach. It involves looking for the positive seeds in people. It then involves supporting these and helping them to achieve success.

The Organic Development Approach In Action

Let's look at how this works in action. Here is an example from when I was doing mentoring work in a company. This focuses on the following theme.

People who have strong personalities can choose to be inspiring or intimidating. This was the case with Tom, a top salesperson who wanted to become a Sales Director.

He was great with customers and always exceeded his targets. But in some interactions with colleagues he came across as dismissive. During meetings he talked across others and did his emails whilst they were talking.

Tom had a dynamic personality and could energise people, especially when talking about future possibilities for the company. On the other hand, he could also be destructive. Such swings in behaviour raised question marks about whether he could achieve his ambition to be Sales Director.

He had recently been turned down for such a role. The reasons given were that his behaviour sometimes upset peers and other colleagues in the company. He was told:

"There is no point in applying for such a role until you change this behaviour."

Tom asked for help in tackling this challenge. After ten minutes or so, I gave him the following messages. This sounds rather blunt, but it seemed to resonate.

"You have a strong personality and can be very inspiring. On some occasions, however, you may also be intimidating. Bearing this in mind, you may face a choice about the possible roads you want to travel in your career."

"You are superb with customers. As far as I understand, you prepare properly for those meetings and make the customer feel the centre of your world."

"You listen to the customer, clarify their goals and then share ideas to help them achieve success. These are skills that, if you wish, you can also use to help your colleagues."

"Looking ahead in your career, you will always get a job in sales and make lots of money. If you want to be considered for a Sales Director role, however, you may need to explore how you can build a good reputation with colleagues."

"You already have the skills to make this happen, because you use these with customers. It is up to you to decide if you also want to use these with colleagues."

"Let me know if you want take this route. If so, we can work together and focus on how you can achieve success."

Tom already had the required skills and used these constantly with customers. Choosing to encourage others in his company would involve him focusing on the following themes.

"Do I want to apply these same skills with colleagues? If so, how can I translate these into action? What will be the benefits – for myself and for my colleagues?"

"Sometimes I get bored in internal meetings, so what can I do to manage my impatience? How can I recognise the triggers that lead to me behaving in ways that cause trouble? How can I manage these triggers?"

"What are the actual words I want my colleagues to be saying about the way I behave towards them? What do I want my bosses to be saying? How can I do my best to ensure that people are saying these things?"

Tom chose to build on the skills he used with customers and apply these with colleagues. He developed these and, as a result, people said he had changed.

The key, however, was that Tom was channelling his personality in a way that created wins for his colleagues and company. He also learned how to manage the triggers that previously led to him flying off the handle.

Tom eventually moved into a Sales Director role. Bearing in mind his strengths, he focused on being the person who led the way and carried the banner. He complemented his style by hiring a superb orchestrator who could ensure the team delivered the goods.

He still set aside time to talk with individuals, however, and treated them like his internal customers. Tom gave them his full attention, focused on their aims and helped them to achieve their goals. This helped the individuals and the company to deliver success.

The work with Tom was based on a certain approach. As mentioned earlier, this helps people to channel their character rather than change their character.

The Channelling Your Character Approach

A person can sometimes develop by focusing on:

Channelling
Their Character

Rather than:

Changing
Their Character

This is an approach I have found useful when working with people who may demonstrate certain characteristics. Here are some examples.

A person may be highly driven. They are energetic and achievement oriented but this can lead to them being impatient with others.

A person may be extremely caring. They are good at encouraging people but they may get exhausted by trying to help people who are takers.

A person may have OCD – Obsessive Compulsion Discipline. They may need to channel this into pursuing certain key strategies, however, rather than become mired in details.

A person may be highly sensitive and have mood swings. They may need to learn how to channel this sensitivity in ways that helps themselves and others.

A person may be a worrier. They may need to use the positive aspects of worrying – such as the part that aims to do superb work - and also develop the warrior side of their personality.

Looking at yourself, what are some of your character traits? What do you see as the potentially positive parts of your character? What are the parts that may sometimes be less positive?

Looking to the future, how can you build on the positive parts of your character? How can you channel these in a way that helps yourself and other people? How can you manage the other parts of your character?

Building On The Best and Developing In The Future

The evolutionary approach is one that you can use with people, teams and organisations. Looking ahead, it invites people to focus on the following themes.

Building On The Best From The Past

The specific things they want to take forward from the past and keep doing in the future are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

Developing In The Future

The specific things they want to add, develop or do differently in the future are:

To ...

To ...

To ...

This is an approach you can use when working with individuals. You can help them to build on the best from the past and add other ideas to shape their future. They can then translate their ideas into action and work to achieve their goals.

You can also use this approach when working with teams. They may be planning the next year's activities, moving office or making a transition. Let's explore one way to take this step.

People like to feel in control, especially when facing challenges. Sometimes they want to cling to the past. Whilst it is good for them to respect their heritage, they may also need to focus on shaping the future.

Imagine that you lead a team that wants to keep developing in order to stay ahead of the game. Here are some steps you can take to make this happen.

Setting The Scene

Gather people together and explain that you want to focus on how the team can continue to develop. One leader explained this in the following way.

"The purpose of this session is to look at how we can continue to shape a successful future.

"I want you to come up with ideas about: a) the specific things we can do to build on the best things we have done in the past; b) the specific things we want to add, develop or do differently in the future.

"Looking back, we have done outstanding work when acting as trusted advisors to clients. We have also worked well together when tackling certain crises.

"Looking ahead, we must continue to do what we do best. We also need to keep our internal stakeholders happy. The profit targets are mandatory, so we need to find ways to hit these targets.

"We also need to be proactive in keeping our stakeholders informed about our progress towards achieving the goals. This will stop them worrying.

"Many of our competitors are producing new applications that could put us out of business. We need to build on our strengths and develop ways to help our customers to achieve success.

"Bearing these things in mind, I am going to invite you to share how we can continue to do superb work in the future."

Imagine that you have set the scene in your own way. You can then invite people to do the following exercise. Give each person a pile of Post-it Notes.

They are to each write ideas on the following themes. Here are some of the things that people come up with when doing these exercises.

Building On The Best From The Past

The specific things we want to take forward from the past and keep doing in the future are:

To have the regular monthly breakfast meetings with the leadership team ... To maintain the ethic of giving great customer service ... To give input into how we can achieve the team's goals.

To work remotely providing we deliver what is required ... To do mentoring work with young people in schools ... To have the profit share ... To manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

Developing In The Future

The specific things we want to add, develop or do differently in the future are:

To play more to our strengths as individuals ... To produce success stories about our work as trusted advisors ... To design the office so that people can work in small groups and also have individual spaces where they can work alone.

To bring in inspiring speakers from different fields ... To separate the performance management and career development sessions ... To have regular sessions where we can contribute ideas to shaping a successful future.

Imagine you are doing this exercise with your team. Give people 15 minutes to write their ideas on Post-it Notes. They can then each go up in turn and put their ideas on the following flip charts.

You can then discuss the ideas. Clarify the ones that you and the team want to implement and translate these into a clear action plan.

Invite people to volunteer to be mission holders for the various projects. You can then provide them with the required support to deliver the goods and help the team to keep developing.

Keep Doing, Start Doing and Stop Doing

There are many applications of the evolutionary approach to development. One is the old exercise that invites a person or a team to focus on the following steps.

This is an interesting exercise to do with individuals. One thing that emerges is a person realising what they want to keep doing to maintain the quality of their life. For example, they may say something like the following.

Keep Doing

The specific things I want to keep doing are:

*To keep encouraging my partner and children ... To keep myself healthy ...
To keep exercising ... To keep doing things that give me positive energy ...*

To keep building on my strengths ... To keep doing work that helps other people ... etc.

This exercise highlights the often-overlooked things that people want to keep doing. The same rule applies to teams, organisations and societies.

The coronavirus crisis, for example, highlighted the key things that a society needs to keep doing in order to thrive. These included the need to maintain the infrastructure and health of a nation.

Such factors often get overlooked until they fall apart. One reason for this is that people can become attracted to what they want to start doing or stop doing. But failing to do the basics can result in disaster.

Good workers continually focus on the principles they want to keep following to get the basics right. These provide the platform for them being able deliver peak performances.

Great teams also focus on what they want to keep doing, start doing and stop doing. Below is an exercise that teams often use to take these steps. They then translate these ideas into action and work towards achieving their goals.

This section has explored several approaches to encouraging people. Whatever approach is used, the aim is to help people to shape their futures. It is then to encourage and enable them to achieve their picture of success.

The Keep, Add And Do Differently Approach

Keep, Add And Do Differently

This is an approach that can be used by individuals, teams and organisations. It invites people to focus on how they can continue to develop rather than telling them they have to change.

The approach invites people to look to the future. It then invites them to describe the specific things they want to keep doing, add and do differently.

This is an approach that can help individuals, teams and organisations to develop rather than telling them they have to change. It also gives them some ownership in working towards the aims.

This article focuses on how you can use the approach when working with teams. But it can also be adapted to other situations.

The approach starts by communicating the big picture and giving people the context. It then involves describing the team's strategy for moving forwards and the benefits of achieving the future picture of success.

It is important to share this information in a way that enables people to see the reasons for pursuing the future strategy. Imagine that you have taken this step and people are prepared to contribute towards achieving the goals.

The next step is to invite people to suggest ideas that will help them and the organisation to achieve these aims. Invite each person to write their suggestions on Post-it Notes under the following headings.

Keep Doing

They are to write what they believe their team or the organisation needs to keep doing in order to achieve future goals.

Add

They are to write what they believe their team or the organisation may need to add in order to achieve the future goals.

Do Differently

They are to write what they believe their team or the organisation may need to consider doing differently in order to achieve the future goals.

People can write as many ideas as they wish under each category. It is good if they can write one idea per Post-it, because this makes the ideas easier to collate afterwards.

Give people at least fifteen minutes to write their Post-its. They can then be invited to go up in turn and put their ideas under the relevant headings. They can also explain their reasons for each idea.

After all the ideas have been added, you may want to discuss some of the themes that have emerged. The ideas can then be collated and shared back with people.

It will be important to describe how some of the ideas are going to be implemented. Plus, if appropriate, the support that people will be given to enable them to achieve the aims.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? Here is an exercise on this theme.

The Frameworks For Fulfilment Approach

There are many ways to help people, teams and organisations to do fulfilling work. One approach is to get foundations right and then provide a framework that enables people to do fine work and find fulfilment.

Imagine that you lead a team. The goals you aim to achieve will be different depending on the specific team. You may run a counselling centre, a sports team, a company or another kind of team.

One approach is clarify the teams strengths. Bearing these in mind, you can clarify the specific goals the team can achieve that may lead to people having a sense of fulfilment. You can then later translate these into a clear picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Team's Goals

The specific team I lead is:

The specific strengths of the team are:

The specific goals I believe we can achieve that may also lead to people having a sense of fulfilment are:

Foundations

Imagine that you have clarified the team's aims. It will be important to build on solid foundations and also ensure people keep focusing on the team's goals. Let's explore these themes.

Foundations

Good leaders start by getting the foundations right. They are positive, predictable and create a positive environment in which motivated people can achieve peak performance.

The foundations to put in place will obviously depend on the kind of work the team is doing. Whatever the work, however, it will be important:

To get the physical things right – such as providing a good environment in which people can flourish;

To get the practical things right – such as providing people with the tools they need to do the job;

To get the psychological things right – such as providing people with the support they need to do fine work.

Getting the basics right also calls for implementing the right strategy with the right people in the right way. This leads to the next stage.

Focus

Good leaders encourage people to focus on the team's goals. They sometimes do this taking the following steps.

They give people the big picture and explain the team's purpose, principles and picture of success.

They give people the chance to reflect and decide if they want to contribute towards achieving the picture of success;

To make clear contracts with each person about their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success.

The Picture of Success

The specific goals we want to achieve by ... are:

1) To

For example ...

2) To

For example ...

3) To ...

For example ...

Good leaders recognise that clear contracting is vital to enable people to achieve the goals. Everybody needs to know the team's goals, the strategy and their parts in working to achieve the picture of success.

Such leaders then manage by outcomes rather by tasks. They make clear contracts with each person about the outcomes they will deliver. They then encourage and enable them to deliver their contributions towards achieving the goals.

Let's assume that you have taken these steps with your team. It can then be time to move on to the next stage.

Framework

Different leaders follow different frameworks to help people to channel their talents towards reaching the goals. Let's explore one approach.

Flow

Some leaders aim to create an environment where people can flow and do fine work. They may do this by encouraging people to play to their strengths, perform superb work and do their best to achieve success.

Imagine that you have communicated the team's purpose, principles and picture of success. You have also given people the chance to opt in to making their best contribution.

The next stage will be to follow a framework that you can use to encourage people to perform at their best. Here are some of the approaches you may take to make this happen. You may aim:

To make sure the team is following the right strategy with the right people in the right places;

To put people in the places where they are more likely to flow, focus and do fine work;

To enable people to build on their strengths, perform superb work and deliver success.

Good leaders then encourage people to focus on the team's goals and do fine work. Let's explore this step.

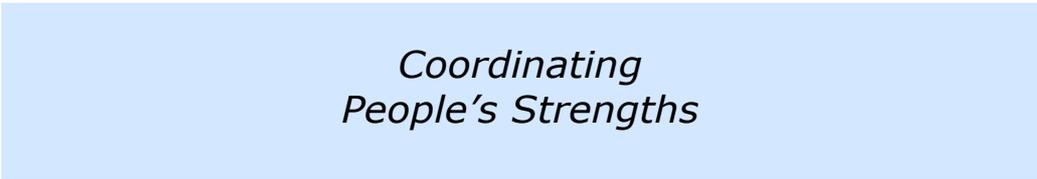

Fine Work

Imagine you have created an environment where people know the team's goals. You can then encourage them to build on their strengths and perform superb work.

There are many models for taking this step. Let's look at one approach that increases the chances of them being able to flow and do fine work.

Good leaders recognise their own strengths and limits in terms of enabling people to do fine work. Some visionary leaders therefore employ a coordinator who can orchestrate people's efforts towards achieving the goals.

Bearing in mind the team's picture of success, they start by clarifying each person's strengths. They then work through the following steps to enable people to do good work.

Coordinating People's Strengths

Bearing in mind the team's picture of success, it can be useful to ask the following questions.

● What are people's strengths? What are the specific activities in which they each deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What might be their best contributions towards achieving the picture of success?

● How can we coordinate people's strengths to achieve the goal? How can we make sure all the other practical tasks get done? How can we make clear contracts with people about their best contributions?

● How can we enable people to do superb work? How can we encourage people to embody the ethic of constant improvement? How can we do everything possible to encourage people to achieve the picture of success?

Imagine that you are ensuring that the team coordinates its strengths to work towards achieving the goals. You can then encourage them to perform fine work.

There are many ways to take this step. One approach is to keep encouraging people:

To keep following the team's principles and perform superb work;

To build on their strengths, manage the consequences of any weaknesses and make their best contributions;

To find solutions to challenges and keep working towards the picture of success.

Good leaders also keep people informed about the team's progress towards achieving the goals. They encourage people to keep focusing on:

The specific things they are doing well and how they can do more of these in the future;

The specific things they can do better in the future and how;

The specific things they can focus on in the next week – or other period – to work towards the picture of success.

Let's assume you are taking these steps. It can then be time to focus on the next stage.

Fulfilment

Good leaders do their best to enable people to finish and find fulfilment. Let's explore these steps.

Finishing

Great teams do their best to achieve their goals. Sometimes this involves them aiming to flow, do fine work and finish.

Imagine that you want to help people to take this step. There are many models you can follow to encourage them to finish successfully. These include the following approaches.

You can encourage the team to follow its successful pattern for finishing

Everybody has a successful pattern for finishing. The same rule applies to teams. If appropriate, you can encourage people to focus on the following things:

The specific times they have finished successfully in the past;

The specific principles they followed then to finish successfully;

The specific things they can do to follow these principles – plus add other skills – to finish successfully in the future.

You can encourage the team to keep following their principles and deliver high professional standards

Bill Walsh took this route with his San Francisco team that won three Super Bowls. The 49ers became known for winning games in the last few minutes. Why? Bill explained this to Steve Jamison and Craig Walsh in the following way.

Keep following the standards of performance and then the score takes care of itself

Have you noticed that great players and great companies don't suddenly start hunching up, grimacing, and trying to 'hit the ball harder' at a critical point?

Rather, they are in a mode, a zone in which they're performing and depending on their 'game,' which they've mastered over many months and years of intelligently directed hard work.

By focusing strictly on my Standard of Performance, the 49ers were able to play the bigger games very well because it was basically business as usual – no 'try harder' mentality was used.

In fact, I believed it was counter-productive. Consequently, the San Francisco 49ers could function under tremendous stress and the forces that work on individuals in competitive situations.

You can encourage people to, when appropriate, dare to do what may be required to deliver the goods

Good leaders encourage people to keep following the team's disciplines. There may be times, however, when people need to do something extra to reach the goals.

Such leaders therefore involve their team in rehearsing how to behave in such situations. It is an approach I have used when working with teams in different fields. Here is one exercise we have used.

Managing Challenging Situations

Invite the team to brainstorm the possible challenge situations they may face in the future. These may include being able to finish successfully. It then involves guiding the team through the following steps.

They can focus on one specific example and clarify the real results they want to achieve in the challenging situation;

They can clarify the principles they want to follow to achieve these results in the challenging situation;

They can practice following these principles and doing their best to achieve these results in the challenging situation.

Great teams encourage people to flow rather than freeze on big occasions. They sometimes do this by reminding people of the following saying:

Prepare as though you have everything to gain. Perform as though you have nothing to lose.

Fulfilment

Imagine that your team has done its best and reached its goals. Sometimes, as a by-product, people may gain a sense of fulfilment.

Different people have different philosophies about fulfilment. Some find fulfilment by doing their personal best. They may aim to become the best kind of person, artist, athlete, scientist or whatever they want to be.

Some people gain fulfilment by performing superb work and achieving their personal or professional goals. They may also gain recognition or even win prizes.

Some people want to serve something greater than themselves during their time on the planet. They aim to follow their principles, do their personal best and leave a positive legacy. This is more likely to produce a sense of peace.

There are many models for building superb teams. One approach is to start by getting the foundations right. It is then to encourage people to follow a framework that enables them to do fine work and find fulfilment.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The People Worker Approach

People workers may work in different fields but they often have a similar calling. They focus on helping people to shape a positive future. They may do this when working in education, sport, business or in other fields.

Such people may do this in different ways, but they have one thing in common. They aim to help people to succeed rather than 'promote their personal brand'.

They believe the work is about helping other people. It is not about them. This can have an interesting side-effect. Aiming to inspire people – rather than trying to impress – can sometimes also be impressive.

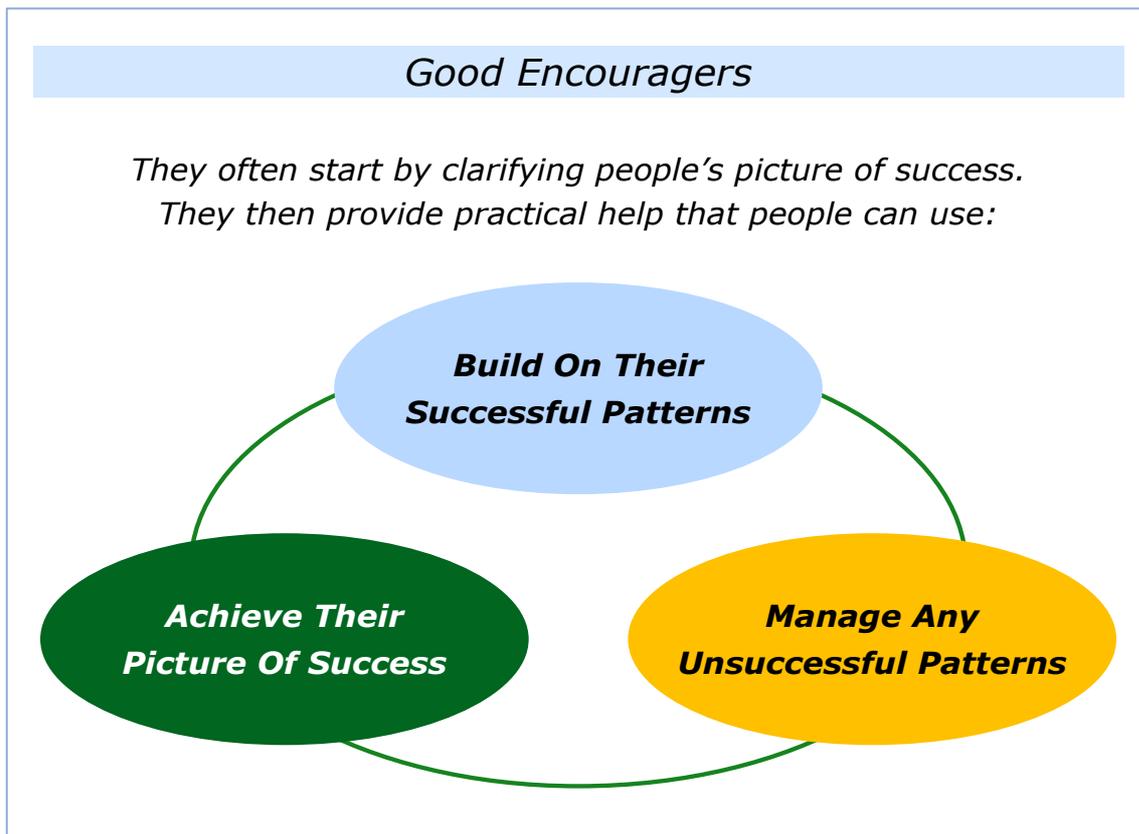

The following pages describe some of the principles followed by people workers. These includes examples of people I have known. It also invites you to explore your own approach to translating these principles into action.

Positive

Many people workers have a positive attitude. They also build on the positive things in other people. They are realists, however, rather than starry-eyed optimists.

Good encouragers often start by making people feel welcome and clarifying their picture of success. When appropriate, they then help people: a) to build on their successful patterns; b) to manage any unsuccessful patterns; c) to achieve their picture of success.

Carl Rogers, the humanistic psychologist, was somebody who took a positive approach towards helping people to grow. He also believed, however, that it was vital for people to focus on the facts.

Today it is hard to realise how revolutionary his ideas were in the 1930s and 40s. In those days the medical profession treated people with psychiatric difficulties as sick patients.

The doctor saw the patient, looked for an illness and made their diagnosis. They then prescribed a treatment that could involve medication, ECT or behaviour therapy.

At that time psychotherapy was often limited to richer people who could afford private sessions. Few doctors sat down with a troubled person to encourage them to clarify their feelings, set goals and take responsibility for shaping their future.

Carl changed all that. He made the person feel welcome and invited them to talk about their feelings and ambitions. This ground-breaking approach led to one book calling him 'the quiet revolutionary'.

His philosophy was that all living things had a drive toward actualisation. Many of his beliefs were formed from watching the processes in nature and seeing how organisms stretched to fulfil their potential.

Carl's books contain examples of how plants, trees and other living things related to their environment. The organisms that succeeded were those that channelled their natural strength and yet also embraced complexity.

This enabled them to develop the resources to deal with challenges. Those that remained narrow did not have the variety to overcome adversity.

Carl applied many of these lessons to conducting therapy. He believed it was vital to create an encouraging environment in which a person felt able to explore. He believed that:

The client – like every person – has a drive towards self-actualisation.

This drive will press towards fulfilment and, when expressed properly, will increase the person's chances of becoming healthy.

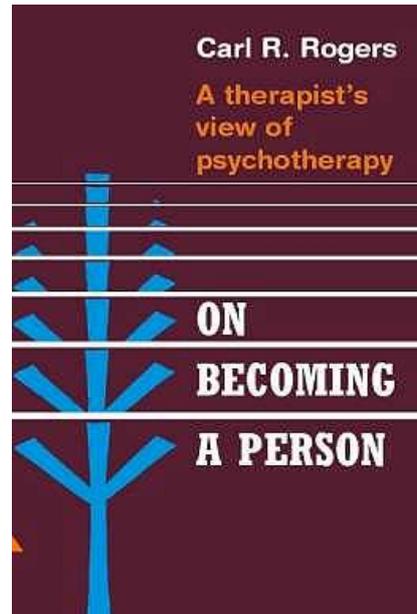

If the drive is frustrated, the person may experience difficulties - some of which might be displayed in various symptoms.

His books such as On Becoming A Person outlined the following approaches for helping people to develop.

The client – like every person - has a natural drive towards self-actualisation.

The helper's role is to create an encouraging environment that facilitates the person's growth.

The person will then be more likely to be their real self, set goals and work towards fulfilling their potential.

Carl believed that to be fully human a person must be true to themselves yet also be willing to learn from experience. This led him to him coining the phrase 'The facts are friendly'. He explained this in the following way.

The facts are always friendly, every bit of evidence one can acquire, in any area, leads one that much closer to what is true.

We should welcome information, he said, even if the new evidence shows that our previous views were mistaken. Such learning can be painful, but it provides a more accurate way of seeing life.

Carl's work emphasised the importance of encouraging a person to be authentic. This involved build on what a person could do – such as their strengths – rather than continually criticising them for what they couldn't do.

He applied this approach to himself and alighted on an interesting paradox. Carl expressed this in the following way.

The curious paradox is that when I accept myself just as I am, then I can change.

Many Teachers Are Positive

Many teachers aim to create a positive environment in which students can grow. They often have a profound effect on people's lives. As they old saying goes:

You never forget a good teacher.

Henry Pluckrose was such a person. He was remarkable teacher who inspired thousands around the world. I met him during the early 1970s when I was running courses for teachers.

Between 1968 and 1984 he was the head teacher of Prior Weston, a state primary school in London's Barbican. The school encouraged children to be creative and built a superb reputation.

I first heard about Prior Weston on the BBC radio programme The World At One. It was introduced as a school which 'everybody liked'. Students and parents were so enthusiastic that the presenter pleaded:

"Please tell me one thing that is wrong with the school."

Prior Weston enabled children to master social and educational skills. It also encouraged them to express their individuality through the arts – such as poetry, music and acting.

The school's approach to education proved successful with students, parents and even governments. Visitors to Prior Weston had to be limited to 4,000 a year and, on one occasion, included the Queen of Denmark.

Henry wrote many books for children and towards the end of his career wrote a memoir called The Travels of a Journey-Man Teacher. Here is a summary of his views about schools and learning.

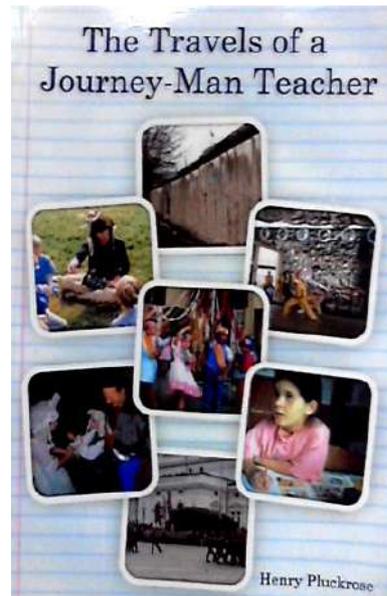

Henry Pluckrose Writing About Schools

Schools should be designed to build on how children learn and develop.

Learning should be relevant and relate to the child's needs.

Learning should be whole - rather than fragmented - and help children to see connections.

Learning is lifelong and should help children to shape their futures.

Roger Tingle, who knew Henry well, wrote the following words about this book.

"The only argument I have is with the title of this book. Having had the rare privilege of working alongside Henry for so many years, I believe that this teacher will be remembered not as a journeyman but as a genius.

"I first met him in the spring of 1965, Henry was teaching on the very top floor of the John Ruskin School (in South London) and I joined him there as a student, a humble apprentice to a Master Sorcerer.

"His classroom was quite unlike anything I had ever visited before and his teaching methods unlike anything I had previously experienced.

"The teaching space itself resembled an artist's studio and was buzzing with a level of activity that only 42 lively ten and eleven year olds can generate.

"Whilst practical art and craft work was most clearly in evidence, it was the Arts in the broadest sense that formed the basis of the curriculum: drama, music, poetry and dance.

"Particular importance was given to direct, personal experience. In practice, this meant that much of the children's learning took place in a variety of settings outside the school: in museums, art galleries, churches and other historic buildings as well as the natural environment."

Prior Weston worked because it took an educational rather than engineering approach to helping children develop. Making learning relevant and rewarding, it encouraged children:

To be curious, gather knowledge and learn how to learn; To build on their strengths, set specific goals and work to achieve success; To develop skills they could use to shape their futures.

The school embodied what employers now call the Four Cs of 21st Century Skills. Critical Thinking, Creativity, Collaboration and Communication. Prior Weston helped students to develop these in the 1970s.

The Cultivation Approach

Great educators often aim to cultivate people's talents rather than concrete over people's talents. encourage people to be creative life-long learners rather than simply becoming economic units.

Great Educators

They often aim:

- To cultivate people's talents rather than concrete over people's talents;
- To follow the fulfilling model of education rather than the factory model of schooling;
- To encourage people to become creative life-long learners rather than compress them into simply being economic units.

Encouragers are often good talent spotters and, when appropriate, help people to achieve their aims. This sometimes also calls making clear contracts about:

The person's role in working to achieve their goals;

The role they can play in helping the person to achieve their goals.

How do you rate yourself in terms of having a positive attitude and also building on the positive things in people – their strengths and successful patterns?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Positive

The ratings I would give myself in the following areas are:

Building on the positive things in people _____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the ratings are:

Professional

The Professional Approach

Many people workers aim to demonstrate the following characteristics. They aim to be:

- Positive

They are positive and also good at reading reality.

- Personable

They are personable and also focus on the person they are helping.

- Professional

They are professional and help people to achieve their goals.

Many people workers have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They are personable and person-centred. They focus on the person in front of them and make them the centre of their world. They then use their professional skills to help the person to achieve their goals.

Good people workers prepare properly for events, click into action and are fully present. Pursuing their chosen principles, they then do their best to produce positive results.

Bernard Haldane was somebody who took this approach during the 1940s. He is recognised as one of the giants of the strengths philosophy. His legacy lives on through his thought leadership, his protégés and the continuing work with Dependable Strengths.

The following pages give a brief overview of Bernard's approach, which was enriched and supported by his wife, Jean. This is followed by an example of positive principles in action. Before then, here is some background.

Bernard was born in 1911, grew up in England and trained to be a doctor. He moved to New York in 1946 but found that his medical qualifications did not meet US standards. Choosing to go another route, he became an editor at the New York Journal of Commerce.

While the job market was being flooded by veterans returning from the war, it became apparent that organisations did not know how to employ people's talents. Veterans were used to 'war jobs', many of which did not exist in the labour market.

Fascinated by the field, Bernard did three things to help veterans:

He asked them to recall their best achievements and, in the process, clarified what they enjoyed doing and what they did well;

He clarified their individual strengths and transferable skills that would be useful to an organisation;

He helped people to market and present their offering in a way that showed the benefits to a potential employer.

Bernard's inside-out approach was radical for the time. Richard Knowdell, a highly respected figure in career development and a friend of Haldane, explained this approach in the following way.

"Bernard believed that he could reveal 'the excellence in each person' by analysing the skills that individuals had used in performing past accomplishments."

He published Career Satisfaction and Success in 1974, which was then followed by other books. Eight years earlier he had married Jean, who added her skills to enriching the strengths approach.

Bernard's books encouraged people to do more than build on their strengths. It described practical ways they could find their perfect role and do what would now be called networking.

Jerald Forster described this in an article titled Bernard Haldane Was Ahead Of His Time.

"In his 1960 book, How to Make a Habit of Success Bernard described a series of activities wherein the person 'mines the gold' in his key achievements, searching for success factors.

"As early as 1962, Bernard wrote: 'Seventy percent of all beginning jobs today are obtained through personal contacts with an employer or through friends.'

Bernard suggested ways to connect with people and create what was initially called a Job Magnet. This approach is quite common today, but then it was revolutionary.

The person wrote letters outlining how their strengths might benefit a potential employer. They then sent the letters to specific business leaders.

Contrary to the prevailing approach, they did not ask for a job. The person asked leaders to consider where such talents might benefit an organisation.

If appropriate, leaders were asked if they might consider sending on the letter to other contacts. The letters acted like magnets and attracted potential employers.

IDENTIFY YOUR STRENGTHS

Strengths Reality Test

To identify your significant strengths, perform the following reality test (try to test 6-12 strengths):

Write the strengths you wish to test in the boxes below. For each strength, identify three distinct examples of experiences in which you strongly applied that strength. First, review the Good Experiences used to complete the Exploration Chart on the previous page for ideas. Next, think of other experiences that are good examples of using that strength. It should be relatively easy to come up with three examples, if the strength you are testing is truly a significant strength.

BHA, the company that Bernard and Jean developed, grew in size and spread across America. They sold the company in the 70s together with the rights to use the name and methodology when working in the commercial sector.

The company continued to use the BHA name, but Bernard and Jean had no connection to it. They focused on the not-for-profit sector and continued to do superb work into the 21st Century.

Caroline Moore is another person who embodies the professional approach. Professor of Urology at University College London, she does pioneering work in the treatment of prostate cancer.

At this point, I need to declare an interest. Caroline has conducted several operations on me using HIFU – High Intensity Focused Ultrasound. This is a non-invasive form of treating prostate cancer and has proved successful.

Caroline is kind, positive and brilliant. She has juggled her career whilst also bringing up four children. Her view is that it is vital to manage your priorities.

Caroline is often asked for advice by people who want to pursue a career. She says:

"Find out what you love and stick with it even through the hard times.

"Parts of my training were less enjoyable than others.

"But it's about finding a path through that and taking time to enjoy it along the way."

Professor Mark Emberton, another pioneer in the field of prostate treatment, wrote the following about Caroline.

It is this dedication, drive, and vision for the end objective - benefiting patients - that I admire so much. I also admire Caroline's ability to corral teams through her infectious determination, balanced with a touch of humour.

Importantly, Caroline is not just a role model to her colleagues in urology, but, working with her, I can see that she is a trail blazer for women in science.

As the first female professor of urology in the UK, she is a role model for all women considering careers in medicine and all women at UCL.

Let's return to your own work. What are the professional guidelines you aim to follow? How well do you think you follow these? How would you rate yourself on a scale 0-10? If you wish, try completing the following sentences.

Problem Solvers

Many people workers are good at solving problems in their areas of expertise. Some go further and help others to develop their skills in problem solving.

There are many ways to find solutions to challenges. One model is to use the outcomes approach. It is to help people to channel their spirit and strengths towards achieving the desired outcomes.

Some therapists I worked with during my early career took this approach. They believed in:

Building on the positive parts of people;

Expanding people's options for tackling problems;

Helping people to work towards achieving their personal goals.

These therapists adopted an outcomes approach. Whilst acknowledging that people had been through tough times, they encouraged them to focus on shaping their futures.

This was an approach I used running therapeutic communities. When working with troubled teenagers, for example, we invited them to focus on their life goals. This involved asking them the following questions.

"What do you want out of life? How can you get what you want out of life? How can you stop yourself getting what you want? When do you want to work towards getting what you want out of life?"

This approach sounds basic, but many young people chose to work towards achieving their desired outcomes. We then focused on how they could also help both themselves and others on the way towards achieving their life goals.

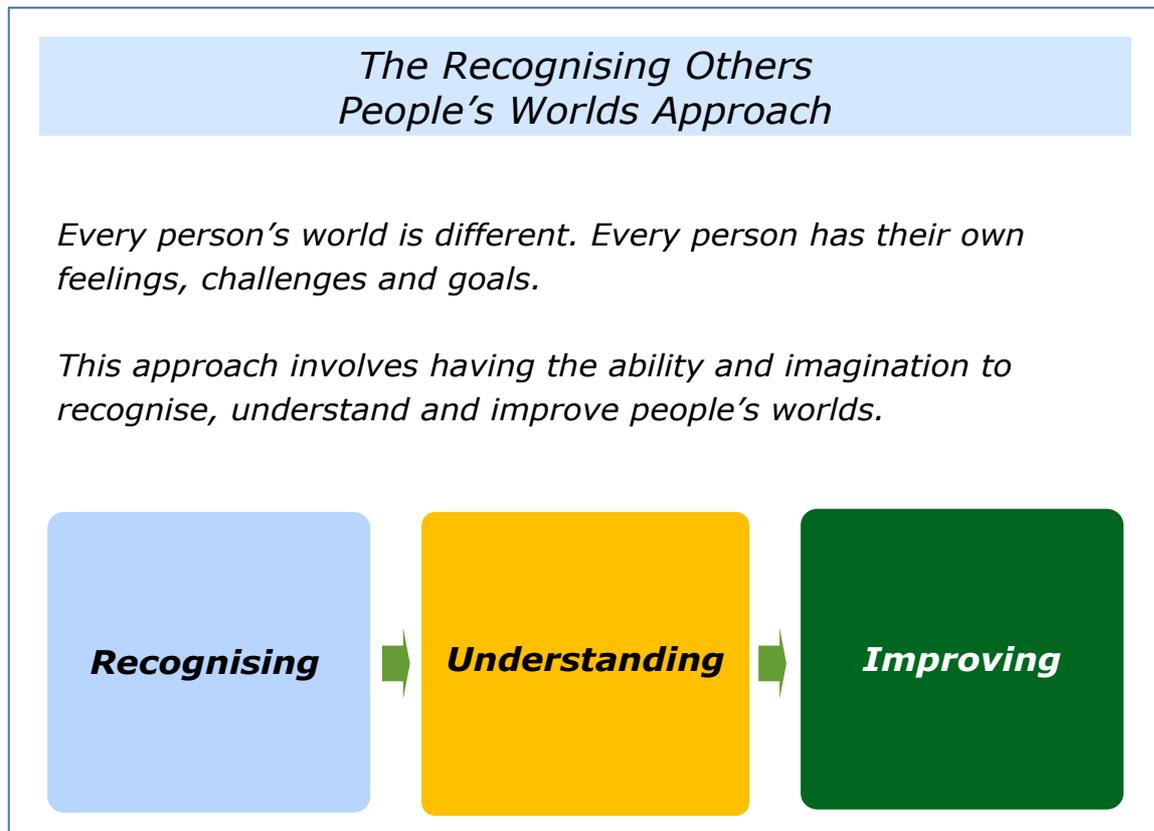

One key point to remember regarding the outcomes approach. It is important to clarify the specific things that people want to achieve on:

A factual level – such as the tangible results they and others want to achieve in the future;

A feelings level – such as the feelings they want themselves and others to experience in the future.

Some people workers also help others to learn how to apply problem solving techniques. This enables people to add to their way power – their ability to see ways to find solutions and achieve their goals.

Good people workers are also good at recognising other people's worlds. This enables them to help people to tackle challenges and achieve success.

Every person is different. Every person has their own feelings, challenges and goals. The things that are happening in each person's world will differ widely. This will be the case if, for example, you are helping either:

A person who is addicted to substances;

A person who wants to achieve peak performance;

A leader who is dealing with challenges and wants to help their organisation to achieve success.

Good mentors, coaches and other people workers often develop the ability and the imagination:

To recognise, understand and, if appropriate, improve people's worlds.

They are able to use both the first and second empathy. Whilst recognising a person's situation, they also focus on the person's aspirations. They then help the person to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your area of expertise. How would you rate yourself as being a problem solver and also helping others to develop their problem solving skills?

Passing On Knowledge

Many people workers pass on knowledge that helps others to achieve their goals. They do this in different ways and sometimes in different roles.

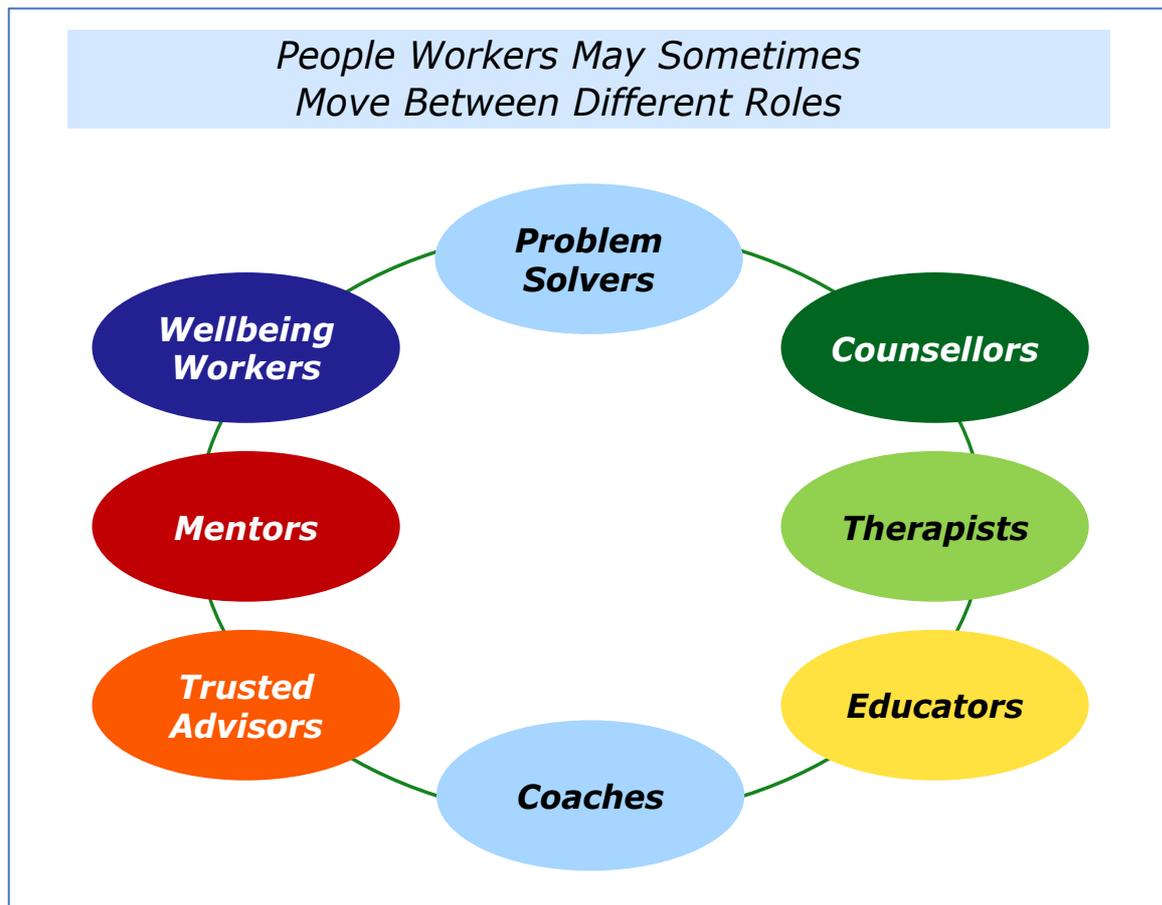

Some simply act as good models and show how to behave in positive ways. Some pass on knowledge in their professional role. They may act as a counsellor, educator, coach, mentor, trusted advisor or in another role.

Sometimes they share ideas during their sessions. Before taking this step, however, they make a psychological contract with the client to make sure this is okay. They may say something along the following lines.

"Looking at the results you want to achieve, is it okay for me to share some ideas?"

The psychological contracting part is crucial. It is vital to ensure the person is open to ideas that they can use to achieve their goals. The people worker then shares knowledge, models and practical tools the person can use in their own way.

Here are some of the roles that such a worker may take. They may also move between these roles when passing on knowledge.

Problem Solvers

People workers sometimes act as practical problem solvers. They may take this role when helping a person to get access to the basic materials for life – such as food, housing or funding.

Social workers sometimes take this role at the beginning of a professional relationship. They may then move into other roles on the road towards helping a person to shape their future.

Counsellors

Counsellors help people who want to solve a problem they are experiencing in their lives. The classic method is to create a safe environment, use listening skills and be non-directive.

Sometimes the counsellor may use facilitation skills to help the client to find their own answers. Sometimes they may move into a more active role and use other methods to help the person to achieve their aims.

Therapists

Therapists use their abilities to help a person to take more control of their life and work towards their personal goals. Different therapists use different approaches when taking this role.

Before choosing a therapist, it can therefore be useful for a person to research: a) the therapist's approach and reputation; b) the pluses and any potential minuses of the therapeutic approach.

This research can take time but it is worthwhile. The person then knows what they can and can't expect from the therapy sessions.

Educators

Educators are often experts in their chosen field. They clarify what the learner wants to learn. They then aim to encourage, educate and enable the person to achieve success.

Many see education as the ultimate democratic activity. This involves offering people more knowledge and tools they can use in their lives and work. People then have more choices and hence more freedom to shape their futures.

Coaches

Good coaches help people to improve in a specific activity. They help a person to build on their strengths, tackle areas for improvement and achieve ongoing success.

Coaches like to watch a person in action or see a piece of their work. They then ask themselves the following questions before giving any feedback.

What is the person's goal? What are the real results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?

What are the specific things the person is doing well? How can they do more of these things in the future to help them to reach their goal? What are the specific things they can do better in the future and how?

What are the key messages I therefore want to give the person? How can I put these messages in a way that the person can accept and use? Are there any other things I can do to help the person to achieve their picture of success?

Trusted Advisors

Trusted advisors pass on specialist knowledge that can help their clients. David Maister, Charles Green and Robert Galford outlined this approach in their book The Trusted Advisor. They said that it is important for advisors to earn trust, build relationships and give advice effectively.

Bearing in mind the client's agenda, advisors use their expertise to outline the possible ways forwards. At a certain point, however, they may say something along the following lines.

"I can explain more about the possible options. If you wish, I can also share some ideas and a potential way forward. But it will, of course, be up to you to decide."

Trusted advisors then share their expertise. The client can decide whether they want to use this to help them to reach their goals.

Mentors

Mentors also act as wise and trusted advisors. They create a stimulating sanctuary in which a person can feel safe and at ease. They then pass on knowledge that helps the person to tackle challenges and achieve their picture of success.

There are many models for running a mentoring session. Later in the book we will be exploring one approach. This provides many practical tools that you can use to help a person to shape their future.

Wellbeing Workers

Many people do work that is related to helping people to take care of their wellbeing. This can range from working in the traditional areas of health care to advocating certain kinds of lifestyles. Let's explore some of these themes.

Physical Wellbeing

This involves helping people to take care of physical health. They may work as nurses, doctors, paramedics, physiotherapists, osteopaths and other roles in the healing professions.

Some people may work as fitness trainers, nutritionists or other fields. They may work as sports trainers or dance instructors, for example, and employ such activities to encourage people to stay healthy.

Psychological Wellbeing

This involves helping people to take care of psychological health. As mentioned earlier, such people may work as counsellors, therapists, coaches or other roles in the helping professions.

Many people go into this field because they respect people and want to help them to live healthy and happy lives. Unfortunately some go into it because they want to sell their particular type of cure or product.

Philosophical Wellbeing

This involves helping people to take care of philosophical health. People like to have a sense of meaning in their lives. They like to focus on their purpose, follow their principles and work towards their picture of success.

Some people help others to explore these areas, but they do so in a humble way. They often learn from spiritual and other fields that provide wisdom that people can use to shape their lives.

Such individuals recognise that, whilst they can offer guidance, it is up to each person to clarify and follow their inner compass. People who take this step are more likely to enjoy philosophical health.

The topic of wellbeing is one that we will explore in greater depth elsewhere in the book. This is in the chapter called The Wellbeing, Work And Wealth Approach.

Some people workers help individuals to develop their skills or reach certain goals. There are many approaches to making this happen. The follow section looks at two well-established methods.

The Classical And Customised Approaches To Developing A Skill

Helping A Person To Develop A Skill

There are many ways to help a person to develop a skill. These include the following approaches.

- The Classical Approach
- The Customised Approach
- Combining The Customised And Classical Approach

There are many ways to help a person to develop a skill. This section looks at the classical and customised approaches.

Many people start learning by following the classical approach. This involves seeing, copying and achieving what is considered to be the correct practice.

Some people find this approach to be challenging. If so, they can be helped by following the customised approach. This involves helping them to build on their strengths and achieve success.

There are also situations where it is possible to combine elements of both approaches. Let's explore each of these methods.

The Classical Approach

Seeing The Correct Practice

The educator describes or demonstrates what is considered to be the correct practice.

Copying The Correct Practice

The student copies this approach and aims to emulate what is considered to be the correct practice.

Achieving The Correct Practice

The student continues to work until the educator considers that they have demonstrated the correct practice.

This approach is sometimes used by classically trained teachers in a particular field. Like any method, it has both pluses and minuses.

The approach may seem rather formal, but the aim is to provide the learners with an established framework that works. Then, after mastering the skill, they can add their own variations.

There are obviously some geniuses that make their own rules and achieve success. But even they may incorporate some of the classical methods in their chosen field. Let's explore this approach.

Seeing The Correct Practice

Students need to see what good looks like. As the saying goes:

"If they can see it, they are more likely to be it."

Educators who use the classical approach therefore often start by focusing on correct practice. They may describe or demonstrate the skill to show what good looks like. This gives the student a positive model that they can aim to emulate.

John Wooden, the legendary basketball coach, took this route. Writing in The Talent Code, Daniel Coyle explained how two researchers described Wooden's methods.

One of Wooden's most frequent forms of teaching was a three-part instruction.

He modelled the right way to do something, showed the incorrect way, and then remodelled the right way.

Wooden's demonstrations rarely took longer than three seconds. But they created great clarity for the players.

Copying The Correct Practice

This stage involves the student aiming to emulate what is considered to be the correct practice. This approach suits some people but others find it challenging.

Some students enjoy replicating and repeating the desired actions. They also like the educator to give them reality checks about what they are doing right and what they can do better.

Some students find this more difficult. They may find it difficult to copy what has been demonstrated or feel constricted by the approach.

The educator's way of giving feedback also plays a vital in the process. Some educators focus on what they student is doing well and will also offer suggestions for improvement. Some focus only on what the student is failing to do properly.

Achieving The Correct Practice

The student continues to work until they have achieved what the educator considers to be correct practice. This can bring a sense of satisfaction and success.

Some students reach this stage relatively quickly and focus on the next skill they want to develop. Some find the process more challenging but eventually practise the skill.

Some students may find that their learning style is not suited to this approach. This can result in them feeling depressed or, in some cases, feeling defiant. The latter group may prefer to go their own way to develop a skill.

The classical approach has pluses and minuses. The pluses include learning from good practise and these actions becoming part of the muscle memory.

The approach does suit everybody. Some individuals can feel it to be constricting. It can also be the case that the skills that are passed on no longer effective in the modern world.

Some people find it easier to learn by using the customised approach. Let's consider this method.

The Customised Approach

Clarity

This involves the person focusing on the results they want to achieve and clarifying the picture of success.

Customisation

This involves building on the person's strengths and clarifying the strategies they can follow to achieve the picture of success.

Concrete Results

This involves the person translating the strategies into action, continually developing and delivering the picture of success.

This approach stems from the organic tradition. It starts by focusing on what the person wants to learn and clarifying their goals.

The next step involves helping the person to build on their strengths and follow certain strategies. They are then encouraged to focus on continuous improvement and work to achieve success.

Educators who apply this approach often have a wide variety of tools they can use. Many follow a certain structure, however, to help the person to achieve success. This often involves focusing on the following themes.

Clarity

The first step is to create an encouraging environment in which the person feels at ease. Bearing in mind what the person wants to explore, it can then be useful to go through the following steps:

To clarify what they want to learn and their reasons for wanting to develop this skill or reach a particular goal;

To clarify the real results they want to achieve and translate this into a clear picture of success;

To clarify the benefits of achieving this goal and also what will be happening that will show they have achieved their picture of success.

Imagine that a person has clarified the desired outcomes. It is then time to move on to the next stage.

Customisation

Educators who take this approach customise the learning experience in a way that encourage and enables the person to achieve success.

Different educators do this in different ways, but many follow the organic approach to development. As mentioned elsewhere in the book, this approach believes that:

People already have the seeds of development within them;

People already have strengths and successful patterns they can develop;

People can be helped to build on their strengths and follow their successful patterns – plus be offered other skills – that they can use to achieve their goals.

Bearing in mind what the person wants to achieve, such an educator may explore some of the following themes with the person.

What are their strengths? What are their successful patterns? When have they tackled a similar challenge successfully in the past?

What did they do right then? What were the principles they followed? How can they follow similar principles – plus maybe add other skills – to achieve their goals?

What works for them? What can they learn from other people who have tackled similar challenges successfully? How can they follow these principles in their own way?

What are the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success? How can they translate these into action? What else can they do to increase the chances of success?

Educators who take this approach may then invite the person to take the following steps:

To clarify the strategies they want to follow and translate these into an action plan for learning the skill or reaching the goal;

To plan ahead and rehearse the strategies they intend to follow plus also how they can manage any potential challenges;

To prepare properly both physically and psychologically for the task they are going to do.

Educators who take this approach may then invite the person to translate their plan into action. This calls for moving on the next stage.

Concrete Results

This involves the person translating the strategies into action, continually developing and working to achieve the picture of success.

Great coaches, for example, want to see the person in action. The golf coach wants to see the player hit golf balls. The musical coach wants to hear the performer sing or play their instruments. The writing coach wants to an example of the person's writing.

Why? This provides a reality check. It is the only way to judge a person's performance. The same rule applies to any form of education. Some people talk a great game but seeing them in action can be an eye-opener.

Imagine that you are helping a person to develop a skill. Looking at their performance, it can be useful to explore the questions that coaches ask themselves when watch a person in action. These were described earlier in this chapter.

Imagine that you have seen a person in action. Certainly you have information to pass on but, as Keith Antoine an Olympics athletics coach, says:

"After a performance, the performer speaks first."

The person must be given the chance to reflect. They need to do some self-evaluation and clarify what they have learned from the experience. So you may say something like the following to them.

"Take a few minutes to reflect. I have some ideas about how you can build on your strengths and focus on areas for improvement."

"But it is vital that you keep developing the habit of self-improvement. Looking back at your performance, I would like to write down the following things:

*The specific things I did well and how
I can do more of these in the future:*

The specific things I can do better in the future and how:

The other things I would like to discuss or explore about my performance are:

"Try to be as specific as possible. After doing this, I will ask you to share your ideas. Then, if you wish, I will add some ideas of my own."

Building on what the person says, you can help them to develop their strengths and tackle areas for improvement. You can also share your knowledge by providing positive models and practical tools they can use to add to their repertoire.

Imagine you have gone through these steps. The next stage will be to give the person time to reflect. They can focus on:

The specific things they have learned or relearned;

The specific next steps they want to take to develop the skill or reach the goal;

The specific things they can do to give themselves the greatest chance of success when translating their plan into action.

Imagine the person has made their action plan. You can encourage and enable the person to keep working until they achieve the picture of success.

The customised approach has pluses and minuses. The pluses include it being organic, building on the person's strengths and adding skills to their repertoire. It also is more likely to help them to do what they believe in and achieve success.

The minuses include the following. The approach relies on the person being motivated and the educator being able to pass on knowledge in a way they person can use to achieve their goals.

Combining The Customised And Classical Approach

Sometimes it is possible to combine both approaches. This is more likely to work, however, when:

The person has previously used the customised approach;

The person has clarified a particular skill they want to learn;

The person wants to learn from good practice, study what works and then apply this skill in their own way to reach the goal.

There are many ways to help a person to develop. As ever, the key is to use whichever method is most likely to work and help the person to achieve ongoing success.

Let's return to your own work. How would you rate yourself at passing on knowledge to people? What can you do to maintain or improve the rating?

Positive Future

Many people workers help people to shape a positive future. Here are some reasons they give regarding choosing their work.

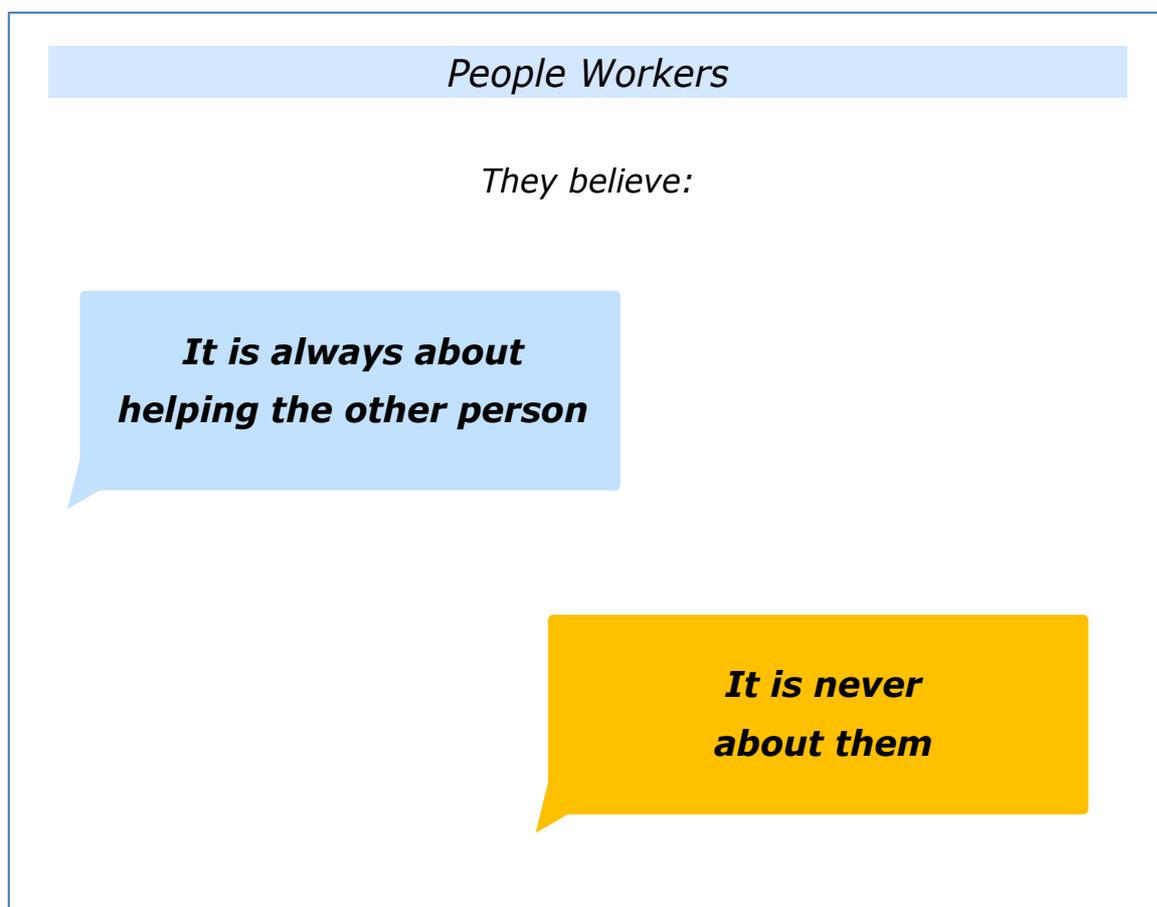

The reasons I went into this kind of work were because I wanted:

To help people ... To give people a better start in life ... To give people more opportunities ... To give people a good education ... To help people to take care of their health ... To enable people to have more options and freedom to shape their futures.

To help children from difficult backgrounds ... To help children with learning difficulties ... To help former addicts to stay healthy ... To help former prisoners ... To help military veterans to use their skills to make a contribution to society.

To help people to build on their strengths ... To help people to do satisfying work ... To help people to overcome problems ... To play a part in helping to build a better society ... To give people hope ... To help people to achieve success.

Many people workers believe that the work is about helping the other person – the client, customer or group of people. It is never about them. It is not about them trying to impress, impose their views or be seen as a saviour or guru.

The people who follow this approach have often got their act together. They know who they are and who they are not. They are then more able to make the work about others rather than about themselves.

Good people workers sometimes demonstrate the following characteristics

They know their philosophy about helping people – they know what they can do and what they can't do to help people;

They know their strengths – such as specific things they can and can't offer to people – and how to help people to achieve success;

They know the kinds of people they can help – and the characteristics these people demonstrate - and those they probably can't help.

People workers love to give to others but they can sometimes feel overwhelmed with challenges. During the Covid-19 outbreak, for example, many were working long hours helping those affected by the events.

Some gained strength by recalling why they went into doing social work, nursing, education or the helping professions. Some saw it has a chance to pursue their calling. They saw it has a privilege – rather than a pressure - to help others during the crisis.

Different people workers supported others in different ways. Some tried to help people to feel more in control of shaping the future. This involved taking the following steps.

They helped people to manage any pressing issues at the base of Maslow's hierarchy of human needs - such as taking care of their health, housing and finding ways to extend their financial runway.

They encouraged people to establish a routine they wanted to follow – this included doing work related activities, doing things that gave them positive energy and, when appropriate, helping other people.

They invited people to recall when they had overcome crises in the past and explore how they could follow some of these principles – plus add other skills – to tackle the present challenge.

They helped people to focus on their strengths and how they may be able to do satisfying work in the future – either in their present role or finding a role in industries that would thrive beyond the crisis.

They took the time to focus on each individual's personal situation and aimed to provide practical tools the person could use to increase their way power and shape the future.

Looking back at your own life, can you think of a situation when you helped people to shape their future? This could have been in your personal or professional life?

You may have done this when acting as a parent, educator, counsellor, coach, leader or in another role. What did you do to help the person or group of people? What were the principles you followed? How can you follow these principles in the future?

Let's explore another approach that some people workers take. Such individuals love to give to others. They also follow certain guidelines, however, on the ways towards helping people to grow. Let's consider this approach.

Many people workers are positive, professional, problem solvers and pass on knowledge. They also aim to help people shape a positive future. How would you rate yourself in terms of taking this final step?

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences. You can then continue to help people to shape a positive future.

The Professional Freelancer Approach

The Professional Freelancer Approach

People who take this approach recognise that the world of work is continually evolving. There are fewer fixed career paths but there will always be projects.

This calls for playing to their strengths and following the professional freelancer approach. They then aim to find or create satisfying projects and deliver positive results.

Great workers recognise that the world of work continues to evolve. There are few predictable career paths anymore but there will always be projects.

This calls for playing to their strengths and having a professional freelancer approach. They then aim to find or create satisfying projects and deliver positive results.

Such people take this approach even if they are a full-time employee. They maintain the freelance mentality and operate as if they are on a rolling contract. They aim to behave in a professional way and help their stakeholders to succeed.

Different people follow this path in different ways. Let's explore how some people pursue these themes.

Professional Freelancer

People who take this approach build on their strengths and have a strong service ethic. They also aim to find or create satisfying projects where they can deliver success.

Such people are proactive and agile. They keep scanning their chosen field to focus on: a) the specific challenges that their potential customers are facing; b) the specific challenges they may face in the future.

Different people then clarify their offering to potential customers in different ways. One approach is for them to explore the following themes.

Strengths

What are my strengths? What are the specific activities where I can deliver As rather than Bs or Cs? What are the kinds of work I find most satisfying to do? What are the specific things I can deliver to help people to tackle challenges or achieve their goals?

Specific Customers

Who are my perfect customers? Who are the kinds of people, customers or organisations with whom I work best? What may be some of the challenges these people face? What may be the specific goals they want to achieve?

Success

How can I use my strengths to help some of these people achieve success? What are the specific things I can deliver to help them to improve their profits, products or people? What would be the benefits of delivering these things – for them, their organisation or their customers?

Imagine that you want to follow this approach and have explored the themes mentioned above. If appropriate, you can then aim to define your professional offering. Here is the exercise on this theme.

My Professional Offering

Bearing in mind my strengths, the specific things I can deliver to help potential customers to tackle their challenges or achieve success are these.

 I can ...*

For example ...

Professional freelancers clarify where they can use their strengths to help others to achieve success. This involves exploring the following theme.

Projects

Imagine that a person is actually working as a freelancer. They have clarified their strengths and the kinds of people with whom they work best.

The next step is to identify what for them would be a stimulating project. It may not always be possible to find such projects, but this can help to clarify where they may be able to do superb work.

Imagine that you want to follow some of these steps in your own way. Let's start with focusing on your ideal project.

The Stimulating Project Approach

You can focus on finding or creating a stimulating project with stimulating people in a stimulating place.

As mentioned earlier, we are all self-employed now. There are no jobs anymore, there are only projects. So how can you find or create a satisfying project and, if appropriate, get paid a salary?

One approach is to start by clarifying the characteristics of the project, people and place you find stimulating. Let's consider how to take these steps.

Project

What are the characteristics of the projects you find stimulating? One person answered this question in the following way.

"Looking back at the satisfying projects I have done in the past, I can identify some patterns. They have to do with helping people or improving the quality of their lives.

"At university I organised the first ever sponsored Fun Run, raising £10k for charity. Early in my IT career I launched software that enabled students to take charge of their own learning.

"In some ways I consider myself a bit lazy, so I prefer projects that have a deadline. This forces me to get my act together. I then rise to the occasion and deliver the goods."

Other people mention other qualities when answering this question. Here are some of the answers.

The kinds of projects that I find stimulating are those that involve:

Doing work I believe in ... Having lots of autonomy ... Helping other people ... Passing on knowledge ... Caring for animals ... Creating beautiful things ... Doing deep work ... Turning around companies.

Launching prototypes ... Selling to certain kinds of customers ... Helping people to heal ... Working with people from different cultures ... Learning new things ... Leading superb teams.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the characteristics of the kinds of projects that you find stimulating.

People

What are the characteristics of the customers and colleagues that you find stimulating? Let's explore these themes.

Customers

Whilst you will always aim to be professional, there may be certain kinds of customers with whom you work best. Here some answers that people give when exploring this theme.

"I work best with people who aim to be pioneers, pacesetters or peak performers. Such people often aim to make the new rules for the game. I am not so good at working with customers who work in established institutions."

"I work best with people who are committed to giving great service to their customers. Many of my customers work in retail, hospitality or the entertainment industries. They want to be commercial but also provide great experiences for their customers."

"I work best with leaders who recognise that, whilst they can set the tone, they will be judged by the performance of their people. Such leaders combine being decisive with being open to exploring many ideas. They then implement these in their own ways to build successful organisations."

Colleagues

The people you work with every day are crucial. One leader described how it was important for them to have the autonomy to hire people who deliver the required professional standards. They explained this in the following way.

"I am happy to be accountable for the results, but I also try to make sure I have the required autonomy and authority. This is because of some bad experiences in the past."

"Many years ago I took on the role of turning around a dysfunctional team. This had several unmotivated team members who had seen off several managers.

"I made the mistake of assuming that, if I could find the keys to motivating them, everything would be okay. But this didn't work.

"My manager procrastinated when I asked for the authority to replace some of the team members. Eventually it got so bad that I left.

"Whilst it is my job to create a positive environment, I work best with people who behave like professionals. I can then do my best to guide the team to success."

If you are a contract worker or team member, however, it can be more challenging when working with difficult colleagues. You can aim to behave in a positive and professional way, but you will have limited power to pick your colleagues.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to do your due diligence before taking a role. You can do research about the people with whom you will be working. If you decide to go ahead, you can focus on:

How you can build with the people with whom you may work best;

How you can manage any other relationships in a professional way.

Managers

Everybody has key stakeholders whom they need to keep happy. These may include the leaders, the board or the investors. One of the key relationships will be with your manager.

Good managers create a positive environment in which self-motivated people can do superb work and deliver success. Poor managers can make people's lives miserable.

Looking back, can you think of the managers with whom you worked best? What were the characteristics of these managers? Bearing these in mind, what are the qualities you want in your ideal manager?

One person answered this question in the following way. They echoed many of the common themes that people mention when describing their ideal manager.

"I work best with a manager who is professional and whom I respect. It is helpful if we agree on the What – the outcomes to achieve – and when these must be delivered.

"We make clear contracts about: a) the specific things I will deliver by when; b) the specific things I will do to keep them informed about the progress; c) the specific kinds of support that will help to deliver the outcomes.

"I then like to have the freedom – within agreed parameters – regarding how I use my strengths to do the work. The key, of course, is that I must deliver the agreed goals."

Most people do not like to be micromanaged, but they also recognise it is important to manage upwards. They need to get some early wins, proactively keep their manager informed and deliver the agreed picture of success.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the characteristics of the kinds of people that you find stimulating to work with.

Place

What are the characteristics of the place – the culture and environment - you find stimulating? Here are some of the answers that people give to this question.

"I like working in pioneering businesses. They are also results focused and fast paced, which suits my style. It also feels like we are creating the rules for the future."

"I like working in organisations that are established yet innovative. Early in my career I worked in start-up businesses, but now I like places that are professional, informal but also have more infrastructure. At the same time, I want freedom to be creative."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to describe the characteristics of the kind of workplace that you find stimulating.

Place

The characteristics of the kind of place – the culture and environment – that I find it stimulating to work in are:

Let's return to your professional offering. You know your strengths. You also know the specific things you can deliver to help people to achieve their goals. You also know the kind of project you find stimulating.

The next step is to potential customers. Let's explore how it may be possible to take this step.

Potential Customers

Imagine that you have an empty diary and want to find work. How to make this happen? One approach is to take the following steps.

To get work by going out and helping people to succeed;

To translate some of this work into doing specific projects;

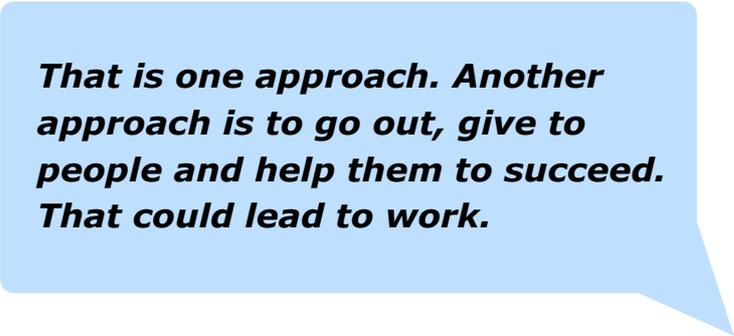

To build on this work and find or create a stimulating project and then deliver success.

Let's consider some of the approaches you can follow to take these steps and get paid work.

Getting Work By Going Out And Helping People To Succeed

I have just lost my job. So I will go home, polish my CV and put it out to recruitment agencies. Then I will see what happens.

That is one approach. Another approach is to go out, give to people and help them to succeed. That could lead to work.

The old proverb says: "Some people make things happen, some watch while things happen and some wonder 'What happened?'"

Certainly this was true during a recent recession. Some people who lost their jobs tried to figure out what had happened and looked for somebody to blame.

Others adopted different strategies when pursuing their job search. Here are examples of the different approaches taken by two people.

Person A said:

"I am going to spend time polishing my CV and registering with recruitment agencies. Then I am going to reconnect with people I know. That is something I should have done before, but I am not good at promoting myself."

Person B said:

"There are lots of jobs out there where I can help people. You can't tell me that every project and every piece of work in the country is on time, on budget and on course to reach its goals."

"Somewhere there are bound to be unsatisfied customer needs. So I am going to get out there and help other people to succeed."

Imagine that you face the prospect of an empty calendar and want to find satisfying work. Building on the ideas mentioned, you may want to take the following steps.

You can aim: a) to clarify your strengths; b) to clarify the specific kinds of people with whom you work best; c) to clarify the specific things you can deliver to help those people to achieve success.

This is a good start but then comes the real task. How to get work? Some of the following ideas may seem counterintuitive but I have seen them work. One approach is to simply give to people.

Sometimes this involves passing on knowledge via email or a blog. Sometimes it involves meeting a person and sharing ideas they can use to achieve their goals. Sometimes it can involve doing work for free.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Here is one example from a person that found work.

"The recession taught me a lot. My first reaction was to worry about maintaining an income. My second reaction was more interesting. I reframed the situation as an opportunity to help people."

"Over the years I have built a business as a mentor but that suddenly became a luxury purchase. Despite funds being cut, I offered my time to meet clients five days a week.

"Mentoring is often about helping people to make good decisions. So my clients and I explored the tough choices they needed to make regarding shaping their future businesses.

"On the practical side, the first aim was to cover my weekly costs, which proved possible.

"After a month or so several clients asked me to do various project work. This included helping teams to complete internal projects, improve customer service and develop new business.

"These projects were funded from the technology and marketing budgets. Previously my work had been paid for by Human Resources.

"Nowadays my diary is full. But I am concerned about the next dip in the market. So it is time to go out and give to people again."

Imagine you want to get work. You will probably start by following one of the first rules:

You can make getting a job a full time job

Successful job seekers follow this path. They cram their days with activities most likely to get them in front of people. They also follow the next rule.

Your next job will most likely come from the people in your network

It will come from either: a) people you know or; b) people you know who recommend you to other people. Some people say they are no good at networking because they think it involves self-promotion. It doesn't.

Real networking is about helping other people to succeed

Sounds crazy? Perhaps. But giving to people – such as encouraging them or passing on knowledge – can be extremely rewarding. It can sometimes also lead to future work possibilities.

People buy people. Whilst CVs may look good, most buyers in the market want somebody whom they can trust, somebody who they know can deliver. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Every job I have had over the past 20 years has come from my network. Twice during that time the companies I was employed by got taken over and my job disappeared. So it was then time to reconnect with people who knew what I could deliver.

"The hard part was getting started. I spent masses of time visiting people. Being customer focused, I made sure the conversation was about them and their company challenges. It was not about me.

"I followed up every visit with an email framing possible ideas they could use to tackle specific challenges. Several times this led to contract work with somebody saying: 'How can we take this further?'

"This is how I have got my last two jobs. I started by doing pieces of project work and then moved into full-time employment."

This approach raises an important point: How to reach or keep in touch with your potential customers? This highlights another rule:

Keep in touch with people in a way that fits your values system and natural style

Do things that put a spring in your step. You can share knowledge, recommend books, offer to provide a pair of hands or connect like-minded people by putting them in touch with each other.

You can also create a website that acts as a shop window and make it customer focused. You can produce articles, pass on knowledge and offer practical tools that people can use to achieve success.

Like an actor, it's vital to keep working. Do something every day to reach people in your network but be patient. It can take time before the right opportunity appears.

Try tackling the exercise on this theme. Draw a map of your network. Write the names of people, customers, colleagues, friends and others in your network.

Looking at your network, describe the challenges that each person faces. Describe the specific things you can do to give to each person and help them to succeed.

Here is the exercise on this theme. This provides space for focusing on just one person. But it can be important to use your imagination and do it for as many people as possible.

Person A ...

The specific challenges they face and the specific goals they may want to achieve are:

- *

The specific things I can do to give to them and help them to succeed are:

- *

The best time for a person to network is when they are successful rather than when they want something. They then have greater strength to give to others. Paradoxically, they may find that even more opportunities come their way.

Finding A Need And Filling It

There are many ways to do satisfying work that earns a salary. One approach is to follow the old advice of 'Find a need and fill it.' This involves exploring the following questions about the present and future needs of potential customers.

Are there any organisational strategies that need to be implemented more successfully? Are there any potential future organisational strategies that need to be piloted successfully?

Are there any present customer needs that need to be met more successfully? Are there any potential future customer needs that need to be anticipated and met successfully?

Are there any potential people issues that need to be tackled successfully? Are there any professional skills or other qualities that people need to develop to deliver success? Are there any other things that can be done to help people to achieve peak performance?

Are there any processes that need to be improved to help the organisation achieve success? Are there any prototypes that need to be built to help the organisation achieve future success? Are there any other challenges to address to help the organisation achieve ongoing success?

Looking at these needs, are there any where I could use my strengths to help the organisation to achieve present or future success? If so, how can I position this in a way that makes it attractive to the organisation.

Professional freelancers follow their preferred approach to keeping in touch with people in their network. When appropriate, they find a way to have a conversation with potential customers. They then aim to act as a trusted advisor rather than doing a hard sell.

Before having such a conversation, they research what may be happening in that person's world. They aim to clarify:

The challenges the person may face in their team, organisation or market;

The knowledge, positive models and practical tools they could pass on to help the person succeed.

During the conversation they aim to help the person to feel at ease and able to explore. At an appropriate point, they may ask about the kinds of challenges that the person may face.

Following the trusted advisor approach, they then ask if it is okay to share some ideas. If so, they try to pass on knowledge that resonates with the person and can help them to achieve their goals.

Much then depends on the potential customer's reactions. These may include the following kinds of responses.

They may simply listen and process the ideas in their own way;

They may thank them for the ideas and say they may get back to them;

They may show an interest in the ideas and say something along the lines of: "How can we take this further?"

Imagine that the conversation leads to the potential customer hiring the freelancer to do a piece of work. This can lead to the next step.

The Specific Project – Making Clear Contracts About The Picture Of Success

Clear contracting is crucial in many areas of life. This is especially so when providing professional services. There are many ways to make such contracts.

Looking at my own work, the pattern has been to agree on this verbally and then summarise it in a follow-up email. Some people prefer to formalise the agreement in a more formal manner.

Professional freelancers find it be useful to make clear contracts in the following areas.

The specific results to achieve;

The specific strategies to follow to increase the chances of achieving the results;

The specific responsibilities of each party in working to achieve the results;

The specific support that may be needs to achieve the results;

The specific measures that will show they have achieved the results.

This is an approach that can be followed by actual freelancers or by full-time employers in organisations. Here is a framework that can be followed to make such a clear contracts. Taking this approach can increase the chances of achieving success.

Imagine that the professional freelancer has made clear contracts with the key stakeholders. They then focus on the next theme.

Positive Results

Great workers do their best to deliver the goods. They believe it is vital to do superb work, give great service and deliver success. They behave in this way whether they are freelancers or full-time employees.

Such workers recognise they are always on stage, they therefore behave in a positive and professional way towards all people. They also apply their specialist knowledge to help people to succeed.

Some imagine that they are on a rolling contract that is to be reviewed every three months. (They do this even if they are full-time employees.) They continue to focus on the following themes.

The Rolling Contract Questions – If I Was On A Rolling Contract:

- How would I make clear contracts with the key stakeholders about the outcomes to achieve? How would I proactively keep them informed about the progress towards achieving the goals?
- How would I behave in a positive and professional way? How would I encourage my colleagues, customers and other people? How would I give great service? How would I focus on continuous improvement and delivering success?
- How would I aim to act as a positive model? How would I aim to get wins for the company, customers and colleagues? How would I aim to increase the chances of the stakeholders extending the rolling contract?

Professional freelancers are good finishers. They find solutions to challenges and deliver the goods. Sometimes they do this by adding that touch of class.

Such people recognise, however, that their contribution may be evaluated by different stakeholders in different ways. These may include the following criteria.

The Professional Freelancer's Contribution

The key stakeholders may ask the following questions about the professional freelancer's contribution

Did they deliver the agreed specific results? Did they behave in a positive and professional way? Did they use their skills to encourage other people and help them to succeed?

Did they, in their own way, pursue the principles we like to follow in our organisation? Did they focus on helping us to achieve our goals rather than any personal agenda?

Would we hire them again if a possibility arose? If so, what would we like them to keep doing? What might we want them to do differently? Would we see them as an asset to our organisation?

Professional freelancers continue to maintain high standards. If and when appropriate, this can even lead to them being offered a full-time role. They may take this role but they also retain their entrepreneurial mentality.

Such workers are aware that things can change quickly. Companies can be taken over, crises can happen and unexpected events can shake the market.

They continue to give 100%. But they recognise that their present project – even if it is a full-time role – may end at some point. They therefore often develop a back-up plan.

Professional freelancers – and those who have a similar mentality – focus on shaping a positive future. They therefore continue to explore the following questions.

What are my strengths? How can I use my strengths to help people, teams or organisations to succeed? How can I find or create the next satisfying project?

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the professional freelancer approach. How can you do this in your own way? How can you translate these ideas into action? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Overview Approach

Great workers are good at getting an overview of events in their area of expertise. They aim to gather information, observe things and see the big picture. They then explore the potential options for going forwards.

Such workers may choose to pursue one of the options and translate their chosen strategy into action. They may then aim to orchestrate the available resources to achieve the desired outcomes.

Great workers sometimes do this by themselves. Sometimes they take a leadership role. They then employ coordinators and experts to do superb work and achieve success.

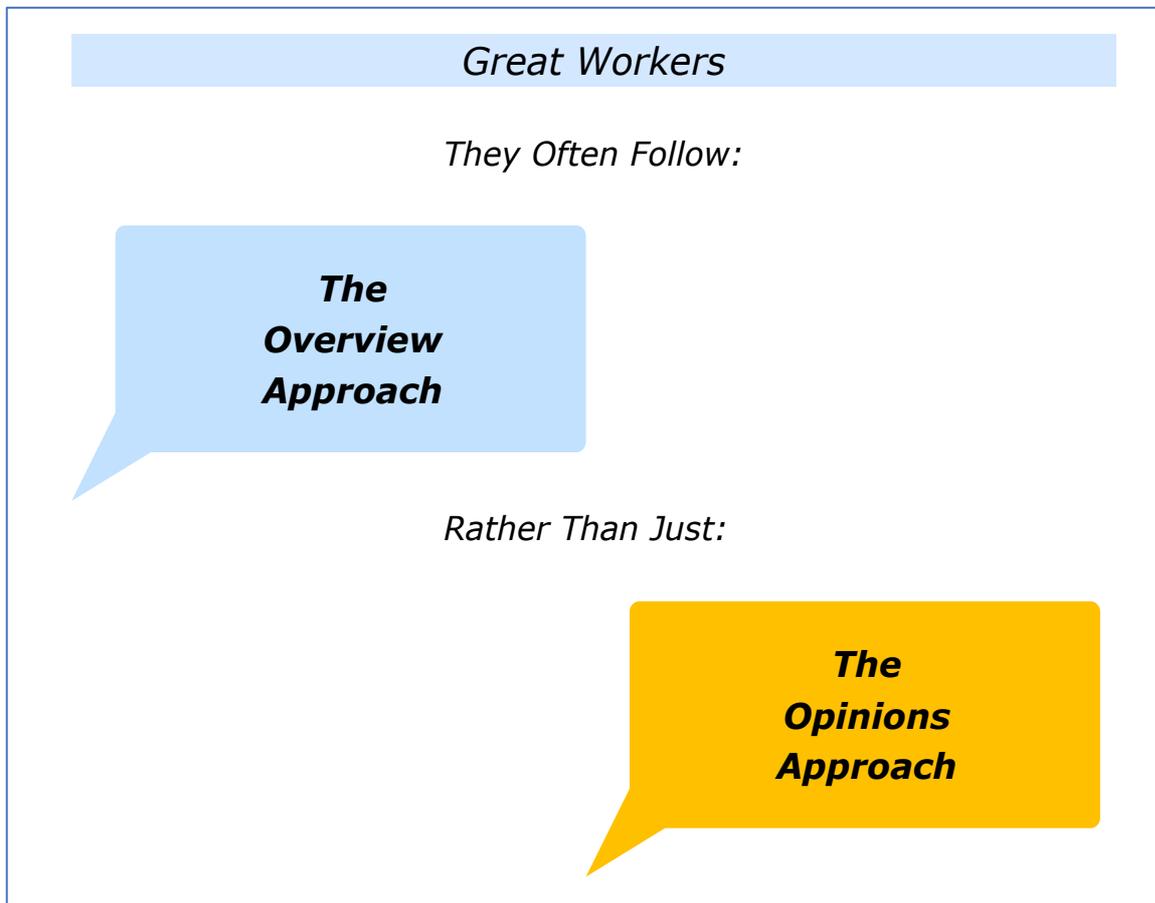

Let's consider some of the steps that such people take to pursue these themes.

Overview

Great workers quickly get an overview of the situation in the specific activities where they excel. They like to gather information, get the big picture and see how things are connected.

Such workers aim to clarify what is happening and consider the potential options for going forwards before then forming an opinion. They take this approach even they may have strong opinions.

Some other people may immediately revert to their opinions. They take that approach rather than getting an overview and exploring the potential options.

Observation

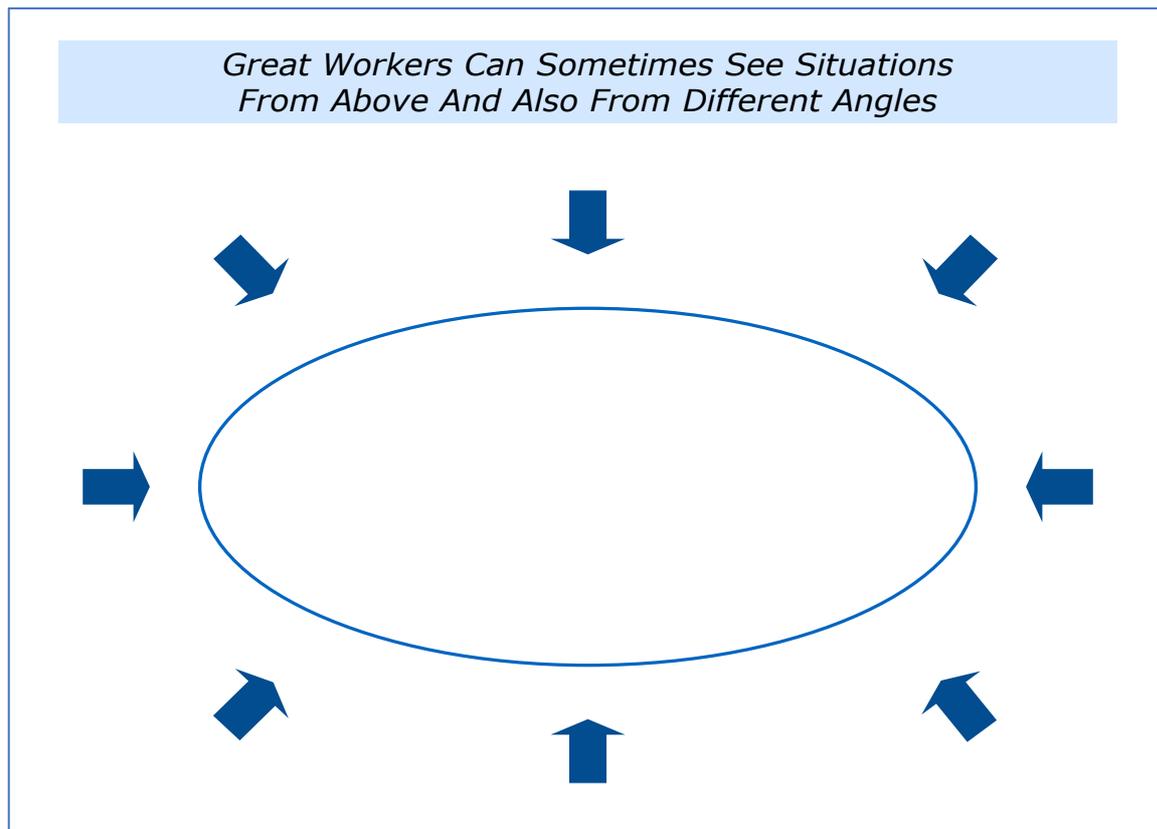

Great workers get an overview by gathering information and also observing what is happening. Such people do this by taking the following steps.

They aim to observe what is actually happening – such as what the people are doing or the actual events that are happening;

They aim to see patterns – both the potentially successful and unsuccessful patterns;

They aim to make sense of what is happening - plus what may potentially happen in the future.

Such workers sometimes seem to hover above a situation and also see things from different angles. Advisors who are asked to help organisations, for example, may aim to look from the outside to see what is happening. This can help them to see patterns.

Options

Great workers observe what is happening. If appropriate, they then clarify the potential options for going forwards. They also clarify the pluses and minuses of each option.

Different workers do this in different situations. They may do it when in some of the following situations.

They may be aiming to make a particular decision;

They may be aiming to achieve a particular goal;

They may be aiming to provide other decision makers with potential options for achieving a particular goal.

Such workers go through a certain process when making decisions. They may take the following approach.

Distancing

Great workers are highly sensitive to what may be happening in their chosen field. Bearing this in mind, they aim to manage their emotions. They may do this when making a tough decision, tackling a crisis or managing a challenge.

Different people employ different ways to distance themselves. One approach is to almost helicopter above the situation. They then aim to get an overview and see the possible options for going forwards.

Another approach is to drain themselves of emotion. Some people become calm, clear and consider their options. They may then demonstrate what is called cold courage when moving into action.

Distancing can be crucial to make considered decisions but this comes with a caveat. It is also important to recognise that the decision they take will affect both their own and other people's emotions.

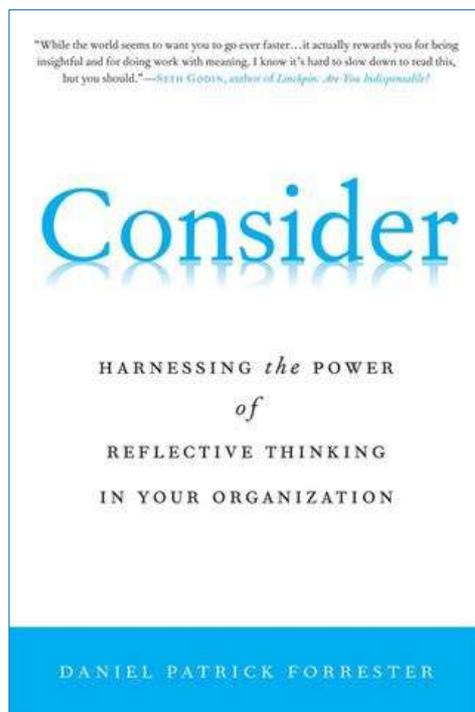

Desired Results

Great workers begin to focus on the desired results. When appropriate, they may employ the classic questions for clarifying the goals. These include the following.

What is happening in the situation? What are the real results we want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits of achieving these goals? What will be happening that will show we have achieved the picture of success?

Good decision makers take time to get a deep understanding of the situation, the options and the implications. Daniel Forrester encourages people to take this approach before making decisions.

He explains this approach in his book Consider: Harnessing the power of reflective thinking in your organization. Here is some background from Daniel's website.

The stories and examples within Consider demonstrate that the best decisions, insights, ideas and outcomes result when we take sufficient time to think and reflect.

While technology allows us to act and react more quickly than ever before, we are taking increasingly less time to consider our decisions before we make them.

Consider

This original work distilled the lessons in leadership and habits of reflective thinking that made the difference within the recent financial crisis, war in Iraq and in recovering from the oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico.

"STOP, THINK, AND DON'T DO SOMETHING STUPID!"

This is the warning Dr. Robert Bea drills into his Civil and Environmental Engineering students at the University of California in Berkeley.

Bea wants to dramatize what he terms the inevitable "oh shit" moments that present themselves-before an actual engineering calamity like the Deepwater Horizon/BP disaster happens.

Reflection supplies an arsenal of ideas and solutions to the right problems.

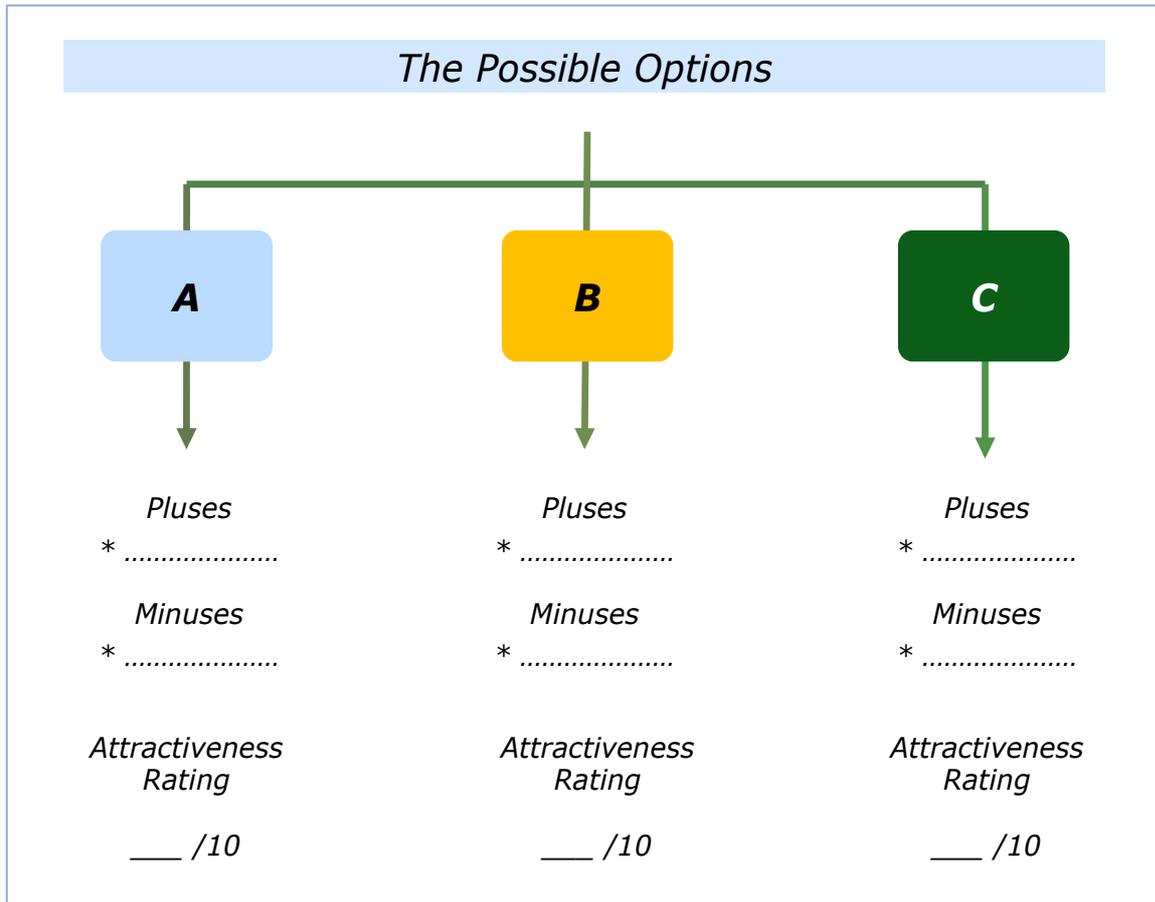

Forrester shows us that taking time and giving ourselves the mental space for reflection can mean the difference between total success and total failure.

Different Options

Great workers may brainstorm the possible options together with the pluses and minuses of each option. They may also consider the attractiveness rating of each route.

Such a worker who has been asked to advice other decision makers, for example, may simply outline the options and the implications. They may then present these to the decision makers.

Great workers who are focusing on their own piece of work may settle on their chosen route. There may be times, of course, when they combine elements of the various options to create a new route.

Orchestration

Great workers sometimes want to go beyond getting an overview of a situation. They want to translate this awareness into achieving results.

Different people do this in different ways. One common factor, however, is that they often orchestrate the available resources to achieve the goals.

They may orchestrate their own resources – their spirit, strengths and strategic thinking – to achieve success;

They may orchestrate the resources of their team or organisation to achieve success;

They may orchestrate certain resources in society to achieve success.

Good Orchestrators

Good orchestrators provide the bridge between clarity and concrete results. They start by clarifying the real results to achieve.

They then coordinate the available resources to deliver the desired concrete results. They focus on the following steps.

Good orchestrators follow the guidelines described earlier in the section on The Coordination Approach. Bearing this in mind, here is a brief overview. Such people often ask the following questions.

What are the real results we want to achieve? What are the actual words we would like to hear the various stakeholders saying about what we deliver? What is the picture of success?

What are the various resources we have available? How can we coordinate people's strengths and the other resources to deliver the results? How can we give people the required support?

How can we enable people to do superb work? How can we anticipate and find solutions to challenges? How can we keep improving and do our best to deliver the picture of success?

You may or may not be good at coordinating things. Bearing this in mind, you may sometimes need to get help in this area.

Good leaders, for example, build on their strengths. They may be good at communicating the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. They may also be good at working with customers and managing their backers.

Such leaders may then work with people who have complementary strengths. These often include coordinators who make sure that things get done.

Let's return to your own work. What is the kind of situation where you are good at getting the overview and orchestrating the resources to deliver the desired outcomes?

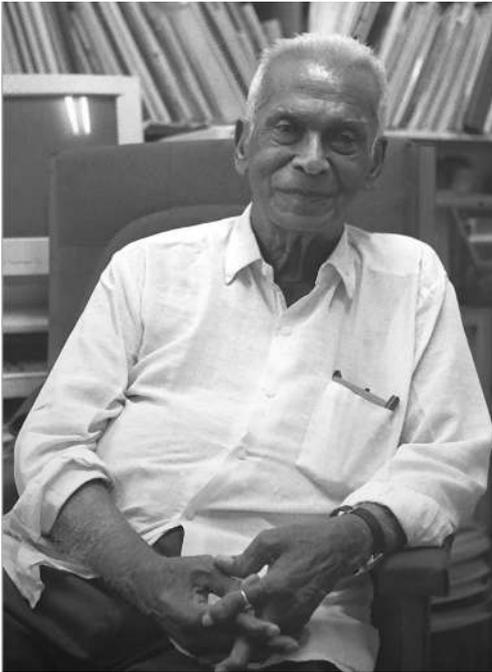

Sometimes you may do these tasks yourself. Sometimes you may complement your strengths by working with people who have other skills. What do you do then to make sure the goods are delivered?

Outcomes

Great workers deliver the desired outcomes. They may do this in their work as an educator, carer, social entrepreneur, sports coach, scientist, leader or in another role.

Dr Govindappa Venkataswamy was somebody who took this route. Known as Dr V., he dedicated his life to providing people with the gift of sight. His individual work and the founding of the Aravind Eye Hospitals has led to helping millions of people to see.

He believed in the following philosophy. Here is an introduction to Dr V's work. This is based on an article by David Kemer in which he cites the doctor as his hero.

We aim to give sight to all and to see all as one.

"Intelligence and capability are not enough. There must be the joy of doing something beautiful.

"When we grow in spiritual consciousness, we identify with all that is in the world there is no exploitation.

"It is ourselves we're helping, ourselves we're healing."

Dr V. was born in 1918 to a farming family in South India. He gained a medical degree, planned to practice obstetrics but then experienced a setback. Contracting rheumatoid arthritis which affected his hands, he decided to change field. David Kemer describes what Dr V. did next.

He began studying ophthalmology and had instruments specially designed for his arthritic hands - each one custom-made to fill a specific need.

These instruments enabled him to perform as many as 100 cataract surgeries a day. He quickly became the most admired cataract surgeon in India.

Dr V. performed eye surgeries at this rate for 25 years before exploring how to scale his approach. Inspired by the McDonald's approach to selling burgers, he aimed to provide millions of sight-restoring operations.

This led to setting up the Aravind Eye Hospital. This had 11 beds in a rented house in Madurai, India. David Kemer describes what has happened since.

Today, there are some 3600 beds in five Aravind Eye Hospitals that perform more than 200,000 operations each year. And 70% of the patients pay little or nothing.

Hundreds of thousands of India's poor have been granted the gift of sight. Dr V. lowered the cost of cataract operations to nearly $10 per surgery compared to almost $1650 in the U.S.

He reorganized how cataract surgeries are done. By training a team of paramedicals to do 70% of the work required in each surgery, doctors are freed up to do a great many more of them.

All of the treatments performed at Aravind Eye Hospitals are financed by those patients who are most able to afford them - roughly 30% - who seek out Aravind's world-renowned quality and happily pay competitive prices.

As such, Aravind Hospitals have become a business model for health care systems the world over.

Dr V. created a wonderful legacy. The Aravind Hospital's philosophy has been described in the following way.

Each year they bring light to millions of lives. If people can't pay, they don't have to. If people can't go to the hospitals, the medical care goes to them.

Aravind's vision is to eliminate needless blindness. Their services are world-class, but the spirit that drives them is one of a kind. It is to provide compassionate and quality eye care affordable to all.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the overview approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Offering Options Approach

This approach can be used in situations where people feel passionately about an issue. It can help them to see things in perspective. They can then settle on their chosen way forwards.

Different people use this approach in different situations. It often involves making people – a person or a group of people – feel welcome and then going through the following steps.

Outcomes

This involves beginning to clarify the real results – the outcomes – they want to achieve.

Overview

This involves getting an overview and seeing how what they want to achieve fits into their total situation. This can involve reaffirming or adjusting their goals.

Options

This step starts by making sure that people are open to ideas. It then involves offering them various options they may wish to pursue to achieve their goals. This must be done in an appropriate way that respects them and their situation.

Outcomes

This involves clarifying the option they want to pursue and helping them to achieve their desired results.

The following pages describe some ways this approach can be translated into action. It starts with a relatively simple example before looking at more complex situations.

Offering Options To A Young Person

This is a method I was taught early my career when working with young people. It can be used to quickly clarify the route a person wants to pursue in the future. Here is one example that took place a few years ago.

Gary was 16 years old when I met him. At the time I actually mentoring his father, the VP of a company. During one session he asked the following question about Gary.

"Do you ever work with young people? Our son is talented but is getting into difficulties at school. Sometimes he upsets the teachers."

"Gary is smart but he gets impatient with authority figures, especially when they tell him to do something without explaining the reason. This has led to several incidents where his mother and I have been called into the school.

"Would you be interested in seeing him? He might listen to somebody other than his parents."

Agreeing to see Gary, I explained that it was important: a) to ensure that he would be interested in having a session; b) to position the work I did as helping people to achieve peak performance rather than being a therapy session.

Gary and I met an hour after he had played in a rugby match where he was the team captain. Welcoming him, I said something along the following lines.

"Good to meet you. I know that you are bright, quick and decisive. I also know that your parents want the best for you. Actually, this session is about how to manage your parents."

Gary laughed and we explored his goals. He wanted to get through school, play rugby but also go on to explore sports coaching.

Bearing this in mind, I used an approach that can work with young people. This is almost like giving them a forced choice exercise.

Taking a piece of paper, I drew three routes that Gary could follow. Describing each of these options, I said something along the following lines.

"Going forwards, it seems to me that you have at least three options. Let me draw these, then you may want to add more possibilities.

"Option A is to carry on as you are doing. It is to continue with your rugby but sometimes also upset the teachers.

"There are pluses and minuses to this route. The pluses are that you can enjoy the rugby, be popular with some people and eventually get through school.

"The minuses are that sometimes you will be impatient with teachers, get into trouble and create a few problems.

"You are a pragmatist. This means that you want to see the point of what you are being asked to do. So sometimes you may get upset if this is not explained fully."

"Option B is to try to be a perfect student who always follows the rules and does not cause difficulties. This sounds great, but it may not fit your personality.

"Option C is to continue with your rugby and show leadership qualities on and off the field. It is also to develop a mechanism for buying time when you feel angry with a teacher.

"This is a bit like controlling your emotions to not get sent off for arguing with the referee. It may take some time to learn this, but I am sure you could do it. Taking this route would mean making sure you get the best from school, manage your emotions and also help your parents.

"In addition, we could look at ways you can develop your leadership skills by learning from great leaders in different fields. We could also explore the possible ways forwards for you to explore more about the work possibilities in sports and sports coaching.

"There may be other options you would like to add. Looking at these three, however, here is a pen. Tick which option you feel is the one nearest to that which you want to follow."

Gary immediately put a tick against Option C. We then explored how to take this route.

This approach may sound contrived – it is very much a forced choice exercise – but I have seen work many times with young people. It helps them to see the obvious choices they can pursue – together with the consequences of the various options.

The handing over of the pen is symbolic. It involves them volunteering to pursue a particular route. We can then focus on how pursue this and achieve success.

Gary became better at managing his emotions. He went on to play semi-professional rugby, coach young people and, at the age of nineteen, embark on his coaching badges.

This approach is one that I have seen work with young people in many situations – such as with troubled teenagers, addicts and others facing challenges.

It involved the simple act of drawing their options on a paper or a flip chart. Then handing over the pen for them to tick the route they wanted to follow. The next step was to start on the real work, set specific goals and get some quick successes.

During critical times we would return to their options. They could then choose whether or not they wanted to keep working towards their picture of success.

If a person chose to be an addict, for example, it meant I would not work with them. That was their choice, however, and it was up to them to accept the consequences.

Offering Options To A Patient

This is the classic situation where a medical consultant helps a patient to see the potential options going forwards. They will start by welcoming the patient, who may sometimes be accompanied by their partner.

The medical consultant will respect the patient by giving them an overview of the situation. They may then say something along the following lines.

"Looking ahead, there are various options we can follow. There are benefits and possible side effects to each option.

"Option A is to ...

"Option B is to ...

"Option C is to ...

"It is up to you, of course, which option you want to follow.

"If you want my recommendation, then I will share this with you. But again it will be your decision.

"We can then look at how to move ahead with what you decide."

The medical consultant approach is one I invite professionals to consider when they are developing their skills as trusted advisors. When appropriate, they can ask the client if it is okay to share their ideas.

They can help the client to see the possible routes going forwards – together with the pluses and minuses of each option. They can then help the client to pursue their chosen route.

Offering Options To People Through Creative Matchmaking

The Creative Matchmaking Approach

This involves focusing on the following themes.

You can create a portfolio of people with specific skills

You can create a portfolio of people with specific skills

You can, when appropriate, connect people in a way that enables them to get potential win-wins

There are many ways to help people to succeed. One approach is to enable people to get professional win-wins by being a creative matchmaker.

Looking at my own work, during the past fifty years I have met many superb people. One of the most rewarding aspects has been giving some of these people the chance to meet. Many have then gone on to work together and succeed.

There are certain elements to creative matchmaking. These go beyond saying to people:

"I think you ought to meet."

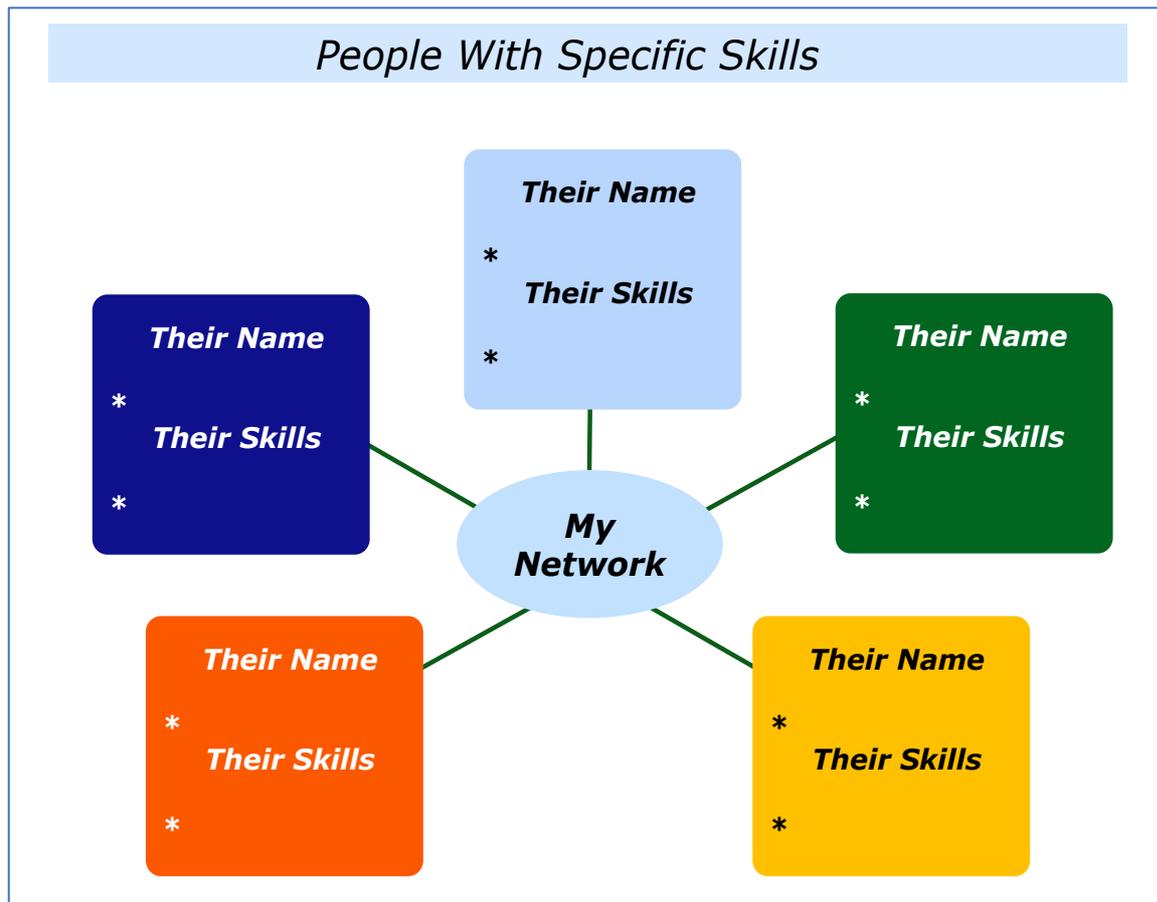

Imagine that you want to give people the opportunity to work together and succeed. Let's explore some of the potential steps towards making it happen.

You can create a portfolio of people with specific skills

One approach is to start by thinking about the various people in your network. It is then to ask yourself the following questions.

Which of these people would I recommend? What are each person's strengths? What are the specific skills or services they offer? Who are the kinds of people with whom they work best? How can they use their skills to help people to achieve success?

If you wish, draw a map of the people you would recommend and the specific skills they offer. You can move on to the next stage.

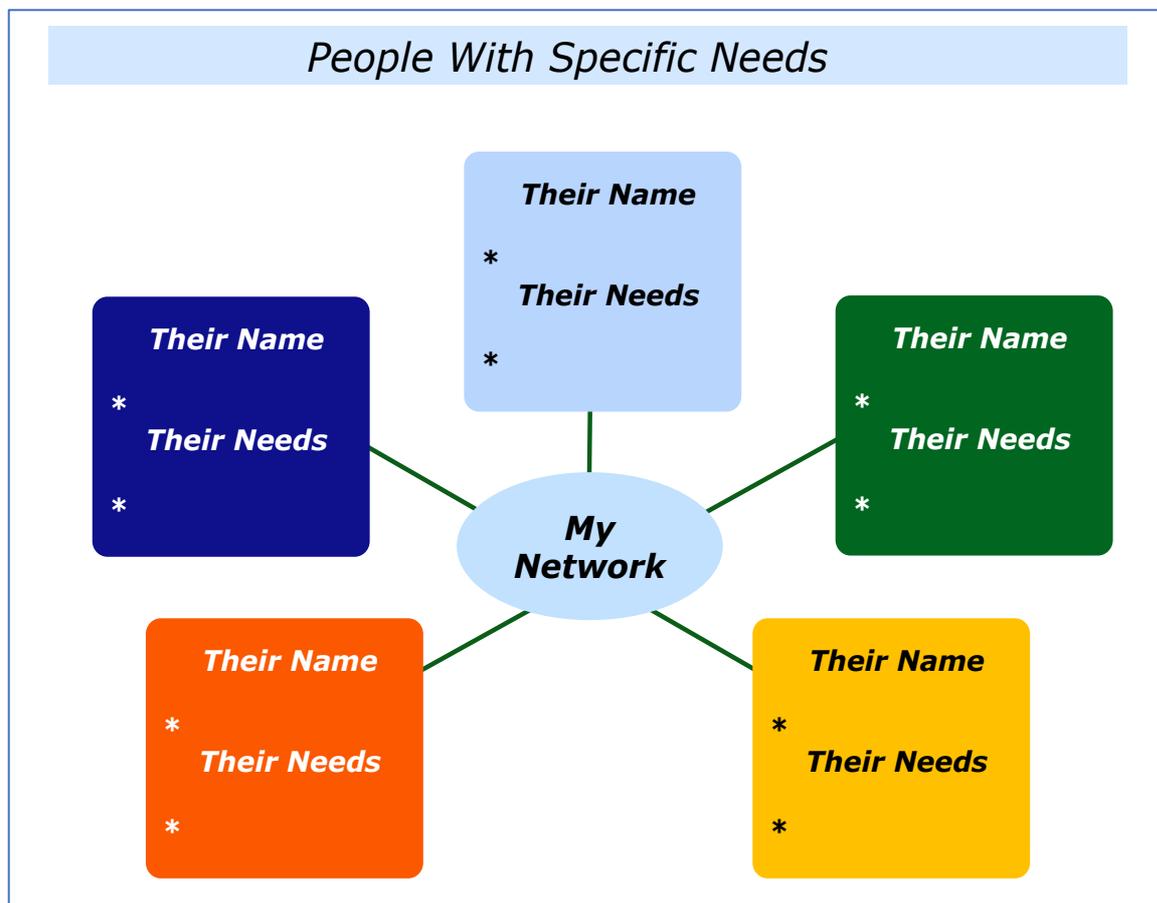

You can create a portfolio of people who have specific needs

If appropriate, think of the people in your network who may have specific needs. It is important, of course, to ensure they really do want these things.

A person may have said they are looking for help in a particular area. Alternatively you may think that, if explored in an appropriate way, they may be interested in getting specific kinds of help.

Again, it is important they would like help, rather you foisting it upon them. If you wish, draw a map of these people who may have specific needs.

You can, when appropriate, connect people in a way that enables them to get potential win-wins

Creative matchmakers are often generous people. They want to give people opportunities and help them succeed.

Sometimes this generosity stretches to actually giving work to others rather than doing it themselves. Such people want the best for their colleagues and customers, however, and help them to get win-wins.

You will have your own approach to creative matchmaking. One approach is to ask the following questions.

Who in my network has a specific need? What are the challenges they face? What are the results they want to achieve? What is their picture of success?

Who do I know who may be able to help this person to succeed? What are their specific skills? How can they use these skills to help the person to succeed?

How could I connect these people in a way that is most likely to succeed? How can I enable them to get potential win-wins?

Different people take this step in different ways. One approach I have used has been after having a conversation with a person in which they expressed having a certain need.

Reflecting on the conversation, I consider if there may be a possible win-win. If so, I may then write an email to a person that goes along something like the following lines.

Dear ...

It was good to catch up with you the other day.

During the conversation you mentioned that you were interested in pursuing ideas about ...

You will no doubt have lots of ideas in this area. If you are interested, however, I know a person who has specific skills in this area.

Their name is ... They have a track record of helping people to achieve their goals in the kinds of area you were mentioning.

If you are ever interested, I could connect you. I am sure the person would be happy to have an informal chat to share ideas.

It would then be up to you to see if you wanted to take it any further. Let me know what you think.

There are many times when the person gets back and says they would be interested in having an informal chat. I then write to the person who has the specific skill. This goes something along the following lines.

Dear ...

The other day I was talking with ...

During the conversation they mentioned that they were interested in pursuing ideas about ...

I hope it was okay, but I mentioned to them that you had specific expertise in this area.

They have since got back to me and said they would be interested in having an informal chat with you.

This would just be an introductory discussion - nothing formal or guaranteed - but they would like to know more about the specific skills you offer.

If you are interested, then I could tell you more about:

a) the person; b) the challenges they face and the results they want to achieve; c) the specific ways you may be able to help them to achieve their goals.

Let me know if this is something you may be interested in.

When appropriate, the next step is for me to write an email connecting the people. It then up to them how they want to take things further.

Different matchmakers have different ways of doing such groundwork. My own approach has been to let people know as much as possible about:

a) the other person or parties involved; b) the goals to achieve; c) the guidelines for potentially working well together.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to use some elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? How can you offer people the opportunity of getting a win-win?

Offering Options To A Senior Leadership Team

People often get hired because of their passion and promoted for their professionalism. When working with a senior team, however, they sometimes need to show they have perspective.

This was the challenge facing Stella, who was due to make a presentation to the senior team about continuing funding for a specific project. The project was to design a new model of customer service that was crucial to shaping the future business.

She believed passionately in the project but was worried that the leaders might pull the plug. The company had been making noises about cutting costs, focusing on priorities and even making redundancies. This did not augur well for the project being given further backing.

Stella's usual approach was to try to convince people, but sometimes her passion was a double-edged sword. She could get into arguments, which did not aid her case.

Looking ahead, she and I explored how she could increase the chances of the project being given further funding. One approach was to try to reconvince the leaders, but that could be dicey. Bearing this in mind, Stella adopted the following approach.

The Overview

She began her presentation by returning to the original brief. In a positive way, she reminded them about:

- a) the specific goals for the project;*
- b) the specific benefits to the company.*

Stella did this to revisit the picture of success. It was up to them where they still wanted to achieve these goals.

The Options

She outlined the potential options going forwards. Whilst she had a preferred option, she described the various routes in a neutral way. Stella also said that she would ask them if they could suggest any other possible options.

Option A would be to continue funding the full-scale project in its present form.

The pluses were it would produce profits plus lead to improving customer service and retention. The minuses were it would continue to cost investment in terms of time and money.

Option B would be to scale-down the project.

The pluses were it would produce some profits but on a lower scale. The minuses were it would not have the full impact and could lead to disillusion within the staff.

Option C would be shift the project's approach from doing lots of in-house design to developing the model with three existing customers and producing quick wins.

The pluses were it would test the approach in real situations and get some successes. The minuses were it would mean not involving every department in the company, which could lead to some people feeling a lack of ownership.

Option D would be to outsource project.

The pluses were that Stella and the team were released to do other things. The minuses were the project may stand a lesser chance of success.

Option E would be to stop the project.

The pluses were it would save money. The minuses were it would mean stopping a project that could shape tomorrow's business.

Stella asked the senior team for their views and any other suggestions regarding the ways forward. Some contributed ideas, but were happy she had covered most of the possibilities.

Bearing this in mind, Stella asked them to reflect and decide which option they wanted to pursue. She would then do her best to make this work successfully.

Stella wanted to go for Option C. She was prepared to reflect, however, if the senior team wanted to pursue another route. It would be up to her to decide if she still wanted to lead the project.

The senior team chose to go for Option C but with a reduced budget. Stella lost a couple of team members but was able to pilot the customer service approach with two companies.

Stella's passion was a great asset, but sometimes it had a downside. She chose to demonstrate perspective by describing the possible options for going forward. This was a method she continued to apply when presenting ideas to senior teams.

Every situation is different, but the offering options approach can help people to get an overview. It is then up to them which route they want to follow.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to use elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you clarify the outcomes the person or group want to achieve?
How can you explore the possible options for going forwards?

The Wholistic Approach To Wellbeing, Work And Wealth

There are many ways to live life. Some people take the wholistic approach and aim to get the right blend between wellbeing, work and wealth. Different people may face different challenges to get the right blend.

Some people may do stimulating work in pioneering companies but, at the same time, neglect their health. They may work long hours in the hope that one day they will sell the business and get a pot of gold. This wealth will then give them the chance to take care of their wellbeing.

Some people may work in organisations that put pressure on them to work long hours in relatively boring jobs. They may also be heavily supervised in ways that stifle their autonomy or do not allow them to play to their strengths. This can affect their health.

Each person will find their own way to manage these challenges. One key point to remember, however, is that it is often about finding the right blend. This is different from the old idea of life-work balance.

Great workers, for example, may absorb themselves deeply in their work for long periods of time. They do not necessarily do a 9-5 shift. They love to do rewarding work, but also recognise the need to recharge.

Such people may aim to enjoy both quality of life and quality of work. This calls for finding ways to blend their wellbeing, work and wealth. Let's explore how it may be possible to make this happen.

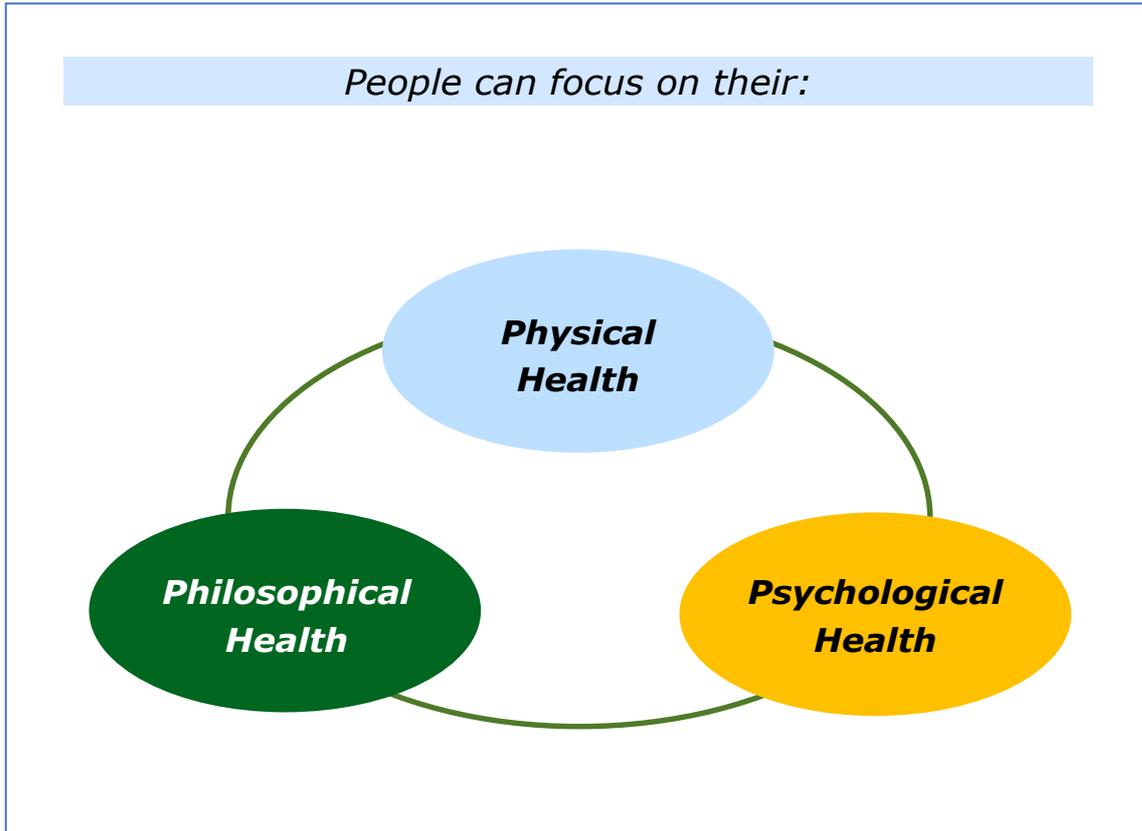

Wellbeing

The most obvious approach to wellbeing is to make sure that everybody has the basic materials for life. They will then be able to shape their own health, hope and happiness.

People who have these basic materials are then more likely to explore other aspects of their wellbeing. Imagine that you want to do this in your own way.

How do you rate your present state of health? There are several aspects to consider. These include your physical, psychological and philosophical health. We all want to care for our wellbeing, but sometimes we get wake-up calls.

We may carry a cold for months, feel emotionally exhausted, lose a sense of purpose or experience a crisis. It may then be time to reassess our lives and work. Let's explore how to maintain the various aspects of your health.

Physical Health

On a scale 0–10, how do you rate your physical health? How do you maintain your health? Do you ever get warning signs? One person explained this in the following way.

"My wake-up call came three years ago when climbing several flights of stairs. After the second flight I suddenly felt out of breath.

"This was something I had not been aware of before, probably because I normally took lifts.

"My professional life consisted of flying twice a week, eating unhealthy snacks and doing little exercise. There were two options.

I could carry on with the same schedule, which would mean getting fatter. Or I could take care of my body. I chose the latter.

"This called for developing a sustainable lifestyle rather than doing a crash programme. So I began running on weekends and slowly increased the exercise.

"During the day I grazed on regular healthy snack. These replaced eating heavy meals at lunch and the evening.

"Finally, I changed job. The flying had become a chore, with trips to the airport increasingly exhausting. Now I feel much better and have more energy."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Physical Health

The rating I would give myself regarding my physical health is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Psychological Health

On a scale 0–10, how do you rate your psychological health? Do you have a positive attitude? Do you have encouraging people around you? Do you have fulfilling work?

The key for many people is feeling in control. Being able to shape their future plays a key part in determining their psychological health. One person explained this in the following way.

"A great breakthrough for me came when learning about the concept of controlling the controllables.

Whatever is happening around me, I need to focus on what I can control, even if it is simply choosing my attitude'

"This has given me a different perspective on life."

There has been lots of research on the characteristics of people who are happy. The following pages again provide a summary of these findings.

People Who Are Happy

They often follow certain eternal principles and, as a by-product, they sometimes experience happiness.

They Have A Positive Attitude

They are grateful, generous and encourage other people to succeed. They are positive realists and focus on what they can control. They do things that give them positive energy and spend time with positive people.

They Follow Positive Principles

They develop a sense of purpose, follow their life principles and sometimes serve something greater than themselves. They aim to be the best they can be rather than compare themselves with others. They develop skills for finding solutions to challenges.

They Make A Positive Contribution

They build on their strengths, do satisfying work and help people to succeed. They pass on knowledge that encourages both present and future generations. They give positive things to people during their time on the planet and sometimes enjoy a sense of peace.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to rate your psychological health on a scale 0-10. It then invites you to describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Psychological Health

The rating I would give myself regarding my psychological health is:

___ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

Philosophical Health

On a scale 0–10, how do you rate your philosophical health? Do you find ways to develop a sense of purpose? Do you feel true to yourself? Do you have clear life goals? Do you do something each day to work towards your picture of success?

Everybody wants to enjoy a sense of meaning. Sometimes this comes encouraging their children, doing satisfying work or making a positive contribution each day. Sometimes it comes from serving something greater than themselves - be it following a faith, a calling, a tradition or whatever.

People like to see a connection between the actions they take each day and pursuing their overall life goals. Looking at your own life, how can you continue to make this link?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to rate your philosophical health on a scale 0-10. It then invites you to describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

There are many things that people can do to maintain their physical, psychological and philosophical health. Their sense of wellbeing is often affected by what they do at work, however, so let's explore this theme.

Work

There are many views on how people can do work that maintains their wellbeing. Let's look at one approach.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach involves going through the stages of shaping things, doing satisfying work and achieving success. Let's explore these themes.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you followed elements of this approach? You may have been pursuing a passion, doing a creative project or doing another activity.

How did you aim to shape things? How did you do satisfying work? How did you do your best to achieve success? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Satisfying Work In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I aimed to shape something, do satisfying work and achieve success was:

The specific things I did then to go through these stages were:

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

Shaping

People like to feel in control. They like to shape things in their lives and work. They sometimes follow this path when doing work by themselves. Being natural designers, they enjoy making decisions about the work they are going to do and deliver.

People sometimes follow elements of the shaping approach when working for organisations. They recognise that their decision making power will be more limited, however, when contributing towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Good organisations recognise this challenge. They therefore manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. They give their people freedom, within parameters, regarding how they use their strengths to deliver the agreed goals.

People like to be architects in their lives and work. They are then more likely to channel their energies into being artisans on the way towards achieving success.

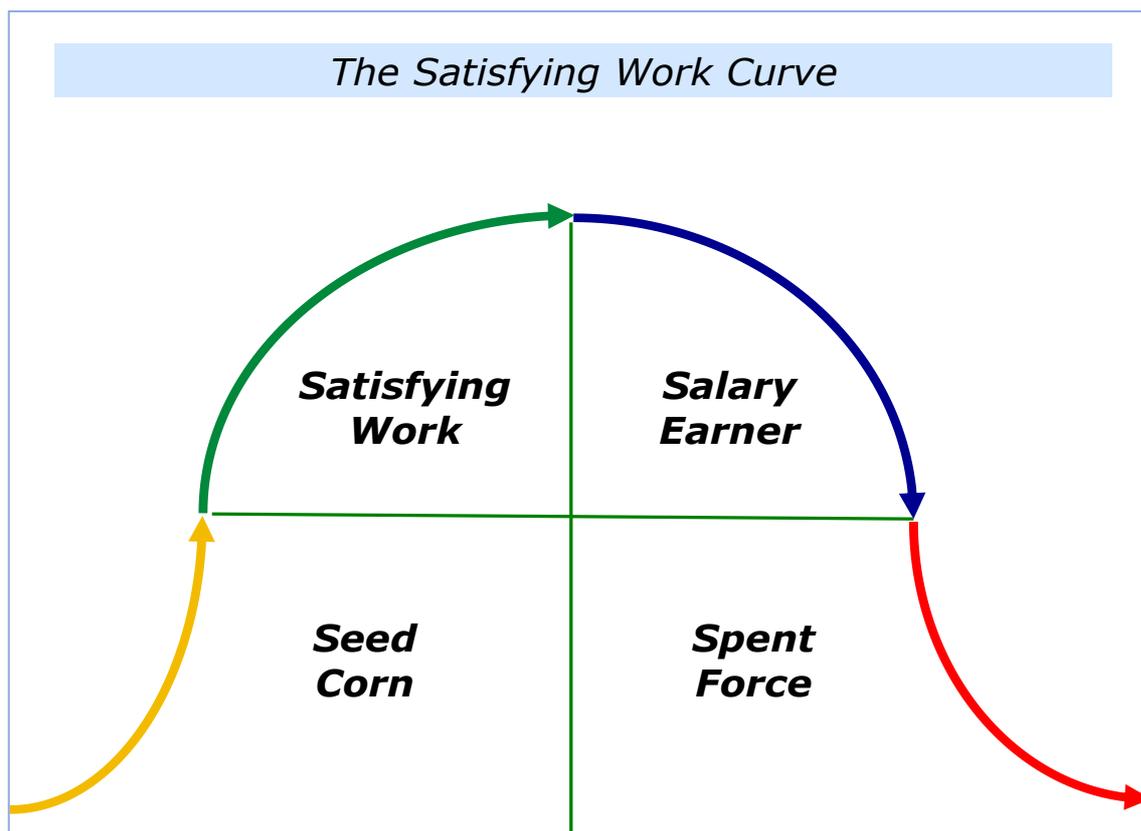

Imagine that you want to shape something in the future. You may want to do work in a garden, write an article, do a creative project or pursue another activity.

Bearing in mind the things you can control, what may be the results you want to achieve? How can you shape the way you do the work? How can you do your best to achieve the desired results?

Imagine that you have taken this step. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

Satisfying Work

People like to do satisfying work. There are many models for doing such work. One approach encourage people to explore where they are on the satisfying work curve.

Seed Corn

A person explores many possibilities. They follow their interests and plants lots of seeds. Some of these turn into activities that they can develop. They then pursue a specific activity they find stimulating.

Satisfying Work

The person translates the activity into doing a specific piece of satisfying work. This may be a task, project or other activity. They continue to pursue this venture and, if appropriate, aim to find some funding.

Salary Earner

The person translates doing the satisfying work into earning a salary. This produces both upsides and downsides. Sometimes they have spurts of growth; sometimes they feel they have plateaued. Sometimes they continue doing good work, but sometimes they experience the next stage.

Spent Force

The person finds their energy begins to deteriorate. The cash is still coming in but doing the activity is no longer stimulating. They feel like a spent force.

This does not matter if they have spent time nurturing their next crop of seed corn. They will then be ready to begin the next development cycle.

Imagine that you are doing satisfying work. This may also involve going onto the next stage.

Success

Different people have different definitions of success. Here are some of the things that people may mention.

Success For Me Is:

*Doing my best every day ... Staying sober ... Helping children to read ...
Creating an environment in which people grow ... Making music that makes people happy ... Passing on knowledge that helps people to succeed.*

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may aim to shape something, do satisfying work and do our best to achieve success? How can you take these steps in your own way?

Wealth

There are many views about what constitutes wealth. As mentioned earlier, it is vital to ensure people have the basic materials for life.

Some people may be driven to make lots of money. They may want to feel secure, provide for their children and achieve a particular view of success. Some people find this approach works; others find that there is a heavy price to pay when aiming for a pot of gold.

Some people have a wider view of wealth. Paul Hwoschinsky explored this approach in his 1990 book True Wealth. He invited people to focus on non-financial forms of wealth.

These could include their health, life-experiences, relationships, enjoyable activities, strengths and resilience. They could also include their imagination, creativity, knowledge, perspective and other assets.

Different people describe different things regarding what they believe to be real wealth. Here are some things they say.

Real Wealth For Me Is:

*Being with our children ... Sharing memories with my partner ...
Walking with our dogs ... Working in the garden ... Listening to music ... Enjoying the food we cook ... Appreciating beauty.*

*Doing work I love ... Encouraging people ... Seeing people develop ...
Being creative ... Finding solutions to challenges ... Feeling contented
... Being alive after a serious illness ... Seeing every day as a bonus.*

Looking at your own life, what do you consider to be your wealth? You may have certain financial assets such as some money, a house and material possessions. What other kinds of wealth do you enjoy?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

*

The specific things I can do to appreciate and build on these kinds of wealth are:

The specific kinds of wealth I may aim to add in the future without damaging my wellbeing or work are:

People who appreciate their wealth are often generous. They have an abundance philosophy and want to help others to grow. They also believe in finding win-win solutions.

People who don't appreciate their wealth may be grumpy. They sometimes have a scarcity philosophy and want to stop others developing. They may start fights that result in collateral damage.

Tom Rath is a generous person who has made an enormous contribution to helping people to improve their wellbeing. He led the Gallup Organization's work on strengths and employee engagement.

Whilst there he wrote books such as StrengthsFinder 2.0, Strengths Based Leadership and Wellbeing: The Five Essential Elements.

Moving on, Tom explored how people could take care of their health and make their best contribution. This led to him producing books such as Eat Move Sleep, Are You Fully Charged? and Life's Great Question.

Tom has been interested in wellbeing since discovering he had a genetic cancer condition that posed huge health challenges. Learning from his own experiences and studies, he turned his attention to health in modern societies.

This led to him writing Eat Move Sleep which has enabled many people to improve their lifestyles. Below are excerpts from a Question and Answer session in which Tom described why he wrote the book.

After writing business books for more than a decade, I realised that improving health is the biggest business challenge of our generation.

Nothing breaks household finances, corporate balance sheets, or national economies faster than poor health.

But the much larger reason why I decided to focus all of my time and energy on this topic is because I was tired of seeing people that I care about suffer unnecessarily and die early.

We are literally killing ourselves, sapping our energy, and destroying our wellbeing as a result of lousy decisions we make about our health each day.

The vast majority of human disease and illness is preventable. There are hundreds of specific, proven actions we can take to increase our odds of living longer and stronger.

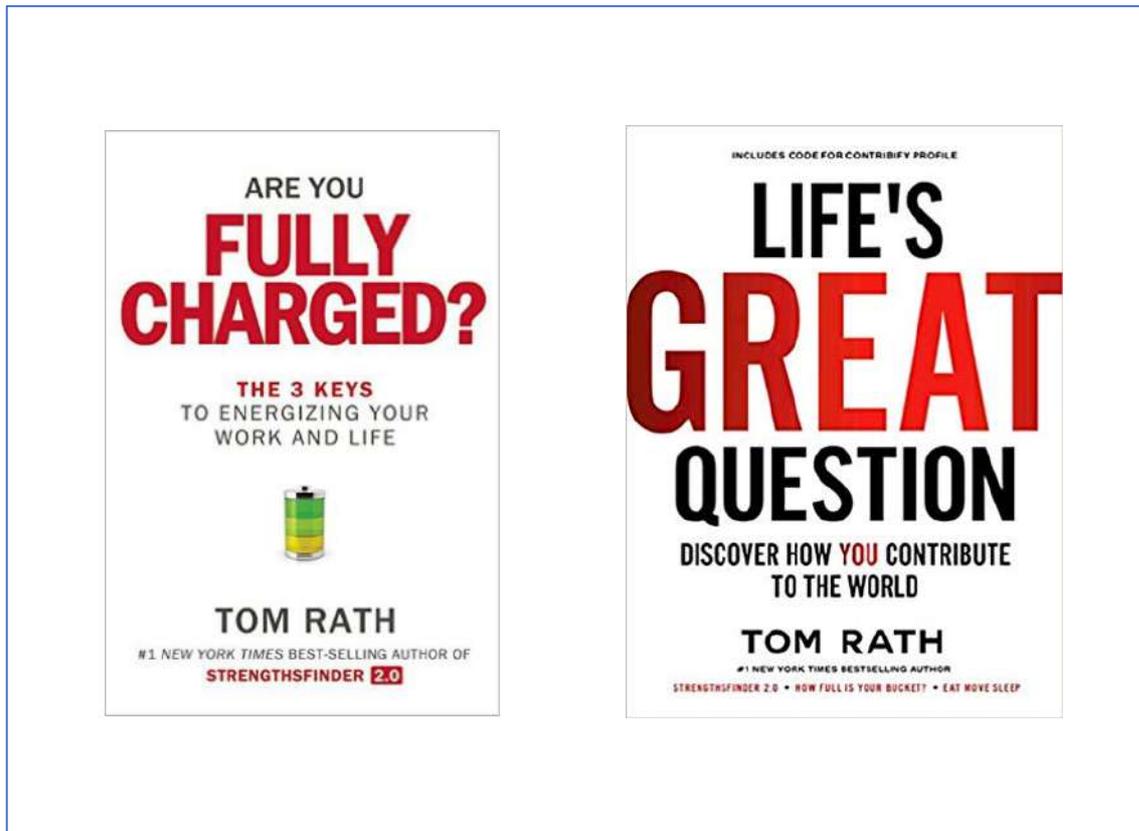

What matters most are the small decisions we make each day, ones that give us more energy in the moment and also prevent illness in the future.

These three elements – eating, moving, and sleeping – build on one another. Eating right makes it easier to be active. Being active makes it easier to sleep. Sleeping well helps you to avoid bad foods, and so on.

Building on these themes, Tom explored how people could manage their energy. He then wrote Are You Fully Charged? This provided many practical tips that people could use to improve the quality of their lives and work.

Moving on, Tom focused on how people could make their best contributions during their time on the planet. This led to him writing Life's Great Question. Here are some excerpts from a description of the book.

Life's Great Question: What are the most meaningful contributions you can make?

What are the most meaningful contributions we can make? This is Life's Great Question.

Life is about what you do that improves the world around you. It is about investing in the development of other people. And it is about efforts that continue to grow when you are gone. In the end, you won't get to stay around forever, but your contributions will.

The key is to invest more time where your talents will yield the greatest return for others. Work is about what you create that improves lives. It is about investing in the development of other people.

While your talents are nature's best building blocks, they serve the world best when your efforts are directed outward — not inward. Consider how your talents can make a more meaningful contribution to others over a lifetime.

Life has an unknown expiration date. Your efforts and contributions to others do not. The time, energy, and resources you invest in people you care for and your community keep growing forever.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of ways you may want to follow elements of the wellbeing, work and wealth approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Stability, Stimulation And Success Approach

People Can Choose To Follow:

The Stability, Stimulation And Success Approach

Rather Than:

The Switchback Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people follow the stability approach rather than the switchback approach. They also focus on stimulation and achieving success.

Such people aim to provide stability during turbulent times. They also aim to be consistent, clear and find solutions. They do not take people through a switchback of events or emotions.

Good leaders, for example, are like good parents. They are positive, predictable and aim to create an encouraging environment in which people can grow.

Such leaders provide stability during difficult times. They may then, when appropriate, provide stimulation and help people to achieve success. Let's explore how they may focus on these themes.

The Stability, Stimulation And Success Approach

Leader A, who ran an organisation of 400 people, took this approach during the Covid pandemic. They had previously built a successful organisation by taking the following steps:

They had created a supportive and stimulating environment in which self-motivated people could deliver ongoing success;

They had continually communicated the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

They had given people the practical and psychological support they needed to do superb work and deliver their parts of the picture success.

They had also ensured the organisation built a long financial runway. This paid dividends when Covid hit. Bearing these factors in mind, they focused on the following themes to manage the crisis and also shape a positive future.

Stability

Leader A aimed to maintain stability during the difficult times. This included communicating with their people through a series of Zoom sessions.

They explained that the organisation was in a good financial position and people would continue to be paid. If anybody had any particular difficulties, however, then certain kinds of help were available.

Leader A reiterated the organisation's purpose and principles. They also explained how these would be expressed in the present situation by translating them into specific goals. Looking ahead, they encouraged people to take the following steps:

To keep in touch with each other and, when appropriate, ask for help and give each other the required support;

To connect with their clients and provide practical support that would help them to manage the present situation and achieve their specific goals;

To, if they wished, get involved in task forces that would help the organisation to shape a positive future.

This final point encouraged people to look beyond the present situation. It also embodied the following theme.

Stimulation

Leader A aimed to build on the stability and also provide stimulation. They wanted to encourage people to channel some of their emotions in a positive way. Bearing this in mind, they took the following steps.

The leader held several sessions with their leadership team. These involved refocusing on the organisation's aims by exploring the following themes.

Stimulation And Shaping A Positive Future

- Bearing in mind our strengths, if we were starting the business again today what would we do? What would be the practical steps we would take to increase the chances of achieving success?
- Who would be the kinds of customers we would focus on? Who would be the present customers we would want to keep? What may be the challenges they will be facing? How could we help them to achieve success?
- Bearing in mind the potential changes in the market, who may the kinds of customers that may thrive in the future? What may be the challenges they will be facing?

- Which of these kinds of customers are we working with at the moment? How can we build on these relationships and help them to achieve future success?
- Who may be the similar kinds of customers with whom we do not have long-standing relationships? When appropriate, how could we connect with them in a positive way? How could we share ideas that may help them to achieve future success?
- Which parts of the present business would we keep and what would be their targets? Who would be the people we would put in these parts of the business? What support would we give them to deliver the goals?

- Bearing in mind our strengths, what may be the additional services and products we can offer to potential customers? What may be the new parts of the business we can develop to deliver success?
- Let's move on to the steps we can take to shape a positive future. Bearing in mind our organisation's purpose and the principles we believe in following, we can aim:

To clarify the specific goals we want to achieve in the next year and translate these into a clear picture of success;

To clarify the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success.
- We can do these exercises and then move to the next stage.

The Picture Of Success

The specific goals we aim to achieve in the next ... are:

Strategies

Bearing in mind our organisation's purpose and principles, the key strategies we aim to follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success are:

- Let's move on to the next stage. This involves focusing on how we can realign the business to deliver strategies. The key will be to put the right people in the right places to get the right results.
- Who are the people we want to put into each parts of the business to increase the chances of delivering success? How can we put these people in these places and give them the required support?
- Let's move on to a tougher question. What may be the parts of the business we don't want to keep? What are the practical steps we can take to, as far as possible, manage these challenges in a moral and positive way?

- How can we provide encouragement to the people who will continue to be part of the future organisation? How can we provide both practical and psychological support to people who may not contribute to the organisation in the future?
- Let's move on to the various responsibilities. My responsibility will be to drive the key strategies. We need mission holders, however, who will take responsibility for implementing parts of each strategy.
- Let me know if you would like to be one of these mission holders. If so, let me know the kinds of support you require. We will then make sure that you are set up to succeed and given what you need to deliver the goods.

- Let's move on to communicating some elements of the future strategy to our people. This needs to be done in a positive but realistic way.
- Bearing this in mind, let's focus on the practical things we can do:
 - To get some quick successes;*
 - To communicate the picture of success and the strategies we are going to follow – and to do this in a reassuring way;*
 - To involve people in helping to shape a positive future.*
- Finally, what else can we do to help the organisation to achieve ongoing success?

Leader A's team agreed on the positive ways forward. They then did a good job of communicating these things to the people in the organisation. They again focused on aiming:

To provide stability and support for people ... To provide stimulation by encouraging people to focus on the future picture of success ... To invite people to add to shaping the strategies for achieving future success.

This final point encouraged people to channel their energies in a positive way. It also involved focusing on the following theme.

Success

Leader A continued to keep people's eyes on the picture of success. This involved sharing the exercises described earlier. It also involved updating people on the progress being made. Here are the themes they covered.

The organisation continued to evolve during the next two years and many of its people remained to shape the future. They continue to maintain high morale and also deliver success for both the business and its customers.

Some people moved on for various reasons. Some received offers of senior roles elsewhere. Some changed their lifestyles after the pandemic. Some were given lots of practical help to move on after their roles disappeared.

Good leaders – and other people – often aim to follow the stability approach. They do this when encountering both successes and setbacks. Some leaders take another route.

The Switchback Approach

Leader B ran an organisation of several hundred people. Whilst they could be inspiring on occasions, they also had mood swings and could be intimidating. This approach came to the fore during the Covid pandemic.

The leader believed in going with their gut. This sometimes worked well during the company's early days but became a liability as it acquired businesses and grew.

They focused on driving profits. They had a style of issuing orders and micromanaging people. They could be charming – especially when wanting something – but often veered into criticising people.

Leader B reacted to the Covid pandemic by using lots of military analogies. They defined it as a war the company could win. At the same time, they said there were battles ahead.

The leader initially attempted to rally the troops. When the reality of Covid sank in, however, they retreated into their bunker. Sometimes they emerged to issue contradictory statements about the future strategy.

Several key members of staff decided to buy time by staying in their present roles. They also aimed:

To take care of their loved ones and themselves;

To do their best to support their people;

To prepare the ground for moving on from the organisation.

Leader B and their organisation did come through the pandemic but the business was much diminished. It lost key managers who had previously shielded people from the leader's behaviour. This put the organisation into a downward spiral.

Different people have different ways of managing situations. Some follow the stable, stimulating and successful approach. Some follow the switchback approach. The route they choose has consequences for both themselves and other people.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of situation where you may want to follow elements of the stable, stimulating and successful approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Appreciative Inquiry Approach

Appreciative Inquiry

AI is an organic approach to development. It studies humanity at its best and builds on what works. It invites people to focus on a particular theme they want to explore. It then invites them:

- To clarify when they have done superb work in this area in the past;*
- To clarify the principles they followed then to do superb work;*
- To clarify how they can follow these principles - plus add other skills - to do superb work in this area in the future.*

There are many models for helping people, teams and organisations to develop. Appreciative Inquiry is one of the most effective. It is based on what works.

AI studies humanity at its best. Bearing in mind the challenge that people want to explore, they are invited to learn from their positive history. This involves them asking some of the following questions.

When have we done superb work in this area in the past? What did we do right then? What were the principles we followed? How did we translate these into action?

How can we follow these principles in the future? How can we translate these into setting a specific goal? How can we then do our best to achieve the picture of success?

David Cooperrider began developing Appreciative Inquiry in the early 1980s. At that time he was completing his doctorate by doing organisational development work at The Cleveland Clinic.

He began with traditional change management questions, looking at deficits and gaps in performance. Then something happened. Impressed by the co-operation and innovation he found, he focused more on people's strengths and professional high points.

David began helping people, teams and organisations to find and follow their successful patterns. Joined by other pioneers, he and Diana Whitney co-authored the first book on the topic. This was called Appreciative Inquiry: A positive revolution in change.

AI can be used with small and big groups. Sometimes it can involve thousands of people. It enables them to tackle challenges in their daily lives, work and communities.

People start by choosing a theme they want to explore. These may include, for example, some of the following.

How can we improve morale? How can we make good decisions during a crisis? How can we work well together across departments? How can we employ the talents of all the people in our organisation?

How can we build on the strengths in our local community? How can we revitalise our High Streets? How can we enable our young people to flourish? How can we help our city to prosper?

How can we improve our customer service? How can we develop successful new products? How can we get the right balance between wealth and wellbeing? How can we achieve sustainable success?

AI has a track record of delivering the goods. Here are some testimonials from people who have used it.

"I would like to commend you (David Cooperrider) for your methodology of Appreciative Inquiry and to thank you for introducing it to the United Nations.

"Without this, it would have been very difficult, perhaps even impossible, to constructively engage so many leaders of business, civil society and government."

United Nations Secretary General Kofi Annan

"Appreciative Inquiry is the way to rediscover and tap into our core strengths and highest potentials.

"It helps us to develop our self-talk in a constructive way and encourages us to bring out our best qualities in serving this institution.

"Appreciative Inquiry is a method that helps us to develop the goals and dreams that support the future of our Navy."

Admiral Vernon Clark, CNO of the US Navy

"Appreciative Inquiry has transformed our approach to sustainability – it is now being owned by the whole organisation and the AI summit was instrumental in achieving this."

Mike Westcott, Group HR Director, National Grid, London

Writing in Psychology Today, Michelle McQuaid described some AI's achievements. Here is an excerpt from her article.

Sought out by world leaders, including the Dalai Lama, Kofi Annan and Jimmy Carter, studies have found the positive psychology inspired questions of Professor Cooperrider and his colleagues have helped:

Accelerate the growth of the United Nations Global Compact for sustainability from 1,500 firms to 8,000 of the world's largest corporations.

Improved energy efficiency across the Commonwealth of Massachusetts resulting in nearly $9 billion of benefits for residents and businesses.

Transformed a mining company once referred to as "dune-rapers" into a country's top corporate citizen while still growing their profits.

United the dairy industry to reduce greenhouse gas emissions by 25% in 2 years whilst increasing farm business value by more than $230 million.

Brought together the world's religious leaders to create over 600 collaboration centers around the globe that have touched the lives of more than 7 million people to unite the strengths of all faiths and build a better world.

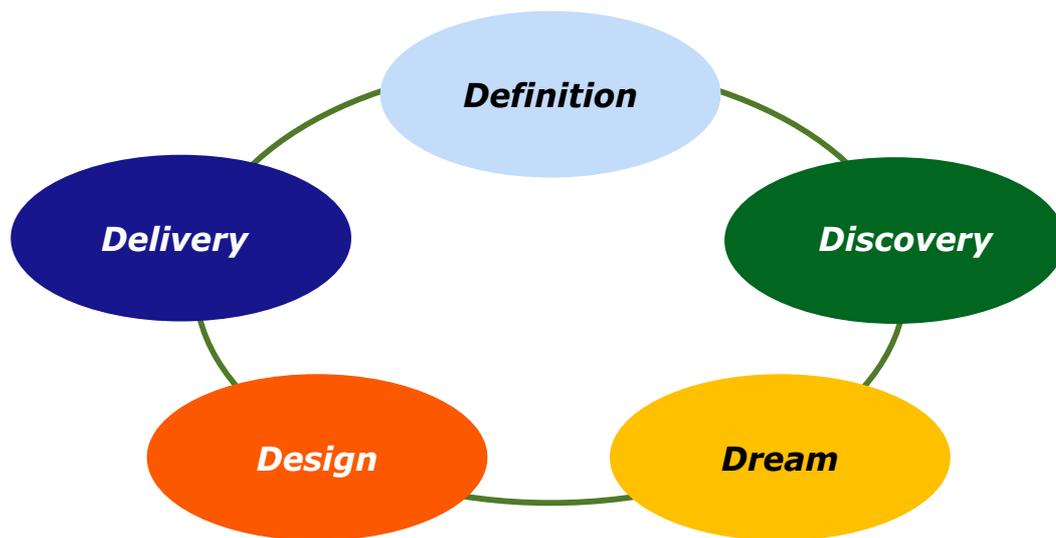

People like Appreciative Inquiry. It builds on what works and, providing people then do the work, it works. People can keep building on their strengths and delivering success.

Here is a short introduction to AI. People start by Defining the theme, challenge or question they want to explore. They then go through the stages of focusing on Discovery, Dream, Design and Delivery.

AI originally used a Four D model, starting with Discovery and the final stage was called Destiny. Some people still use that approach, but we will explore the Five D model.

Appreciative Inquiry

People define the topic they want to explore and work through the following stages. (In the original model there were four stages and the final stage was called Destiny.)

Definition

AI starts by inviting people to clarify the topic they want to explore. It can be useful:

To define the theme, challenge or question they want to explore;

To frame this in a positive way - because this determines the way in which people will channel their energy;

To frame it as a question, such as 'How can we ...'

AI mirrors the approach taken by many creative people who frame challenges in a positive way. They move from saying:

"How can I stop feeling bad?" to: "How can I start feeling good?"

"How can we stop arguing?" to: "How can we, as far as possible, find a win-win?"

"But you can't frame every challenge in a positive way," somebody may say.

Many AI practitioners help people to reframe things by using Flip Questions. If a person is describing what is wrong, they flip the energy by asking:

"So what do you want to happen? What is your picture of success?"

Sometimes a person or group may resist this approach. They may want to keep describing what is wrong, but this can be debilitating.

David was confronted by the challenge of formulating a positive question when he received a phone call from a consultant who was helping a company to tackle sexual harassment.

During the previous 2 years staff had attended training designed to eliminate this issue, but the levels of sexual harassment were increasing. The consultant running the diversity training asked David:

"How would you take an appreciative approach to sexual harassment?"

David asked about the real results to achieve. The reply was:

"We want to dramatically cut the incidence of sexual harassment. We want to solve this huge problem."

David asked what this would look like. The consultant said:

"What we really want is to see the development of a new century organisation - a model of high quality cross-gender relationship in the workplace."

Though this wording was somewhat awkward, it clarified a positive picture of success. So eventually the questions posed to people during the later Discovery stage were along the lines of:

When have women and men worked together successfully in the company? What did they do right then? How can we follow those principles in the future?

The company held a pilot programme on this theme and it exceeded expectations. Hundreds of people provided stories illustrating men and women working together successfully in the company.

Defining the topic is crucial. It creates the framework within which people can channel their positive energy. People can then embark on the next stage of the AI process.

Discovery

The Discovery phase taps into the positive core – the life-giving forces of a team, organisation or community. It encourages people to build on their inner strengths and successful patterns.

Imagine that you are using this approach with a group of people who have defined the topic they want to explore. They have also defined it in terms of: “How can we ...?”

Invite people to form small groups and each person:

To describe a specific situation in the past when they - or the team they were part of at that time - did superb work in this area;

To describe the specific things they did right then - the various principles that people followed - to do superb work;

To describe the specific things they did to translate these principles into action and what happened as a result.

Invite people to present their findings back to the big group. They can do this by using the following framework.

Dream

Appreciative Inquiry is different from most visioning approaches in a crucial way. It builds on the stories, strengths and successful principles that have already emerged. People are doing several things.

They are building on the organic principles they know work.

They are then more confident about extrapolating these principles into the future.

They see how these principles might be expressed in a picture of success.

People may be dreaming but, because they are following successful principles, they have a belief they can deliver. This is because they have started from within. The dream is organic rather than something grafted on.

AI practitioners find the Dream and Design parts sometimes start to overlap. This is okay, because there is often a moving forwards and backwards between the two elements.

There are, however, a few things to mention in relation to defining the dream. It can be useful:

To make sure the dream is an expression of the principles that people know have worked already;

To make sure the dream is stimulating, stretching and yet within the scope of the controllables – the things they can control in the situation;

To, if appropriate, invite people to make a picture - or other representation - of them achieving the dream.

People can draw a picture to show what will actually be happening when they reach the goal.

They can bring this to life by adding the actual words they want to be hearing from customers, colleagues, the press and other stakeholders. They can then put the picture in a place where they see it each day.

One key point is worth underlining. People who deliver a dream are often positive realists. They have a positive approach, but they are also realistic.

They are mountain climbers. They focus on achieving a particular goal but also do their due diligence. Such people often go through the following stages when exploring the potential project.

They clarify the benefits - for all the stakeholders – of achieving the goal.

They clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving the goal.

They clarify how to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses.

They clarify whether they are prepared to accept the whole package.

They check their motivation by asking:

"On a scale 0–10, to what extent are we really serious about doing what is required to achieve the goal?"

They make sure the rating is at least 8+/10.

Here is a framework people can follow during the Dream stage. They can then present these findings to the whole group.

*The dream we want to achieve
- the picture of success - is:*

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Here is a picture - a visual representation - of the actual things that will be happening when we achieve the dream:

Design

The Dream is the What – the real results to achieve - and the Why - the benefits of achieving the goal. The Design is the How – the strategies for achieving the goal.

Different people use different approaches to clarify their strategies. You will, of course, have your own method. Here is one approach. Bearing in mind the picture of success, people may ask some of the following questions.

What are the key strategies we can follow to give ourselves the greatest chance of success? How can we implement these strategies successfully? What support will people need to deliver success?

What are people's best contributions towards achieving the goals? What are people's strengths? How can we build on and coordinate these strengths to reach the goal? How can we do any remaining tasks that must be completed?

How can we make clear contracts with people about their best contributions? How can we encourage them to do superb work? How can we manage them by outcomes rather than by tasks?

What are the potential difficulties people may face along the way? How can we anticipate and prevent these difficulties happening? How can we manage the difficulties if they do happen?

What is the road map – the action plan – for achieving the dream? Who will need to deliver what and by when? What will be the actual things that will be happening that will show we have reached the goal?

This is a standard planning approach, but sometimes there may be the need to find creative solutions. David explains this in the following way.

"People are encouraged to wander beyond the data with the essential question being this:

"What would our organisation look like if it were designed in every way possible to maximise the qualities of the positive core and enable the accelerated realisation of our dreams?"

"When inspired by a great dream we have yet to find an organisation that did not feel compelled to design something very new and very necessary."

Imagine you are helping an organisation to take these steps. You can invite people to clarify the key strategies they will follow to achieve the goals.

If appropriate, people can then form small teams where they focus on their elements of implementing the strategy. They then can present these back to the whole group.

They can start their presentations, however, by completing the following headlines. Then, if appropriate, they can break these down into more detailed action plans.

Design Presentation

The key strategies we can follow to achieve the dream are:

 To ...*

 To ...*

 To ...*

Delivery

The Delivery phase translates the dream into reality. People throw themselves into the work and get some early wins.

Maintaining the momentum is crucial, so it is vital to have follow up meetings. One approach is to gather people together at least once a month to report their progress.

If you are running such sessions, keep people's eyes on the big picture. You can start, for example, by reminding people of the Dream. People can then be invited to present the following things.

The specific things they have delivered in the past month towards achieving the dream.

The specific things they plan to deliver in the next month.

The specific challenges they face and their plans for tackling these challenges.

The specific support they would like to help to deliver the dream.

The specific other topics they would like to explore regarding how to deliver the dream.

You can encourage people to build on their successes and develop the habit of constant improvement. This will increase the chances of achieving the goal.

Appreciative Inquiry builds on the positive core in people, teams, organisations, communities and societies. Here are some quotes from people who have used AI.

"AI changed the entire culture of our company, from the shop floor to the boardroom.

"People's energy and passion are at an all-time high. Innovation now occurs at all levels.

"Trust, collaboration and teamwork improved. Employee retention increased and creative new products were developed.

"The positive change process works better than any other change methodology we have ever used."

Fairmount Minerals

"As an academic and advisor to companies on Conscious Capitalism, I have experienced the huge impact that AI can have on companies and all their stakeholders:

"Discovering a sense of shared purpose, aligning their interests together, discovering exciting new ways of creating value so that all can not only win, but win more, and creating cultures suffused by caring and passion.

"AI is a huge contribution to our collective understanding of how we can bring about greater individual, group, community, organisational, national and planetary flourishing."

Rajendra Sisodia, Co-Founder & Co-Chairman of Conscious Capitalism Inc.

David Cooperrider continues to be optimistic about the future. He is particularly fascinated by how AI can help corporations to develop. Here is his view about how the strengths approach can help them to make a positive contribution to the planet.

"The question we're working on now is whether the strengths revolution can lead us to a point where positive institutions can be defined as places that elevate, magnify, and then extend our higher human strengths into the world?"

"In other words, can a corporation be a vehicle for bringing more courage or wisdom into the world?"

"And what we're seeing is that that's absolutely the case."

The Managing Your Professional World Approach

There are many models for developing in your work. One approach is to start by managing the various aspects of your professional world.

Imagine you lead a team and want to manage the various aspects of the role. One senior manager explained this in the following way.

"Success calls for getting the right balance between managing your stakeholders, team and customers.

"People often think that climbing the corporate ladder will lead to them spending their days directing strategy, but this isn't the case.

"Frequently you spend increasing amounts of time managing your key stakeholders, such as your bosses. That is fine, because morally you must satisfy the people who pay you.

"Managing upwards is crucial, because many bosses worry. They will also intervene if you don't keep them informed."

"At the same time, you will only be able to deliver the required results if you lead a superb team and satisfy your customers. Getting the right balance is the key to achieving success."

Managing Your Key Stakeholders

Imagine you are a leader. Who are the key stakeholders you need to manage? These may include your manager, other leaders in the organisation and some of your peers. Let's explore how you can manage these stakeholders successfully.

The first step is to ensure that, as far as possible, you are working for a manager with whom you have a values-fit. Later we will explore what to do when this is not the case.

Let's imagine, however, that you and your manager share similar professional values. You are in broad agreement about the picture of success and the principles to follow to achieve these results.

Every team has a scorecard. These are the mandatory things that must be delivered. You may also be able to do stimulating projects on top of this. It is vital to deliver the scorecard, however, otherwise life can get difficult.

Bearing this in mind, it can be good to meet with your manager and agree on the goals. It is useful:

To make clear contracts about what your team must deliver and by when;

To proactively keep your key stakeholders informed about the progress towards achieving the goals;

To get some quick wins, produce superb work and deliver the agreed picture of success.

Aim to get some quick wins. This will buy time, reassure your stakeholders and enable you to get on with other aspects of the work.

Managing your stakeholders is crucial - they are akin to your Venture Capitalists. They are also your key customers. Be proactive and manage the centre - otherwise the centre will manage you.

Getting this right will release time to manage your team and customers. Getting it wrong will mean spending masses of time trying to keep the stakeholders onside.

Clear contracting provides the framework for your work together. How to make this happen?

One approach is to meet with your key stakeholder and agree on the outcomes to be delivered. You will do this in your own way. Here are some themes, however, that you may want to cover when meeting with your manager.

"Thank you for the meeting.

"I would like to make clear contracts about the specific results you want our team to deliver. We will then make sure we deliver these goals.

"Looking at the bigger picture, the organisation's goals are:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"Bearing this in mind, as far as I understand it the specific results our team needs to deliver are:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"This is the scorecard – the mandatory things that we must deliver. Are there any other things you would like us to add to the scorecard? If so, let me add those to the targets.

"We will proactively keep you and the other stakeholders informed about our progress towards achieving the goals. We will also aim to get the following quick successes:

1) To ...

2) To ...

3) To ...

"Are there any other Dos and Don'ts you would like us to follow on the way towards delivering the goals? Are there any other topics that it would be useful to explore?

"Thanks for the session. I will put together a summary of the results to achieve – together with what must be delivered by when – and then send it to you. Is that okay?"

Repeat this process with each of the key stakeholders. You can then get on with delivering the scorecard and also doing stimulating projects.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing Your Team's Outcomes

Good leaders create an encouraging environment in which motivated people can perform superb work. They then aim to manage the team's outcomes.

They aim to be positive, predictable and enable people to achieve peak performance. They recognise that they cannot actually manage people, however, because people manage themselves.

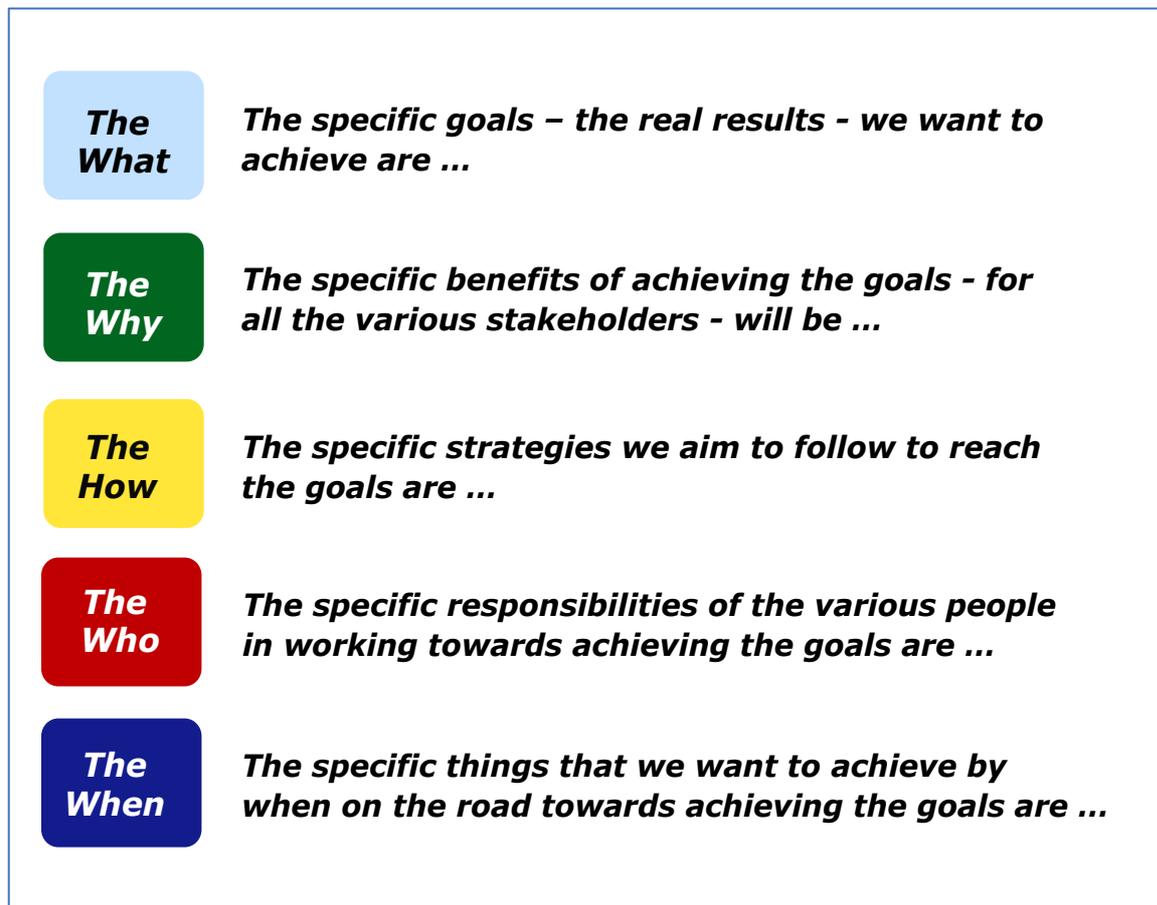

Such leaders provide people with an inspiring framework and the support they need to do the job. They then manage people's contributions towards achieving the team's goals.

Different leaders do this in different ways. One approach is to start by giving people the big picture and context. Some do this in the following way.

Good Leaders

They focus on the outcomes to achieve. They keep communicating the What, Why, How, Who and When.

Imagine that you have taken this step. It can then be useful:

To invite people to decide if they want they want to contribute towards achieving the goals;

To make clear contracts about their best contributions and to give them the support to do the job;

To agree on the specific things they will do to proactively keep you informed about their progress towards achieving the goals.

Managing By Outcomes

Good leaders set up people to succeed. They then encourage, educate and enable them to do superb work. This often calls for managing by outcomes rather than by tasks.

One approach is to meet with each person every month. Create an encouraging environment where they can share their successes and challenges.

During the conversation keep returning to the agreed goals. You may want to say something along the following lines.

"Let's go back to the real results to achieve. How can we do our best to deliver those results? What are the steps we need to take to make this happen?"

Why take this approach? People can get into a pattern of talking about details, making excuses or whatever. They may also confuse activity with results.

Certainly it is vital to revisit the aims to ensure these are still desirable and possible. But then it is good to go back to the results to achieve. Whether it concerns profits, product quality or people, the mantra is:

"Let's go back to agreed outcomes. How can we do our best to deliver these results?"

Many leaders face a challenge as they get older. First, their control needs get stronger. Second, they recognise that they will be judged by their people's performance.

How to square this circle? One approach is to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Taking this step can help to build an even more self-managing and successful team.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing Your Customers

Good leaders keep focusing on their internal and external customers. One leader explained this in the following way.

"During the last year I have reconnected with my customers. This has proved vital in reviving the business. It has also been stimulating."

The person returned to doing what they did best. This was acting as a trusted advisor to certain kinds of customers. They chose:

To meet with key customers they had worked with in the past - some of them having moved on to new roles;

To act as a trusted advisor to these people - this resulted in getting more business for the organisation;

To produce success stories that showed how their organisation had helped the customers to achieve success.

How can you keep in touch with your customers? How can you show you understand the world from their point of view? How can you use your strengths to help them to achieve success?

Great leaders help other people succeed. Sometimes this calls for making sure they manage their key stakeholders, their team's outcomes and their customers.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to clarify how you can manage your customers and help them to achieve their goals.

Managing Yourself

Imagine that you are managing your key stakeholders, managing your team's outcomes and managing your customers. It is may also be vital to stay healthy and manage yourself.

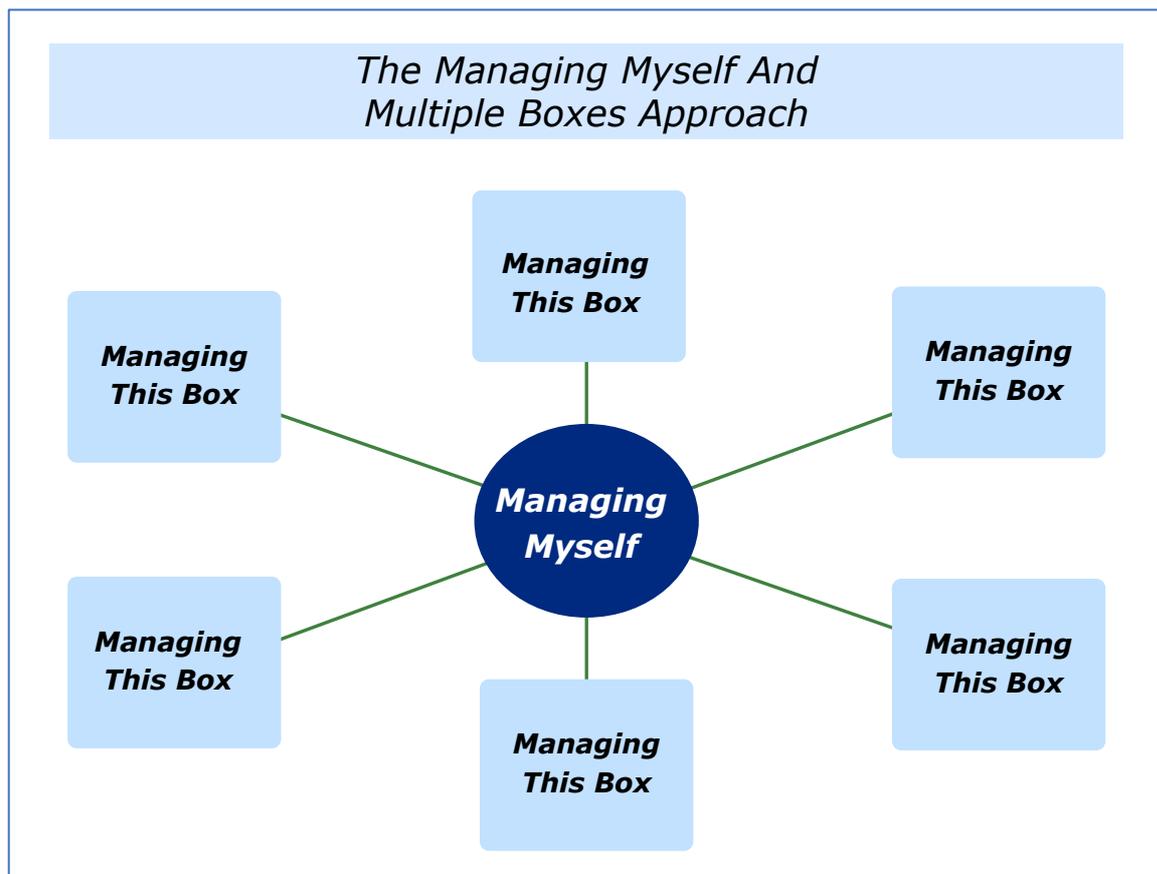

One approach is: a) to enjoy life and maintain your sanity; b) to keep developing as a person and as a professional. Bearing these things in mind, it may be useful:

To do things they give you positive energy;

To spend time with positive people;

To do things that ensure you enjoy living a positive life.

You will follow you own habits for staying healthy. Sometimes you may also want to consider adding the following approach.

Sometimes you may also have to manage multiple boxes. You may feel surrounded by multiple tasks, relationships, situations, challenges or other activities.

Sometimes this can feel overwhelming. Bearing this in mind, one approach it to take the following steps.

Step One

You can do things to manage yourself and take care of your wellbeing. This will give you energy to deal with the other challenges.

Step Two

You can focus on each of the boxes in turn. Looking at the task, relationship or challenge, you can ask yourself the following questions:

What are the things I can and can't control in the situation? What are the things I can expect and can't expect in the situation? Bearing these in mind, what are the results I can achieve? How can I do my best to achieve these results?

You can then aim: a) to go into the situation; b) to do your best to achieve the desired results; c) to then go back to your centre and take care of your wellbeing.

Step Three

You can, at some point, take stock of your situation. When doing this, it can be useful to explore the following questions.

Which of these boxes do I want to continue to have in my life? How can I do my best to manage these boxes?

Which of these boxes do I not want to have in my life? How can I move on from these in, as far as possible, a positive way?

Which boxes – tasks, relationships, situations – do I want to add? What will be the pluses and minuses of adding these boxes?

You can then aim: a) to keep managing yourself; b) to manage the boxes that give you pleasure; c) to move on from – or find ways to manage – any boxes that are more challenging.

Imagine that you want to keep yourself healthy. If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Tremendous Work Approach

Imagine that a person has asked you to help them to develop in an activity where they may have the ability to do fine work. One approach is to go through the following steps.

You can begin by focusing on the specific activity where they want to do such work. It is then to explore how they can use their temperament and talent to do tremendous work.

There are several definitions for the word tremendous. Here we are using it in terms of a person's ability to do really good work in a specific activity. Let's explore how you can help them to take these steps.

Tremendous Work

Imagine that the person wants to do such work. They may want to do this when working as a counsellor, educator, athlete, medic, technical specialist, scientist, leader or in another role.

As mentioned earlier, you can start by clarifying their ability to do work in this area. One approach is to focus on the specific activity they want to pursue. It is then:

To clarify when they have done really good work this specific activity in the past;

To clarify the principles they followed then – and how they translated these into action – to do really good work;

To clarify how they may be able to follow these principles to do really good work in the future.

Imagine that you have explored these themes with the person. This may have revealed that they may have the ability to do really good work in a specific activity.

There may also be additional reasons why they have the ability to do such work. The person may, for example, have the drive to keep improving and the desire to perform at their best.

If appropriate, you may want to do the following exercise. This invites you to write the person's name and then to describe:

The specific activity in which they want to do tremendous work;

The specific reasons why they may be able to do such work in this activity.

Here is the exercise on this theme.

Tremendous Work

The person's name is: ...

The specific activity in which they want to do tremendous work is:

The specific reasons why they may be able to do tremendous work in this activity are:

What happens if the person may not appear to be able to do such work? One approach is for them to opt to simply aim to make the most of their ability.

Another approach is for them to focus on another specific activity where: a) they have the ability to superb work; b) they will find such work satisfying; c) they can deliver success.

Imagine, however, that the person does have the ability to do tremendous work in their chosen activity. It can then be time to move on to the following theme.

Temperament

Great workers have the temperament required to do their chosen work. Looking at the person you are helping, what may be the kind of temperament they need to demonstrate to deliver top performances?

Different kinds of work require different temperaments. A paramedic needs to be calm in distressing situations. A salesperson needs to be motivated and resilient. An athlete needs to manage pressure and rise to the occasion.

If a person wants to lead an organisation, for example, this calls for having a certain kind of personality. It involves being prepared to accept the pluses and minuses involved in the role. Here are some of the upsides and downsides when running an organisation.

The pluses may include being able:

To clarify and communicate the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success;

To create a positive culture in which motivated people can grow and deliver success;

To earn a good salary and grow as a person;

To enjoy the adrenaline and excitement involved in leading an organisation;

To make sure the organisation keeps delivering today's business whilst also building tomorrow's business in order to achieve ongoing success.

The potential minuses may include:

To sometimes feel lonely because nobody else may be privy to the implications of the decisions you are making;

To make decisions that have implications for all the stakeholders – the owners, employees, customers and society;

To proactively manage the key stakeholders – such as head office – to keep them satisfied and stop them interfering;

To perhaps work a minimum of 12 hours a day plus weekends;

To get cut off from the reality of what is happening on the ground – particularly what is happening for customers – and therefore make poorer decisions.

Let's return to the person who may want to develop. Bearing in mind the activity they want to pursue, what is the temperament they need to demonstrate to deliver tremendous work?

On a scale 0-10, how would you rate them in terms of demonstrating these qualities? What can they do to maintain or improve the rating?

Talent

Talent is a prerequisite for doing great work. A therapist needs to combine caring with being able to clarify a person's aims and achieve their goals. A general practitioner needs medical skills, people skills and, in some cases, organisational skills to run a good practice.

A leader needs to make good decisions. They need to implement the right strategy with the right people in the right way. They also need to build a positive culture in which motivated people do superb work.

A footballer needs certain skills to play in a specific position. The Ajax football club has a great track record for producing young players. It uses the Acronym TIPS when looking at a player's development.

The Ajax TIPS Model For Talent Development

This focuses on helping a person to keep developing in the following areas.

- Technique* their technical ability in the various aspects of the game;
- Insight* their football intelligence and their ability to read the game;
- Personality* their personality and their contribution to the team;
- Speed* their speed of thought and their physical speed.

Let's return to the person you are helping to develop in their chosen activity. You may have already explored when they have demonstrated some of these talents.

If appropriate, however, you may wish to list the talents required to deliver tremendous work in the specific activity. You can then focus on, for example, the key talents they will need to demonstrate.

Imagine that you have taken this step. If you wish, you can then try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Tremendous Work

Temperament and talent can take a person so far. They may then also need to apply the right tactics and tenacity to do tremendous work. Let's explore these themes.

Tactics

Great workers clarify the strategies most likely to deliver success. They then clarify the specific actions they will take to implement the strategies and perform tremendous work.

Here we are using the term tactics to include both the strategic elements and the specific actions. Depending on their work, different people will adopt this approach in different ways.

Great workers often make good strategic decisions about the specific activity they will pursue. They put themselves into a place where they can play to their strengths and do superb work. They then do their best to deliver success.

Good sports coaches build on their team's strengths. They educate their players to follow certain strategies and achieve routine perfection. They then translate these into specific tactics which the players can implement to achieve success.

Let's return to the person you may be helping to develop. How would you rate them in terms of demonstrating the required tactics? This includes good strategic thinking and translating these strategies into action. What can they do to maintain or improve the rating?

Tactics

The specific activity in which the person wants to do tremendous work is:

The rating I would give regarding them demonstrating the tactics – the strategic thinking and translating this into action - required to deliver such work is:

___ / 10

The specific things they can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

*

Tenacity

Great workers demonstrate tenacity. They may do this when aiming to develop a skill, continue to improve or overcome challenges to reach a goal.

Such people show grit, persistence and resilience. They put in the effort required to improve their mentality and technique on the way to doing tremendous work. Let's look at one example.

Wayne Gretzky, the great ice hockey player, described how he took this route. Talking with Michael Murphy for the book In The Zone, he explained how he practiced during his childhood.

"I'd get up in the morning, skate from 7.00 to 8.30, go to school, come home at 3.30, stay on the ice until my mom insisted I come in for dinner, eat in my skates and then go back out until 9.00.

"On Saturdays and Sundays, we'd have huge games, but night time became my time. It was sort of an unwritten rule around the neighbourhood that I would be out there by myself or with my dad.

"I would just handle the puck in and out of those empty detergent bottles my dad set up as pylons. Then I'd set up targets in the net and try to hit them with forehands, backhands, whatever. Then I'd do it all again, except this time with a tennis ball, which is much harder to handle.

"I was so addicted that my dad had big kids come over to play against me. When the kids wanted to go home, I'd beg them to stay longer."

Great workers see every day as an opportunity to improve. Sometimes this involves demonstrating tenacity – persistence and determination to reach a specific goal.

Tremendous Work

Great workers aim to do their best to perform tremendous work. Different people do this in different ways. Some take the following steps when applying their abilities.

They Trust Their Talent

Such workers often aim to relax and trust their talent. It sounds like a paradox, but they work hard at being able to relax. This enables them to make better use of their strengths when doing the work.

They Trust Their Tactics

They aim to trust their tactics - which includes both physical and psychological preparation. They rehearse following their strategies and tactics. This gives them something to fall back on when necessary.

They Trust Their Technique

Great workers hone their technique and aim to trust it in certain situations. They take this approach rather than becoming tense. They are then more able to flow and deliver top performances.

Christian Horner, Principal of the Red Bull Formula 1 Team, described how he wanted one of his drivers to take this approach. Here is a summary of what he said.

"This driver is extremely talented, but sometimes he crams too much information into his head. He needs to prepare properly but then let his instinct take over."

"Great drivers have that edge. They rehearse the race ahead of time and then apply their natural flair to perform superbly at critical moments."

Great workers spend years building on their strengths and developing skills for managing their weaknesses. Preparing thoroughly, they clarify their strategies for dealing with many different situations.

They take these steps whether they are playing a sport, acting on stage, climbing a mountain or doing some other activity. Being fully prepared, they are able to apply their skills and achieve success.

On some occasions, however, they may hit a block. They over-think things, try too hard or tighten up in stressful situations. They may become over-critical and get into a downwards spiral. Top performers may then follow their chosen ritual to calm themselves.

Matt Lloyd, the climber and writer, explores this approach in an article he wrote called The Mind Game: How To Overcome Fear. He begins the article by referring to a near-death experience he had when climbing.

Matt recalls how dealing with it called for staying calm, doing the basics and then trusting his technique. He then describes some of the tools he learned for managing fear.

Be Prepared

When you're prepared and well-practiced, you have no reason to doubt yourself. It's not about closing your eyes and jumping into the unknown.

It's about having eyes wide open to the dangers around you but knowing that you're as ready as you can be. Trust in your training and preparedness will give you the required confidence to apply your skills to the task at hand.

While performing, the pros work consciously and in the current moment. They focus on the task at hand rather than the outcome, staying present rather than thinking too far into the event or about the finish.

Matt then builds on some of the ideas he learned from Lisa Lollar, a sports psychologist.

Visualization

Use this as much as you can before you even get off the ground, while lying in bed at night or driving to the crag. The basic idea is to imagine and clearly see yourself completing each move with ease. Go through each move step by step from bottom to top.

Centering

Best done right after coming out of the initial fear flood, it involves paying conscious attention to breathing and bodily sensations. Centering helps the athlete stay in the moment and release past and future thoughts, worries, and plans.

Self-Talk

Use this at any time to quiet the amygdala, awaken the prefrontal cortex, and regain your calm. Either out loud or in your head, talk to yourself. Make it simple: "I'm fine" or "I can do this" or "I got it."

On a recent 5.11 free solo in Golden, Colorado, I sat at the bottom of the climb thinking about how quickly panic sets in. I then imagined myself handling that experience calmly, breathing deeply, and saying to myself, Relax, you can do this.

I still get scared - hell, what climber doesn't? - but now I'm better equipped to keep my cool, and that's made all the difference.

Great workers may start by doing small pieces of fine work. They then aim to follow good habits and keep improving. This can lead to them maintaining high standards and consistently delivering tremendous work.

Let's return to the person you may be helping. How would you rate their present performance regarding consistently delivering such work? What can they do to maintain or improve the rating? How can you help them to take this step?

The Warrior Wizard Approach

Imagine that you want to do superb work. How can you identify where this may be possible? One approach is to focus on a specific activity where you show warrior qualities and also add a touch of wizardry.

There are many ways to describe different kinds of workers. One view is that people may be warriors, warrior wizards or wizards. There are, of course, several other kinds of workers.

Warriors love to work hard. They are duty-driven and want to achieve the desired results. Such people are vital in teams. They deliver high professional standards and provide a platform for others to perform at their best.

Warrior wizards also have a strong work ethic. They sometimes go further, however, and add that touch of magic. They have the talent, application and imagination to make creative breakthroughs. They also have the ability to deliver peak performances.

Wizards may be brilliant in their specific area of expertise, but they may not always show warrior-like qualities. They can provide insights and perform superb work on occasions, however, and in this way make a positive contribution to organisations.

Different people demonstrate the warrior wizard qualities in different activities. They may be fixing technical problems, playing a sport, performing on stage, finding solutions to specific challenges or doing another activity.

What is the specific activity where you may demonstrate some of these qualities? This may only be for a few moments, but it can highlight where you have this ability. It may be an activity where you prepare properly, put in the hard yards and then produce something special.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Being A Warrior Wizard

The specific activity where I have warrior qualities and at times may add touches of wizardry is:

The specific examples that show I may have – or maybe can develop – this ability in the specific activity are:

David Beckham showed these qualities during his football career. Whilst being more talented than the majority of players, he was not considered to be as gifted as the world's top players.

Showing a strong work ethic, he developed his abilities and made great contributions to teams. Sometimes he also produced moments of wizardry - such as scoring goals with wonderful free kicks.

Kelly Marks shows these qualities when educating people how to work with horses. She is known as a Horse Whisperer but is actually a specialist in understanding horse psychology and behaviour. She finds solutions that benefit both horses and humans.

Kelly has worked with horses for much of her life. She loves the whole process of caring for them – the feeding, the mucking out and looking after their health.

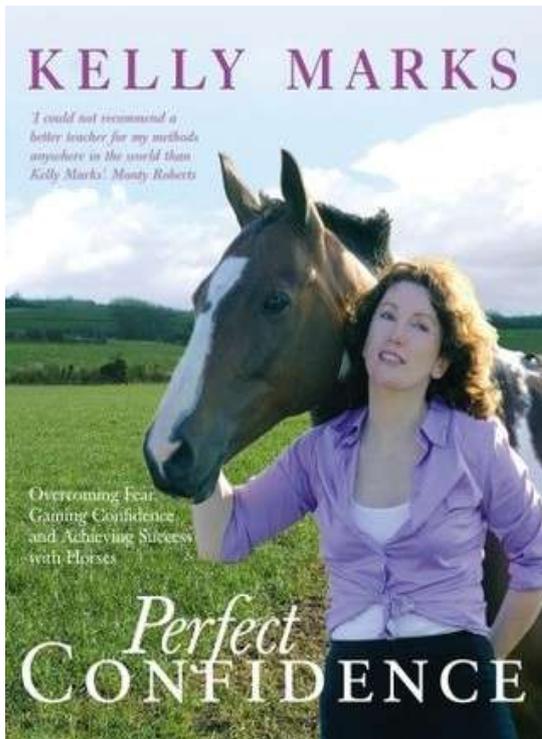

During her riding career she won on the flat, over hurdles and was in the Ladies British Team. In 1991 she stopped using the whip in races as it 'just felt wrong' whipping a horse whether racing or not.

Kelly then had some of her biggest successes riding in races. These included winning the most valuable ladies handicap race of the year at Newbury. She retired from competitive tournaments in 1995, immediately after winning the Ladies European Championship.

During the 1990s I saw her assisting her mentor Monty Roberts during the process of working with horses. At the time I was working with a leadership team that wanted to explore new ways of learning. Bearing this in mind, I asked Kelly to run a practical day on how to connect with and lead horses.

The leaders learned from watching Kelly do a join-up with a horse. She explained that it was important: a) to be clear on the goals; b) to communicate clearly with the horse; c) to encourage the horse to want to follow them.

Kelly then invited each person to go into the ring and get a horse to follow them. They learned from the experience, which also provided lessons they could apply back in their work.

Kelly taught each novice to get a horse to nuzzle up to their shoulder and willingly follow them. This took only a few minutes. Her style was:

To give the person specific encouragement when they did something right;

To give the person positive suggestions when confronted by challenges;

To keep supporting the person until they got the horse to willingly follow them.

Kelly is a warrior wizard when coaching people who want to work with horses. She has strategic intuition in this activity. She has the ability to see to the heart of the matter, try multiple strategies and then do what is required to achieve the picture of success.

There are many ways to do fine work as in individual or when leading a team. Sometimes this depends on the kind of work you want to do.

People who work in certain caring professions, for example, are often prepared to spend a lot of time helping people who have social problems. This calls:

For providing a supportive environment;

For having the skills and patience needed to help troubled people to achieve their goals.

People who work in other kinds of teams or organisations may work best with those who are motivated to achieve certain goals. This highlights another model which seems rather tough but, at times, it may be necessary to take this approach.

Great teams often get the right mixture of warriors and warrior wizards. They do not employ people who want to keep complaining.

Different people may use different terminology to describe these individuals. One football manager I worked with expressed this approach in the following way.

"Every good team I have built has had at least 70% soul players. Such people embody the spirit of the team.

"They have a strong work ethic and can always be relied on to deliver high standards. Sometimes that can also develop their talents to become star players in certain areas.

Superb Teams Get The Right Blend Of:

Star Players (Who Are Also Soul Players)

Soul Players

"My successful teams have also had around 30% star players who are also soul players. They are prepared to sweat and sometimes add that extra touch of magic.

"I never employ semi-detached players who are on their own agenda. Such people take energy. I work with people who want to use their strengths to help the team achieve success."

Let's return to your own work. What is the specific activity where you may have the ability to be a warrior wizard?

How can you develop this ability in the future? How can you build on your strengths? How can you follow strategies that work, do superb work and deliver success? How can you, when appropriate, add the sparkle?

The Stimulating Project Approach

We are all self-employed now. There are no jobs anymore, there are only projects. So how can you find or create a positive project and, if appropriate, get paid a salary?

One approach is to start by clarifying the characteristics of the project, people and place you find stimulating. Let's consider some ways to take these steps.

Project

What are the characteristics of the projects you find stimulating? One person answered this question in the following way.

"Looking back at the satisfying projects I have done in the past, I can identify some patterns. They have to do with helping people or improving the quality of their lives."

"At university I organised the first ever sponsored Fun Run, raising £10k for charity. Early in my IT career I launched software that enabled students to take charge of their own learning.

"In some ways I consider myself a bit lazy, so I prefer projects that have a deadline. This forces me to get my act together. I then rise to the occasion and deliver the goods."

Other people mention other qualities when answering this question. Here are some of the answers.

The kinds of projects that I find stimulating are those that involve:

Doing work I believe in ... Having lots of autonomy ... Helping other people ... Passing on knowledge ... Caring for animals ... Creating beautiful things ... Doing deep work ... Turning around companies.

Launching prototypes ... Selling to certain kinds of customers ... Helping people to heal ... Working with people from different cultures ... Learning new things ... Leading superb teams.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Describe the characteristics of the kinds of projects that you find stimulating.

People

Great workers put themselves into situations where they perform superbly. What are the characteristics of the customers and colleagues that you find stimulating? Let's explore these themes.

Customers

Whilst you will always aim to be professional, there may be certain kinds of customers with whom you work best. Here some answers that people give when exploring this theme.

"I work best with people who aim to be pioneers, pacesetters or peak performers. Such people often aim to make the new rules for the game. I am not so good at working with customers who work in established institutions."

"I work best with people who are committed to giving great service to their customers. Many of my customers work in retail, hospitality or the entertainment industries. They want to be commercial but also provide great experiences for their customers."

"I work best with leaders who recognise that, whilst they can set the tone, they will be judged by the performance of their people. Such leaders combine being decisive with being open to exploring many ideas. They then implement these in their own ways to build successful organisations."

Colleagues

The people you work with every day are crucial. If you are a leader, it is important to have the autonomy to hire people who deliver the required professional standards. One person explained this approach in the following way.

"I am happy to be accountable for the results, but I also try to make sure I have the required autonomy and authority. This is because of some bad experiences in the past."

"Many years ago I took on the role of turning around a dysfunctional team. This had several unmotivated team members who had seen off several managers."

"I made the mistake of assuming that, if I could find the keys to motivating them, everything would be okay. But this didn't work."

"My manager procrastinated when I asked for the authority to replace some of the team members. Eventually it got so bad that I left."

"Whilst it is my job to create a positive environment, I work best with people who behave like professionals. I can then do my best to guide the team to success."

If you are simply a team member, however, it can be more challenging when working with difficult colleagues. You can aim to behave in a positive and professional way, but you will have limited power to pick your colleagues.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to do your due diligence before taking a role. You can do research about the people with whom you will be working. If you decide to go ahead, you can focus on:

How you can build with the people with whom you may work best;

How you can manage any other relationships in a professional way.

Managers

Everybody has key stakeholders whom they need to keep happy. These may include the leaders, the board or the investors. One of the key relationships will be with your manager.

Good managers create a positive environment in which self-motivated people can do superb work and deliver success. Poor managers can make people's lives miserable.

Looking back, can you think of the managers with whom you worked best? What were the characteristics of these managers? Bearing these in mind, what are the qualities you want in your ideal manager?

One person answered this question in the following way. They echoed many of the common themes that people mention when describing their ideal manager.

"I work best with a manager who is professional and whom I respect. It is helpful if we agree on the What – the outcomes to achieve – and when these must be delivered.

"We make clear contracts about: a) the specific things I will deliver by when; b) the specific things I will do to keep them informed about the progress; c) the specific kinds of support that will help to deliver the outcomes.

"I then like to have the freedom – within agreed parameters – regarding how I use my strengths to do the work. The key, of course, is that I must deliver the agreed goals."

Most people do not like to be micro-managed, but they also recognise it is important to manage upwards. They need to get some early wins, proactively keep their manager informed and deliver the agreed picture of success.

What are the characteristics of the place – the culture and environment – you find stimulating? Here are some of the answers that people give to this question.

"I like working in pioneering businesses. They are also results focused and fast paced, which suits my style. It also feels like we are creating the rules for the future."

"I like working in organisations that are established yet innovative. Early in my career I worked in start-up businesses, but now I like places that are professional, informal but also have more infrastructure. At the same time, I want freedom to be creative."

A Stimulating Project - Making It Happen

Imagine that you are clear on the kind of project you would find stimulating. It may be up to you to find or create such a project. How to make this happen? One approach is to take the following steps.

To get work by going out and helping people to succeed;

To translate some of this work into doing specific projects;

To build on this work and find or create a stimulating project and then deliver success.

Imagine that you have an empty diary and want to get work. Let's consider some of the approaches you can take.

Getting Work By Going Out and Helping People To Succeed

I have just lost my job. So I will go home, polish my CV and put it out to recruitment agencies. Then I will see what happens.

That is one approach. Another approach is to go out, give to people and help them to succeed. That could lead to work.

The old proverb says: "Some people make things happen, some watch while things happen and some wonder 'What happened?'"

Certainly this was true during the recession. Some people who lost their jobs tried to figure out what had happened and looked for somebody to blame.

Others adopted different strategies when pursuing their job search. Here are examples of the different approaches taken by two people.

Person A said:

"I am going to spend time polishing my CV and registering with recruitment agencies. Then I am going to reconnect with people I know. That is something I should have done before, but I am not good at promoting myself."

Person B said

"There are lots of jobs out there where I can help people. You can't tell me that every project and every piece of work in the country is on time, on budget and on course to reach its goals."

"Somewhere there are bound to be unsatisfied customer needs. So I am going to get out there and help other people to succeed."

Imagine that you face the prospect of an empty calendar and want to find satisfying work. Building on the ideas mentioned earlier in the book, you may want to take the following steps. You can aim:

To clarify your strengths: to clarify the specific kinds of people with whom you work best; to clarify the specific things you can deliver to help those people to achieve success.

This is a good start but then comes the real task. How to get work? Some of the following ideas may seem counter-intuitive but I have seen them work many times. Here is one example from a person that found work.

"The recession taught me a lot. My first reaction was to worry about maintaining an income. My second reaction was more interesting. I reframed the situation as an opportunity to help people.

"Over the years I have built a business as a mentor but that suddenly became a luxury purchase. Despite funds being cut, I offered my time to meet clients five days a week.

"Mentoring is often about helping people to make good decisions. So my clients and I explored the tough choices they needed to make regarding shaping their future businesses.

"On the practical side, the first aim was to cover my weekly costs, which proved possible.

"After a month or so several clients asked me to do various project work. This included helping teams to complete internal projects, improve customer service and develop new business.

"These projects were funded from the technology and marketing budgets. Previously my work had been paid for by Human Resources.

"Nowadays my diary is full. But I am concerned about the next dip in the market. So it is time to go out and give to people again."

Imagine you want to get work. You will probably start by following one of the first rules:

You can make getting a job a full time job.

Successful job seekers follow this path. They cram their days with activities most likely to get them in front of people. They also follow another rule:

Your next job will most likely come from the people in your network.

It will come from either: a) people you know or; b) people you know who recommend you to other people. Some people say they are no good at networking because they think it involves self-promotion. It doesn't.

Real networking is about helping other people to succeed.

Sounds crazy? Perhaps. But giving to people – such as encouraging them or passing on knowledge – can be extremely rewarding. It can sometimes also lead to future work possibilities.

People buy people. Whilst CVs may look good, most buyers in the market want somebody whom they can trust, somebody who they know can deliver. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Every job I have had over the past 20 years has come from my network. Twice during that time the companies I was employed by got taken over and my job disappeared. So it was then time to reconnect with people who knew what I could deliver.

"The hard part was getting started. I spent masses of time visiting people. Being customer focused, I made sure the conversation was about them and their company challenges. It was not about me.

"I followed up every visit with an email framing possible ideas they could use to tackle specific challenges. Several times this led to contract work with somebody saying: 'How can we take this further?'

"This is how I have got my last two jobs. I started by doing pieces of project work and then moved into full-time employment."

This approach raises an important point: How to reach or keep in touch with your potential customers? This highlights another rule:

Keep in touch with people in a way that fits your values system and natural style.

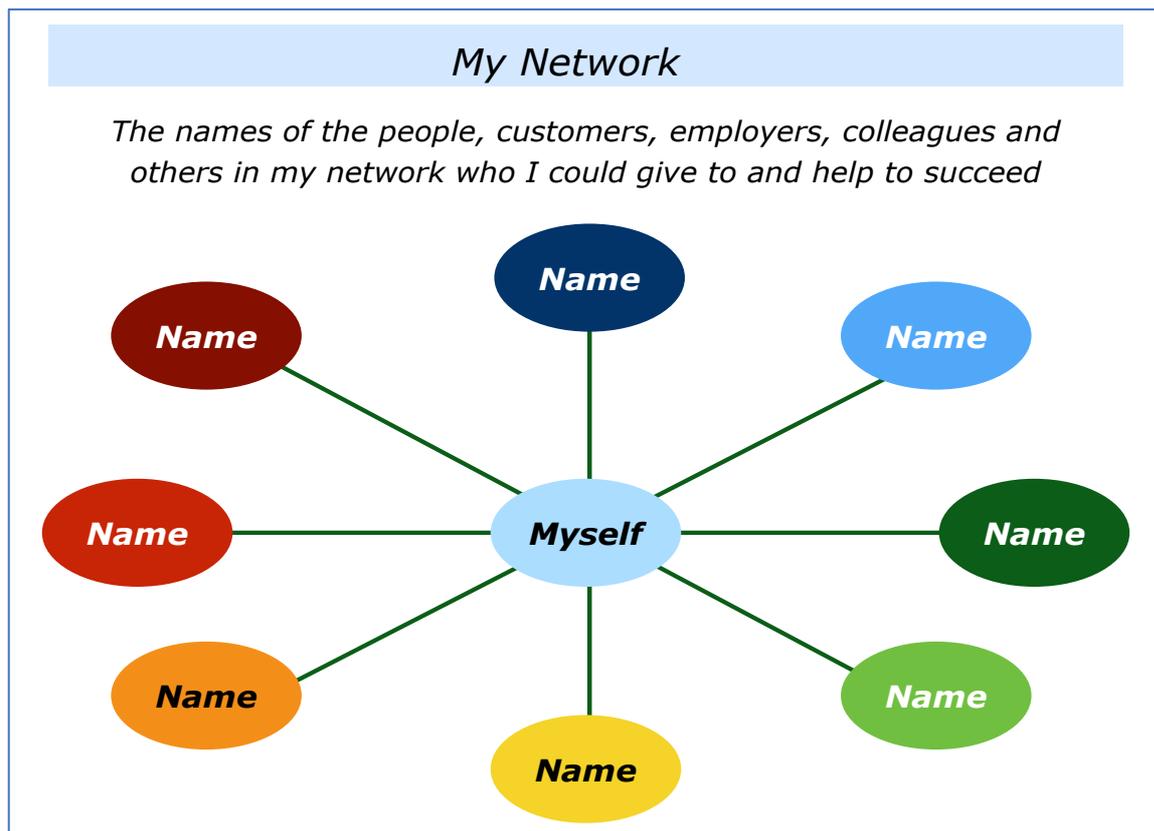

Do things that put a spring in your step. You can share knowledge, recommend books, offer to provide a pair of hands or connect like-minded people by putting them in touch with each other.

You can also create a website that acts as a shop window and make it customer focused. You can produce articles, pass on knowledge and offer practical tools that people can use to achieve success.

Like an actor, it's vital to keep working. Do something every day to reach people in your network but be patient. It can take time before the right opportunity appears.

Try tackling the exercise on this theme. Draw a map of your network. Write the names of people, customers, colleagues, friends and others in your network.

Describe the challenges that each person faces. Describe the specific things you can do to give to each person and help them to succeed.

People In My Network

The specific challenges they may face and the specific goals they may want to achieve are:

The specific things I can do to give to them and help them to succeed are:

The best time for a person to network is when they are successful rather than when they want something. They then have even greater strength to give to others. Paradoxically, they may find that even more opportunities come their way.

Imagine that you have been able to do some work on a specific project and delivered success. If appropriate, you may then want:

To focus on other challenges in the organisation and show how it would be possible to do project work to tackle these successfully;

To, if possible, identify a specific project that you would find stimulating and show how delivering certain results will help the organisation to achieve success.

You may be able to do some of the first set of projects and, in the process, get a salary. If possible, however, you can also aim to do the most stimulating kind of project.

Whilst this would satisfy your soul, it would only get signed off if it benefited the organisation. You would therefore need to show how delivering it would help the organisation to achieve present or future success.

There are many ways to find or create projects. Let's explore another approach.

Finding A Need and Filling It

There are many ways to do satisfying work that earns a salary. One approach is to follow the old advice of 'Find a need and fill it.'

Some people say this approach needs to be extended. They say it is important to focus on what people want, rather than just what they need.

Sometimes even the 'want' approach can be extended. Some new inventions, for example, can also open people's eyes to what they want.

Henry Ford may or may not have uttered the famous phrase, but there is some truth in the view that:

"If I had asked people what they wanted, they would have said faster horses."

Bearing these factors in mind, one approach is to ask the following questions about potential clients' present and future needs. You can then explore how you could use your strengths to fill these needs and help people achieve success?

Are there any organisational strategies that need to be implemented more successfully? Are there any potential future organisational strategies that need to be piloted successfully?

Are there any present customer needs that need to be met more successfully? Are there any potential future customer needs that need to be anticipated and met successfully?

Are there any potential people issues that need to be tackled successfully? Are there any professional skills or other qualities that people need to develop to deliver success? Are there any other things that can be done to help people to achieve peak performance?

Are there any processes that need to be improved to help the organisation achieve success? Are there any prototypes that need to be built to help the organisation achieve future success? Are there any other challenges to address to help the organisation achieve ongoing success?

Looking at these needs, are there any where I could use my strengths to help the organisation to achieve present or future success? If so, how can I position this in a way that makes it attractive to the organisation.

Finding A Need And Filling It

Here is one approach to finding and filling both the present and future needs of an organisation

The specific questions to ask about both the present and potential future needs are these:	The specific needs that need filling in this area are:	The specific things I could do to fill these needs are:

As we mentioned earlier, the world of work continues to evolve. There may not be many safe jobs anymore, but there are going to be many projects.

If you wish, try tackling the final exercise on this theme. Bearing in mind the kind of project you would find stimulating, this invites you to do the following things.

The Rewarding Role Approach

The Rewards Of Going Into Role

Some people find it rewarding to go into role. This is a route sometimes taken by introverts in their professional work. They then aim to follow certain rules on the way towards getting the desired results.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for a person to choose to go into what they find to be a rewarding role. They may then follow certain rules – guidelines – that they believe are likely to produce positive results. This can bring rewards for both other people and for themselves.

Different people choose to go into different roles. A person may aim to do their best when acting as a carer, educator, doctor or coach. They may aim to do so when working as a singer, leader, trusted advisor or in another role.

Some individuals find this approach to be liberating. They move into a role where they feel comfortable and can follow certain rules to get certain results.

People who go into role sometimes need to practise self-care. This is because there are both pluses and minuses involved when, for example, helping other people.

The pluses of going into role may provide the opportunity:

To have sense of purpose; to follow certain principles; to help other people; to pass on knowledge; to put aside any of their personal troubles; to be rewarding; to get positive results.

The potential minuses of going into role may be:

To find it tiring; to be reactive; to sometimes feel out of control; to put aside their own agenda; to not be appreciated; to sometimes find it unrewarding; to take its toll if a person does not take care of themselves.

People can thrive, however, if they learn how to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses. They can then find it rewarding to sometimes go into role and deliver certain results.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when found it satisfying to take this step? You may have chosen to go into the role of counsellor, actor, chef, coach, mediator, crisis manager, leader or another role.

What were the results you aimed to achieve by going into the role? You may have aimed to help another person or a group of people. What happened as a result?

Introverts and extroverts can go into role and do rewarding work

Each person is a mixture of introvert and extrovert. Everybody has a preferred way of behaving, however, which means they may feel more comfortable when operating as an introvert or extrovert.

Introverts enjoy their own company but sometimes also enjoy going into professional role. They may be quiet at home but then take charge when moving into the role of nurse, doctor, facilitator or another professional role.

Such a person can feel comfortable because they can go into role and follow certain rules to get certain results. They have clear guidelines and maybe a clear script to follow.

People who go into role often forget their own concerns. They focus on the job to be done and channel their energies into achieving the goal. Going into role offers a person the opportunity:

To pursue a clear sense of purpose;

To follow principles that enable them to channel their personality towards achieving the purpose;

To follow a script that they can adapt in their own way to achieve the purpose.

Introverts like to prepare properly. They do the mental rehearsal and then go into a certain mode to do marvellous work. They don't necessarily like surprises or being thrown off-track.

As the years go by, however, they learn how to buy time when faced by unexpected events. They take time to think, consider their options and then pursue the path most likely to achieve success.

Extroverts may choose to channel their personalities by going into certain roles. They may play to their strengths by acting as a host, salesperson, keynote speaker or in another role.

Extroverts sometimes go into other roles when they need to be low key and support people. Some can be excellent counsellors, for example, providing they know the rules to follow. They may do good work for a while, but then may feel more comfortable returning to another role.

Some people consciously move between the roles of being an introvert and extrovert. A singer-songwriter I interviewed, for example, enjoyed spending time alone writing and creating.

Walking on stage, however, he transformed into playing the role of being a great performer. After the show he would love to get back home, reflect and then work on composing his future songs.

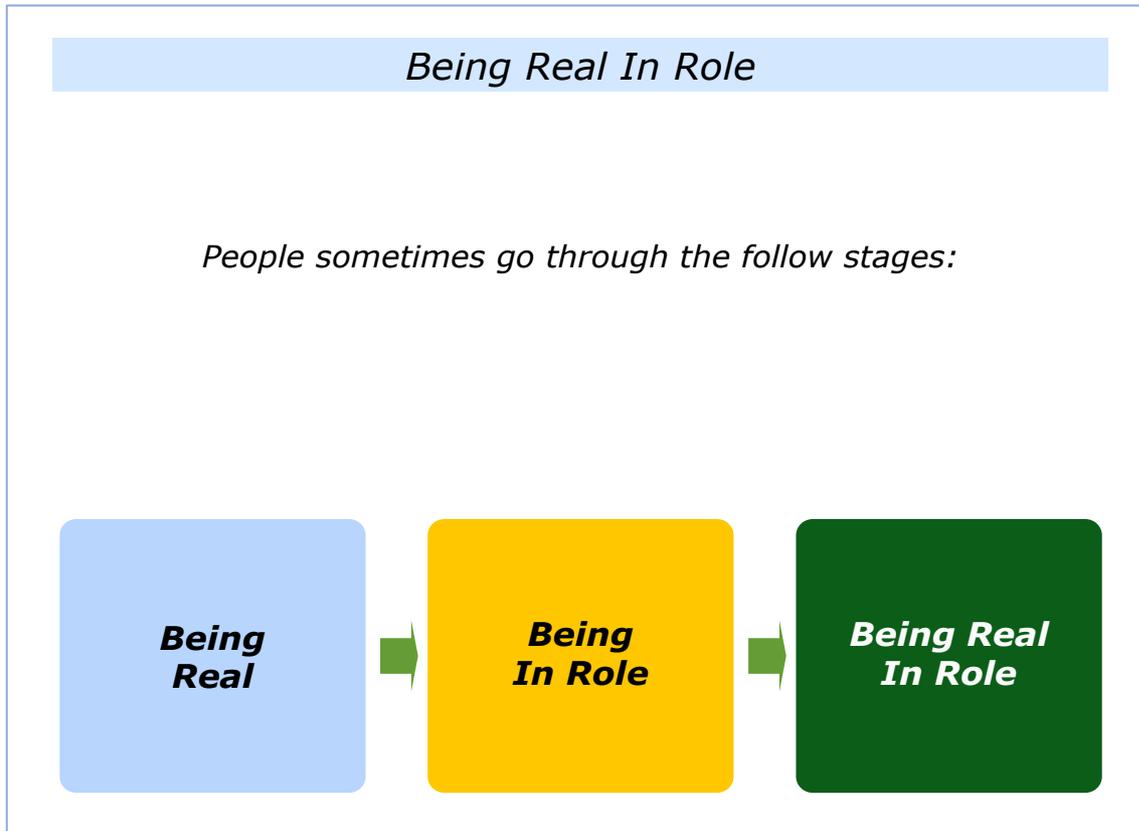

Great leaders sometimes follow a similar pattern. They like to reflect, make decisions and plan the future strategy. They also mentally rehearse how they will act in certain situations and the key messages they want to give people.

Such leaders click into action when meeting colleagues or customers. Recognising they are on stage, they aim to make others feel the centre of the world. They then focus on how to encourage and enable people to achieve success.

Being Real In Role

Some people may think that going into role is not authentic, but individuals can actually be real in role. This is because they may go through certain stages during their professional careers.

A person may begin by being real and passionate. They may then become wrapped up in playing a role. As they get older, they often learn how to be real in their professional role. Let's explore these steps towards being real in role.

Being real

People often show passion when starting out on their chosen road. They are real, raw and may be seen as a rough diamond. Throwing themselves into their work, they sometimes make mistakes but this is part of the adventure. Their spark transmits energy and fire.

Singer-songwriters, for example, sometimes produce great work early in their careers. Belying their youth, they write songs that convey knowledge beyond their years.

The same happens in other fields. Stoked by idealism, people look forward to going to work each day. They are enthusiastic and sometimes express profound insights.

Being in role

People may climb the career ladder and, at a certain point, feel they have to be more conservative to play the role. Certainly they must be professional.

We quite like people to go into professional role as pilots, nurses and others upon whom we rely. It is good if they provide predictability and deliver positive results.

But sometimes people bury their personalities and lose their humanity. This may lose touch with customers, talk in long theoretical terms or make things complicated

Being real in role

Confident in their professional ability, some people are real yet also able to fulfil their role. Great leaders, for example, sometimes show the human touch. They feel able to be themselves and, far from diminishing their authority, this increases their credibility.

People who are real in role are often personable, professional and peak performers. They come across as real human beings. At the same time, they also do everything possible to prepare properly and fulfil their professional obligations.

Such people do work they feel passionately about. They perform superbly, deliver the desired results and add that touch of class. Sometimes they create an enduring legacy by passing on knowledge and also acting as positive models for other people.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to go into role? You may wish to do this when acting as a carer, educator, leader or in another professional role.

What may be the results you want to deliver in that role? How can you do your best to achieve these goals? What may happen as a result of you performing this role superbly? What may be the benefits for you and other people?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Relaxed Relentlessness Approach

Great athletes sometimes follow these steps when performing at their best. It is an approach that can also be adapted by other people who want to deliver peak performances.

Bearing in mind what they can control, a person starts by clarifying the results they want to achieve. They then go through the following steps.

Rehearsal

They rehearse how they can follow their chosen strategies. This includes how they will manage both successes and setbacks on the road to delivering the desired results.

Relaxed Relentlessness

They move into action and follow their chosen rhythm. This sometimes involves being both relaxed and relentless when translating their strategies into action.

Results

They perform superb work and aim to deliver the desired results. They also rise to the occasion when it matters. This sometimes includes delivering peak performances.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you demonstrated relaxed relentlessness? One writer described how they took this approach when doing a long project.

"I began by sketching the schedule I wanted to follow on the way towards reaching the goal. It was important to pace myself properly.

"Bearing this in mind, I scheduled three kinds of time: a) preparation time; b) performing time; c) pottering around time.

"The preparation part involved going through certain rituals and planning what I wanted to accomplish in the next block of time.

"The performing time involved making the best use of my prime times – the times of the day when I had most energy. During this time I was able to relax and follow a certain rhythm. This enabled me to do my best work.

"The pottering around times were also useful. I just let my mind wander. Sometimes these times resulted in making creative breakthroughs.

"I then returned to the work with renewed energy. Following this pattern helped me to complete the project."

You will have your own approach to following the relaxed relentlessness approach. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

How can you follow some of these principles in the future? You may want to do this when pursuing a specific project, leading a team or doing another activity. Let's consider how you can take these steps, starting with what you want to achieve.

Results

Imagine that you lost your job during Covid. Applying for various full-time roles proved unsuccessful and sapped your confidence.

After several months, however, one of your old managers offered you the opportunity to do a project in their organisation. This would initially be for three months but it could lead to further work in the future.

Talking with your partner, you decided to take the role. It meant working from home and managing some aspects of home schooling, but the pluses of taking this route far outweighed the minuses.

Looking ahead at the project, you began to define the results you wanted to deliver for the organisation. Bearing in mind the research you had done already, you aimed:

To clarify your key stakeholders – such as both your internal and external customers - and the results they want delivered;

To clarify the specific strategies you could follow to deliver these results;

To clarify the specific things that would be happening that would show you have delivered the desired results.

There are many models for clarifying the desired results. Some focus on the three Ps – profits, product quality and people.

Imagine that you clarified the targets to be achieved under the relevant headings. You may then aim to add another dimension to the goal setting.

Clarifying the actual words you would like to hear the stakeholders saying

This is an old but useful exercise. Start by brainstorming all the key stakeholders that it will be important to satisfy. Looking at each of these people in turn, clarify the results they would like delivered.

Describe the actual words you would like them to be saying about the work you deliver. For example, you may want one of your external customers to say the following things about you.

"They deliver great service ... They proactively keep us informed about the progress being made ... They act as real partners and trusted advisors ... They help us to achieve success."

When doing this exercise, it is important to focus on certain themes. These are:

To see the world from the stakeholder's point of view ... To clarify the real results they want delivered ... To clarify how they want to feel about the way you relate to them and how you help them to achieve success.

Imagine that you have described the actual words you want the stakeholders to be saying. You can then ask yourself:

"How can I do my best to ensure they are saying these things?"

Focus on what you can control. You are not in control of the stakeholder's personality, changing priorities or the words they use. But you can do your best and hope this leads to them saying some of these things.

Here is the exercise on this theme. This invites a person to focus on three of their stakeholders. On some occasions, however, there may be many more stakeholders it is important to satisfy.

Rehearsal

Charles Garfield, the author of Peak Performers, described how many great workers rehearse before going into their version of the arena. The National Business Association produced a summary of his views on mental rehearsal in one of their newsletters. Here is an excerpt from that piece.

Peak performers practice mental rehearsal. They rehearse, in their mind's eye, any incident or event that is important to them.

Business executives can benefit by rehearsing specific events in the mind's eye, including all those possible outcomes and possible surprises that can materialise. This mental practice can build familiarity and boost confidence and self-esteem.

Great workers in many fields take this approach. Wayne Rooney, the former footballer, explained what he did before his team had an away fixture and needed to change the colours of their kit. Speaking in an interview with ESPN, he said:

"Part of my preparation is I go and ask the kit man what colour we're wearing – if it's red top, white shorts, white socks or black socks.

"Then I lie in bed the night before the game and visualise myself scoring goals or doing well. You're trying to put yourself in that moment and trying to prepare yourself, to have a 'memory' before the game.

"I don't know if you'd call it visualising or dreaming, but I've always done it, my whole life."

There are many approaches to mental rehearsal. One model is the positive visualisation approach.

Bearing in mind what you can control in a situation, this involves focusing on what you do want to do rather than don't want to do. You can then relax and work through the following steps.

The Positive Visualisation Approach

You can start by clarifying what you can control in the situation. Bearing these things in mind, you can then work through the following steps.

Success

You can clarify the real results you want to achieve - the picture of success. You can then focus on the following steps.

- Strategies

You can rehearse following the key strategies that you believe will give you the greatest chance achieving success.

- Solutions

You can rehearse anticipating and overcoming potential challenges on the road towards achieving success.

- Success

You can again rehearse pursuing the key strategies for achieving the picture of success.

Imagine that you have prepared properly and want to translate your strategies into action. One approach is to focus on the next step.

Relaxed Relentlessness

Great Workers, Teams And Organisations

They build on their strengths and clarify the strategies they want to follow to achieve success. They then follow a certain rhythm by creating a structure that enables them:

- To pursue their chosen strategies;
- To perform superb work;
- To do their best to achieve success.

They then demonstrate a relaxed relentlessness when pursuing these strategies on the way towards achieving success.

Great workers often take this approach. Bearing in mind their strengths, they clarify the strategies they want to follow to achieve success.

They then aim to follow a certain rhythm by creating a structure that enables them to follow their chosen strategies. Moving into action, they demonstrate relaxed relentlessness on the way towards achieving success.

Let's return to the scenario we explored earlier. Imagine that one of your former managers has hired you to do a project in their organisation. You have clarified the key strategies you can follow to do your best to deliver success. Bearing these in mind, you may aim:

To keep following your chosen strategies by doing the right things in the right way every day;

To keep managing your energy properly and following your chosen rhythm;

To keep being relaxed but relentless in the way you pursue your chosen strategies.

Different people develop different rhythms for doing fine work. One person said:

"Preparation is crucial. I then have a ritual for clicking into action and hitting the ground running. My best performances come from being able to get into my rhythm and deliver the required results.

"Sometimes I get distracted. But I have now developed a ritual for regaining my rhythm and doing good work."

If you are a creative artist, for example, you may have a certain ritual for clicking into action. You may work for a set time and then take break. You may go for a walk or do something else before returning to the work.

Several leaders I worked with before Covid established a different kind of rhythm. One leader for the European arm of a global business explained this in the following way.

"I prefer my lifestyle now, compared with when I headed the UK business. My working work has the following pattern.

"On Monday I take the children to school and then take a lunchtime flight to one of the major capitals. Monday night is spent having dinner with colleagues or clients. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday are devoted to clients visits.

"Sometimes this involves another flight on, for example, Wednesday night. The work is intensive, but it is also rewarding. I am able to play to my strengths, which is working directly with clients.

"Normally I fly back on Thursday evening and take the children to school on Friday. The rest of the day is spent working from home and finalising plans for the next week.

"This sounds tough, but it was harder when I ran the UK business, which meant travelling into London every day. My diary was full from the moment I entered the building.

"There were always crises to solve and meetings to attend. Sometimes I was lucky to get home before 8.00 pm at night.

"The lifestyle I have now is excellent. Sometimes I need to spend a week in the USA, but that is fine.

"I have also built a good leadership team who run the daily business. They release me to do what I do best, which is to work with customers and shape tomorrow's business."

Let's assume that you are following your own approach to being relaxed but relentless. It will then be time to focus on the final stage.

Results

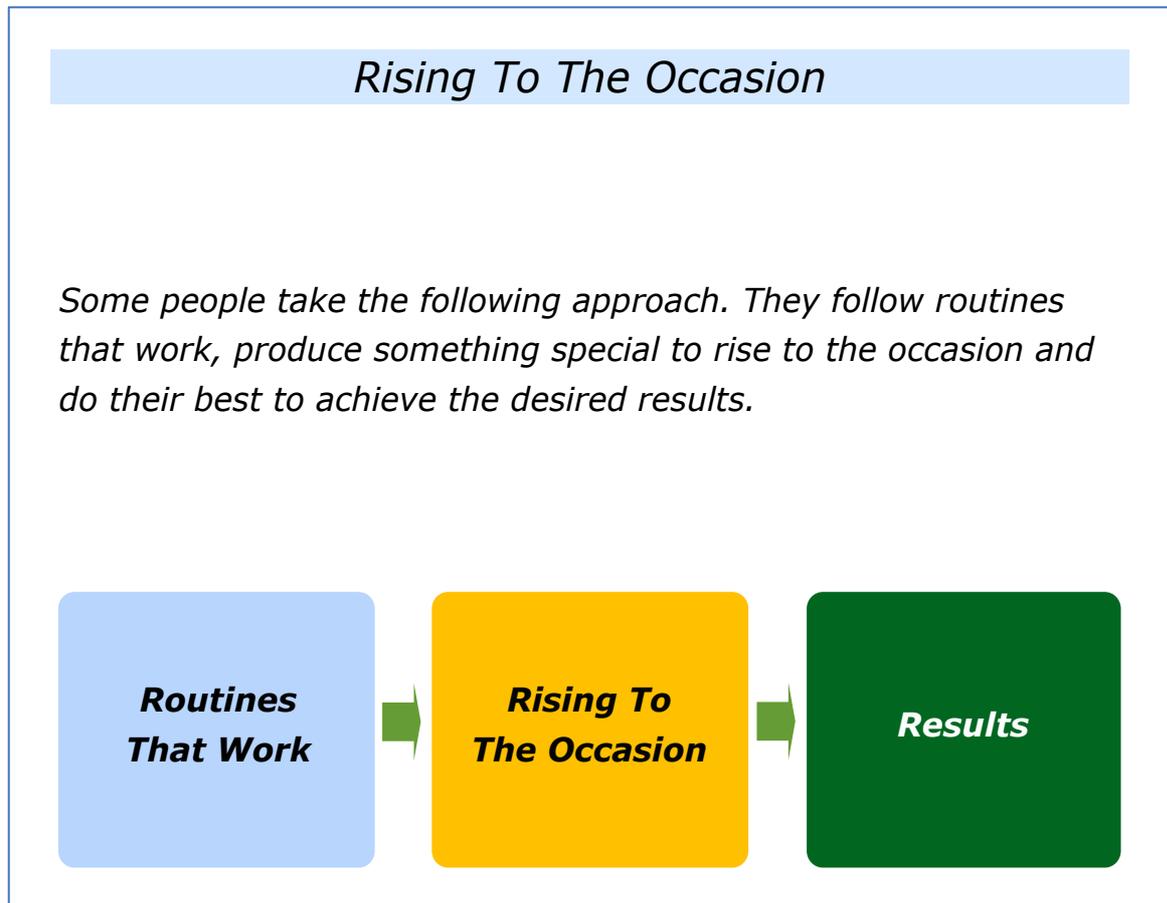

Imagine that you are doing the freelance work in the organisation and aiming to deliver success. Like many people in today's world, it will be vital:

To keep producing short and medium-term successes on the road towards the longer-term picture of success;

To keep connecting with your key stakeholders to keep up to date with their challenges and any changes in the results they want delivered;

To keep improving your work and delivering the desired results to the stakeholders.

Sometimes this calls for doing something special to perform superb work, tackle challenges or achieve your goals. Some people do this by taking the following approach.

Great workers continue to follow routines that work. They aim to keep doing the right things in the right way. This creates the platform for moving on to the next stage.

Such workers then aim to rise to the occasion. They buy time to think, look ahead to the challenge and clarify the real results they want to achieve.

They relax and explore the potential options for going forwards.. Sometimes this involves reaching into their repertoire to clarify the strategies they want to pursue.

Great workers rehearse how they are going to tackle the challenge. Moving into action, they then become totally engaged. Pursuing their chosen strategy, they do their best to rise to the occasion and produce the desired results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow some elements of the relaxed relentlessness approach?

You may want to do this when pursuing a project, tackling a challenge or doing another activity. You may want to do it when working as a therapist, mentor, leader, trusted advisor or in another role.

How can you clarify the results to achieve? How can you rehearse what you are going to do? How can you follow your chosen rhythm? How can you follow the relaxed relentlessness approach? How can you rise to the occasion? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Money, Meaning And Magic Approach

People want three things from work: money, meaning and magic. Money feeds the stomach. But meaning and magic feed the spirit and the soul.

A person needs enough money to get the basic materials for life. They may then need other things to get the right blend between their wellbeing, meaningful work and wealth.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you did work that gave you enough money and had real meaning? Sometimes you may also have experienced a sense of magic.

Here is a précis of what three people I have worked with for many years said when exploring this theme.

"When I worked as a volunteer for six months in a refugee camp. We had little money, but it was enough. The conditions were raw but I felt so alive. Every day was a chance to help refugees to recover from illness, be reunited with their loved ones or find a home in a new country."

"When I worked on an IT project for the Commonwealth Games. It was inspiring to work towards a goal that would help the Games to succeed. The team was full of energy and applied their skills to deliver outstanding results."

"When I led a team that created a new culture in a growing part of a business. The company allowed us to make the culture fit for the future rather than follow old methods. It was exciting and people learned many lessons they applied in their future careers."

Money

Different people have different relationships with money. Sometimes their attitudes are shaped by their experiences growing up in the family.

Some individuals decide to change their attitudes about money. One person I worked with took this approach. He described this in the following way.

"I grew up in a working class family where we lived on the never-never. My parents always made sure we had enough food but they always stretched themselves financially.

"After paying off one debt they immediately bought something else from the home catalogue. At one point my father also got into gambling and thought he could pay off everything with one big win.

"I have changed my own attitude to money. At one point I thought I would never have enough. I also recognised I would never get a big pot of gold – such as by starting and selling a company.

"This was a key turning point – realising that I would need to earn money for much of my life. Building on what I did best, I developed transferable skills that would be required in both the present and future world.

"Whilst it is impossible to predict the future, I will always be able to make a contribution that helps my customers to achieve success. This will hopefully continue to provide a good income stream."

Different people want money for different reasons. As mentioned earlier, these include the following:

To get the basic materials for life – food, shelter, health care and other necessities – and follow their chosen lifestyle;

To build a financial fund that can protect them in tough times, provide health care for their later years and give their children a good start in life;

To gain a sense of freedom and feel they can shape their future in the way they want.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at your own work, this invites you to do the following things. Describe the extent to which you feel you have enough money in your work. Rate this on a scale 0 – 10.

Many individuals will say they would like more money. This will certainly be the case if they cannot afford the basic materials for life. Some people may be able to make changes in their lifestyles, however, that mean they can live on less money.

Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating. This could include aiming to earn more, adjusting your lifestyle, finding another role, developing another income stream or doing other activities.

Meaning

Many people want a sense of meaning in their work. They often do their best work when they have the opportunity to do the following things:

They pursue a compelling purpose and aim to achieve a specific goal;

They use their strengths to follow principles they believe in and get the support they need to do the job;

They perform superb work, are managed by outcomes – rather than by tasks – and do their best to deliver the desired picture of success.

Different people choose different ways to focus on these themes. Here are some of the routes they take.

Some people want their employers to provide a compelling vision. This approach can work when there are leaders and employees who continually commit themselves:

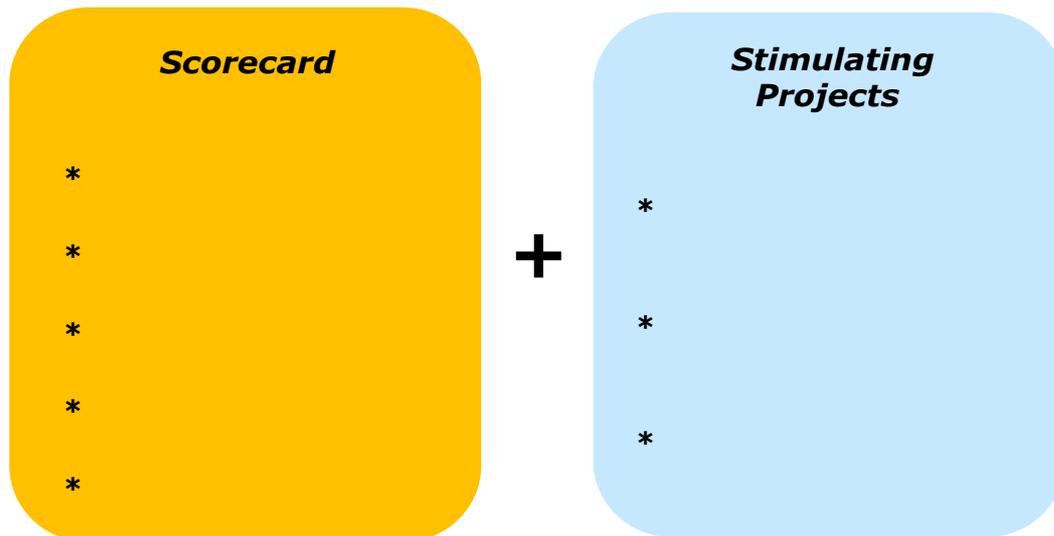

To get wins for the organisation, wins for the customers and wins for the colleagues.

In some organisations, however, the leaders may be battling to hit the next month's targets or manage their own backers. This can lead to short-termism. People can find themselves buried in doing grunt work without the chance to do great work.

Some leaders take a different approach to enabling their people to do meaningful work. They encourage them to deliver the scorecard – the mandatory things that must be done – and also doing stimulating projects.

Doing Satisfying Work In Organisations

One approach is to deliver the scorecard – the mandatory things that must be done – plus do other stimulating projects.

Every organisation has its own version of a scorecard. Some scorecards mainly focus on the What and the targets are written in outcome terms. People are given freedom, within parameters, regarding how they deliver these results.

Some scorecards describe not only the What, but also have strict controls on the How' The centre wants to feel more in control – not only of what people deliver, but how they do it in their daily work.

One leader I worked with helped her team to do satisfying work whilst also delivering the team's targets. She explained this approach during an off-site two months before the beginning of the new financial year. Here is how she positioned this approach.

"The scorecard has changed as our business has got bigger. Ten years ago it contained a few top line targets. These covered the normal Three Ps of Profits, Products and People.

"We had lots of freedom in terms of how we worked to hit these targets. But during the past few years the scorecard has contained more and more micro-targets.

"Some people get upset about the scorecard. But, as I say to the people who join my team, we have several choices. We can choose:

To ignore the scorecard;

To fight the centre about the scorecard;

To grumble about the scorecard and let it dominate our lives;

To move elsewhere;

To deliver the scorecard – but in a way that is creative – and also do stimulating projects that provide wins for ourselves and for the business.

"I tell the people who join my team that we are going with final option. We can then keep the centre off our backs and create the space to do other good work.

"If people don't want to do that - if they just want to do the things they find interesting without delivering their part of the scorecard - they should find another team.

"I have earlier had conversations with each of you. Everybody wants to contribute to delivering the scorecard whilst also doing satisfying work. So let's look at how to deliver the results."

The leader then invited each person to focus on the following themes. Bearing in mind their strengths, they were invited to describe the specific things they would like to do:

To help to deliver the scorecard and satisfy their key stakeholders;

To do stimulating projects that would also benefit the business;

To translate these projects into success stories that could be published and deliver benefits for the company.

The team members made clear contracts about the outcomes they would each deliver in the next financial year. During the following twelve months they fulfilled these contracts and delivered the goods.

The organisation's management style became increasingly oppressive, however, and led to many respected knowledge workers leaving the business. This included the leader who took a prestigious role in another company.

Some individuals take another approach to doing meaningful work. They follow their vocation, find the right vehicle and do valuable work. They may choose to do this by aiming:

To find or create a role in an organisation where they can do satisfying work that helps people to achieve success;

To be a professional freelancer who helps individuals, teams or organisations to achieve success;

To build a business that helps its customers to achieve success.

You can find out more about this approach in the book section on The Strengths Approach and The Vocation Approach.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. Looking at your own work, this invites you to do the following things.

Magic

When do you experience a sense of magic in your work? When do you get creative breakthroughs? When do you feel joy or a deep sense of satisfaction?

Some people feel these when doing work that involves the heart, head and hands. They are immersed in the activity and at one with the work. Things come together and they feel a higher harmony.

Some people get these feelings when managing a crisis. They feel it is a privilege to be able to use their strengths in pressure situations. Pursuing their chosen strategy, they then do their best to achieve success.

Some people get the helper's high by doing work that helps other people to succeed. Bearing in mind Maya Angelou's famous quote, they want to help people and give them a positive memory for life.

Maya Angelou

"I've learned that people will forget what you said, people will forget what you did, but people will never forget how you made them feel."

Different people describe these experiences in different ways. Here are some of the things they say. These are based on people I have listened to or with whom I have worked.

"I feel happy and relieved when seeing a recovered patient leaving hospital. Sometimes the whole staff line the corridor and applaud them as they go out of the door with a wave. The feeling of exhilaration reminds me of why I came into this work."

"My greatest satisfaction comes from seeing a young footballer I have worked with make their debut in the senior team. There is a saying in Academies that: 'Our trophies are the players who become regulars in the first team'. We now have five graduates in the first team and this gives me great pleasure."

"I get an enormous kick from seeing the relief on a customer's face after fixing their technical issues. They sometimes greet me as if I am a paramedic who is a saviour. It is great to use my skills to solve their problems and help them to succeed."

Some people often enjoy a sense of magic in their work. Such people enjoy the journey as well as reaching the goal. Some people experience this feeling on less frequent but intense occasions. They feel high after overcoming a challenge or reaching a stimulating goal.

The Managing Emotions Approach

Emotions are the material of life. The way people use these can affect both themselves and other people. This section looks at how to manage emotions in a positive way rather than a negative way. It focuses on the following themes.

Managing Emotions

This involves managing our emotions rather than letting our emotions manage us.

Making Sense Of Emotions

This involves understanding the reasons why we may experience certain emotions.

Making Good Use Of Emotions

This involves using emotions in a way that helps ourselves and other people.

People who care deeply can live on an emotional roller coaster. They can get depressed about climate change, politics or other events. Caring is a great asset when translated into positive action. Some people just worry, however, and fall into helplessness

Creative artists have a choice about how they use their emotions. Such people are often highly sensitive, which has both pluses and minuses. We are told that some people: "See too deep and too much."

They can use their sensitivity in helpful or hurtful ways. One approach is for them to create things that help people or the planet.

Some people are stable on an emotional level. One person gave the following answer when asked how happy they felt on a scale 0-10.

"I am normally at 8/10 or higher. Sometimes I get upset about things for a bit, but then I do something to change the feeling. I count my blessings, go for a walk or do something to encourage other people.

"I have been this way since my early forties. That is when I learned to focus on what I can control. Maybe I am just lucky, but since then I have got happier as I have grown older."

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you managed emotions in a helpful way? You may have recovered from a setback, managed a difficult challenge, made a tough decision or done another activity.

What did you do to manage the emotions? What happened as a result of taking these steps? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Managing Emotions

People choose how they manage their feelings. The choices they make, however, are often influenced by personal experiences. They may learn from watching models - such as parents, friends and others they admire.

Sometimes their strategies work, sometimes they provide temporary relief, sometimes they create problems. The strategies that a person applies may fall into one of two categories:

They help themselves or other people;

They hurt themselves or other people.

The following pages describe how people can manage their emotions in a positive way. The first section focuses on some basic models that work. We then explore some of the more complex challenges.

The Choices Approach

Imagine that a person feels sad. They can choose how they deal with this feeling. For example:

They can cry ... They can sulk ... They can lash out at others ... They can say the world is against them.

They can do an activity that will help them to feel happier – such as going for a walk, gardening, playing music or another activity.

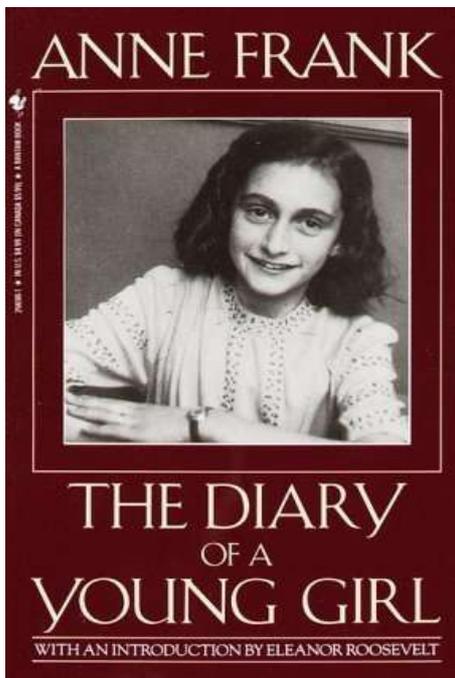

They can translate their sadness into doing something that helps other people – because giving to others often helps the giver to feel good.

People choose how they express their feelings. They can do this by asking the following questions.

*"What am I feeling right now? How do I want to manage this feeling?
What are the various options? What are the consequences of each option?
Which option do I want to follow?"*

Anne Frank was somebody who used her feelings to create a testament to the appreciation of life. People will have their own favourite quotes from her diary. Here are some that are often used.

"Everyone has inside of him a piece of good news. The good news is that you don't know how great you can be! How much you can love! What you can accomplish! And what your potential is!"

"How wonderful it is that nobody need wait a single moment before starting to improve the world."

"I want to be useful or bring enjoyment to all people, even those I've never met ... I want to go on living even after my death!"

"Think of all the beauty still left around you and be happy. Whoever is happy will make others happy."

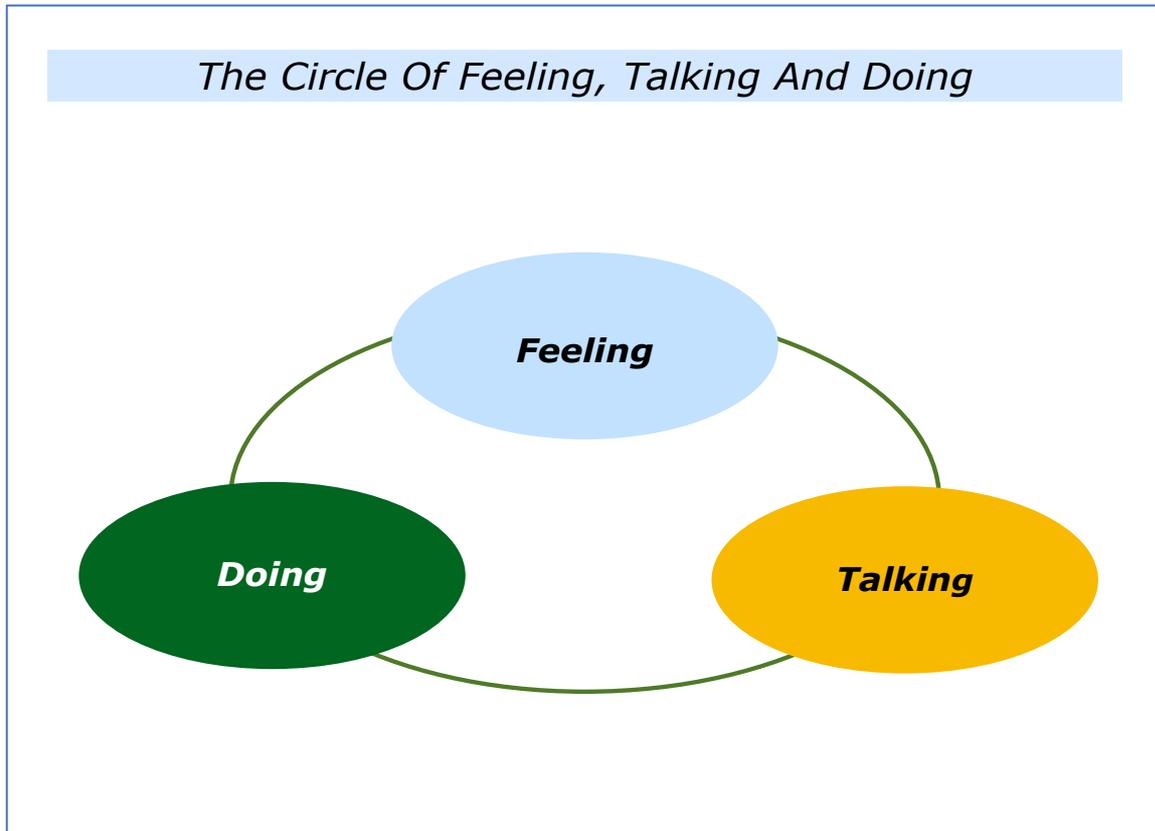

"Look at how a single candle can both defy and define the darkness."

The Doing Something To Change The Feeling Approach

There are many views about how it is possible to manage feelings. One approach is to recognise the circle of feeling, talking and doing. Imagine that for some reason you feel bad. It can then be useful:

To acknowledge that you have a certain feeling – such as sadness, disappointment or another feeling;

To do something that will give yourself another feeling.

Some people love to talk about how bad they feel. This can help for a while, but it can lead to them falling into a negative cycle.

If they feel overcome by problems, however, there is a quick way to change that feeling. They can do something that will encourage themselves or other people.

Feeling, talking and doing are all important. If somebody wants to feel differently quickly, however, they can do this by behaving differently.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? What may be the feeling you want to get in the situation?

What are the principles you can follow to increase the likelihood of getting the feeling? How can you do your best to follow these principles to get the desired feeling?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Many people find it challenging to manage their emotions regarding events happening in the world. Some want to know what is happening but also find the information overwhelming.

This feeling was epitomised in the famous cartoon published by David Sipress in the New Yorker in 1989. In it a woman is saying to a man:

"My desire to be well-informed is currently at odds with my desire to stay sane."

Different people find different ways to manage their emotions. One approach is to make sure you get your daily delights and healthy anti-depressants.

Doctor Phil Hammond describes one such approach. Here is an excerpt from a piece he wrote on this topic.

Our health is our freedom to live a life that we have reason to value, and our ability to bounce back when our circumstances change and life kicks us in the teeth.

Both of these elements of health are more likely to happen if we try to adopt daily habits that are fun, good for us and rewarding. One way to remember them is the acronym CLANGERS, which depicts 8 daily vitamins (and joys) of health.

Connect .. Learn .. Active .. Notice .. Give Back .. Eat well .. Relax .. Sleep

These are the fundamentals of feeling good and, if you can do them at regular times to fit in with your body's natural 24 hour rhythm (particularly eating, exercising and sleeping), it should improve how you feel and your energy levels.

Doing Your Daily Clangers

- CONNECT with the world around you.

Human beings are social animals. We are leaves on a tree, needing to feel part of something bigger. Reach out to people, pets, plants, places and the planet.

- LEARN

What do you want to do with your one wild and precious life? A purpose in life often stems from learning about what matters most to you, developing a passion for learning and keeping your curiosity alive.

- BE ACTIVE in mind and body.

Rediscover activities and passions you left behind. Have the courage to try new ones. Aim for five portions of fun a day, each different, at least one outdoors and one that involved getting pleasantly breathless.

- NOTICE and be present in the world around you

Try to be as still as you can for fifteen minutes every day, preferably outside. Fill up your senses. Catch sight of the beautiful. Enjoy the everyday. Savour the moment. Slowing down and focusing on your breathing for ten minutes a day can pay huge dividends.

- GIVE BACK

Helping and caring for friends, strangers and those less fortunate than ourselves is fundamental to good emotional health. It cements us as part of a community and develops more meaningful connections and insights.

- EAT WELL

Food is above all a pleasure. Learn what's good and enjoyable to eat, and in what quantities. Learn how to grow it, where to buy it and how to prepare it. Set time aside to sit and eat with friends and family.

- RELAX

Take time to rest and reflect on the day you've had, reliving and re-savouring the happy memories and having gratitude for friends and family. Learn to meditate. Be kind to your mind and let it wind down and de-clutter.

Our brains are neuro plastic, which means what we focus on is what grows. So if we learn to relive happy moments and have gratitude for the good things, it can actually make us happier. And this happy end of day wind down can really improve your sleep.

- SLEEP

Good sleep is one of life's great joys. It's also essential for mental and physical health, helping you prevent and recover from a whole range of illnesses and improving your energy levels, creativity and performance.

Doctor Phil works with young people and others who experience chronic fatigue. There are many physical and psychological approaches to helping such people to regain their health.

One approach is to encourage them to do those things that give them delight. It is also to pursue some of the healthy anti-depressants – such as walking, exercising, playing and doing things that give them joy.

People who experience bipolar feelings are sometimes given similar advice. Here is an excerpt from the website of the American Addiction Centers Resources.

This advises people: a) to follow a regular routine; b) to do things that give them positive energy. It also provides the following suggestions.

Persons with Bipolar Disorder who are in the grip of severe mood episodes are often unable to help themselves or often even to stop themselves from acting out in ways that may damage their health.

However, these same people can do a whole lot to help ensure their health and safety as their bipolar symptoms stabilize (generally with the help of bipolar medication therapy).

Self-help methods include any activities that patients may engage in which will help keep their moods maximally stable. Useful methods that patients might explore would include:

Setting and maintaining a standard bedtime and wake-time.

Eating a healthy diet at regular times each day

Regular physical exercise.

Practicing relaxation or meditation exercises regularly.

Reducing work and family stress as much as is practical.

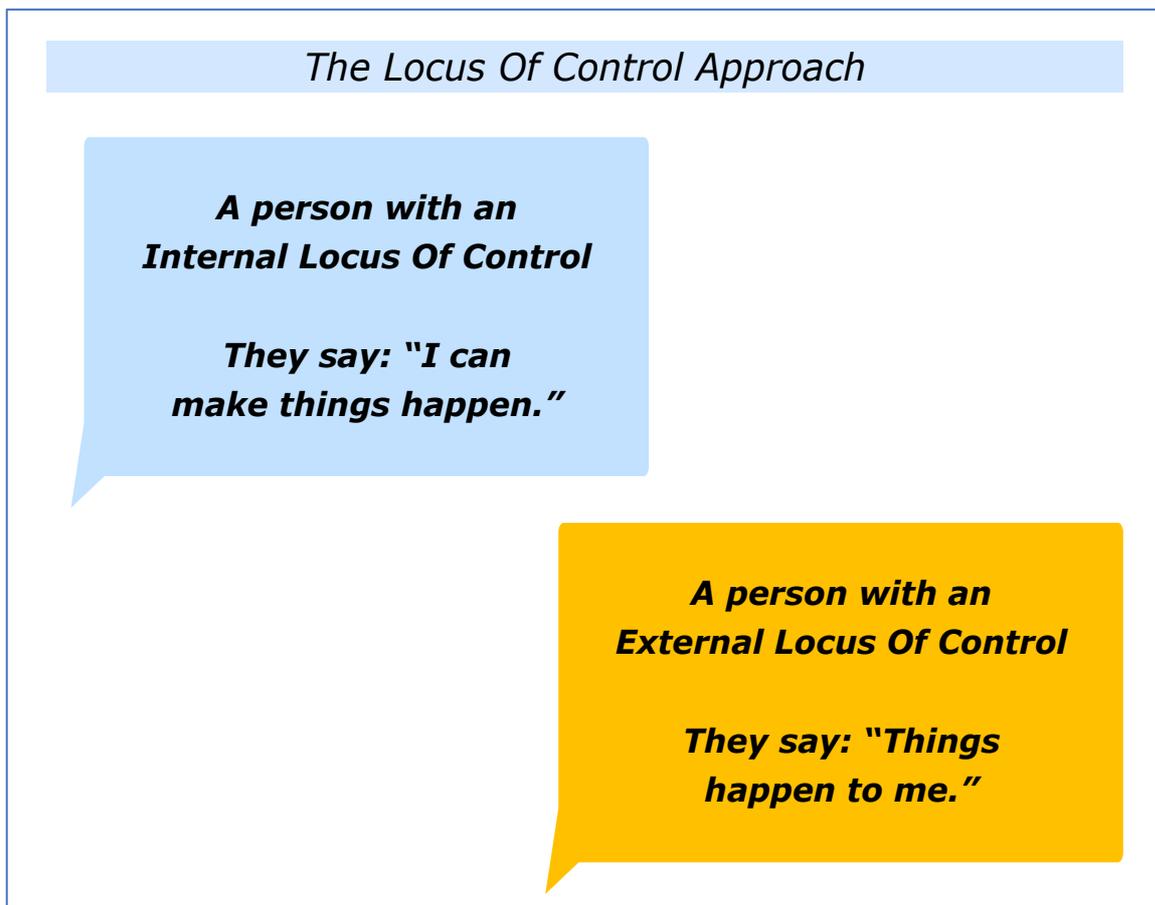

Regular participation in communities (including peer-support groups, religious communities or other civic or interest-based regular gatherings).

Regular attendance in psychotherapy and/or regular self-monitoring exercises designed to help promote awareness of moods (talking about problems and problem solving help to prevent depression).

Avoidance of mood-altering drugs, including alcohol.

Self-help approaches can help patients increase their ability to resist extremes of emotion (insomuch as that is possible to accomplish), and also help patients to recognize when a shift in mood is about to occur so that they may take steps to minimize the severity and impact of that oncoming mood.

The Locus Of Control Approach

Imagine you are helping a person to manage their emotions. Whatever approach you use, at some point you will probably invite the person to take responsibility for shaping their future.

This calls for them strengthening their internal locus of control, which was a term coined by Julian Rotter in the 1950s. Let's explore what this means.

A person with an internal locus of control

They believe they can make things happen and help to shape their future;

They believe that, whilst external events may bring challenges, they can take an internal decision regarding how they respond to such events;

They say things like: "I can take responsibility ... I can make things happen ... I can recover from setbacks."

A person with an external locus of control

They believe they have little control over their lives and shaping their future;

They believe they are at the mercy of events and these determine their happiness;

They say things like: "The world is against me ... Why do things like this always happen to me? ... Everything would be okay if I won the lottery."

Many individuals reach a point where they develop their internal locus of control. They then aim to shape their future.

Some people prefer to blame outside circumstances. Others may try to help them, but their suggestions fall on unreceptive ground. They are met by the person saying:

"Yes, but ..."

Good coaches create an encouraging environment in which a person can feel safe and explore. As mentioned earlier, this often involves helping a person to increase their way power.

Many people respond to this approach. If they don't, however, at some point the coach may refocus on the person's will power. They may say to the person:

"I am happy to continue to work with you, but it will be important for you to decide if you want to shape your future.

"At the moment this may seem difficult. Bearing this in mind, I am going to give you time to reflect.

"Get back to me when you want to work towards your goals. We can then work on how you can do your best to achieve your picture of success."

A person must demonstrate the will before they can learn the skill. Once they have done that, it is possible to help them to add to their repertoire for achieving their goals.

The Volunteer Language Rather Than Victim Language Approach

This is an approach that I saw used in treatment programmes for people recovering from addiction or other challenges. As we know, the language we use can help to shape feelings.

Bearing this in mind, people were encouraged to consider whether they chose to use volunteer language or victim language. Here are some of the ways that people might demonstrate these approaches.

*People Can Use Volunteer
Language Or Victim Language*

Volunteer Language

They choose to believe: "I can make things happen."

They choose to take responsibility for their feelings.

They choose to be grateful and appreciate life.

They choose to focus on what they can control.

They choose to be builders and try to find win-wins.

Victim Language

They choose to believe: "Other people make things happen to me."

They choose to blame other people for their feelings.

They choose to be grumpy and get angry about life.

They choose to focus on others they would like to control.

They choose to be blamers who try to win and make others lose.

People were encouraged to take ownership for choosing the route they wanted to take. Those that chose the volunteer approach were more likely to shape their futures in a way that helped them and other people.

The Taking Care Approach

During the past fifty years I have worked with many people in the caring professions. They have used their compassion to care for other people or the planet.

Such people love to give to others. At the same time, it is important for them to take care of themselves and their health. Taking this step enables them to keep giving their best to other people.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. This can involve focusing on the following themes.

Taking Care Of Yourself

Different people take care of themselves in different ways. One approach is for them to take care of their physical, psychological and philosophical health.

Imagine that you want to follow element of this approach. Here are some topics you may want to consider.

Physical Health

How physically healthy do you feel? How would you rate your physical health on a scale 0-10? How can you maintain or improve the rating?

You may want to eat nourishing food, exercise in a way that you enjoy and manage your energy. You may also want to feel more in control of shaping your days.

The latter point is crucial. People often feel better when they are following their own rhythm rather than somebody else's rhythm. This is especially true as they get older.

Bearing this in mind, how can you shape your days so you feel more in charge? This can be challenging - especially if you work for a big organisation that has its own rhythm.

You may be morally bound to make your best contribution to an organisation. At the same time, it can sometimes be useful to work in a flexible way that supports your quality of life.

Psychological Health

How positive do you feel? How would you rate your psychological health on a scale 0-10? How can you maintain or improve the rating?

You may want to do the things that give you positive energy. These may include doing what you enjoy, walking, being with your loved ones, pursuing your passions, doing satisfying work or other activities.

You may want to continue being with positive people. These are people with whom you feel at ease and able to be yourself. They may be your loved ones, kindred spirits or other people.

You may want to continue to have a positive attitude. This may include focusing on what you can control, having a sense of gratitude, seeing possibilities and giving to other people.

Philosophical Health

How do you feel in terms of having a sense of purpose and working towards your life goals? How would you rate this - your philosophical health - on a scale 0-10? How can you maintain or improve the rating?

You may want to focus on the things that enrich your life. These may include serving something greater than yourself, working towards your life goals or following your vocation.

You may want to reflect on what you have achieved in your life. Who have been the people you have helped? How have you encouraged loved ones, friends and other people? What would they say about how you have helped them?

People who are givers sometimes need to take care of themselves. Taking this step can give them more energy to give to other people. This leads to the next theme.

Taking Care Of Other People

Different people take care of people in different ways. Some do it in a proactive way, some do it in a reactive way, some combine both elements. Let's explore these themes.

Some people care for others in a proactive way. They may aim to offer provide a loving environment, encouragement and the basic materials for life.

They may take this approach as parents, educators, scientists, mentors, decisions makers or in other roles. They aim to provide people with the tools they can use to shape a positive future.

Some people care for others in a reactive way. They may care for them by providing support, medical care, therapy, counselling or doing other activities that help people to heal.

Such people may also move into taking proactive action. After helping with the healing, they may aim to provide the conditions that can help people to stay healthy and grow.

Taking Care Of The Planet

Different people take care of the planet in different ways. They may aim to do this in a practical, psychological or philosophical way.

Some people care for the planet in a practical way. They may aim to do this by cleaning up pollution, gardening, farming in a sustainable way or doing other things to protect or enhance the beauty of the planet.

Some people care for the planet in a psychological way. They may do this by writing inspiring articles, describing positive models that show a better way or supporting people who are doing their best to care for the planet.

Some people care for the planet in a philosophical way. They may do this by sharing positive paradigms. This can involve that showing people how to build sustainable systems that benefit both people and the planet.

Let's return to your own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the taking care approach?

The Positive Attitude Approach Rather Than The Paralysed By Angst Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to have a positive attitude. Some may be paralysed by angst. The route they choose has consequences for themselves and other people. Let's explore these themes.

The Positive Attitude Approach

People who take this route are often grateful, generous and aim to do good work in their lives. They want to encourage people during their time on the planet.

Such people are often positive realists, however, rather than wide-eyed optimists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality. They focus on what they can control and are good at being able:

To recognise the positive qualities in themselves, people, teams and organisations;

To recognise the positive and negative patterns in people, teams and organisations;

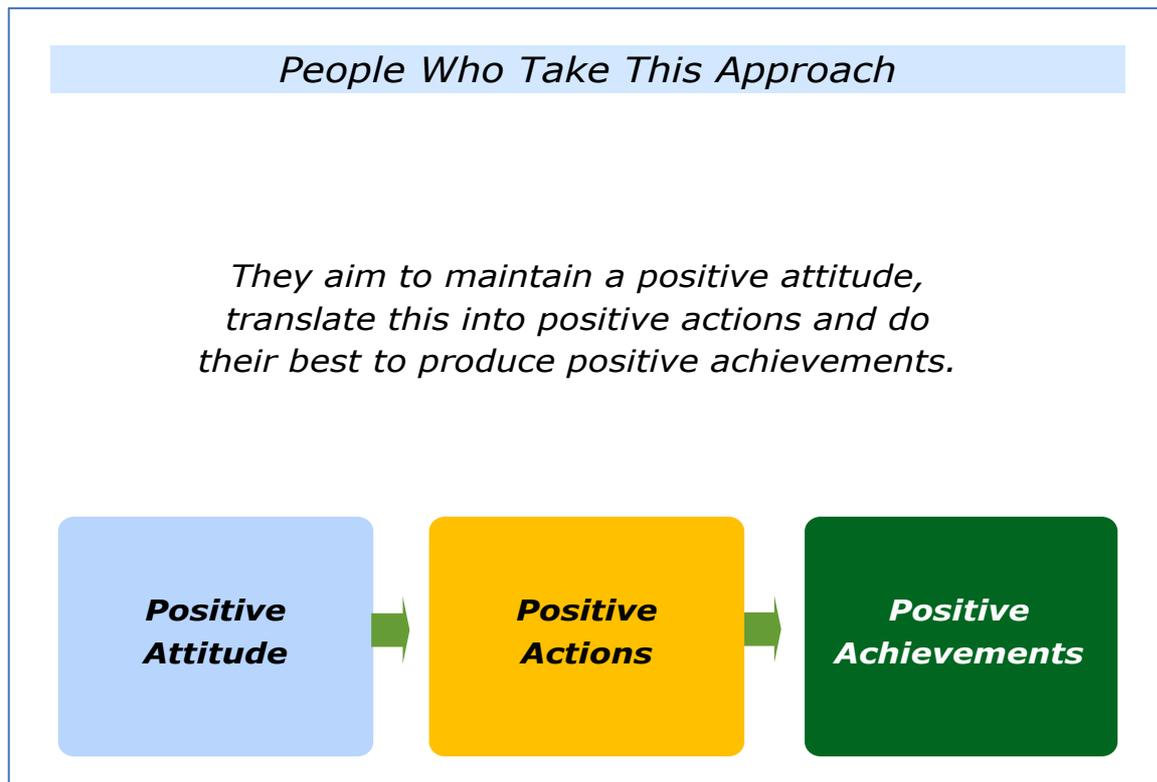

To recognise how to build on the positive patterns and manage negative patterns to achieve positive results.

Such people are not blind to potentially negative things in the world. They sometimes deal with this, however, by following the old saying that:

"What you focus on, you become."

They therefore aim to study: a) the positive things that are happening in the world; b) the positive things that are being done to find solutions to difficult challenges.

Such people use this information to maintain a positive attitude. They then translate this into positive actions and do their best to produce positive achievements.

Some people follow this approach when acting as a parent, partner, carer or friend. Some follow it when working as a medic, teacher, coach, therapist, trusted advisor or in another professional role.

Such people often focus on success. They aim to study what works, simplify what works – in a profound way – and share what works. They then follow strategies work and do their best to achieve success.

The Paralysed By Angst Approach

Different people follow this route for different reasons. Some people may have had experiences that mean they look at life through a negative lens. This may also follow negative scripts in the daily lives.

Some people may have an external locus of control rather than internal locus of control. They may say: "Things happen to me," rather than, "I can make things happen."

Some people may be highly sensitive and feel overwhelmed by experiences or what is happening in the world. They may also dwell on events and feel paralysed by angst.

Some dictators, politicians and leaders aim to suppress people. They aim to make people feel scared, helpless and impotent. This can lead to people feeling there is nothing they can do to change things.

People who have a positive attitude are often curious and also gather information about what is happening in the world. Sometimes they feel depressed for a while, but then they build on what they can control.

Such people focus on what they can do to encourage others and plant seeds of hope in their lives. They aim to do positive things that can help people or the planet.

Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive attitude approach? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Maintenance, Magical And Miserable Approaches

There are many ways to live life. Sometimes we have a wide choice regarding the attitude or approach we take. Sometimes our choices are more limited.

The following section explore three approaches that people may follow at various times in their lives. There are, of course, many other routes that people may pursue.

The Maintenance Approach

Some people spend much of their lives following the maintenance approach. They do the necessary tasks to get the basic materials for life for themselves and their loved ones.

They also aim to get the maintenance tasks done in their work. Getting these done provides the platform for moving on to doing work that is satisfying.

The Magical Approach

Some people follow the magical approach. They do the maintenance and then aim to add magic to their lives. They may do this by spending time with loved ones, doing stimulating activities or pursuing experiences that take them into another dimension.

Some may experience magic when counting their blessings, having a sense of wonder or doing certain activities. They may feel this when adventuring, tackling challenges or helping other people to have magical experiences.

The Miserable Approach

Some people experience the miserable approach. They may focus on darkness and not know how to provide a light for themselves or others. This can be challenging for themselves and other people.

Some may also aim to make life miserable for other people. They may do this by spreading fear or aiming to control others. Some may do it by causing pain or scapegoating other people.

Some individuals who experience misery choose to replace it by acting to find solutions to challenges. Sometimes this calls for focusing on how to do the maintenance things and maybe even bring magic to their own or other people's lives.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, how can you continue to do the maintenance things? How can you add the magic? When appropriate, how can you deal with any misery by helping yourself or other people?

The Doing Beautiful Things During Boring Or Battling Times Approach

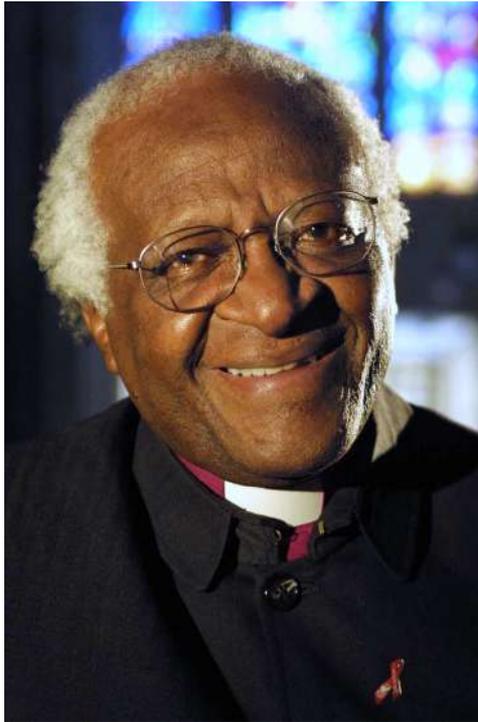

There are many ways to feed the soul. One approach is to do beautiful things during boring or battling times. Let's look at some examples.

People who are having treatment for cancer often do things to brighten their own and other people's lives. They may wear colourful clothing, aim to appreciate special moments or do practical work to help other people.

People who feel bored may do things that give them positive energy. They may play beautiful music, study success or embark on doing creative projects.

Desmond Tutu believed it was important to do small things – as well as big things – that lift the spirit. Writing in The Impossible Will Take A Little While, Paul Rogat Loeb, describes how Tutu laughs and loves life.

Tutu, like other social and political activists who haven't forgotten the importance of enjoyment, passionately embraces the gifts placed before him.

If it's a gift of music, he will dance. If a gift of food, he will eat. If in the company of friends, he will converse, laugh, and share stories.

Such are the small but necessary pleasures that enable him to look evil in the eye and be confident that the fight must be fought.

For only someone who knows how good life can be is in a position to appreciate what's at stake when life is degraded or destroyed.

Maria Popova aims to encourage the positive spirit in people. She grew up in Bulgaria before leaving for the United States and creating the website Brain Pickings which has been renamed as The Marginalian.

Maria aims to pass on knowledge that enables people to be creative and shape their future lives. In one article she reflected on the lessons she had learned during her time writing the blog. These included the following tips for maintaining your own spirit during challenging times.

Be generous

Be generous with your time and your resources and with giving credit and, especially, with your words. It's so much easier to be a critic than a celebrator.

Always remember there is a human being on the other end of every exchange and behind every cultural artifact being critiqued.

To understand and be understood, those are among life's greatest gifts, and every interaction is an opportunity to exchange them.

Build pockets of stillness into your life

Meditate. Go for walks. Ride your bike going nowhere in particular. There is a creative purpose to daydreaming and even boredom.

The best ideas come to us when we stop actively trying to coax the muse into manifesting and let the fragments of experience float around our unconscious mind in order to click into new combinations.

Most important, sleep. Besides being the greatest creative aphrodisiac, sleep also affects our every waking moment, dictates our social rhythm and even mediates our negative moods.

Presence is far more intricate and rewarding an art than productivity

Ours is a culture that measures our worth as human beings by our efficiency, our earnings, our ability to perform this or that.

The cult of productivity has its place, but worshipping at its altar daily robs us of the very capacity for joy and wonder that makes life worth living — for, as Annie Dillard memorably put it, “how we spend our days is, of course, how we spend our lives.”

Expect anything worthwhile to take a long time

This is borrowed from the wise and wonderful Debbie Millman, for it’s hard to better capture something so fundamental yet so impatiently overlooked in our culture of immediacy.

The myth of the overnight success is just that — a myth — as well as a reminder that our present definition of success needs serious retuning.

The flower doesn’t go from bud to blossom in one spritely burst and yet, as a culture, we’re disinterested in the tedium of the blossoming. But that’s where all the real magic unfolds in the making of one’s character and destiny.

Don’t be afraid to be an idealist

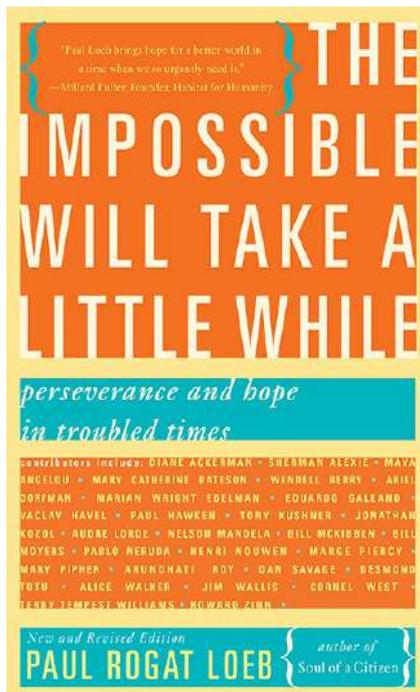

E.B. White, one of our last great idealists, was eternally right when he asserted half a century ago that the role of the writer is “to lift people up, not lower them down” - a role each of us is called to with increasing urgency, whatever cog we may be in the machinery of society.

Seek out what magnifies your spirit

Patti Smith, in discussing William Blake and her creative influences, talks about writers and artists who magnified her spirit - it's a beautiful phrase and a beautiful notion.

Who are the people, ideas, and books that magnify your spirit? Find them, hold on to them, and visit them often. Use them not only as a remedy once spiritual malaise has already infected your vitality but as a vaccine administered while you are healthy to protect your radiance.

Paul Rogat Loeb says: "Hope is a way of looking at the world." Writing in The Impossible Will Take A Little While, he says that one person's actions can inspire others. He describes this in the following way.

Even in a seemingly futile moment or losing cause, one person may unknowingly inspire another, and that person yet a third, who could go on and change the world, or at least a corner of it.

Mandela called this process:

The multiplication of courage.

We live in a contradictory world. Dispiriting events coincide with progress for human dignity. But when change occurs, it's because people persist, whatever the nature of their causes.

"The world gets worse. It also gets better," writes Rebecca Solnit in her wonderful essay Acts of Hope. Change comes, Solnit argues:

"Not by magic, but by the incremental effects of countless acts of courage, love, and commitment, the small drops that wear away stones and carve new landscapes, and sometimes by torrents of popular will that change the world suddenly."

There are many ways to feed the soul. One approach is to do beautiful things during boring or battling times. This can provide benefits for both yourself and other people.

Looking ahead, can you think a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Alive, Alert And Achieving Things Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people focus on doing the activities where they feel alive, alert and achieve things. They also follow the anti-numbness approach. Let's explore these themes.

Alive

What are the specific activities where you feel alive? You may feel this when caring for your loved ones, playing a sport, doing a creative project, performing satisfying work or doing other activities.

People want to feel alive. Some reach a point in their career where they are no longer doing satisfying work. They feel stodgy and part of a big system.

This is a topic that some people raise during mentoring sessions. Whilst it is not always possible to change everything straight away, we often find ways they can do satisfying work. We also focus on how they can do other things to regain their zest for life.

Alert

What are the activities where you feel alive and alert? You may do this when you are in your element – doing activities where you feel at ease and yet able to excel.

Going into the situation, you use your antennae to gather information. Scanning the situation, you may look for patterns, see possibilities and the potential challenges.

Great workers often take this approach. They use their strengths and experience to clarify what is happening. They then settle on their chosen strategies for achieving the desired picture of success.

Achieving Things

People often like to set and achieve goals. Bearing this in mind, what are the activities where you feel alive, alert and also achieve things? These could be in your personal or professional life.

You may get satisfaction from encouraging a person, cooking a meal or renovating a building. You may get it from solving a problem, completing a creative project or sharing knowledge that helps other people.

Joseph Campbell, the professor of mythology, was sometimes approached by people who were looking for meaning in life. He said:

"I don't think people are really seeking the meaning of life. I think we're seeking an experience of being alive. We want to feel the rapture of being alive"

This highlights a key theme followed by some people in their lives and work.

The Alive And Anti-Numbness Approach

Some people believe that parts of society are geared towards numbing people. They recognise that some politicians, institutions and bureaucracies aim to control and exhaust people. This can lead to people feeling numb or choosing to numb themselves.

Some people aim to continue to feel alive and alert in their own lives. Some artists, writers, thinkers and others do work that encourages people to experience and retain their aliveness.

Such individuals also encourage people to focus on the experiences that give them joy, happiness and stimulation. They encourage people to be on the side of life and combat institutions that can numb people into despair and consumerism.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity where you feel alive, alert and achieve things? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you continue to do this activity? How can you do this in a way the benefits you and maybe other people? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The How Are You Choosing To Feel Today? Approach

How Are You Choosing To Feel Today?

This approach is based on you first being able to fulfil your basic needs for food, safety and shelter. If so, then you can:

- Choose to increase the likelihood of having a certain feeling;*
- Choose the attitude you want to have towards having a certain feeling;*
- Choose to be aware of the consequences – the pluses or minuses – of how you express a certain feeling.*

There are many ways to live life. This approach explores how a person can choose to increase the likelihood experiencing certain feelings in life.

The first step, of course, is for a person to be able to satisfy their basic physical needs. They need food, safety and the basic materials for life. They can then focus on their psychological needs.

Every person is different. They will have had different experiences and models in their lives. These will influence how they manage their emotions. There comes a point in their life, however, when a person can choose their attitude in certain situations.

Many people recognise the specific things they can do to increase the likelihood of them feeling positive or negative. They may also recognise that the way they behave has consequences – both for themselves and other people.

Viktor Frankl highlighted this approach in his book Man's Search For Meaning. This described his journey as a prisoner in the Nazi concentration camps.

The daily horrors left much to chance and survival could depend on the whim of a guard. Trying to make sense of the madness, Viktor described what he saw as the last human freedom. He described this in the following way.

Everything can be taken from a man or a woman but one thing: the last of human freedoms to choose one's attitude in any given set of circumstances, to choose one's own way.

This is an approach I built on when working with people. Greeting them in a positive way, I would also ask:

"How are you choosing to feel today?"

When appropriate, we then began to focus on the theme of choices and consequences. Bearing in mind the things they could control, we focused on the choices they wanted to pursue in their lives or work.

They could choose their attitude, aspirations and how they wanted to work towards potential achievements. They could also choose to increase the likelihood of having certain feelings. The choices they made could have consequence – both for themselves and other people.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach. You may want to increase the chances of having certain feelings. Or you may have a professional role where you are helping others to shape their future lives. Let's explore the following themes.

Choosing to increase the likelihood of having a certain feeling

How can you help to shape your feelings? One approach is to ask yourself the following questions.

What are the specific things I can do to increase the chances of feeling positive? What can I do to increase the chances of being happy? What can I do to increase the chances of developing my strength to deal with challenges?

What have I done in the past to develop these feelings? What did I do right then? What were the principles I followed? How can I follow these principles – plus maybe add other skills – to have these feelings in the future?

What can I do to encourage myself? What can I do to count my blessings? What can I do to build on my personal and professional assets? What can I do make the most of my life on Earth?

What can I do to put myself into positive circles? What can I do to put myself into negative circles? What will be the consequences of taking each of these approaches?

What are the feelings I want to have in the future? How can I do my best to increase the chances of having these feelings? What will be the consequences – both for myself and other people?

There are many ways that a person can be helped to shape their feelings. Let's look at another approach.

Choosing the attitude you want to have towards having a certain feeling

A person can sometimes feel out of control, worried or have another challenging feeling. They may say something like:

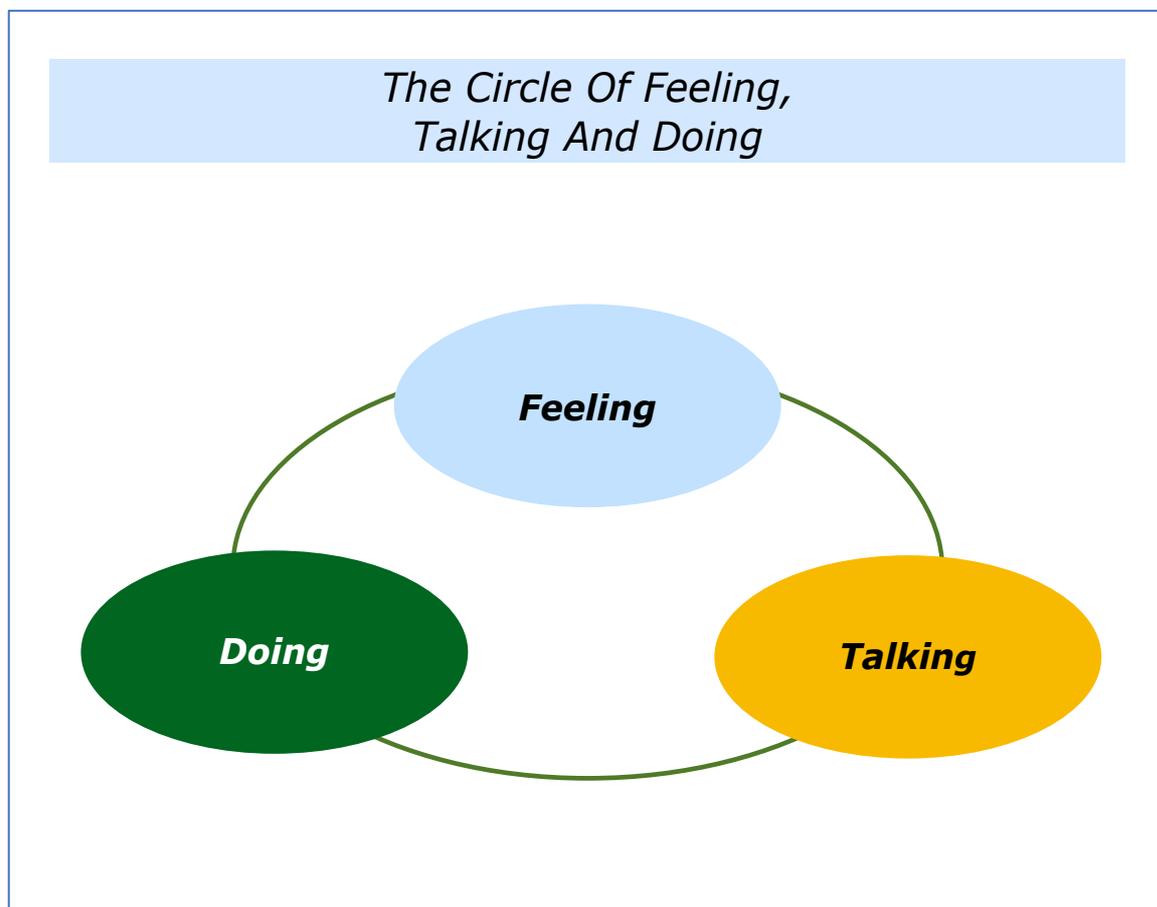

"I feel really down and am not sure how to deal with this feeling."

How to help them to retake control? Some people may respond by showing empathy, some may make suggestions. When appropriate, there is another approach.

This involves inviting the person to take charge of shaping their future. It is to ask the person:

"What is the attitude you want to take towards having this feeling?"

This involves helping the person to find ways to manage the feeling rather than let the feeling manage them. One approach is to help the person to recognise the circle of feeling, talking and doing.

Imagine, for example, that for some reason you feel bad. It can then be useful:

To acknowledge that you have a certain feeling – such as sadness, disappointment or another difficult feeling;

To decide that you want to have a better feeling;

To do something that is likely to increase the chances of having that feeling.

Some people love to talk about how bad they feel. This can help for a while but it can lead to them falling into a negative cycle.

Reflecting is vital but then comes the crunch. Some people substitute talking for action. They may find that their analysis leads to a downwards spiral. They may say, for example:

"Why can't I do something? Before I move forward, I must understand the barriers stopping me."

If they feel overcome by problems, however, there is a quick way to change that feeling. They can do something that will encourage themselves or other people.

Feeling, talking and doing are all important. If somebody wants to feel differently quickly, however, they can do this by behaving differently. People can choose what they do and, in this way, help to shape their future feelings.

Choosing to be aware of the consequences of how you express a certain feeling

A person may sometimes want to talk about their feelings or express these in other ways. Many people find this a good way to manage or deal with feelings.

Some people may do this in helpful way. They may find it helps to heal themselves. It can also sometimes lead to deepening relationships with other people.

Some people may express their feelings in not so helpful ways. Sometimes this can have less helpful consequences – both for themselves and other people.

When appropriate, a person may therefore find it helpful to buy time to reflect. They may then want to explore the following questions.

What am I feeling at the moment? What do I want to do about this feeling? How can I manage it in, as far as possible, a positive way?

Do I want to express this feeling in any way? If so, what are the possible ways I can express this feeling? What may be the consequences – the pluses and minuses – of each option? What may be the effect – for myself and for other people?

Bearing these things in mind, what is the route I want to take to express the feeling? How can I express it in a way that helps – rather than hurts - myself or other people? What are the steps I can take to make this happen?

Such an approach sounds difficult – especially during heated moments or times of distress. But it is route is worth considering.

Some people find it useful to explore the possible choices they have and the consequences of each option. They may then choose to express their feeling in a way that is helpful rather than hurtful for themselves and other people.

There are many ways to live life. This section has explored how a person can choose to increase the likelihood experiencing and managing certain feelings.

The Taking Action To Shape The Future During Turbulent Times Approach

Taking Action During Turbulent Times

Some people take the following steps to shape the future during turbulent times.

- Step One: They take stock.
- Step Two: They take time to think clearly.
- Step Three: They take action to shape the future during the turbulent times.

There are many ways to manage situations in turbulent times. Some people take the following steps. They take stock, take time to think clearly and take action to shape a positive future during the turbulent time.

Different people follow these steps in different ways. Let's explore how they may translate these into action.

Step One - Taking Stock

Imagine that a person is facing a challenge. They may have experienced a shock, lost their job or be confronted by a troubling problem that could affect them or their loved ones.

Their first reaction will be to deal with any pressing issues that could be life-changing or cause damage. The aim will be to, as far as possible, stabilise the situation.

Imagine that a person has managed to do this. They may then buy time to take stock of the situation by focusing on the following themes.

They take stock of what is happening in the situation and what could happen in the future

A person may gather as much relevant information as possible. They may do this by exploring some of the following questions.

What is actually happening in the situation? What could happen if these things continue? What may be the consequences? How can I deal with the effects of these consequences?

Looking at the situation, what could happen in the future? What could be possibilities? What could be done to shape a positive future? What may be the benefits of taking this approach?

Let's assume that a person has gathered information about what is happening. They may then move on to the next stage.

They take stock of what they believe it is important to do in the situation

Some people may focus on their inner compass before settling on their plans for tackling the situation. Here are some things they may consider when exploring this theme.

The specific things I believe are important to do in this situation are:

To be true to myself ... To follow my principles ... To care for my loved ones ... To clarify the results I want to achieve ... To do my best to achieve those results.

Imagine that a person has settled on the principles they want to follow in the situation. They may then consider their action plan. Before doing so, however, they may also explore the following theme.

They take stock of their assets and how they can use these in the situation

Some people focus on how they can use their assets to tackle the situation successfully. Bearing this in mind, they may explore the following themes.

What are my personal and professional assets? What are my strengths? What is my successful style of working? Looking back, when have I tackled a similar situation successfully?

What did I do right then? What were the principles I followed? How can I follow these to principles in the future? How can I use my assets and strengths to tackle the present challenge?

Imagine that a person has taken stock. They may then move on to the next step.

Step Two - Taking Time To Think Clearly

Good crisis managers take action to deal with any immediate issues and, when appropriate, aim to stabilise the situation. They then buy time to look ahead and plan their strategy. They may explore the following themes.

What are the things I can control in the situation? What are the things I can't control? How can I do my best to build on what I can control and manage what I can't?

Looking ahead, what are the real results I want to achieve? What is the picture of success? What are the specific things that will be happening that will show I have achieved success?

What are the possible options going forwards? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses – of each option? Are there any other potential options?

What is the route I want to take? What are the key strategies I can then follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? How can I manage any potential challenges?

How can I translate these strategies into action? How can I get some quick wins? How can I encourage myself on the journey? What else can I do to increase the chances of achieving success?

Imagine that a person has clarified their strategy. It is then time focus on the next step.

Step Three – Taking Action To Shape The Future During The Turbulent Times

Good crisis managers move into action and aim to achieve their picture of success. Different people do this in different situations.

They may be working as a first responder, a mediator or a technical problem solver. They may be an individual tackling a personal or professional crisis. Whatever their situation, they may aim:

To manage the present situation but also focus on the possible positive future;

To follow the strategies most likely to achieve the desired results both now and in the future;

To get some quick successes and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

There are many ways to manage situations and shape the future in turbulent times. This piece has looked at how people may take stock, take time to think and then take action to do what is necessary in the turbulent time.

The Positive Programme Approach

People like to follow habits. Bearing this in mind, some people choose to put themselves on a positive programme rather than a negative programme.

A person may choose to do this when tackling a challenge or working to reach a certain goal. This could involve aiming to follow good habits in their personal or professional life.

A person want to recover from an illness, develop a healthy lifestyle, train for a marathon or do another activity. They want to do good work as a counsellor, athlete, trusted advisor, leader or in another professional role.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of this approach in your own way. If appropriate, you may want to consider pursuing the following themes.

You can clarify the goal you want to achieve and the benefits of following a positive programme

Looking ahead, can you think of a goal you want to achieve? Different people want to achieve different things in their lives and work. Here is a summary of one person's aims.

"I want to develop a positive attitude and not compare myself to others. The family I grew up in was loving but sometimes we as children got negative messages. These often involved comparing ourselves to others. We were told it was important to get good grades and be top of the class.

"On the one hand this was good because it taught us to work hard. It was only later that I realised it was important to focus on what I was best at and do my best. Comparing myself to others was a no-win situation.

"Bearing this in mind, I want to maintain a positive attitude towards myself and other people. At the same time, I want to be grateful and humble.

"I also want to take care of my parents as they get older. This includes showing my gratitude for the positive things they have given me in life. I can also find ways to deal with any criticism they give.

"Doing these things will help me to feel positive and able to keep encouraging others. This will bring benefits to both myself and other people."

You will set your own specific goal. You will also see the benefits of achieving these aims. It will be important to keep focusing on these when working towards the goal in your personal or professional life.

You may want to stay healthy, run a marathon, resume playing music, climb a mountain or do another activity. You may want to achieve certain aims in your work as an artist, educator, technical specialist, leader or in another role.

Let's assume that you have focused on an activity you want to pursue and have also set a specific goal. You have also clarified the benefits of achieving the goal. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can make specific plans and get some early successes when following the positive programme

People like to work towards achieving stimulating goals. They also like to make plans they believe in that include some of the following qualities. Providing they do their best:

They are able to stand a good chance of achieving success;

They are following their chosen rhythm – their way of doing things – on the way to achieving success;

They are getting some early wins and encouraging themselves on the journey towards achieving success.

People who take these steps may see themselves as following a positive programme. They make a plan and follow a certain rhythm towards achieving their aims. Different people follow this approach in different situations.

A recovering addict may aim to stay healthy one day at a time. A mediator may aim to stay positive and help warring parties to find solutions to conflicts. A great worker may aim to follow their principles and do their best to deliver peak performances.

Such people clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They then translate this into specific actions and follow good habits on the way to achieving their goals.

One person took this approach when having treatment for cancer. Here is a summary of the positive programme they aimed to follow.

"I was fortunate to have several non-invasive treatments for prostate cancer. These worked well for more than ten years. At that point, however, I needed to consider other treatments. These involved hormone medication followed by twenty sessions of radiotherapy.

"I did lots of research about the treatment, the logistics and the side effects. I then focused on the benefits of the treatment. It would prolong my life and give me the chance to continue helping people.

"Looking ahead, I focused on all the practical aspects. These included driving to the sessions and drinking enough water to fill my bladder. I would then lie on the table and the radiotherapy be administered for ten minutes.

"I also positively reframed the sessions. It would be my equivalent of going the gym. The end result would be that I would be healthier.

"On the practical side, I walked more than ten thousand steps a day and ate good food. Plus I bought myself a two litre drinking bottle to ensure I drank at least that amount of liquid each day.

"I then followed the programme. I got into the habit of doing this without thinking. Whilst there were some ups and downs, the results were fine. I have now continued some the habits I began when doing the treatment."

You will have your own approach to making a plan. As mentioned earlier, it can also be helpful to get some early successes on the way towards goal. This can then lead to the next stage.

You can achieve your goal and then keep following a positive programme

A person may put themselves on a positive programme in order to deal with a difficult challenge. This could be in their personal or professional life.

They may be aiming to stay sober, recover from an illness, build better relationships or achieve another goal. They may be aiming to find satisfying work, turnaround a company or achieve their version of peak performance.

Different people act in different ways after achieving their goal. Depending on the circumstances, a person may choose either:

To maintain some of the good habits they followed when pursuing the positive programme;

To build on some of the good habits, set new goals and aim to follow a new positive programme;

To revert to some of their previous unhelpful habit and maybe even follow a negative programme.

Imagine that you reach your goal and want to keep following some of the good habits. This could involve doing what you can to stay healthy, be creative or keep developing.

Alternatively, you may want to create a new kind of positive programme and tackle a different kind of challenge. How can you apply what you have learned and follow good habits to reach your goal?

There are many ways to continue to develop. One approach is to set a goal and then follow a positive programme. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

The Enjoyable Approach Rather Than The Exploited Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to follow the enjoyable approach. They are wary of being exploited by forces that may want to take away people's joy.

Such individuals aim to encourage others to enjoy life. They also recognise that some people and institutions may try to control them, fill their heads with worry or make them feel powerless.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. Let's explore how they may aim do this in their lives or work.

The Enjoyable Approach

Some people may have been encouraged to follow this approach early in their lives. They may have had parents, teachers or other key people who gave them the following messages.

"You can aim to do things you enjoy and encourage other people to do what they enjoy. It is important to do this in ways that help people rather than hurt people.

"You can follow this approach when learning. You can focus on the topics you find interesting and that give you positive energy. You can keep exploring these and add to your knowledge.

"You can, when appropriate, translate these into doing specific projects. You can set specific goals, apply yourself and do good work. You can then do your best to achieve positive results."

Some people follow the enjoyable approach in their working lives. They also develop the savvy to get paid for doing what they love. They build on their strengths and do superb work that helps other people to achieve success.

Such individuals may also believe in the ethic of excellence. They may study what works and do things that are effective. They may then aim to keep developing and do their best to deliver excellence.

They may meet challenges on the journey. Providing they are doing what they believe in, however, they often develop the expertise to find solutions to challenges.

People who follow the enjoyable approach may experience both pluses and minuses on the route. These can include the following.

The Potential Pluses

They are doing what they enjoy. They get positive energy and feel alive and alert. They often have a positive attitude. They may spread this and encourage other people. They can feel enriched and appreciate life.

They build on their strengths and do satisfying work. They can develop the savvy to earn money doing what they love. They develop the inner strength to manage challenges. They may experience a sense of peace.

The Potential Minuses

They may need support to deal with systems – such as schools and work places - that treat people like numbers. They may need help to find ways to make a living doing work they love. They may not always gain riches.

The Exploited Approach

Some people may encounter individuals, institutions and forces in society that aim to exploit people. The exploited approach can take many forms.

Some schools, for example, do not encourage young people to build on their strengths. They instead train them to be economic units and compete against each other in league tables.

Some people move into jobs that are boring. Many do this out of necessity to get the basic materials for life. Some may stay in such jobs. Some may find a way to do more rewarding work and enjoy a good quality of life.

Some individuals aim to get jobs that pay the highest salary rather than the chance to do satisfying work. Sometimes this is out of necessity. Sometimes it is a conscious choice that also involves aiming to climb the corporate ladder.

Some do get promotions and do satisfying work. They may reach a point, however, where they feel stale. Whilst they may seem to be successful, they may reach an impasse. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I have what could be called a First World problem. Even though I am well paid I no longer look forward to going to work. This is affecting my health and has spilled over into my family life.

"I would like to leave but am locked in by my share options. These can be paid out in three years. I am not looking for sympathy, because in many ways I am fortunate. But I often feel numb inside."

Some people may be exploited in another way. They may be addicted to the philosophy of 'no pain, no gain'. Sometimes this takes the form of a Faustian pact.

They may work long hours in a well-paid soul-destroying job in a toxic culture. They hope that one day they will be rich enough to retire and regain their soul.

An intimidating leader may exploit people by having a business model that aims to micromanage, criticise and humiliate them. They may control people but ultimately may trap themselves by shrivelling their soul.

Some people may allow authoritarian leaders to exploit them. They may listen to toxic messages given by such leaders who aim to poison people's lives.

Some individuals may get to a point, however, where they recognise the old rule that 'what we focus on we become'. They may then aim to do what they enjoy and help other people to live enjoyable lives. They refuse to allow others to exploit them.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the enjoyable approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Creative Fix Approach

Some people love to get a creative high. Some people aim to do this early in the day. They then get a sense of satisfaction and feel more in charge of their day.

Different people follow this approach in different way. Some choose to do something where they go through the following stages.

Flow

They explore many ideas. They may increase the chances of doing this by going for a walk, listening to music or doing other things that set their creative juices going.

Focus

They focus on something they want to do. They may aim to help a person, write an article, paint a picture, do a project, tackle a challenge or do another activity.

Fulfilment

They pursue their chosen topic. They do fine work, finish and, as a by-product, enjoy a sense of fulfilment. They may also get a creative high that gives them a fix.

Some individuals aim to follow this process every day. One writer expressed this in the following way.

"I aim to get this feeling early in the day. Sometimes I begin working before breakfast. I get a kick out of mapping out the day's writing and creating a framework that I want to pass on to people.

"Sometimes this leads to a feeling of deep satisfaction and creates a platform that I can build on. Getting this creative fix gives me energy and provides a great start to the day."

Looking at your own life, when do you get a creative fix? You may do this when writing, dancing, gardening, cooking, fixing certain problems, leading a group of people or doing another activity.

Some individuals may do this when preparing to do a piece of work. They may relax, play music, go for a walk or do another activity. They follow a conscious or unconscious process that leads them to having a 'Aha' moment. They then build on this to do creative work during the day.

Some individuals may do this when actually doing the work. They build on their strengths, follow certain strategies and shape the material they are using. They may then create something that helps them to make a breakthrough and achieve success.

The creative act sometimes remains a mystery. But it is possible to explore some of the steps you can take to increase the likelihood of being creative. You can clarify, for example:

The specific times of the day when you have most creative energy – such as the prime times when you feel creative or able to absorb yourself in an activity;

The specific activities that lead to feeling stimulated or creative – such as being in your favourite work place, listening to music, creating models that make sense of experience, going for a walk or doing other things;

The specific ways you can increase the chances of you being able to be creative – such as setting aside a block of time when you can flow, focus and finish.

Looking ahead, what are the specific things you can do to increase the likelihood of getting a creative fix? How can you do more of these things in the future? Nothing is guaranteed, of course, but sometimes taking these steps can produce results.

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to live in a positive universe rather than a negative universe. They are often positive realists. They have a positive attitude but are also good at reading reality.

Such people believe that 'what you focus on you become'. Bearing this in mind, they often take the following steps.

They Focus On Positive Things

People who take this approach focus on the positive things in life. Whilst they do see negative things, they quickly switch their attention. They then focus on positive things or aim to find positive solutions.

Some people take this approach relatively early in life. Some take it at a certain point in their lives. Such people choose to be selective and focus on what they can control in situations.

Different people take this approach in different ways. Whatever route they take, however, many focus on the following principles.

They have a sense of gratitude ... They count their blessings ... They do things that give them positive energy ... They love to encourage people ... They like to create positive experiences for people.

They focus on success ... They see when people come alive ... They build on people's strengths ... They focus on the principles people follow to achieve success ... They aim to shape a positive future.

Imagine that you are following some of these principles in your own way. If appropriate, you may wish to explore the next step taken by people who take this approach

They Focus On Positive Goals

Such people often focus on positive goals. They do this in their own life and, when appropriate, with other people. They then clarify the key strategies they can follow to achieve the desired aims.

Different people do this in different ways. Some ask themselves the following questions when focusing on different situations in their lives and work.

What do I want to do in my life? What are the principles I want to follow? How can I translate these into action in my daily life and work? How can I work towards my life goals?

How can I encourage people? How can I help them to feel at ease and, if they wish, to explore their aims? When appropriate, how can I help them to achieve their personal or professional goals?

How can I continue to have a sense of purpose? How can I keep following my principles? How can I do my best to encourage people during my time on the planet?

Imagine that you are following some of these principles in your own way. If appropriate, you may wish to explore the next step taken by people who take this approach

They Focus On Positive Solutions

Such people focus on finding positive solutions to challenges. They are good at seeing both successful and unsuccessful patterns in life. They also anticipate what will happen if these patterns continue.

They then like to channel their energy into finding solutions. Some people develop this approach early in life. They may have had parents, teachers or other people who modelled this approach.

Some people choose to take this approach later in life. They prefer to switch their energy to finding solutions rather than dwelling on problems. They also enjoy adding to their strategies for achieving success.

Some ask the following questions when exploring possible solutions. They adapt these questions when tackling challenges an individual or, for example, when finding solutions in a team or an organisation.

What is happening in the situation? What are the successful and unsuccessful patterns? What may happen if the unsuccessful patterns continue?

What do I want to do about the situation? Do I want to focus on exploring possible solutions? What are things that I or we can control in the situation? How is it possible to build on these things and manage the other issues?

What are the real results that I or we want to achieve in the situation? What is the picture of success? What will be the benefits – to all the various stakeholders - of achieving these goals?

What are the possible options – the ways forward - in the situation? What are the consequences – the pluses and minuses - of each option? On a scale 0-10, what is the attractiveness of each option?

What are the other potential creative solutions? What do we know works in these kinds of situations? How it is possible to build on what works? What are the other possible ways forward?

Let's return to the real results to achieve. What are the key strategies that I or we can follow to increase the chances of success? How can these be translated into action? What can be done to get some early successes?

There are many ways to live life. Some people choose to live in a positive universe rather than a negative universe. Such people aim to do things that encourage themselves and other people during their time on the planet.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of any ways you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Flow Approach Rather Than The Fight Or Flight Approach

There are many ways to behave in challenging situations. One theory is that a person may go into fight or flight mode. This theory has become part of common parlance over the years.

There is another approach. Some people choose to flow in the challenging situation. They then focus and do their best to find fulfilment. Let's explore this approach.

Flow

Different people take this approach in different situations. They may be playing a sport, doing creative work, giving a speech, tackling a challenge or doing another activity.

Such people often make a conscious decision to take this approach. One person expressed this in the following way.

"My first step is to acknowledge my feeling about a situation. I may feel excited, concerned or have another feeling. It is important for me to recognise the reality of what I feel.

"My next step is to choose to channel the feeling by aiming to flow in the situation. I make friends with the feeling. Paradoxically, this has the effect of almost removing myself and looking down on the situation from above.

"The next step is to follow my own technique for being able to flow in the situation. This sometimes involves being able to relax, rehearse what I am going to do and then follow my chosen rhythm."

Some people aim to flow in extremely challenging situations. One person did this when embarking on a programme of medical treatment. They chose:

To do things that gave them positive energy;

To encourage themselves each day;

To focus on the goal of prolonging their life.

The person knew what they wanted to do in their life – both in the present and in the possible future. They saw the treatment as a chance to do some of these things now rather than put them off to the future.

Focus

People like to have a sense of purpose. Many also recognise the old rule that 'what you focus on you become'. Bearing in mind what they can control in a situation, some people take the following steps.

They focus on a positive goal. They may aim to encourage other people, perform superb work or do their best to achieve a compelling picture of success.

They focus on the benefits of achieving the goal. This can help them to stay motivated, even in the darkest hours. Focusing on the benefits – both for themselves and other people – can provide extra strength on the journey.

They clarify their action plan for achieving the goal. One approach is to clarify the key strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success. They then translate this into a clear action plan.

Fulfilment

Such people then click into action and do their best to achieve their goals. This can lead to them – and sometimes also other people – having a sense of fulfilment. Some people do this by taking the following steps.

They aim to do fine work. They build on their strengths, follow strategies that work and focus on continuous improvement. They then aim to achieve the picture of success.

They aim to finish properly. Some do this by finding and following their successful pattern for finishing. They then aim to flow, focus and do their best to finish successfully.

They may, as a by-product, sometimes find fulfilment. Achieving their goals, they have a deep sense of satisfaction. They may also do work that enables other people to experience fulfilment.

There are many ways to behave in challenging situations. One approach is to flow rather than go into fight or flight mode. Sometimes, of course, you may have to channel your fighting spirit to flow successfully.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may aim to flow, focus and do your best to find fulfilment? How can you follow this approach in your own way?

The Upbeat And Downbeat Approaches

There are many ways to live life. This section looks at how people can sometimes choose to be upbeat rather than downbeat. One person in their seventies expressed this in the following way.

"I seem to get more upbeat as I get older. Maybe I am just following the curve that shows that some people get happier from around fifty-five onwards.

"Perhaps it is because I appreciate life and focus on what I can control. I also see ways that, if people want to, they can solve some of the challenges in the world."

The world is full of ideas about how people can live fulfilling lives. Many of these return to the principles of being grateful, generous and making a good contribution.

We will explore some of these later – particularly those described in the Harvard University course on being happy. The key, however, is to translate these principles into action.

There are also many views about how people can develop their personalities. These often reflect the perennial arguments about nature and nurture.

One view is that an individual is born with a certain kind of personality. They can learn to channel their personality – rather than change their personality – but it plays a key part in shaping their moods.

A second view is that individuals who are given support are more likely to thrive. They may also learn key life skills from their parents, teachers and significant people in their lives.

A third view is that individuals can choose their attitude in certain situations. They can also become lifelong learners and develop their ability to shape their futures.

There are, of course, many other views. Bearing these in mind, people can sometimes choose to be upbeat rather than downbeat. Here are some definitions for these terms.

Upbeat – to focus on hope and happiness;

Downbeat – to focus on the lack of hope and happiness.

Some individuals who take the upbeat approach are often positive realists. They aim:

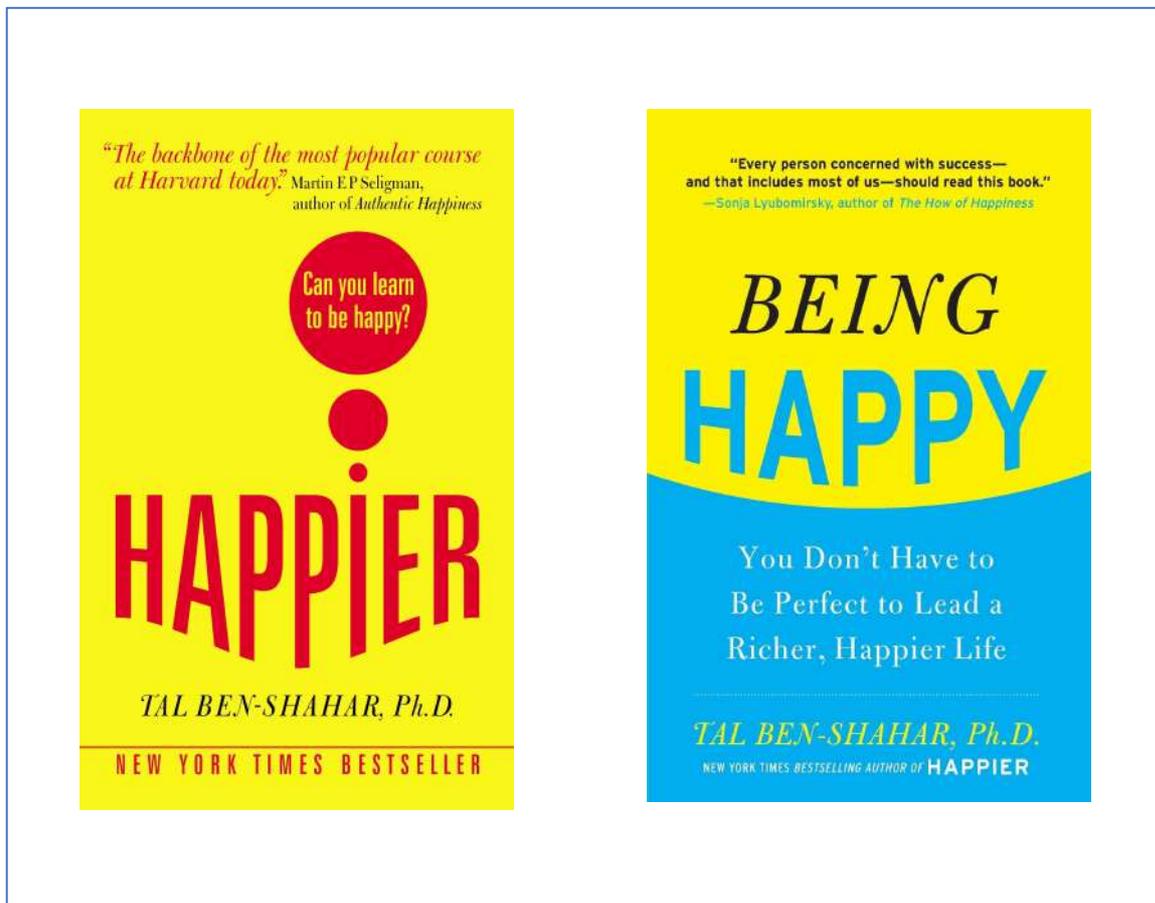

To have a positive attitude but also be good at reading reality;

To be a positive model and encourage other people;

To focus on the positive things in life and find possible solutions to challenges.

As mentioned earlier, there are many views on how people can increase the likelihood of being upbeat and happy. Tal Ben-Shahar described some of these in the programme he ran at Harvard University.

Here is an introduction to this approach. This is taken from both Tal's and the Harvard websites plus his books on happiness.

Harvard's most popular course was a class on how to be happier

Tal Ben-Shahar loves teaching and his Harvard University course on How To Be Happy attracted over 800 students.

Why teach such a course? Tal recalled his own days as a student. Even though he was an outstanding achiever, something was missing. So later he created the kind of course he was looking for as a student. This aimed:

To provide an introduction to the research in the field of happiness;

To provide practical ways the students can apply these ideas in their lives and communities.

The course was based on research from positive psychology. This is the study of humanity at its best and the conditions that enable people to flourish.

So how can people be happier? Tal says some of the messages can sound corny but the secret is in actually translating these into action.

It is for people to do these things rather than just think about doing them. Here are some of the messages.

Accept painful emotions

These are part of being alive. The only people who don't feel pain are psychopaths and those who are dead.

Spend time with people you care about

This quality time is enjoyable and also gives us energy to do other things.

Enjoy time affluence

Appreciate life and the specific thing you are doing. Enjoy the moments, rather than try to do several things at once.

Simplify your life

This makes it easier to appreciate life. At the moment we are trying to cram more and more into our days.

Exercise

This is equivalent to some of the most powerful drugs that deal with depression or anxiety.

Breathe

Learning to breathe deeply and properly can improve our sense of well-being.

Cultivate gratitude

Research shows that people who keep a Gratitude Journal are more positive. This involves spending a few minutes each night writing down five things for which they are grateful. Such a simple exercise increases their optimism and even their health.

Let's return to your own life and work. Imagine that you want to follow some elements of the upbeat approach. How can you do this in your own way? What may be the benefits of taking these steps?

The Enthusiastic Approach

There are many ways to live life. One approach is for people to focus on the things they feel enthusiastic about.

Enthusiasm is a key driver in life. Here are some of the many quotes about this topic.

"The secret of genius is to carry the spirit of the child into old age, which means never losing your enthusiasm." Aldous Huxley

"Watch how your enthusiasm can light up another's fire. This is how we wake up the world." Amy Ippoliti.

"Enthusiasm is one of the most powerful engines of success. When you do a thing do it with all your might. Be active, be energetic, be enthusiastic and faithful, and you will accomplish your objective." Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Different people have different things they feel enthusiastic about. One approach is to focus on the things that give them positive energy, things in their personal life and things in their professional life. Let's explore these themes.

Positive Energy

What are the things that you feel enthusiastic about that give you positive energy? Here are some answers that people may give to this question.

The things I feel enthusiastic about that give me positive energy are:

Encouraging people ... Solving certain kinds of problems ... Making things work ... Rock Climbing ... Doing stimulating work ... Studying success ... Sharing knowledge.

This is a theme that is sometimes followed by educators, therapists and others who work with people. When appropriate, they invite a person:

To describe the things they feel enthusiastic about that give them positive energy;

To do more of these things in their daily life and work;

To focus on the benefits of doing these things.

People who do such things are more likely to feel alive. They may also get into the habit of feeling stronger, setting goals and achieving success.

Imagine that you have explored following some of these ideas in your own life. If appropriate, you may then move on to the next theme.

Personal Life

What are the things that you feel enthusiastic about in your personal life? Different people give different answers when exploring this theme. Here are some things they may say.

The things I feel enthusiastic about in my personal life are:

Being with my children ... Encouraging my partner ... Caring for my parents ... Living where we are ... Walking with my dogs ... Doing yoga ... Cooking ... Playing five a side football ... Singing in the choir.

Let's assume that you have explored some of these things. If appropriate, you may then move on to the next theme.

Professional Life

People love to keep developing in their professional lives. Some see this in terms of moving up the ladder and sitting in the C-Suite. Some focus on continuing to do stimulating work and making a different kind of career contribution.

Imagine that you want to encourage a person to consider this approach. This involves inviting them to explore the following questions.

What are the kinds of work you feel enthusiastic about doing? How can you find or create opportunities to do such work? What will be the benefits – to yourself, to your customers or to your employers - of doing such work?

This approach encourages a person to continue doing work they find stimulating. It also involves helping them: a) to find or create such opportunities; b) to show the benefits; c) to do the work and deliver success.

People who feel enthusiastic about their work are more likely to encourage both themselves and other people. This can bring benefits for all the stakeholders.

Let's return to your own situation. What are the things you feel enthusiastic about in your life and work? How can you continue doing these things? What will be the benefits? If you wish, try tackling the tackling the exercise on this theme.

The Joyful, Judgemental And Being A Good Judge In Certain Situations Approaches

*People Can Choose To Follow
One Or More Of These Approaches*

-  The Joyful Approach
-  The Judgemental Approach
-  The Being A Good Judge In Certain Situations Approach

Different people choose to follow different approaches to life. The route they follow can have consequences – both for themselves and other people.

Some people follow the joyful approach. They may aim to do things that give joy to themselves and other people.

Some people follow the judgemental approach. They may be judgemental towards other people. Some may be judgemental towards themselves.

Some people follow the joyful approach but are also good judges of situations. They focus on how to help themselves and others to thrive.

Different people follow these approaches in different ways. Let's explore these themes.

The Joyful Approach

People love to experience a sense of joy. They often find this comes as an outcome of doing certain things, however, rather than making joy an end in itself. Different people achieve this feeling in different ways.

Looking at your own life, what are the things you do that may lead to feeling joyful? Here are some answers that people have given to this question.

The specific things I do that may lead to a sense of joy are:

*Giving to other people ... Counting my blessings ... Listening to music ...
Singing in a choir ... Nurturing my garden ... Cooking for other people ...
Being with our children ... Caring for animals.*

Doing stimulating projects at work ... Making wood sculptures ... Coaching athletes ... Being a trusted advisor to my clients ... Helping people to solve problems ... Giving myself time to appreciate life.

Many people enjoy helping others to experience joy. They may do this as a parent, partner, friend, educator, chef, artist, performer, medic or in another role.

*Some people focus on doing work they enjoy that brings joy to others.
Some do it in the obvious roles when caring for people. Some do it in less obvious roles. Let's look at one example.*

Richard Sheridan leads Menlo Innovations, a software company in Ann Arbor, Michigan. The company aims to build an intentionally joyful culture. Richard has published several books about the work they do. Below are excerpts from the organisation's website.

Our Way

It's all about JOY

At Menlo, we do more than design and build great software. Not that great software is a small thing. It's rare. But we aim for something higher. Our processes, our culture, our work ethic—they all aim toward a single goal: joy.

So what does JOY look like at Menlo?

Joy is what happens when people use our software with ease, even excitement. It's what happens when we exceed our project sponsors' expectations. It's what happens when our teamwork brings out the best in each other and in what we create.

Our Mission

Being intentional about restoring JOY to technology. Since 2001, Menlo has pursued returning joy to technology. Our mission is to end human suffering in the world as it relates to technology.

Who are we serving? We've learned that our stakeholders fall into one of three groups: end users of technology, project sponsors, and project teams.

What will delight them? We champion the importance of quality through every part of our process. It takes a high-functioning team using the right tools. Paired programming, open-space collaboration, frequent client feedback, short iterative work cycles - in the end, they're all about quality.

Some people believe it is important to spread joy. Some take another route. Let's explore this approach.

The Judgemental Approach

Many people have strong views on how to live life. Some express these in a judgemental way. They believe their approach is the only way to live and are intolerant of people who are different.

Such people sometimes see themselves as superior to others. They may criticise, attack or aim to suppress those who think or behave differently. Some get a kick out of trying to make others feel small or afraid.

Some people have a different approach to being judgemental. They are judgemental towards themselves. Maybe because of their upbringing, they may have negative scripts. They keep criticising themselves or feel that whatever they do will never be good enough.

Such people may link their own self-esteem to how other people judge them. They may seek constant affirmation or aim to get accolades. Such responses may work for a while. But they then embark on another round of aiming to be judged as worthwhile in other people's eyes.

The Being A Good Judge In Certain Situations Approach

Some people follow the joyful approach but are also good judges in certain situations. They are often savvy. They have lots of life experience and take the following steps:

They continue to do things that help themselves and other people to experience joy;

They have the ability to read situations, recognise patterns and see the potential consequences;

They are good at making decisions that will enable themselves and other people to thrive.

Such people are good at reading reality. They may also have built a repertoire of tools they can apply in both personal and professional situations. They then aim to apply this knowledge to get the desired positive results.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a specific activity where you may want to follow elements of the joyful or being a good judge in certain situations approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Being Serious But Not Taking Yourself Too Seriously Approach

There are many ways to live life. Some people aim to be serious about the work they do. At the same time, however, they do not take themselves too seriously.

Some people have even put a number to this approach. They may call it Rule 6 or Rule 66. The philosophy is the same, however, which is:

Do your best in life but also see things in perspective.

Don't take yourself too seriously.

Sages sometimes take this approach. They start by immersing themselves fully in their chosen route. They may do this when following a spiritual practice, pursuing a vocation or doing a piece of work.

Such people aim to do their best. They take their work seriously, for example, but they do this in a positive way. They are grateful for the abilities they have been given and aim to use these in their work.

Sages have a sense of perspective, however, and see the big picture. They see the work they do as important but do not see themselves as important. They recognise that they are small in the great sweep of history.

Some people go another route. They believe in their own importance and take themselves extremely seriously. They focus on what they call their personal brand and want to promote themselves.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you want to do serious work but in a positive way? How can you do such work? What will be the benefits?

Bearing this in mind, however, how can you see things in perspective? When appropriate, how can you not take yourself too seriously? What may be the benefits of taking this approach?

The Positive Self Approach Rather Than The Negative Self Approach

Imagine that a person is feeling down and has asked for your help. One approach is to encourage them to be their positive self.

Many individuals know how to be their positive self. They know it is important to plan ahead, take care of their health, do things they enjoy, spend time with encouraging people and do satisfying work. They know the rewards of developing such healthy habits.

Many individuals also know how to be their negative self. They know how to let things drift, feel sorry for themselves and hope things will change. They know the consequences of developing such unhealthy habits.

Imagine that you want to explore this approach in your own life before helping another person. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

My Positive Self And Negative Self

Let's return to helping a person who is feeling down. One approach is to encourage them: a) to be their positive self; b) to express their positive self; c) to, if appropriate, making a living being their positive self. Let's explore these themes.

Being Their Positive Self

A person can choose to be their positive self rather than their negative self. They can do the things that are more likely to help themselves to be happy. Some people may object to this approach. They may say:

"This sounds too simple. You don't always have a choice in these matters."

People do not always choose what happens to them. But they can choose their attitude to how they respond to such events. They can do things to put themselves into positive rather than negative circles.

If appropriate, you can invite a person to describe: a) the specific things they can do to be their positive self; b) the specific rewards of doing these things. They can then aim:

To translate their ideas into action ... To get some quick successes ... To maintain the habit of doing these things.

Imagine that the person has begun to explore these ideas. If appropriate, you can help them to move on to the next stage.

Expressing Their Positive Self

There are many ways a person can express their positive self. They may do things they find stimulating or where they can use their strengths. Different people do this in different ways. They may express their positive self through:

Writing ... Drawing ... Dancing ... Exercising ... Cooking ... Singing ... Playing music ... Playing a sport ... Pursuing a craft ... Helping people ... Fixing certain problems ... Or other activities.

The keys are for them to feel alive, express themselves and, if appropriate, to get a feeling of success. This can help to generate positive energy and feeling good.

They may also get a feeling of affirmation. They may get this by simply being true to themselves. They may sometimes get it from other people appreciating what they have done. This can build their self-confidence.

Imagine that the person has done some of these things. If appropriate, you can help them to move on to the next stage.

Making A Living Being Their Positive Self

Some people make a living by being their positive self. They may do this by building on their strengths, doing satisfying work and delivering success.

They may do it by helping people, doing certain projects, fixing problems or doing other activities. They may do it by working as an individual, team member, leader or in another role.

This book describes many ways to take path. One approach is for a person to follow their passion, translate this into doing professional work and delivering positive results. It is also developing the ability to get paid for following their passion.

Imagine that you are helping a person to take this path. Bearing this in mind, it can be worth exploring the following questions.

What does the person enjoy doing? What do they care about? What are their passions? What are their strengths? What are the specific things they can deliver for other people?

Who may be the kinds of people they may be able to help – such as their perfect customers or employers? What are the challenges these people may face? What may be their goals?

How can the person use their strengths to help these people to achieve success? How can they get paid for doing some of these activities? How can they eventually make a living doing satisfying work?

Imagine that you have helped a person to take some of these steps. When appropriate, it may also be useful to explore the following topic.

Building On The Positive Self And Managing The Negative Self

A person can build on their positive self but life can also bring challenges. Bearing this in mind, they may say:

"How do you manage negative emotions? Do you just ignore them?"

They may find it useful to recognise the warning signs. These may include feeling out of control, having negative self-talk, suffering recurring illnesses, experiencing long periods of lethargy or other symptoms.

Some people become numb to the warning signs or sink into negative cycles. Some people learn how to manage these triggers, however, and do something to put themselves into positive rather than negative cycles.

One approach is to return to building on their positive self. It is to plan ahead, do something positive and get a success. It is then to keep following these habits to maintain the positive cycle.

Imagine that you want to follow elements of the positive self approach. You may want to do this when helping a person or in your own life. How can you do this in your own way?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Making The Most Of Life Whilst Managing Multiple Challenges Approach

Many people want to make the most of life. There may be times, however, when they need to manage multiple challenges. These challenges can take many forms.

A person may be going along happily in life but then face difficulties. They may lose their job, have an illness, fall into debt or experience other setbacks. They may also be affected by events happening to people that they love.

Some people are able to continue with much of their life when experiencing one difficult issue. There may be times, however, when they face multiple challenges. These can be overwhelming and have a profound effect on a person.

Different people manage such situations in different ways. One approach is to try to make the most of their lives whilst also managing each of the challenges. Let's explore this approach.

Managing Each Challenge

Many individuals would prefer to get on with their normal life but they often choose to tackle the challenges. They want to regain the feeling of being in control.

A person may aim to do this is by finding solutions to each of the challenges. They feel that, once they have managed the challenges, they will be able to return to pursuing their normal life.

Different people will obviously face different issues. They may aim to regain their health, find a new job, help a loved one or aim to tackle another challenge.

Some people take the following approach to managing the issues. Bearing in mind the things they can control in the situation, they go through the following steps.

They focus on the first challenge they want to tackle and clarify the real results they want to achieve.

They clarify the strategies they can follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success and translate these into a clear action plan.

They follow their chosen strategies, get an early success and then do their best to achieve the desired results.

A person may immerse themselves in tackling one challenge at a time. One person explained this in the following way.

"Several years ago I needed to deal with several challenges. These included attending hospital visits with my partner, helping my son to manage his dyslexia at school and also trying to find a more satisfying job for myself.

"This meant organising things properly so that I could devote myself to tackling each challenge. Sometimes the issues overlapped but I tried to immerse myself the specific issues..

"I did my best to tackle each one challenge. When there was no more I could do, I aimed to box off that challenge. I then moved on to the next challenge. Sometimes this proved difficult, but I found it to be the best strategy in the circumstances."

Some individuals have the ability to move from challenge to challenge. This can be rewarding and can help to solve some of the challenges.

There may come a point, however, where a person needs to return to their centre to rest and refresh themselves. They may do this by simply taking time out before then moving back into tackling each of the challenges.

There is another model for regaining energy, however, so let's explore this approach.

Making The Most Of Life

Some people gain strength by making the most of life. They devote time to doing things that give them positive energy. They may choose, for example:

To focus on what they believe is important in life ... To count their blessings ... To spend time with people who encourage them ... To eat nourishing food ... To play their favourite music.

To take care of their health ... To exercise ... To walk with their dog ... To give themselves treats ... To do creative projects ... To reflect on the positive things they have done that day.

Such individuals are then more able to define themselves by the things that give both themselves and other people joy. They do not define themselves by their challenges.

Different people take these steps in different ways. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Some time ago I was faced by a number of challenges. These included caring for people I loved plus tackling problems in my own life.

"At first I gave everything to dealing with these issues. At a certain point, however, I began spending time doing gardening and other activities that I found healing.

"At first I felt guilty about doing these things. But then I realised they gave me strength to deal with the various challenges. They also helped to me to continue to enjoy life and give to other people."

Let's return to your own life. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? What may be the multiple challenges you may need to tackle?

You may need to recover from an illness, live on less money, care for a loved one or help somebody who is facing difficulties. You may want to change your job, manage a micromanaging boss, deal with a conflict or tackle another issue.

How can you continue to make the most of life? How can you do your best to manage each of the challenges? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Positive Energy Approach To Making Decisions

There are many models for making decisions. Some invite a person to buy time and be cerebral. Others invite them to be more feeling and use their intuition.

Some models invite a person to stay calm and clarify their goals. The person then aims to consider their options, the consequences of each route and any potential creative solutions. They are then more likely to make a considered and calculated decision.

Some models invite a person to use their strategic intuition. Drawing on their experience and previous successful strategies, they rehearse following these – plus adding other skills – to tackle the present challenge. They then pursue the strategy that they believe has the greatest chance of success.

This section explores how you can use the positive energy approach when making decisions. The example relates to career choice, but you can apply this approach to any type of decision in your personal or professional life.

You can clarify the possible options for going forwards

Imagine that you are focusing on the next step you want to take in your career. Looking ahead, describe the potential routes you can follow in the future. Take time to reflect and describe all the possibilities.

Option A Is:

* To ...

Option B Is:

* To ...

Option C Is:

* To ...

Every person is different so will have different options. Imagine a scenario, however, where you may be able:

- a) to stay in your present operational role;*
- b) to work towards getting promotion – maybe to a role with more pay and responsibilities;*
- c) to lead a new part of your organisation;*
- d) to follow one of your previous bosses to another company;*
- e) to go freelance and do consultant work.*

d) to do something else – such as change career, study or do other things.

It is important to brainstorm all the possibilities. Do not worry about how to make any of these happen. Just get all the options out into the open.

The same rule applies to any situation in your personal or professional life. Dare to outline all the possibilities. The next stage will be to look at the implications.

You can clarify the pluses and minuses of each option and the positive energy rating of each option on a scale 0-10

Imagine that you have outlined the various options. You can then aim to do two things.

First, to describe what you see as the pluses of each option. Second, to rate the extent to which each option gives you positive energy – even when you think about it. Do this on a scale 0-10.

Option A Is:

* To ...

The Potential Pluses Are:

*

The Potential Minuses Are:

*

The Positive Energy Rating Is:

_____ / 10

Option B Is:

* To ...

The Potential Pluses Are:

The Potential Minuses Are:

*

The Positive Energy Rating Is:

_____ / 10

Option C Is:

* To ...

The Potential Pluses Are:

The Potential Minuses Are:

- *
- *

The Positive Energy Rating Is:

_____ / 10

Different people list different pluses and minuses under each of the options. Much will also depend on the stage they are at in their life and work.

One leader I worked with in a large company, for example, was fed-up with reporting to the head office in another country and being micromanaged. Whilst the pay was good, there were negative side-effects. Their positive energy rating for continuing in their present role was 6/10.

They had the opportunity to take the COO role in another company, but this would mean putting in masses of hours to build credibility. They were also at a stage of life where they had other priorities. Bearing this in mind, the positive energy rating for this option was 6/10.

The option that appealed most was heading a new venture in their present company. The pluses included the following. They would be able shape something, build a team and use the company's resources to do pacesetting work in a new field.

The potential minuses included the following. They would step down from the C-suite, miss out on getting extra shares and may be seen to lose some of their status.

Looking at the pluses and minuses, the leader still felt excited about the challenge that would give them a new lease of life. The positive energy rating was 8/10.

They decided to take this route. Despite the apparent loss of status, they reported that several of their colleagues felt admiration and respect for them pursuing this option.

Imagine that you have given a positive energy rating for each of your options. It will then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can clarify the option – or the combination of options – you want to pursue

There are several things to consider when choosing the route to follow. One of the key factors to bear in mind is that we are feeling beings. This should not need saying, but it is important to recognise this factor when making decisions.

The positive energy approach is one that I have used many times with individuals who feel in a dilemma when making a decision. A person may say things like:

"I have done all the intellectual work regarding the pluses and minuses of each option. I still can't make up my mind, however, about the best way forwards."

On these occasions it is sometimes helpful to invite them to do a positive energy rating. There are several reasons for taking these approach.

First, to recognise that energy is life. It is important for people to do things that give them positive energy. They are then more likely to feel alive and creative. This can also have a positive effect on other people – such as their loved ones or family.

Second, to recognise that choices have consequences. Certainly a person can take a higher paid job or study for a degree that may one day lead to them being well paid. Making decisions based only on money, however, can have both pluses and minuses.

Third, to consider both positive energy and their longer-term big picture of success. Doing what gives them positive energy can lead to them feeling more alive. It can also increase the chances of serendipity and finding even more positive opportunities.

At the same time, they may also want to bear in mind their life goals. They may choose to pursue an option that will enable them to work towards their longer-term picture of success.

Whatever route a person chooses to take, they need to plan properly. If appropriate, they can aim:

To clarify their strategies and action plan for pursuing their chosen route;

To clarify how they can build on the pluses and minimise any potential minuses;

To clarify how they can get some quick wins, encourage themselves on the journey and do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of the positive energy approach? This could be when making a decision yourself or when helping somebody else to make a decision.

Looking at the specific situation, what may be your potential options going forwards? What may be the pluses and minuses of each option? What may be the positive energy rating for each option? How can you then use this information to make your decision?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Balancing The Cave And The Campfire Approach

Balancing The Cave And The Campfire

What is your preferred way of living and working? Are you an introvert, extrovert or a mixture of both?

Sometimes you may like to spend time in your cave to reflect. Sometimes you may want to spend time beside the campfire with certain people. Sometimes you may want to get the right combination of both. Let's explore these different modes.

Spending Time In The Cave

When do you like to spend time in your version of a cave? Sometimes in your professional life you may need to do solitary creative work without interruption. Perhaps when you are writing, problem solving or pondering a tough decision.

Sometimes in your personal life you may need individual time to do some slow thinking. Sometimes you may simply want to make sense of experience before moving forwards.

There are many different kinds of caves. Perhaps you have favourite physical spaces where you withdraw from the world. These may be a studio, a bed or even the corner of a coffee house.

Sometimes you may withdraw into your own psychological space. You may want to listen to music, go for a walk or find other ways to reflect. Taking this time can help to recentre and then refocus before going out into the world

Spending Time Around The Campfire

When do you like to spend time around your version of the campfire?
What do you get from being in these places?

Looking at your personal life, you may like to share ideas with a few kindred spirits. You may enjoy talking with them, getting stimulation and finding solutions together. How can you spend more time with these people?

Looking at your professional life, who are the specific people with whom you like to share the campfire? Who are the customers and colleagues with whom you enjoy working? Do you have any favourite places where you like to meet? How can you spend more time in these situations?

Balancing The Cave And The Campfire

What for you is the right balance between the cave and campfire? Do you need to spend more time alone? Or do you need to spend more time getting stimulation from the real world?

Everybody is different and it may be impossible to get the perfect combination. But it can be good to clarify how much time you want to spend in the different places.

Everybody is a mixture of introvert and extrovert. A person who is an introvert, for example, may like to spend time reflecting and composing their thoughts. Such a person may then switch into professional mode when going out into the world.

They may go into role as a medic, trusted advisor or as another kind of specialist. Going into role provides a chance to follow clear guidelines and enable other people to succeed.

Let's return to your own life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on these themes. This invites you to do the following things.

First, describe the various caves where you like to spend time. These include the places where you can rest, reflect, recentre, get stimulation or feel at peace.

Second, describe the various campfires where you like to spend time. These include the places where you get encouragement from other people or where you do stimulating work with people.

Third, describe the specific things you can do to keep getting the right balance between spending time in the caves and around the campfires.

Here is the exercise on these themes. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Clearing Your Mind Rather Than Cluttering Your Mind Approach

A person can sometimes do their best by preparing properly and then by:

Clearing Their Mind

Rather than:

Cluttering
Their Mind

What are the situations where you want to clear your mind? What are the rituals you go through to take these steps? What are some of the things that may happen as a result?

Different people do different things to clear their minds. Some do deep breathing, some go for a walk, some take a nap. Some have a bath or a shower. Some do routine chores to get them out of the way.

Some creative people do things that sound counter-intuitive. They may play music or do activities that others would see as cluttering their minds. Every person is different, however, and finds their own way to approach tasks with a clear mind.

One writer had an unusual approach. Having relatively few books in their house, they explained this in the following.

"The best way for me to remember what is in a book is to read it and then give it away. This forces me to write a short piece summarising the key points in the book.

"This helps me to keep my mind open when reading other books. Sometimes I need to buy the book again to revisit the key points but, by and large, I find that this approach works."

Looking at my own work, I do lots of research in the days leading up to a first session with a new person. It is vital to know about their strengths, their situation and the specific topics they may want to explore. The day before the session I rehearse the possible scenarios.

On the actual day I set aside half an hour to relax and again rehearse what may happen. Then, a few minutes before the session, I clear my mind and relax. Beginning the session, I aim to be fully present, help the person to feel at ease and clarify their aims.

Sometimes we cover topics that I have considered, other times the topics may be different. Whatever happens, I try to have a clear mind and pass on ideas the person can use to achieve their goals.

Reshaping The Future

A person who goes through tough times may reappraise their life. After a period of reflection, they may ask themselves certain questions. These can include the following.

"What can I learn from what happened? What do I think is important in life? How can I focus on these things in the future? How can I do what I believe in? How can I translate this into action? What may be the implications for myself and other people?"

Tough experiences can lead to epiphanies that help us to clarify the possible ways forward. Here are some of the approaches that a person may use to reshape their life.

The Clarifying The Script You Want To Follow In A Challenging Situation Approach

Clarifying My Script

The Key Messages I Want To Give Are:

- *

There are many ways to be resourceful. One approach is to clarify what you want to do and say in a potentially challenging situation.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you took this approach? You may have done this when:

You were ending a relationship;

You wanted to give somebody clear messages about how you would prefer them to behave in the future;

You needed to give a tough message to an employee;

You wanted to explain the decision you had made about your chosen way forwards.

Let's explore how some people have dealt with such situations.

Sometimes these involved the person wanting to get things off their chest. They then realised that the way they planned to do this could lead to difficulties.

Dave was going to leave his present employer for a new job. He planned to break the news by telling his manager he was disappointed that the organisation had not fulfilled certain promises.

This approach could come across as negative. We therefore explored how to manage the situation in a more positive way.

Dave wanted to leave on a good note. Bearing this in mind, he formulated the script he wanted to follow.

Looking ahead to meeting his manager, he aimed to give them the following messages. He would do this in a calm and clear way.

"I have learned a lot here and it has been a good couple of years.

"I have been offered an opportunity that plays to my strengths and I am planning to take it.

"I will do everything possible to make a good handover to whoever replaces me."

His employer was shocked at first, but Dave gave the messages in a professional way. Saying that he wanted to move to the role that played to his strengths, he did not go over old ground. This helped him to move on in a positive way.

Different people choose to give their chosen messages in different ways. Imagine, for example, that you want to give tough messages to an employee about the way they behave.

Some managers start by identifying where the team member is failing. They then aim to point these out to the person and urge them to change. Sometimes this can work, sometimes it fails.

Another approach is to explain the professional standards you want the person to follow in the future. It is to then invite them to decide if they want to behave in these ways.

Imagine you are going to have such a conversation with a person. You may want to give them the following messages.

"As you know, we have certain professional standards that people need to follow to deliver the agreed goals. These include the following things that we expect people to do:

"Looking ahead, I would like to decide if you want to follow these professional standards. This would involve you choosing to do the following things:

*

"I would like you to take time to reflect to decide if you want to follow these professional standards. If so, then I would also like you to let us know the specific things you want to do to translate these into action."

You may want the person to demonstrate a positive attitude, encourage their colleagues and manage their key stakeholders. It can be useful to give examples of how they can do this in the future.

How to give these messages? There are some Dos and Don'ts you may wish to follow.

Do keep referring to the required professional standards. Do give examples of how they can translate these into action in the future. Do show the benefits to them and to others of behaving in these ways.

Do focus on the future and don't get into arguments. Dirty fighters sometimes want to get you into the gutter and fight about details. Don't fall for it. Do keep saying it is up to them to decide if they want to follow the required professional standards.

Looking ahead, can you think of a challenging situation where you may want to give some key messages to a person or a group of people? You may have certain feelings that you want to express, but it will be important to consider the following things.

Clarify what you can and can't control

You can control your attitude and how you give the messages. You can't control the way people receive them or how they will react.

Clarify what you do and don't want to do

You may want to be calm, positive and professional. You may also want to achieve certain aims. You may not want to be a victim or come across as blaming others.

Clarify the key messages you want to give

Clarify how to position the conversation. Depending on the topic you want to discuss, you may say something like:

"I would like to talk with you about something when you have the time. It is about some of the possible ways forward. Can you let me know when it may be a good time to talk?"

The way you position the conversation will depend on the topic you want to cover. If possible, position it in a way so that the other party has the chance to prepare themselves for the conversation.

Write down the key messages you want to give to the person or group of people. Looking at these messages, you may want:

To change any negative ones into giving the other person or the group positive suggestions or alternatives;

To, if appropriate, focus on how you or the other party can behave in a positive way in the future.

You can clarify what you want to say and also rehearse the situation. Here are some things to bear in mind.

Giving Key Messages

You may want:

- To write down the key messages you want to give and rehearse giving these in a way that fits your personality;
- To anticipate how the other party may behave and the way that you will respond;
- To rehearse going back to the key messages that you want to give and not being knocked off-track.

Let's look at another situation where a person may want to clarify and give certain messages.

A medical consultant may be due to see a patient who has been through several courses of chemotherapy. The latest x-rays show that the illness is worsening.

How to break the news? The consultant will aim to show respect to the person but also explain the realities of the situation. Making the person feel welcome, they may then say something along the following lines.

"We have got the x-rays back and unfortunately it is not the news we were hoping for. There are, however, several ways forward. Each route has both pluses and minuses.

"What would you like me to do first? I can explain the x-rays or I can go through the possible ways forward. Which would you prefer?"

Sometimes it is hard to give tough news but people want to be treated like adults. They also want the opportunity to explore the ways forward and then make decisions.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to following elements of the clarifying your script approach?

What may be the specific situation? What may be the script you want to follow? How can you do this in your own way? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Freedom Approach

Many people aim to get a sense of freedom in their lives. They may aim to have economic, emotional or other kinds of freedom.

Some people make good use of their freedom. They fill their lives with doing projects that bring satisfaction to themselves and other people.

But some people encounter a dilemma. They may have been working so long to achieve this goal that they do not know what to do after achieving it. This can lead to a sense of frustration.

There are many models for making good use of freedom. Some people develop a sense of purpose, follow their principles and work towards a picture of success. Other people follow other approaches.

Some people choose to be passive but in a positive way. They take time out to reflect, recentre and see what happens. This can lead to a sense of stillness and appreciating life. Sometimes this create new impulses that they want to follow in the future.

Some people choose to be proactive and do things that give them positive energy. They do this in a smooth way rather than a strained way. They aim to enjoy the journey as well as reaching a particular goal.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may have a sense of freedom? How can you make good use of this gift?

One approach is to do things where you can flow, focus and find fulfilment. You also can encourage other people to follow these principles in their lives and work.

Different people follow these paths in different ways. Two people described the steps they took in the following ways.

Person A – The Freedom Of Being Myself Again

Several years ago I left an abusive relationship. I took my daughter, lived with my parents and began rebuilding my life.

Six months later I joined a fitness group, began running and learnt self-defence. This helped me to feel more at ease. Gaining confidence, I began to apply for jobs and eventually got one as a care assistant in a hospice.

I love my job and it teaches me a lot about life. I know it is a cliché, but the main lessons include the importance of being true to yourself. This is something I teach my daughter and also try to follow myself.

The work I do is fulfilling and I am studying to be a nurse. I feel able to breathe and enjoy life. This is something that I relearned in my late-twenties – which is better late than never.

Person B – What To Do With Freedom After Selling My Business?

Since I was a teenager my aim has to been to be financially independent. Maybe this is because of my background, because my parents constantly struggled for money.

Several years ago I fulfilled this dream by selling my marketing business to a big company. This was something I had worked towards for years and gave me a great deal of financial freedom.

Then I experienced something which probably happens with athletes after they have won a gold medal. I kept asking myself: 'What next?' I was looking for the next big thing.

Talking with other entrepreneurs who had sold their businesses, I found they had taken several routes.

Some had thrown themselves into pastimes – such as golf, sailing, climbing or other activities.

Some had done charity work or had become advisors in their field of expertise.

Some had pursued things that fascinated them and this led to discovering their next project.

Going the latter route, I went to the USA to study social enterprises that were using technology to build a better world. Whilst I got lots of ideas, I kept returning to the theme of helping people to do rewarding work.

This eventually led to me creating a strengths-based recruitment company. Whilst this is a crowded field, our business creates wins for both the employers and employees.

I enjoy leading the business but I am a builder - not a maintainer. Bearing this in mind, I am recruiting somebody to run the business. I will then pursue the next fulfilling project.

Let's consider another situation where some people make use of their freedom. This sounds paradoxical, but some follow this route when realising they have only a certain time to live.

We are told that near death experiences focus the mind. This can certainly be the case with some people who realise they have only so long to live. They choose to live this time by being true to themselves and, in some cases, doing their best to help other people.

Many people were inspired to take this route after hearing about the path followed by Zach Sobiech. Diagnosed with osteosarcoma at the age of 14, he vowed to live life fully and also help other people.

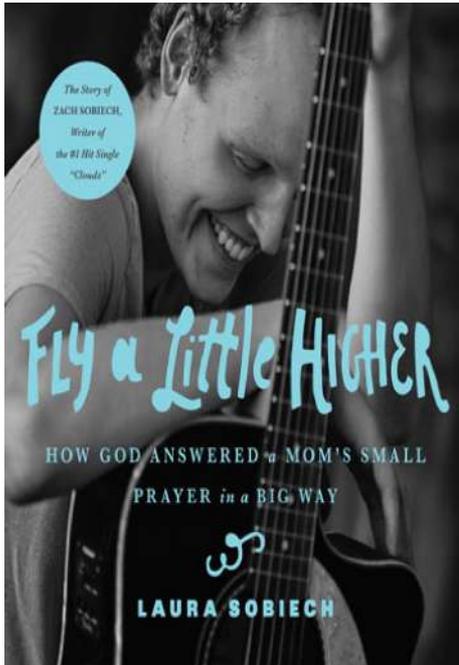

This led to him writing and performing the song Clouds, which was viewed by millions on YouTube, and his life was depicted in a Disney film. The American Childhood Cancer Organization's website described him as a Gold Ribbon Hero. Here is an excerpt from the site.

During Zach's journey, he remained incredibly positive and hopeful that his diagnosis was for something big. He told his mom that if he was going to die, he wanted to leave the world a little better than what it was.

He made it his mission to keep a smile on the faces of everyone he met and his energy was felt in every room he walked into.

When Zach received the news that the treatments were no longer working instead of breaking down, he asked for a party. Zach gained his wings in May of 2013 and his legacy lives on with "Clouds."

Laura, his mother, went on to write Fly A Little Higher. Here are some of the things Zach said about his life and journey.

"You don't have to find out you're dying to start living."

"I want to be remembered as a kid who went down fighting, and didn't really lose"

"You don't have to wait for things to happen to live your life."

"Try and make people happy, and you will make the world a better place."

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to make good use of freedom?

You may start by doing things you enjoy or find stimulating. How can you then flow, focus and find fulfilment? What may be the benefits – for yourself and maybe for other people – of taking these steps?

The Feelings, Facts And Future Approach

The Feelings, Facts And Future Approach

There are many ways to help people to shape their future. One approach is to recognise they have certain feelings. It can then be to move on to exploring the facts and how they can shape their future.

There are many ways to help people to shape their future. One approach is to recognise that people may have certain feelings. It can then be to move on to exploring the facts and helping them to shape their futures.

One crucial point is to recognise when it is appropriate to move on from the feelings aspect. There are many ways to do this in a caring way. Let's look at one example.

A doctor who is giving somebody bad news will recognise the importance of a patient's feelings. They may say something like the following.

"We have got the results back. Unfortunately it is not good news. There are, however, several possible ways forwards."

"I recognise that this may come as something as a shock, so you may need time to reflect. I can also give you any more information you want to know about the results.

"When you are ready, but only when you feel it is appropriate, we can explore the possible ways forward.

"There are several different routes we can take. Each route has pluses and minuses. It is important that you know the implications about each route.

"First of all, however, I can give you any information you want to know about the present situation and the possible ways forwards."

Good communicators also recognise that people have different ways of operating. They therefore aim to communicate in ways that connect with different people. Here are three different ways that people operate. These are extremes, of course, and people often blend these approaches.

Feelings

Some people mainly operate and talk on the level of feelings. Their feelings are real for them and they want these to be respected.

They may have difficulties with people who – for various reasons – may not believe that the person's feelings are justified or who simply want to talk about facts.

Facts

Some people mainly operate and talk on the level of facts. They can find it difficult to communicate with those who operate on the level of feelings. The classic example is when the feelings person says: "I feel ..."

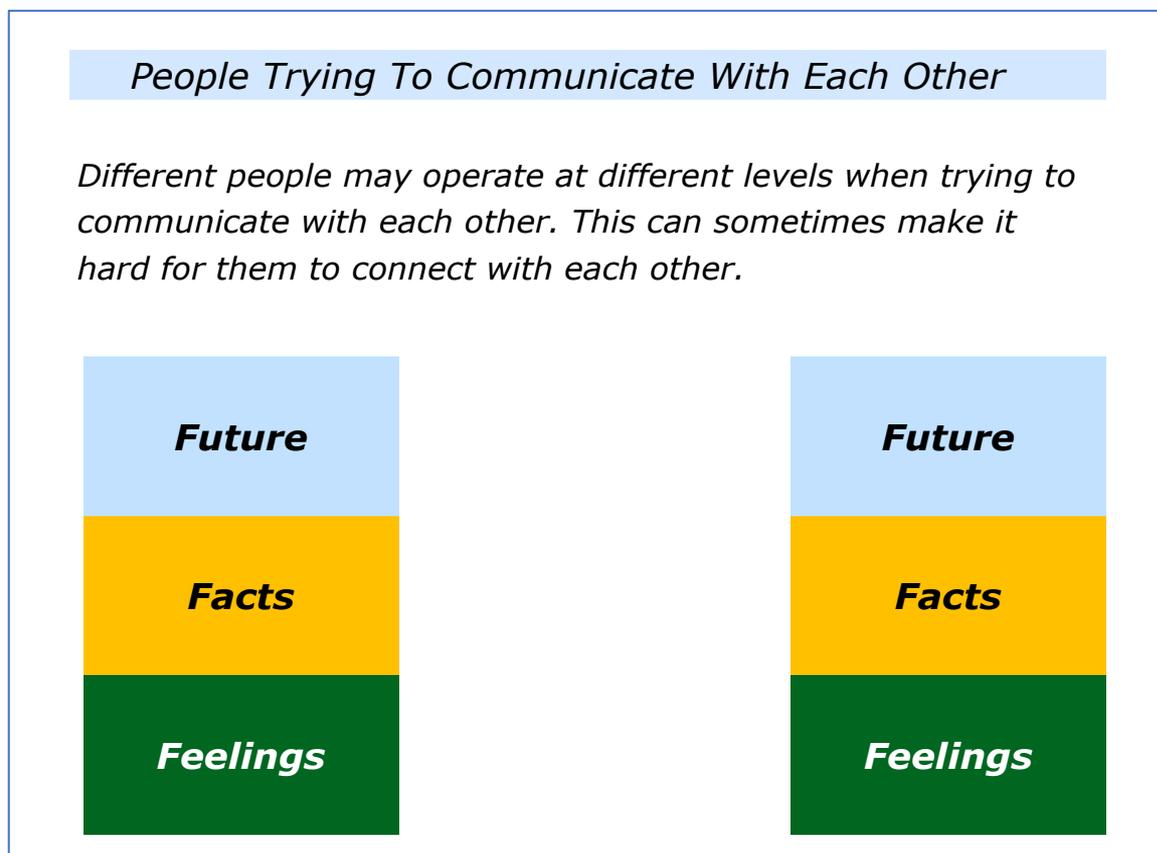

The facts person responds by saying: "But that is illogical. Here are the facts."

Future

Some people operate by focusing on the future. Whatever the situation, they may quickly move into solutions mode or setting positive goals.

Such people do have feelings and explore facts. They quickly channel these into towards at the future, however, and how to achieve success.

People sometimes get into difficulty when communicating with each other because they operate in different ways. One person may want to talk about their feelings, for example, but the other person wants to talk about the facts or the future.

Good therapists recognise the people may operate at different levels. They often start on the level at which the other person is operating. They then aim to help them to shape their future.

When working with a feelings person, for example, they will show that they recognise that the person's feeling is authentic. This does not mean that:

They personally have the same feeling ... They are saying the feeling is justified ... They are prepared to accept how the person behaves in the way they express this feeling.

When I worked as a therapist, if a person said: "I feel ..." I would ask: "What do you want to feel in the future?" We then explored how they increase the likelihood of experiencing that feeling.

Good communicators take similar steps when encouraging people to work towards a positive vision. They sometimes do this by taking the following steps.

They show they recognise the authenticity of people's feelings;

They then, when appropriate, focus on the facts and show the possible ways forwards that people can follow to shape a positive future.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? You may want to help a person to deal with a setback, take the next step in their career, deal with a challenge or reach a specific goal.

What can you do to recognise the person's feelings? When appropriate, how can you encourage them to explore the facts and shape their future? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The feelings, facts and future approach can be used to help other people and also yourself in certain situations. Let's explore this theme.

Managing Your Own Feelings By Focusing On The Facts And Shaping The Future

Many people do work that involves managing emotions, crises or dramas. Sometimes these call for being able to manage their emotions rather than let the emotions manage them.

This is an approach taken by medics in Accident & Emergency. Every day they care for patients who experience traumas that may be life-changing or life-threatening.

The medics then have to stay calm and gather information. This often involves dealing with any immediate issues, stabilising the patient and clarifying the possible ways forward.

People in other professions follow a similar approach. One football coach, for example, described how they aimed to do this during matches.

"People often get swept along with the emotions they experience. This can be the case for the fans, players and coaches. Over the years I have learned to manage my emotions."

"During my early career I aimed to encourage my players by continually praising their efforts during matches. Sometimes I allowed my emotions to get the better of me, however, and began railing against the officials."

"Being animated on touchline did not help me to make better strategic decisions. These days I try to take the following steps."

"First, to manage my feelings. This can be difficult because there are many swings in a game."

"Second, to gather the facts. This involves seeing: a) what is happening; b) what we are doing well; c) what we can do better."

"Third, to clarify the strategies for going forwards. This also involves communicating these to the players in a way they can apply in the game."

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow the feelings, facts and future approach to helping people to shape their future? How can you do this in your own way?

The Making Use Or Your High Sensitivity Approach

Making Use Of Your High Sensitivity

This sometimes involves going through the following steps.

- Making Sense Of Your High Sensitivity;
- Managing Your High Sensitivity;
- Making Use Of Your High Sensitivity.

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach involves making good use of your high sensitivity. Different people are sensitive to different things.

Some individuals may be affected by physical events – such certain sounds, images, smells or other sensations. Some may be affected by psychological events – such as people behaving in certain ways.

Some people are affected by events that help or hurt their values. Some are affected by seeing positive or negative patterns that have consequences for people or the planet.

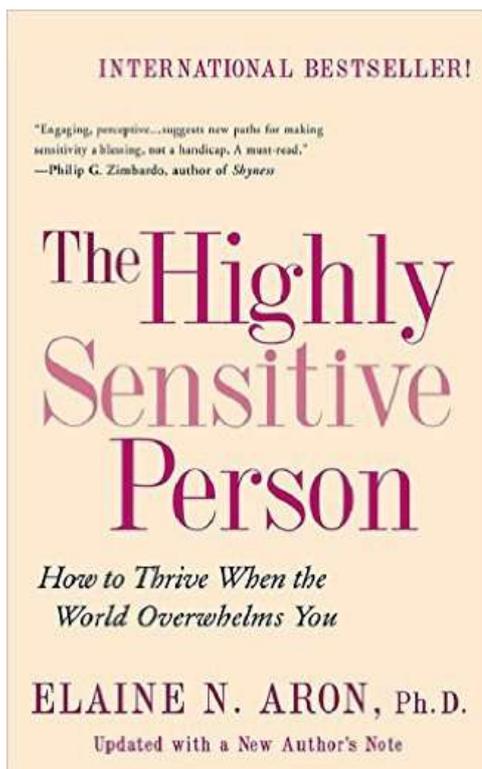

Some people learn how to use their sensitivity in a positive way. Some learn how to manage it. Some find it difficult to deal with the emotions that are triggered by their sensitivity.

The following sections explore some ways to manage such experiences. Let's explore these themes.

Making Sense Of Your High Sensitivity

Elaine Aron introduced many people to this theme in her book The Highly Sensitive Person. Sensitivity is what makes us human. It enables us to enjoy life, be empathetic and encourage others.

Every person is different, however, and is sensitive to different kinds of experiences. Sometimes we react in positive ways. Sometimes we react in negative ways.

Sensitivity is what makes us human. Certain experiences enable us to live fully but sometimes we can feel overwhelmed.

Elaine says it can be useful to understand highly sensitive people who: "just feel more deeply."

She also provides many practical tools that we can use to make good use of our own and other people's sensitivity.

Great workers often learn how to use their sensitivity. They translate their experiences into ways of encouraging others, playing music, creating beauty or doing other activities.

This approach calls for going beyond ignoring such signals or being afraid of being called a snowflake. People who learn how to manage their sensitivity can then use it to help other people.

Let's return to your own life and work. You may be sensitive to certain kinds of physical or psychological sensations. These may include the following.

Being Highly Sensitive To Certain Sensations

Physical Sensations

You may be highly sensitive to certain kinds of physical sensations.

These may include certain kinds of sounds, sights, smells, environments or other sensations.

You may respond to these in a positive or potentially negative way.

Psychological Sensations

You may be highly sensitive to certain kinds of psychological sensations.

These may include certain kinds of feelings, values being violated or people behaving in certain ways.

You may respond to these in a positive or potentially negative way.

Managing Your High Sensitivity

Imagine that you may be sensitive to certain physical or psychological stimuli. There are many approaches to manage these experiences. Let's explore some of these themes.

You can accept your high sensitivity and choose to manage it in positive ways

Imagine that you are highly sensitive to certain kinds of sounds. You can choose to accept this trait. You can then aim either:

To surround yourself with sounds that you like;

To avoid sounds that you don't like;

To try to get used to sounds that you don't like.

The same rule applies to other experiences where you have high sensitivity. This leads to the next approach.

You can aim to control what you put into your body and soul

Individuals like to feel in control. They like to manage their environment, their decisions and their future. They also like to feel in control of what they put into their body and soul.

Everything is food. This includes the experiences, sounds, sights, emotions and other things we expose ourselves to each day. Bearing this in mind, you may want to take the follow steps. You may aim:

To put yourself into stimulating environments – such as stimulating sanctuaries or stimulating work places – rather than sapping environments;

To spend time with people who are encouragers and who give you positive energy – plus you also encouraging them - rather than with negative people who take energy;

To focus on positive things happening in the world – such as human beings finding solutions to challenges – rather than only on negative things.

You can focus on experiences that support rather than sap your body and soul. Sometimes this involves the next skills.

You can find ways to manage triggers that lead to negative experiences

Individuals often respond to triggers which can lead to positive or negative experiences. Many people know the triggers they can help them to feel joyful, satisfied and happy. Sometimes it is harder to identify the triggers that lead to them feeling lost, depressed or unhappy.

You may, for example, believe it is important to follow certain values in your daily life and work. You may then get upset when seeing other people violating these values. Such an experience can act as a trigger for you going into a negative spiral.

One approach is to avoid putting yourself into situations where you may encounter negative triggers. If you do encounter one, however, you may want to take the following steps.

You can do something physical – such as to breathe deeply or move away from the triggering situation – to recentre. You can then aim:

To recognise the trigger – which may be a certain kind of experience or people behaving in a certain way – and buy time to think;

To focus on what you can control, clarify the possible ways forward and the potential consequences of each option;

To pursue your chosen strategy, get a quick success and do something to put yourself into a positive cycle rather than a negative cycle.

Imagine that you have developed the habit of putting positive things into your body and soul. This can then lead to the next step.

Making Use Of Your High Sensitivity

Imagine that you are aware of the areas where you have high sensitivity. One approach is to then explore how you can make good use of these qualities.

Some therapists, for example, often have high degrees of empathy. They then use this to help troubled people to survive and then thrive. They do not use this empathy to become overwhelmed by other people's worried.

Some people who care about life on Earth use this emotion to share stories about how others are healing and improving the planet. They do not allow this caring to drive them into depression.

The Verywell Mind website describes some of the qualities shown by highly sensitive people. Here is an extract from the website.

Being A Highly Sensitive Person

Some of the ways that being an HSP might impact your life include the following.

- You might avoid situations that leave you feeling overwhelmed.

Highly sensitive people may be more affected by certain situations such as tension, violence, and conflict, which may lead them to avoid things that make them feel uncomfortable.

- You might be highly touched by beauty or emotionality.

Highly sensitive people tend to feel deeply moved by the beauty they see around them. They may cry while watching particularly heart-warming videos and can really empathize with the feelings of others, both negative and positive.

- You may have close relationships with others.

They care deeply about their friends and tend to form deep bonds with the right people.

- You may be grateful for the life you have.

Highly sensitive people appreciate a fine wine, a good meal, or a beautiful song on a level that most people can't access. They may feel more existential angst, but they also may feel more gratitude for what they have in life, knowing that it is possibly fleeting and nothing is certain.

If you know how to manage the unique features of being an HSP, you can make it more of a strength and less of a challenge in your life. For HSPs, lows may be lower, but highs have the potential to be higher as well.

Let's return to your own life and work. Can you think of specific area where you may be highly sensitive? Looking ahead, you may want to explore the following themes.

How can I try to make good use of my high sensitivity in this area? How can I use it in a positive way? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people – of taking these steps?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Numbers Approach

Happiness

On a scale 0-10, the extent to which I feel happy with my life at the moment is:

_____ / 10

The specific things I can do to maintain or improve the rating are:

- * _____
- * _____
- * _____

This approach may sound counter-intuitive, but I have found it can help people to manage their emotions and shape their futures.

Sometimes people talk around an issue or find it hard to put a name to a feeling. One way to get to the heart of the matter is to invite them to rate their feelings or perception around a topic.

Using numbers may sound an unfeeling approach. But it can actually help people to focus on their feelings and specific behaviour. They can then move on to the actions they can take to shape their futures.

Here are some of the topics a person may wish to explore. It is often useful, however, to invite a person to rate themselves in just one of these areas. This can be a good starting point for exploring their reasons for giving the rating.

My Ratings

The ratings I would give myself in the following areas

Shaping My Future

The extent to which I feel in control of shaping my future is: _____ / 10

Health

The rating I would give my health at the moment is: _____ / 10

Satisfaction In Work

The rating I would give regarding satisfaction in my work is: _____ / 10

Being Professional

The rating I would give regarding me being positive and professional in my work is: _____ / 10

Encouraging People

The rating I would give regarding me encouraging other people is: _____ / 10

Moving Forwards

The scores are just the start. If appropriate, you can invite the person to describe the reasons for the ratings. The next step is to invite them to focus on shaping the future.

The aim of the ratings approach is to encourage a person:

To clarify where they are at the moment – such as the feelings they have or to focus on a particular area in which they want to improve;

To clarify the specific things they can do to maintain or improve the rating in this area;

To clarify the specific benefits of doing these things – both for themselves and for other people.

When focusing on the future, it is important to encourage the person to build on what they can control. You can also offer them practical tools they can use to achieve positive results.

Here is the exercise that can be used to help a person to focus on shaping the future. If appropriate, you can then help them to work towards achieving their picture of success.

The Numbers Approach To Performance Development

Let's move on to an area that is sometimes loaded with emotion. This is the topic of what organisations may call performance appraisal, performance management or performance development.

There are many models for helping a person to focus on and develop their performance. The following pages describe one approach that can be effective.

One key point. It is vital to have separate sessions on the person's performance, any pay negotiation and the person's wider career development. Some organisations try to cram all three into one session, but that seldom works. Try to have separate sessions on each topic.

The following pages provide a pack that has proved useful when helping people to focus on their performance development. It invites a person to rate their performance on a scale 0-10. The manager can also give their views on the rating and other areas.

As you can guess, some poor performers may rate themselves highly whilst good performers sometimes rate themselves down. In both cases, the manager may wish to say something like the following.

"Is it okay if I share some ideas? It is, of course, up to you if you want to take the ideas on board. If you do, however, then we can focus on how you can maintain or improve the rating."

This can help to provide a reality check. It is up to the person to decide if they want to continue to maintain or improve their performance. Each choice does, of course, have consequences.

Here is the pack that can be sent to a team member a couple of weeks before the session. They can then send it to the manager before he actual meeting.

Introduction

As you know, we are committed to helping people to develop themselves and their performance. This approach works well when people are prepared to be positive, professional and work to keep improving.

Bearing this in mind, this pack invites you to do the following things. Try to be as honest as possible when doing the exercises.

- Describe the specific goals you have worked towards achieving. Describe the rating you would give yourself in terms of achieving these goals. Do this on a scale 0-10.

The Managing Unfairness Approach

Managing Unfairness

This may involve going through the following steps. You can aim:

- To clarify your philosophy for managing unfairness;
- To clarify how you can stay positive and manage unfairness;
- To clarify the practical steps you can take to manage unfairness.

A person may sometimes find it difficult to deal with unfairness. The unfairness may be real or simply be their perception. Whatever the trigger, the person may respond in a negative way.

This can lead to them feeling angry, resentful or depressed. Sometimes the passion they feel can lead to them lashing out. This may feel good for a moment, but it does not always lead to the result they want to achieve.

Looking back, how have you dealt with unfairness in the past? You may have been treated unfairly at work or in other areas of life. You may have been upset when perceiving what you see as unfairness in the world.

How to manage such feelings? The following section explores some options, but managing unfairness can still be challenging. Let's consider these steps.

You can clarify your philosophy for managing unfairness

Different people take these steps in different ways. Here are some of the themes you may wish to explore when considering these issues.

What is my philosophy of life? What do I believe is important in life? What can I do to keep focusing on these things? How can I keep following my philosophy? What will be the pluses and minuses of taking this approach?

What do I believe regarding fairness in life? How can I try to live in a fair way? What do I believe every person has the right to in life? What do I think can be unfair in life?

What can I choose to do when I see or experience unfairness? What can I control in such situations? What can't I control? How do I want to behave when I see or experience unfairness?

Some individuals may find it relatively simple to clarify their life philosophy. They clarify what they believe is important in life. They then aim to focus on these things in their daily life and work.

A person may find it harder to deal with what they regard as unfairness in life. For example:

They may believe that everybody has the right to encouragement, justice and the basic materials for life;

They may believe that, providing people put in the effort, they should be rewarded with what they deserve;

They may believe that they personally should be judged fairly and get what they deserve.

Such a person may also recognise that such fairness does not always happen in life. Bearing this in mind, they may then ask themselves the following questions.

How do I want to behave when I see or experience unfairness? What can I do when I see unfairness in the world? What can I do in my own life to help to build a better world?

What do I want to do when I personally experience unfairness? How can I choose: a) to see what actually happened; b) to choose how I behave? How can I maintain my sanity and manage the unfairness?

Imagine that you have begun to settle on your philosophy for managing unfairness. The next step will be clarify how to deal with such situations when they happen. Let's consider this approach.

You can clarify how to stay positive and manage unfairness

Different people respond in different ways when faced by unfairness. Some may be so consumed with emotion that they get angry or fall into depression. They may then behave in ways that do not help themselves or other people.

A person may feel it is unfair that they have lost their job, not got a promotion or not been recognised for their efforts. They may feel that life has treated others unfairly by inflicting them with an illness, denying them opportunities or causing them pain.

Sometimes a person may be filled with righteous anger or other emotions. This may be justified, but then comes the next question. How to manage such feelings? Some individuals take the following steps.

They learn to recognise the triggers regarding unfairness that may affect them in a negative way;

They learn to buy time, reflect and consider their possible ways forwards for managing the unfairness;

They learn to, whenever possible, build on the positive things in their life whilst also following their chosen way forwards for managing the unfairness.

Every person will find their own way to manage their emotions, but that is not the end of the story. It can be relatively simple to find a logical way to deal with such situations, but then comes the hard part. How to deal with your emotions in the heat of the moment?

One approach is to have a ritual for staying stable. You may choose to have a mantra, such as saying to yourself: "Stop, pause, think." Or you may use other words.

You may do some deep breathing and regain your composure. Bearing in mind the things you can control, you may consider your options for going forwards.

Sometimes you may also try to see things in perspective. You may consider the positive things you have in life. Building on this base, you may then focus on the actions you want to take to deal with the unfairness.

Some people find it easier to deal with unfairness when it happens to them rather than when it happens to other people. Choosing to focus on what they can control, they take action to try to shape their future.

Such individuals find it harder when innocent people have suffered. Some then focus on what they can do: a) to help the people involved; b) to help to prevent such events happening in the future.

Sometimes this can work, but sometimes a person may feel their efforts are relatively futile. Nevertheless, they aim to do their best to make life better for others in the future.

You can clarify the practical steps you can take to manage unfairness

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a possible situation where you may see or experiences unfairness? This could be in your personal or professional life.

You may experience this personally in a workplace. Despite doing your best on a project, for example, you may not necessarily receive credit or the appropriate rewards.

Different people will deal with this in different ways. Some individuals ask themselves the following questions.

"Do I believe something is worth doing even if the work I do is not recognised? If so, do I still want to do the work? What will be the benefits for both myself and other people? How can I choose to do my best and encourage myself on the journey without feeling like a victim?"

There are, of course, many other possible situations where you may see or experience unfairness. You may encounter disappointment, rejection or feel helpless when other people experience pain.

How can you deal with such situations? How can you recognise the trigger, buy time and consider your options? How can you build on the positive things in your life? How can you then do your best to manage the unfairness?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Managing A Nagging Feeling Approach

Have you ever had a nagging feeling was hard to shift? This could have happened when either:

You felt a sense of injustice ... You had made a mistake ... You had tried to right a wrong but was not getting the response you wanted.

Such nagging feelings can take energy. They can trigger a negative cycle that is difficult to arrest. Trying to stop or ignore such feelings can have an opposite effect – they just increase.

How to manage such feelings? The following section describes some steps that can help. But, as ever, the old rule that time is the best healer may also be true. Time can help to put things in perspective.

Bearing this in mind, here are some of the steps it can be useful to explore when aiming to manage a nagging feeling.

Moving On From A Nagging Feeling

Here are some steps you may wish to consider. You may aim:

- To see things in perspective by focusing on the positive things in your life;
- To focus on the desired outcomes and do your best to achieve these results;
- To get to the point where you can say "I have done everything I can," and do something that gives you positive feelings.

Imagine that you have a nagging feeling that it is hard to shake off. You may have made a mistake, hurt a person, been misunderstood or had a painful experience. Let's explore some ways to deal with this feeling.

You can see things in perspective by focusing on the positive things in your life

This is the old standby, but it is still well worth doing. One person expressed this in the following way.

"Looking at life, I always try to focus on the positives. I am fortunate to have a lovely family and to do work I enjoy.

"Several years ago, I made a mistake that led to problems. These were not catastrophic, but they could have been avoided. The nagging feeling stayed with me for weeks.

"Eventually I began to see things in perspective. There were more than 90% good things happening in my life.

"Looking back, I could have avoided making the mistake. I tried to build on the positive things in my life, however, and resolved to do better in the future.

Time can be a healer, but there are some things we never get over. We may learn to manage these feelings over time, however, and be able see them in perspective.

You can focus on the desired outcomes and do your best to achieve these results

Imagine that you have a nagging feeling. This could be because of something you have done or something that has happened to you. It may be useful to work through the following steps.

You can clarify the outcomes you would like to achieve in the situation

Looking at the situation, you may want to clarify: a) what actually happened; b) what you would like to happen. If appropriate, try exploring the following themes.

What actually happened in the situation? Looking to the future, what would I like to happen? What are the outcomes I want to achieve in the situation?

When doing this, try to avoid judging yourself or other people. Avoid putting labels on people or interpreting their behaviour.

Clarify what actually happened and what you would like to happen. Focus on what you would like yourself and other people to do and feel in the future.

You can clarify what you can control in the situation

As ever, it is important to clarify what you can control. You can control your attitude, the way you prepare and the way you behave. Whilst you cannot control the way others react, you can control how you respond to what they do.

You can also clarify how to manage any triggers that lead to you behaving in a negative way. Plan how to buy time, consider your options and behave in a way that is more likely to achieve your chosen goals.

You can then do your best to achieve the desired results

You can then move into action. The steps you take will depend on the specific situation and the results you want to achieve.

You may want to show kindness, encourage another person or make positive suggestions. You may want to follow a certain strategy, aim to get a win-win solution or take other steps.

You can only do your best. Much will depend on how the other person or parties react. But you can keep doing what you believe in and aiming to achieve a positive solution.

You can eventually get to the point where you are able to say: "I have done everything I can."

Imagine that you have taken some of the steps mentioned previously. Bearing in mind what you want to achieve, it can be useful to explore the following themes.

What else can I do? What is the likelihood of that working? On a scale 0-10, how would I rate the chances of success?

If appropriate, you can follow these strategies. You can again do your best to achieve the desired outcomes. There may come a point, however, where you say to yourself:

"I have done everything that I can do or that I want to do."

You may then want to do something that you know will help you to feel positive. This will help you to move into a positive cycle rather than a negative cycle.

Some feelings never go away. We learn to manage these feelings, however, rather than let them manage us. Sometimes going through such experience can help us to grow as people and as professionals.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to focus on how to manage a nagging feeling. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Boxing Off A Challenge Approach

Different people choose different approaches to dealing with difficulties such as illnesses, problems or other challenges.

Some people ignore the issues. Some define the problem as a battle and gear their whole lives around tackling the issue.

Some people aim to manage such challenges as part of life. Such people may work through the following stages.

They acknowledge their feelings of shock, concern and worry.

They begin to focus on what they can control. They gather information about how they may be able to tackle the challenge.

They take time to reflect and clarify the strategies they want to follow to give themselves the greatest chance of success.

They may also focus on what they believe important in life and continue to pursue some of these activities - this gives them strength to take the next step.

They pursue their strategies for tackling the challenge – such as getting treatment, making tough decisions or taking other steps. They keep going until they feel they have done everything possible.

They then, when they feel ready, emotionally box off the challenge because there is nothing else they can do at the present time.

They get on with their life by focusing on what they believe is important and aiming to enjoy the experiences.

This approach is the opposite of denial. It calls for a person being proactive and realistic. It calls for doing masses of research, studying what works and then pursuing the strategy that is most likely to achieve success.

This sounds good in theory, but sometimes it can be difficult. A person may ask, for example:

"What happens when you have multiple challenges? Surely it is harder to focus on what you believe is important in life? Much of your time must be taken up with dealing with the difficulties."

A person may then feel overloaded with pressing issues. These can include juggling hospital appointments, getting treatment, dealing with family problems, maintaining an income or other issues.

One person described how they tried to manage such a situation.

"I have suffered from several related illnesses over the past five years. At one point my life was filled with anxiety. I just seemed to live from test to test."

"My partner and I then made a decision. We were going to get on with enjoying life rather than worrying about the next set of results.

"At some point the tests will not be what we want. But in the meantime we are going to do the things we enjoy in life."

Some people take the following approach to managing multiple challenges.

They try to keep doing things that give them positive energy.

They focus on one challenge, do their best to tackle it and box off that challenge.

They then move on to the next challenge – which may be linked to other challenges – and repeat the process.

There may come a point, however, where the human system is no longer able to manage multiple challenges. This can be the case when a person is suffering from several illnesses.

Such a person may choose to spend the last period of their life at home rather than embark on another series of treatment. They will aim to enjoy as much quality of life as they can during their remaining time.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to continue living your life whilst also boxing off a challenge? You may be managing a transition, dealing with an illness, tackling a specific problem or whatever.

How can you continue to do things that give you positive energy? How can you do your best to tackle the challenge? How can you then box off the challenge and get on with your life?

If you wish, try tackling the following exercise. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Making Sense Of Emotions

People often want to make sense of their feelings. The following section describes several ways it is possible to take this step. This also comes with the following health warning:

A person can change a feeling without actually understanding what happened to create it. They can do something that will produce another feeling.

A person can also find it helpful, however, to recognise what led to creating the feeling. They can learn from the experience and recognise similar situations in the future.

Bearing these things in mind, here are several things to consider when aiming to make sense of emotions.

Making Sense Of Emotions

The main emotion you feel – such as joy, happiness, pleasure, peace, feeling out of control, pain, disappointment, hurt, anger, confusion or mixed feelings - can be the result of many things.

-  It can be because of something you have done;
-  It can be because of something that has happened;
-  It is then up to you to choose how you want to manage the emotion.

Something the person has done may have contributed towards causing the feeling

A person may have done something that led to them feeling joyful, happy or towards other people feel valued.

It can be important to recognise what they did right – such as how they behaved – that led to this feeling. They may be able to follow these principles to create similar feelings in the future.

A person may also have done something that led to themselves or other people feeling sad, hurt or upset.

It can be important to recognise what they did that led to the feeling. They can then focus on what they can do instead – such as what they can improve - to create better feelings in the future.

Something may have happened that contributed towards causing the feeling

A person may have experienced something that led to them feeling sad, hurt or helpless. They may have been on the receiving end of a personal attack, dirty fighting, injustice or another event that caused harm.

Sometimes it can be important to clarify what actually happened. This can help to explain the emotions they are experiencing.

For example, later in the book we will look at double bind situations. These are situations where, whatever a person does, they feel bound to lose.

Being on the receiving end of a double bind can lead to a person continuing to carry the pain. Recognising that it wasn't their fault can help them. They can also aim to avoid such situations in the future.

Let's consider an even more challenging scenario. It can hard for people to manage emotions such as grief, sorrow or trauma. Sometimes this process can be facilitated with the help of a skilled counsellor.

Al Siebert, author of The Survivor Personality, specialised in helping people who had been in traumatic situations. Many of these people demonstrated resilience but some also benefited from counselling.

He wrote a piece called Guidelines for Listening to War Veterans. Here are some of Al's suggestions for listening to returning soldiers. Simply listening can sometimes help people on their healing journey.

Al Siebert

Guidelines For Listening To War Veterans

People who have survived highly distressing experiences will usually talk with a good listener who will take time to hear the whole story.

If you are willing to listen to someone speak truthfully about all their experiences, here are useful guidelines to follow.

- Don't ask about a person's experiences unless you can handle honest answers.

Don't open someone up and then chicken out when the story gets too rough. Survivors of horrifying experiences will usually talk to a person who has the courage to listen.

- Give the person lots of time.

Vietnam veterans found the average person could listen for only several minutes. When a veteran is willing to talk, it is important to allow them plenty of time to talk. Plan to listen for hours. Expect to have some follow up sessions.

- Be an active listener.

Ask for details. Ask about feelings. Ask questions when you feel puzzled about facts or incidents.

- Remain quiet if he or she starts crying.

Don't tell the person to not feel what he's feeling. Leave their thoughts and feelings alone. Your quiet presence is more useful than anything else you can do.

- Listen with empathy, but minimize sympathy.

Survivors of horrible experiences talk more easily to a person with calm concern. Don't make the veteran have to handle your emotional reactions as well as his or her own.

- Ask if he or she sees anything positive about being in combat.

It is not accurate to think of most war veterans as having a post-traumatic stress disorder. Some do. The majority do not. The extreme circumstances that cause emotional trauma for some people cause others to become stronger.

Managing Emotions In Organisations

People need to manage their own emotions, but organisations can sometimes play a part in helping them to take this step. This approach was highlighted during Covid-19. The following pages describe how one company took these steps.

Positive Organisations During Covid

They aimed to connect with their people and encourage them:

- To take care of themselves and their loved ones;
- To take care of today's business and tomorrow's business;
- To take care of shaping a positive future.

The leadership team began by clarifying the organisation's strategy. This focused on taking care of their people, managing the present situation and shaping the future.

Treating people like adults, they communicated the strategy to everybody in the organisation. They did this in a positive but realistic way. They aimed:

To explain that people would be supported and helped to manage the present situation;

To explain the organisation's strategy – including the action steps it would take – to manage the present situation and shape the future;

To explain that people would be invited to contribute to shaping the future.

The leaders then focused on connecting with individuals and, where appropriate, helping them to manage specific challenges. This also enabled people to feel more ready to tackle the business challenges. They focused on the following themes.

They encouraged people to take care of themselves and their loved ones

The company offered one-to-one sessions to people across the organisation. The CEO positioned these by giving people the following messages.

"As you know, we want to involve people in using their strengths to implement the company's strategy.

"We also want to offer people practical tools that they can use to shape the future for themselves and other people.

"Bearing this in mind, we will be sending you an invitation to a one-to-one session. The sessions are voluntary. They will be confidential and you can explore any themes they wish.

"We hope that these will offer practical ideas that you can use to shape a positive future for the company and for yourself."

Framing the session in this way provided the opportunity: a) to offer individuals some practical tools; b) to give them the chance to explore specific challenges.

Many people took advantage of the sessions. Everybody's situation was different, of course, and individuals faced different challenges. Here are some examples that emerged.

They may be concerned about their finances ... They may be caring for a parent with dementia ... They may need to take care of their physical or psychological health ... They may find it hard to connect with the people in their team when working remotely.

They may have difficulty juggling home schooling and work ... They may have planned on moving to a new job but this disappeared when the lockdown came ... They may be facing other personal or professional challenges.

People were helped to take more control of shaping their futures. They then felt more able to move on to the next theme the company explored.

They encouraged people to take care of today's business and tomorrow's business

The company wanted to involve people in taking this step. The CEO explained this approach to them in the following way.

"We have clarified our strategies for taking care of today's business and tomorrow's business.

"These describe the actions we can take within our own company and also to help our customers.

"The strategies we aim to follow to manage today's business are:

"To ...

"To ...

"To ...

"The strategies we aim to follow to shape tomorrow's business are:

"To ...

"To ...

"To ...

"We have appointed mission holders who will be leading task forces that will focus on specific elements of these strategies.

"If you wish, you can choose the topic that interests you and join the task force that is focusing on this issue.

"The task forces will then present their ideas for implementing the strategies successfully. People can also add other suggestions for taking care of both today's business and tomorrow's business."

The leadership team set the overall strategies. They then gave people the chance to contribute within these guidelines and also add other suggestions.

Here are the exercises that the company gave to people. It then involved people in translating the ideas into action. This gave people a sense of ownership – within parameters - of helping to shape the future.

They encouraged people to take care of shaping a positive future

People are more likely to feel motivated when they are working towards a long-term aim. The company therefore encouraged people to focus on their longer-term personal and professional goals.

People needed to do good work on a day-to-day basis. The company also encouraged them to also lift their heads, however, and focus on their longer-term picture of success.

This was vital as lockdown followed lockdown because some people became dispirited. They found it difficult to know when the situation would change.

Some people enjoyed working from home during the first lockdown. They felt like they were in a 1500 metre race and could see the end in sight. But then things changed. People were told they were actually in a marathon.

Some people reframed the situation quickly, but others found it more difficult. People can do good work by focusing on one day at a time. But they feel much better if they are working towards a long-term goal.

The mentoring sessions therefore provided people with practical tools they could use: a) to manage the present situation; b) to shape a positive future. The aims were to help their people and the company to achieve ongoing success.

Let's move on to another theme regarding emotions. As mentioned earlier, feelings are the materiel of life. It can therefore be useful to learn how to take the following step.

Making Good Use Of Emotions

Don Clifton, the author of Now, Discover Strengths, was once asked about a certain person's potential. A positive person, he was also realistic and answered along the following lines.

"The person has strengths and shows promise, but I do not know how good they can become. I will be able to answer better after I see how they deal with setbacks."

Some people react to setbacks by choosing to develop. Some choose to blame the world. Some ask the following questions:

"How can I use this feeling to help other people? How can I use it to encourage people, improve life or build a better world?"

Jakob von Uexkull chose to translate his concern about the planet into creating The Right Livelihood Awards. These became known as the Alternative Nobel Prizes.

He sold his successful stamp trading business to fund the first five years of the awards. His initial move was to approach the Nobel Foundation. The original categories for the prizes had been set in a different world, said Jakob. Bearing this in mind, he asked:

"Would it be possible to create awards for people tackling the present challenges facing humankind?"

The Nobel Foundation were polite, but said that no new categories would be added. He responded by creating the Right Livelihood Awards.

The first ceremony was held in Stockholm in a rented hall in 1980. Now they are given in the Swedish Parliament. The aims are:

To honour and support those offering practical and exemplary answers to the most urgent challenges facing us today.

Jakob explains that he chose the term Right Livelihood to symbolise 'the whole life'. It should focus not only on what people do, but how they live their lives. These awards are given to individuals and groups who have done practical work to help people and the planet.

Right Livelihood

Right Livelihood is a Buddhist term. In the context of work it refers to earning a living in a way that does not harm others or the world. It encompasses the following principles.

- Right View ... Right Intention
- Right Speech ... Right Action
- Right Livelihood ... Right Effort
- Right Mindfulness ... Right Concentration

The awards are now globally recognised. Wangari Maathai actually gained the Right Livelihood Award in 1984 and the Nobel Peace Prize in 2004. Here are just two people from the many hundreds that have won Right Livelihood awards over the past 40 years.

Ela Bhatt, Self-Employed Women's Association, India

Ela helped poorly paid self-employed women to organise and create SEWA. This led to improving their welfare, opportunities and sense of self-determination. It set up scores of cooperatives – often comprising more than 1,000 people - and trade groups to share skills and expertise.

SEWA also established its own bank. This freed thousands of women from money lenders and to recover their possessions from pawnbrokers. Ela explained this in the following way.

"From a miserable passive acceptance of all the injustices, SEWA women, by organising themselves, have attained the courage to stand up and fight, the ability to think, act, react, manage and lead.

"Self-reliance is what they ultimately want. There is no development without self-reliance. But there is no route to self-reliance except by organisation."

Ela has continued to work for justice and help people around the world. The Foundation's site explains:

She is a member of The Elders, founded by Nelson Mandela. In 2010 she was awarded the Niwano Peace Prize and the first ever Global Fairness Award.

In 2011, Harvard University awarded her the Radcliffe Institute Medal for her life and work. Also in 2011, Ela Bhatt was appointed to the Board of the Reserve Bank of India. The same year, she was selected for the prestigious Indira Gandhi Prize.

Different people choose different ways to make good use of their emotions. Sometimes these involve simple acts of kindness. Sometimes they involve doing practical things that help people to shape a positive future.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to manage your emotions in a helpful way? You may anticipate overcoming a setback, tackling a challenge or dealing with a difficult situation.

What can you do then to choose your way forward? How can you manage your emotions in a way that helps yourself or other people? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Radar, Repertoire And Results Approach

Great workers have good radar in the activities where they excel. They seem to know what will happen before it happens.

Al Siebert, author of The Survivor Personality, called this gift personal radar. He first noticed it when studying paratroopers who had survived challenging experiences.

Many survivors demonstrated a specific characteristic. Al described this in the following way.

"During our training I noticed that combat survivors have a type of personal radar always on scan. Anything that happens, or any noise draws a quick, brief look. They have a relaxed awareness.

"I began to realise it wasn't just luck or fate that these were the few who came back alive. Something about them as people had tipped the scales in their favour."

AI saw a link between survivors and peak performers in different fields. Such people demonstrate the following qualities.

Radar

They have good radar in the activity where they excel. They see patterns quickly and seem to know what will happen before it happens. Such radar often springs from a natural talent, but it increases as people develop.

Repertoire

They have a wide repertoire of tools – knowledge, strategies and skills – in the activity where they excel. They continue to add to their repertoire as they gather more experience and wisdom.

Results

They use their radar to gather information. They then reach into their repertoire and select the appropriate strategy to work towards the desired results.

Great retailers, for example, often have an intuitive feeling for market trends and selling. Walking into a store, they can immediately point out several things that can be done improve the business.

Ellen MacArthur, the round-the-world yachtswoman, talked about reading the waves to anticipate future sailing conditions. She then worked out the strategy for reaching her destination.

Clarifying where you have good radar

Where do you have good radar? You may demonstrate this when doing specific activities, solving particular problems or operating in certain situations.

What do you do then to do your best to deliver the desired results? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Radars

*The specific activity where
I have good radar is:*

The specific things I do to use my radar and do my best to achieve the desired results when doing this activity are:

You may have good radar in some situations but not in others. It is important to know:

How to build on this ability in the situations where you have good radar;

How to manage any situations where you don't have good radar.

Different people use different names for this ability. Some call it personal radar; some call it scanning; some call it taking pictures; some call it having a sixth sense; some call it strategic intuition.

Arsène Wenger, the former football manager, described how great players were continually scanning to see what is happening on the field. Below are extracts from a talk he gave that was published on the website Training Ground Guru.

Top players have radar in their heads

Arsène Wenger says a top player has a 'head like a radar' and that more work needs to be done on perception and decision making at young ages.

"I came to the conclusion that it is about getting as much information as possible before (getting) the ball. I call that scanning.

"I try to see what happens to a player in the ten seconds before he gets the ball, how many times he takes information and the quality of information he takes. It depends on the position.

"What is interesting is that very good players scan six to eight times in the ten seconds before getting the ball and normal ones three to four times. That is a major step for improvement."

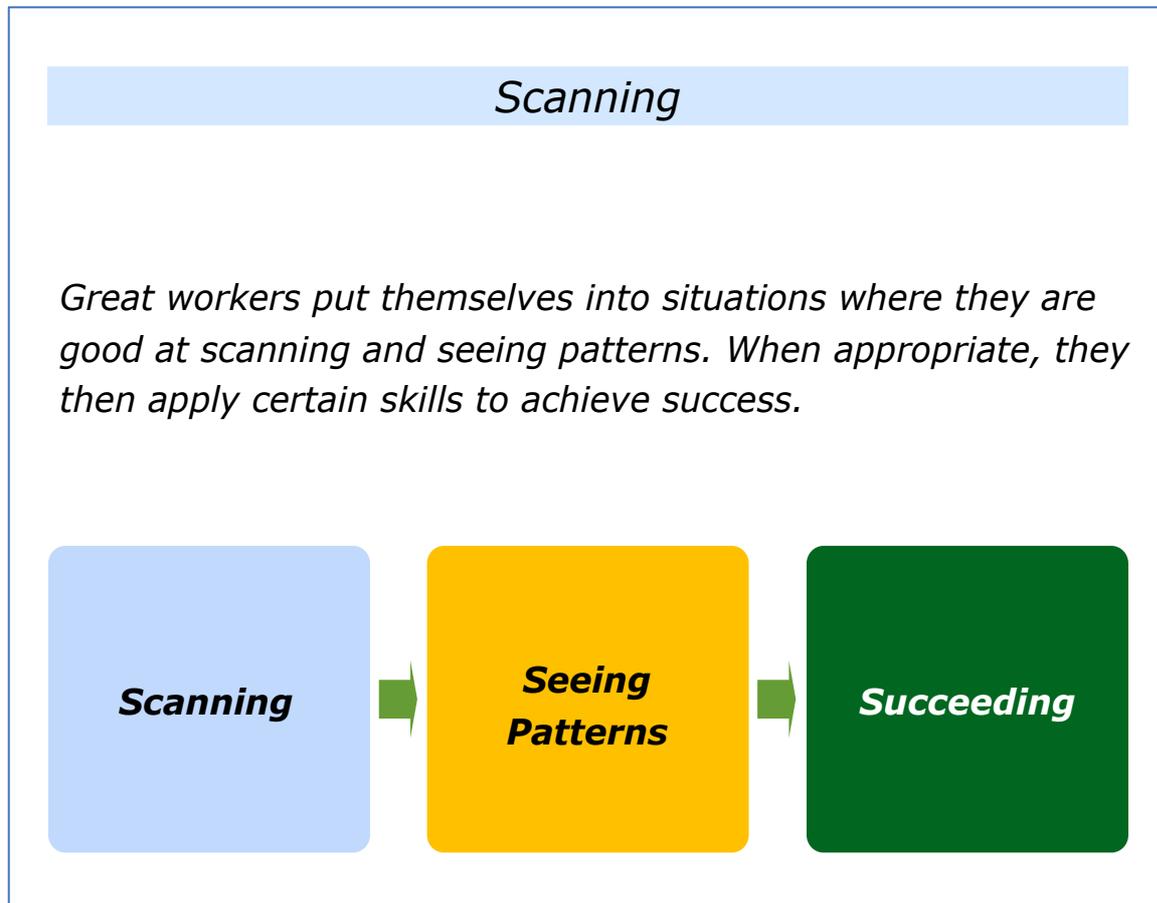

Arsène described the ability: a) to see what is happening; b) to anticipate what may happen. Then then comes the next step. This is developing the ability use this knowledge and make things happen.

Lionel Messi often demonstrated these gifts. Here is how Barney Rooney described this ability in an article in the Guardian.

Footballers are often said to carry a picture in their head. Messi has a great whirring bank of air traffic controller's screens up there, alternate visions of the future to scroll through and finesse.

Messi then applied his remarkable skills to deliver success. He did this on the football field, but other people do it in other areas.

Great workers put themselves into situations where they are good at scanning and seeing patterns. When appropriate, they then apply certain skills to achieve success.

Clarifying where you have a good repertoire

Radar is a good the starting point and this ability grows with age and experience. But you may need to develop your repertoire of skills to capitalise on such insight. This will enable you to move from awareness to action to achievement.

Arsène Wenger underlined the importance of players learning to make good decisions with the information they got from scanning. He described this in the following way.

The quality of perception and decision making

"My challenge is to get my players to know which the best choice is and make the optimal decision every time they get the ball.

"The player has to scan and decide. When he has decided he has to make the best possible solution. This means a compromise between risk and the progress of the ball."

Great workers find their radar gives them the time and space to use their talents to deliver great results. Wayne Gretzky, the ice hockey player, is often quoted as saying that he scored so many goals because:

"I skate to the part of the rink where the puck will appear."

Wayne had great radar on the rink. He also developed a repertoire of skills to deliver results.

Radar is given – but the greatest area for growth is in expanding your repertoire. There are many components in your repertoire. These include your:

Strengths - the natural talents you have been given;

Strategies - the knowledge, models and wisdom you have gathered;

Skills - the tools and techniques you have developed to get results.

What is the activity where you have good radar and also a wide repertoire? How can you improve your repertoire? How can you keep developing and adding to your strengths, strategies and skills?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Repertoire

The specific activity where I have the radar and the repertoire to deliver the desired results is:

The specific things I can do to keep adding to my repertoire are:

Clarifying how you can use your radar and repertoire to deliver results

Great workers reach into their repertoire and use the right tools to achieve the required results. The route they take will depend on whether they work as a counsellor, educator, engineer, athlete, crisis manager or whatever.

People often start by clarifying the picture of success. They then try different strategies to see what works. Pursuing their chosen route, they employ their skills to work towards achieving success. One counsellor explained what they did in the following way.

"Every client is different, but I do follow a certain model. Meeting a troubled person, I make them feel welcome and quickly look for behavioural patterns.

"I then imagine what I want them to be feeling, thinking and saying when they leave the session. This is the picture of success.

"Drawing on my experience, I use different strategies to help the person to tackle their challenges. I keep going until we find practical ways forward that they believe in.

"We then settle on the steps they want to take towards achieving their goals. The aim is to keep doing my best to ensure the person feels the session has been successful."

Great workers keep putting themselves into places where they can use their radar. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to take this step?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites to describe a specific situation where you may want to use your radar. It invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Pleasurable Work Approach

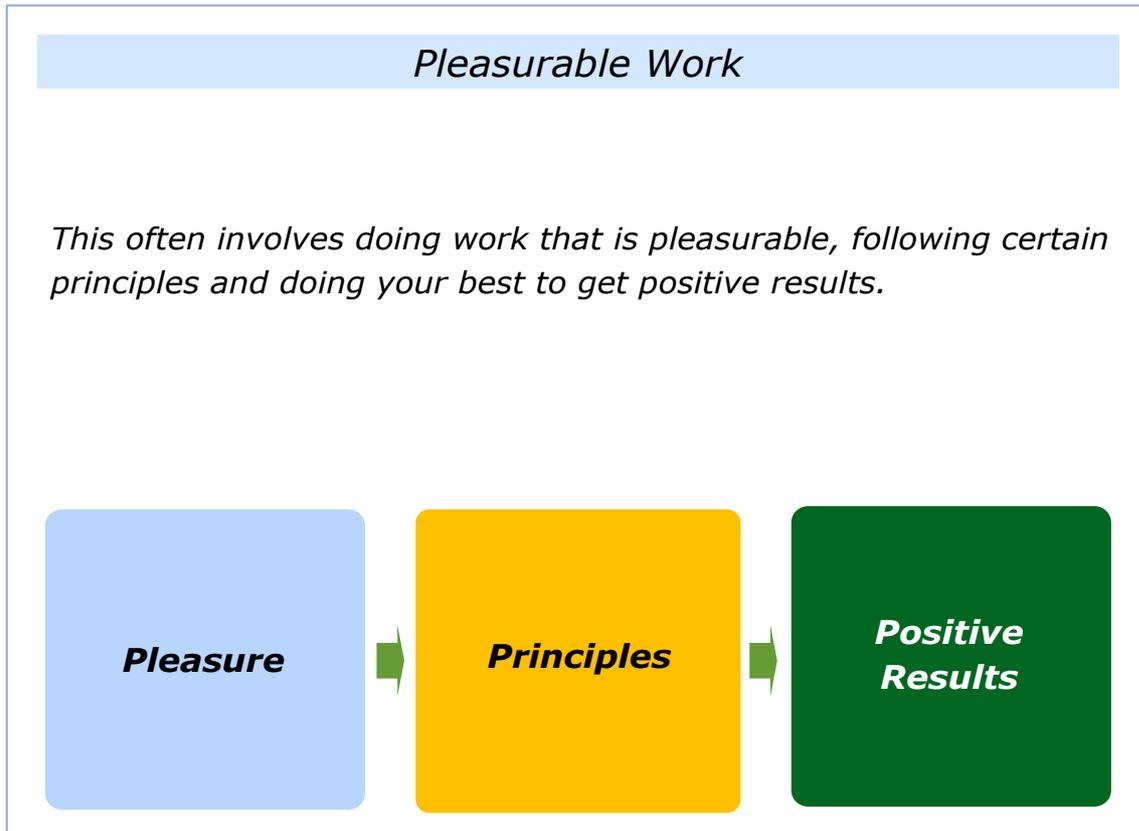

Some kinds of work are pleasurable, some are practical, some are painful. Each person will have different feelings about the various kinds of work. One approach is to take the following steps:

To do the kinds of work you find pleasurable or that may give pleasure to other people, to follow your principles and aim to get positive results;

To manage the kinds of work that are practical and necessary - or to find pleasure in doing some of these;

To do less of the work that are painful – some of this work may be necessary but, over the long-term, it can be debilitating.

Let's explore each of these kinds work and how you can translate these into action.

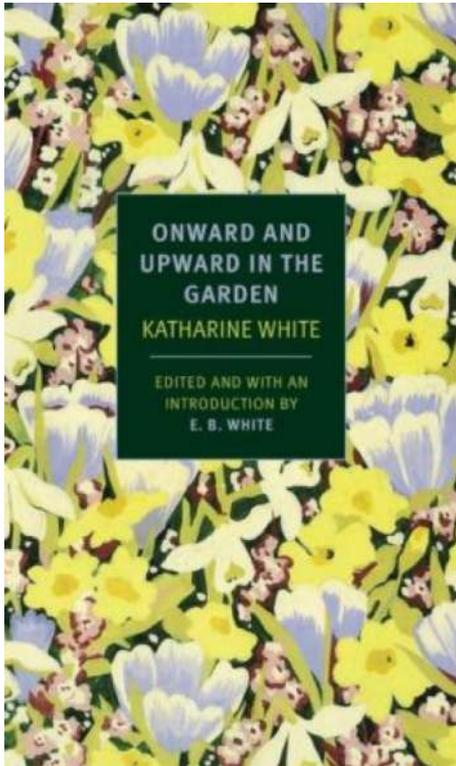

What are the kinds of work that you find pleasurable or that give pleasure to other people? What are the principles you follow then? How do you do your best to get positive results?

You may love helping people, solving specific problems, passing on knowledge or doing other activities. You may do fine work in a role where you help other people to enjoy positive experiences.

E.B. White described how his wife Katherine loved to do such work. In the Introduction to her book Onward and Upward in the Garden, he explains how every year she spent days planning the future work.

She continued this loving ritual even when nearing the end of her days. Below is a piece that E.B. White wrote about Katherine.

As the years went by and age overtook her, there was something comical yet touching in her bedraggled appearance on this awesome occasion - the small, hunched-over figure, her studied absorption in the implausible notion that there would be yet another spring, oblivious to the ending of her own days, which she knew perfectly well was near at hand, sitting there with her detailed (garden) chart under those dark skies in the dying October, calmly planning the resurrection.

Looking ahead, what are the specific kinds of pleasurable work you would like to do in the future? How can you translate this into doing a piece of work or a project?

What are the principles you would like to follow when doing this work? How can you translate these into action? How can you then do your best to get the desired positive results?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Practical Work

What are the kinds of work you do that are practical and perhaps necessary? How can you manage this practical work? How can you maybe find pleasure in doing some of this work?

Different people choose different ways to tackle these tasks. One approach is to take control by being proactive. It is to get ahead of the game by exploring the following themes.

Preparation

*The specific tasks I need to prepare properly for in my life and work are ...
The steps I can take to prepare for these practical tasks are ...*

The specific positive solutions I can find for getting some of these tasks done – such as earning money to pay people to do them or finding other solutions – are ... The specific benefits of taking these steps may be ...

Great workers aim to be proactive. They prepare properly and make sure all the practical tasks get done. This provides the platform for them to perform at their best.

How can you take some of these steps in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Painful Work

What are the kinds of work that you find painful? How can you do less of this work? How can you manage this in the future?

People can find it debilitating to do such work. Some accept it as part of the job; some find ways to manage the painful aspects; some develop healthy or unhealthy coping mechanisms.

Many people try to numb themselves to the pain. They find ways to survive a two-hour daily commute, deal with pointless tasks or cope with a negative culture.

Some find the pain accumulates and expresses itself in different symptoms. Feeling out of control, they experience physical or psychological pain. The pain may spur the person to move on.

They may need help to take this step, however, because it can be challenging: a) to retake control of their lives; b) to regain their confidence; c) to take the practical steps to doing pleasurable work.

Regarding the topic of pain, there is one piece of counter-intuitive advice that is sometimes given to people. This is:

"You may find it helpful to - at some point in your life - take a job that is really painful. Not one that is just boring, because that leaves scope for daydreaming. Take one that scratches your soul."

This sounds crazy, but there is a logic behind the advice. The painful work can stoke the hunger to find satisfying work. People who do work they love often have a sense of gratitude. Looking back on their life, they may say something like the following.

"I feel lucky to do my present job. Sometimes I feel somebody is going to tap me on the shoulder and say:

'Right, your time is up. It's time for you to go back to the place where you came from. This is a great motivator. It inspires me to keep improving in my work.'

John McDermott underlined this point in an article called Why You Should Work A Job You Hate. Here are excerpts from the piece.

I got out before it crushed my soul - and have appreciated every job I've had since. The most important lesson I learned, though, was that the key to professional development is - for a short while, at least - to work a job you hate.

Anyone who believes a dream job doesn't require a sizable amount of work probably lacks the work ethic to excel at any profession, let alone their dream one.

It's best if the job you hate comes early in your career, and even better if your hate-job is the last one you hold before embarking on your passion. Not a job you merely tolerate because it affords you a comfortable living; I mean one so unbearable that not even tripling your salary would assuage your disdain.

A job so bad that you lie awake Sunday nights, racked with dread about the workweek that lies ahead. A job that has the capacity to bring you to the verge of tears while you work at it.

You should work a job you hate so much that you're willing to suffer through any sort of circumstance for a job you enjoy. And until you experience the former, you'll never really understand the value of the latter.

Let's return your own work. How can you find ways to manage any painful aspects of your work? At one point may it become too much? What can you do then to take charge of shaping your future?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Pleasurable Paradox

There are many models for doing fine work. One approach is to learn from athletes who aim to perform at their best in sports.

An athlete may spend ten years working towards their big day in the Olympic Games. How can they approach such an event?

One way is to hype themselves up because they really want to win the prize. This can work, but it can also lead to tightening up.

Another approach is for them to do everything possible to prepare for the event. It is then to follow the principles they believe in to perform at their best both physically and psychologically.

This sometimes calls for seeing the event in perspective. They can define themselves by whether or not they do their best rather than by if they win the prize. The event is important, but their life will go on afterwards.

How can they enter this psychological zone? Sometimes we are at our bravest and do our best work when we have nothing to lose. Bearing this in mind, athletes sometimes pursue the following path.

Prepare as though you have everything to gain.

Perform as though you have nothing to lose.

There is a similar approach to doing pleasurable work. This involves focusing on the following steps.

The Pleasurable Paradox

This sometimes involves the following steps:

To keep giving and helping people to gain

To find that, in the process, you may also gain

The aim is to give to people and help them to succeed. It is important to be savvy, of course, and not become a victim or resentful. One by-product of giving, however, is that you may also gain.

Let's return to your life and work. Looking ahead, what is the kind of pleasurable work you would like to do that may help other people? This could be to help a person or a group of people.

How can you do this pleasurable work? What are the principles you want to follow? How can you encourage yourself on the journey? What will be the benefits – both for other people and yourself?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Dimension Approach

The Positive Dimension

This approach involves enabling people to go through the following stages.

- To go into a positive dimension;
- To learn in the positive dimension;
- To apply what they learned in the positive dimension.

There are many ways to help people. One approach is to offer them experiences that take them into a positive dimension.

People often develop by going into another dimension. They may be exploring, working, listening to music, appreciating beauty, seeing new paradigms or doing another activity. They may then apply what they learned from the experience.

Some workers enable people to go through these steps. They may do this in their work as artists, educators, therapists, coaches or in other roles. They help people to develop by having such experiences.

Looking back, when have you aimed to help people in this way? What did you do to help people to learn from going into a positive dimension? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Positive Dimension In The Past

The specific situation in the past when I aimed to help people to learn by going into a positive dimension was:

The specific things I did then to aim to help people to learn by going into a positive dimension were:

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow similar principles in the future? One model is to build on your strengths – as a person or as a professional - when taking this approach.

You will do this in your own way, of course, but here are some steps it can be useful to consider.

The Positive Dimension

Start by clarifying the topic that the person or the group of people wants to explore. Bearing in mind your strengths, you can then offer people the chance to do the following things.

- To learn from positive models or their own examples of experiencing things from a positive dimension;
- To clarify what they learned or relearned when experiencing things from a positive dimension;
- To choose how they want to apply what they learned or relearned when experiencing things from a positive dimension.

As mentioned, it can be good to use your own strengths when offering people the chance to learn from such experiences. You will then feel on solid ground and be more able to bring things to life with concrete examples.

The work I do has been influenced by many people who enabled others to go into a positive dimension. These were educators, writers, singers and people in all walks of life. They were grounded in reality but lifted people's souls. Such people often aimed:

To study people performing at their best;

To share positive knowledge about people performing at their best;

To share practical tools that people can use to perform at their best.

The following pages describe some ways I tried to build on the lessons passed on by such positive artists.

The Happiness Approach

This section describes an exercise I used in the early 1970s when running five-day courses that encouraged people to build on their strengths. These were mainly held in Scandinavia.

The participants came from all walks of life and were paid for by their employers. There were normally between 24 and 30 people on each course. The first days were devoted to inviting people to do exercises around the following themes.

When do I feel most creative? How can I do more of these things? How can I encourage other people – such as my family members, students or colleagues at work - to do more of things where they feel creative?

What are my personal and professional goals? How can I work towards achieving these goals? How can I help other people to work towards their personal or professional goals?

What gives me encouragement? How can I do more of these things? How can I encourage other people – such as my family members, students or colleagues at work?

What are the challenges I may face in the future? How can I manage these challenges successfully? How can I help other people to manage their challenges successfully?

What can I do to make my best contribution in my work? How can I encourage other people to make their best contributions? What will be the benefits of doing this for them, the workplace and for society?

We then moved on to exploring the topic of happiness. As many people have said, this is often the by-product of following certain principles in your life or work.

People were invited to do an exercise taken from the work of people such as Abraham Maslow. Today the exercise may sound rather basic, but many people found it to be valuable on a personal level.

Later we will look at an exercise that is more professionally focused. Before then, however, here are the instructions for the personal exercise.

Happiness

People are to form groups of three. Each person is to reflect and then go through the following steps. The others in the group are to listen, encourage the person and, if appropriate, ask questions.

Each person is:

- To describe a happy time in their life.

This could have been for a fleeting moment – such as being with their children, walking on the beach, reaching a specific goal or having another experience.

This could also have been for a longer period of time - such as when doing a creative project, being in a certain culture or following certain principles in their life.

- To describe what they did right then - the principles they followed and how they translated these into action - to help to create the happy time.

This is based on the idea that, whilst happiness sometimes just happens to us, there are often things we do to create the conditions for such experiences.

- To describe how they may want to follow these principles in the future.

This gives people the chance to focus on how they can follow similar principles – plus perhaps adding other skills – to maybe experience happiness in the future.

- To draw a picture of themselves in the happy time and also to include the principles they followed to be happy.

People were given one hour in the groups but we found they often wanted longer to do the exercise. Returning to the big group, they put their pictures around the walls and spent time looking at the various posters.

People then moved on to the next stage. This involved individuals clarifying how they could follow their chosen principles in the future.

The Extraordinary Work Approach

Let's move forward thirty years. During the early part of the 2000s I spent five years mentoring for a large software company. This also involved helping people to build superb teams.

The following section describes one occasion when we did this by helping people to go into a positive dimension. The Director of a team contacted me to give the brief. Here is a summary of what he said.

"Our team is excellent, but we want to go a step further. I believe there are some potential opportunities to do work that is extraordinary."

"Bearing this in mind, we have booked a two day workshop at the Training Centre for the Royal National Lifeboat Institution. We want to learn from their work and also add other dimensions.

"During one session we will do the capsized exercise. This involves us being capsized in a safe environment and rescued by the lifeboat crew.

"We would like you to help us to also run sessions on how we can build on our strengths. How can we move from doing work that is excellent to that which is extraordinary?"

The RNLi Capsize Training Centre

The Director and I agreed on the outcomes for the workshop. These were to provide them with practical tools that people could use:

To continue doing excellent work;

To choose two projects where they could build on their strengths and do extraordinary work;

To deliver these projects in ways that created wins for the customers, wins for the colleagues and wins for the company.

During the workshop we would help people to learn from positive models and also from their experience at the RNLI. Before the session they were invited to do some homework. They each presented this during the morning session. Here is the exercise.

Extraordinary Work

We want to continue delivering excellence and also do some extraordinary work. We would therefore like each of you to do the following exercise and present this during the first session.

- To describe a team that you believe did extraordinary work.

This could be a team you were part of or a team you have learned about. It could be in the arts, medicine, sports, business or any field.

It can be useful to give some context regarding the team's background, their work and the results they achieved. This can be presented in a creative way via a flip chart, film or other media.

- To describe the principles the team followed - and how they translated these into action - to do extraordinary work.

This may require some research. For example: What did they do to clarify their goal, clarify their strategy, coordinate their strengths, find solutions to challenges and achieve the goal?

- To describe a specific project where you believe our team can do extraordinary work.

This to be based on your view of the team's strengths and potential contribution. It can also be useful to describe the benefits of doing such work.

We will explore all these ideas and then settle on the projects where we want to do extraordinary work.

The first day began with an introduction to doing extraordinary work. The team members then made their presentations. These were engrossing and we only had time for six of the 12 members to present in the morning.

The afternoon involved people being capsized and rescued from the water. This was followed by a talk from the RNLI about how they aimed to translate their purpose into action.

The team continued with the presentations in the evening. Each person then shared what they had learned or relearned during the sessions. We concluded by agreeing on the specific goals to achieve the second day.

The next day began by listing all the potential projects for doing extraordinary work. The Director invited people to vote on these and this resulted in settling on two projects.

A mission holder was appointed for each project – they actually volunteered - and individuals allocated themselves to the projects. People then went through the normal process of decision making, design and working towards delivery.

The Director was pleased with the planning stage and provided people with the support they needed to do the work. Three months later both projects produced outstanding results and were published as success stories.

Many people in the company rated the work as extraordinary. The team members, however, felt they could have done more. During the next six months several moved on to leadership roles and applied the lessons from their time at the RNLI.

There are many ways to offer people the opportunity of going into a positive dimension. The following section looks at one such approach.

The Positive Memories For Life Approach

This is an approach followed by some people, teams and organisations. They aim:

To create a positive environment ... To do things that generate positive energy ... To offer people positive experiences.

Sometimes this can help to create positive memories for life. Let's explore how different people translate these themes into action.

They Create A Positive Environment

Good encouragers often aim to create a positive environment in which people can grow. They may do this as a parent, friend, educator, leader or in another role.

They make a person feel welcome and the centre of their world. They may, if appropriate, focus on the person's goals. Sometimes they focus on their mutual goals.

Henry Pluckrose, a great educator, created a warm and welcoming atmosphere when working as a head teacher in primary schools. He explained this in the following way.

"We aim to make each child feel welcome because it may be their first interaction with an institution. We invite them to visit us several times before their actual first school day.

"It is vital to recognise each child as an individual rather than as a number in a group. Getting this right can help them to feel at ease and eager to come to school."

Good leaders sometimes aim to create a positive environment in which self-motivated people can do superb work. They then enable people to make their best contributions towards achieving the organisation's goals.

Let's return to your own life or work. Imagine that you want to create a positive environment in the relationship, team or organisations. How can you do this in your own way?

Let's move on to another theme followed by people who sometimes help to create positive memories.

They Do Things That Generate Positive Energy

Good encouragers sometimes do things to generate positive energy. Depending on their role, different people do this in different ways. They may aim, for example:

To encourage a person to talk about what gives them positive energy;

To encourage a person by focusing on their strengths and catching them doing something right;

To encourage a person by inviting them to focus on their positive goals in their personal or professional lives.

Good educators may generate positive energy by focusing on inspiration, implementation and integration. They create an inspiring environment and clarify what people want to learn.

Such educators then pass on implementation tools that people can use in their daily lives or work. They then help people to integrate the learning and achieve their goals.

Let's return to your own life or work. Imagine that you want to do things that generate positive energy in the relationship, team or organisation. How can you do this in your own way?

Let's move on to another theme followed by people who sometimes help to create positive memories.

They Offer People Positive Experiences

Good encouragers aim to offer people positive experiences. They may do this when acting as a parent, educator, coach, chef, designer, leader or in another role.

Different people do this in different ways. The leader of a football club, for example, may describe this in the following way.

"We aim to embody the spirit of the community and offer people enjoyable experiences. We aim to do this with all our stakeholders.

"The main group, of course, are our fans. Whilst we can strive to win trophies, this is not always in our control. Bearing this in mind, we also try to create positive memories for life. These are what many people remember in later years.

"We also have this aim with our other stakeholders. These include our community programmes, youth academy, players and their families, plus all our corporate backers.

"We aim to make our club a force for good in our community and our society."

There are many ways to encourage people in our lives and work. One approach is to do things that help them to take away positive memories for life.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you create a positive environment? How can you generate positive energy? How can you offer the person or the group of people positive experiences? How can you maybe help to them to take away positive memories for life?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Romantic Realist Approach

Romantic realists aim to build on the positive spirit in people. Whilst believing in humanity's possibilities, they are also practical. They show how people can do superb work during their time on the planet.

Such people have steel. They believe in getting the basics right and then adding the brilliance. They do this by encouraging people to build on solid foundations and then flourish.

Romantic realists recognise that it is vital to deliver results –otherwise they will be accused of being woolly and lacking realism. As we have explored elsewhere in the book, they recognise that:

If you are going to be a deviant, you have to over-deliver.

During my early career I met several people who took this path.

Alec Dickson took this approach when creating Voluntary Service Overseas and Community Service Volunteers. Henry Pluckrose did it when leading the much-acclaimed Prior Weston Primary School.

There were also many romantic realists who I learned from but never met. These included Maria Montessori, the pioneering educator; Virginia Satir, the family therapist; Paul Hawken, the business leader and environmentalist; and Anita Roddick, the founder of The Body Shop.

Working with sport teams also revealed that some coaches were romantic realists. They built teams based on character, competence, consistency and creativity.

People worked hard to maintain high standards and then, when appropriate, added that touch of class. Such teams sometimes reached the heights and provided positive memories for life.

Looking back, can you think of a person who was a romantic realist and delivered results? This could have been somebody you knew or have heard about. The person may have worked in education, therapy, business, art or some other field.

What were the characteristics of this person? What did they do to demonstrate some elements of the romantic realism approach? What happened as a result?

Many of the people I met who took this approach were involved with education. They were encouraging but also expected their students to take responsibility.

The following pages describe one educator who took this approach with children at an early age. She followed elements of the romantic realism path in her own way. The piece is rather long, but it shows how she translated these ideas into action.

Sylvia Ashton-Warner – Doing Pioneering Work In Education

Sylvia was a gifted but complex teacher who worked with Māori children in New Zealand from the 1940s onwards. Experts flocked to study her methods for helping children to learn to read and write. She produced excellent results, but had the reputation of being somewhat difficult. So what was the secret of her success?

Sylvia believed in organic reading and writing. Learning must be real. It must start from a person's experience and relate to their world.

Children were then able to learn quickly and, in the process, develop their inner strength. Let's explore how this worked in practise, starting with an example that is based on her best-known book Teacher.

Sylvia calls the children to attention each morning by playing the first eight notes of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

She asks the class to tackle their work, then invites each child to her in turn. Gay is the first child to come to her desk.

Sylvia asks: "What word do you want today?"

Gay replies: "House."

Sylvia writes the word on a piece of cardboard. She then asks Gay to trace the word with her finger and say it out loud. Gay 'owns' the word, it comes from her guts.

Sylvia makes sure that Gay says the word, sees the word and feels it in her body. She gives Gay the cardboard and asks her to keep her 'word' for the day.

Sylvia repeats the process with each child. When the class finishes, she collects all the words on the separate pieces of cardboard.

The next morning Sylvia starts the class by tipping the cardboard words onto the floor. She tells the children:

"Find your word."

Gay leaps from the chair and rummages in the pile.

"House," she shouts, "I have found my word."

Sylvia believed that children have two visions – these are an inner vision and an outer vision. It is the inner vision which burns brightest. Gay grasps the word which she spoke from her inner vision. She owns the word. It is her word.

Sylvia asks each child to choose a partner, speak their words and hear their partner's words. While the children teach each other, she repeats the process of inviting each child to choose their word for today. They build up what Sylvia calls their Key Vocabulary.

What happens if Gay fails to find her word? Sylvia rips-up the piece of cardboard. The word has failed the 'one look' test and cannot have any great meaning for Gay.

Classrooms often display Jack and Jill illustrations for introducing the reading vocabulary to five-year-olds, said Sylvia, but it is a vocabulary chosen by educationalists in Auckland or London.

Gay owns only those words that come from deep within herself. She is more likely to love these words and want to write them on paper.

Shouldn't these Māori children be learning Oxbridge English? Once they know the joy of creating their own words, says Sylvia, they reach out longingly to learn about other cultures. She believes that:

"Reaching out for a book must become an organic action."

Sylvia's recognition that each person has a key vocabulary, a set of words with a special meaning relating to their emotional life, enabled her to develop a reading scheme for children who were otherwise failing at school.

Her methods were controversial at the time – as was some of her behaviour. But her work enabled many people to develop their inner strength and believe in their own experience.

She believed it was vital for children to learn from the wisdom of others. But the best way to stoke a child's hunger to read and write was to focus on the events that made up their daily lives. She wrote:

Back to these first words; to these first books. They must be made out of the stuff of the child itself.

I reach a hand into the mind of the child, bring out a handful of the stuff I find there, and use that as our first working material.

And in this dynamic material, within the familiarity and security of it, the Māori finds that words have intense meaning to him, from which cannot help but arise a love of reading.

For it is here, right in this first word, that the love of reading is born, and the longer his reading is organic the stronger it becomes, until by the time he arrives at the books of the new culture, he receives them as another joy rather than as a labour.

Writing in her book Teacher, Sylvia explained how she helped children to write by inviting them to draw pictures and add their own captions. They built up their words into sentences and create books about their experiences.

Children wrote one word, then two sentences, then three, until six-year-olds were writing half a page a day and seven-year-olds a page or more a day. Sylvia explained the impact of this method.

Children Using Their Key Vocabulary

Sylvia asked the children to use their key words as the basis for building their own stories. She described in the following way.

The drama of these writings could never be captured in a bought book. It could never be achieved in the most faithfully prepared teaching books.

No one book could ever hold the variety of subjects that appears collectively in the infant room each morning.

Moreover, it is written in the language that they use themselves. The books they write are the most dramatic and pathetic and colourful things I've ever seen on pages.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation when you may aim to help people to learn by going into a positive dimension?

You may want to do this when encouraging a person, teaching a class, coaching a team, running a workshop or doing another activity. You may do this when acting as a parent, educator, creative artist, trusted advisor, leader or in another role.

How can you use your strengths to help people to go into a positive dimension? How can you help people to learn in the experience? How can you help them to apply what they learned in their life this in their lives work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Culture Handbook Approach

There are many ways to build a principles driven organisation. This section describes an approach that worked effectively during the Covid lockdown when it was difficult to do off-site workshops.

The approach has since been adapted by other work places. It works best in places where people have already discussed the possibility of building a principles driven organisation.

The example described in this section was driven by the leadership team. It also gave other key people a sense of ownership in shaping the organisation's future. Here is some background to the approach.

The Culture Handbook Approach

This involves the leader and leadership team putting together a Culture Handbook that can be used in the organisation. The handbook describes the principles that people can follow to help the organisation to achieve success.

There are many ways to arrive at such principles. One approach is:

To clarify when people in the organisation have done superb work and delivered success;

To clarify the principles they followed to do superb work and deliver success;

To clarify how they can follow these and other principles – and express these in modern ways – to deliver future success.

There are many ways of communicating these principles to people in an organisation. Before the lockdown one approach was to go through the following steps. It was:

To do workshops with the leadership team to clarify the principles that people could follow to deliver success;

To do workshops with all the employees to communicate the principles and involve them in clarifying how to translate these into action to deliver success;

To follow up by continually publishing success stories that showed how people were following the principles and delivering success.

This approach became more difficult during the lockdown. Bearing this in mind, I used the Culture Handbook approach when a leader asked me to help their organisation to clarify its principles. Let's call it Organisation A.

Here is a precis of the approach that we arrived at as result of our conversations.

Organisation A - The Background To Building A Principles Driven Organisation

The organisation had around 80 people spread in locations across the world. This had both advantages and disadvantages.

The advantages were that it hired high quality employees who could do superb work in the different countries. This enabled it to stand out from its competitors. The disadvantages included it being hard to maintain consistency. It was also sometimes challenging to manage such people.

The leader, who was also the founder, had a charismatic personality. At the beginning this was a strength because they inspired people to do fine work. This proved more difficult as the organisation got bigger and people waited for the leader to make decisions.

The leader and the leadership team wanted people in the organisation: a) to align their efforts to following certain principles; b) to deliver consistently high standards; c) to use their strengths to deliver success.

The leader and I explored how to make this happen. He eventually decided it would be useful for the leadership team to take the following steps:

To build an organisation that was principles driven rather than personality driven;

To focus on managing the principles rather than just managing the people;

To also encourage people to use their strengths to translate the principles into action and deliver ongoing success.

After discussions with the leader and other key people, we embarked on taking the following steps. (Other organisations that I worked with later followed elements of this approach in their own ways.)

The Leader Starts By Putting Together A Provisional Version Of A Culture Handbook

The leader had strong views about the principles people could follow to help the organisation succeed. Whilst it would be important to involve other people, it made sense to begin by getting him to clarify these views.

Bearing this in mind, I invited him to describe what he saw as the organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success. We could then invite others to add to this framework.

The following section provides a summary of his thoughts. (I have described these in generic terms rather than the detailed descriptions he gave.) Here are the main themes.

Purpose

The purpose of our organisation – the specific thing we want to do – is the following.

We want:

To use our strengths to do superb work that helps all our stakeholders to achieve success.

Principles

We want to encourage our people to pursue the following principles in our work:

To Be Professional

To have a positive mindset and behave in a professional way towards both internal and external customers.

To Take Ownership And Focus On Outcomes

To take ownership for doing things and keep focusing on the outcomes to achieve.

To Help Our Customers To Succeed

To provide great service and pass on knowledge in ways that help our customers to succeed.

To Stay Healthy And Keep Developing

To maintain our wellbeing and continue to keep developing as people and as professionals

The Picture Of Success

The specific goals we want to achieve by ... are:

To achieve £... in terms of profit.

To achieve a rating of ... in terms of customer satisfaction.

To achieve a rating of ... in terms of employee satisfaction.

The leader and I had three virtual sessions which involved crafting these themes to his satisfaction. He also shared some of his early thoughts with three people close to him in the leadership team. We then moved on to the next stage.

The Leader Involves The Wider Leadership Team In Adding To The Cultural Handbook

The leader invited the wider leadership team to add their ideas to the handbook. This involved ten people who had senior roles.

He began by sending out the following email people. This was followed by having a virtual workshop conducted by himself and his two closest colleagues. Here is the email he sent to people.

Building A Principles Driven Organisation

As you know, for some time we have been talking about the idea of making sure we build a principles driven organisation.

Bearing this in mind, I have had a first go at writing what I believe may be our purpose, principles and picture of success.

This can form the basis for creating a Culture Handbook that we can use as a guiding compass for our work.

I have based the principles on the guidelines we seem to follow when we do superb work.

There may, of course, be many more principles. But I wanted to focus on the core ones we seem to follow.

I would like you to look at what I have written and then to do the following things:

To see if you think the purpose, principles and picture of success embody some of the things we do as an organisation;

To give your suggestions regarding what you believe could be added to the provisional draft.

We will then have a virtual workshop where we can build on these ideas.

The next step will be to share these principles with people in the organisation. When doing this, it will be useful:

To explain how the principles have been built on when people in the organisation have performed superbly;

To describe the principles we would like people to follow – together with the reasons for these - to increase the chances of success;

To invite people to flesh out the principles plus describe how they think we can translate these into action.

Before then I would like your ideas for adding to the purpose, principles and picture of success. If possible, get your ideas back to me within the next week.

We will then have a virtual workshop to agree on the final version of the principles. Thanks in advance for your ideas.

The wider leadership team members responded with their ideas. Many of these mirrored the principles outlined by the leader – though there were some slight differences on wording.

The principle that created the most debate was that around people staying healthy. One person responded to this in the following way.

"If we are serious about people's wellbeing, it will be important to study organisations where they have made this work successfully.

"We rely on many people who are dutiful in carrying out their work. Sometimes they pay a price for being so conscientious.

"We may need to find ways that enable them to work in smart ways whilst also taking care of the wellbeing."

The wider leadership team workshop proved successful. After a short introduction, each person gave their views about the principles.

They were in broad agreement about the key themes, though some wanted to go into more detail. The leader suggested that this could be done in small groups.

Bearing this in mind, people formed four groups. Each of these focused on one of the principles. They then aimed:

To give concrete examples of when people had followed these principles successfully in the past;

To give concrete examples of how people could follow these principles in the future;

To give concrete examples of the support people would need to be able to follow the principles successfully.

Each sub-group presented their ideas back to the whole group. After some discussion, the leader said they would work with two other people to complete the next draft of the Culture Handbook.

The wider leadership team then explored how to present the principles to everybody in the company. This would take the form of an All-Hands Meeting being followed up by regional sessions in each of the locations.

Originally the leader saw it as his role to introduce the session and take people through the principles. This changed at the end of the wider leadership team session.

The sub-groups suggested they each take responsibility for introducing the specific principle they had worked on. Whilst the leader could introduce the session, it would help to show how the leadership team were supporting each of the principles.

The leader liked this idea. He also suggested that, if appropriate, I could offer people a framework they could use when introducing the principles to their people. This led to doing some work with each of the sub-groups.

We focused on how we could bring the principles to life in a way that resonated with people. The aim would be that, after presenting the principles, people in the organisation would be saying things like:

"This is us. We recognise ourselves and we want to follow these principles."

"We also believe the organisation is serious about supporting us in following these principles to achieve success."

The wider leadership team had another virtual meeting where they practiced presenting the principles to their people. They were then ready to move on to the next stage.

The Wider Leadership Team Introduce The Principles To People Across The Whole Organisation

The wider leadership team did this in the following stages. The leader kicked off the process by writing an email to everybody in the organisation.

This mirrored several of the themes he outlined in his original note to the wider leadership team. Here is a summary of what he wrote.

The Next All-Hands Meeting

During our All-Hands Meetings we have sometimes highlighted the principles that people in our organisation have followed to do superb work. Looking ahead, it will be important:

To build on these principles to shape a successful future;

To encourage our people to build on their strengths to follow these principles and translate these into action;

To give our people the support they need to follow the principles and achieve success.

Bearing this in mind, the leadership team and I have put together a provisional draft for a Culture Handbook. This describes our organisation's purpose, principles and picture of success.

The purpose of our organisation will continue to be: 'To use our strengths to do superb work that helps all our stakeholders to achieve success'.

The principles will be similar to those that we follow to deliver success. Though the way we express these may evolve because of modern technology and other events.

The picture of success will also evolve as we continue to develop as an organisation.

The next All-Hands Meeting will take the following format.

I will kick-off the session and give an introduction to the reasons why it is important to continue to build a principles driven organisation.

This will be followed by members of the leadership team introducing each of the principles in turn. When doing so they will aim:

To describe real-life examples of when people have followed this principle in the past;

To describe the reasons why it will be important to follow this principle in the future and how it can be translated into action;

To describe how we as an organisation will support you in aiming to follow this principle successfully.

We hope that you recognise yourselves in some of the principles. We also hope that you will feel able to use your own strengths to translate these into action.

We will follow-up the All-Hands Meeting with smaller sessions in your locations. During these sessions we would like your feedback on the following themes:

- a) What you like about the principles;*
- b) What you would like to see added to them;*
- c) What concerns and questions you may have about them;*
- d) What you would like to do in your part of the organisation to translate these principles into action.*

We will then aim to incorporate some of these ideas into what will become the organisation's Culture Handbook.

This will be something that you can use, for example, when recruiting people. You can clarify to what extent you believe that a person will use their strengths to follow the principles and deliver success.

We will follow up the local sessions with producing success stories that show how we are translating the principles into action. This will be something we do on a regular basis to maintain the momentum.

I hope this gives you some background and the reasons for continuing to build a principles driven organisation. I look forward to seeing you at the All-Hands Meeting.

The All-Hands Meeting went well. Like many virtual meetings it had its limitations, but most people enjoyed the session.

The leader started by referring to the organisation's purpose and gave examples of when people had helped both customers and colleagues. He also referred to the organisation's picture of success.

The leader emphasised, however, that it was important to follow certain principles in order to achieve sustainable success. He then handed over to members of the leadership team who introduced each of the principles to the wider organisation.

The leaders brought the principles to life by giving examples of when people had translated these into action. This was accompanied by photographs and other illustrations of the people.

During the session there were some written comments from the wider audience. These were mostly complementary or humorous. There were also questions about the extent to which the organisation was serious about following the principles.

The All-Hands Meeting was followed-up by local sessions. As outlined in the email from the leader, this focused on certain themes

People were encouraged to describe: the things they liked about the principles; the things they would like to see added; the concerns and questions they had; the specific things they could do to translate the principles into action.

These sessions were led by members of the wider leadership team. Before conducting them, however, they were given tips. It would be important:

To create a positive environment in which people were encouraged to share their ideas;

To recognise that people would demonstrate their normal personalities – some would be positive, some would be positive/neutral, some may not be positive;

To, if any negative comments emerged, invite people to describe the positive things they would like to see happen instead.

The local sessions produced many ideas that were fed back to the leadership team. Some were then incorporated into the final version of the Culture Handbook. This led to the next stage in the process.

The Organisation Publishes Success Stories That Highlight People Following The Principles Outlined In The Cultural Handbook

The leadership team were pleased by the response from most people in the organisation. They then took several steps to increase the chances of success.

The leader hired a writer to produce the Culture Handbook that captured the essence of the organisation. A version of this was given to people who joined the organisation.

The leader appointed a Mission Holder who ensured the organisation kept publishing success stories. These highlighted how people had translated the principles into action.

The leadership team members started every All-Hands Meeting by reminding people of the organisation's purpose and picture of success. They also gave examples of people following the principles.

Since the end of lockdown the organisation had had several off-sites. These have included customers sharing stories about how the organisation has helped them to reach the goals. This has encouraged people to continue to follow the principles and achieve success.

The Culture Handbook approach is one that can be used as a Trojan Horse for helping people and organisations to develop. Here is the framework for a version that can be given to new joiners. You will, of course, have your own approach to building a principles driven organisation.

The Culture Handbook

The Principles We Want To Follow In Our Organisation

Introduction

Welcome to our organisation. This handbook gives an introduction to our purpose and the principles we aim to follow. It also describes the goals we want to achieve - the organisation's picture of success.

It can be useful to read the handbook and see how people have translated these principles into action. We have tried to bring these to life with real examples and illustrations.

You can then meet with your manager. Bearing in mind your strengths, you can clarify how you can make your best contribution towards achieving the picture of success.

The Managing Your Obsessions Approach

Great workers are often obsessed by doing certain things. They may feel compelled to encourage people, play the piano, climb mountains, solve certain kinds of problems or do other activities.

Such workers often have a different kind of OCD in the areas where they excel. They have obsessive compulsive discipline. They like to feel in control and follow certain disciplines to do great work.

Imagine that you have some obsessions that you want to channel in a positive way. One approach is to recognise, manage and make good use of the obsessions. Let's explore these themes.

Recognising Your Obsessions

What are your obsessions? What do you keep thinking about? What are the things you find fascinating? What are the things that you cannot help but do? What do you feel compelled to focus on?

People who do creative work often follow certain obsessions. They may be obsessed by designing gardens, solving maths problems, finding medical cures, renovating houses or doing other activities. They then follow certain routines to translate these into action.

Such people like to feel in control. They may do this by being obsessive about following certain habits in their daily lives. They like to follow consistent patterns and make things as predictable as possible.

Some people have obsessions they channel in a positive way. Some may have obsessions that create challenges. This leads to the next theme.

Managing Your Obsessions

Imagine that you have recognised some of your obsessions. How can you manage these in a positive way? People sometimes need to go through the following stages to make this happen. They need:

To manage their obsessions rather than let their obsessions manage them;

To recognise the potential pluses and minuses of their obsessions – both for themselves and other people;

To find ways to build on the pluses and minimise the minuses of their obsessions.

Great workers often follow their chosen strategies for managing their obsessions. Some do this in a structured and systematic way that enables them to focus. Such an approach can have both pluses and minuses.

The pluses may be:

They stay ahead of the game ... They are fully prepared ... They know some areas in great detail ... They get things done effectively ... They follow a predictable rhythm ... They anticipate future scenarios ... They perform superb work and get a sense of satisfaction.

The potential minuses may be:

They may appear anti-social when doing their work ... They may appear odd ... They may behave in ways that affects others ... They may have blind spots.

A person with a creative drive, for example, may learn to manage these pluses and minuses. One approach is to organise their days so that: a) they can give quality time to their loved ones; b) they can spend quality time pursuing their obsession.

Different people build on the pluses and manage the minuses in different ways. Let's look at one example.

Eric had an engineering background and was driven to make things work properly. This had both pluses and minuses. He expressed these in the following way.

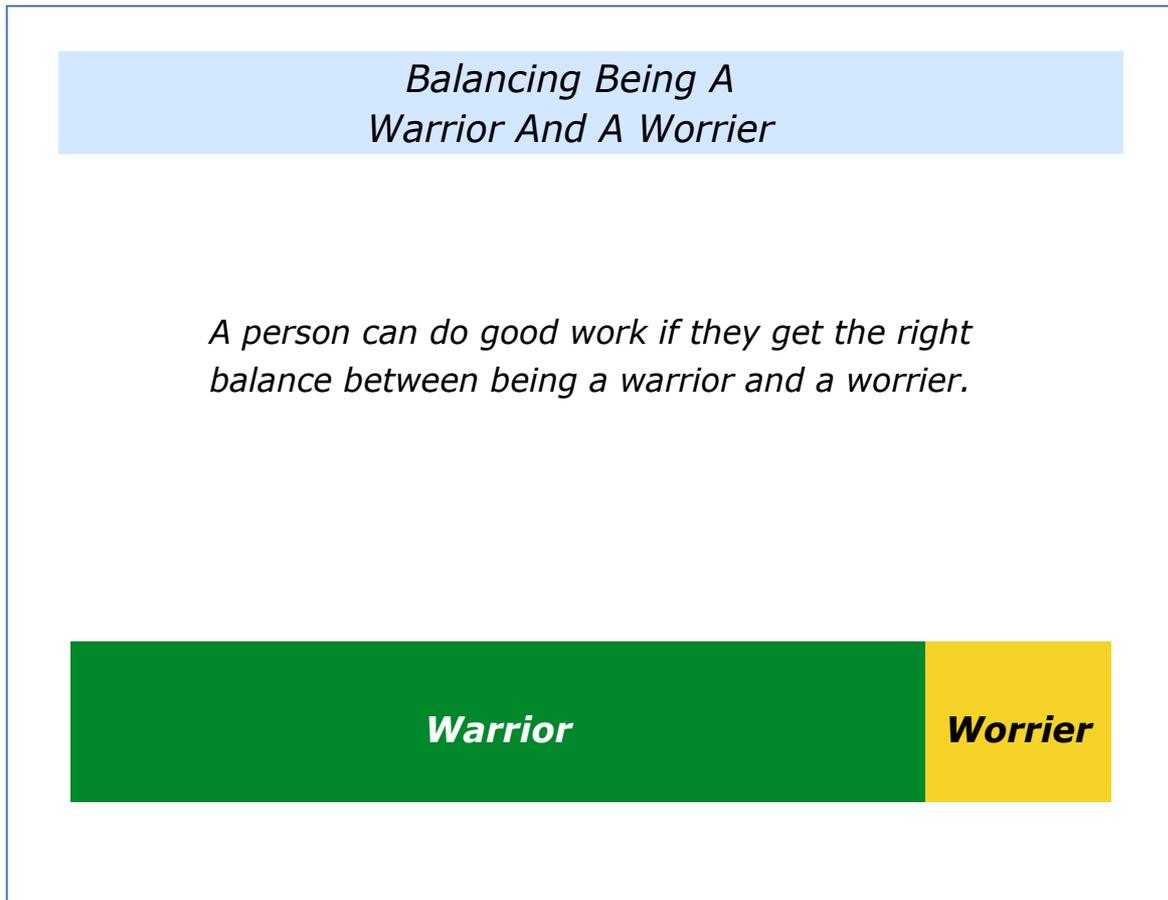

"I strive for perfection. Whilst this is a great driver, it also has a downside. I love to make things work properly, but I also spend a lot of time worrying.

"How can I stop worrying? Sometimes I worry so much that I begin to feel negative. This can affect both me and other people."

Eric and I explored how he could build on the pluses of his approach. His drive for perfection was a great motivator. He focused on things he was passionate about, prepared properly and absorbed himself in his chosen projects.

The people Eric worked with – his company, colleagues and customers – saw him as an expert. They respected his drive and desire to constantly improve.

Eric could build on these qualities, but he also needed to find ways to manage his worrying. Bearing this in mind, we focused on how he could balance being a warrior and a worrier.

Great workers get the right balance between being warriors and worriers. Being sensitive to issues, they use worry as a drive to fix problems, improve things or work towards achieving perfection. Sometimes the balance can get out of kilter, however, and can cause problems.

As mentioned earlier, however, the key is to get the right balance. If you are a warrior to 90% and a worrier to 10%, you may channel these feelings in a positive way. If you worry to a greater extent, you may seize up and not do anything.

Eric and I explored ways that he could accept his personality. He would always be a perfectionist. But it was also important to accept that sometimes perfection was not possible.

We therefore focused on: a) the specific activities where he could pursue his drive for perfection; b) the specific activities where perfection may not be possible.

He wanted to feel in control. We therefore explored how he could feel in control in each of these activities. Sometimes this involved accepting that he had done his best but some things were beyond his control.

Eric began to pursue this approach and, even though it was hard at first, he found it helped to retain his sanity. He then continued to use his strengths to perform superb work.

Making Good Use Of Your Obsessions

Imagine that you have learned how to recognise and manage some of your obsessions. One approach is to then move on to making good use of these traits. Let's look at one example.

Karen was a brilliant leader of a national chain of supermarkets. She was obsessed by quality and making sure that people got things right. This had pluses and minuses – both for herself and other people.

Always obsessed by retail, Karen had started as a shelf stacker. She loved to make lists, cross off the items and get a sense of satisfaction. This served her well as she rose through the ranks.

At a certain point, however, Karen needed to learn how to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. She had an eye for detail, however, so this provided to be a challenge. She expressed this in the following way.

"When working as a store manager, I got into the store two hours before everybody else. After organising my day, I then walked the store to make sure everything looked perfect."

"I still have this habit when in other supermarkets. I find myself pulling the tins forward so they are flush with the edge of the shelf."

Karen was obsessed by maintaining quality standards. At the same time, she wanted to her staff to proactively deliver these standards without her resorting to micromanagement.

How to take this step? Karen and I took her staff through an exercise that focused on the following theme.

Being Obsessed With Quality

Great workers are often obsessed with quality and see things quickly in their area of brilliance. They have what is called personal radar and scan situations to see patterns. They then extrapolate these patterns to see the possible consequences.

Each person has good radar in specific areas but bad radar in others. Is it possible to improve their radar? Providing they have some feeling for the activity, the answer is 'Yes'.

Karen had good radar regarding retail but worried that her people did not see what she saw. Bearing this in mind, we adapted an old exercise that encouraged the staff to focus on quality and become more customer focused.

Here is a description of the steps we took. It is an exercise that can be adapted to many situations.

The Post-it Note Exercise

Karen gathered a group of staff members and met with them several hundred yards away from the supermarket. She then gave people the following instructions.

We are going to walk towards our store. The customers would be coming in their cars. I want you to see the journey through their eyes.

We will go into to the car park and then walk through the store. Here is what I want you to do when going through this journey.

You each have three different coloured bundles of Post-it Notes - Green, Red and Blue.

As we approach and then walk through the supermarket, I want you to write what you see and your impressions. I want you to describe the following things on the different coloured Post-its.

Green Post-its

Write every positive impression you get about the company or the good things you may see if you are a customer.

Describe the specific things we can do to keep improving these things.

Red Post-its

Write every negative impression you get or a thing that needs to be fixed.

Describe the specific thing that can be done to improve these things.

Blue Post-its

Write every other idea you have about what could be done to improve the experience.

Write one idea per Post-it . But you can write as many Post-it Notes as you wish.

We will then meet together, theme the topics and consider the suggestions for improvement.

The next steps will be to implement some of the actions, get quick successes and keep improving.

Karen and the staff started out on the journey. This took approximately an hour and people made stacks of notes. They then met together and agreed on the ways forward.

As could be predicted, Karen saw many more things than some of the staff. She later presented these in a positive way, however, and it helped to open people's eyes to seeing things in a different way.

The exercise was repeated with all the staff and led by other managers rather than Karen. This led to many more people becoming obsessed by quality and improving the stores.

Let's return to your life and work. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on these theme.

First, describe a specific thing that you may be obsessed by. Second, describe the potential pluses and minuses of this obsession. Third, describe how you can build on the pluses and manage any minuses when following this obsession.

The Gumption Approach

There are many ways to do fine work. One approach is for a person to focus on the specific activities where they have gumption and can to apply their gifts to do great work.

Imagine that you want to follow this approach in your own way. Let's explore these themes.

Gumption

There are several definitions for gumption. These include people having common sense, courage and the competence required to deliver the goods. Here are some definitions.

Gumption is the ability to decide what is the best thing to do in a particular situation and then to do it with energy and determination.

It means bravery, get-up-and-go, drive or initiative. Someone who possesses gumption is a self-starter and has the nerve and motivation to succeed.

It was originally a Scottish term that meant having common sense or being shrewd. It is the ability to decide what is the best thing to do in a particular situation and then to do it with energy and determination.

However, this current definition of gumption didn't arise until the nineteenth century. Before that time, gumption was a Scottish term and meant having street smarts or common sense, or being shrewd.

Some people have gumption – common sense and savvy - in certain areas but not in others. A person may have developed this through their natural feeling for an activity and also learning through experience.

What are the specific activities where you demonstrate gumption? Here are some answers that people give to this question.

Gumption – I Demonstrate Gumption When I Am:

Helping recovering alcoholics ... Buying and selling antiques ... Being a chef in a Michelin Star restaurant ... Managing certain kinds of crises ... Playing in a particular position in a football team ... Mentoring leaders in pioneering companies.

Clarifying a specific activity where you have gumption is a good starting point. It can then be useful to clarify whether you have the ability to do superb work in this area. Let's explore this theme.

Gifts

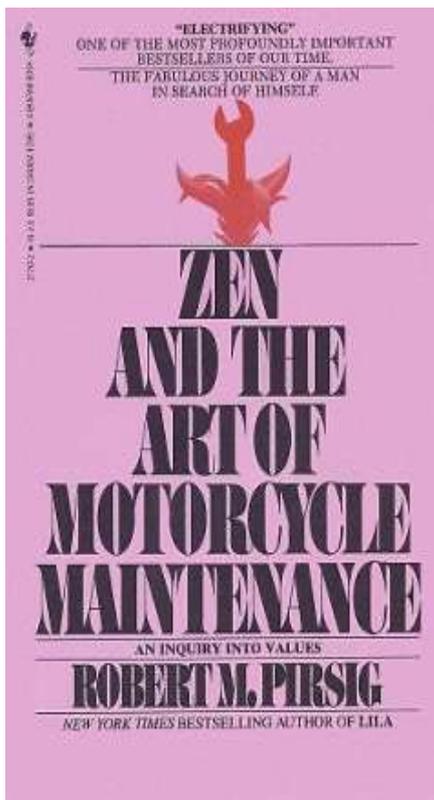

Gumption can help you to do several things. First, to see what is happening in a situation. Second, to clarify the desired results; c) to clarify the strategy you can follow to achieve success.

Great workers sometimes also possess another quality. They have strengths they can apply in the specific situation to achieve success.

What are the activities where you have both the gumption and gifts to do superb work? This may be when doing certain kinds of work with certain kinds of people in certain situations.

Robert Pirsig referred to both gumption and gifts in his book Zen Art Of Motorcycle Maintenance. He saw the word gumption as synonymous with quality. Here are some quotes from the book. (Pirsig used 'he' to refer to both male and female.)

I like the word 'gumption' because it's so homely and so forlorn and so out of style it looks as if it needs a friend and isn't likely to reject anyone who comes along. I like it also because it describes exactly what happens to someone who connects with Quality. He gets filled with gumption.

A person filled with gumption doesn't sit around dissipating and stewing about things.

He's at the front of the train of his own awareness, watching to see what's up the track and meeting it when it comes. That's gumption.

If you're going to repair a motorcycle, an adequate supply of gumption is the first and most important tool.

If you haven't got that you might as well gather up all the other tools and put them away, because they won't do you any good.

Great Work

Some people apply their gumption and gifts to do great work. Different people do great work. Different people do this in different ways.

Nick Offerman, the actor and author, wrote Gumption: Relight the Torch of Freedom with America's Gutsiest Troublemakers. In it he pays homage to some of his personal heroes and heroines who showed gumption.

The book describes well-known figures such as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, Eleanor Roosevelt and Yoko Ono. It also provides insights into the work done by artisans, farmers and others who pursue their calling. Here are some quotes from Nick.

I am always hugely inspired (and personally relieved) to learn of the hard work that was required of any of my heroes before they could arrive at the level of mastery for which they ultimately garnered renown.

Part of what defines gumption involves a willingness, even a hunger, for one's mettle to be challenged. Far and away the best prize that life has to offer is the chance to work hard at work worth doing.

Find out what makes you kinder, what opens you up and brings out the most loving, generous, and unafraid version of you - and go after those things as if nothing else matters. Because, actually, nothing else does.

Today there are websites that describe how people can demonstrate gumption. Some tell the stories of real-life individuals, campaigners, artists, entrepreneurs and pioneers we can learn from.

Some describe famous or fictional characters who have demonstrated gumption. Here is an excerpt from the Only Good Movies Blog which describes films in which women show gumption.

These movies are perfect for anyone looking to be entertained by tales of strong and independent females. From gun-toting cowgirls to determined cotton farmers, this list covers a wide range of genres and time periods.

But they all have one thing in common: the men take a backseat to the women, and the estrogen will flow like a raging river.

Erin Brockovich (2000)

Julia Roberts captured a Best Actress Oscar for her portrayal of real-life figure Erin Brockovich, a single mom who gets a job as a file clerk at a lawyer's office and ends up discovering a massive cover-up involving Pacific Gas and Electric.

Miss Potter (2006)

Renee Zellweger stars as Beatrix Potter, the author of such children's stories as Peter Rabbit. A strong-willed woman, she starts her career as an author, defies her parents when it comes to marriage, and eventually begins buying up property to help preserve nature.

9 to 5 (1980)

Sick and tired of their sexist boss (Dabney Coleman), a trio of female employees (Dolly Parton, Lily Tomlin and Jane Fonda) decide to give him a taste of his own medicine.

Crouching Tiger, Hidden Dragon (2000)

Directed by Ang Lee, this international production features lots of eye-popping fight sequences and wire work, but none is more impressive than the showdown between Yu Shu Lien (Michelle Yeoh) and Jen (Zhang Ziyi), two martial arts masters with plenty of issues to work out.

Million Dollar Baby (2004)

Hillary Swank won her second Oscar for playing Margareth Fitzgerald, a scrappy waitress who leaves her Missouri hometown and heads to Los Angeles to become a professional boxer.

Norma Rae (1979)

Sally Field won a Best Actress Oscar for her portrayal of a factory worker in Alabama who becomes involved with the struggle to bring in a labor union. Based on the real-life tale of Crystal Lee Sutton.

A key question is: "Is it possible to develop gumption?" The answer is yes, but this comes with several provisos.

A person must have the right attitude and want to learn. They must also have some natural ability in the specific activity.

Let's assume that they meet these conditions. They can then follow the classic steps that people often take when learning about a topic.

Developing Gumption – A Person Can Aim:

To clarify the specific activity where they want to improve and to study good practice – what works – in this activity;

To clarify the strategy they want to follow, perform superb work and do their best to achieve their goals when doing the activity;

To clarify what they have learned and how they can apply this knowledge in the future when doing the activity.

Let's return to your own work. What may be the specific activity where you have the ability to follow the gumption approach? What are the specific things you can do to follow this approach when doing this activity? What may happen as a result of taking these steps?

The Great Days, Good Days And Grunt Days Approach

Great days are when you fly and feel exhilarated. Good days are when you do fine work and feel satisfied. Grunt days are when you feel as if you are just doing grunt work.

Great workers keep doing their best during each kind of day. They also ask:

"How can I turn a grunt day into a good day and a good day into a great day?"

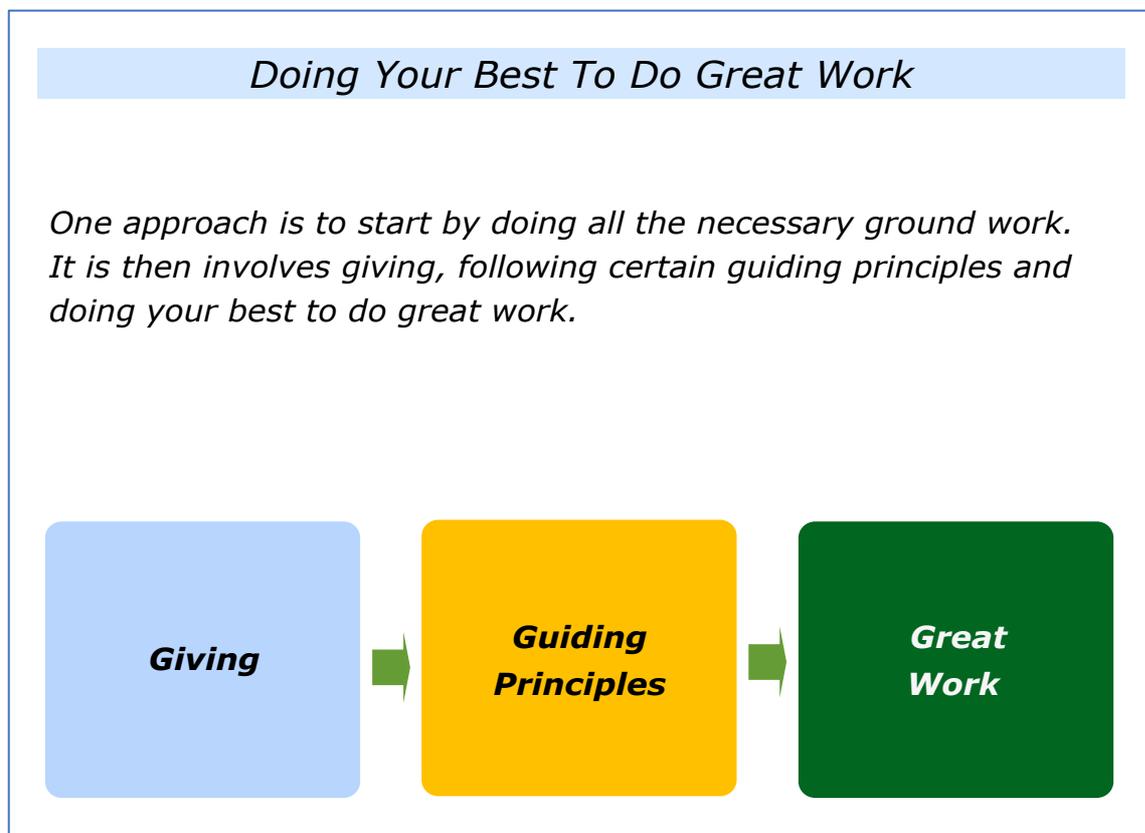

Different people follow different principles to make this happen. Let's explore some of these possibilities.

Great Days

Can you remember when you enjoyed a great day in your work? Perhaps you were immersed in writing, solving a problem, building a house or doing another activity. You felt alive, alert and able to do fulfilling work.

What did you do right to create such a day? What were the principles you followed? How did you translate these into action? How can you follow similar principles in the future?

There are many models for creating such days. One approach is to go through the following stages.

Imagine that you want to work on a particular day. You may aim to run a mentoring session, facilitate a workshop, do a creative project, renovate a house, mediate between warring parties or do another activity.

Groundwork

The first step will be to do all the groundwork. This will involve preparing properly, doing the necessary research and identifying the results to achieve. It will then involve clarifying and rehearsing the key strategies you can follow to achieve success.

Giving

This will involve clicking into action, being fully present and giving everything to serve the work. It can mean using your strengths to serve a purpose, serve a vocation or serve a person. The aim is to give your best to achieve the desired picture of success.

Guiding Principles

The next step will be to focus on your guiding principles. These may be certain Dos and Don'ts you believe in following. You can keep focusing on these principles to perform superb work, keep improving and working towards the picture of success.

Great Work

You will keep doing good work and sometimes go further. This may mean making a creative breakthrough, adding a touch of class or going into another dimension. You may then add something special and perform great work.

Imagine you want to create a great day in your work. You may aim to encourage people, work on a creative project, perform a series of tasks, help customers or do other activities.

How can you prepare the ground properly? How can you give everything to the work? How can you follow your guiding principles? How can you do your best to perform great work?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The specific things I can do to do my best to create such a great day are:

The specific things that may happen as a result of taking these steps may be:

Good Days

When do you feel you have had a good day in your work? The answers you give will depend on several factors. These may include:

The specific kind of work you do;

The specific things you find rewarding in the work;

The satisfaction you get from doing this work on a specific day.

You will have your own definition of such a day. This may depend on whether you work as a writer, counsellor, teacher, paramedic, bomb disposal expert or in another role. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme.

Good Days

*I feel I have had a good

 I have ...*

 I have ...*

 I have ...*

Great workers follow certain rituals to increase their chances of doing good work. They pursue these habits without thinking. They reserve their thinking power for doing creative work, tackling challenges and finding solutions.

Mason Currey described how creative people apply elements of this approach in his books Daily Rituals: How Artists Work and Daily Rituals: Women At Work.

Here is an excerpt from what Mason says about Maya Angelou. This is followed by other examples from the books.

For many years, Angelou worked in hotel or motel rooms, the more anonymous the better. In 1983 she told an interviewer:

"I keep a hotel room in which I do my work – a tiny, mean room with just a bed, and sometimes, if I can find it, a face basin. I keep a dictionary, a bible, a deck of cards and a bottle of sherry in the room.

"I try to get there around 7, and I work until 2 in the afternoon. If the work is going badly, I stay until 12.30. If it's going well, I'll stay as long as it is going well. It's lonely, and it's marvellous."

Descartes liked to linger in bed, his mind wandering in sleep through woods, gardens, and enchanted palaces where he experienced 'every pleasure imaginable'.

George Gershwin worked for twelve hours a day from late morning to midnight, composing at the piano in pyjamas, bathrobe and slippers. Igor Stravinsky was never able to compose unless he was sure no one could hear him and, when blocked, stood on his head to clear the brain.

Barbara Hepworth sculpted outdoors, Janet Frame wore earmuffs as she worked to block out noise. Kate Chopin wrote with her six children 'swarming around her' whereas the artist Rosa Bonheur filled her bedroom with the sixty birds that inspired her work.

Louisa May Alcott wrote so vigorously - skipping sleep and meals - that she had to learn to write with her left hand to give her cramped right hand a break.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of situation where you would like to create good days when doing certain kinds of work? How can you plan ahead and prepare properly? How can you organise your time in blocks so you can do deep work?

How can follow your chosen rhythm? How can you build in times for rest and recovery? How can you be relaxed but relentless? How can you do your best to perform good work?

If you wish, try the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Grunt Days

When do you have grunt days in your work? You may, for example, be working through a list of tasks. This can sometimes seem formidable. Let's explore how you can encourage yourself on the journey.

People want to see a connection between their daily tasks and their life goals. So you may ask:

What are my life goals? How will today's work contribute to me achieving the picture of success?

Sometimes you will need to be creative when exploring these questions, but it is important to find a connection. Doing so can bring a sense of meaning to each day. Here are some ideas it may be worth considering when doing the grunt work.

Doing The Grunt Work On The Way Towards Doing Great Work

- You can start by clarifying the long-term goal – the picture of success.

It is important to work towards something worthwhile. Start by clarifying what you want to achieve by a certain date and translate this into a clear picture of success.

- You can make a road map for working towards the picture of success.

Describe the specific things you want to achieve by certain dates on the journey. Translate this into a clear action plan.

- You can do the grunt work on the way towards achieving the picture of success.

You can aim to play to your strengths when doing the work and, if possible, get help with the other aspects of the work.

- You can encourage yourself on the journey.

You can follow your preferred way of working, take regular breaks, set short-term goals and get a feeling of success.

- You can keep working towards achieving the long-term picture of success.

Keep getting successes on the journey. You can then do your best to achieve the long-term picture of success.

Some people manage the grunt work by using positive reframing. They may reframe it as a chance to add certain skills or give themselves time to think. (I took the latter approach when working in factories for six years.)

Alexander Solzhenitsyn highlighted these themes in his book One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich. He describes how Ivan Denisovich Shukhov, who is serving a ten-year sentence in the Gulag, takes pride in his daily work. This is how several commentators described Shukov's approach.

He acts under a moral code that allows him to continue to respect himself. He no longer thinks much of home or freedom but instead thinks about that day, taking pride in his work as a mason.

In working hard at his masonry and taking pride in building a good, strong, straight wall, he is in effect subverting the prison authorities who seek to punish him by making him work.

Shukhov, instead, is gaining self-esteem by learning a new skill in prison and making his actions meaningful to himself.

He finds a sort of freedom through work because he is no longer working for the authorities but for himself.

He even wants to carry on building when the signal for the end of the day sounds.

Let's assume you reframe the situation and make the best of the grunt day. You can start by finding a larger meaning in your work – for yourself or for other people – and then set your goals for the day.

Break down the day into chunks. Get an early success and build in time to reenergise yourself at points during the day. Encourage yourself by ticking items as you complete them along the way.

Taking a break, you can again refocus on your lifetime picture of success and then plunge back into the work. Looking back at the end of the day, you may feel almost exhilarated.

Sounds odd? Perhaps, but like Shukhov you may have beaten the system. The grunt day may even get a 7/10.

The Setbacks As A Springboard To Success Approach

Setbacks As A Springboard To Success

Some people see setbacks as an opportunity to take stock, to explore their potential future strategies and then to work towards a new compelling picture of success.

Everybody has both successes and setbacks. Some people build on the successes. They also use the setbacks as a springboard to achieving future success.

Such people deal with the latter part in different ways. Some take the following approach:

They take time to reflect, recover and manage the emotions involved with the setback;

They begin to see the setback as an opportunity to take stock and consider their potential future strategies;

They then use the setback as a springboard towards achieving a new compelling picture of success.

A person in the 60s may find their job terminated with little hope of another full-time role. They may reframe this as an opportunity to provide specialist help to decision makers in their network who want experienced people to do certain projects.

A young football player may be discarded by their club or suffer a career-ending injury. They may reframe this as an opportunity to become a coach or provide advisory services for young players who find their dreams have been dashed.

A person with a harmful addiction may have a traumatic experience. This leads them to making a decision: "Do I want to live longer? Or do I want to continue with my addictions and die soon?" They may choose to see this as an opportunity to live a healthier life.

A couple may try for years to have a child. This becomes emotionally draining and challenging. After a number of years, however, they decide to reframe it as an opportunity to adopt children and provide them with a loving home and family.

A company that hits the rocks may see it as an opportunity to shape a better future. They may return to doing what they do best with the customers with whom they work best. They may then build a company that creates wins for all its stakeholders.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you used a setback as a springboard for achieving future success? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

What did you do then to reflect, recover and explore the future opportunities? What did you do to pursue your chosen path? How did you do your best to achieve future success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Setbacks As A Springboard To Success In The Past

*The specific situation in the past when
I used a setback as a springboard to achieving future success was:*

The specific things I did to use the setback as a springboard to achieving success were:

The specific things that happened as a result of taking these steps were:

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may use a setback as springboard towards achieving future success? How can you channel your energy in this way?

You will follow your chosen approach to making this happen. If appropriate, however, you may want to pursue some of the following steps in your own way.

You can take time to reflect, recover and manage the emotions involved with the setback

Different people choose different ways to deal with setbacks. Each approach may have both pluses and minuses. It can be helpful for a person to act in a way that works for them and other people.

Some individuals choose to leap into action. This may be necessary to prevent further problems or shape a better future. Sometimes a person may simply do something that provides a distraction from the pain.

Some individuals use other ways to manage the emotions. They may sleep, talk with friends or go deep into themselves. Some may fall into a downward spiral. Some may begin to recover and gain strength.

Some individuals may feel down. They may recognise, however, that they need to do something to change the feeling. They may therefore do something that they know will give them positive energy.

Some individuals may take time to reflect on the setback. They may aim: a) to clarify what they did well; b) to clarify what they could have done better; c) to clarify the lessons learned and how to apply these in the future.

Imagine that you have gone through some of these steps in your own way. It may then be time to move on to the next stage.

You can begin to see the setback as an opportunity to take stock and consider your potential future strategies

Different people see the world in different ways. This also influences the way they see and deal with setbacks.

Some individuals are positive but realistic. They prepare, plan ahead and do their best. But they also realise there will be both delights and disappointments.

Such a person may take time to recover from a shock. After a while, however, they may take stock and begin to explore some of the following themes.

What can I do in the future? Are there any ways that I can use this setback as an opportunity? What are my assets? How can I take charge of shaping my future?

Looking ahead, how can I build on my strengths? What are the possible routes I can follow? What may be some of the potential opportunities? How could I pursue these possibilities?

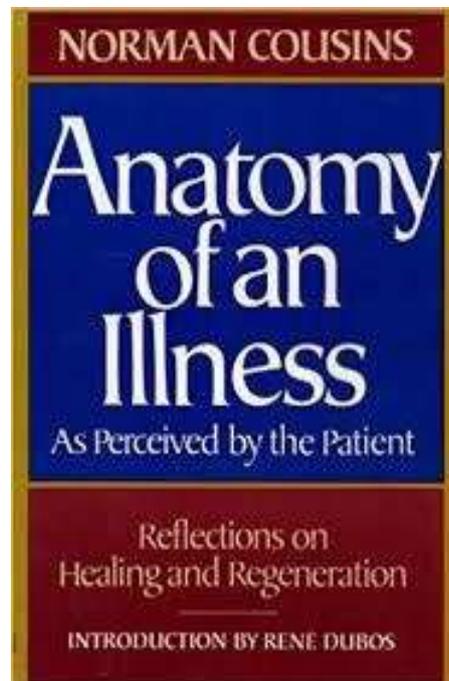

What is the route I want to follow? What would be the pluses and minuses involved? How can I build on the pluses and manage the minuses? On a scale 0-10, how motivated do I feel to do what is required to follow this route?

Looking ahead, what are the real results I want to achieve? What are the key strategies I can follow to give myself the greatest chance of success? When do I want to begin? How can I get some early successes?

Imagine that you have gone through some of these steps in your own way. It may then be time to move on to the next stage

You can then use the setback as a springboard towards achieving a new compelling picture of success.

Different people use setbacks in different ways. Some use them to reinforce their view that the world is wrong. Some use them as an opportunity to do their best during their time in the world. Let look at one of the most well-known examples of somebody choosing the second route.

Norman Cousins was born in 1915 and lived till 1990. He was a political journalist, well known for his humanitarian views.

He reached a wider audience, however, with his book Anatomy of an Illness. The book showed how people could mobilise their inner strength to fight illness.

In addition to his journalistic work, Norman was Adjunct Professor of Medical Humanities for the School of Medicine at the University of California. He specialised in researching how human emotions could affect a person's ability to stay healthy and overcome illness.

Norman translated this into action himself when diagnosed with a life-threatening illness. Told that he had little chance of surviving, Cousins developed a personal recovery programme.

This involved taking lots of Vitamin C, together with mobilising his positive emotions. The latter involved him watching lots of Marx Brothers films. Norman later wrote:

I made the joyous discovery that ten minutes of genuine belly laughter had an anaesthetic effect and would give me at least two hours of pain-free sleep.

When the pain-killing effect of the laughter wore off, we would switch on the motion picture projector again and not infrequently, it would lead to another pain-free interval.

Norman recovered and published his findings in medical journals. This led to him producing the book, whose full title was Anatomy of an Illness as Perceived by the Patient: Reflections on Healing and Regeneration.

Whilst warning against charlatans who ignored real medical problems, Norman stressed the importance of people mobilising their inner resources to live healthy lives. He wrote:

Hearty laughter is a good way to jog internally without having to go outdoors.

Anatomy was published in 1979 and had a profound influence on the way people began conducted themselves as patients. Norman believed that people could take a stand towards setbacks. He wrote:

Wisdom consists of the anticipation of consequences.

A human being fashions his consequences as surely as he fashions his goods or his dwelling his goods or his dwelling. Nothing that he says, thinks or does is without consequences.

Norman was, above everything, a world citizen. He believed that humanity could create a better world. But this would require both imagination and will power. He wrote:

The main failure of education is that it has not prepared people to comprehend matters concerning human destiny.

Leadership on this higher level does not require mountains of gold or thundering propaganda. It is concerned with human destiny. Human destiny is the issue.

The essential lesson most people still resist is that they are members of one species.

It is this that we all share - the emergence of a common destiny and the beginning of the perception, however misty, that something beyond the nation will have to be brought into being if the human race is to have any meaning.

This sounds a big task, but Norman remained a positive realist. Each of us could contribute by encouraging the spark in other human beings. He wrote:

If something comes to life in others because of you, then you have made an approach to immortality.

The Succeed Or Get Stronger Approach

The Succeed Or Get Stronger Approach

This approach involves playing to your strengths and doing superb work. You can then either succeed or – if you do not yet succeed - you can get stronger.

There are many models for managing emotional responses to succeeding or not yet succeeding. Here is one approach.

Imagine that you are going to tackle a task. You may be aiming to do your best when playing a sport, applying for a job, doing a project or performing another activity.

You may start by clarifying what you can control in the situation. Bearing these things in mind, you will aim to play to your strengths, follow your chosen strategies and do superb work.

Moving into action, you will aim to do your best and to give everything. Depending on the situation, may find that either:

You can maybe succeed.

You can, if you don't yet succeed, choose to get stronger.

Some people see themselves on a lifetime journey. Sometimes they succeed; sometimes they do not yet succeed. When the latter occurs, they choose to get stronger.

Different people do this in different ways. Looking at the work they have done in the situation, they may focus on:

The specific things they did well and what they could do better in the future;

The specific things they learned – both on a personal and professional level;

The specific things they can do to apply these lessons in their future life.

Such people aim to learn and get stronger. Sometimes they apply the lessons to improve in their sport, creative work or other activity. Sometimes they apply the lessons in other areas of life.

They may have learned about caring, compassion or continuous improvement. They may have learned about positivity, professionalism or peak performance. They may then use these lessons to help themselves or other people.

People can learn from succeeding and not yet succeeding. They can learn lessons that they can apply: a) to keep improving and grow stronger; b) to help themselves and other people. You will, of course, do this in your own way.

Let's return to you own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may encounter a setback? How could you use it as a springboard towards achieving future success?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Generous Guide Approach

This approach involves being generous and sharing guidance in a way that helps people to achieve their goals. It is one I saw in action early in my career. It was embodied by some of the sages I visited to learn about encouraging people.

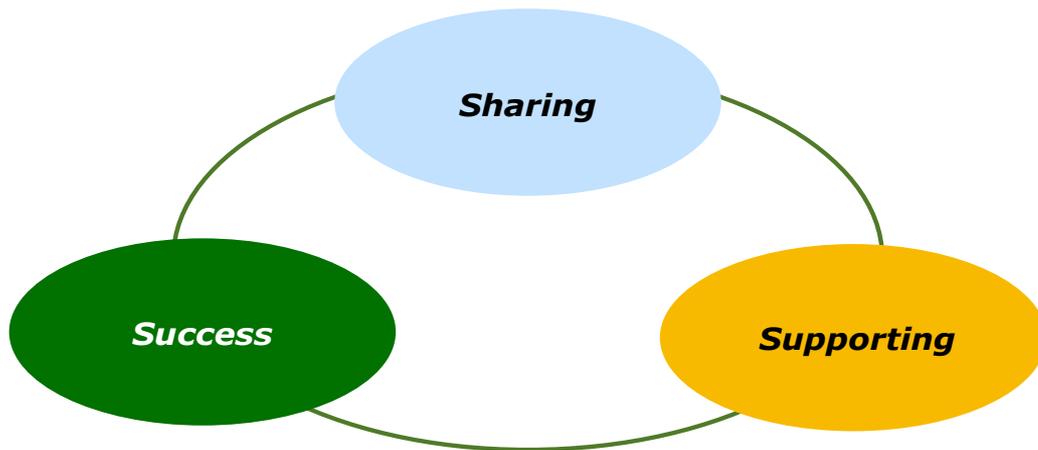

Such people often combined the elements of being kind, driven and humble. They saw themselves as lifetime students. At the same time they had strong convictions about how to help people during their time on the planet.

They embodied the generosity of spirit shown by great educators. They often helped people by working through the stages of clarity, customisation and concrete results.

Generous guides often focus on the sharing rather than selling approach. They love to share knowledge that helps people to succeed.

The Sharing Rather Than Selling Approach

Generous guides embody this approach. They love to share knowledge, support people and help them to succeed. They focus on:

Such people often start by making a person feel welcome and clarifying their goals. Sometimes this involves focusing on the person's spirit, strengths and long-term picture of success.

Drawing on the eternal lessons passed on by wise people, they sometimes add their own ideas. They then share this knowledge a way that helped the person to achieve their goals.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you may have followed some elements of the generous guide approach? This could have been in your personal or professional life.

You may have done this when helping a student, colleague, customer or other person. You may have done it in your role as a friend, educator, coach, counsellor, leader, trusted advisor or in another role.

What did you do to make the person feel welcome? How did you clarify their goals? Bearing in mind what they wanted to achieve, how did you draw on the knowledge passed on by wise people? How did add your own ideas?

How did you share this guidance in a customised way to ensure it was relevant to the person and their situation? How did you build on what resonated with them? How did you then do your best to help the person to achieve their goals?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Generous Guide Approach In The Past

I followed some of the principles in the generous guide approach was:*

Generous guides come in many forms. Let's look at one person who embodied this approach.

Virginia Satir – A Generous Guide

Virginia was a pioneering family therapist who created many concepts that have been used to build healthy families, teams and organisations. She provided people with tools they could use to build their strengths and find solutions to challenges.

*Problems are not the problem:
coping is the problem.*

Life is not what it's supposed to be. It's what it is. The way you cope with it is what makes the difference.

The event does not determine how to respond to the event.

The way in which we respond will direct and influence the event more than the event itself.

Looking back on her life, Virginia said she was five-years-old when she decided to be a 'children's detective on parents'. She explained:

"I didn't quite know what I would look for, but I realized a lot went on in families that didn't meet the eye."

She went on to provide many practical tools that have benefited thousands of people. Here are some of the things she said.

Parenting And Families

I regard parenting as the hardest, most complicated, anxiety-ridden, sweat-and-blood-producing job in the world.

Succeeding requires the ultimate in patience, common sense, commitment, humour, tact, love, wisdom, awareness and knowledge.

At the same time, it holds the possibility for the most rewarding, joyous experience of a lifetime, namely, that of being successful guides to a new and unique human being.

Every word, facial expression, gesture, or action on the part of a parent gives the child some message about self-worth. It is sad that so many parents don't realize what messages they are sending.

The Nurturing Family And Society

Feelings of worth can flourish only in an atmosphere where individual differences are appreciated, mistakes are tolerated, communication is open, and rules are flexible. The kind of atmosphere that is found in a nurturing family.

I feel that adolescence has served its purpose when a person arrives at adulthood with a strong sense of self-esteem, the ability to relate intimately, to communicate congruently, to take responsibility, and to take risks. The end of adolescence is the beginning of adulthood. What hasn't been finished then will have to be finished later.

Families and societies are small and large versions of one another. Both are made up of people who have to work together, whose destinies are tied up with one another.

Background And Philosophy

Virginia was born in Wisconsin in 1916. She was the eldest of five children born to Oscar and Minnie Pagenkopf, whose ancestors came from Germany.

She had several medical setbacks early in life. She contracted Mastoiditis when aged 5 and lost her hearing for two years. Seven years later she suffered a life-threatening illness.

Minnie was a Christian Scientist and at first resisted calling medical help. Oscar eventually stepped in and insisted that Virginia get treatment. She had a ruptured appendix and spent five months in hospital.

Looking back, Virginia felt she learned positive things from both her parents. Despite the hospital episode, Minnie was ambitious for her eldest daughter, who showed great ability to learn. For example, Virginia taught herself to read by the age of three.

Minnie later insisted the family move from their farm to Milwaukee so that her daughter could attend High School. Virginia said that Minnie taught her how to fix things, while Oscar taught her the value of honesty. Both embodied strong ethics.

They also taught her to focus on possibilities – and solutions – rather than get dragged down by problems. She would later say:

"Problems are not the problem. Coping is the problem."

Virginia studied hard at High School. Money was scarce – America was going through the Depression – so she took jobs to fund her studies. She then went on to the Milwaukee State Teachers College.

Whilst studying to be a teacher, she worked in a department store and with children at weekends. She also worked at an African-American Community Centre called Abraham Lincoln House. This opened her eyes to racism – people being discriminated against because they were different.

Managing and rejoicing in differences became a key theme in her later work with families and organisations. Whilst extremely practical, she also encouraged people to explore their possibilities.

Qualifying from college, Virginia spent several years working as a schoolteacher. Wanting to broaden her experience, she worked in different cities, including Ann Arbor, St. Louis and Miami, Florida.

Deciding to focus on social work, she began doing graduate work at Northwestern University in Chicago in 1937. Virginia studied on a part-time basis for the first few years – university in the summer - whilst doing her teaching work during the other months.

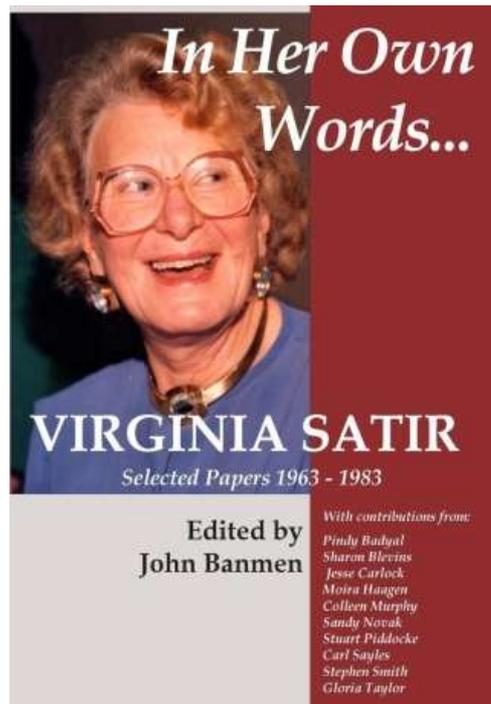

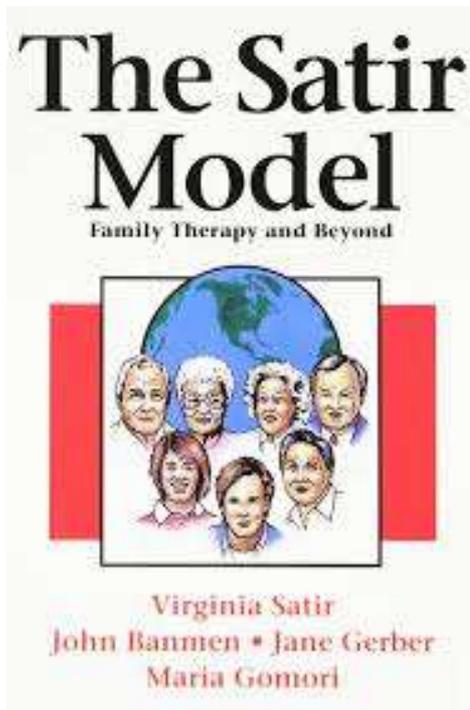

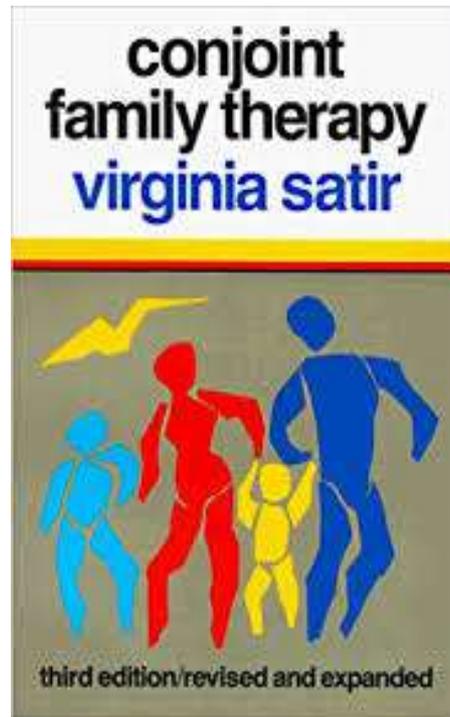

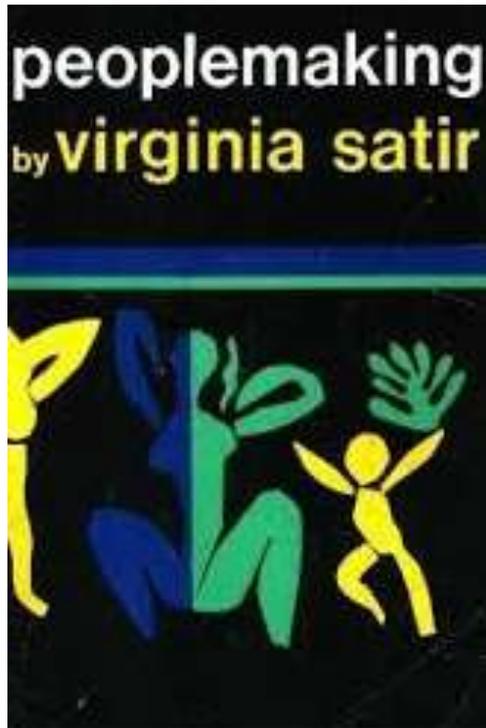

She then switched to full-time study, finishing her coursework by 1943 and her thesis by 1948. She also got married in 1941 and then divorced in 1949.

Virginia initially found the academic side tough, but she excelled at the practical aspects. The university culture was not conducive to married women who wanted to pursue a career.

Alongside the academic work, she was given a potentially nerve-wracking placement at the Chicago Home for Girls. She flourished in the environment, even without the benefit of ongoing supervision.

Virginia's approach was considered unconventional but it produced fine results. She would follow this path for the rest of her life. The University of Chicago did finally recognise her gifts. In 1975 it awarded her a Gold Medal for service to humankind.

Her work had a profound influence on generations of individuals, families and professional workers. Here are some of the books about Virginia's work

Virginia's Approach

Virginia completed her Masters dissertation and started her own practice. Looking back on her first therapy session with a whole family in 1951, she realised the value of seeing the whole picture.

This was a time when systems theory – and seeing the whole family as a system – was coming to prominence. Previously the problem child was taken away, treated and then put back in the family. Frequently the problem child relapsed into their old behaviour.

Certainly the person must take responsibility. But there was also something in the system – such as family pain or unresolved issues – that was shifted onto the family scapegoat.

Virginia believed it was vital to help the whole family to grow. During the next decade she pioneered work on family therapy and used many innovative techniques.

She taught people how to see the family as a system which had certain rules. Some rules were obvious but some might be hidden. The family might, for example, have rules about how people got attention – such as by falling sick, creating problems or behaving in other ways.

She helped them to identify the rules around many topics – such as showing affection, expressing anger and managing differences. People were then able:

To see the rules;

To see the consequences these rules;

To practice the rules they wanted to follow in the future.

Virginia used her warmth and insight to educate people about such dynamics. Many felt that, at last, somebody understood their role in the family. She enabled them to create a healthier future.

Virginia Helped People To Build Healthy Systems

- She saw the family as a whole system.

She helped people to see how the system worked by focusing on how people communicated and related to each other. It was possible to build a healthy system in which everybody could grow.

- She helped people to build healthy families and systems.

She helped people to follow certain guidelines. These included respecting each person, helping them to express their feelings in a healthy way and learning how to manage differences.

- She helped people to communicate clearly and grow.

She said that people had good intentions but these could get lost because of their communication styles. She helped people to communicate in a clear and encouraging way.

Communication Styles

Virginia helped people to identify different communication styles. She did this in a loving way and helped them to understand the style they wanted to adopt in the future.

The Leveller

Somebody who took responsibility and gave clear messages. Later in her career Virginia used the term Congruent rather than Leveller to symbolise such clear communication.

The Placater

Somebody who pleased others and put themselves last. For example, somebody who took the role of perfect child, later to grow-up to be a martyr.

The Blamer

Somebody who blamed others and created arguments.

The Computer

Somebody who was scared of expressing feelings and intellectualised emotions.

The Distracter

Somebody who distracted, often by behaving in a problematic way to get attention or, for example, create a diversion to stop family conversations that were entering difficult territory.

Virginia helped people to communicate in clear and healthy ways that helped themselves and others to grow.

Communication Plays A Key Role In Systems

People may give the following kinds of messages.

Clear
Messages

They may give messages that are crystal clear and people understand what is meant.

Confusing
Messages

They may give messages that are confusing and people find it hard to untangle what is meant.

Conflicting Messages

They may give messages that are conflicting and which can lead to uncertainty or problems.

Virginia believed in helping people to fulfil their potential. She saw her job as helping to relieve family pain but did this in a positive way.

She often began by asking the couple to relive the magic of when they first met. She then asked each family member about the best times in the family. Most of all, she gave each person the following message:

"I understand. You want the best for your loved ones and you are doing your best. Sometimes it is confusing that things don't work out how you intended. Let's look at how to make them better."

Communication Can Help Or Hurt A Relationship

Virginia showed that communication plays a key part relationships. The ways that people communicate with each other can build or break a relationship.

Communicating in a positive way can help to build a relationship;

Communicating in a negative way can hurt and break a relationship.

Virginia's work led to many therapists teaching people how to communicate in a helpful rather than hurtful way. This helped them to build more positive relationships.

Here is one of the most common exercises on this theme. If you wish, you can try it in your own life or work.

Communication Can Help Or Hurt A Relationship

Introduction

Communication plays a key part relationships. The ways that people communicate with each other can build or break a relationship.

Communicating in a positive way can help to build the relationship. Communicating in a negative way can hurt and break the relationship.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites to focus on a specific relationship with a person or group of people.

It then invites you to describe the Dos and Don'ts you want to follow when communicating with the person or the group of people in this relationship.

Communication

*The person or the group of people
I want to communicate with is:*

The Dos

The Dos I want to follow when communicating with them are:

 Do ...*

 Do ...*

 Do ...*

The Don'ts

The Don'ts I want to avoid when communicating with them are:

 Don't ...*

 Don't ...*

 Don't ...*

Virginia created many tools for helping people to grow. She invented The Self-Confidence Pot exercise that was described earlier in the book. This helped a person to understand their Pot Fillers and Pot Drillers. She also helped people to take the next step.

Helping People To Build Healthy Systems

Virginia found that healthy systems – marriages, families, organisations and societies - demonstrated certain characteristics. They often pursued the following principles:

They shared similar values;

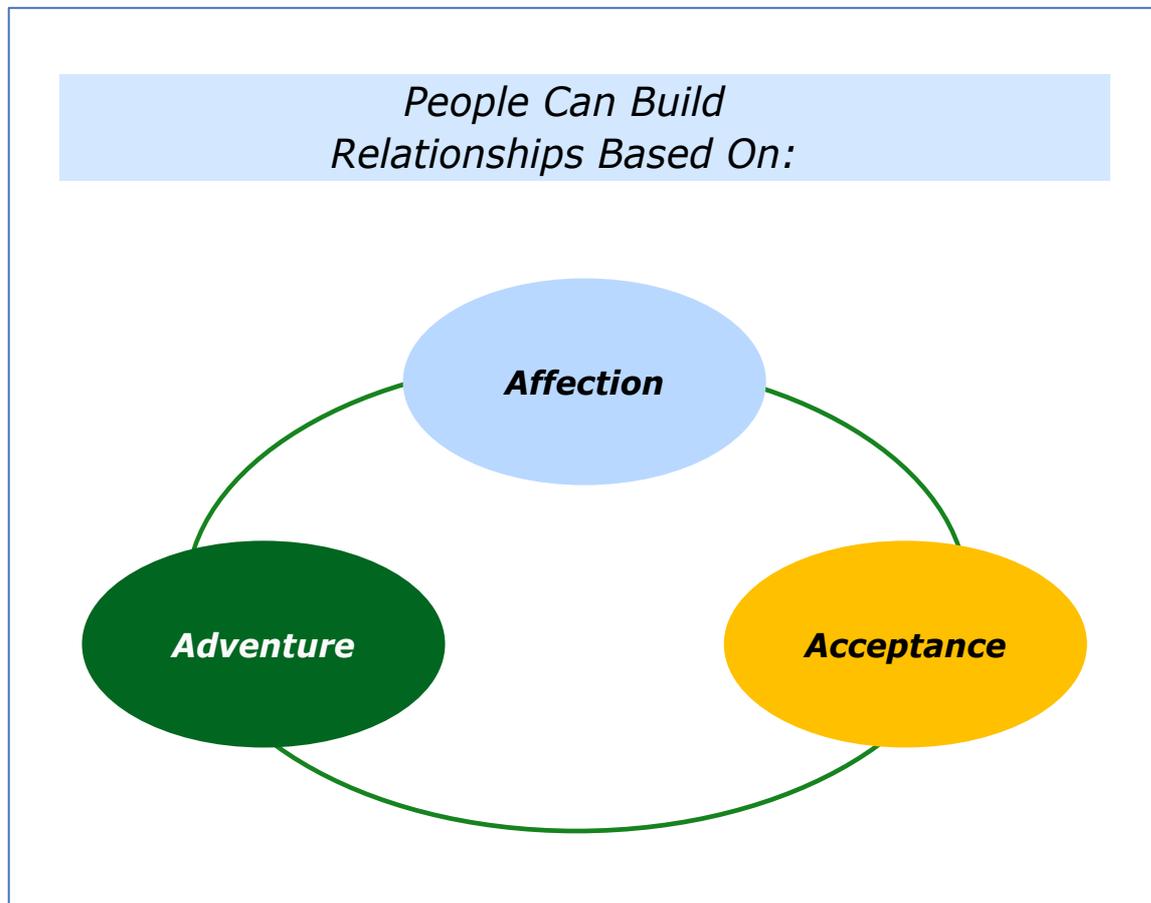

They respected and encouraged differences – obviously within certain parameters;

They built on their similarities and encouraged people to use their differences to tackle challenges and grow.

Sick systems often had people who believed their own values were paramount and suppressed those who disagreed. They also actively crushed differences.

Virginia's work inspired many people to create exercises that people could use to build partnerships and other relationships. Here are some of these.

Affection, Acceptance And Adventure – Three Themes In Caring Relationships

Virginia helped us to learn from healthy couples. People can, however, apply similar principles in other relationships. Healthy couples often base their relationship on affection, acceptance and adventure.

Affection

They show each other affection. Some may do this in a physical way. Some may do it in a psychological way.

They may show affection by making the other person feel welcome and helping them to feel the centre of their world. They may do it in simple ways, such as making them a cup of tea, listening and encouraging them.

Acceptance

They build on the things they have in common. They also find ways to encourage and, in some cases, manage any differences. They recognise that differences can make or break a relationship.

(There is an in-depth exercise on this theme further on in this section of the book.)

Healthy couples, for example, accept each other rather than constantly try to change each other. They realise that, after a certain time, people do not change all that much. They are clear on:

The differences they want to encourage, because these make the other person special.

The differences they are prepared to accept, because the person probably won't change certain habits.

The differences they would like the person to change and how. It is vital for them to give a positive alternative.

Regarding the latter differences, they may suggest how they would like the person to behave in the future. But what if the person refuses to change? The person making the suggestion has a decision to make.

They can recognise that the other person is not going to change and accept the difference. They can keep trying to persuade the person to change. They can, if they feel the difference is too painful, choose to leave the relationship because there is no point in being a victim.

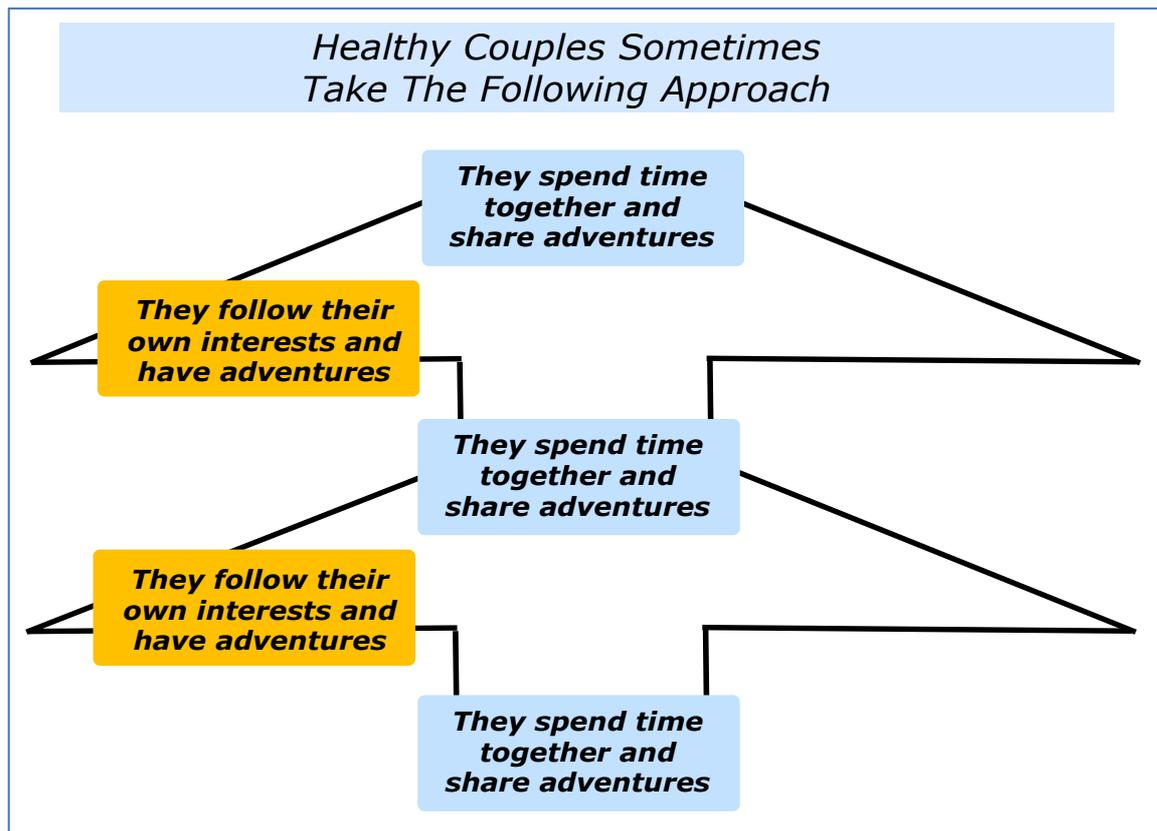

Adventure

Healthy couples share adventures together. These can be big adventures or even simply enjoying small talk together. They feel uplifted after their time together.

They may then individually go apart and pursue their own interests and adventures. This are ones that help them to feel alive but that do cause pain in the relationship.

The couple may then come back together to share what they have each been doing. They then build on what they have in common and share adventures. Sometimes this is simply chatting but in a positive way.

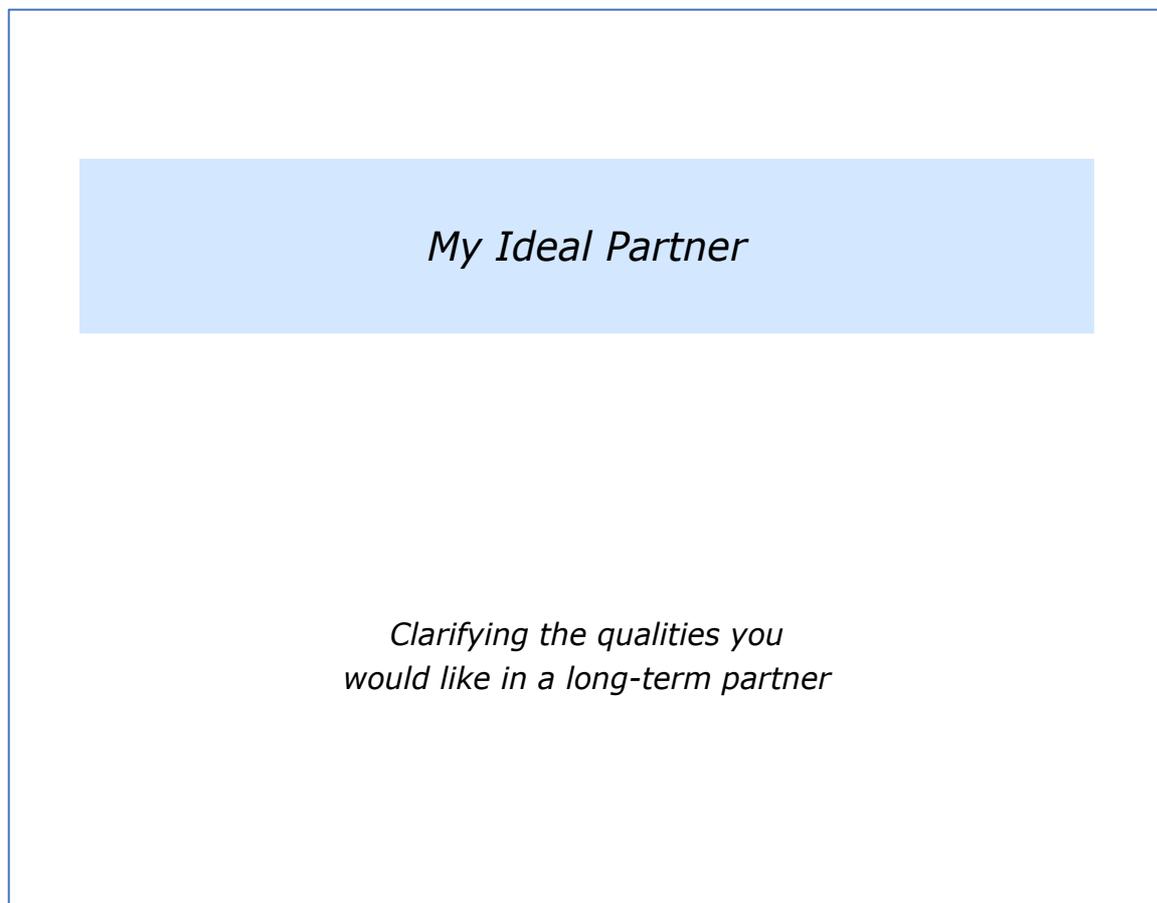

Such couples aim to enjoy their time together and also when they are apart. They take this approach to building a mutually enriching relationship.

You can, of course, apply these principles in your own way to build with the people that you enjoy being with. Taking these steps will continue to give you positive energy.

There are many views about how people build a good relationship. One model is for people to base their relationship on affection, acceptance and adventure.

Let's move on to another exercise that people use to build long-term relationships. This explores qualities a person would like in an ideal partner.

The approach can apply to romantic relationships but similar principles can be followed when building other kinds of relationships. The exercise is in several parts. Here are the themes that it can be useful to explore.

Describe the individual women or men with whom you have felt encouraged

If you are looking to build a partnership with a man, write the names of the men with whom you have felt alive, accepted and able to be yourself.

If you are looking to build a partnership with a woman, write the names of those with whom you have felt alive, accepted and able to be yourself.

These do not necessarily need to have been romantic relationships, even if you are looking for such a relationship. It could have been a parent, teacher, coach, friend or other person.

Describe the positive qualities in each of the people you have listed

Each person will have had different qualities. Looking at some of the individuals, you may say for example:

"They accepted me ... They listened to me ... They were creative ... They were a fair fighter ... They were self-managing ... They were sometimes exciting to be with ... They had great vision ... etc."

It is doubtful if every person will have the same qualities, but you may find that certain themes keep occurring.

Some of these qualities may mirror those of your own - such as having a positive attitude. But sometimes a person may have qualities that complement your own and enable you to be yourself. Here is the exercise.

People With Whom I Have Felt Encouraged

Write the names of the people with whom you have felt alive, accepted and encouraged. If you are aiming to build romantic relationship, write the names of the people of this gender.

*My Ideal Partner – The Qualities
I Would Like In Such A Person*

Imagine that you have describe the positive qualities that each person demonstrated. If appropriate, move on to the next step.

Describe the qualities you would like in your ideal partner

Take a look at the list of the people with whom you have felt good. Looking at these, can you see any recurring qualities?

Bearing these in mind, describe the qualities you would like in your ideal partner. It can be useful to describe quite a lot of qualities and then list these in order of priority.

The qualities you have listed have worked for you in the past and they may work in the future. If appropriate, however, you may wish to list additional qualities you would like a person to demonstrate.

It will be hard to find a person with all the qualities, so it can be useful to list the qualities you want in order of priority. If you want somebody who has a positive attitude to life, for example, it may be hard to live with somebody who keeps complaining.

A person may also demonstrate some of the qualities you want some of the time but not at others. If you want somebody who is energetic, visionary and a doer, for example, they may not always stop what they are doing to listen to you.

Nevertheless, it can be useful to list the qualities you want. Then we will go on to the next step.

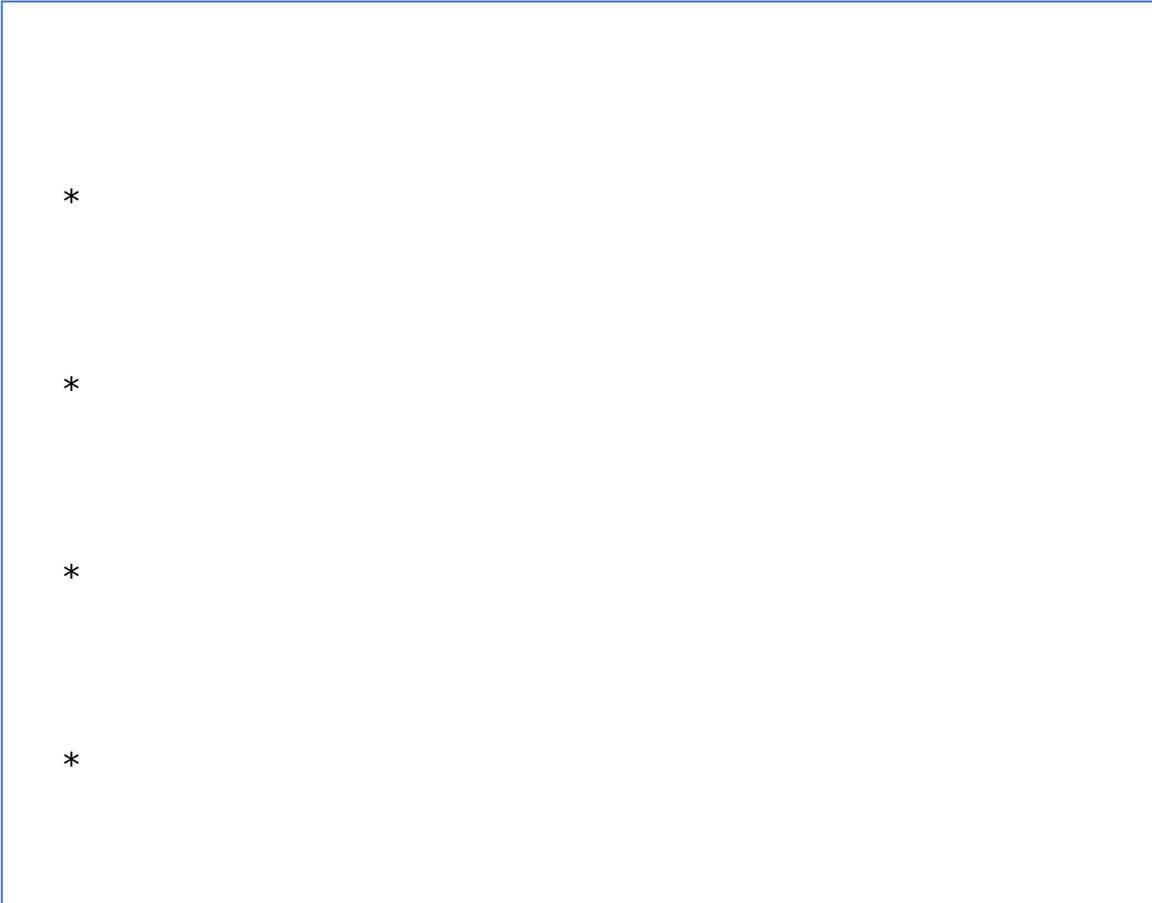

My Ideal Partner

The qualities I would like in my ideal partner is somebody who:

My Ideal Partner – Taking The Next Steps

The next steps you will depend on: a) whether you are already in a relationship; b) whether you are looking for somebody with whom to build a relationship.

Imagine you are already in a relationship

Bearing in mind the qualities you want in an ideal partner, you may want to explore the following themes.

Which of these qualities does my partner already demonstrate?

Which qualities may they have that they can develop?

Which qualities may I wish to, if appropriate, look for elsewhere?

If your top priority is to be with somebody who encourages you, for example, it will be important to that your partner demonstrates this quality. Otherwise life will be difficult.

There may be some qualities you would like that your partner may have the ability to develop. If these are latent, then that may be possible. But the nurturing of these may need to be done in an encouraging rather than challenging way.

It will be hard to find a person with all the qualities you would like. When appropriate, it may be important to find ways to get these outside the relationship. This will need to be done in a way that helps rather than hurts your present relationship.

Looking at the qualities you would like in an ideal partner - and bearing in mind that nobody is perfect - you can ask yourself:

Is there the basis for building in our relationship?

If so, how can I encourage my partner and continue to build a good relationship?

If there is not the basis, what decisions may I need to take?

It can also be important remember that many long-term relationships go through certain stages. Some marriages, for example, take different forms as they develop. These may differ from how things were at the beginning. But the individuals may still care for each other and develop an enriching relationship.

Imagine you are looking for somebody with whom to build a relationship

This can involve exploring a different set of questions. It calls for:

Clarifying the qualities you want in an ideal partner;

Clarifying the kinds of places where you are most likely to meet somebody who demonstrates these qualities;

Clarifying the things you want to do when you meet somebody who may have these qualities.

Imagine that you are looking for somebody who is caring, supportive and yet not putting themselves down. You can ask yourself some of the following questions.

What are the kinds of places where you are likely to meet this kind of person? What are the kinds of jobs such a person might do? How can you increase the chances of meeting such a person?

As we know, there are many ways to meet people and build good relationships. The My Ideal Partner exercise has helped people to take some of these steps.

This is certain not an exact science, however, and building good relationships can be lifetime journey. Here is the final exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentence.

My Ideal Partner

The next steps I want take to build a good relationship are:

Managing Differences Successfully

Virginia Satir believed that the way people managed their differences determined whether a relationship would flourish or die. This section describes an exercise that was inspired by her approach.

Although the exercise relates to couples, the principle of managing differences successfully has been applied to many other systems, such as teams and organisations.

Imagine you are working with a couple. You can invite them to work through the following steps. Each person makes lists describing the following things.

Similarities: How my partner is similar to me

This can cover every aspect of life. These may include values, attitudes, habits, behaviour, physical things, psychological things, philosophical things or other topics. A person may list the way their partner is similar to them by writing the following:

"They have two children – ours; they like walking in the countryside; they get angry about injustice; they like Italian food; they enjoy watching sport; they enjoy having pets; etc."

Differences: How my partner is different from me

This can also cover every aspect of life. A person may list how their partner is different from them by writing:

"They are a morning person, whilst I am an evening person; they are introvert, whilst I express my feelings; they have different standards of tidiness in the house; they drink quite a lot; etc."

Similarities: How we can build on what we have in common

Each partner describes how they want to build on what they have in common. Providing these are healthy similarities – things that benefit both – it can be good to build on this foundation. For example, people may plan to share more projects in the future.

Differences: How we can manage the differences

This is the crunch part. Differences can make or break a relationship. They can add juiciness or they can be a nightmare.

Each person is to take the following steps. Looking at how their partner is different, they can explore the following themes.

The differences they want to encourage - because these make the other person special.

The differences they are prepared to accept - because their partner probably won't change certain habits. Bearing in mind the whole package involved in living with their partner, they may be prepared to accept some of the differences.

The differences they would like their partner to change and how they would like them to behave. It is vital for them to give a positive alternative.

This final point is crucial. For example, Partner A may be upset because Partner B behaves in a certain way – such as suppressing their feelings, drinking lots of alcohol, fighting dirty during arguments or whatever.

Partner A has several options. Each option has consequences.

They can put up with the behaviour.

They can harangue the other person and hope they will change.

They can give the other person a positive alternative. They can explain how they would like the person to behave in the future. They can also describe the potential benefits for everybody.

Imagine Partner A gives a positive alternative but Partner B says:

"I am not prepared to change."

Partner A can then ask themselves:

"Am I prepared to stay in the relationship? Is it worth the whole package?"

If so, fine. If not, then Partner A has a decision to make. Here is the exercise on the theme of managing differences successfully.

Managing Differences

People often build on their similarities. They may also enrich the relationships by enjoying and nurturing the differences.

Sometimes the differences bring pleasure but they can also cause problems. The way that people learn to manage these differences can make or break the relationship.

The following exercise can be used to focus on how it may be possible to manage the differences successfully. It invites a person to complete the following sentences.

Similarities How my partner is similar to me	Differences How my partner is different from me

Managing Differences Successfully

Similarities

Describe the similarities you want to build on. Describe the specific things you can do to build on these similarities.

Differences

Describe the differences you want to encourage because these make the person special. Describe the differences you are prepared to accept as part of the whole package.

Describe the differences you would like the person to consider changing and what you would like them to do instead. Describe how you can try to communicate this in a positive way

Virginia opened people's eyes to the importance of managing differences successfully. This idea has been used many other people.

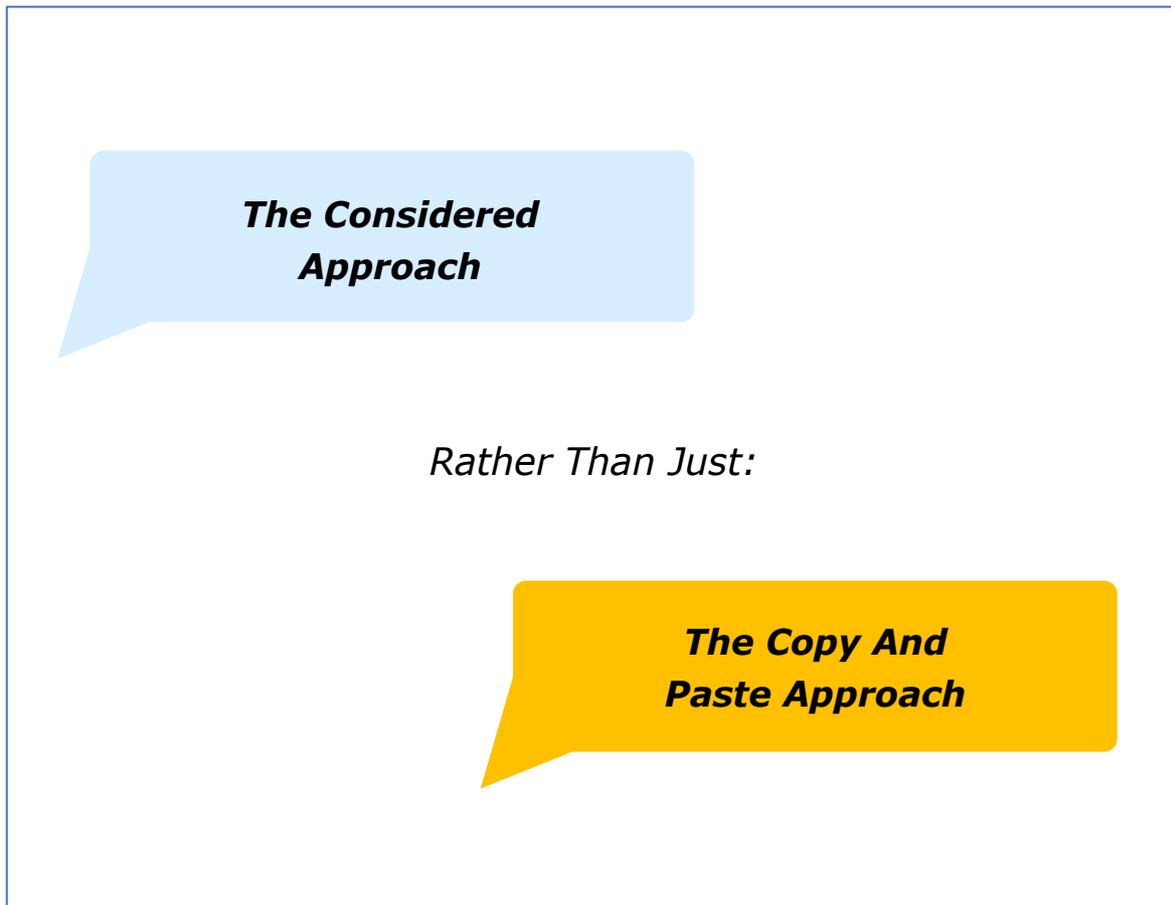

Looking at my own work, for example, I apply it to building positive teams. As described elsewhere in the book:

Great teams are based on similarity of spirit and diversity of strengths.

Healthy systems – whether they are families, teams or organisations – are based on similar values. These provide the foundation. They only flourish, however, if on top of this they encourage variety.

Virginia embodied many of the qualities demonstrated by generous guides. Let's explore some of the ways they share their knowledge with people.

Generous Guides – They Often Follow The Considered Approach

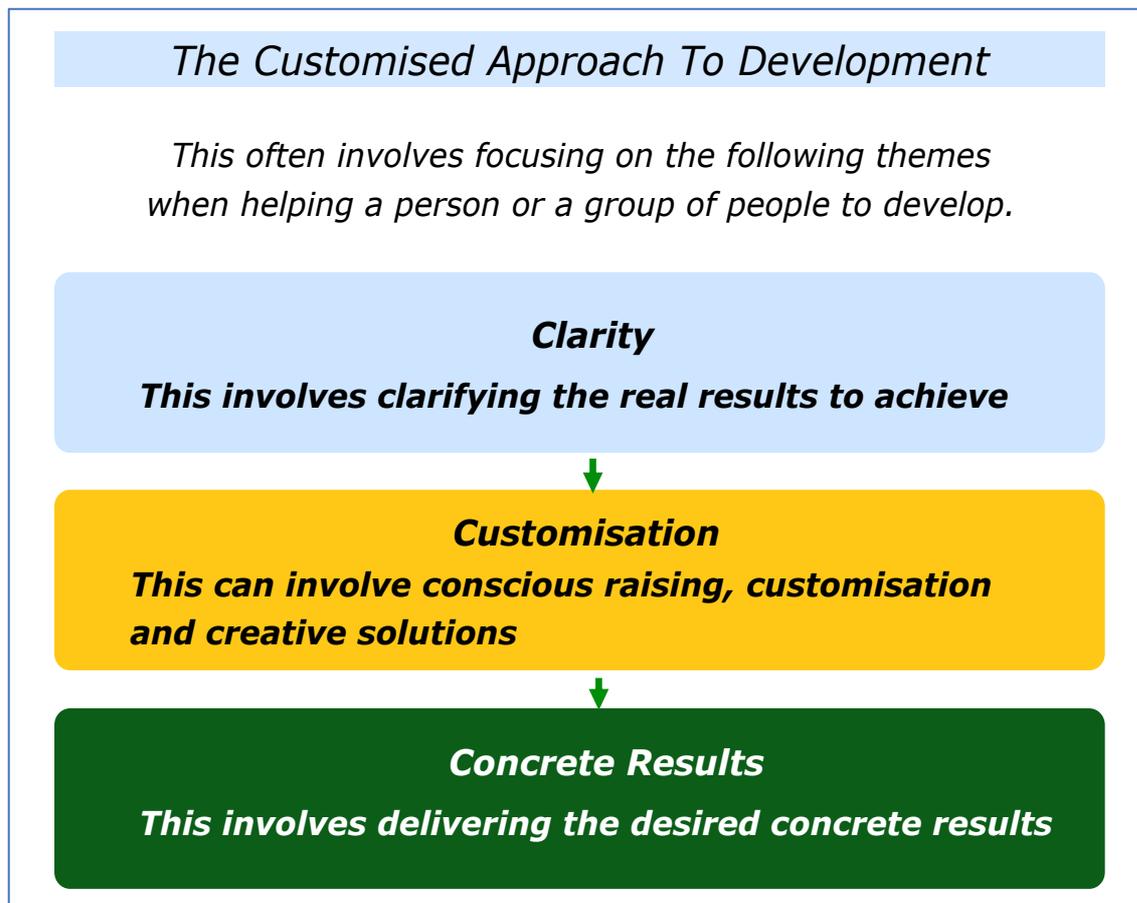

Generous guides often follow a considered approach when making a decision or helping a person. They take this approach rather than copying and pasting phrases when answering a question.

Different people follow this approach in different way. Some of them aim to stay calm and considered. They may also follow the Three C Model of focusing on Clarity, Creativity and Concrete Results.

Generous guides may also build on this model and use a customised approach when helping people to develop. They do this whether working as an educator, mentor, trusted advisor, online learning tutor or in another role.

Such guides follow certain beliefs about development. They believe that the learner learns what the learner wants to learn. They also aim to make the learning personal, practical and, in the widest sense, profitable.

They focus on clarity – establishing the real results to achieve – customisation and concrete results. They then do their best to help people to achieve success.

Generous guides recognise that each person's situation is different. They clarify what is happening in the person's world. They focus on the theme the person wants to explore and the real results they want to achieve.

They may, in a respectful way, do some consciousness raising in terms of helping the person to see possible ways forwards. They may help them to see the big picture and positive models that work.

Let's explore another approach generous guides may follow.

The Potential Career Paths Approach

Potential Career Paths

There are many different paths that people can take in their careers. These include the following approaches.

- The Strengths And Satisfying Work Approach
- The Straight Line Approach
- The Stimulating Projects Approach
- The Squiggly Approach
- The Going Around The System To Achieve Success Approach
- The Serendipity Approach
- The Salary And Status Approach

There are many models for helping people to shape their futures. One approach is to show them some of the potential paths that people can follow in their careers.

Imagine that you want to help people to see some of these possibilities. If appropriate, you may want to describe the following potential career paths.

The Strengths And Satisfying Work Approach

This approach involves a person building on their strengths and doing satisfying work. Imagine that a person wants to follow this route. This may involve them being helped:

To find and build on their strengths;

To find and do satisfying work where they can play to their strengths;

To continue to build on their strengths and, when appropriate, find or create other opportunities where they can do satisfying work.

Some people are able to take this route by themselves. As mentioned earlier, however, some may need help to find or create the opportunities where they can continue to pursue this career path.

The Straight Line Approach

This is the traditional career path. It used to be considered a safe route but nowadays unexpected events can cause problems. Nevertheless, many people still focus on this path.

One person who follows this route may aim to do well academically. They may aim to join an established company, climb the ladder and reach the C-Suite.

Another person who follows this route may go into medicine, the law, financial services or another established profession. They may continue to gain qualifications, develop their expertise and perhaps specialise in their chosen field.

The Stimulating Projects Approach

Some people aim to build on their strengths and do stimulating projects. They have a freelance mentality. They recognise there are now fewer predictable career paths but there are many potential projects.

Such people aim to find or create such projects. These may be in different fields – such as health care, logistics, local government, digital or other areas. They aim to contribute to these projects and deliver success.

Being professional freelancers, they aim to continually deliver high standards. They recognise that satisfying the key stakeholders can lead to getting more work on future projects.

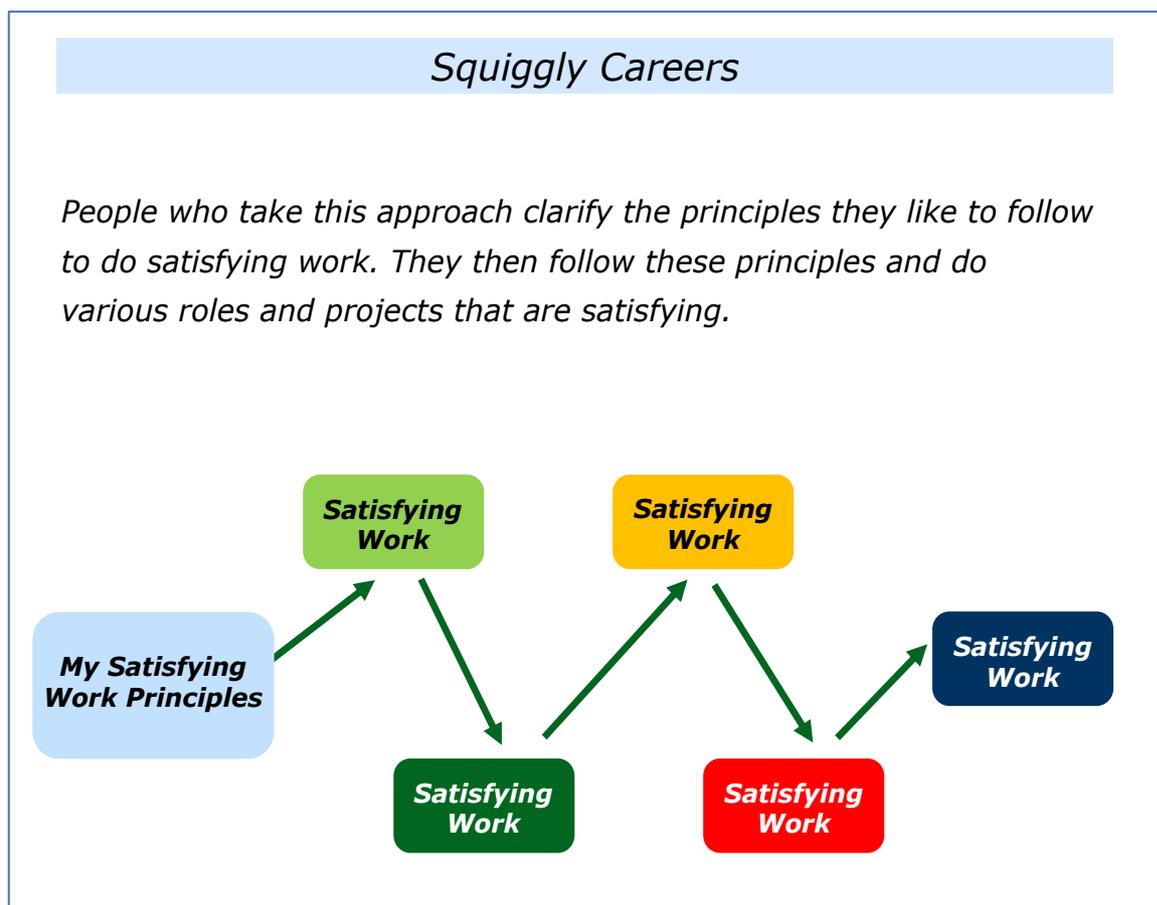

Such workers also keep in touch with people in their network. Clarifying the challenges that these people face, they offer knowledge that these people can use to achieve success. Sometimes this leads to opportunities for future work.

The Squiggly Approach

This approach has become more accepted in recent years. Some people pursue squiggly careers by doing projects and roles that appear quite different. But people who take this route often embody two themes.

They clarify the principles they like to follow to do satisfying work;

They then follow these principles and do various roles and projects where they can do satisfying work.

Mitch Joel talked about squiggly careers in his book CTRL ALT Delete. Here is a short introduction to his view of this approach.

Embrace The Squiggle

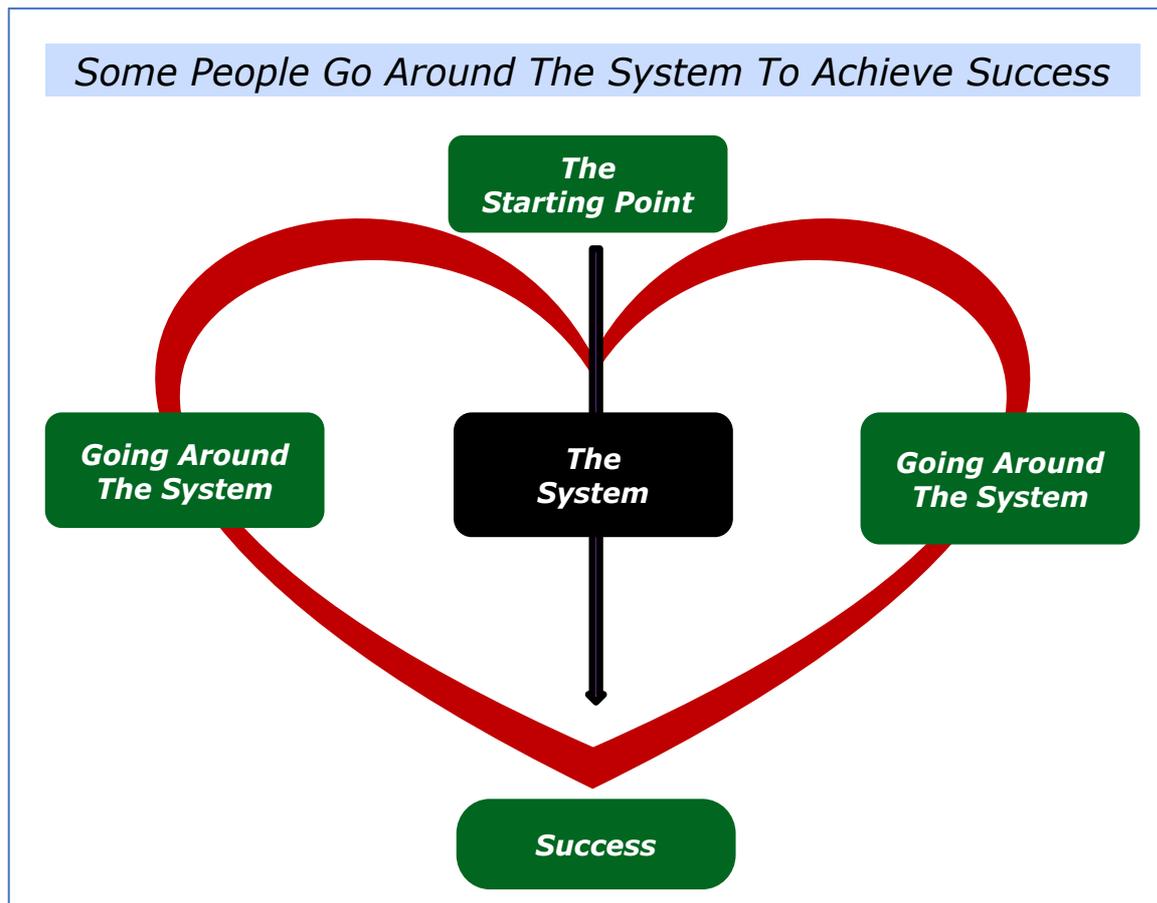

In the second half of the book (called Reboot: You), I talk about the value of having a squiggly career. I explain:

How the most interesting and successful people I know didn't have a very linear trajectory;

How it will not be uncommon for many of us to have 4-5 different careers in our lifetime (as opposed to 4-5 different jobs in our careers).

Too many people feel trapped and compelled to stay the course. Too many people think that a linear career is the prudent and true path. Squiggly is interesting. Squiggly is better.

The Going Around The System To Achieve Success Approach

This is an approach followed by people who may be considered to be deviants who deliver. They may do this by being creative, being entrepreneurs or by going around the system to achieve success.

Such people may be lifelong learners and have a pattern of following their own path. They may have been good at school but others may have preferred to learn in their own way.

Some may have pursued a passion where they have the ability to deliver peak performance. They may then have taken the following approach.

They may have focused on a stimulating goal – such as inventing a product, building a business or having another picture of success;

They may have found creative ways to go around the system – rather than through it – and explored different routes to delivering success;

They may have learned from experience and failures before establishing credibility and achieving their picture of success.

Such people continue to be curious. They love to follow their passions, do stimulating work and achieve success.

The Serendipity Approach

Some people experience the serendipity approach. This can take many forms but here is one example.

Eric was finishing a degree in chemistry and aimed to pursue this as a career. During his final year he visited a friend who invited him to a trade fair where companies were looking to hire graduates.

Accompanying his friend, Eric became interested in a particular stand at the exhibition. The company was demonstrating a new technology that would diagnose illnesses at an earlier stage.

The representative for the company invited Eric to try the technology. This led to further discussions and him joining the business.

Eric went on to become the head of sales and, eventually, the CEO. He was then focusing on a different kind of chemistry. This involved channelling people's talents to achieve success.

There are many examples of serendipity striking to take people in different directions. Such chances can lead to deeply satisfying careers.

The Salary And Status Approach

This is a route followed by some people. They seek roles based on: a) the salary; b) the status it will give them. These factors can become an obsession as they go through their careers.

Such people may also compare themselves with others. They may measure their progress compared to what others in their age group are doing. This does not necessarily help their wellbeing.

Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to describe some of the career paths that people can follow? How can you do this in your own way? If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Let's return to the generous guide approach. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation when you may want to follow some of these principles?

How can you be generous but not be taken for granted? How can you welcome the person and make clear working contracts? How can you clarify their goals?

How can you then use the customised approach? How can you, if appropriate, help them to see the big picture? How can you pass on knowledge and practical tools that resonate with the person?

How can you help them to map their chosen way forwards? How can you help them to rehearse following their strategy? How can you help them to achieve the desired concrete results?

The Enlightenment, Enterprise And Excellence Approach

There are many models for doing fine work. One approach is to go through the stages of enlightenment, enterprise and excellence.

People have many epiphanies but they may only pursue a few. Enterprise calls for doing things to translate their insights into action. They can then keep working until they achieve excellence.

Andre Agassi, the former tennis player, described how many people have epiphanies but the key is to make use of these breakthroughs. He described this in the following way.

"Epiphanies don't change your life. It's what you do with them that changes your life."

Some people choose to quickly act on the insight. Some reflect, sleep on it and see if the breakthrough still resonates. Sometimes the idea gets stronger. If so, they then decide whether or not they want to translate it into action.

Looking back on your life, when you have gone through these stages? When did you have a creative breakthrough? What did you do to be enterprising and translate the insight into action? What did you do to deliver excellence?

Imagine that you want to follow similar principles to do a specific project. Let's explore how you can make this happen.

Enlightenment

When do you get creative breakthroughs? Maybe it is a particular time of day, such as the early morning. Maybe you are doing a particular activity, such as walking. Maybe you are in a particular location, such as the countryside.

There is no guarantee that doing these things will produce ideas, but it can be useful to consider the conditions that lead to such breakthroughs. Here is what one person said.

"I get my best ideas at different times. One is when running in the morning. My head feels clear and this releases my imagination.

"Running is easy at the weekends, but more difficult during the week.

"So I decided to create a 20-minute walk to my work place in London. I get off the tube two stops before I need to, buy a coffee and walk to the office.

"This helps me to recover from the crowded commuter train. I feel refreshed and able to do good work during the day.

"Another time I get ideas is when witnessing something brilliant. I love to see a superb musical, visit an art gallery or watch wildlife programmes on television.

"My mind feels stimulated. Frequently I follow-up the ideas and translate these into something tangible."

Enlightenment comes in many different forms. It also has many different names, such as 'epiphanies', 'realisations' or 'Aha!' moments.

Such moments are exciting, but not all stand the test of time. Some people therefore choose to reflect, sleep on it and see if the breakthrough still resonates.

Sometimes the idea gets stronger. If so, they then decide whether or not they want to translate it into action. This is something we will explore later.

Imagine that you want to do a specific project. Let's explore how you can do this by going through the stages of enlightenment, enterprise and excellence.

The first step may be to gather information, make creative breakthroughs and settle on your chosen way forwards. If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Enlightenment

The specific project where I would like to get enlightenment and make a creative breakthrough is:

*

The real results I want to achieve by making the creative breakthrough are:

*

The specific things I can do to increase the chances of making a creative breakthrough are:

Enterprise

Some people see enlightenment as an end in itself. Another approach is to be enterprising. It is to do something with the idea and translate it into action. How to make this happen?

Let's assume that you have had a creative breakthrough. You can see a potential way forward with the project and are clear on your picture of success.

Good implementers then move into action. They aim to keep doing the right things in the right way every day. This increases the chances of delivering the right results.

Looking back at your own life, when have you followed a daily discipline? You may have been studying for an exam, aiming to improve your health, striving to hit a project deadline or whatever.

What did you do right then? How did you develop good habits? How did you overcome setbacks along the way? How did you encourage yourself on the journey? How can you follow similar principles in the future?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Enterprise

The specific project where I would like to move from enlightenment to being enterprising is:

*

The specific things I can do to be enterprising and translate the insights into action are:

*

The specific things I can then do to perform effective work when aiming to get the desired results are:

*

Excellence

Looking at the project you want tackle, what is your picture of success? What will be happening that will show you have delivered excellence?

Different people have different views regarding what they believe to be fine work. Much depends on the positive models they have learned from during the early part of their careers.

One Managing Director explained where he had learned about professional standards.

"My early working life was spent in retail. Fortunately I had a great boss who kept showing us what good looks like.

"Every morning he took us outside to stand in the car park. He encouraged us to look at the store through the customer's eyes.

"He then took us on the customer's journey. Looking at every detail as we walked through the store, he asked us to note the following things.

'What is good about the store, the display and the behaviour of the staff? How can we do more of these things?

'What can be improved about the store, the display and the behaviour of the staff? How can we do these things?

"Part of my job was to make sure that every tin was flush with the edge of each shelf. That is probably where I developed my OCD tendencies.

"Now I have extremely high standards regarding what must be delivered by the people in my company."

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

Excellence

The specific project where I would like to deliver excellence is:

*

The specific things I can do to deliver excellence and achieve the desired results are:

*

The specific benefits of taking these steps and achieving the desired results will be:

*

Different people take these steps in different ways. Some go beyond doing work that is excellence. They may go into another dimension and do work that exceptional. This can have profound effects for themselves, for other people or for a society.

The following pages describe people who have followed some elements of this approach. Everybody's journey is different, but each of these people moved from enlightenment to enterprise to doing excellent work.

Marcus Rashford

Marcus Rashford was successful on the football field. He felt a strong desire to feed children, however, during the Covid-19 pandemic. Drawing on his own experience, he dedicated himself to specific projects that tackled child food poverty.

Working with the FareShare organisation, Marcus helped more children to be fed. Here is a quote from the organisation after six months of his work supporting their efforts.

We've been overwhelmed with the amazing support our ambassador Marcus Rashford has helped galvanise over the the past six months.

We will now be able to provide an additional 6 million meals to vulnerable children and families through this difficult and uncertain time.

Marcus brought the issue to national attention with an open letter to the government. At the time this was particularly aimed at extending meal vouchers for children during the summer holidays. Here are excerpts from the letter he wrote

Tackling Child Food Poverty – An Open Letter

My story to get here is all-too-familiar for families in England: my mum worked full-time, earning minimum wage to make sure we always had a good evening meal on the table.

But it was not enough. The system was not built for families like mine to succeed, regardless of how hard my mum worked.

As a family, we relied on breakfast clubs, free school meals, and the kind actions of neighbours and coaches. Food banks and soup kitchens were not alien to us; I recall very clearly our visits to Northern Moor to collect our Christmas dinners every year.

It's only now that I really understand the enormous sacrifice my mum made in sending me away to live in digs aged 11, a decision no mother would ever make lightly.

As their stomachs grumble, I wonder if those 200,000 children will ever be proud enough of their country to pull on the England national team shirt one day and sing the national anthem from the stands.

Ten years ago, I would have been one of those children, and you would never have heard my voice and seen my determination to become part of the solution.

This is not about politics; this is about humanity.

Looking at ourselves in the mirror and feeling like we did everything we could to protect those who can't, for whatever reason or circumstance, protect themselves.

Political affiliations aside, can we not all agree that no child should be going to bed hungry?

The government has taken a "whatever it takes" approach to the economy – I'm asking you today to extend that same thinking to protecting all vulnerable children across England.

I encourage you to hear their pleas and find your humanity. Please reconsider your decision to cancel the food voucher scheme over the summer holiday period and guarantee the extension.

Yours sincerely, Marcus Rashford

Maya Angelou

Maya aimed to do what she believed in and also encourage other people. Here is an excerpt from her famous poem Still I Rise.

*Out of the huts of history's shame
I rise
Up from a past that's rooted in pain
I rise
I'm a black ocean, leaping and wide,
Welling and swelling I bear in the tide.
Leaving behind nights of terror and fear
I rise
Into a daybreak that's wondrously clear
I rise
Bringing the gifts that my ancestors gave,
I am the dream and the hope of the slave.
I rise
I rise
I rise.*

She used her own pain to embark on a journey to stretch herself. Here is an excerpt from her biography published by The American Academy of Achievement.

At age seven, while visiting her mother in Chicago, she was sexually molested by her mother's boyfriend. Too ashamed to tell any of the adults in her life, she confided in her brother.

When she later heard that an uncle had killed her attacker, she felt that her words had killed the man. She fell silent and did not speak for five years. Maya began to speak again at thirteen, when she and her brother re-joined their mother in San Francisco.

Maya attended Mission High School and won a scholarship to study dance and drama at San Francisco's Labor School, where she was exposed to the progressive ideals that animated her late political activism.

She dropped out of school in her teens to become San Francisco's first African American female cable car conductor. She later returned to high school, but became pregnant in her senior year and graduated a few weeks after giving birth to her son, Guy.

Maya left home at sixteen and took on the difficult life of a single mother, supporting herself and her son by working as a waitress and cook, but she had not given up on her talents for music, dance, performance and poetry.

She went on to do stimulating work and stretch herself. Living and working in many countries, she learned to speak French, Spanish, Italian, Arabic and the West African language Fanti.

Maya's work has inspired many people to channel their emotions in a creative way. They have followed the path of being able to rise and use their strengths to shape a positive future.

George Lyward

George was a charismatic educationalist who achieved outstanding results at Finchden Manor, a pioneering a therapeutic community for troubled boys. I was fortunate to learn from him when visiting the community.

Many youngsters found solace at Finchden. It was a place to heal and decide what they wanted to do with their lives. Some went on to become well-known, including musicians such as Alexis Korner and Tom Robinson.

Many people visited Finchden to find the secret of its success. Walking around the ramshackle huts, they saw boys playing guitars, kicking footballs, tending gardens or engaged in study.

Finally the visitors crammed into the large hall and bombarded George with questions. Curious about what they had seen, they asked him:

"What is the therapy programme? What is the staff's role, because they seem to do little except watch the boys?"

George thought for a moment and replied along the following lines.

"You are right about the staff. They are watching the boys. Watching is one of the hardest things to do in life.

"Our staff watch the boys painting, mending cars, playing music, helping each other or doing other activities.

"They look for when somebody comes alive. The staff then encourage them to build on their talent and shape their future lives."

George's work reached a wider audience with the publication of Michael Burn's book, Mr Lyward's Answer. This led to more people visiting the community.

They saw the physical chaos, but also something deeper. Some called it poetry.

George – affectionately known to all as the 'Chief' – created an environment in which troubled boys were able to heal themselves. He believed that the youngsters got into trouble because they had not been given love and were fighting the world.

Finchden gave them the chance to live, learn and begin to shape their futures. He said:

"We give young people the chance to have their childhoods. We let them do all the things they want to do as children. If they don't do these now, they'll do much worse things later."

Watching George in action, he was both spiritual and practical. He immediately connected with troubled boys and encouraged them to be their true selves. He created a stimulating sanctuary in which the boys could lose time, explore possibilities and shape their futures.

The boys pursued many creative activities. These included staging reviews at the local village hall. One performance included a sketch that depicted life at the community.

One boy played the role of George whilst another took the role of a troubled boy who wanted to come to Finchden. The dialogue that was written by the boys captured the approach taken by George. Here is an extract from the sketch performed by the boys.

GL: And what can we do for you, my boy?

Boy: Please. I want to come to Finchden. I've got schizophrenia. (Bursts into tears.)

GL: There, there, my boy. (Pats Boy vaguely on head.) You shall come to us.

Boy: Oh, thank you, sir! What shall I bring?

GL: Bring? Bring nothing.

Boy: Nothing, sir?

GL: Well - ah - my boy - bring a toothbrush. And - ah - if you have one, bring a dream.

E.F. Schumacher

Fritz Schumacher is best known for his book Small Is Beautiful. He believed that economics should serve people rather than the other way round. The aim of societies should be to enable people:

"To obtain the maximum amount of well-being with the minimum amount of consumption."

“Call a thing immoral or ugly, soul-destroying or a degradation to man, a peril to the peace of the world or to the well-being of future generations: as long as you have not shown it to be ‘uneconomic’ you have not really questioned its right to exist, grow, and prosper.”

Background

Ernst Friedrich Schumacher was born in Germany in 1911. He studied as a Rhodes Scholar at Oxford before settling in England in 1936.

After the Second World War he acted as an economic advisor to organisations helping to rebuild the German economy. He then became Chief Economic Advisor to the British Coal Board, a post he held between 1950 and 1970.

Despite playing a key role in shaping British industry, Fritz began exploring alternative models. During the 1950s he acted as an economic advisor to countries in Asia.

This led to him developing what he called Buddhist Economics. The principles he espoused included:

That good work plays a vital part in healthy human development;

That developing local resources for local needs is the most rational way of economic life;

That it is possible to empower local communities to employ appropriate technology they can use to shape their futures.

These ideas need to be seen in relation to the economic beliefs prevalent from the 1950s onwards – the belief that bigness was best. This led to building bigger schools, hospitals, factories, institutions, aid programmes and government departments.

Such an approach produced some upsides, but there were also downsides. Bureaucrats controlling the levers of power were further away from the effects of their decisions.

Small Is Beautiful

Writing in Alias Papa, Fritz's eldest daughter Barbara Wood says he made a key decision in 1970. He left full time work with the Coal Board to write the books that had been in his mind for years.

He wrote Small Is Beautiful, which was published in 1973. The book would have a remarkable effect on people for several generations. More than thirty years later, Kamran Mofid would describe the book in the following way.

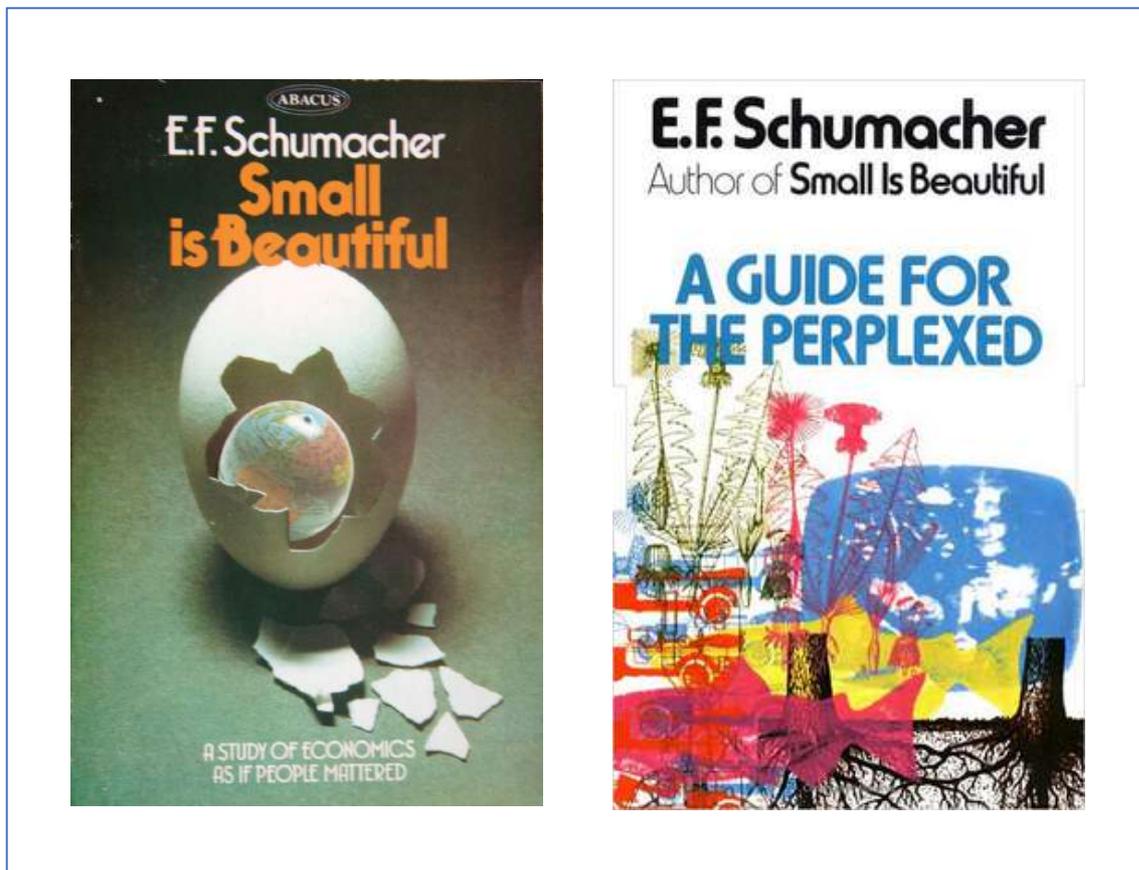

Schumacher's Small is Beautiful is an appeal to the deep instinctive understanding of the common good that all people share.

It is an appeal to our essential humanity. It deals with some of the most pressing concerns of people the world over, concerns which every generation must consider and answer.

The book encourages us to reflect on and understand things we seem to have forgotten: What is Education? What is Knowledge? What is Wisdom? What is the source of happiness and wellbeing?

What is the good life? What is the purpose of economic life? What does it mean to be a human being living on a spaceship with finite resources?

The remedy he proposed - a holistic approach to human society, which stressed small scale, localised solutions - flew in the face of economic orthodoxies of the time.

The Role Of Work

Fritz believed work had a three-fold purpose:

To provide people with useful goods and services; To provide people with the chance to use and perfect their gifts; To provide people with the chance to collaborate with others in order to liberate themselves from inbuilt egocentricity.

Ever the practitioner, Fritz began translating his ideas into action. This led to creating The Intermediate Technology Group. This enabled local communities to employ the appropriate technology to meet their needs.

The Role of Education

Fritz believed education could play a key role in enabling people to develop wisdom. Unfortunately, he said, modern education has become atomised.

Education should instead enable people to connect with the key issues of life – such as how they could be truly healthy and happy. He said that it should help people:

To act as spiritual beings; To act as neighbours and to render service; To act as responsible people; To be creatively engaged, using and developing the gifts that they had been blessed with.

Fritz believed it was vital to be true to the spirit of the Earth that has given us life. The danger was that we would become disconnected.

Therefore we needed to recognise what was truly important in life. Writing in A Guide For The Perplexed, he explained this in the following way.

The generosity of the Earth allows us to feed all mankind.

We know enough about ecology to keep the Earth a healthy place; there is enough room on the Earth, and there are enough materials, so that everybody can have adequate shelter.

We are quite competent enough to produce sufficient supplies of necessities so that no one need live in misery.

Fritz left an enduring legacy. He used his talent to enable people to do good work and build a better world. Let's explore another dimension on the road to achieving excellence.

The Great Work After Hitting Gold Approach

Different people behave in different ways after working hard and hitting a seam of gold. The way they behave can determine whether or not they maintain success.

Some people think they have made it, down tools and stop doing the good things that helped them to hit gold.

Some people keep working and follow the good habits that helped them to hit gold.

Some people go into another dimension and do great work after hitting gold.

Great champions in sports, for example, have a track record of building on their successes after winning their first major prize. They may pause for a short while to regather their strength and plan their future strategy. They then work hard to achieve ongoing success.

Looking back, can you think of a time when you did great work after hitting your equivalent of gold? You may have done this after completing a creative project, winning a competition, gaining a sale, publishing a book or doing another activity.

How did you build on the success? How did you keep doing what was working and tackle the areas for improvement? What happened as a result of taking these steps?

Imagine that you want to follow similar principles in the future. You may start by setting a clear goal. You may aim to build a business, win a part in a musical, launch a product or achieve another aim.

You may then follow your chosen guidelines – the principles you want to follow – to work towards the aim. You will keep doing the grunt work and the good work needed to reach the goal.

Imagine that you get your first hints of success. This could be winning your first customer, publishing an article or, when playing football, your team getting the first goal in a match.

Different people react in different ways when achieving the glimpses of success. Here are some of these approaches.

Some people knock off for lunch after hitting gold

A young footballer may think they have made it after making their first team debut. A company that gets its first customer may think that everything will now be easier on the way to achieving success.

Reaching the first milestone can be a cause of celebration, but it is not a reason for taking your foot off the gas. There may be a long journey ahead and it can be useful to build on the initial success.

Some people reflect, recharge their batteries and then continue doing good work after hitting gold

This is an approach I saw with successful sports teams. They followed a certain ritual after taking the lead in a match.

They educated their players: a) to buy time to pause – especially in the few seconds after scoring a goal; b) to refocus on what they were going to do next; c) to follow good habits and regain their rhythm.

Such teams kept following their guidelines – the principles they aimed to follow. This enabled them to keep controlling the game and work towards getting the desired results.

Some people make decisions that enable them to go into a new dimension and do great work after hitting gold

One travel company I worked with in the early 1990s took this approach. It launched a new offer on the day I was due to run a workshop with their leadership team.

Starting the session at 9.00, we were interrupted by two middle managers. They said something along the following lines.

"The phones are going crazy. Literally hundreds of people are calling to make bookings.

"Some are asking if we can offer them a special price if they make bookings for several holidays over the next year. What can we do?"

The company believed the new offer would be attractive but had not counted on it being so successful. The leadership team decided to capitalise on hitting gold.

The Managing Director apologised to me. Cancelling the workshop, he said the leadership team members needed to start answering the phones. Before doing so, however, the team clarified:

The specific things they could and could not offer to customers who wanted to book multiple holidays;

The specific messages they wanted the staff to give to the customers and to give these in a way that maintained the company's good reputation;

The specific things they could do to reward their staff at the end of this working day.

The leadership team acted as good models. They manned the phones, supported their staff and gave them tangible rewards. These included giving staff the chance to take their loved ones to locations offered in the new holidays.

The company increased its profits massively in the next year. Despite some of the extra work involved, the employee engagement and morale scores also increased.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may hit gold? This could be in your personal or professional life.

How can you build on this success? How can you buy time to think and settle on your strategy? How can you go into a new dimension and do great work? How can you keep developing after hitting gold?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Control, Cocooning And Creative Work Approach

Different people choose different ways to do good work during challenging times. Some concentrate on the following themes.

Control – They start by focusing on what they can control in the specific situation.

Cocooning – They create a safe and stimulating place where they can protect themselves from distracting influences.

Creative Work – They aim to build on their strengths and do creative work.

A person may take this approach for personal, professional or even political reasons. Let's explore these steps.

Control

Some individuals start by focusing on what they can control in a potentially challenging situation. Different people do this for different reasons. They may aim to do this, for example, when either:

They are embarking on a programme of medical treatment;

They are encouraging other people who face challenging circumstances;

They are aiming to spread practical hope – and retain their own sanity – when aiming to reverse climate change.

A person who wants to encourage other people, for example, may take this approach when feeling overwhelmed by events happening around the world.

Some individuals may start by aiming to be a positive model. They may then aim: a) to take simple steps; b) to set achievable goals; c) to do their best to achieve success.

One person took this approach after feeling depressed about the votes for Brexit and the 2016 US Presidential Election. They described what they did in the following way.

"I tried to be encouraging and kind in my daily life and work. The aim was to care for other people and the planet rather than to give in to cruelty."

Let's return to you own life. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to build on what you can control? What could you do to take those steps? What may be the benefits?

Cocooning

There are many forms of cocooning. Whilst Faith Popcorn popularised the term in the 1980s, it is an approach that has been followed by many people throughout history. Different people do cocooning in different ways.

Some do it by going into a sanctuary to gain comfort. Some do it by creating a safe place that is also stimulating. Some aim to do creative work by cutting off outside noise. Some do it by concentrating fully when tackling a challenge. Let's explore these themes.

Cocooning For Comfort

Some individuals follow the cocooning approach to find comfort. They may rest, sleep or spend time in their chosen sanctuary. They may gain comfort by staying home or doing other things that bring solace to their soul.

Many people take this step to recentre. They may do it for hours, days or even years. Spending time in the cocoon can help them to refresh themselves. There may come a time, however, when they want to emerge.

Such individuals may then go out into the world to learn, do a stimulating project or aim to achieve a specific goal. They may go through the process of absorption, adventure and achievement.

They may sometimes return to their sanctuaries to make sense of what is happening and regain their strength. They may then alternate between spending time in their cocoon and being creative in the world.

Cocooning For Creating

Some people follow the cocooning approach when doing creative work. Many writers, painters, sculptors, designers, thinkers and others have taken this route throughout history.

Such individuals aim to create a safe place that can also be stimulating. They aim to focus fully when pursuing their work. They therefore protect themselves from various influences that may be distracting.

As mentioned earlier, some sensitive people may aim to do work that helps to build a better world. They may therefore cocoon themselves by creating a positive environment and stop exposing themselves to negative things happening in the world.

Cocooning For Tackling Challenges

Some individuals follow the cocooning approach when tackling challenges. They often start by gathering lots of information before settling on their strategy. They then focus fully on following their chosen process for working to achieve their goal.

Many athletes, golfers and other sports people describe how they follow this approach. They talk about being in their bubble but also being present in the moment.

They may have a positive mantra they say to themselves to keep focusing on the task in hand. They stay in the present rather than get ahead of themselves. Such individuals then do their best to achieve their picture of success.

Creative Work

Different people behave in different ways when facing challenging situations. Some may choose to simply build on what they can control. They then feel more able to shape their futures.

Some may gain strength by spending time in their version of a cocoon. Some may stay there for the duration of the challenging time. Some may choose to rehearse following certain plans and then go out into the world.

Some may focus on doing creative work. They may pursue a craft, write a book, make music, develop software, provide virtual mentoring, run a business from home or do another activity.

Some may focus on following the principles of stability, stimulation and success. They gain stability by being in their safe place but they also aim to get stimulation.

Some individuals get inspiration from books, music, art, exercise or other activities. Some get it from occasionally going out into the world to find solutions to challenges or help people. They may then do creative work and aim to achieve their picture of success.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may want to follow elements of this approach? How can you do this in your own way?

What may be the specific challenging situation? How can you build on what you can control? How can you spend time in your version of a cocoon? How can you then aim to do creative work?

The Fun, Freedom And Fulfilment Approach

People like to do work that scores highly on fun, freedom and fulfilment. Those who hate their jobs feel imprisoned and frustrated. Let's explore these themes in your work.

Fun

Looking back on your life, can you think of a time when you did work that was fun? Certainly there may have been some tough times, but overall you really enjoyed the work. What made it fun?

You may have been following your vocation, doing things you loved, spending time with positive people or whatever. You may have been doing work that involved your heart, head and hands.

Sometimes it can be challenging to find or create such work. One person expressed this in the following way.

"I'd like to do work I enjoy, but it is so difficult."

Perhaps so, but try doing work you hate. That is more difficult. What the person may mean is:

"I would like to do work I enjoy, but it is hard to find somebody to pay me for doing it."

Great workers often begin their professional journey by doing work they love. Later they develop the savvy to get paid for using their strengths to help customers or employers to achieve success.

Some people feel stuck in roles they do not enjoy but then decide to move on. They make a serious plan to find more satisfying work and earn a salary. One person explained this in the following way.

"I decided to go back to my specialism rather than do general management. It took six months to make the shift."

"I began by leading more specialist projects within the business. Eventually this led to me giving up my director title and but leading projects in different countries across EMEA."

"I feel happy focusing on what I do best. General management was just an endurance test. Now I have much more fun in my work."

Let's assume that, for the time being, you want to focus on your present work. If you wish, try tackling the following exercise. This invites you to do the following things.

Describe the extent to which you have a sense of fun in your work. Rate this on a scale 0–10. Bear in mind that anything below 7/10 is a danger signal. Describe the specific things you can do to maintain or improve the rating.

Freedom

People want to feel in control of shaping their work. Daniel Pink highlighted this theme in his book Drive. Here is an introduction to his findings regarding what motivates people to do good work.

Autonomy - this is the desire to direct our own lives;

Mastery - this is the urge to get better and better at something that matters;

Purpose - this is the yearning to do what we do in the service of something larger than ourselves.

Great organisations therefore focus on managing by outcomes rather than by tasks. At the same time, however, it is vital that people fulfil their part of the professional contract and contribute to achieving the employer's goals. They therefore take the following steps to give people freedom – within parameters – to deliver the goods. They aim:

To communicate the organisations aims and the specific outcomes to achieve;

To make clear contracts with people about their contributions to delivering the outcomes;

To encourage people to deliver high professional standards and achieve the agreed outcomes.

Daniel Pink's work provides many pointers to how we can enable people to take charge of their working lives and deliver the goods. Here are some quotes from the book.

"Human beings have an innate inner drive to be autonomous, self-determined, and connected to one another. And when that drive is liberated, people achieve more and live richer lives."

"The science shows that the secret to high performance isn't our biological drive or our reward-and-punishment drive, but our third drive - our deep-seated desire to direct our own lives, to extend and expand our abilities, and to live a life of purpose."

Many fulfilled people have a freelance mentality. They may or may not be freelancers, but they feel in charge of shaping their futures. One person expressed

"I now feel more in control of my professional life. I still work for the same company. But I now feel more in control of my diary and contribution to the business."

Looking ahead, how can you feel more in control of shaping things in your work? There will always be parameters. But it is important to feel that you can follow your own principles providing you deliver the picture of success.

Start by describing an activity where you like to shape things. This could be a specific kind of project, a piece of work or tackling a certain kind of challenge.

You can certainly do such an activity in your personal life. Different rules apply, however, if you want to get paid for doing such a project in your professional life. You may then need:

To find or create such a project;

To show the potential benefits to your employer, customers or other stakeholders;

To perform superb work and deliver success.

People who take these steps often move from project to project. They may do this as a freelancer or as a full-time employee. They find that delivering the goods gives them more freedom to shape their future work.

Let's return to you own work. If you wish, try tackling the following exercise. This invites you to do the following things.

Fulfilment

Looking at your present work, imagine that you would like to shape it into something fulfilling. Bear in mind, however, that it can take time to craft your perfect role.

As mentioned earlier, there may come a point where you want to move on to find another role. Before doing that, however, you may want to explore some of the following themes regarding your work.

The Fulfilling Parts

What are the fulfilling parts of my work? What are the specific projects, tasks and other activities that I find satisfying?

Who are the kinds of customers and colleagues with whom I enjoy working? How can I use my strengths to help these people to achieve success?

How can I craft a role around my strengths? How can I get my first three customers – internal or external – and help them to succeed?

How can I produce some tangible successes – financial or otherwise – that show my employers the benefits of doing this work? How can I keep producing successes and develop my perfect role?

The Other Parts

What are the other parts of my work? How can I manage these parts more successfully? What percentage of my time do I spend on: a) the fulfilling parts; b) the other parts?

What percentage of my time am I prepared to spend on the other parts? At what point will I decide it is vital for me to focus on the fulfilling aspects of my work? What may be the trigger that gets me to look elsewhere to find another role?

How can I be proactive? How can I explore the potential future roles rather than be reactive? How can I do my best to find or create a fulfilling role in the future?

Creative people recognise that stimulating opportunities are not always advertised. They often create such roles by being savvy and showing the tangible benefits. This calls for developing win-wins for both for themselves and their employers.

People who take this step are more likely to enjoy a sense of fun, freedom and fulfilment in their work. This can make a positive contribution to their wellbeing.

The Are You Serious? Approach

This is an approach that can be used by individuals, teams or organisations. It can be particularly useful when deciding whether or not to follow a particular strategy. When doing so, it can be useful:

To clarify the specific strategy that people say they want to follow;

To clarify the pluses and minuses of following the strategy;

To clarify whether they are really serious and prepared to accept the pluses and minuses of following the strategy.

This is an approach I often used I used with leadership teams towards the end of values workshops. Let's consider one example.

The leadership team I was working with had clarified the values they believed it would be important for people in the company to follow in the future. These were:

Take Responsibility ... Encourage People ... Deliver Results ... Keep Developing

The team planned to introduce these values to their people in the following ways.

By aiming to live their values themselves;

By sharing successes stories of when people in the company had lived the values in the past;

By involving their people in sessions where they could share ideas about how the values could be lived;

By producing some quick wins that showed they would translate the values into action;

By giving people the support they needed to live the values and deliver success.

The leadership team was all set to press the button. Before they went ahead, however, I asked them to consider the following themes.

First: To explore the pluses and minuses of living the values

It was important to clarify the pluses and minuses of living the values: a) for the company – including themselves as a leadership team; b) for the customers; c) for the colleagues; d) for any other stakeholders.

Second: To explore if they were really serious about living the values

This called for inviting the leadership team members to explore the following themes.

"Bearing in mind the pluses and minuses involved, are you really serious?"

"Do you really want to aim to live the values? Because if you are, these are the implications ...

"For example, it means you: Aiming to be good models; Rewarding the behaviour you want repeated; Never walking past a quality problem.

"Bearing these things in mind, on a scale 0-10 how serious are you about aiming to really live the values?"

Are You Serious?

Because if you are:

- It means you being good models and doing what you say you are going to do;
- It means rewarding the behaviour you want repeated;
- It means never walking past a quality problem.

The leadership team explored all these themes. They did this in the following way.

They began by focusing on their own behaviour. They listed the Dos and Don'ts they needed to bear in mind – both as individuals and as a whole team – to translate the values into action.

They then explore how to encourage people to live the values. This included having a mission holder who to responsibility for finding and publicising success stories about how people in the company were living the values.

They finally focused on making tough decisions. This included never walking past a quality problem – whether this was poor service quality or people behaving in an unprofessional way – because this would be saying that such behaviour was okay.

The leadership team looked at how to offer people positive alternatives in such situations. They needed to be able to show people:

The professional standards that could be followed to do such things in the future;

The benefits of following these professional standards;

The leaders needed to give individuals the opportunity of decide if they wanted to follow the professional standards. Sometimes a person may need help to follow these standards in their own way.

If a person chose to continuing behaving in an unprofessional way, however, this would call for making a tough decision. It would mean hiring somebody who wanted to deliver the required professional standards.

The leadership team explored how they could aim: a) to build on the positive aspects of living the values; b) to manage any of the potential minuses. The latter called for rehearsing how to deal with several challenging scenarios.

The leadership team then rated their seriousness in terms of living the values. Bearing in mind the pluses and minuses involved, they rated their seriousness as 8+/10.

A postscript. I worked with this company for the next five years. During this time the feedback from the employees was that the leaders and most people in the company did live the values.

Individuals Can Also Ask Themselves: Am I Serious?

The Are You Serious? approach is one that is sometimes used by individuals. Such a person may aim:

To clarify the goal they want to achieve – the picture of success;

To clarify the strategies they can follow to achieve the picture of success;

To clarify the pluses and minuses involved in working towards achieving their picture of success.

Such an individual does their due diligence. After exploring the work involved, they may then ask themselves the following questions.

"Bearing in mind the pluses and minuses involved, how serious am I about doing what is required to reach the goals? Rate this on a scale 0-10."

Such a person makes sure the rating is at least 8+/10. They then commit themselves to doing their best to achieve the specific goal.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a situation where you may use elements of this approach?

You may aim to do it when helping a team to live their values, clarify their future strategy or take other steps. You may do it when helping a person to decide if they want to work towards achieving a specific goal.

The Building A More Self-Managing Team Approach

*	*

Imagine you are a leader who wants to build a self-managing and successful team. You may want to do this for various reasons. For example, you may aim:

To take a more strategic role in the organisation and, in the process, build a team that is more self-managing;

To, at the same time, ensure the team continues to be effective and deliver excellence;

To give people in the team the chance to grow and achieve success.

Taking these steps calls for everybody in the team taking more responsibility. This involves making clear working contracts with people about the roles they will play in the team.

One approach is to start by encouraging people to focus on the self-managing aspect. You can then move on to the various responsibilities people may need to take to build a self-managing and successful team.

If appropriate, you can gather people together and focus on the following themes.

You can clarify whether people want to build a more self-managing team

You can begin by making sure people in the team really do want to become more self-managing. They will almost certainly say they do but it is important to explain the work involved.

The old coaching rule applies: 'People must have the will before they can learn the skill.' It is vital to make a psychological contract with people that they really want to take this approach.

Some may be willing to take this step whilst others may prefer to be managed. If so, you can later make decisions about the people in the team.

You can describe the reasons for building a more self-managing team

You may have been asked to take a more strategic role, to lead several other projects, to deputise for your own manager or to do another activity. The consequences are that you will spend less time with the team.

Whilst it is possible to ask everybody to simply step up, that could also mean you still have to coordinate their efforts. It may therefore be better to have somebody who will act as your deputy.

Bearing this in mind, it can be useful to explain the background to people. You may want to say something along the following lines.

Looking to the future, I have been asked to do the following things in the organisation.

To ...

To ...

To ...

This means that to some extent my role in the team will be changing.

My responsibilities will continue to be:

To ...

To ...

To ...

My deputy's responsibilities will be:

To ...

To ...

To ...

We will, however, be asking everybody to take on more responsibility.

Later on we will be making clear contracts about the roles people can play in helping the team to deliver success.

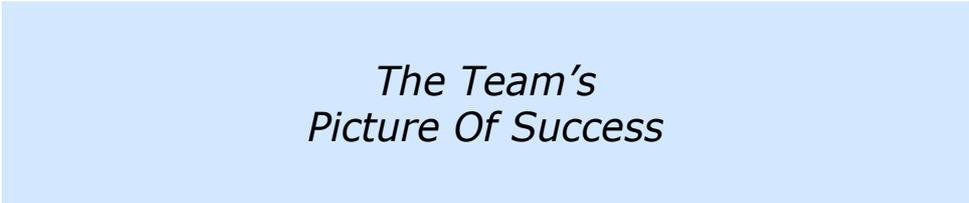

Imagine that you have set the scene. It can then be important to encourage people to focus on the big picture. This involves taking the next step.

You can remind people of the team's picture of success

You can remind people of the results the team wants to deliver by a certain date. This could be by the end of the financial year or another date. If appropriate, invite people to add suggestions to the goals and also to ask questions for information.

You will have your own approach to communicating the team's picture of success. The example given below uses the template of focusing on the Three Ps – the team's profits, products and people – but you may use another template.

Whatever approach you use, however, it is good to remind people of the big picture.

*The Team's
Picture Of Success*

The specific results we want to deliver by ... are

Profits

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

Products

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

People

- * To ...
- * To ...
- * To ...

You can involve people in clarifying the chances of achieving the picture success

Imagine that people are clear on the goals. You can then involve them in taking a reality check. Bearing in mind the things the team can control, invite each of the team members to do the following things:

To rate the team's present chances of success on a scale 0 – 10;

To describe the specific things the team can do to maintain or improve the rating.

It is important to encourage people to be honest when giving their views because this reflects their views of the present reality. Give them time to write their ratings and ideas for improvement on Post-it notes.

They can then go up in turn and put their views on a flip chart. When appropriate, these ideas can become part of the team's action plans. Here is the exercise you can invite the people to complete.

The Success Rating

Bearing in mind what the team can control, rate what you believe are the team's present chances of achieving the goals. Do this on a scale 0-10.

_____ / 10

The specific things we can do to maintain or improve the chances of success are:

* To ...

* To ...

You can invite people to clarify the various future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team

You can explain that after the session you and your deputy will be meeting with each person. The aim will be to make clear contracts about the specific contribution they each want to make towards achieving the team's goals.

You can explain that before then, however, you want to do another exercise. This also involves shifting the focus to the various future responsibilities in:

Building An Even More Self-Managing And Successful Team

You can start by giving an overview of what you see as the leader's future responsibilities – your responsibilities – in such a team.

You can then give an overview of what you see as the future responsibilities of the deputy and the team members. (If appropriate, you may also give guidance on the responsibilities of any line managers.)

Here is an introduction to some things you may mention regarding the various responsibilities. This is an extensive list but you may prefer to simply give people some overall pointers for guidance. You can then leave space for people to contribute their ideas.

The leader's future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

To make clear contracts with the Board about the team's contribution towards achieving the organisation's picture of success;

To communicate these goals to the team – because this is the scorecard we must deliver - and clarify the team's picture of success;

To make clear contracts with people about the contributions they want to make towards building an even more self-managing and successful team.

To maintain a positive culture – including providing the required air cover and support - that enables the team to be self-managing and achieve success;

To retain the overall responsibility for the team's performance and do whatever is required to enable the team to deliver success;

The deputy's future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

To meet with the leader to update them on the team's progress and check if there may be any potential future changes regarding the picture of success

To coordinate people's contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To, for example, run fortnightly meetings where people aim; a) to report what have delivered towards achieving the picture of success; b) to describe what they aim to deliver in the next fortnight towards achieving the picture of success;

To encourage the team to focus on any specific challenges they may face and find solutions to these challenges;

To focus on the specific things that can be done to support people on the road towards achieving the team's picture of success.

The team members' responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

To make clear contracts about their contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To do superb work and proactively keep other people informed about their progress towards achieving the team's goals;

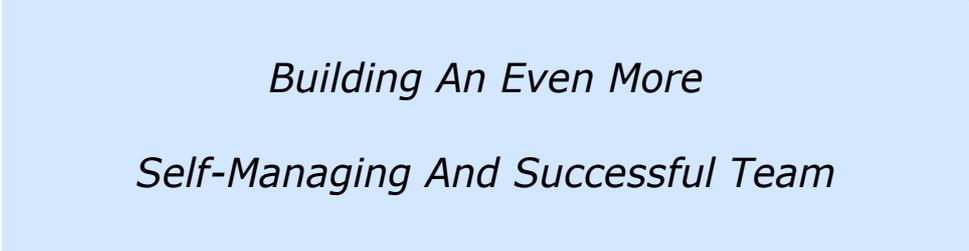

To find solutions to challenges on the way towards achieving the picture of success;

To deliver their agreed contributions towards achieving the picture of success;

To help their colleagues and the whole team to continue to build a self-managing and successful team.

You can invite people to do the following exercise regarding what they see as the responsibilities of various people. Emphasise that they can describe what they see as the leader's, deputy's and team members' responsibilities – not just their own.

Give people 15 minutes to write their ideas on Post-it notes. Each person then goes up in turn and places their ideas under the relevant headings. Invite them to also explain their suggestions.

Building An Even More Self-Managing And Successful Team

The Leader's Responsibilities

The leader's future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

* To ...

The Deputy's Responsibilities

The deputy's future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

* To ...

The Team Members' Responsibilities

The team members' future responsibilities in building an even more self-managing and successful team are:

* To ...

Discuss the suggestions that emerge. You will have the final say on the various responsibilities, of course, but it can be useful to get everybody's ideas.

If appropriate, you can also use the session to describe the attitudes and abilities that are often needed to build such teams. This can help to reinforce the kinds of responsibilities that people can choose to take in the team.

You can make clear contracts about people's contributions to helping the team achieve success

You and your deputy can meet with each person to make clear contracts about their contributions to achieving the team's goals.

When doing this, you can invite each person to do some prework before the session. One approach is to invite them to do the following exercise.

My Contribution Towards Achieving The Picture Of Success

Bearing in mind the picture of success and my strengths, the specific results I want to deliver towards achieving the team's goals are:

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

 To ...*

For example ...

Bearing in mind what is required to achieve the picture of success, you can then make clear contracts with each of them about:

The specific results they will deliver towards achieving the goals;

The specific things they will do to proactively keep people informed about their progress towards achieving the goals;

The specific support they would like to help them to achieve the goals;

The specific early successes they will aim to get on the way towards achieving the goals;

The specific things they want to do to support their colleagues and the whole team on the way towards achieving the goals.

Imagine that you and your deputy have made clear contracts with people about their contributions. If appropriate, you can then write the equivalent of a press release to describe:

The team's picture of success;

The leader's and deputy's responsibilities in helping the team to achieve the picture of success;

The team members' responsibilities in helping the team to achieve the picture of success.

The deputy can then take responsibility for organising future team meetings. These can start by focusing on the picture of success. People can then update others on: a) the progress they are making; b) the support they may need to help them to achieve the goals.

One key point. Whilst you are aiming to build a more self-managing team, it will be important to keep in touch with the deputy. They may need support in their coordination role and finding solutions to certain challenges.

You may also want to attend some team meetings but, when doing so, it can be important for the deputy to run the sessions. When appropriate, you can then pass on knowledge in a way that helps the team to continue to be self-managing and successful.

Let's return to your own work. Can you think of a situation where you may want to follow some elements of the building a self-managing team approach? How can you do this in your own way?

The Managing By Outcomes Approach

Good organisations often manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. Such organisations also get the right balance between the global purpose and the local practice. They combine the best aspects of a big organisation with the spirit of a small enterprise.

The centre communicates the purpose and the principles. The way that people practice these is up to them, within parameters, in their part of the organisation.

But this comes with a proviso: people must show how what they are doing is following the principles and contributing to the purpose.

Good leaders encourage people to think global and act local. This calls for creating an adult-adult relationship, however, with everybody taking responsibility for making their best contributions to the company.

Imagine that you lead a large organisation and are addressing all the employees. You will aim to communicate the big picture whilst also encouraging people to take ownership for the local practice.

Different leaders will do this in different ways. One approach is to say something along the following lines to explain this approach to people.

Welcome To Today's Session.

I am going to give an overview of our organisation's purpose and the part you can play in making this happen.

Later I will give some examples of how people have contributed to this purpose in the past and how they can contribute in the future.

But first let me give an outline of our overall approach to working together.

The Purpose

The purpose of our organisation is:

* To

The Principles

The principles we aim to follow to pursue our purpose are:

* To

* To

* To

The Picture Of Success

The picture of success we want to achieve in the next year that will be an expression of our principles is:

* To

* To

* To

The Practice

The way you practice these principles and contribute to achieving the picture of success will - within parameters - be up to you in your part of the organisation.

But there is a key point. You must show how what you practice supports the principles and contributes toward achieving the goals.

We want you to take time to reflect and decide if you want to contribute. If so, we will then make clear contracts with you about the outcomes you want to deliver towards achieving the picture of success.

Good leaders build on the people who want to contribute. They then take the following step.

Managing By Outcomes

Good leaders give people the big picture because they recognise that knowledge workers, for example, want context. They then manage by outcomes rather than by tasks.

They spend a lot of time with people agreeing on what must be delivered. Many people are used to writing lists of tasks and talking about what they will do. It can take time to educate them to focus on the outcomes they will deliver.

Good leaders make crystal-clear contracts about the real results to achieve. Why? Because from then on virtually every performance conversation will start by concentrating on the agreed outcomes, rather than get into supervising the tasks.

After such a contracting session, for example, here is how one team leader might describe their contribution under the Three Ps.

My Contribution To The Picture of Success

Profitability

To ensure my team achieves its financial targets – a profit of £500k.

To develop 3 new customers and do work with them that delivers a profit of £100k.

To reduce our overheads by £100k.

Products

To ensure more than 90%+ of our customers say they are extremely satisfied with our work.

To develop 2 new products and pilot these successfully with customers – then launch these products by the end of the year.

To simplify 2 of our complex products to ensure these are more user friendly for customers - then get a further £100k's worth of orders for these before the end of the year.

People

To deliver an internal morale rating of 90%+ of our team members saying they enjoy coming to work each day.

To educate, equip and enable 2 of my team members to win promotion and move on to other roles in the company.

To recruit 4 new positive team members who take responsibility, build on their strengths and get some early successes that contribute towards achieving the team's goals.

Why take this approach? People can get into a pattern of talking about details, making excuses or whatever. They may also confuse activity with results.

Certainly sometimes it is vital to revisit the aims to ensure these are still desirable and possible. Whether it concerns profits, product quality or people, however, the mantra is:

"Let's focus on the desired outcomes. How can we do our best to deliver these results?"

Sounds tough? Perhaps, but it is also a good way of leading a team. People learn:

To clarify the specific goals that are written in outcome terms;

To make clear contracts about the goals, including the required support;

To take responsibility, be creative and do their best to deliver the agreed outcomes.

Managing By Outcomes – The Rule Of Three Approach

There are many ways to encourage people to focus on the outcomes to achieve. One of the simplest is the rule of three approach.

This involves communicating the three goals to achieve. If appropriate, each of these can be broken down into three sub goals. You can then aim to bring these to life with specific examples.

Some people follow the rule of three in their lives and work. They may do this when focusing on three goals, giving three messages to people or creating a model that has three steps.

The Rule Of Three

Some people follow this rule in their lives and work.

- They may focus on three goals;
- They may communicate three messages;
- They may create a model which has three steps.

Why take this approach? People look for patterns to make sense of information. According to brain scientists, three is the easiest number for people to remember in terms of looking for patterns.

The Masterclass website gives some reasons when it can be useful to remember the rule of three. It describes this in terms of giving tips to writers but the rule often applies in other situations. Here is an excerpt from the website.

What Is The Rule Of Three?

The rule of three is a writing principle based on the idea that humans process information through pattern recognition. As the smallest number that allows us to recognize a pattern in a set, three can help us craft memorable phrases.

Good leaders sometimes communicate their team's goals by following the rule of three. They may also add three points under each heading. This makes it easier to remember than a list of nine points. Different leaders do this in different ways. Here is one framework they use.

The Team's Goals

*The three key goals
we want to achieve are:*

1) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

2) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

3) To ...

For example:

To ...

To ...

To ...

You will adapt the rule of three in your own way. Let's look at another situation where it is important to manage by outcomes.

Managing By Outcomes In Challenging Situations

Good leaders also focus on outcomes when people face challenges in their work. One leader I worked with took this approach when a team member asked them about how to deal with a problem client. The team member explained this in the following way.

"We are having problems with a difficult client. They are always complaining, even though we give good service, and this is wearing down our staff. The client is part of a culture where the bosses rule by fear, which may be why they take the same approach with us.

"The client now wants us to lower our prices. This will be difficult, however, because we make little money from our work with them. I also fear for our staff who are near breaking point. I would be grateful for any ideas you have about what we can do."

The leader listened to their team member. They then said something along the following lines.

"Thanks for the background information. Of course, I am happy to offer some ideas. Before then, however, let's look at the outcomes we want to achieve. Do we want:

"To keep the client – at least until we have found another to replace them; to keep giving good service and make some profit; to care for our staff and encourage them whilst we are trying to replace the client?"

"Are there any other things we want to achieve? Bearing these things in mind, let's explore the key things we can do to achieve these outcomes."

The leader and team member agreed on a plan: a) to continue to give good service to the existing client; b) to find a new client to replace the income stream; c) to give support to their staff in the meantime. They translated their plans into action and resolved the issue within two months.

Many leaders find that over the years their control needs get stronger. They also realise, however, that they will be judged by the performance of their people.

How to square this circle? One approach is for them to manage by outcomes rather than by tasks. This can help them to build more self-managing and successful teams.

Let's return to your own work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific situation where you may want to follow elements of the managing by outcomes approach? How can you do this in your own way.

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.

The Peak Performer's Path Approach

There are many ways to do superb work. One approach is to have a positive attitude and focus on a specific activity where you may have the ability to deliver peak performances.

Different people follow this approach in different ways. If appropriate, you may want to explore the following steps.

Passion

Many career coaches advise people to follow their passion. Others say this is not good advice. They suggest that people should focus on the things they do best.

Great workers often combine these elements. They pursue a passion where they have the ability to achieve peak performance. They may feel passionately about encouraging people, designing gardens, finding a medical cure, fighting for justice, caring for animals or doing another activity.

What are the things you feel passionately about? What are the specific activities that give you positive energy? What are the activities you feel passionately about where you may have the ability to deliver peak performances?

Purpose

Great workers translate their passion into a clear purpose. They may aim to write an article, climb a mountain, finish a marathon, teach an inspiring course, lead a team to success, build a certain kind of culture or achieve another goal.

People like to have a sense of purpose. They love to work towards achieving a compelling goal. This can provide meaning and structure to their days.

Imagine that you want to follow one of your passions and translate this into a clear purpose. You may want to express this purpose by working to achieve a specific goal.

You may want to write an article, teach a seminar, create a website for people with a particular illness or do some other project. What will be the benefits of achieving this purpose - both for you and for other people?

Bearing in mind the work involved, how would you rate your motivation to pursue the project? Rate this on a scale 0 – 10. Make sure the rating is at least 8+/10. Will achieving this goal give you a sense of peace?

Principles

Great workers often have a have a clear philosophy about their life or work. They then translate this into action by following their chosen principles.

Such individuals take this approach whether counselling people, coaching a sports team, leading a business or doing other kinds of work. They focus on the principles they want to follow and translate these into practice.

Imagine that you are focusing on doing a specific activity. What are the principles you want to follow when doing the work? How can you be super professional when translating these into action?

How can you build on your strengths and manage the consequences of any weaknesses? How can you follow your successful style of working? How can you get the right people around you who will complement your strengths?

How can you maintain good habits? How can you keep doing the right things in the right way every day? How can you make sure you are still on the road to achieving your picture of success?

Problem Solving

Great workers find solutions to challenges. Some even use setbacks as a springboard to success. You will do this in your own way, but it can be useful to ask some of the following questions.

Looking ahead, what may be some of the difficulties I may face on the journey? What can I do to prevent some of these difficulties happening? How can I manage these difficulties if, despite my best efforts, they do happen?

What can I do to stay calm during a crisis? How can I buy time to think and explore the options for going forwards? How can I find creative solutions to challenges? How can I then pursue my chosen option and do my best to achieve success?

Peak Performance

Great workers do their best to deliver the goods. How can you do whatever is necessary to reach the goals? How can you always do the basics and then add the brilliance?

How can you encourage yourself on the journey? How can you manage your energy properly? How can you make good use of your prime times – the times of the day when you have most energy? How can you build in time to rest, reflect and refocus?

How can you keep improving? How can you keep focusing on: a) the specific things you are doing well and how you can do more of these; b) the specific things you can do better and how?

How can you be a good finisher? What is your successful pattern for finishing? How can you follow it when doing your chosen activity? How can you flow, focus and finish? How can you add that touch of class? How can you achieve peak performance?

Passing On Knowledge

Great workers sometimes want to go beyond doing fine work. They want to share what they have learned with other people. How can you do this in your own way? It can be useful to start by focusing on the What, Why, Who, How and When.

The What

What is the knowledge you want to pass on? This may depend on the project or other activity you have been pursuing.

You may have learned lessons from gardening, counselling, building houses, managing crises, coding, leading teams, solving particular problems or whatever.

The Why

Why would you like to pass on this knowledge? What would be the benefits for people? What are the practical tools they could take away and use in their daily lives and work? How could these things help them to succeed?

The Who

Who would you like to reach with the knowledge? Would they be young people, those with learning difficulties, budding entrepreneurs, athletes, leaders, scientists, social entrepreneurs, therapists or other people?

What would be the characteristics of these people? Would they be motivated and wanting to learn? What other qualities would you like to see in your ideal students?

The How

How would you like to share your knowledge with people? Different people prefer different methods for sharing know how. They may prefer, for example:

To act a positive model and show what good looks like on a daily basis by, for example, running a business;

To act as a mentor, coach, trusted advisor or to run teaching sessions, seminars, workshops or other forms of education;

To write articles, create websites, write blogs, produce learning materials, make videos, make television programmes or whatever.

The When

When do you want to share the ideas with people? What would be your preferred setting? Would you like to run a seminar, produce a blog, run a coaching session or whatever?

Peace

Great workers love to do their best. This can lead to them enjoying a sense of peace, which can take different forms.

A person who is adrenaline-driven may enjoy stretching themselves and reaching a specific goal. This may be followed by a rush of satisfaction and feeling high.

Such a person may then enjoy a sense of peace, but this may only last for a short while. They will then move on to planning the next mountain they want to climb.

Let's return to your own life and work. Looking ahead, can you think of a specific activity where you would like to follow elements of the performer's path? How can you do this in your own way?

The Taking Control Approach

Control

On a scale 0-10, to what extent do you feel in control of shaping your future?

A green arrow pointing to the right, containing a scale from 0 to 10. The numbers 0 through 10 are written in white inside the arrow's shaft. The arrow's tip is a solid green arrowhead.

People like to feel in control. They like to feel able to take charge of shaping their future lives. Sometimes they can experience difficulties, however, if they feel things are beyond their control.

A person can only do their best and there are events they can't control. But they can choose their attitude regarding how they respond to such events.

During the past 50 years I have worked with many people who have explained they have distressing symptoms. They have said some of the following things.

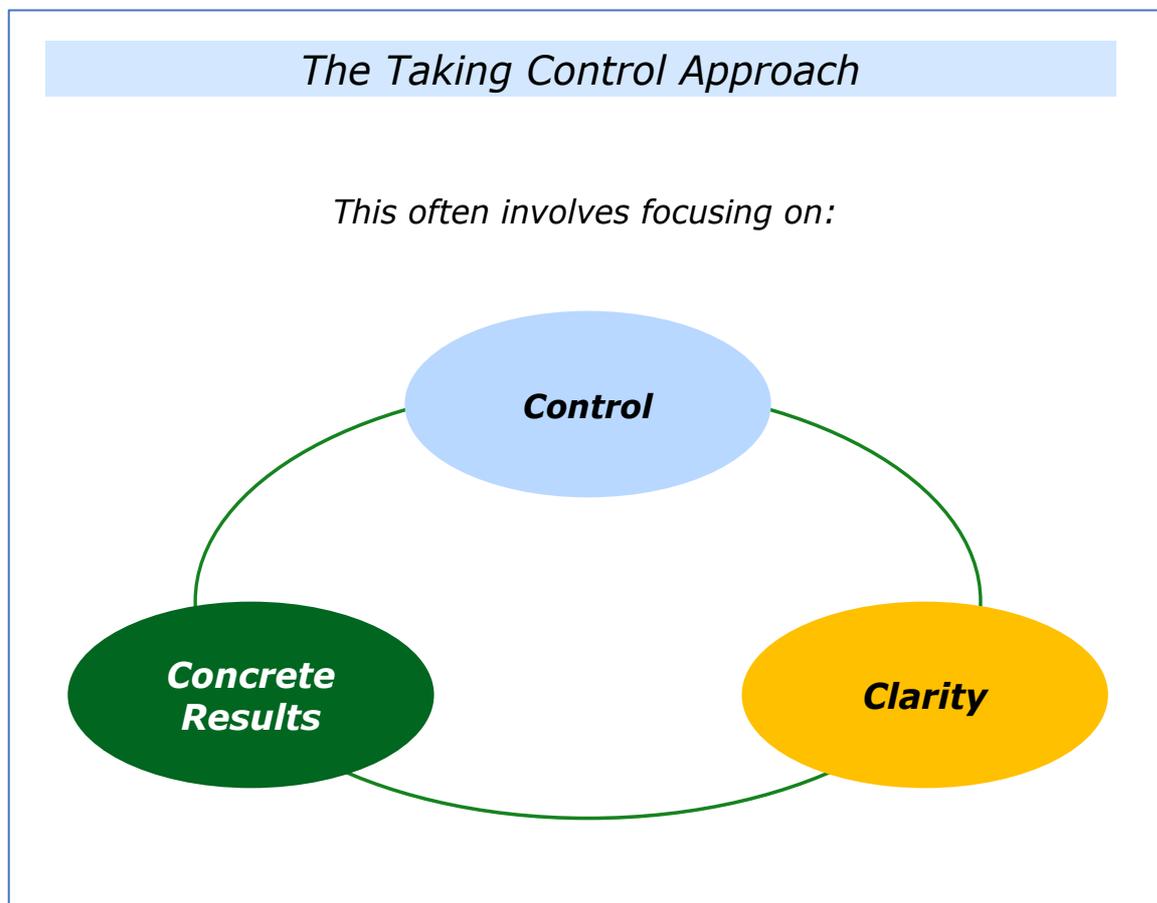

"I am feeling stressed ... I have lots of mood swings ... I am no longer enjoying my work ... I am in a situation where I feel trapped ... I am beginning to have panic attacks."

Sometimes there may be medical reasons for these symptoms. When appropriate, I therefore suggest that they consult a doctor to check for any medical causes. There is one question, however, that I ask. This is:

"On a scale 0-10, to what extent do you feel in control of shaping your future?"

People who feel healthy often give a rating of 7+/10. They recognise that there may always be events that are beyond their control, but they feel able to deal with most situations.

As mentioned, people like to feel in control of their lives. There are many different models for taking this approach. One of these involves focusing on the following themes.

- Control

You can clarify the specific things you can control in the situation;

You can take control of the specific things you can control.

- Clarity

You can clarify the What – the real results you want to achieve and the desired picture of success;

You can clarify the How – the key strategies you can follow to give yourself the greatest chance of achieving success.

- Concrete Results

You can follow your chosen strategies and work towards your goals;

You can do your best to achieve the desired picture of success.

The Focusing On Your Life Goals Approach

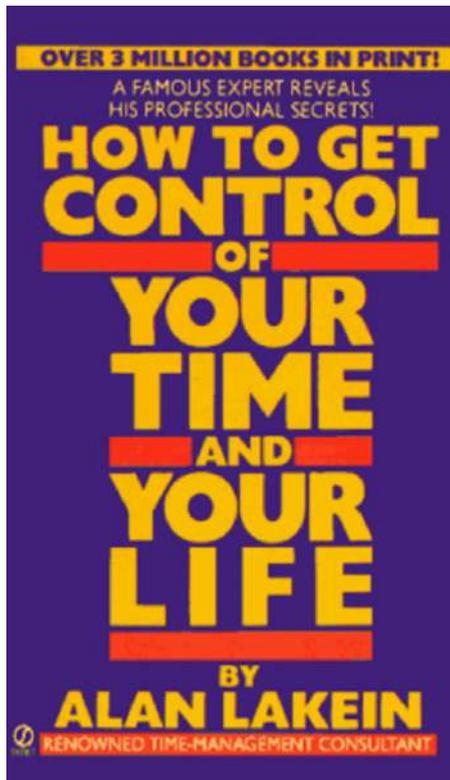

As mentioned many times, healthy people aim to build on what they can control and manage what they can't. They also keep focusing on their life goals.

There have been many books on this topic. One of the most influential was Alan Lakein's 1970 book How To Get Control Of Your Time And Your Life.

Many of the ideas seem commonplace now, but many people found them helpful. Here are some ideas from the book.

Keep focusing on your lifetime goals – put these in a place where you can see these each day.

Clarify your A, B and C priorities – remember these may evolve over time.

Focus on your top priorities – do something towards these each day and get some quick successes.

Do weekly & daily planning – schedule your time so you have the chance to do things properly.

Cross off items as you do them – this will give you the feeling of success.

Ask Alan Lakein's question:

"What is the best use of my time right now?"

The following pages show one way that a person can apply Alan's approach. This can also help them with their priority management. A person can use this:

To focus on their life goals – such as clarifying their A, B and C goals together with the sub-goals under each category;

To focus on their priorities – such as the specific actions they want to take towards achieving their A, B and C goals.

As mentioned earlier, different people applied Alan's ideas in different way. The next pages describe one framework that people use to focus on their priorities.

This is followed by a piece that describes how some people realign themselves and their daily actions with their life goals.

My Life Goals

The following pages describe the three main goals I want to work towards achieving in my life.

These are listed as my A, B and C goals – together with the sub-goals under each of these.

Therefore I have my A1, A2, A3 goals and so on.

The Realigning Yourself With Your Life Goals Approach

Some people encounter experiences that encourage them to reflect on life. They may then choose to realign themselves and their actions with their life goals.

Different people take this step after different experiences. They may have an illness, suffer a setback or experience a life-changing event.

Some of the more fortunate people took these step after the Covid pandemic. They took time to reassess their priorities and focus on what they wanted to do in their lives.

Some realised they wanted to spend more quality time with their family as well as doing satisfying work. This led to them changing their lifestyle and doing something each day towards their life goals.

Looking back, can you think of a situation when you refocused on your life goals? What did you do then to take this step? What did you do well to follow up on your action plan? With the benefit of hindsight, what do you think you could have done better to implement your plans?

Looking to the future, can you think of situation when you may want to take time to reflect and realign yourself with your life goals? What can you do then to do these steps?

Different people use different frameworks when focusing on these themes. Here is one framework that they follow. You will, of course, use your own approach to realigning yourself with your life goals.

The One Year To Live Approach

One Year To Live

The specific things I would aim to do if I had one year to live would be:

* To ...

* To ...

* To ...

There are many ways to focus on what it is important in life. This is an exercise that a person can use to follow this approach. It invites them to clarify what they would do if they had one year to live.

The exercise is slightly different from the classic Bucket List. It encourages a person to immediately focus on doing what is important in life. It invites them to explore the following questions.

What would you do if you had one year to live?? Who are the people you would like to spend time with? How would you like to behave towards these people?

You may want to continue to work to support your loved ones, but what else would you do? What would be your priorities? How could you take steps towards pursuing these aims?

Looking at your life, what are the specific things that give you positive energy? How could you do more of these things? How could you deal with any things that give you negative energy?

How could you encourage yourself and other people? What would be the Dos and Don'ts? How could you follow these principles to help yourself and other people?

What are the positive things you want to give to people during the rest of your life? If appropriate, how can you pass on your knowledge? Many people want to feel at peace when they die. What can you do to increase the chances of experiencing a sense of peace?

Bearing in mind what you have written, how can you take steps to doing some of these things in your daily life and work? What may be the benefits – both for yourself and other people?

Different people write different things when doing this exercise, but some common themes often emerge. These include individuals writing the following things.

I would aim:

To be kind ... To encourage people ... To build on what I can do rather than worry about what I can't do ... To appreciate the simple things in life ... To take more walks with my dog ... To see every day as a bonus.

To do the things in which I feel alive ... To go to more concerts, art galleries and other events ... To plant trees for future generations ... To pass on knowledge that can help people to succeed.

Let's return to your own life and work. What are the things you would aim to do if you had one year to live? How can you take steps to do some of those things now? What would be the benefits?

If you wish, try tackling the exercise on this theme. This invites you to complete the following sentences.
